Originally built around a port, settled on the 15th century, its name derived from N'kran meaning for "ants" in local Akan, a reference to the numerous anthills seen in the countryside around Accra, founded in 1898.

Names of main towns

Kumassi, Tamale, Cape-coast, Sekondi-takoradi.

Date of Independence

6th March 1957.

Religions (Major)

Christian 68.8% (Pentecostal/Charismatic 24.1%, Protestant 18.6%, Catholic 15.1%, Muslim 15.9%, others 11%, traditional 8.5%, other 0.7%, none 6.1%.

Main spoken languages
Asante, Ewe, Fante, Boron (Brong), Dagomba, Dangme, Dagarte (Dagaba), Akyem, Akuapem, widely spoken including English (official) are major languages.

Currency unit

Ghana Cedi (GHC) =100 Pesewas.

Area in Km2

238,533.00

Country area comparison in Africa

34 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms ;-

Average annual population growth rate 1.855 %

Birth rate 28.9 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 8.93 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 60.55 years

Male 59.36 years ; Female 61.78 years;

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 23, Female:34

Average per capita income

USD 2, 500

Population density

94.5/km2

Urban population (%)

49

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, fishing:35

Industry: 20

Social service: 45

Main Export Items

Gold, Cocoa, Timber, Tuna, Bauxite, Aluminium, Manganese ore, Diamonds, Horticulture.

Economy is based on Agriculture.

Climate

Tropical; Warm & comparatively dry along southeast coast; Hot & humid in southwest; Hot and dry in north.

Extremes;-

Lowest point; The Atlantic Ocean 0 mtr.

Highest point: Mt. Afadjato 800 mtrs.

Weather of the Capital city (Accra) average annual temperature 26.60c.

Altitude
27 mtrs/200 ft

Hottest Month
March-April 24-31oc.

Coldest Month
August 22-27oc.

Driest Month
January 15mm average Rf.

Wettest Month
June 178 mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

GMT/UTC+0

Public holidays

January1, March 6 (Independence day), Good Friday, Easter Saturday & Sunday, July 1 (Republic day), Christmas, Boxing day.

Ethnic groups

Akan 45.3%, Mole-Dagbon 15.2%, Ewe 11.7%, Ga-Dangme 7.3%, Guan 4%, Gurma 3.6%, Grusi 2.6%, Mande-Busanga 1%, other tribes 9.2%.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Most of Ghana consists of low fertile plains & scrubland cut by river by the artificial lake Volta. Lake volta is one of world's artificial lakes. Environment: recurrent drought in north severely affects agricultural activities; deforestation; overgrazing; soil erosion; poaching and habitat destruction threatens wildlife populations; water pollution; inadequate supplies of potable water.

Economy Overview

Industry

Aluminium smelting, light industry, mining, lumbering, manufacturing, food processing, cement, small commercial ship-building.

Chief crops

Cocoa (70% of export), coffee, rice, cassava, peanuts, corn, shea-nuts, bananas, timber.

Natural resources

Crude-oil, Gold, Manganese ore, Industrial diamonds, Bauxites, Timber, Fish, Rubber, Silver, Salt, Limestone, Hydro-power.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 28

Grassland: 37

Forest woods: 24

Other: 11

Marine:

Coastline; 539 km.

Commercial Sea ports:-

Accra (Tema-Harbour), Sekondi-Takoradi

Development prospect;

Ghana is the world's second largest cocoa producer behind Ivory Coast, and Africa's biggest gold miner after South Africa. It is one of the continent's fastest growing economies, and newest oil producer. The government will need to speed its revenues from oil, gold and cocoa wisely, as prices of these commodities look likely to decline during the year ahead. Scrutiny of the mining sector by the government's Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has become more rigorous. EPA uses a new rating system, known as Akoben – 'war horn' in the Akan language – to name and shame poor performers. Anglogold Ashanti, Goldfields Ghana and Prestea Sankofa Gold had slipped down the environmental list in 2011, and bottom was the Ghana Bauxite Company, in which China's Bosai Minerals recently acquired an 80% stake.

Scientists at the Centre for Environmental Impact Analysis say that host communities in the gold-rich Western Region face a wide range of medical hazards caused by toxic chemicals such as arsenic, cadmium, mercury, zinc, manganese, lead, cobalt and platinum. But the communities are not blameless. When Adamus Resources began operations in Teleku-Bokazo, they were forced to demolish 3,000 illegal, empty structures, built only to obtain compensation.

NGOs have expressed concern about the increasing encroachment by prospecting mining companies into the country's forest reserves. Hannah Owusu Koranteng of pressure group WACAM says the practice contravenes the national land policy adopted in 1999, and that at the current rate of destruction Ghana will lose its forest reserves in 23 years.

Top 24 Richest And Poorest Countries Of Africa – 2020 Edition

By Stephanie Rheingold Last updated Oct 23, 2021

Ghana

Credit: The Only Way Is Ghana

Ghana accounts for a total GDP of $68.26 billion. The country has a rich and vast economy, placing it 9th in terms of highest GDP in Africa, right after Ethiopia.

> The position of their GDP has increased with a lot of management plans that they have applied to improve the country's position. With it being blessed with natural resources, the country continues to rely on it as a source of income. With a population of 31.07 million people its GDP per capita stands at $2,262.
> Ghana's economy continued to expand in 2019, with real GDP growth estimated at 7.1%. High growth momentum since 2017 has consistently placed Ghana among Africa's 10 fastest-growing economies.
>
> Nominal GDP Rank: #9

Yussif Issah Oyen

.

Follow OTC Drugs Seller at Pharmaceuticals (2013 present)May 28

Private media outlet Class Media Group firebombed in Ghana

On April 25, a group of unidentified men firebombed Class Media Group's office, in the Labone district of Ghana's capital Accra, and fled the scene. (Screenshot My C TV/YouTube)

Abuja, May 6, 2024—Authorities in Ghana should swiftly and comprehensively conclude their investigation of the April 25 firebomb attack on Class Media Group's office, hold those responsible to account, and ensure that journalists at the media outlet can work safely, said the Committee to Protect Journalists on Monday.

On April 25, four unidentified men on two motorbikes threw petrol bombs inside the privately owned Class Media Group's office in the Labone district of Ghana's capital Accra, and fled the scene, according to media reports and Class Media Group Operations Officer Theodore Edwards, who spoke to CPJ by phone.

Class Media Group owns nine local radio stations across the country, including Class 91.3FM, Accra 100.5FM, KUMASI 104.1FM, No.1 105.3FM Accra , Ho FM, Adehyee FM, Taadi FM, Dagbon FM and Sunyani FM; the C TV television broadcaster, and the Class FM news site, according to Patrick Ayumu, an editor with the website who spoke with CPJ by phone and messaging app.

The Accra attack shattered the media outlet's door, including the entryway glass leading to the office corridor, but no staff members were injured, according to Edwards and Ayumu, and footage of the attack reviewed by CPJ.

"Authorities in Ghana must swiftly and comprehensively conclude their investigation into the firebomb attack on Class Media Group's office in Accra, ensure that the attackers are held to account, and step-up actions to ensure that the press can operate safely," said Angela Quintal, head of CPJ's Africa program, in New York. "This attack is a frightening reminder of the dangers media workers face in Ghana, where the murder of journalist Ahmed Hussein-Suale Divela in January 2019 remains unsolved, and numerous attacks on other journalists are carried out with impunity."

Edwards told CPJ that Class Media occasionally received online complaints about their reporting, which covers a wide variety of subjects, but the complaints were general and did not seem linked to the attack. Edwards and Ayumu told CPJ that they did not immediately see a motive for the attack on their office.

Class Media Group reported the firebomb attack to police on April 25, but Ayumu said on Friday May 3, that police were still investigating and had not updated them on any developments.

On April 26, President of the Ghana Independent Broadcasters Association Cecil Thomas Sunkwa-Mills condemned the attack, said that it was crucial for police to investigate, and called on Class Media's management to increase its office security, according to Ayumu and a media report.

In an earlier incident in Accra, on January 16, 2019, men on a motorcycle shot and killed Ghanaian journalist Ahemed Hussein-Sale Divela, and those responsible have yet to be identified and held accountable. Last year, CPJ documented a years-long pattern of impunity in attacks on the press in Ghana.

CPJ's calls and text messages on May 3 to the Ghana police spokesperson, Grace Ansah-Akrofi, went unanswered.

No accountability after Ghanaian journalists attacked while covering illegal mining

\The bloodstained jacket of journalist Ohemeng Tawiah is shown. Armed men attacked Tawiah with stones and machetes after he and his camera operator joined a police team investigating allegations of illegal mining at a site in Ghana's northern Ashanti region on December 20, 2024. (Photo: Courtesy of Tawiah)

Abuja, February 6, 2025—Armed men, some wearing military camouflage, attacked journalist Ohemeng Tawiah with stones and machetes on December 20, 2024, after Tawiah and his camera operator, Joseph Kusi, joined a police team investigating allegations of illegal mining at a site in Ghana's northern Ashanti region.

Tawiah told CPJ he provided police with a written statement about the assault on January 2, 2025, as well as phone numbers and photos of those who led the attackers, which he obtained through his own investigations. No one has been arrested in the case.

"Environmental reporting is an increasingly dangerous beat in Ghana, and it is essential that authorities identify and hold accountable those responsible for attacking journalist Ohemeng Tawiah," said Angela Quintal, head of CPJ's Africa program, from New York. "Ghanaian authorities must swiftly and thoroughly conclude their investigation and publicly share their findings. This is crucial to preventing the culture of impunity that often surrounds the targeting of the press in the country."

Tawiah, assistant news editor at the privately owned Joy News outlet, had reported on allegations of illegal mining at the site earlier in December and told CPJ he obtained permission from police to join and report on their investigations.

At the site's entrance, police arrested some suspected illegal miners, Tawiah told CPJ. Armed men then arrived, demanded the release of the men, and then began throwing stones at police, Tawiah, and other civilians waiting inside a police vehicle.

As Tawiah tried to escape, a stone hit his chest, and he fell to the ground, he told CPJ. When the attackers caught up, they attacked him with stones and machetes. They also took the reporters' phones and money and destroyed Kusi's camera.

Tawiah said he bled profusely from a major cut to his head, was hospitalized for two days, and was treated for injuries to his head, chest, and fingers, and multiple cuts to his body, including what appeared to be attempts to cut off his leg. He still suffers from severe chest pains and headaches. Kusi was uninjured.

CPJ's calls and text messages to police spokesperson Grace Ansah-Akrofi asking for updates on the investigation did not receive any replies.

GUINEA

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

Guinea became a French colony in the late 19th century. It became independent in October 1958, 2 years earlier than the other French African colonies, because it rejected de Gaulle's offer of membership of the French Community (a short-lived structure which gave France's colonies limited autonomy within the French empire). Guinea was the only country of the French African Empire to reject de Gaulle's proposal, and the country's historic "Non" led to it being abandoned by the French who immediately cut all ties. This reinforced a proud sense of independent nationhood in Guinea which still resonates today. Ahmed Sekou

Touré, who became the first President, ruled as an autocrat and suppressed opposition, often on the pretext of defending the country against destabilisation by foreign powers. Cut off by France, Touré isolated Guinea from Western influence and allied himself with the Soviet bloc. Hundreds of thousands of Guineans went into exile. Sekou Touré died in 1984, and was succeeded by General Lasana Conté following a bloodless coup.

Conté's moves to initiate a more open style of government were welcomed by the population. However an attempted coup in July 1985 bought the regime's authoritarian instincts to the fore - thousands were arrested and dozens executed. Conté soon reverted to the oppressive methods of the Sekou Touré years. Following President Conté's death on 22 December 2008, a bloodless coup occurred with Capt Moussa Dadis Camara taking power. On 28 September 2009, 156 peaceful protestors were killed by Guinean security forces. There were also reports of mass rapes and other human rights atrocities. The United Nations Secretary General commissioned an inquiry into the events and their report clearly identified Dadis Camara and other leading figures in the Guinean regime as responsible for the murders. On 3 December 2009, Dadis Camara was shot in the head by his aide de camp, Toumba Diakite, during an argument about responsibility for the massacre on 28 September. He was taken to Morocco for medical treatment then subsequently moved to Burkina Faso where he currently resides. A political agreement was signed in Ouagadougou on 15 January 2010 which provided an opportunity for a return to democratic principles and, on 26 January 2010, Interim President, General Sekouba Konate appointed a civilian Prime Minister, Jean-Marie Dore, and a government of national unity from the civilian side to lead a transitional government to Presidential elections in 2010. The Republic of Guinea held its first democratic Presidential elections in 2010 and President Alpha Conde took office in December 2010. Alpha Conde has committed his government to reform of the management of the country, after decades of poor governance, to the benefit of all Guinea's people. The priorities are water, electricity, jobs and reform of the security sector. The outlook is broadly positive for the first time in many years. The next milestone in Guinea's democratic transition will be the holding of peaceful legislative elections. These elections are overdue, having been expected in 2011.

Guinea achieved official independence in 2nd October, 1958 from France as Mr. Ahmed Sekou Toure it's native prime minister soon to become founder president of the "Republic of Guinea" at independence in October, 1960. It was the first country granted independence by France in West Africa.
Guinea refused what it considered to be a 'neo-colonial' association with France after independence and as a result France curtailed all aid to the new state.

Headship sice independence; Head of instrumental self-administration

After independence Guinea adopted socialist policies which brought isolation from the West and economic stagnation.

In 1984 a militay coup was followed the death of founding president Ahmed Sekou Toure brought in a military government until 1990, after which Guinea began the transition to a multiparty democratic system.

On the 23rd of December, 2008 a group of soldiers under Captain Mousa Dadis Camara, a onetime logistics officer in the Guinean army staged a coup, as exactly copied from his predecessor suspending the constitution as well as political parties activities, announced an administrative, the "National Council for Democracy and Development" which it's far main task to organize free election in a couple of years, shortly after the long term president Lansana Conte had died the previous evening.

Captain Mousa Daddis Camara was shot in the head on the 3rd December, 2009 when a former top aide (Aide-de-camp), called Leutenant Aboubacar Sidiki Toumba Diakite tried to kill him when he was getting all the blame for the massacre of the Conakry Football Stadium that armed soldiers opened fire on public gathering killing over 157 people and injuring over many others.

The country’s first democratic elections were carried out in June 2010 but there was no outright winner, occasioning a run-off election scheduled for Augist 1, 2010. A successful conclusion of elections in Guinea & Cote D' Ivoire is expected to improve political stability among west African states and boost the regional economy. Guinea is a country rich in mineral wealth, although it's people are among the poorest in the world.

A Republic in West Africa.

In mid-ninteenth century the French arrived and proclaimed the now coastal regions of Guinea a French protectorate, that's on about 1849. In 1895 the French Guinea became part of the federation of French west Africa. In 1946 it was made part of an overseas territory of France, and it achieved official independence in October, 1958 with Mr. Ahmed Sekou Toure, as native prime minister, soon to become founding president of the republic of Guinea. Mr. Sekou Toure ruled the Life of the nation, i.e. the political, the Judicial, administrative, economic and technical aspects of Guinea for further quarter a century until his sudden death on the 26th of March, 1984. A military coup was carried out a week after the death of the long standing president, who had ruled since the country's independence in October, 1958. A coup staged by the then Army chief of staff Lt. Colonel Lansana Conte on the 5th April, 1984, and then he later found a sole political party of his own and won elections in 1993 and was re - elected in 1998 and in 2003, claimed that he secured 95% of the vote, but all the elections were marred by accusations of fraud. Lt. Colonel Lansana Conte who tookover power in a military coup after the death of his predecessor in 1984, he died on the 21st of December, 2008, after a long illness of diabates and blood cancer (Leukhemia).

Guinea has had a history of authoritarian rule since gaining it's independence from France in 1958, on the 23rd of December, 2008 a group of soldiers under Captain Mousa Dadis Camara, a onetime logistics officer in the Guinean army staged a coup, as exactly copied from his predecessor suspending the constitution as well as political parties activities, announced an administrative, the "National Council for Democracy and Development" which it's far main task to organize free election in a couple of years, shortly after the long term president Lansana Conte had died the previous evening. Captain Mousa Daddis Camara was shot in the head on the 3rd December, 2009 when a former top aide (Aide-de-camp), called Leutenant Aboubacar Sidiki Toumba Diakite tried to kill him when he was getting all the blame for the massacre of the Conakry Football Stadium that armed soldiers opened fire on public gathering killing over 157 people and injuring over many others. He has been treated in a hospital in Morocco, which touched part of his brain, is so severe that he might not return to the post in any condition that would not make him relevant anymore in the country's affairs, he is currently in a voluntary exile in Burkinafaso. General Sekouba Konate, a colleague is now acting in charge of Guinea and head of the military ruling council, a position he is likely to occupy until Guinea holds an election on the 27th of June, 2010, a framed time the army has promised to step down after the poll, which guineans are looking forward to an end to military rule. He, pledged to pave the way for a return of civilian rule by forming, a six month transitional government, leading to elections. The Interim government should also realize that it is not enough to hold only elections, democratic institutions such as an independent Judiciary, functional legislature as well as a workable and generally acceptable constitution, must be in place which that had been outlawed for decades by the Guinean military. Indeed, Guinea holds a presidential election regarded as the west African country's first democratic vote since independence in 1958, the poll follows a pledge by military ruler Colonel Sekouba Konate to return Guinea to civilian rule and, he has vowed not to stand or allow any members of his administration to do so. The first round of the vote seen as Guinea's first democratic vote since independence in 1958, raising hopes of an end to military and authoritarian rule in the mineral rich country. There is real optimism that the vote could finally drive the army out of Guinean politics, leaving democratically chosen leaders to try to improve people's lives. Guinea has been ruled by a succession of military and civilian autocrats since independence in 1958.

Politics: President Ahmed Sekou Toure has ruled as a dictator until his death in 1984. His successor Lt. Colonel Lansana Conte similarly dispensed with democratic niceties. As a result, Guinea has never had a democratic transition until 2010. Following Conte's death in 2008, a military junta took power headed by Captain Moussa Dadis Camara. Amid international isolation, the junta made life more impossible for itself when soldiers shot dead 157 opposition protesters on September 28, 2009. The rally was held in retaliation to rumours that Capt Camara would stand in elections in January after previously saying he would not. Following an assassination attempt, Camara was taken to Morocco for treatment and thereafter prevailed to relocate to Burkina Faso, ostensibly for recuperation but apparently into forced exile. The forced exile imposed with the reported acquiscence of ECOWAS to prevent him from interfering in the democratic transition programme that was initated by his successor, Gen Sekouba Konate. The country first democratic elections were carried out in June 2010 but there was no outright winner, occasioning a run-off election scheduled for Augist 1, 2010

Economy: Most of Guinea's people live on less that $1 a day despite the fact that Guinea is a leading bauxite exporter. Recent strikes in opposition to the current military government have had enative implications on the nation's economy, particularly the mining industry. Nonetheless, the democratic political transition has opened way for new improved mining contracts with mining companies and especially the Chinese government

Social: On the November 9,2009 the UN approved $416,056 from its Central Emergency Response Fund to restore medical supplies and help treat people wounded in the September 28 violence. There were reports of the public rape of women during the September 28 rally. The sexual assaults were said to have been predominantly carried out by Capt Camara's presidential guard, the "berets rouges". Ethnic and national tensions have coalesced around the issue of refugees. Victims of the Sierra Leonean and Liberian civil wars were initially welcomed in the early and middle 1990s. However, when the country's border towns were attacked in 2000, President Conté made a radio address in which he accused the refugees of harbouring rebels and ordered them to leave the country. At the latest, the veteran opposition politician Mr. Alpha Conde defeated the ex-Prime Minister Mr. Cellou Dalein Diallö in the run-off presidential election in Guinea on the 7th of november, 2010. The re-run, which was postponed many times and characterised controversies, had become necessary as the election of the 27th of June, 2010 did not produce a clear winner. The declaration of Mr. Alpha Conde, who won 52.52% of the votes, was greeted with violent protests by Mr. Celou Diallo's supporters, leading the military government to declare a state of emergency until the confirmation of the result by the country's Supreme Court. The election is intended to return the country to a civilian rule after a military coup in December, 2008 following the death of Colonel Lansana Conte, who ruled the country for twenty five years. President -elect Alpha Conde will become the fifth leader of Guinea in the first democratic transition of government since independence in 1958. A successful conclusion of elections such in Guinea & Cote D' Ivoire is expected to improve political stability among west African states and boost the regional economy.Guinea is a country rich in mineral wealth, although it's people are among the poorest in the world.

Major Conflicts

Military Coup

When: 2008

Who: Captain Moussa Dadis Camara and military vs the government (just a few hours after President Lansana Conte died)

Why: Governmental Control

Outcome: Capt Camara became the leader of the new.

Guinea has the wettest capital on earth, with 3.7 metres of rain a year. Labé: Guinea's crossroads community for travel to Senegal and Guinea Bissau La Dame du Mali: a rock face that resembles an elegant woman's head.

Accession to power of president Alpha Conde, by election.

Tentative election calendar-Election pending for June, 2010.

Guinea – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

1891 - France declares Guinea to be a colony, separate from Senegal.

1898 - Defeat of resistance to French occupation led by Samory Toure, great-grandfather of futurePresident Ahmed Sekou Toure.

1906 - Guinea becomes part of French West African Federation.

1952 - Ahmed Sekou Toure becomes secretary-general of the Democratic Party of Guinea.

October 1958 - Guinea becomes independent, with Ahmed Sekou Toure as president.

1965 – President Ahmed Sekou Toure breaks off diplomatic relations with France after accusing it of plotting to oust him.

March 1984 – Founder president Sekou Toure dies.

April 1984 – Colonel Lansana Conte and Diarra Traore seize power in bloodless coup. Lansana Conte becomes president while Traore is installed as prime minister.

1985 - Attempted coup organized by Traore following his demotion to education minister.

1990 - Constitution paving the way for civilian government is adopted.

1993 - First multiparty elections are held; Conte confirmed in office.

1995 - Conte's Party of Unity and Progress wins 71 of the National Assembly's 114 seats.

1996 - Some 30 people are killed and presidential palace set on fire as 25% of Guinea's armed forces mutiny over low pay, poor conditions.

September 2000 - Alpha Conde, leader of opposition Guinean People's Rally, sentenced to five years in prison for endangering state security and recruiting foreign mercenaries. He is pardoned in May 2001.

September 2000 - Start of incursions by rebels in Guinea's border regions with Liberia and Sierra Leone which eventually claim more than 1,000 lives and cause massive population displacement. The government accuses Liberia, the Sierra Leonean United Revolutionary Front (RUF) rebel group, Burkina Faso and former Guinean army mutineers of trying to destabilise Guinea.

February 2001 - Government deploys attack helicopters to the front-line in its fight with rebels.

November 2001 - Official results show constitutional referendum, boycotted by opposition, endorses President Conte's proposal to extend presidential term from five to seven years. Critics accuse Mr Conte of trying to stay in power for life.

March 2002 - Guinea, Sierra Leone, Liberia agree on measures to secure mutual borders and to tackle insurgency.

November 2003 - Opposition leader Jean-Marie Dore detained, subsequently released, after saying President Conte is too ill to contest December's presidential election.

December 2003 - President Conte wins a third term in elections boycotted by the opposition.

January 7, 2004 - Senegal's president promised a new amnesty for Movement of Democratic Forces of Casamance (MFDC) separatist rebels, after they agreed to clear landmines from the southern Casamance region and the end a decades-old conflict. Hundreds of people have been maimed by mines in Casamance, a former tourist hotspot between mainland Senegal and Guinea Bissau that has been isolated by a low-intensity conflict between rebels and government forces since 1982. These rebels claim to have taken up arms to demand more autonomy for the largely Christian and animist region from the rest of mostly Muslim Senegal, but in reality they are little more than disenchanted drug runners without a credible political agenda. Their favorite trick was to sow antipersonnel landmines around poor villages during the night, then demand tribute from the farmers and goat herders in exchange for the mines' locations. - Adam Geibel

February 20, 2004: Guinea-Bissau's army chief admitted that four soldiers were killed and 14 wounded in almost two weeks of clashes with separatist rebels on the Senegalese border. A patrol of Guinea -Bissau soldiers fell into a rebel ambush, while three other soldiers were killed by landmines over the weekend of 14-15th. The army also claimed that the suspected rebels had suffered a "huge" number of casualties, which have yet to be be tallied.

After moving reinforcements into the area and planning to set up a field hospital in Farim (near the Senegalese frontier), the army declared that the border region "clear", the "armed bandits" tied to the Casamance Democratic Forces Movement (MFDC) having returned to their bases in southern Senegal. Guinea-Bissau's Oio province is about 100 kilometers northeast of the capital Bissau.

Hundreds of locals have also been maimed by mines in Senegal's Casamance, a former tourist spot frequently be French vacationers. However, Casamance's local hotel owners reported a 62 percent increase in business since last year (primarily from Dutch and other European tourists) and Senegal doesn't need any more problems. While mainly Muslim Senegal has a reputation for religious tolerance, stability and security, the head of Roman Catholic Church received a death threat from a group calling itself 'Steel Circle' after church leaders had spoken out against politically motivated violence.

This corner of Africa has taken on greater importance, ever since friends of Al-Qaeda started to pop up in the more lawless frontier regions. West Africa's Gulf of Guinea currently supplies US refineries with 15 percent of their crude and by 2015, as much as 25 percent of US oil imports could come from Africa's oil belt (from Mauritania past Sao Tome down to Angola). The United States is also considering building a deep-water sea port and new airport on the Sao Tome islands (300 kilometers off the African coast). America has already pledged $800,000 for feasibility studies into the potential projects, but denied reports they were planning to establish a naval or military base on the islands.

On the 19th, French President Jacques Chirac held talks with Senegal's President Abdoulaye Wade in Paris. France-Senegalese ties are apparently under pressure, largely due to Senegal's increasingly closer ties to the United States. The French wanted to flex a bit of political muscle.

Three days before that, Gambia announced that oil in "large quantities" had been discovered in waters off it's coast. The nearest commercial finds currently under development are in Mauritania (600 kilometers to the north) and in the Ivory Coast (1,500 kilometers to the southeast). Both of those countries are former French colonies.

The MFDC 'rebels' have fought a low-level insurgency since 1982, allegedly for greater autonomy for the largely Christian region of Casamance from the rest of mostly Muslim Senegal. In reality, they are little more than drug-running criminals. Left unchecked, they (and armed groups like them) could prove to be as expensively annoying to the entire West African oil industry as the Ijaw hijacking pirates are to Nigeria's offshore oil riggers. - Adam Geibel

April 2004 - Prime Minister Lounseny Fall resigns while visiting the US.

October 6, 2004: The chief of staff of the army, general Verissimo Seabra, was killed by soldiers angry over delays in being paid for recent peacekeeping duty in Liberia. The troops then went on to stage a coup. General Seabra himself came to power via a coup last year. Before that, there was an unsuccessful coup in 2001. The country of 1.5 million has been independent (from Portugal) since 1974, but is hobbled by poverty and unstable government.

October 7, 2004: Only one of the army's six infantry battalions has mutinied, and the government is negotiating with the mutineers. The battalion, of about 500 troops, served nine months in Liberia, and were to be paid, via the UN, about a thousand dollars a month. But they were only paid for three months, and feared that senior officers or politicians had stolen the rest (not an unusual situation.)

October 11, 2004: The army mutineers made peace with the government. Both sides signed an agreement that has the government granting amnesty, paying the money owed the troops, improving living conditions for soldiers. The mutineers also proposed changes in the high command of the armed forces.

October 17, 2004: About a dozen senior officers in the armed forces went into hiding when the October 7 coup took place, and not all of them have come out of hiding. These officers were all allies of the late chief of staff, general Verissimo Seabra. Most of them are also descended from families that originally came from the Cape Verde islands. These families formed an impromptu tribe, and this was resented by the other tribes in Guinea-Bissau.

October 25, 2004: The UN came through with $2.2 million to pay the 650 soldiers most of the money owned them for most of the money owned for peacekeeping duty. The money originally paid ($1,028 per month per soldier) was stolen by officers in the Guinea Bissau army. This triggered the rebellion. The money has not been recovered. The UN felt it was better to pay twice than to have a civil war in Guinea Bissau.

October 27, 2004: The rebellious soldiers have now received over $3,000 each for their peacekeeping work in Liberia. This is a fortune for these men, who normally make $35 a month. But the rebellious soldiers also want wholesale changes in who runs the army. Rather than educated, Portuguese speaking officers belonging to the small Papel tribe, the mutineers want members of the dominant Balanta (a third of the population) tribe in senior position. But many of the men proposed are poorly educated, but do have combat experience. The issues of tribal relationships and corruption have long defined government, or the lack of it, in Africa.

March 14, 2006: Near Sao Domingos, on the Senegalese border, a bus hits a land mine, killing twelve civilians. At the same time, Guinea -Bissau troops moved into the area and began fighting with Senegalese rebels. The Senegalese had been planting mines in the area, and generally demonstrating their power.

March 20, 2006: Soldiers continued attacking Senegalese rebels on the Senegalese border, near the town of Sao Domingos. So far, five soldiers have been killed, and perhaps as many rebels. The rebels appear to have retreated back into Sebegal. Some 5,000 civilians fled the fighting.

The Senegalese separatists are demanding independence for the Casamance region which, is, literally, separated from Senegal by Gambia. The rebellion has been low key, and going on for two decades. This sort of situation is typical throughout Africa, where groups of armed men maintain control, or at least freedom, in an area, often on a border. The central government does not consider it worth the trouble and expense to deal with the situation.

March 21, 2006: The fighting along the Senegalese border involves Senegalese rebels, led by Salif Dialo who had previously, in 1999, helped overthrow current Guinea-Bissau president Joao Bernardo Vieira (who became president again last year). The Dialo crew have bases on the Senegal side of the border, and accuse the Guinea-Bissau troops of entering Senegal to attack their camps. Guinea-Bissau says they attacked the Dialo men when they crossed the border to meet with weapons dealers in Sao Domingos.

May 15, 2006: Reacting to rising oil prices, Guinea has raised oil prices 30 percent, to about $4.80 a gallon. The country of 8.9 million has per capita income of about $500. About half the population has a measure of prosperity because of jobs in the mining industry (Guinea has a third of the world's Bauxite, used to make Aluminum) or government. But the other half a very poor, and the increased price of oil, makes it virtually unaffordable.

May 30, 2006: Guinea's president is facing yet another potential coup, and has responded by replacing most of the ministers in his cabinet. The old guard was brought back, and the younger advisers, with dangerous new ideas, were out. The last coup attempt was three years ago, when several dozen officers and troops were arrested for plotting to overthrow dictator (for the last 22 years) Lansana Conte. Technically a democracy, Conte's restoration of voting in 1992 was a sham, with rigged elections. The long years of peace, however, have allowed the growth of labor unions, which have become a primary source of opposition to the government.

June 7, 2006: The unions called a general strike and demanded that fuel be reduced to $3.80 a gallon and that the price of rice be reduced as well.

June 13, 2006: Students, protesting because schools were closed (because the teachers were on strike) and final exams cancelled, got violent. Police responding with rifle fire, killing nine people and wounding many more, in three different cities. President Conte is negotiating with the unions, but the basic problem is that the country is run by a bunch of corrupt and inept politicians. The problem is the corruption, which extends to the police and armed forces.

On the 16th, the demonstrations in the capital, began to turn violent. Police forces attempting to keep the protesters away from government buildings, began using tear gas, riot gear, and firearms. One women was reported killed by police fire on the 17th. Meanwhile the country has sunk into severe poverty and is mired in corruption. Recently a courageous judge put two of Conte's henchmen on trial for stealing millions in government funds. Conte immediately halted the trial. On January 10th a series of major public demonstrations began across the country. Rabiatou Sera Diallo, president of the National Confederation of Guinea Workers, promptly organized a general strike with the stated goal of getting Conte out of office.

As evidence of Conte's declining health has mounted, so too have demands for his resignation. Early in 2006 demonstrations led by union members occurred across much of the country, but were put down by police. As opposition leaders quit the National Assembly in protest, Conte banned several newspapers to tighten his grip on the country. A series of demonstrations in June were similarly broken, up, with police beating, robbing, and in some cases raping protestors. Although Conte attempted to make some concessions, offering to reduce the price of fuel, increase food subsidies, and curb police corruption, demonstrations have become a daily affair and the protests have affected most areas of the iconology, including the lucrative (for Conte) bauxite mines.

On the 18th, Ms. Diallo and several hundred demonstrators marched on the National Assembly. Acting swiftly, paramilitary police used tear gas to temporarily break up the group, so that they could arrest Diallo and seven others. The eight were taken into the National Assembly building, where the Speaker, a Conte man, apparently tried to bribe her and the other leaders protests into dropping the issue. The offer was rejected. Meanwhile, the protest crowd had reassembled, and literally hundreds of people surrounded building, calling for Diallo and shouting "Down with Conte!" This apparently convinced the authorities to release the group. If Conte continues to cling to power, Guinea may be the next African country to undergo complete collapse.

January 21, 2007: The situation in Guinea verges on total collapse, and a popular uprising or military coup may be imminent. In 1982 a coup installed Lansana Conte as president of Guinea. The chain smoking 72-year old Conte has diabetes, suffers from a heart condition, and is apparently lucid only in the mornings. Despite this, he clings to power. Not only has he refused to designate a successor, but he has even refused to delegate any authority during his several recent trips to Switzerland for heart treatments.

February 11, 2007: The unions have called on the population to go on strike. Many have complied.

February 12, 2007: The government declared martial law, in an attempt to curb the growing number of street demonstrations and break the national strike.

February 23, 2007: The parliament in Guinea refused to extend the martial law. This was unexpected, as parliament had never defied president-for-life Conte before.

February 24, 2007: Over a hundred people have died in political violence in Guinea in the last month. The police and soldiers have been brutal, and corrupt (stealing from people and homes being searched), which has enraged people even more. It's feared that the country will dissolve into general disorder, and threaten the fragile peace in neighboring (to the south) Liberia and Sierra Leone. The strike has shut down mining operations, which provide most of the revenue which president Conte uses to keep himself in power.

February 27, 2007: For the past several weeks there have been widespread public demonstrations and a general strike to protest the arbitrary rule of Guinea's ailing strongman President Lansana Conte. Coordinated by the leaders of the country's labor movement, the demonstrations have paralyzed Guinea, and continued despite increasingly violent attempts by police and military forces to suppress them. So far, more than a hundred people were killed by security forces, who have also committed rapes and gone on looting sprees. Over the weekend, apparently desperate for a resolution of the crisis, all else - including martial law - having failed, Conte accepted a deal brokered by a team of mediators from ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States) led by former Nigerian President Ibrahima Babangida.

Under the terms of the deal, the leaders of the country's labor movement, Rabiatou Serah Diallo and Ibrahima Fofana, agreed to end the general strike on 27 February. In return, Conte pledged to select a new prime minister by Friday, from among four "neutral" candidates. These are Mohamed Beavogui, an official of the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD), a U.N. agency, Saidou Diallo, head of Guinea's National Social Security Fund, Kabinet Komara, an official of the Cairo - based African Export-Import Bank, and former ECOWAS executive secretary Lansana Kouyate. While all of the candidates have some ties to the Conte-regime, which has been in power for decades, none are close associates of the president and all are viewed as relatively honest in a country awash in corruption. Conte appointed Lansana Kouyate as prime minister today.

Although Guinea holds about half of all the bauxite (aluminum ore) in the world, and impressive deposits of iron, gold, and diamonds, government mismanagement and corruption have seen the country of about ten million sink further and further into poverty. Conte is generally believed to be in his late 70s, and is in very poor health (he has several times traveled to Europe for treatment of a number of conditions, including diabetes). As he has grown older, he had tended to rule through an increasingly shrinking circle of close friends and advisors and refused all calls for reform.

The natural next question is not whether Conte will adhere to the plan, as he has little choice. The more important question is "What happens after Conte?" Constitutionally, in the event of the president's death a relatively powerless parliamentary official becomes acting president. But who will control the real power? Conte has not named a successor.

Part of the turmoil in the country has been generated by fear that with Conte's passing chaos will ensue, followed by civil war. Having witnessed events in neighboring Sierre Leone and Liberia, Guineans have a very good idea what civil war looks like. This is why Guinean reform leaders are willing to accept the deal with Conte, in the hopes of securing a more orderly transition of power. This is also believed to be a way to head off the possible "candidacy" of General Kerfalla Camara, chief of the defense staff, and a very strong Conte supporter.

If the ECOWAS-sponsored deal works, it will not only be good for Guinea, it will also be good for ECOWAS. Originating as a sort -of "common market" of West African states, over the past few years ECOWAS has begun acting as a regional organization, such as the Organization of American States. Although a number of its members have undergone rough times, the organization overall has managed to have several successes, helping broker peace deals in several countries and organized peacekeeping forces in some crises. This has helped a number of the less stable countries in the grouping emerge from chaotic situations.

Guinea's armed forces are the potential source of forces in a civil war no one wants. There are about 10,000 troops in the Guinean armed forces. Roughly 75-percent of them are conscripts doing a two year hitch. The Army totals about 8,500 men. It consists of a dozen battalions. Five of these are infantry, and the rest are one each of armor, artillery, air defense, engineers, commandos, special forces, and rangers. Most of the heavy equipment is dated, and includes about 50 old Soviet tanks, perhaps 75 other armored combat vehicles and personnel carriers, and perhaps 100 artillery pieces, anti-tank guns, and mortars. Little of the equipment is likely to be operational. The Air Force has about 800 personnel, with four MiG-21s and four MiG-17s, plus two MiG-15 trainers. There are a half-dozen helicopters and a handful of transport aircraft. Few, if any, of these aircraft are believed in operating condition. The Navy totals only 400 personnel. Although on paper there are three or four coastal patrol vessels, none of them are actually operational.

Over the past few years the country's armed forces have essentially become a "regime protection" force. Lansana Conte has fired literally hundreds of officers, often on flimsy pretexts. The older ones were canned for being "overage," quiet humorous considering the president's approaching octogenarian status, while junior officers were often dismissed for "drunkenness," in numbers suggesting an extraordinary degree of boozing. This trend is also indicated by the proliferation of "special operations forces" in the Army (the ranger, commando, and special forces battalions). In addition to the armed forces, there are also other regime protection forces, the "People's Militia" of about 7,000, a 1,600 strong "Republican Guard," and a National Gendarmerie of about a thousand men.

March 22, 2014: Ebola outbreak officially announced in the West African state of Guinea. Six cases have been confirmed as Ebola. - Scientists tackling an outbreak of Ebola in Guinea believe they have identified the virus as the Zaire strain, the most lethal of all that "raises the already high level of concern."

TROPICAL DISEASE: Guinea Ebola outbreak believed to be deadly Zaire strain’

By Misha Hussain DAKAR, March 24 (Thomson Reuters Foundation) - Scientists tackling an outbreak of Ebola in Guinea believe they have identified the virus as the Zaire strain, the most lethal of all that "raises the already high level of concern", according to France's Institut Pasteur. At least 59 people have died after contracting a mystery illness in southeastern Guinea since early February. Six cases have been confirmed as Ebola, a haemorrhagic fever with a fatality rate of as high as 90 percent.

None of the suspected cases in the capital Conakry have tested positive. However, the deaths are the first confirmed from Ebola in West Africa and a suspected case reported in neighbouring Sierra Leone has raised fears the disease may spread into other nations with weak health systems."Preliminary sequencing of a portion of the virus is compatible with the Zaire species," experts at the Lyon-based Institut Pasteur said in a statement.

The institute believes the strain in Sierra Leone would be the same, but said further lab results were needed. "Detection of Zaire Ebola virus raises the already high level of concern for this event," it said. Institut Pasteur has been testing samples sent to France and has also dispatched a team to Conakry to help the government handle the crisis. The symptoms of Ebola range from flu-like pains to internal and external bleeding caused by kidney and liver failures.

Humans can catch the disease from bats, gorillas and forest antelope and then it is spread between humans through contact with infected blood, bodily fluids and tissue. The last major outbreak of the Zaire strain was in 2007, when 187 people died in the Democratic Republic of Congo - a case fatality rate of 74 percent.

Sakoba Keita, head of the preventative diseases department in Guinea's ministry of health, said the number of suspected cases had risen to 86 by Monday.The government sent SMS messages to Guineans calling for calm and detailing precautions people could take against Ebola. Over the weekend, officials dispatched specialised medical equipment, imposed restrictions on funerals and sought to contain panic to prevent Ebola from spreading.

Medical charity Medecins Sans Frontieres (MSF) said researchers are trying to find the source of the virus and understand how the Zaire strain reached Guinea from Sudan, Congo and Uganda where there are frequent outbreaks. "Nobody has a clue how the virus arrived in Guinea," said Esther Sterk, MSF's tropical medicine adviser."We know the virus hides in some species of bats in between outbreaks in human hosts, so many people are looking at bats flying around Guinea."

WHO: Virus in Guinea capital Conakry not Ebola’

March 24, 2014 (Last updated)

Tests on the suspected cases of deadly Ebola virus in Guinea's capital Conakry are negative, health officials say.

On Sunday, United Nations officials said that the virus had spread to the capital, a port city of up to two million, from remote forests in the south, where some 61 people have died. The government has sent out text messages, urging people to stay calm and wash their hands with soap. Ebola is spread by close contact and kills between 25% and 90% of victims. There is no known cure or vaccine. Symptoms include internal and external bleeding, diarrhoea and vomiting.

Neighbouring countries such as Liberia, Senegal and Sierra Leone are said to be on high alert in case the disease spreads. Five people are already reported to have died in Liberia after crossing from southern Guinea for treatment, Liberia's Health Minister Walter Gwenigale told journalists. However, it is not clear whether they had Ebola.

The BBC's Jonathan Jonathan Paye-Layleh in Liberia says the country's health facilities are closer and more accessible to Guineans living on the border than those in big Guinean cities. Cross-border trade is huge between the two countries, which share some cultural and linguistic ties, he adds.

Mr Gwenigale confirmed tests were being carried out on those who had died. He also urged people to avoid close contact with people, such as shaking hands and kissing. Guinea is also currently grappling with epidemics of measles, cholera and meningitis.It is said to be the first time Ebola has struck Guinea, with recent outbreaks thousands of miles away, in Uganda and Democratic Republic of Congo. There have been 87 cases so far, with 61 deaths, according to Guinea's health ministry.After two people died from a haemorrhagic fever in Conakry, samples were sent to the Pasteur Institute in neighbouring Senegal for testing.

WHO spokesman Collins Boakye-Agyemang told the BBC these had shown that the victims had not been infected with Ebola. It is not known what killed them. Outbreaks of Ebola occur primarily in remote villages in Central and West Africa, near tropical rainforests, the World Health Organization says. (Text ends)

It has to be recalled that more than 3, 500 people have died from Ebola in Guinea, which along with Sierraleone and Liberia has seen the vast majority of deaths from the disease.

Pourquoi la Guinée Conakry s'appelle-t-elle ainsi ?

Alexandre Sombardier DEA en Géopolitique et Sciences Politiques, Universités Paris VIII (Diplôme obtenu en 2002) 8 déc.

Q : Pourquoi la Guinée Conakry s'appelle-t-elle ainsi ?

A vrai dire c'est juste une appellation usuelle pour la distinguer de la Guinée-Bissau et de la Guinée Equatoriale.

La forme longue et officielle de la Guinée Conakry est République de Guinée.

Appellation des Pays : c'est la République de Guinée et non Guinée-Conakry (communiqué)

Les autorités guinéennes, par un communiqué du ministère des Etrangères viennent de rappeler aux médias que « depuis la proclamation de l'indépendance le 2 octobre 1958, la dénomination universelle…

https://guineenews.org/appellation-des-pays-cest-la-republique-de-guinee-et-non-guinee-conakry-communique/

Pour la Guinée-Bissau, ancienne colonie portugaise, il s'agit de la République de Guinée-Bissau pour la Guinée Equatoriale ancienne possession espagnole, République de Guinée équatoriale.

(Trois Guinées en Afrique. Trois pays d'ailleurs tout à fait différents.)

Bref l'Afrique compte trois Guinées, toutes issues de colonisation différentes, espagnoles, françaises et portugaises. Pourquoi une telle popularité du terme Guinée, me direz-vous ?

Le terme a été popularisé en Europe par les Portugais, grands explorateurs de l'Afrique, qui eux-mêmes l'avaient probablement emprunté à un terme berbère désignant vaguement 'le pays des hommes noirs'. En Guinée (Conakry) on avance une autre étymologie liée à un quiproquo entre locaux et portugais, mais que je trouve à titre personnel (et sans être du tout un expert sur le sujet, je précise) moins convaincante.

Quoi qu'il en soit dans l'esprit des Portugais qui emploient pour la première fois ce mot à l'écrit au milieu du XVe siècle, la Guinée c'est l'ensemble des pays dits noirs au sud du fleuve Sénégal. Autant dire que vu les connaissances géographiques et ethnographiques de l'époque, on est dans le flou le plus artistique.

A noter que le terme Guinée a aussi été accolé à une large région côtière et maritime, côté et golfe de Guinée, région importante sur le plan géopolitique tant pour ses ports commerçants que pour ses ressources en hydrocarbures ainsi que pour ses enjeux de sécurité (piraterie).

(Le Golfe de Guinée, objet de toutes les convoitises, entre multiples opportunités et risques.)

En tout cas le terme Guinée a connu un grand succès, lié qu'il était dans l'imaginaire colonial des européens aux richesses qu'ils pensaient en tirer (dont l'or). Fut un temps on parlait usuellement de Guinée française, anglaise, espagnole, même allemande (les futurs Togo et Cameroun par exemple). A noter que la région était tellement associée à l'or et à la richesse, qu'elle donna son nom à une célèbre pièce de monnaie anglaise puis britannique la Guinée (dont la valeur fluctua autour de celle de la livre).

Sources: D'où vient le nom Guinée ? – Jeune Afrique

Question posée par Adama Keita, Nouakchott, Mauritanie – Jeune Afrique
https://www.jeuneafrique.com/222515/archives-thematique/d-o-vient-le-nom-guin-e/

Les étymologistes (spécialistes qui recherchent l'origine des mots) ne s'entendent pas Savoir plus: Pourquoi plusieurs pays ont «Guinée» dans leur nom ?

sur les premières origines du mot Guinée dans leur nom
https://intellivoire.net/pourquoi-plusieurs-pays-ont-guinee-dans-leur-nom/

Sécurité dans le golfe de Guinée : un combat régional

Questions similaires

Quand j'avais 4 ans, ma sœur avait la moitié de mon âge. Maintenant ma sœur a 12 ans. Quel âge ai-je ?

Un père a 54 ans et un fils en a 60. Comment est-ce possible ?

Ma tante qui a 3 fois mon âge a 42 ans. Quel âge ai-je ?

Quand ma sœur avait 16 ans, j'avais la moitié de son âge, maintenant elle a 28 ans, quel âge ai-je ?

Aman a 35 ans de plus que son fils. La somme de leurs âges donne 55. Quel est l'âge du fils ?

Question mathématique rapide : Quand mon frère avait 17 ans, j'avais deux fois son âge. Maintenant, mon frère a 34 ans. Quel âge j'ai ?

Il y a 5 soeurs dans une pièce. Anne regarde la télévision, Marguerite joue aux échecs, Marie fait la cuisine et Katie fait la lessive. Que fait la cinquième soeur ?

Une fille a 5 ans, sa soeur est âgée de 15 ans. Aujourd'hui cette fille a 13 ans, quel age a sa soeur ?

L'âge d'un homme avant 20 ans était cinq fois supérieur à celui de son fils. Quel est l'âge actuel de son père, si après 16 ans l'âge du fils devient 41 ans ?

J'ai 5 sœurs, chacune d'entre elles ont 1 frère. Combien de frères ai-je?

L'âge du père il y a 10 ans était trois fois l'âge de son fils. Dans dix ans, l'âge du père sera le double de celui de son fils. Le rapport de leur âge actuel est ?

Richard et Françoise ont 3 enfants. Chaque enfant a 2 garçons et une fille. Combien Richard et Françoise ont-ils de petits-enfants ?

Le père d'Alice a actuellement 3 fois son âge. Dans 11 ans, le père d'Alice n'aura que le double de son âge. Quel âge a le père d'Alice ?

Rosie et Sammy sont allés au cinéma. Ils ont amené leurs 10 filles. Chaque fille a 10 frères. Chaque frère a 20 enfants. Tous les frères et leurs enfants sont également allés au cinéma. Combien de membres de la famille sont allés au cinéma ?

Un homme avait 26 ans quand sa fille est née. Maintenant il est trois fois plus vieux que sa fille. Quel est l'âge actuel de la fille ?

Savoir plus: Pourquoi plusieurs pays ont «Guinée» dans leur nom

Les pays suivants : Guinée Équatoriale; Guinée-Bissau; Guinée; Papouasie Nouvelle Guinée.

Les étymologistes (spécialistes qui recherchent l'origine des mots) ne s'entendent pas sur les premières origines du mot « Guinée » ou Guinea en Anglais . Certains estiment que la trace de ce mot se trouve dans l'expression berbère « Akal n-Iguinawen » qui signifie « Terre des Noirs » ». La période de domination de Djenné comportait l'utilisation du terme « Genawah » qui est le mot arabisé pour « Ghinawen », qui signifie « noirs ».

Une théorie alternative affirme que le terme Guinée est dérivé de Djenné, une ville du Mali qui était très importante dans le commerce transsaharien du 15ème au 17ème siècle.

La Côte de Guinée et la colonisation

Au XVe siècle, les marins portugais ont utilisé «Guiné» pour décrire une région proche de ce qui est aujourd'hui le Sénégal. Au XVIIIe siècle, les Européens ont utilisé «Guinée» pour désigner une grande partie du littoral d'Afrique de l'Ouest (Côte de Guinée) . Beaucoup de colons européens qui sont arrivés dans la région de Guinée de l'Afrique de l'Ouest ont donné des noms tels que «Guinée allemande», «Guinée espagnole», «Guinée française» ou «Guinée portugaise». Certains pays ont conservé des portions de ces noms après l'indépendance. La guinée française est devenue « Guinée », la Guinée espagnole est devenue la « Guinée équatoriale « et la Guinée portugaise est devenue la « Guinée-Bissau » . Cependant, la Guinée allemande a complètement abandonné la partie « Guinée » du nom pour devenir Cameroun et Togo.

Source majeure d'or

La région était une source majeure d'or, d'où le nom « Guiné » de la pièce d'or britannique. Une pièce de monnaie anglaise a été nommé « Guinée(Guinea) » puisque l'or utilisé pour la fabriquer était initialement extrait dans la région de Guinée de l'Afrique de l'Ouest.

Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée

La Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée, située dans le sud-est de l'Asie, a été nommée ainsi par un explorateur espagnol (Yñigo Ortiz de Retez) à cause de la ressemblance de la population de Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée avec celle qu'il avait vu le long de la Côte Guinéenne en Afrique. Papouasie est un terme local de l'île. Pour lire plus https://intellivoire.net/pourquoi-plusieurs-pays-ont-guinee-dans-leur-nom/

Appellation des Pays : c'est la République de Guinée et non Guinée-Conakry (communiqué)

Les autorités guinéennes, par un communiqué du ministère des Etrangères viennent de rappeler aux médias que « depuis la proclamation de l'indépendance le 2 octobre 1958, la dénomination universellement reconnue et acceptée mentionne clairement République de Guinée », malheureusement on constate que dans les communications et conversations à l'extérieur et de manière persistance, l'usage récurrent du vocable « Guinée-Conakry » pour désigner la République de Guinée.

Face donc à cette situation, le ministre Mamadi Touré demande aux médias de « contribuer à la restauration de l'appellation officielle : (République de Guinée, Ndlr), à travers les commentaires, signatures des équipes rédactionnelles »

Voici qui est donc clair. Désormais, au lieu de l'appellation Guinée-Conakry, il faut plutôt dire ou écrire République de Guinée.

À LIRE AUSSI
Kamsar : la collision entre deux véhicules fait deux morts Dimanche, 26 Décembre 2021 À 9h:09
Conakry-Foot : pour la paix, la gendarmerie bat deux équipes de l'Axe…Dimanche, 26 Décembre 2021 À 8h:08

Rappelons qu'en 1986, lors de l'une de ses rares conférences de presse, l'ancien Chef de l'Etat ivoirien, feu Félix Houphouët Boigny, qui en avait assez de la déformation du nom de son pays, la Côte d'Ivoire selon les langues, a profité de cette rencontre avec la presse pour rappeler aux uns et autres l'appellation Côte d'Ivoire reste unique et inchangeable quelle que soit la langue.

La Côte de Guinée et la colonisation

Au XVe siècle, les marins portugais ont utilisé «Guiné» pour décrire une région proche de ce qui est aujourd'hui le Sénégal. Au XVIIIe siècle, les Européens ont utilisé «Guinée» pour désigner une grande partie du littoral d'Afrique de l'Ouest (Côte de Guinée) . Beaucoup de colons européens qui sont arrivés dans la région de Guinée de l'Afrique de l'Ouest ont donné des noms tels que «Guinée allemande», «Guinée espagnole», «Guinée française» ou «Guinée portugaise». Certains pays ont conservé des portions de ces noms après l'indépendance. La guinée française est devenue « Guinée », la Guinée espagnole est devenue la « Guinée équatoriale « et la Guinée portugaise est devenue la « Guinée-Bissau » . Cependant, la Guinée allemande a complètement abandonné la partie « Guinée » du nom pour devenir Cameroun et Togo.

Source majeure d'or

La région était une source majeure d'or, d'où le nom « Guiné » de la pièce d'or britannique. Une pièce de monnaie anglaise a été nommé « Guinée(Guinea) » puisque l'or utilisé pour la fabriquer était initialement extrait dans la région de Guinée de l'Afrique de l'Ouest.

Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée

La Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée, située dans le sud-est de l'Asie, a été nommée ainsi par un explorateur espagnol (Yñigo Ortiz de Retez) à cause de la ressemblance de la population de Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée avec celle qu'il avait vu le long de la Côte Guinéenne en Afrique. Papouasie est un terme local de l'île. Pour lire plus https://intellivoire.net/pourquoi-plusieurs-pays-ont-guinee-dans-leur-nom/

Appellation des Pays : c'est la République de Guinée et non Guinée-Conakry (communiqué)

Les autorités guinéennes, par un communiqué du ministère des Etrangères viennent de rappeler aux médias que « depuis la proclamation de l'indépendance le 2 octobre 1958, la dénomination universellement reconnue et acceptée mentionne clairement République de Guinée », malheureusement on constate que dans les communications et conversations à l'extérieur et de manière persistance, l'usage récurrent du vocable « Guinée-Conakry » pour désigner la République de Guinée.

Face donc à cette situation, le ministre Mamadi Touré demande aux médias de « contribuer à la restauration de l'appellation officielle : (République de Guinée, Ndlr), à travers les commentaires, signatures des équipes rédactionnelles »

Voici qui est donc clair. Désormais, au lieu de l'appellation Guinée-Conakry, il faut plutôt dire ou écrire République de Guinée.

À LIRE AUSSI
Kamsar : la collision entre deux véhicules fait deux morts
Dimanche, 26 Décembre 2021 À 9h:09
Conakry-Foot : pour la paix, la gendarmerie bat deux équipes de l'Axe…
Dimanche, 26 Décembre 2021 À 8h:08

Rappelons qu'en 1986, lors de l'une de ses rares conférences de presse, l'ancien Chef de l'Etat ivoirien, feu Félix Houphouët Boigny, qui en avait assez de la déformation du nom de son pays, la Côte d'Ivoire selon les langues, a profité de cette rencontre avec la presse pour rappeler aux uns et autres l'appellation Côte d'Ivoire reste unique et inchangeable quelle que soit la langue.

FRANCE 24 English
Guinea's transitional president, Colonel Mamady Doumbouya, gave an interview to FRANCE 24 from the capital, Conakry. Doumbouya seized power following a coup d'état on September 5, which ousted Alpha Condé, who had been president for 11 years. 🔔Subscribe to France 24 now: https://f24.my/YTen 🔴

LIVE - Watch FRANCE 24 English 24/7 here: https://f24.my/YTliveEN 🌍

Read the latest International News and Top Stories: https://www.france24.com/en/
Like us on Facebook: https://f24.my/FBen
Follow us on Twitter: https://f24.my/TWen
Discover the news in pictures on Instagram: https://f24.my/IGen

GUINEA 🇬🇳 Colonel Mamady Doumbouya has sent a strong message to the Guinea national team
News Nigeria Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Dec 28

Bring back the African Cup of Nations or if not bring back the money that was invested in you." At least, these were the strong words of Colonel President Mamadi Doumbouyah this Monday, December 27, 2021 at the Palais Mohamed V de Conakry during handing over the National Flag to the players of Syli Guinea before their departure for the CAF 2021 in Cameroon.

Pourquoi autant de pays se nomment-ils Guinée ?

Dimitri Ken Féru d'histoire 24 janv.

Pour commencer, faisons l'inventaire de tous les pays qui se nomment Guinée:Guinée-Bissau

Guinée Équatoriale

Guinée (encore appelée Guinée Conakry)

Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée

Ça en fait 4. Mais alors, pourquoi autant de Guinées ?

Le mot « Guinée » vient probablement d'un ancien mot berbère, qui signifie « peau sombre ». Ce terme était utilisé pour nommer une large portion de l'Afrique.

Source en fin de réponse.

Lorsque des siècles plus tard, les puissances européennes ont commencé à coloniser l'Afrique, plusieurs d'entre elles ont ainsi adopté indépendamment le nom Guinée. Il y a eu :

La Guinée portugaise ;
La Guinée suédoise/danoise/néerlandaise, qui est plus tard devenue la Gold Coast (actuel Ghana) ;
La Guinée française ;
La Guinée espagnole.

Lors de la décolonisation, la Guinée française a obtenu son indépendance la première, et s'est donc appelée tout simplement Guinée.

20 ans plus tard, la Guinée portugaise a obtenu son indépendance et est devenue la Guinée-Bissau.

En gagnant son indépendance, la Guinée espagnole est devenue Guinée équatoriale, à cause de sa localisation par rapport à l'Équateur.

Parlons maintenant de l'autre Guinée, celle qui n'est pas africaine. L'île, initialement appelée Papouasie, a été renommée Nouvelle Guinée par les explorateurs espagnols. La raison ? Il n'y avait selon eux aucune différence de phénotype entre Papouasiens et Ouest-Africains…

© Pascale Sury

4 siècles plus tard, lorsque le territoire a gagné son indépendance, ils ont décidé de combiner l'ancienne dénomination (Papouasie) avec la contemporaine (Nouvelle Guinée). Ainsi naquit la Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée.

Source : History Matters (2022), Why are so many countries called Guinea? (Short Animated Documentary), lien.

Pourquoi autant de pays se nomment-ils Guinée ?

Jean Onquiert Anciennement Retraité 23 janv.

La Guinée est une monnaie utilisée au XVII et XVIII -ème siècle en Grande Bretagne.

Comme pays, je ne connais que la Guinée Bissau, et la nouvelle Guinée. Ya t'il un lien entre le commerce des esclaves payé en guinée, et pour la nouvelle Guinée, une césure avec la Papouasie.

Et cette particularité géographique du golfe de Guinée, 0 de longitude, et 0 de latitude. Croisement de l'équateur, et du méridien de Greenwich.

Autret Claude , ancient (ne) LIBRAIRE SPECIALISE EN SCIENCES DITES HUMAINES Répondu 23 janv.

l'afrique compte trois guinées, avec chacune une langue officielle différente français, portugais et espagnol On distingue en effet : la guinée (245857) km carré aussi appelée guinée conakry (francophone) La guinée équatoriale (28051) km carré aussi appelée guinée espagnole (hispanophone), la guinée bissau (36125) km carré aussi appelée guinée portugaise (lusophone) La guinée sous la colonisation française Elles constituent progressivement u instrument efficace de la domination française Ce système joue un rôle important dans l 'unification d 'un pays artificiellement créé par les puissances coloniales en cours de conquête Les navigateurs portugais sont les premiers européens à explorer le golfe de guinée, en 1471 Les portugais commencent à coloniser leds îles de bioko (alors appelée fernando poo, du nom se son découvreur), de pagalu (alors appelée annobon) et de corsico; elles servent de comptoirs pour le trafic d 'esclaves Avec le traité de san ildefonso (1772) et le traité du pardo (1778) le portugal livre à l 'espagne les îles de fernando poo, annabon, et de corisco, en échange de la colonie de sacramento, en amérique du sud et d'autres territoires permettant de conforter les frontières du brésil Les traites négrières sont soit disant abolies en 1871 mais le trafic illégal d 'esclaves menés par certaines riches familles se poursuit au - delà, avant d'être remplacé d 'abord par le commerce de brandy, d'huile de palme, de bois précieux et de textiles entre barcelone et la colonie

Commenter ce contenu

Questions similaires

Pourquoi le Français est-il mal aimé des autres pays ?

Pourquoi ceux qu’on appelle des Maghrébins s'appellent ainsi tout en sachant qu'ils sont sur le continent africain ?

Que signifie le "-stan" à la fin de tant de noms de pays ?

Pourquoi la Guinée équatoriale a-t-elle sa capitale sur une île qui semble appartenir au Cameroun?

Est-ce que les noms des pays sont les même dans leurs langues ?
Quels pays commencent par la lettre W ?
Pourquoi la plupart des pays européens se déchristianisent-ils et deviennent-ils athées ?

Pourquoi le COVID 2019 affole autant le monde alors que le taux de mortalité est inférieur à 3%?

Quel pays vous insupporte le plus ? Pourquoi ?

Pourquoi utilise-t-on le franc CFA en Guinée équatoriale, quel est le lien historique de ce pays avec la France ?

Qu'est-ce qui se passe en Guinée ?

Guinée Conakry Que s'est-il passé lorsque Sékou Touré de Guinée a décidé en 1958 de quitter l'empire colonial français et d'opter ainsi pour l'indépendance de son pays?

Pourquoi les pays arabes détestent-ils Israël ?
Pourquoi la plupart des pays africains restent pauvres ?
Pourquoi les pays du monde se rendent-ils dépendants les uns des autres ?

News Nigeria
Samory Toure: a legendary African king who fought French colonialism

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 1m

Described as African Napoleon, Samory Toure built a Muslim empire fighting off the French colonisation of West Africa in the 19th Century.

Toure's rise is one of the inspiring examples of resistance in times of the Trans Atlantic Slave Trade, which heavily influenced West Africa between the 19th and early 20th centuries.

Born in present day Guinea in 1830s, his father was a trader and Toure followed in his footsteps at the age of 15. During these years, he contacted many Islamic scholars and applied the model of Islamic finance to his trading business.

In 1853, his life took a major turn with the kidnapping of his mother by the leader of the powerful Cisse clan. To save her, he quit trading and signed up to be a personal slave of the clan leader, his mother's captor, serving him for seven years, seven months and seven days. His mother was eventually released for his work as a slave. While learning the Quran and increasing his knowledge in Islamic education, he also acquired military skills. He took part in several campaigns under the command of local clan chiefs.

By 1855, Toure returned to his native place and in the next six years he gathered volunteers from the Camara clan. He gave them both military training and Islamic education. In the following years, he became the most powerful military and political leader in the Milo region. He promoted his friends and relatives to various leadership positions in his army.

His military prowess contributed to his expansion from Bamako, Mali, in the north, to the frontiers of Sierra Leone, the Ivory Coast, and Liberia in the east and south. In the 1880s he divided his lands into 162 counties and placed his relatives at the top. He made Islamic scholars advisors to the government officials. In 1884, he took the title of Almami, meaning the religious head of a Muslim empire.

He commanded an army of between 40,000 to 65,000 soldiers. He first imported weapons from the British colony Sierra Leone and later founded a gun factory with the help of soldiers who had left the British and French troops. He even captured gold mines near the Sierra Leone-Guinea border, becoming one of the richest kings in the region.

As Toure's realm expanded in the region, he tried to reestablish the historic Mali Kingdom, which existed in Western Africa from 1235 to 1670 and whose rulers and royals were believed to be wealthy and generous.

He became known as a devoted Muslim with impressive social ethics. He sent Quran teachers to almost all the villages of his region to spread Islamic understanding. He personally monitored many students of the Quran, testing their knowledge of the holy book, rewarding the most successful ones.

The students who graduated from the Islamic school played a key role in spreading the word of Islam across the region. Therefore, in Guinea, the Ivory Coast, Mali, Sierra Leone and Liberia, Islam spread rapidly in the late 19th Century, when Toure ruled the region.

In 1881, as French forces clashed with his soldiers, he gave a befitting reply to the invaders. The gallant efforts made by Toure's army to repel the French invasion helped him earn a nickname — the Napoleon of Africa.

Two years later, however, he couldn’t prevent another French invasion in Bamako.

Following the partition of Africa due to the Berlin Conference in 1884, French troops began encroaching on Mandinka. Despite his army initially defeating the French troops, it was pushed back into the West African interior. French troops often included Senegalese troops to build a strong attack against Toure's army.

Toure's forces inflicted massive damage upon French troops in 1885 in Bure. But as France was decisive in its invasion of West Africa, Toure signed three deals with them. After signing the first agreement in 1886, he left Bure, and a year after he handed over the control of the west bank of Niger to France.

Toure signed the last agreement with France in 1889 and left the area from Tisinko to the Niger River. However, in 1891, France attacked Toure again and he was obliged to leave most important parts of his country to France, including his capital.

Because of the growing French threat against him, he retreated back to the northern sides of the Ivory coast. He targeted Muslim forces who had collaborated with France during his retreat.

By 1898 he had moved to Liberia, as Britain refused to support his resistance against France by denying him the supply of weapons. Toure formed a second empire and established its new capital in the city of Kong, Upper Ivory Coast. On May 1, 1898, when French forces seized the town of Sikasso, just north of the new empire, Toure and his army took up positions in the Liberian forests to resist a second invasion.

This time, however, famine and desertion weakened his forces and the French seized Toure on September 29, 1898. He was sent to Ndjole in Gabon where he died in exile in 1900.

Guinea’s first president Ahmed Sekou Toure was claimed to be Samory Toure's great grandson. Ahmed played a key role in the African independence movement.

Qu'est-ce qui se passe en Guinée ?

Hamid Sam · Suivre Grand passionné de politique 5 sept.

Si je devais analyser la situation comme je le fais d'habitude, je dirais qu'une mutinerie se prépare.

Des informations que j'ai pu recueillir sur FRANCE 24, des soldats se seraient mutinés. Des tirs ont été entendus au centre-ville non loin du palais présidentiel, du ministère de la Défense et du siège de l'état-major des armées.

En début d'après-midi de ce dimanche 5 septembre, toutes les casernes, par exemple le camp Alpha Yaya, étaient sous haute protection et la sécurité a été renforcée autour des résidences des officiels guinéens.

On ne sait pas où se trouve le chef de l'État, Alpha Condé. Selon une bonne source, il était bien présent à Conakry samedi soir. C'est en effet aux premières heures de la matinée que les habitants du centre-ville de Conakry et de la proche banlieue ont été réveillés par des détonations de tirs d'armes automatiques.

Voilà ce que dit un habitant de Conakry joint par RFI « Depuis ce matin, on était à la maison, on n'est pas sortis… On a d'abord entendu des tirs partout, de gauche à droite… Personne ne peut sortir. On a entendu des armes lourdes que je n'ai jamais entendues, sauf dans les guerres. Ça tire vers le palais présidentiel. »

Quand on lit, on voit bien que ce dernier fait allusion aux armes de guerres. La situation ne doit pas être du tout bonne. Mais je me reserverai de tout autre commentaire.

On aura d'autres réponses dans les heures qui suivront.

Guinée-Conakry (Guinée française)

Footnotes:
https://www.axl.cefan.ulaval.ca/afrique/guinee_franco.htm

Questions similaires

Le putsch en Guinée était-il prévisible ?

Les avis divergent énormément . La France est-elle réellement complice du génocide des tutsis au Rwanda ? Quelle est la responsabilité de Mitterrand et surtout celle de Kagame (attentat avion) ?

Les Maliens manifestants dans les rues pour réclamer le départ des soldats français, alors pourquoi la France insiste-t-elle tant pour se maintenir au Mali si elle n'est pas la bienvenue ?

Que pensez-vous de la CEDEAO, sur la question de coup d'état en Guinée Conakry ?
Quelle lecture faites-vous du coup d'État en Guinée ?
https://youtu.be/0BI7KZKF6KI

Guinée Conakry Que s'est-il passé lorsque Sékou Touré de Guinée a décidé en 1958 de quitter l'empire colonial français et d'opter ainsi pour l'indépendance de son pays?

Pourquoi autant de pays se nomment-ils Guinée ?

Pourquoi la Guinée équatoriale a-t-elle sa capitale sur une île qui semble appartenir au Cameroun?

Guinée : La transition est-elle sur la bonne voie ?
Comment ça marche en Guinée Conakry?

Pourquoi utilise-t-on le franc CFA en Guinée équatoriale, quel est le lien historique de ce pays avec la France ?

Est-ce qu'il neige en Afrique ?
Que pensez-vous du récent coup d'État en Guinée ?

Si la Guinée et le Mali sont respectivement numéro 1 et 2 sur la liste diplomatique du Ghana, quels pays occupent les 3ème à 10ème positions ?

Que pensez-vous du sentiment anti français qui évolue actuellement au Mali ?

Pourquoi autant de pays se nomment-ils Guinée ?

Olivier Gakwaya · Suivre jeu.

Dimitri Ken Féru d'histoire 24 janv.

Pour commencer, faisons l'inventaire de tous les pays qui se nomment Guinée :

Guinée-Bissau
Guinée Équatoriale

Guinée (encore appelée Guinée Conakry)

Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée

Ça en fait 4. Mais alors, pourquoi autant de Guinées ?

Le mot « Guinée » vient probablement d'un ancien mot berbère, qui signifie « peau sombre ». Ce terme était utilisé pour nommer une large portion de l'Afrique.

Source en fin de réponse.

Lorsque des siècles plus tard, les puissances européennes ont commencé à coloniser l'Afrique, plusieurs d'entre elles ont ainsi adopté indépendamment le nom Guinée. Il y a eu :

La Guinée portugaise ;
La Guinée suédoise/danoise/néerlandaise, qui est plus tard devenue la Gold Coast (actuel Ghana) ;

La Guinée française ;
La Guinée espagnole.

Lors de la décolonisation, la Guinée française a obtenu son indépendance la première, et s'est donc appelée tout simplement Guinée.

20 ans plus tard, la Guinée portugaise a obtenu son indépendance et est devenue la Guinée-Bissau.

En gagnant son indépendance, la Guinée espagnole est devenue Guinée équatoriale, à cause de sa localisation par rapport à l'Équateu

Parlons maintenant de l'autre Guinée, celle qui n'est pas africaine. L'île, initialement appelée Papouasie, a été renommée Nouvelle Guinée par les explorateurs espagnols. La raison ? Il n'y avait selon eux aucune différence de phénotype entre Papouasiens et Ouest-Africains…

© Pascale Sury

4 siècles plus tard, lorsque le territoire a gagné son indépendance, ils ont décidé de combiner l'ancienne dénomination (Papouasie) avec la contemporaine

(Nouvelle Guinée). Ainsi naquit la Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinee

Source : History Matters (2022), Why are so many countries called Guinea? (Short Animated Documentary), lien.

Que pensez-vous du sentiment anti français qui évolue actuellement au Mali ?

Pourquoi autant de pays se nomment-ils Guinée ?

Olivier Gakwaya · Suivre jeu.

Dimitri Ken Féru d'histoire 24 janv.

Pour commencer, faisons l'inventaire de tous les pays qui se nomment Guinée :

Guinée-Bissau, Guinée Équatoriale

Guinée (encore appelée Guinée Conakry)

Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée

Ça en fait 4. Mais alors, pourquoi autant de Guinées ?

Le mot « Guinée » vient probablement d'un ancien mot berbère, qui signifie « peau sombre ». Ce terme était utilisé pour nommer une large portion de l'Afrique.

Source en fin de réponse.

Lorsque des siècles plus tard, les puissances européennes ont commencé à coloniser l'Afrique, plusieurs d'entre elles ont ainsi adopté indépendamment le nom Guinée. Il y a eu :

La Guinée portugaise ;
La Guinée suédoise/danoise/néerlandaise, qui est plus tard devenue la Gold Coast (actuel Ghana) ;

La Guinée française ;
La Guinée espagnole.

Lors de la décolonisation, la Guinée française a obtenu son indépendance la première, et s'est donc appelée tout simplement Guinée.

20 ans plus tard, la Guinée portugaise a obtenu son indépendance et est devenue la Guinée-Bissau.

En gagnant son indépendance, la Guinée espagnole est devenue Guinée équatoriale, à cause de sa localisation par rapport à l'Équateu

Parlons maintenant de l'autre Guinée, celle qui n'est pas africaine. L'île, initialement appelée Papouasie, a été renommée Nouvelle Guinée par les explorateurs espagnols. La raison ? Il n'y avait selon eux aucune différence de phénotype entre Papouasiens et Ouest-Africains…

© Pascale Sury

4 siècles plus tard, lorsque le territoire a gagné son indépendance, ils ont décidé de combiner l'ancienne dénomination (Papouasie) avec la contemporaine (Nouvelle Guinée). Ainsi naquit la Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinee

Source : History Matters (2022), Why are so many countries called Guinea? (Short Animated Documentary), lien.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi y a-t-il trois Guinée ?
Qu'est-ce qui se passe en Guinée ?

Pourquoi ceux qu'on appelle des Maghrébins s'appellent ainsi tout en sachant qu'ils sont sur le continent africain ?

Pourquoi la Guinée équatoriale a-t-elle sa capitale sur une île qui semble appartenir au Cameroun?

Guinée Conakry Que s'est-il passé lorsque Sékou Touré de Guinée a décidé en 1958 de quitter l'empire colonial français et d'opter ainsi pour l'indépendance de son pays?

Le putsch en Guinée était-il prévisible ?

Pourquoi utilise-t-on le franc CFA en Guinée équatoriale, quel est le lien historique de ce pays avec la France ?

Que signifie le "-stan" à la fin de tant de noms de pays ?
Quels pays commencent par la lettre W ?
Pourquoi la plupart des pays africains restent pauvres ?
Pourquoi le Français est-il mal aimé des autres pays ?
Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils aussi fiers de leur pays ?
Pourquoi la Guinée Conakry s'appelle-t-elle ainsi ?
Pourquoi les pays africains sont-ils sous-développés ?
Pourquoi la Rhodésie a-t-elle été renommée Zimbabwe ?

Are there evidences to show that snakes can swallow humans?

Current Gist · Follow Swallow21h

See A Huge Snake That Swallowed A 70 Years Old Man Dalaba, Guinea .

Dalaba is a town and sub-prefecture in the Dalaba Prefecture in the Mamou Region of Guinea. To continue reading and to see more photos visit

See A Huge Snake That Swallowed A 70 Years Old Man Dalaba, Guinea

UNDILUTED INFORMATION BRING YOU INFORMATION IN FORM OF ENTERTAINMENT, NEWS AND GIST.

https://undilutedinfomation.blogspot.com/2022/05/see-huge-snake-that-swallowed-70-years.html?m=1

Welcome to Africa: Rest in Peace Mory K.

Posted by Patrick Crosset Valentina's (young) grandpa 2 years

An exceptional African voice has disappeared. Guinean singer and musician Mory Kanté , known for the planetary hit "Yéké yéké" in the 1980s, died of a long illness on Friday May 22 at the age of 70 in a hospital in Conakry, announced his son Balla Kante.
Mory Kanté, nicknamed the "electric griot", helped popularize African and Guinean music around the world.

I had the chance to meet him in 2015 with friends in Kipé in the suburbs of Conakry in Guinea. He gave us a 30-minute mini show in a courtyard with all the neighborhood neighbors. I will keep an exceptional memory. A Great Gentleman of African and world music has left us.

© Tulga pour StudioBleuParis

RIP my brother

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

On the Atlantic coast of West Africa.

Official title of the state

The Republic of Guinea (English)

Republique de Guinee (French)

Is a country in West Africa on the Gulf of Guinea. Formerly known as French Guinea, it is today sometimes called Guinea-Conakry to distinguish it from its neighbour Guinea-Bissau and the Republic of Equatorial Guinea.

Flag description:

Three equal vertical bands of red (hoist side), yellow, and green; red represents the people's sacrifice for liberation and work; yellow stands for the sun, for the riches of the earth, and for justice; green symbolizes the country's vegetation and unity. Note: uses the popular Pan-African colors of Ethiopia; the colors from left to right are the reverse of those on the flags of neighboring Mali and Senegal.

Neighbours

Guinea Bissau, Senegal Mali on N., Cote D'Ivoire on E., Liberia, Sierra Leone on S.Land boundaries; total 3,399 km. Border countries; Cote D' Ivoire 610 km, Guinea-Bissau 386 km, Liberia 563 km, Mali 858 km, Senegal 330 km, Sierraleone 652 km.

Founder of The Nation
Ahmed Sekou Toure

Local division
33 prefectures, 1-special zone (zone-special),Conakry Government type Republic - semi-presidential

Legislation chamber

Unicameral People's National Assembly

Form of State

Republic

The President is the Chief of State Prime Minister is the Head of Government. President is elected by popular vote for a seven-year term and has no term limits Multi-party republic with one legislative house. The Peoples National Assembly with 114 seats, members are elected by direct popular vote or proportional party lists to serve for five -year terms.

Executive branch

President, Prime Minister, Cabinet (council of ministers).

Separated by chief of State and head of Government. President elected by popular vote to serve for seven-year terms without presidential term limits. Head of Government to be appointed by the president with a consent of the National assembly.

Former Rulers

1958 – 1984 Ahmed Sékou Touré

1984 – 2008 Colonel Lansana Conté

December 22, 2008 - December 3, 2009 Captain Moussa Dadis Camara.

December, 2009 – current Mr. Alpha Conde

Judicial chamber

Court of first instance

Capital city

Conakry Altitude 7 mtrs/23 ft.

Geographic coordinates - 9.33N , 13.42W.

The name of the city comes from the fusion of the name "Cona", a wine producer of the Baga people, and the word "nakiri", which means in Sousou the other bank or side. Founded as a village in 1887, becomes capital of Guinea in 1904.

Names of main towns

Labe, Kankan, Kindia

Date of independence

2nd October, 1958.

Religions (Major)

Muslimm 85%, tribal beliefs 10 %, Christian 5%.

Main spoken languages

French (official), Pular, Mandinque (malinke), Soussou, other tribal languages spoken.

Currency unit

Guinean franc (GNf) =100 Centime

Area in Km2

24,585,700

Country area comparison in Africa

32 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms ;

Average annual population growth rate 2.649 %

Birth rate 37.21 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 10.72 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 57.6 years

Male 56.13 years ; Female 59.12 years;

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 50, Female:74

Average per capita income

USD 1, 000

Population density

43.1/km2

Urban population (%)

35

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishery: 22

Industry: 40

Social service: 38

Main Export Items

Aluminium, Bauxite, Gold, Diamonds, Coffee, Fish, agri -products.

Economy is based on

Guinea posseses major mineral, hydro-power & agricultural resources.

Climate

Tropical: Generally hot, humid and wet on the coast.

Extremes;-

Lowest point; The Atlantic coast 0 mtr.

Highest point; Mt. Nimba 1752 mtrs.
Weather of the Capital city (Conakry) average annual temperature 26.40c.

Altitude
7 mtrs

Hottest Month
August 22-28oc.

Coldest Month
January

Driest Month
January 3mm average Rf.

Wettest Month
July 1298 mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric System.

Time zone

GMT/UTC + 0

Public holidays

2nd October, 1st January, All Muslim holidays.

Ethnic groups

Peuhl 40%, Malinke 30%, Soussou 20%, other ethnic groups 10%.

Topography & Environmental concern

A narrow coastal belt leads to the mountainous middle region the source of the Gambia, Senegal and Niger rivers upper Guinea farther inland is a cooler upland the SE is forested. Environment: Deforestation; inadequate supplies of potable water; desertification; soil contamination and erosion; overfishing, overpopulation in forest region; poor mining practices have led to environmental damage.

Economy Overview

Industry

Bauxite, gold mining, diamonds, iron ore, aluminum refining, light manufactures, agro-processing.

Chief crops

Bananas, pine-apples, rice, palm-nuts, coffee, cassava, sweet potatoes, honey, timber-log : cattle, sheep, goats,

Natural resources

Bauxite, iron ore, diamonds, gold, uranium, fish, salt, hydro-power.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 7 %
Grassland: 22

Forest woods: 54

Other: 17

Marine:

Coastline; 320 km.

Commercial Sea ports:-

Conakry (main port), Boke (Kamsar) minning-export jetti

Development prospect;-

Guinea has more than half of the world's known reserves of bauxite in addition to sizeable iron ore, diamond, gold and uranium deposits. Companies from Europe and North America (Rio Tinto, BHP Billiton, Alcoa, Rusal, Anglogold and Crewgold), South America (Vale) and Asia (Chinalco and China Power Investment) have all been lobbying to protect and increase their stakes in Guinea's underground riches. The government took an aggressive approach and introduced a new mining code in September which allows the state to take a 35% stake in mines and imposes tougher regulations on acquiring development licences.

China Power Investment appears to be the first out of the block after it announced a decision to build a $6bn alumina refinery at Boffa in late 2011. Its mining permits obtained in 2008 give it access to known reserves of 900m tn of bauxite with the potential of 2bn tn. Rusal, which quickly found trouble with the new authorities after they demanded $1bn in damages for mismanagement of the Friguia alumina refinery, has opted for a diplomatic resolution to the crisis rather than risking legal proceedings. In mid-September, mines minister Mohamed Lamine Fofana launched a contract review to eliminate problematic clauses of contracts signed by previous regimes.

All of the planned mining projects require vastly improved electricity supplies. The next project on the table is the 240MW hydroelectric dam at Kaleta which is likely to be built by a Chinese company. As part of China Power Investment deal, the government asked it to build a 340MW coal - fired plant in September, 2012.

GUINEA-BISSAU

Formatted: Font: (Default) Times New Rom

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

Historically, Guinea-Bissau was known as the 'Slave Coast' due to its strategic positioning as a trading post. Guinea-Bissau was a Portuguese colony until 1974. The African Party for the Independence of Guinea-Bissau and Cape

Verde (PAIGC) fought a protracted guerrilla war for the independence of both colonies. It was led by Amilcar Cabral. He was assassinated by dissidents in his own movement in 1973. However, Guinea-Bissau unilaterally declared its independence under the leadership of his brother, Luis Cabral, and, following the carnation revolution in Lisbon in 1974, Portugal withdrew its troops and recognised the independence of Guinea Bissau. Luis Cabral governed Guinea-Bissau as a one-party state, with socialist policies but a non-aligned foreign policy. He was overthrown in 1980 by a coup led by Joao Bernardo Veira known as ‘Nino’. The coup was the beginning of a pattern in Guinea-Bissau of military coups and resultant instability, which has continued to the present day.

The liberation struggle for independence is led by the late Mr. Amilcar Cabral and of course, a Guerilla warfare under the, African Party for the Independence of Guinea & Capeverde (PAIGC) , a liberation front of the 1960s that led to the country's independence in 1974.

Mr. Amilcar Lopes Cabral, a nationalist Guerilla and politician, nicknamed "Abel Djassi" led the African nationalist movements in Guinea-Bissau & the Capeverde islands and led Guinea-Bissau to independence

Mr. Amilcar Cabral was assassinated in a commando operation in the name of "Mar Verde" meaning "Green Sea" whose goal was to capture or eliminate the leaders of PAIGC, whose were located in Conakry, Guinea, that was done on the 20th January, 1973 by the Guinea-Bissau native agents of the Portuguese colonialists, just months before unilateral declaration of independence.

Guinea became an independent state and a republic on 10th September, 1974 from the Portuguese. Half-brother, Luis De Almeida Cabral became the leader of the party (PAIGC) and would eventually to become president of Guinea-Bissau at independence in September, 1974, he was the founder president of Guinea-Bissau.

Headship since independence; Head of State and government.

President Luis Cabral was overthrown by a military coup on the 14th of November, 1980, detained for over a year and died later on the 30th of May, 2009, the coup have brought Majour Joao Bernardo Vieira (Nino) to power, a new constitution was adopted in 1984. But political turmoil in Guinea-Bissau continued.

A Republic in West Africa on the Atlantic ocean.

The present Guinea Bissau was discovered by the Portuguese in 1446 and of subsequent importance in the slave trade, Portugal made it a colony in 1879. It's former name was Portuguese Guinea (until 1974). The liberation struggle for independence is led by the late Mr. Amilcar Cabral and of course, a guerilla warfare under the, African Party for the Independence of Guinea & Capeverde (PAIGC) , a liberation front of the 1960s that led to the country's independence in 1974. Mr. Amilcar Lopes Cabral, a nationalist Guerilla and politician, nicknamed "Abel Djassi" led the African nationalist movements in Guinea-Bissau & the Capeverde islands and led the Guinea-Bissau's independence movement. An eventual union with the Capeverde islands is planned in post-independence years. Mr. Aristides Periera of the was an ally in the drive to unite the two Luzophone countries Capeverdes He was assassinated in a commando operation in the name of "Mar Verde" meaning "Green Sea" whose goal was to capture or eliminate the leaders of PAIGC, located in Conakry, Guinea, that was done on the 20th January, 1973 by the Guinea-native agents of the Portuguese colonialists, just months before Guinea-Bissau declared a unilateral independence.

The Operation Green Sea (Portuguese: Operação Mar Verde) was an amphibious attack on Conakry, the capital of Guinea, by between 350 and 420 Colonialist Portuguese soldiers and Portuguese-led Guinean fighters in November 1970. The goals of the operation included the overthrow of Ahmed Sékou Touré's regime, capture of the leader of the African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde (PAIGC), Amílcar Cabral, destruction of the naval and air assets of the PAIGC and its Guinean supporters, and the rescue of Portuguese POWs held in Conakry. His half brother, Mr. Luis De Almeida Cabral became the leader of the party (PAIGC) and would eventually to become president of Guinea-Bissau at independence in September, 1974, he was the founder president of Guinea-Bissau. Guinea Bissau became an independent state and a republic, but political turmoil continued and the government of president Luis Cabral was overthrown by a military coup on the 14th of November, 1980, arrested, detained for over a year and to be died later on in the 30th of May, 2009, the coup have brought Majour Joao Bernardo Vieira to power, a new constitution was adopted in 1984, the first multi-party elections were held in 1994, he weathered numerous attempts until being forced out nineteen years later at the onset of the country's civil war in May, 1999, Majour Joao Bernardo Vieira known as locally "Nino", went into exile in Portugal. A transitional government was formed under opposition leader Mr. Kumba Yala, sworn in as president, but he was ousted on February, 2000, by the Army chief of staff General Verissimo Correia Seabra who stepped in to end Mr. Kumba Yala's three and half years in office in a bloodless coup. And a businessman called Henrique Rosa was nominated as Interim president. Gunea-Bissau organised elections in 2005 until the late Mr. Joao Bernardo Vieira returned from exile and ran, winning the vote. Mr. J.B Vieira is shotdead by army soldiers in an apparent revenge attack at his home in Bissau on the 2nd of March, 2009, hours after a bomb blast that killed the Army chief of staff at the HQ. In accordance with the constitution of Guinea-Bissau, speaker of the national assembly, Mr. Raimundo Pereira appeared to be Interim president, then presidential elections were held on the 26th of July, 2009, that brought Mr. Malam Bakai Saanha once again to sworn into office as president, as he briefly served early years. In Guinea-Bissau, there is such romours, top military officers were involved with smuggling of illicit goods like narcotics drugs, counterfeits cigaretts from latin America across borders of to western Europe.

Politics

In an alleged revenge attack, President Joao Bernardo Vieira was shot dead by renegade soldiers on March 2, 2009, hours after a bomb attack which killed the army's chief of staff, General Tagme Na Waie.

The presidential polls following the assassination of President Viera were held in June 2009, however, a few days earlier, military police killed one of the candidates, which was explained as a bid to foil a coup.

High levels of crime and drug trafficking threaten political stability.

Economy

Guinea Bissau has oil prospects. However, for significant investment to take place, it needs more conclusive results in the exploration stages

Large spurts of growth in the tourism sector has contributed substantially to the country's economy, which is largely crippled by external debt.

The nation's dependence on cashew exports means it is highly susceptible to world price fluctuations.

Social

There is a high level of income inequality in Guinea Bissau, which has led to social divisions based on income rather than ethnicity.

There exists a problem of 'brain drain', the highly educated tend to emigrate.

Contraception is more widely used in urban and rural areas. This is widely attributed to improvements in family planning services.

Major Conflicts

War of Independence

When: 1963 – 1974

Who: African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde (PAIGC)led by Amilcar Cabral vs Portuguese

Why: Liberation revolution

Outcome: Portugal grants Guinea-Bissau independence with Luis Cabral, Amilcar Cabral's brother, as president after Amilcar Cabral was assassinated

Joao Bernardo Vieira's Coup

When: 1980

Who: Joao Bernardo Vieira and the military vs Luis Cabral's government

Why: Dissatisfaction with the government – predominantly due to poor economic conditions.

Outcome: The bloodless coup was successful and Vieira was declared president. Plans for unification with Cape Verde were cancelled and the PAIGC in Cape Verde fractioned and formed a separate party. A nine-member military Council of the Revolution, chaired by Vieira, was set up and the constitution was suspended.

General Ansumane Mane's Coup

When: 1999

Who: General Ansumane Mane and soldiers vs Vieira's government

Why: Vieira had sacked Mane in 1998, which led to mutinies

Outcome: Vieira was toppled and Malam Bacai Sanha, the former speaker of parliament, was installed as the interim president

2003 Military Coup

When: 2003

Who: Commander Zamora Induta and the national forces vs government.

Why: The armed forces claimed that the government was not solving the country's problems. Outcome: The bloodless coup was successful and then President Kumba Yala was taken prisoner. At recent, Guinea-Bissau's navy chief has been arrested after an attempted coup on the 26th December, 2011. The army said there were more clashes overnight in the hunt for suspects, the AFP news agency reports. President Malam Bacai Sanha is in France, where he has been receiving medical treatment since early December.

Outcome: Guinea-Bissau's navy chief has been arrested.

Side note: Last year, Guinea Bissau Navy chief Rear Admiral Jose Americo Bubo Na Tchuto was named by the US as a "drug kingpin". In recent years the tiny West African nation has become a major transit hub for cocaine smuggled from Latin America to Europe and suffered much political unrest as a result.

Side note: Guinea-Bissau ex-spy chief Samba Djalo shotdead. The former head of military intelligence in Guinea-Bissau has been shot dead by uniformed men, just hours after polls closed in the unstable country, officials say. Col Samba Djalo was shot in a restaurant opposite his home in the capital, Bissau, witnesses say. It is not clear why he was shot but he was previously linked to a 2009 bombing which killed the then army chief. The election follows the death in January of President Malam Bacai Sanha. Guinea-Bissau has experienced numerous army mutinies and coup

plots since independence from Portugal in 1975. In recent years, it has become a major drugs trafficking hub as gangs have taken advantage of its instability and poverty to use it to smuggle cocaine from Latin America to Europe. The electoral commission head and army spokesman have vowed that the shooting of Colonel Samba Djalo will not derail the election.

Side note: Soldiers, led by Guinea-Bissau's army chief of staff, General Antonio Indjai, toppled the government over its alleged plans to reduce the size of the army.The military leaders - who took power on 12th April between the two rounds of a presidential election - had previously also agreed to a 12-month transition to civilian rule, as demanded by the regional bloc ECOWAS. The coup leaders said, polls to return the country to constitutional rule would take place within two years. The soldiers claimed during a presidential election on 12 April that Mr. Gomes - who was considered the front-runner in the election - planned to reduce the size of the army. It’s to be recalled that the coup leader General Antonio Indjal became the army chief after staging an army mutiny in April 2010. The West African regional bloc ECOWAS has imposed targeted sanctions on Guinea-Bissau's military junta after talks to restore civilian rule broke down. At a 26 April summit in Ivory Coast's commercial capital, Abidjan, ECOWAS gave Guinea-Bissau's junta 72 hours to agree to a return to constitutional order and to allow in up to 600 regional troops or face targeted sanctions. ECOWAS mediators said the junta rejected key demands - including that elections be held within 12 months.Former Interim President Raimundo Pereira and Prime Minister Carlos Gomes Jr, who were arrested during the coup, were released over the weekend and flown to Ivory Coast's commercial capital of Abidjan, officials said. West Africa's heads of state are due to meet on 3 May to discuss "all other necessary measures, including the use of force to enforce the decisions of the summit," the Ecowas statement added.West African leaders have agreed to send troops to Mali and Guinea-Bissau following coups in both countries. The regional grouping Ecowas said after an emergency summit that it expected both countries to organise presidential elections within the next 12 months. Between 500 and 600 troops will be sent immediately to Guinea-Bissau. At least 3,000 regional soldiers are ready to go to Mali to support the transitional government's fight against rebels which control the north. Meantime, Guinea-Bissau leaders seized in coup are freed. Troops in the West African country of Guinea-Bissau have freed the interim president and ex-prime minister seized in a coup. The UN Security Council has imposed a travel ban on five leaders of the recent military coup in Guinea-Bissau.

The resolution also demands immediate steps to restore democracy and ensure soldiers return to their barracks. General Antonio Injai and his forces took power on 12 April, between two rounds of a presidential election. The UN resolution also threatens an arms embargo and financial sanctions if Guinea-Bissau does not return to civilian rule. It expresses concern about reports of looting and human rights abuses by the military and about the possible increase in drug trafficking as a result of the coup. The European Union has already imposed sanctions and the West African group Ecowas has begun deploying forces to Guinea-Bissau to oversee a gradual one-year transition to civilian rule. About 600 troops are expected to arrive there in the coming days. The UN is taking part in regional meeting in Ivory Coast over the weekend to discuss the political crises in Guinea-Bissau and Mali which has also suffered a coup.

Updates: Guinea-Bissau drug trade 'rises since coup' - Guinea-Bissau has become a major hub for smuggling drugs to Europe - The UN Security Council has expressed concern that drug trafficking in Guinea-Bissau has increased since the coup in April, 2012. It demanded that the country's rulers restore constitutional rule. Guinea-Bissau has a long history of coups since independence from Portugal in September, 1974. It has also become a staging post for gangs smuggling cocaine from Latin America to Europe, allegedly in collusion with top army officers. "The members of the Security Council condemned the continuing interference of the military in politics and expressed their concern with reports of an increase in drug trafficking since the April 12, 2012 coup d'etat," the Security Council said after a meeting in New York. It said it was considering calling an international summit to discuss how to achieve democratic rule in Guinea Bissau. In May, 2012 the Security Council imposed travel bans on the coup leaders and their key supporters. The military has agreed in talks brokered by the West African regional body, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), to return the country to democratic rule, but has so far failed to do so. In 2010, the US accused senior military men from Guinea-Bissau, including former navy chief Jose Americo Bubo Na Tchuto, of drug running. Under the Drug Kingpin Act, financial sanctions were imposed on the officers. No elected leader in nearly 40 years of independence has finished their time in office in Guinea-Bissau.

October 21, 2012: Guinea-Bissau Troops Kill 6 Gunmen in Failed Coup Attempt'

Six people have been killed in a gunbattle in troubled of Guinea-Bissau in what officials are calling a failed coup attempt. Officials in the West African country say government troops repelled an attack before dawn Sunday on the airforce base near the capital, Bissau. Casualties among the government forces could not be immediately confirmed. Witnesses said authorities tightened security in the capital after a two-hour gunbattle and the situation is calm. Guinea-Bissau has suffered chronic unrest since independence from Portugal in 1974, with frequent coups and counter-coups. A military junta seized power in April, interrupting a presidential election between the first and second rounds. The coup leaders later installed a transitional government to organize new elections, winning the support of West African regional bloc ECOWAS. But the transitional government has failed to secure wider international recognition, with critics saying it remains under army influence. The instability has made Guinea-Bissau a hub for international cocaine traffickers. VoA News Africa

Updates;-(October 11, 2012): Guinea Bissau's coup complacency' The deposed prime minister and leading presidential candidate, now living in exile, complains that West African leaders have sought too much compromise with rogue elements of the military. Deposed prime minister Carlos Gomes Júnior believes that the country "faces gloomy prospects" if the current government – formed after a military coup ousted the ruling Partido Africano da Independência da Guiné e Cabo Verde (PAIGC) in April – stays in power. "The government I was leading had very high scores in performance and good governance, which was recognised by the Guinean people. That is the reason the army wanted us out," Gomes Jr says from Lisbon, where he and advisers are now living in exile. In a country rife with political instability, military coups and a thriving drug trade since its 1974 independence from Portugal, the politician believes that only a United Nations-led intervention will restore stability. The aid-dependent country is now headed by a military command whose leadership has been mediated by the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS). "ECOWAS has acted disastrously," Gomes Jr continues, adding that Nigeria – which has just announced training for troops to go into Guinea-Bissau – Côte d'Ivoire, Senegal and Burkino Faso have eroded the principle held by ECOWAS and the African Union of zero tolerance for coups. "Guinea-Bissau is not a self-sufficient country. It depends on the international community to guarantee that the basic needs of its population are met. The majority of the coup government have no governmental experience, legitimacy or credibility to convince international partners that it can continue with cooperation agreements." The Comunidade dos Países de Língua Portuguesa's tough stance – seeking a stabilisation force and completion of the interrupted presidential election – has encouraged Gomes Jr. and the PAIGC to refuse compromise and has left ECOWAS as the broker. "Angola has always been a strong ally of Guinea-Bissau and will continue to betoitspeople," Gomes Jr says.

Butan ECOWAS force has now replaced the Lusophone nation's military support mission in Guinea-Bissau. A recent concession has resulted in the interim government, led by Manuel Serifo Nhamadjo, agreeing to an ECOWAS deadline of April 2013 for new elections – a year after Gomes Jr was seized by the army. "On 12 April we were arrested and held by soldiers, in an abusive way, for 14 days," Gomes Jr says of the events that occurred after he won the first round of the elections. "ECOWAS made the necessary arrangements with the military officers involved in the coup, got us freed and taken dir- ectly to Abidjan, where we were not informed of the terms and status of our stay. That is when we decided to come to Portugal – where we have more freedom to fight against those who seized power in Guinea-Bissau." In early September, Gomes Jr was at the 67th United Nations General Assembly, where he hoped to solidify his legitimacy. In spite of the uncertain future, he doubts the likelihood of "total state collapse" and believes free and fair elections can be held: "I have faith in the international community, personified by the UN, because of what has been its coherence since the beginning: firmly condemning the coup and always demanding the reinstatement of consti- tutional order in the country." The Africa Report

Guinea-Bissau Troops Kill 6 Gunmen in Failed Coup Attempt'

Updates: (October 21, 2012) Six people have been killed in a gunbattle in troubled of Guinea-Bissau in what officials are calling a failed coup attempt. Officials in the West African country say government troops repelled an attack before dawn Sunday on the airforce base near the capital, Bissau. Casualties among the government forces could not be immediately confirmed. Witnesses said authorities tightened security in the capital after a two-hour gunbattle and the situation is calm. Guinea-Bissau has suffered chronic unrest since independence from Portugal in 1974, with frequent coups and counter-coups. A military junta seized power in April, interrupting a presidential election between the first and second rounds. The coup leaders later installed a transitional government to organize new elections, winning the support of West African regional bloc ECOWAS. But the transitional government has failed to secure wider international recognition, with critics saying it remains under army influence. The instability has made Guinea-Bissau a hub for international cocaine traffickers. VoA News Africa

Guinea Bissau: Arrest of drug lords just the first step in the battle against trafficking’

Summary & Comment: Tshwane/Pretoria (South Africa) Guinea Bissau is notorious for being West Africa's drug capital. Cocaine trafficking here has an estimated market value of $4,3 billion a year. Where to try the traffickers if caught?. Drug money can get them off within the country. An incorruptible justice system would help catch traffickers, but impossible to change it before the upcoming election in November. No other African country provides a better setting for a fast-paced crime thriller than Guinea Bissau. The spectacular capture at sea of the former head of Guinea-Bissau's navy, José Américo Bubo Na Tchuto, by the United States (US) navy in April this year was another reminder that fact is stranger than fiction in this country - notorious for being West Africa's drug capital. Cocaine trafficking here has an estimated market value of $4,3 billion a year. But apart from its spectator value, one has to ask what the sting operation led by the US Drug Enforcement Agency means for Guinea-Bissau's future.Recently, the country's interim leader President Manuel Serifo Nhamadjo announced that the long-overdue elections would be held on 24 November this year - the first elections since a military coup in April 2012. Building on the recent successful arrests, everything possible should be done to ensure that these elections are not tainted by drug money.

In order for the operation against the drug lords to have a lasting and positive effect on stability, democratic governance and the rule of law in Guinea Bissau and in West Africa more broadly, Na Tchuto's trial, which began in the US this week, needs to be emphasized as a deterrent and followed up with a sustained effort to improve the country's criminal justice system. If not, an opportunity will be wasted to see long-term benefits from this dramatic external intervention. On the contrary, the arrests might destabilise power relations and lead to more violence. The capture of Na Tchuto and six accomplices, as well as the indictment against General Antonio Indjai, head of the armed forces, is certainly a victory for law enforcement. It may also mean the end of an era of impunity in the region. Both men are charged with drug trafficking and the purchase of surface-to-air missiles and AK47 assault rifles with grenade launchers for the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) insurgency. The main problem with these arrests is that outsiders were responsible for them and Na Tchuto is now being tried by the New York District Court. This undermines due process in Guinea Bissau and has been met with nationalistic indignation in some circles. The military, not surprisingly, feels threatened and betrayed.

Clearly, it would have been preferable if Na Tchuto and his accomplices were tried and imprisoned on national soil. However, years of turmoil have left Guinea-Bissau's judiciary in tatters. Since the latest coup, high-ranking officials like Indjai have vetted all political and judicial appointments, ruling out any credible due process. Guinea-Bissau has also been plagued by political assassinations in recent years, including that of former president João Bernardo 'Nino' Vieira in March 2009. None of these acts - often linked to the cocaine trade - has ever been seriously investigated. The Guinea-Bissau League of Human Rights remarked in a 2012 press release that 'citizens are denied the fundamental right of access to justice due to the failure of the state to fulfil its constitutional obligations'.

A possible solution could be to try drug traffickers in the region. This could be modelled on the international response to piracy in West Africa, where pirates are tried in neighbouring countries. This option has been discussed in the past and a majority of the members of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) are in favour of such a move. In the short term, the 2 April sting operation could, paradoxically, increase the possibility of violence. A lesson learned from Latin America is that the key driver of violence is not cocaine as such, but change: change in the negotiated power relations between and within groups, and with the state. It is clear that if Na Tchuto and Indjai are successfully unseated it will destabilise a longstanding balance of power, linked to control of territory along ethnic and clan lines.Until now Guinea-Bissau has been relatively free from clan-, community- and gang-related violence and people do not see drug trafficking as directly impacting on their own sense of security. This might now change.

Some citizens also fear military retaliation or another coup, following the arrest of the drug lords. To allow this to happen on the eve of the elections, and because of a much-needed law enforcement intervention, would be a crying shame. To help Guinea-Bissau break the vicious cycle of political fragility the international community can use this opportunity to highlight that impunity for drug trafficking and organised crime has now ended in West Africa. It should work with the region to make sure the upcoming elections go ahead and are not influenced by criminal actors, and continue to support the work of the United Nations Integrated Peacebuilding Office in Guinea-Bissau (UNOGBIS). It should support efforts to strengthen the criminal justice system and help the country establish a broad-based rule of law and legal empowerment framework.

Finally, it could consider setting up an internationally sponsored mechanism - perhaps similar to the International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala (CICIG). The aim will be to provide integrity to regionally or nationally led criminal justice proceedings against crimes committed in Guinea-Bissau, such as drug trafficking and violations of human rights. A serious commitment is needed to strengthen the criminal justice system in Guinea-Bissau and to build citizens' confidence that the state has the capacity to deliver justice and uphold the rule of law. Elections are a perfect opportunity to hold the candidates, and thus the potential future government, to account for building more robust measures to counter organised crime and impunity. The international community can and should help in this process in preparation for the elections. This article is based on an ISS Policy Brief, 'The end of impunity? After the kingpins, what next for Guinea-Bissau?'. Tuesday Reitano and Mark Shaw, senior research associates, Institute for Security Studies and STATT Consulting, Hong Kong.

Accession to president Malam Bakai Saanha, by election.

Tentative election calendar – July

Guinea-Bissau – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

Pre-15th century - The area of what is now Guinea-Bissau comes under the influence of the Mali Empire and becomes a tributary kingdom known as Gabu.

1446-47 - First Portuguese arrive; subsequently administered as part of the Portuguese Cape Verde Islands, the Guinea area becomes important in the slave-trade.

1879 - Guinea-Bissau becomes a separate colony. Portuguese control of the interior is slow and sometimes violent, and not effectively achieved until 1915.

1951 - Guinea-Bissau declared overseas territory of Portugal.

1956 - Amilcar Cabral establishes the African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde (PAIGC).

1963-74 - PAIGC launches war of independence.

1973 - Amilcar Cabral nicknamed ‘Abel Jassi’ assassinated. PAIGC unilaterally declares Guinea-Bissau independent of Portugal and gives it its present name.

1974 - Portugal grants Guinea-Bissau independence with Luis Cabral, Amilcar Cabral's brother, as president.

1980 - Luis Cabral ousted in military coup led by Majour Joao Bernardo Vieira; plans for unification with Cape Verde dropped.

1990 - Parliament revokes the PAIGC's status as the sole legitimate party.

Majour Joao Bernardo Vieira took power in a coup and was himself ousted. He won the presidential election but was then assassinated 1994 – Joao Bernardo Vieira nicknamed as ‘Nino’chosen as president in Guinea-Bissau's first free election.

1998 - Army mutinies after Vieira sacks his army commander, General Ansumane Mane, whom he accused of allowing weapons to be smuggled to rebels in Senegal.

May 1999 - Soldiers led by General Ansumane Mane toppled Nino Vieira.

Military junta installs Malam Bacai Sanha, the former speaker of parliament, as interim president.

January 2000 - Kumba Yala elected president.

November 2000 - General Mane killed, allegedly after trying to stage coup.

January 2001 - Guinea-Bissau Resistance (RGB) party pulls out of ruling coalition saying it wasn't consulted about a cabinet reshuffle.

May 2001 - IMF, World Bank suspend aid over millions missing from development funds. Towards year's end an IMF team praises improvements in financial controls.

November 2001 - Foreign minister Antonieta Rosa Gomes dismissed after criticising President Yala. Increasing concern over the president's erratic behaviour.

December 2001 - Government says it has thwarted a coup attempt by army officers. Opposition casts doubt on allegations. Prime Minister Faustino Imbali is sacked for "failing to meet expectations".

November 2002 - President Yala says he plans to dissolve parliament and call early elections. The move comes amid a long-running row with his prime minister.

September 14, 2003 - Military coup ousts President Yala.

September 28, 2003 - Civilian administration headed by interim President Henrique Rosa and interim Prime Minister Antonio Artur Rosa is sworn in after military, political parties agree to hold parliamentary and presidential elections.

March 2004 - Former ruling party, the PAIGC, wins general election.

October 2004 - Mutinous soldiers kill the head of the armed forces in pursuit of demands which include payment of outstanding wages.

April 2005 - Joao Bernardo Vieira, former president toppled in 1999 rebellion, returns from exile in Portugal.

May 2005 - Former president Kumba Yala, who was deposed in 2003, declares that he is still the rightful head of state. He stages a brief occupation of the presidency building.

July 2005 - Former military ruler Joao Bernardo Vieira wins a run-off vote in presidential elections.

October 2005 - After a few weeks in office, President Vieira sacks the government of Prime Minister Carlos Gomes Junior.

March-April 2006 - Guinea-Bissau soldiers battle Senegalese rebels along the southern border.

June 2006 - Unions call a three-day strike over civil service wage arrears. The regional economic grouping ECOWAS promises to cover teachers' pay.

October 2006 - Guinea-Bissau appeals for international help to stop people-traffickers using its remote coastline to smuggle migrants, including Asians, to Europe.

March-April 2007 - Prime Minister Aristides Gomes resigns after his government loses a no-confidence vote. Martinho Ndafa Kabi is appointed as consensus prime minister.

June 2007 - Donors have one last opportunity to save Guinea-Bissau from chaos and to combat Latin American drug cartels, the UN and International Monetary Fund warn.

December 2007 - Parliament passes law guaranteeing amnesty for any violence committed during the years of political unrest between 1980 and 2004.

July 2008 - One of the three major parties quits the national unity coalition, triggering a political crisis.

July-August 2008 - The justice minister and attorney-general both say they have received death threats over the arrest of three Venezuelans, the head of air traffic control and his deputy on suspicion of drugs trafficking.

August 2008 - President Vieira dissolves parliament, which automatically brings about the fall of the government of Martinho Ndafa Kabi.

Mr Nino Vieira appoints former prime minister Carlos Correia to head the government in the run-up to parliamentary elections in November 2008.

November 2008 - President Vieira survives a gun attack on his home by mutinous soldiers, in what appears to be a failed coup.

March 2009 - President Joao Bernardo Vieira is shot dead by renegade soldiers, hours after a bomb attack that killed the army's chief of staff, General Tagme Na Waie.

June 2009 - First round of presidential polls. Days earlier, military police kill one of the candidates in bid to foil a "coup".

July 2009 - Malam Bacai Sanha, wins presidential election in a run-off.

April 2010 - Mutinous soldiers briefly detain Prime Minister Carlos Gomes Junior and replace armed forces chief.

US names two top military officials as international drugs traffickers and freezes their US assets.

June 2010 - Leader of April's mutiny, General Antonio Indjai, is made army chief.

August 2010 - EU announces it is ending mission to reform Guinea Bissau's security forces, saying lack of respect for rule of law is making this an impossible task.

October 2010 - US expresses concern over Guinea Bissau government's decision to reinstate alleged drugs kingpin Jose Americo Bubo Na Tchuto as head of navy. Mr Na Tchuto is a close ally of army chief General Antonio Indjai.

December 2010 - Former army chief Jose Zamora Induta, who was arrested during April mutiny, is released from prison but days later placed under house arrest.

February 2011 - EU suspends part of its aid to Guinea-Bissau because of concerns over governance and the rule of law.

July-August 2011 - Thousands take to the streets to demand the resignation of Prime Minister Carlos Gomes Junior for his failure to curb rising food prices.

December 2011 - Prime Minister Carlos Gomes Junior says a coup attempt against President Malam Bacai Sanha, mounted while the president was receiving medical treatment abroad, has been foiled. Navy chief Jose Americo Bubo Na Tchuto is accused of masterminding the coup and arrested.

January 2012 - President Malam Bacai Sanha dies in hospital in Paris. National Assembly head Raimundo Pereira becomes interim president.

April-May 2012 - Soldiers topple the government. Interim President Pereira is detained, as is the front-runner in an ongoing presidential poll, former Prime Minister Carlos Gomes Junior. A transitional government, led by Manuel Serifo Nhamadjo, is formed. Politicians and the military agree to hold fresh elections within a year, but no specific steps are taken. The UN Security Council imposes travel bans on the coup leaders and their key supporters.

July 2012 - The UN Security Council expresses concern that drug trafficking has increased since the coup, and demands a return to constitutional rule.

October 2012 - Seven killed in raid on an army barracks, which the transitional government describes as a failed coup attempt.

FORMER PORTUGUESE OVERSEAS TERRITORIES
Are there many immigrants in Brazil coming from Lusophone African countries like Mozambique, Angola, Guinea Bissau, Cape Verde?

Here is the data— I think it is missing folks from Haiti, who are going to Brazil
Christine Nogueira Lives in Boston, MA US 3y

Approaching the third decade of the 21st century, Brazil continues to be a center of global migration. In 2017, nearly 736,000 registered immigrants lived in Brazil, while many hundreds of thousands more were in the country without formal documentation. Portuguese are the largest immigrant population, followed far behind by those from Japan, Italy, Paraguay, and Bolivia (see Table 2). In recent years, Koreans, Angolans, Paraguayans, and Nigerians have been entering in growing numbers.

Table 2. Top Immigrant Populations in Brazil, 2017

Country of Origin	Number of Immigrants
Portugal	169,000
Japan	60,000
Italy	46,000
Paraguay	48,000
Bolivia	48,000
Spain	38,000
Argentina	36,000
Uruguay	29,000
China	24,000
United States	22,000

Source: UN DESA, "Trends in International Migrant Stock: The 2017 Revision."

Migration in Brazil: The Making of a Multicultural Society By Christine Nogueira

Related Links

Can the majority of the population of Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau speak standard Portuguese at a good conversational level?

How different are the Portuguese spoken in Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, East Timor, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, Portugal and São Tomé and Príncipe?

Are there many Portuguese speaking Africans (Angolans, Bissau-Guineans, Cabo Verdianos, São Toméans, or Mozambicans) living in Brazil? What do Brazilians think of them?

Was Angola and Mozambique were not much more than overseas holdings for Portugal? How did this relationship or colonial process differ from that of Portugal's other famous colony, Brazil? (And to other European colonies in Africa of the time)?

Did African slaves in Brazil all come from the African countries who speak Portuguese today (Angola, Mozambique, etc.)?

Will the Angola government send troops to Cabo Delgado in Mozambique insurgency?

Why do Brazilians and Cape Verdeans speak Portuguese as a native language but people from Goa and Macau do not despite a longer Portuguese presence?

How different is Brazilian Portuguese from the Portuguese spoken in Mozambique or Angola?

Why can't Portugal consider people from Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, and Mozambique as ethnic Portuguese people since they have Portuguese blood?

How and why were 2 islands off the African coast, Cape Verde, Guinea and Brazil unable to stop the Portuguese from invading, conquering, colonising and taking over them too?

What is it like to be an immigrant in Brazil?

Can a speaker of Brazilian Portuguese understand Cape Verde Creole?

Mozambique and Angola were both Portuguese colonies and both embraced communism. Is that just a coincidence, or is there something to that?

Given their common colonial Portuguese background does Brazil have a special relationship with Angola, Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau, Sao Tome and Principe and Timor-Leste?

If Brazil, Portugal, Angola and Mozambique came together again (as in the old days of the United Kingdom of Portugal, Brazil and the Algarves). How influential would this Lusophone Empire be?

News Nigeria
Attempted coup d'état in Guinea Bissau
Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 8h

State broadcaster reports ‘invaders’ holding government officials amid videos of heavily armed men on social media.

The African Union and the West African bloc ECOWAS on Tuesday condemned an 'attempted coup' in Guinea-Bissau after heavy gunfire was heard near a government compound where the president had been chairing a cabinet meeting.

If confirmed, this would be the second military power grab in West Africa in as many weeks after a coup in Burkina Faso on Jan.

GUINEA BISSAU
HIS EXCELLENCY
UMARO SISSOCO EMBALÓ
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF GUINEA BISSAU

News Nigeria

Guinea-Bissau President Umaro Sissoco Embalo confirmed a coup attempt that occurred at the government palace on Tuesday, saying it was unsuccessful.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 8h

“Our republican defense and security forces were able to stop this evil,” Embalo said after a five-hour attack on the government building that was hosting an official meeting with the president and prime minister, The Associated Press reported.

It is unclear who was behind the attack, but the individuals shot at the building with machine guns and AK-47s.

CPJ-Armed men again raid Guinea Bissau broadcaster Radio capital FM, destroy equipment

Damaged equipment is seen in the office of Guinea-Bissau broadcaster Radio Capital FM after armed men raided the station's headquarters, threatened its staff, and destroyed its equipment on February 7, 2022. (Photo: Mustafa Queita)

New York, February 8, 2022 -- Authorities in Guinea Bissau must thoroughly investigate the latest attack on broadcaster Radio Capital FM, ensure the safety of its staff, and bring those responsible to justice, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Tuesday.

At around 10 a.m. on Monday, a group of about four unidentified men fired guns at the privately owned broadcaster’s headquarters in Bissau, the capital, and then broke into the office and ransacked it, according to media reports and Radio Capital FM program host Sabino Santos and owner and director Lassana Cassamá, both of whom spoke to CPJ in phone interviews and via messaging app.

The attackers, some in military uniforms and others in civilian clothes, shot and destroyed broadcasting equipment throughout the office, according to those sources.

The men openly discussed whether to kill the station’s staff members, but one of the men ordered that no one be harmed, Santos and Cassamá said. The staff members on the premises were able to flee, but several sustained injuries while escaping over the two-meter wall surrounding the building, they said.

A police officer guarding the station fled as soon as the attack began, according to Santos and Cassamá.

The station often reports critically on the government of President Umaro Sissoco Embaló, and that morning had hosted a call-in show for listeners to comment on the country's failed February 1 coup attempt, Santos said.

Police have been stationed at the broadcaster following an attack in July 2020, when unidentified armed men smashed its broadcast equipment. Authorities have not identified any suspects in that attack, Santos and Cassamá told CPJ.

"Authorities in Guinea-Bissau must ensure that this time around, those responsible for attacking Radio Capital FM and terrorizing its journalists and media workers are arrested and held to account," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator. "The continued impunity for attacks on journalists in Guinea-Bissau has given armed thugs the license, once again, to destroy equipment and force off air a radio station critical of the government of President Umaro Sissoco Embaló, believing that there will be no consequences."

Administrative assistant Binghate Martins was at the broadcaster during the raid and told CPJ in a phone interview that the attackers forced him to lay on the ground, fired gunshots near his feat, and beat him on his back with rifles.

Reporters Maimuna Bari, Bala Sambú, and Ansumane Sow, radio technicians Lassana Djassi, Bakar Kuiaté, and Alssene Kandé, and administrative worker Sana Mancal sustained injuries as they escaped over the wall surrounding the radio station, according to Santos.

He said that Bari sustained a suspected spinal contusion and remained hospitalized; Djassi broke a leg, Sow broke an arm, and the others suffered minor injuries.

Sow told CPJ in a phone call that he broke his right arm when he slipped and fell trying to climb the wall as attackers fired their initial shots outside the building. He was treated at a private clinic in Bissau, he said.

Hearing gunshots at the radio station was "particularly horrible and traumatic" after he had reported on the February 1 coup attempt, Sow said. Santos told CPJ that the attackers shot nine computers, two sound mixing tables, and all of the station's security cameras, and the attack lasted about five minutes.

"Their intentions to wreck the equipment were clear," he said, adding at the broadcaster was off the air indefinitely due to a lack of functioning equipment.

Santos said the national judicial police sealed the station to investigate the attack, and he could not predict when they would release the premises or when the station would be back online.

The deputy director of the judicial police, Cornélia Viera, told CPJ in a phone interview that she did not know when the premises would be unsealed, as it would depend on when the investigation was completed. She said she could not comment further as the case was under investigation.

In comments to journalists yesterday, the deputy commissioner of the public order police, Salvador Soares, described the attack as “an isolated act.” Santos disagreed with that framing, asking, “how is this an isolated act if the Ministry of Interior has had two officers at the door since the last attack?”

Indira Baldé, head of the local journalists’ trade union SINJOTECS, told CPJ via messaging app that the attack “goes to show journalists are not safe while doing our jobs in Guinea-Bissau.”

Last year, Santos also faced a criminal defamation investigation over his work, along with Radio Capital FM host Sumba Nancil. The case was later dropped for lack of evidence, Santos said.

Guinée-Bissau (Guinée portugaise)

Footnotes:
https://www.axl.cefan.ulaval.ca/afrique/Guinee-Bissau.htm

Que pensez-vous du sentiment anti français qui évolue actuellement au Mali ?

Pourquoi autant de pays se nomment-ils Guinée ?

Olivier Gakwaya · Suivre jeu.

Dimitri Ken Féru d'histoire 24 janv.

Pour commencer, faisons l'inventaire de tous les pays qui se nomment Guinée :

Guinée-Bissau
Guinée Équatoriale

Guinée (encore appelée Guinée Conakry)

Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée

Ça en fait 4. Mais alors, pourquoi autant de Guinées ?

Le mot « Guinée » vient probablement d'un ancien mot berbère, qui signifie « peau sombre ». Ce terme était utilisé pour nommer une large portion de l'Afrique.

Source en fin de réponse.

Lorsque des siècles plus tard, les puissances européennes ont commencé à coloniser l'Afrique, plusieurs d'entre elles ont ainsi adopté indépendamment le nom Guinée. Il y a eu :

La Guinée portugaise ;
La Guinée suédoise/danoise/néerlandaise, qui est plus tard devenue la Gold Coast (actuel Ghana) ;

La Guinée française ;
La Guinée espagnole.

Lors de la décolonisation, la Guinée française a obtenu son indépendance la première, et s'est donc appelée tout simplement Guinée.

20 ans plus tard, la Guinée portugaise a obtenu son indépendance et est devenue la Guinée-Bissau.

En gagnant son indépendance, la Guinée espagnole est devenue Guinée équatoriale, à cause de sa localisation par rapport à l'Équateu

Parlons maintenant de l'autre Guinée, celle qui n'est pas africaine. L'île, initialement appelée Papouasie, a été renommée Nouvelle Guinée par les explorateurs espagnols. La raison ? Il n'y avait selon eux aucune différence de phénotype entre Papouasiens et Ouest-Africains…

© Pascale Sury

4 siècles plus tard, lorsque le territoire a gagné son indépendance, ils ont décidé de combiner l'ancienne dénomination (Papouasie) avec la contemporaine (Nouvelle Guinée). Ainsi naquit la Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinee

Source : History Matters (2022), Why are so many countries called Guinea? (Short Animated Documentary), lien.

Que pensez-vous du sentiment anti français qui évolue actuellement au Mali ?

Pourquoi autant de pays se nomment-ils Guinée ?

Olivier Gakwaya · Suivre jeu.

Dimitri Ken Féru d'histoire 24 janv.

Pour commencer, faisons l'inventaire de tous les pays qui se nomment Guinée :

Guinée-Bissau
Guinée Équatoriale

Guinée (encore appelée Guinée Conakry)

Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée

Ça en fait 4. Mais alors, pourquoi autant de Guinées ?

Le mot « Guinée » vient probablement d'un ancien mot berbère, qui signifie « peau sombre ». Ce terme était utilisé pour nommer une large portion de l'Afrique.

Source en fin de réponse.

Lorsque des siècles plus tard, les puissances européennes ont commencé à coloniser l'Afrique, plusieurs d'entre elles ont ainsi adopté indépendamment le nom Guinée. Il y a eu :

La Guinée portugaise ;
La Guinée suédoise/danoise/néerlandaise, qui est plus tard devenue la Gold Coast (actuel Ghana) ;

La Guinée française ;
La Guinée espagnole.

Lors de la décolonisation, la Guinée française a obtenu son indépendance la première, et s'est donc appelée tout simplement Guinée.

20 ans plus tard, la Guinée portugaise a obtenu son indépendance et est devenue la Guinée-Bissau.

En gagnant son indépendance, la Guinée espagnole est devenue Guinée équatoriale, à cause de sa localisation par rapport à l'Équateu

Parlons maintenant de l'autre Guinée, celle qui n'est pas africaine. L'île, initialement appelée Papouasie, a été renommée Nouvelle Guinée par les explorateurs espagnols. La raison ? Il n'y avait selon eux aucune différence de phénotype entre Papouasiens et Ouest-Africains…

© Pascale Sury

4 siècles plus tard, lorsque le territoire a gagné son indépendance, ils ont décidé de combiner l'ancienne dénomination (Papouasie) avec la contemporaine (Nouvelle Guinée). Ainsi naquit la Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinee

Source : History Matters (2022), Why are so many countries called Guinea? (Short Animated Documentary), lien.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi y a-t-il trois Guinée ?
Qu'est-ce qui se passe en Guinée ?

Pourquoi ceux qu'on appelle des Maghrébins s'appellent ainsi tout en sachant qu'ils sont sur le continent africain ?

Pourquoi la Guinée équatoriale a-t-elle sa capitale sur une île qui semble appartenir au Cameroun?

Guinée Conakry Que s'est-il passé lorsque Sékou Touré de Guinée a décidé en 1958 de quitter l'empire colonial français et d'opter ainsi pour l'indépendance de son pays?

Le putsch en Guinée était-il prévisible ?

Pourquoi utilise-t-on le franc CFA en Guinée équatoriale, quel est le lien historique de ce pays avec la France ?

Que signifie le "-stan" à la fin de tant de noms de pays ?
Quels pays commencent par la lettre W ?
Pourquoi la plupart des pays africains restent pauvres ?
Pourquoi le Français est-il mal aimé des autres pays ?
Pourquoi les Algériens sont-ils aussi fiers de leur pays ?
Pourquoi la Guinée Conakry s'appelle-t-elle ainsi ?
Pourquoi les pays africains sont-ils sous-développés ?
Pourquoi la Rhodésie a-t-elle été renommée Zimbabwe ?

Pourquoi autant de pays se nomment-ils Guinée ?

Dimitri Ken Féru d'histoire 24 janv.

Pour commencer, faisons l'inventaire de tous les pays qui se nomment Guinée :

Guinée-Bissau

Guinée Équatoriale

Guinée (encore appelée Guinée Conakry)

Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée

Ça en fait 4. Mais alors, pourquoi autant de Guinées ?

Le mot « Guinée » vient probablement d'un ancien mot berbère, qui signifie « peau sombre ». Ce terme était utilisé pour nommer une large portion de l'Afrique.

Source en fin de réponse.

Lorsque des siècles plus tard, les puissances européennes ont commencé à coloniser

l'Afrique, plusieurs d'entre elles ont ainsi adopté indépendamment le nom Guinée. Il y a eu :

La Guinée portugaise ;
La Guinée suédoise/danoise/néerlandaise, qui est plus tard devenue la Gold Coast (actuel Ghana) ;
La Guinée française ;
La Guinée espagnole.

Lors de la décolonisation, la Guinée française a obtenu son indépendance la première, et s'est donc appelée tout simplement Guinée.

20 ans plus tard, la Guinée portugaise a obtenu son indépendance et est devenue la Guinée-Bissau.

En gagnant son indépendance, la Guinée espagnole est devenue Guinée équatoriale, à cause de sa localisation par rapport à l'Équateu

Parlons maintenant de l'autre Guinée, celle qui n'est pas africaine. L'île, initialement appelée Papouasie, a été renommée Nouvelle Guinée par les explorateurs espagnols. La raison ? Il n'y avait selon eux aucune différence de phénotype entre Papouasiens et Ouest-Africains…

4 siècles plus tard, lorsque le territoire a gagné son indépendance, ils ont décidé de combiner l'ancienne dénomination (Papouasie) avec la contemporaine (Nouvelle Guinée). Ainsi naquit la Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée.

Source : History Matters (2022), Why are so many countries called Guinea? (Short Animated Documentary), lien.

Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée

Ça en fait 4. Mais alors, pourquoi autant de Guinées ?

Le mot « Guinée » vient probablement d'un ancien mot berbère, qui signifie « peau sombre ». Ce terme était utilisé pour nommer une large portion de l'Afrique.

Source en fin de réponse.

Lorsque des siècles plus tard, les puissances européennes ont commencé à coloniser l'Afrique, plusieurs d'entre elles ont ainsi adopté indépendamment le nom Guinée. Il y a eu :

La Guinée portugaise ;
La Guinée suédoise/danoise/néerlandaise, qui est plus tard devenue la Gold Coast (actuel Ghana) ;
La Guinée française ;
La Guinée espagnole.

Lors de la décolonisation, la Guinée française a obtenu son indépendance la première, et s'est donc appelée tout simplement Guinée.

20 ans plus tard, la Guinée portugaise a obtenu son indépendance et est devenue la Guinée-Bissau.

En gagnant son indépendance, la Guinée espagnole est devenue Guinée équatoriale, à cause de sa localisation par rapport à l'Équateur.

Parlons maintenant de l'autre Guinée, celle qui n'est pas africaine. L'île, initialement appelée Papouasie, a été renommée Nouvelle Guinée par les explorateurs espagnols. La raison ? Il n'y avait selon eux aucune différence de phénotype entre Papouasiens et Ouest-Africains…

© Pascale Sury

4 siècles plus tard, lorsque le territoire a gagné son indépendance, ils ont décidé de combiner l'ancienne dénomination (Papouasie) avec la contemporaine (Nouvelle Guinée). Ainsi naquit la Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guiné

Source : History Matters (2022), Why are so many countries called Guinea? (Short Animated Documentary), lien.

Response similaires
Pourquoi autant de pays se nomment-ils Guinée ?

Dimitri Ken Féru d'histoire 24 janv.

Pour commencer, faisons l'inventaire de tous les pays qui se nomment Guinée :

Guinée-Bissau

Guinée Équatoriale

Guinée (encore appelée Guinée Conakry)

Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinée

Ça en fait 4. Mais alors, pourquoi autant de Guinées ?

Le mot « Guinée » vient probablement d'un ancien mot berbère, qui signifie « peau sombre ». Ce terme était utilisé pour nommer une large portion de l'Afrique.

Source en fin de réponse.
Lorsque des siècles plus tard, les puissances européennes ont commencé à coloniser l'Afrique, plusieurs d'entre elles ont ainsi adopté indépendamment le nom Guinée. Il y a eu :

- La Guinée portugaise ;
- La Guinée suédoise/danoise/néerlandaise, qui est plus tard devenue la Gold Coast (actuel Ghana) ;
- La Guinée française ;
- La Guinée espagnole.

Lors de la décolonisation, la Guinée française a obtenu son indépendance la première, et s'est donc appelée tout simplement Guinée.

20 ans plus tard, la Guinée portugaise a obtenu son indépendance et est devenue la Guinée-Bissau.

En gagnant son indépendance, la Guinée espagnole est devenue Guinée équatoriale, à cause de sa localisation par rapport à l'Équateur.

Parlons maintenant de l'autre Guinée, celle qui n'est pas africaine. L'île, initialement appelée Papouasie, a été renommée Nouvelle Guinée par les explorateurs espagnols. La raison ? Il n'y avait selon eux aucune différence de phénotype entre Papouasiens et Ouest-Africains…

© Pascale Sury

4 siècles plus tard, lorsque le territoire a gagné son indépendance, ils ont décidé de combiner l'ancienne dénomination (Papouasie) avec la contemporaine (Nouvelle Guinée). Ainsi naquit la Papouasie-Nouvelle-Guinee

Source : History Matters (2022), Why are so many countries called Guinea? (Short Animated Documentary), lien.

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

On the Atlantic coast of West Africa.

Official title of the state

The Republic of Guinea-Bissau.
Flag description: two equal horizontal bands of yellow (top) and green with a vertical red band on the hoist side; there is a black five-pointed star centered in the red band; yellow symbolizes the sun; green denotes hope; red represents blood shed during the struggle for independence; the black star stands for African unity. Note: uses the popular Pan-African colors of Ethiopia; the flag design was heavily influenced by the Ghanaian flag.

Neighbours

Senegal on N. Guinea on E. and S. Land boundaries; total 724 km. Border countries; Guinea 386 km, Senegal 338 km.

Founder of The Nation
Luis De Almeida Cabral (younger brother of the assassinated Amilcar Cabral became the leader of the party (PAIGC) and the Government.

Local division

9 regions /regioes/

Government type

Republic - semi-presidential

Legislation chamber

Unicameral - People's National Assembly

Form of State

Republic (ushered with Supreme Military Ruling Council) President is

Chief of State Prime Minister is Head of Government

President elected by popular vote for a five-year term (no term limits) Prime Minister appointed by the President after consultation with party leaders in the legislature. A republic with one legislative house. The People's National Assembly 102 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for four-year terms.

Executive branch (Ushered with Supreme Military Ruling Council)

Separated by chief of State and head of Government. President elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms without presidential term limits. Head of Government to be appointed by the president.

Former Rulers

1974 – 1980: Luís Severino de Almeida Cabral

1980 – 1999: João Bernardo "Nino" Vieira

May 14, 1984 - May 16, 1984: Carmen Pereira-acting presdent

May 7, 1999 – May 14, 1999 : Ansumane Mané

1999 – 2000: Malam Bacai Sanhá

2000 – 2003: Kumba Ialá (Kumba Yallá)

2003 – 2003: Veríssimo Correia Seabra

2003 - 2005: Henrique Pereira Rosa

2005 – 2009: João Bernardo Vieira

March 3, 2009 - Sept. 8, 2009: Raimundo Perreira (Interim)

September 8, 2009 – Present: Malam Bacai Sanhá

Judicial chamber

Supreme Court

Capital city Bissau Altitude 23 mtrs Geographic coordinates - 11.51N , 15.35W.

It's located on the Geba river estuary, off the Atlantic. Founded as a village in 1687, to become the capital in 1942.

Names of main towns

Bafala, Gabu, Mansoa, Caccine, Corubal, Cacheu.

Date of independence

24th September, 1973 independence formally declared / 10th September,1974 officially gained.

Religions (Major)

Muslim 50%, Traditional beliefs 40%, Christian 10%.

Main spoken languages

Portuguese (official), Crioulo (cognate of Spanish Criollo and of English Creole), Balante widely spoken.

Currency unit

Franc CFA=100 Centavos.

Area in Km2

36,125.00

Country area comparison in Africa

43 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms ;-

Average annual population growth rate 2.004 %
Birth rate 35.56 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 15.52 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 48.3 years

Male 46.44 years ; Female 50.22 years;

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 39, Female: 63

Average per capita income

USD 1, 100

Population density

48.3/km2

Urban population (%)

30

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishery: 54

Industry: 15

Social service: 31

Main Export items

Ground nuts, palm product, cashew-nuts, palm kernels, sawn timber.

Economy is based on Agriculture & fishery.

Climate

Tropical; Hot, dry dusty: generally hot and humid; monsoonal-type rainy season (June to November) with southwesterly winds; dry season (December to May) with northeasterly winds. Natural hazard: dusty wind “harmattan haze” that may reduce visibility during the dry season.

Extremes;-

Lowest point; The Atlantic coast 0 mtr.

Highest point; Mont Nimba 1,752 m

Weather of the Capital city (Bissau) average annual temperature 26.90c.

Altitude At sea level.

Hottest Month April 34-45oc.
Coldest Month January 19-23oc.

Driest Month 34-45oc.

Wettest Month 18-30oc.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

GMT/UTC + 0

Public holidays

September 24, (Independence day), January 20 (Amilcar Cabral day), November 14 (Liberation day).

Ethnic groups

African tribes, Ballante 40%, Fula 20%, Manjaca 14%, Mandinga 13%, Papel 8 %, others Mulattoes /mixed/, Europeans 5%.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Terrain: generally flat coastal plain, hilly to mountainous interior.

A swampy coastal plain also covers most of the country to the east is a low savannah region. Environment—current issues: deforestation; inadequate supplies of potable water; desertification; soil contamination and erosion; overfishing, overgrazing , and overpopulation in forest region

Economy Overview

Industry

Agro-processing, breweries, soft-drinks.

Tourism

Cacheu: former slave-trading center, Bijagos Islands, Saltinho Waterfall. Guinea-Bissau's biggest annual festival is the Latin-style Bissau carnival in February. The red river hogs, which consume dead animals and act like scavengers, can be found as sightseeing in Guinea-Bissau.

Chief crops

Peanuts, cotton, rice, corn, cassava, cashaw nuts, palm kernels, timber, fish.

Natural resources: Bauxite, Iron ore Diamonds, Gold, Uranium, Fish, Timber, Phosphates, Clay, Granite, Limestone, Hydro-power, unexploited deposits of petroleum.
Land in use (%)

Arable land: 11

Grassland: 38

Forest woods: 38

Other: 13

Marine:

Coastline; 350 km.

Commercial Sea port:-

Bissau, Bolama

Development prospect;-

The health of the cashew harvest is the major determinant of the country's economic growth. The trade ministry said in August that the crop should produce about 170,000tn for export, compared to about 140,000tn in 2010. Weak rains elsewhere hurt production of staples such as corn, millet and rice.

Political stability is also enabling other large projects to start, including the port at Buba and a bauxite mine at Boé. Angolan company Bauxite Angola is backing the two projects, estimated to cost more than $500m and to include road, dam and rail construction. As analysts, reducing the size of the powerful military and the civil service will give the government the funds to invest in much-needed infrastructure

The Paris Club and Guinea-Bissau's other creditors have sought to ease public financial stress. The country reached the completion point of the Heavily Indebted Poor Country debt-relief initiative in December 2010, and in May 2011 the Paris Club of commercial creditors wrote off $256m of the country's debt. The government has started paying part of its large internal debt, boosting the prospects of local suppliers and construction companies.

By raising more through taxing cashew exports and other measures, government revenue will cover recurrent costs for the coming year, according to the IMF. That will enable the government to use donor budget support for development projects and new infrastructure. In May, the World Bank agreed to provide the government with $2.2m towards the purchase a 5MW thermal generator for the capital city, which currently produces just 4MW for demand of about 30MW. More urgent improvements are needed elsewhere in the roads, water and electricity sectors, which are receiving donor support.

IVORY COAST

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, briefly analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

The Europeans came to the area to trade in Ivory and Slaves and estimated that local kingdoms were gave way to French inluence in the late eighteenth century. Côte d'Ivoire is the present name of formerly Ivory Coast, it was part of French colonial West Africa. It was a major area of agricultural development under French rule, attracting immigrant workers from throughout the French African Empire. It gained independence from France in 1960, retaining close ties with the former colonial power through a number of bilateral agreements including membership of the Franc Zone, a defence pact, and provision for a French military base in the country. Félix Houphouët-Boigny became the first President and ruled for 33 years until his death in 1993. His party, the PDCI, was the sole legal party until 1990 when multipartyism was introduced. During his time in office, Côte d'Ivoire was renowned as the most prosperous and most stable country in the West African region. It also hosted the largest French community in Francophone Africa. But his rule was shaken by economic recession in the 1980s, when prices of the main exports, cocoa and coffee, plunged. The first multi-party elections since independence were held in 1990, which Houphouët-Boigny easily won against veteran opposition leader Laurent Gbagbo. At his death in 1993, he was succeeded by Henri Konan Bédié, the speaker of the National Assembly. The careful ethnic and regional balance which Houphouët-Boigny had nurtured, together with his welcoming of immigrant workers, was soon compromised by the concept of 'Ivoirité' (Ivorian nationalism), which quickly acquired xenophobic connotations. This began a sequence of events which was to deprive the country of its long record of stability and prosperity. Cote D' Ivoire's rapid decline following a long period of ethnic and religious harmony has been one of the continent's more tragic tales. Under Felix Houphouet-Boigny, the nation was a model of tranquility, which anchored the country's rapid economic growth for three decades after independence.

Achieved it's independence on 7th August, 1960, from France.

Headship since independence; Head of State

From 1960 to 1993, the country was led by Mr. Felix Houphouet-Boigny founder president, and the leader of the ruling Parti Démocratique de Côte d'Ivoire (PDCI).

Mr. Felix Houphouet-Boigny, nicknamed "Le Vieux", was the founder president of Cote D'Ivoire and the leader of the Parti Démocratique de Côte d'Ivoire (PDCI), Ivory Coast's single party. Originally a village chief, he worked as a doctor, an administrator of a plantation, and a trade union leader, before being elected to the French Parliament and serving in a number of ministerial positions in the French government. From the 1940s until his death, he played a leading role in the decolonization of Africa and in his country's politics.

Under President Houphouët-Boigny's politically moderate leadership, Côte D'Ivoire prospered economically. Maintained close political and economic association with its West African neighbours, while at the same time maintaining close ties to the West, especially to France.

Côte D'Ivoire is a republic with a strong executive power invested in the President

Yamoussoukro became its de-jure capital, Abidjan remains the commercial city and a main port.

Since the end of Houphouët-Boigny's rule, Côte d'Ivoire has experienced one coup d'état, in 1999, and a Civil war, which broke out in 2002.

A political agreement between the government and the rebels brought a return to peace.

Côte d'Ivoire is a republic with a strong executive power invested in the President. Its de-jure capital is Yamoussoukro and the biggest city is the port city of Abidjan.

Its de-jure capital is Yamoussoukro and the biggest city (commercial) is the port city of Abidjan.

Foreign Policy Issues under President Houphouet-Boigny; Cote d'Ivoire plays a central role in mediating regional conflicts Côte d'Ivoire continues to maintain close relations with France.

Since the end of Houphouët-Boigny's rule, Côte D'Ivoire has experienced one coup d'état, in 1999, and a civil war, which broke out in 2002.

At later, a political agreement between the government and the rebels brought a return to peace.

A Republic in west Africa on the gulf of Guinea.

Cote D' Ivoire, is a French name for a country formerly known as "Ivory Coast" which means for "A Land of Ivories", the present name for a country mostly known as Ivory Coast previously, as it's meaning almost the same. Believed Chimpanzees in Cote d'Ivoire have been using stone tools to crack open nuts for more than 100 years. The Europeans came to the area to trade in Ivory and Slaves and estimated that local kingdoms were gave way to French inluence in the late eighteenth century. Côte d'Ivoire became independent on 7 August 1960. From 1960 to 1993, the country was led by Felix Houphouet-Boigny. It maintained close political and economic association with its West African neighbours, while at the same time maintaining close ties to the West, especially to France.
Mr. Houphouët-Boigny was commonly known as the "Sage of Africa" or the "Grand Old Man of Africa". Mr. Houphouët-Boigny moved the country's capital from Abidjan to his hometown of Yamoussoukro and built the world's largest church there, the "Basilica of Our Lady of Peace of Peace of Yamoussoukro", at a cost of US$300 million. At the time of his death on 7th December 1993 he was the longest-serving leader in Africa's history and the third longest-serving leader in the world. In order to make the transfer of power appear constitutional, in accordance with the Article 11 of the Cote D' Ivoire constitution, which empowered the president of the national assembly to complete the term of the republic's president, if the president died or was incapacitated while in office, in this regard, President Houphouet-Boigny was succeeded by the house speaker Mr. Henri Konan Bedie, on the 7th December, 1993.

The Army led by General Robert Guei overthrew the Interim president on the 25th of December, 1999, a coup the first ever in Cote D' Ivoire history. The coup leader General Robert Guei, blatantly rigged, election held in late 2000 that announced he won it, but a public uprising and foreign pressure forced him to step aside and brought Mr. Laurant Gbagbo, who spent all the 1980s in exile in France, has served as history lecturer until recently in Paris University onto power, the military once agan launched a failed-coup attempt that brought the assassination of General Robert Guei, on the 17th of September, 2002, as a result of internal contradictions within the political system that Cote D' Ivoire had been operating for the past fourty years, it began to fracture politically into North & South, a civil war insued, an armed rebellion split the world's largest Cocoa producer country b/n the North, held by the rebel Forces Nouvelles (FAFN), which supported former premier Alassane Ouattara, who's accused of a foreigner born that together with the Burkinabe president Blaise Compaore, he was responsible for the 2002 rebellion, and the government controlled the South part in the hands of the Gbagbo led government split the country in half in 2002 and polls are seen as a vital step to end the political crises, until a power-sharing agreement was signed between rivals in 2007, to hold free elections on March, 2010 which that extended again for October, 2010. Since then, Cote D' Ivoire has had two governments, administrations, armies, and "national" leaders.

Internal Conflict

Civil War

When: 1999 – 2007

Who: North vs South

Why: Rebels from the north were against the southern dominated government and the high number of foreigners in Cote d'Ivoire added to tensions. The rebel Forces Nouvelle (FAFN) under Mr. Guillaume Soro has joined the Unity government under the incumbent president Laurant Gbagbo in 2007, but the peace process has been dogged by delays. Elections have been postponed in Cote D' Ivoire at least six times in the last five years since the president's mandate expired. Mr. Laurent Gbagbo has been in power since 2000 and had already overstayed his mandate by five years when the long delayed presidential election was finally held in November, 2010.

Politics

In March 2007 Gbagbo and former New Force rebel leader Guillaume Soro signed onto the Ouagadougou Political Agreement, which saw Mr Soro joining the Gbagbo government as Prime Minister. The two leaders sought to reunite the country by dismantling the zone of confidence that separated the North from the South, and also agreed to integrate rebel forces into the country’s armed forces and to hold elections. Polls are yet to be held. Issues that led to the civil war are yet to be resolved and French and UN peacekeepers, known as the Impartial Forces, patrol the buffer zone. The UN Security Council has extended an arms and diamond embargo imposed in 2004 on the country for another year until October 31, 2010. The UN has imposed travel restrictions targeting Ivorian political figures and a freeze on their foreign assets. The vote was intended to help reunify the country, which was divided by the 2002 to 2003 civil war into a rebel controlled North and a loyalist South. For such reason, and of strategic importance, it was inevitable that this electoral contest would decide the long-term future of the country. In protracted negotiations from 2002, the Ivorians agreed that the presidential elections would not be held until various conditions had been met. These included the reunification of the country, the restoration of the national administration to all parts of the Ivorian territory, and the disarmament of the rebels and all militia and their integration in the national security machinery, with latter process completed at least two months ahead of any presidential elections, but despite the fact that none of this was honoured, the presidential elections were allowed to proceed, and the date for long-delayed presidential elections in Cote D' Ivoire set for 31 October, 2010. The first round was held on 31 October, 2010 but it produced no clear winner, having been repeatedly postponed since 2005 owing to issues arising from the country's civil war, the run-off vote is expected to herald a new era of peace in the country, which has been in a tense state for nearly twenty years. Then the Ivorians have voted again in a second round of the presidential election in Cote D' Ivoire on the 28th of November, 2010, to decide b/n pitted two long-standing polilical opponents against each other, the incumbent president Laurent Gbagbo and the former premier Alassane Dramane Ouattara. The Ivorian Constitutional Council (CC), is the only body constitutionally empowered to determine the winner in any presidential election and to install the president, with Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) mandated to forward it's provisional poll results to the Constitutional Council (CC). The Constitutional Council overturned earlier poll results and declared that the incumbent president Laurent Gbagbo a winner after a run-off, that the main opposition candidate Mr. Alassane Ouatara declared a winner by the Independent Electoral Commission. The election in Cote D' Ivoire condemned by the UN, and the continental organ, the African Union, which suspended the country temporarily from membership until the incumbent president, who is believed to have lost the election, handed power to the winner, Mr. Alassane Ouattara. But then the Ivorian electoral structure itself looks absurd, on the one there is the IEC and on the other the CC. The former declared the opposition candidate Mr. Alassane Ouattara winner only to be overruled by the latter which declared the incumbent Mr. Laurent Gbagbo the winner.

If the CC had the authority to overrule the IEC why was the IEC allowed to declare the results without consulting the council in the first place? And if the IEC has the mandate to declare the winner, why would the so-called CC interfered ? Not known well if this issue has been addressed by the African Union or the UN before they took sides on the result. The November elections were supposed to open a more positive chapter in Cote D' Ivoire's history eight years after civil war splits the west African nation into the mainly Muslim-north, which backs Alassane Ouattara, and the Christian-south, where Mr. Gbagbo holds sway. In December, 2010, President Laurent Gbagbo refuses to step-down as president after he was decisively defeated in the presidential election as the IEC announced his opponent Alassane Drammane Ouattara has won the election by a nine-point margin. Instead, the election has renewed divisions that threaten to plunge the country back into civil war, while Cote D' Ivoire was officially reunited in a 2007 peace deal, the main opposition candidate Alassane Ouattara still draws his support from the northern half of the country, where residents feel they are often treated as foreigners within their own country by the southerners, these are that Alassane Ouattara is accused by the government as foreigner born in Burkinafaso, that together with Burkinabe president Blaise Compaore, he was responsible for the 2002 rebellion; that his accession to power would result in the takeover of the country especially by Burkinabe foreigners; and that historically, to date, he has been ready to advance French interests in Cote D'Ivoire. The United Nation security council had also called on president Laurent Gbagbo to honour the voice of the Ivorian people, as expressed in the 28th of November, 2010 presidential run-off election. And the US, taking stronger line than usual, had warned Laurent Gbagbo that he had very little time in which to avoid stronger sanctions against him and his followers. The problem arose when Cote D' Ivoire, which fought a civil war that tore it apart between 2002 and 2004, was ushered into a renewed tension by Gbagbo's actions after he had lost the elections, he refused to yield power to the opposition ctandidate Alassane Ouattara who had clearly won it. The election was the second round of contest whose first round had produced figures that should have told Laurent Gbagbo he would not be reelected:- Gbagbo got 38% to Ouattara's 32%, with former president Henri Konan Bedie taking 25%.

It was obvious that whoever obtained Konan Bedie's support would be the winner of the second round. Alassane Ouattara secured Konan Bedie's blessing, and indeed won over 54% of the vote, to the 45 obtained by Laurent Gbagbo, in the run-off. But just as the election results were being announced, the government prevented the Independent Electoral Commissio (IEC) from announcing the results on the national TV and the Radio. In one instance, an IEC official was physically prevented from making announcement, as the papers containing the results were taken from his hands and torn to pieces. The IEC thus missed it's deadline, but found a hotel room, without national TV or Radio present, where it made it's announcement, after having insisted by the government to hand-over the results to the so called Constitutional Council, whose majority of members were the president's men, and that the "Constitutional Council" would deliver the final results. Yet seizing on this legal nicety, the so called Constitutional Council has declared the result in favor of Laurent Gbagbo. The IEC figures had been certified by the UN observer team and witnessed by the European Union, the two organizations that had borne the brunt of the election expenses, as donors, counted for nothing with Laurent Gbagbo. So he was sworn in as president, cling to power by appointing an unrecognized government, but Alassane Ouattara also had himself has sworn in as president, as widely recognized new president of Cote D' Ivoire, waits for his mandate. The 15-member Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) has warned Laurent Gbagbo, it could use force to oust him if he does not step down, a threat the President has brushed off. In the spirit of brotherliness in Africa, three presidents have been nominated by their colleagues to confront Mr. Laurent Gbagbo in Abidjan to encourage him to leave office and end the impasse over the disputed elections without any delays. And the three presidents can fly back with Mr. Laurent Gbagbo as all the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) including non-members Angola, South Africa, Malawi, Nigeria and the United States are prepared to offer him asylum, but he turned-down all of them. This internal crises will, of course prevent Cote D' Ivoire from obtaining the investment needed in the coming years to bring it's Cocoa and Coffee production to world markets as well as it's industries, back to the buoyant economic success they enjoyed in the days when the late president Houphouet-Boigny was in charge of office. Cote D' Ivoire threatens to slide back toward civil war since Laurent Gbagbo refused to accept that he lost the November election.

The International community and Cote D' Ivoire's Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) says Allassane Ouattara won the November presidential election, but Laurent Gbagbo has refused to give-up power after a decade-long in office, up to 1 million people have fled the fighting caused by political chaos and over 500 people have been killed since the election. Fighters supporting the internationally recognised leader seized control of the country's administrative capital Yamoussoukro on the 29th, March 2011, but many believe a final bloody battle over the presidency is now destined for the commercial capital of Abidjan, only 143 miles (about 230 km) away. The rebels "Republican Forces" advanced on three fronts; in the west, center, and east of the country. The west and central columns have converged on Yamoussoukro and may join the eastern front, which is heading directly for Abidjan. Along Cote D' Ivoire's eastern border with Ghana, the rebels "Republican Forces" secured Bondoukou and Abengourou and got as far as Akuoupe, which is only 70 miles (about 113 km) from seat of the government, Abidjan. Allassane Ouattara, who is from the northern part, had long tried to distance himself from the rebels "Republican Forces" based there who fought in a brief civil war almost a decade ago that left the country split in two. However, the rebels have been stepping-up their offensive to install him on power in recent weeks. A draft-UN resolution, demands "an immediate end to the violence against civilians and urges all the Ivorian parties and stakeholders to respect the will of the Ivorians and the election of Alassane Dramane Ouattara as President". The battle for Cote D' Ivoire's presidency neared a decisive phase as the opposition "Republican Forces" reached the out-skirts of Abidjan, the country's commercial center, as the Ivorian Army chief of staff, General Phillipe Mangou, sought refuge for himself, his wife, and five children in the home of the South African Ambassador in Abidjan, his flight appeared to deal a significant blow to Mr. Laurent Gbagbo, whose forces have crumbled from east to west in the west African nation. a string of cities, including the strategic Cocoa-exporting port city of San-Pedro, have already fallen to forces loyal to Mr. Laurent Gbagbo's rival, Mr. Alassane Ouattara, as they have swooped south toward Abidjan, the crucial stake in what has now become an open war for presidency in Francophone Africa's former economic power. The rebels, "Republican Forces" had begun besieging Abidjan from the outside as supporters within the city attacked a prison and freed it's inmates. The city of Abidjan divided neighborhood by neighborhood between the supporters of the two loyalists. Meanwhile, Mr. Alassane Ouattara's prime minister, and leader of the rebel "Republican Forces", Guillame Soro, delivered an ultimatum to Mr. Laurent Gbagbo, saying he had only "several hours" to give-up power. After winnng control of most of the country within a week, the rebel "Republican Forces" who are seeking to oust Laurent Gbagbo in favor of president-elect Alassane Ouattara on 30th March, 2011 entered Abidjan and attacked the presidential palace, army camps and the state-run TV headquarters. If Laurent Gbagbo prevails, he would be the third African leader to refuse to accept election results, following the leaders of Zimbabwe and Kenya. Mr. Laurent Gbagbo "is exploring different options for turning himself, he has been intouch with different leaders involved in this crises", said an Ouattara spokesman. He has absolutely not resigned and is currently being scandalously held against his will, some said. It's to be recalled that, following four months of attempts to negotiate Laurent Gbagbo's departure, the UN-security council unanimously passed an especially strong resolution giving the 12,000-strong peace-keeping operation the right "to use all necessary means to carry out it's mandate to protect civilians under imminent threat of physical violence-including to prevent the use of heavy weapons against the civilian population. Laurent Gbagbo, the former history professor in the University of Paris, who won 46% of the vote, held power for a decade and already had overstayed his mandate by five years when the November election took place. Mr. Alassane Drammane Ouattara, the president-elect has tried to rule from a lagoonside hotel. In a latest development, the elected president used the Republican Forces troops, French tanks and airpower to oust strongman Laurent Gbagbo, ending their four-month standoff on Monday the 11th of April, 2011 by storming the bunker where he hung on to power by pulling him from his burning Abidjan residence, arresting the man whose refusal to handover the presidency, to the election winner left hundreds dead and threatened to re-ignite a civil war in the west African nation. Mr. Laurent Gbagbo looked pathetic as his captors surrounded him and barked-out orders, he looked so helpless, defenseless, friendless and hopeless, his forlom eyes told the whole story, the man who had thumbed up his nose at the world for the past five months while his country was burned visibly hyperventilating and drenched in sweat. He could hardly put on his shirt, it was a totally humiliating experience for Laurent Gbagbo, it was devastating, depressing and dispiriting to any African who values self-dignity. There is substantial evidence to show that as a direct result of Laurent Gbagbo's refusal to concede the November, 2010 presidential election, thousands of people lost their lives in officially sanctioned extra-judicial killings. Many Ivorians have died and in excess of one million Ivorians have been forced to leave the country to avoid the internal violence, much infrastructure has been destroyed, and historic animosities have been exacerbated in the lead-up to this outcome. The United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, took the extra-ordinary step of notifying Laurent Gbagbo and his henchmen that they will be held personally responsible and accountable for human rights violations in connection with the discovery of two mass-graves. But there is also substantial evidence of extra-judicial or arbitrary executions, sexual violence, enforced or involuntary disappearances, arbitrary detentions and tortures against Gbagbo and his regime, back-dating one decade. The end game for Laurent Gbagbo is to face justice for his crimes in an Ivorian-court, a special court for Cote d' Ivoire or before the International Criminal Court (ICC), in The Hague, the Netherlands. The president-elect has been receiving pledges of allegiance from senior military officers and the heads of main institutions at Abidjan Golf-Hotel, where he has been based since the post-election crises began. He says "Laurent Gbagbo will be brought to justice and a truth and reconciliation-style process instituted to address the causes and effects of the decade-long political crises in the country". The ICC prosecutor-General Luis Moreno Ocampo said, he would like Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), the sub-regional economic bloc to request an ICC investigations into the massive human rights violations in Cote D' Ivoire, a preliminary step to Laurent Gbagbo's prosecution. All suspects, including the president designate's supporters "Republican New Forces", the often ill-diciplined force is also accused of looting and perceived as a threat by some civilians, allegedly involved in human rights violations, must be investigated and brought to justice. There are also compelling evidences that forces loyal to Alassane Ouattara have been involved in gross human rights violations, including extra-judicial killings, rapes and burning of villages. The 5, 000 combatants of the "Republican Forces" would be integrated in to the national army. Mr. Alassane Dramane Ouattara has been sworn-in as Cote D' Ivoire (Ivory Coast) president, as predecessor Laurent Gbagbo is reportedly questined for the first time over rights abuse. Mr. Alassane Dramane Ouattara took his oath of office at the presidential palace in Abidjan on the 6th May, 2011. Swearing-in is to be followed by a ceremony attended by heads of states planned for 21st May, 2011 in the official capital, Yamoussoukro, after months of violence and political turmoil. In the meantime, the Netherland based International Criminal Court (ICC) prosecutor is to open an investigation into Ivoary coast's post-election violence that left over 3,000 dead.

Sidenote: Ivory Coast violence: Laurent Gbagbo allies attacked Abidjan' Fighters loyal to ex-Ivory Coast President Laurent Gbagbo carried out recent attacks in Abidjan, killing 11 soldiers, a minister has said. Hamed Bakayoko told Radio France International (RFI) he believed the attackers received their orders from Gbagbo loyalists in neighbouring Ghana. One assailant was also killed in the gun battle on Monday in the Riviera district of Abidjan, the main city. Ivory Coast is recovering from months of unrest after a disputed poll. The attacks on Sunday and Monday were said to be the biggest in Abidjan since Mr Gbagbo was ousted in April 2011. "They [the attackers] were people who come from the myriad pro-Gbagbo militiamen and former armed forces nostalgic of the Gbagbo regime," Mr Bakayoko told RFI. He believed that "everything was ordered" by pro-Gbagbo militiamen who fled to Ghana after they were ousted from power in Abidjan, RFI reports. Mr Bakayoko told state TV the army would step up its presence across the country. "The orders have been given, our instructions are firm," he said. "From today, you'll be able to note this by the presence of our men in all the districts of Abidjan as well as towns in the interior." The BBC's John James in Abidjan says there was a gory scene at the Akouedo military camp, with bodies lying on the ground and blood spattered over the walls after Monday's attack. Corp Ousmane Kone, who took part in the fighting, told Reuters news agency that the attackers had made off with guns. "They took lots of weapons, loaded them in a truck and drove off with them. They took AK-47s [automatic rifles], machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades," he said. The head of the national assembly, Guillaume Soro, said the situation was under control. "The attackers just want to give the impression that the security situation in Ivory Coast is precarious," he added. The army is patrolling the areas east of Abidjan looking for the attackers. UN peacekeepers have been posted at key junctions. Defence Minister Paul Koffi Koffi had told AFP the Yopougon attack was an apparent bid to free people who had been arrested the previous day. Yopougon district suffered some of the heaviest fighting during the battle for control of Abidjan last year following the disputed elections. Although Abidjan has been relatively peaceful recently, there have been outbreaks of unrest, especially in the west of the country, which correspondents say remains awash with guns. Some 3,000 people were killed in a dispute after the November 2010 poll. Mr Gbagbo refused to accept defeat to President Alassane Ouattara, who eventually ousted his rival with the help of former rebel forces, the UN and former colonial power France. Mr Gbagbo is currently in The Hague, awaiting trial at the International Criminal Court on charges of crimes against humanity.

End note: Former Côte d'Ivoire minister now faces murder charges' A former ally of Ivory Coast President Laurent Gbagbo who was arrested in late September, 2012 by Interpol in Accra Ghana is now facing facing murder charges. Justin Katinan was charged with conspirancy to murder and two counts of murder when he appeared before an Accra magistrate on. The former Minister in charge of Budget and Gbagbo's spokesman was granted $25 641 bail by the Osu magistrate's court last week after the court considered that he was an asylum seeker among many other factors. But he was dragged back to court on Monday accused of conspiring with one Dalo Desire in Cote d'Ivoire to murder two men in the capital Abidjan. The first alleged murder of a 33 year-old welder, Kamagate Seyobou, took place on March 19, 2011 while Diabate Drissa, 37, a trader, was allegedly killed on March 29, 2011, at Port Bouet, a neighborhood in Abidjan. Katinan was not asked to plead to the charges was remanded in custody October 16. The prosecutor, DSP Abraham Annor asked the court to remand him in custody to enable Interpol to carry out further investigations into the matter. He said they had been informed that Katinan's accomplice, who is also an ex-minister in Cote d'Ivoire, had been arrested in that country. Opposing to the prosecution's submission, Katinan's lawyer, Patrick Sogbodzor said his client was was taken to court where an extradition process was supposed to start and it was not proper for Interpol to amend the charges. He said Katinan had lived in Accra since April 13, 2011 as an asylum seeker and there was need to to protect his rights under Ghana's laws. On September 29, Ivorian authorities issued a warrant of arrest against Katinan and asked Ghana to arrest him. He was first charged with leading a gang that robbed some banks and financial institutions in Ivory Coast. The murder charges come hard on the heels of a diplomatic spat between the two neighbours following claims that an incursion on Côte d'Ivoire was being launched from Ghana. Last month, Côte d'Ivoire closed its land, air and sea borders with Ghana after several attacks on security installations - including police stations and Gendarmerie barracks in Abidjan and the Ivorian side of the Ghana-Côte d'Ivoire border – were reportedly launched by armed assailants. Following talks between the leaders of Côte d'Ivoire and Ghana, Alassane Ouatarra and John Mahama, respectively, the borders were re-opened. But they were closed again after a unilateral decision by the Ivorian authorities.

Accession to power of ex-president Laurent Gbagbo - 26th October, 2000 elected by nomination.

Tentative election calendar- Presidential/Parliamentary, October/ November

Ivory Coast (Cote D' Ivoire) – Timeline Diaries updates and related Key notes:

1842 - France imposes protectorate over coastal zone.

1893 - Ivory Coast made into a colony.

1904 - Ivory Coast becomes part of the French Federation of West Africa.

Leader Felix Houphouet-Boigny

Died as continent's longest serving leader

Worked as doctor, union leader and politician

President from 1960-93

Played leading role in African decolonisation

1944 - Felix Houphouet-Boigny, later to become Ivory Coast's first president, founds a union of African farmers, which develops into the inter-territorial African Democratic Rally and its Ivorian section, the Ivory Coast Democratic Party.

1958 - Ivory Coast becomes a republic within the French Community.

1960 - France grants independence under President Felix Houphouet-Boigny. He holds power until he dies in 1993.

1990 - Opposition parties legalised; Houphouet-Boigny nicknamed ‘Grandman of Africa’ wins Ivory Coast's first multiparty presidential election, beating Laurent Gbagbo of the Ivorian Popular Front (FPI).

1993 - Henri Konan Bedie becomes president following the death of Houphouet-Boigny.

October 1995 - Bedie re-elected in a ballot that is boycotted by opposition parties in protest at restrictions imposed on their candidates.

July 1999 - Alassane Ouattara, a Muslim, leaves job at International Monetary Fund and returns to run for president in 2000; his plan to challenge Bedie splits country along ethnic and religious lines. Opponents say he is national of Burkina Faso, not Ivory Coast.

1999 - Bedie overthrown in military coup led by Robert Guei. Bedie flees to France.

October 2000 - Guei proclaims himself president after announcing he has won presidential elections, but is forced to flee in the wake of a popular uprising against his perceived rigging of the poll.

October 2000 - Laurent Gbagbo, believed to be the real winner in the presidential election, is proclaimed president. Opposition leader Alassane Ouattara, excluded from running in the poll, calls for a fresh election.

October 2000 - Fighting erupts between Gbagbo's mainly southern Christian supporters and followers of Ouattara, who are mostly Muslims from the north.

December 2000 - President Gbagbo's Ivorian Popular Front (FPI) emerges as the biggest single party in parliamentary elections.

January 2001 - Attempted military coup fails.

March 2001 - President Gbagbo and opposition leader Ouattara meet for the first time since violence erupted between their supporters in October 2000 and agree to work towards reconciliation.

2001 - Reports of child slave ship off Africa's west coast spark allegations of child slavery in cocoa plantations, straining international relations. Government moves to tackle the issue.

March 2001 - Calls for fresh presidential and legislative elections after Alassane Ouattara's party gains majority at local polls.

June 2001 - Amnesty International criticises government's human rights record over alleged extra-judicial killings of 57 northerners during presidential election campaign in October 2000. Eight gendarmes accused of the killings are cleared in August.

October 2001 - President Gbagbo sets up National Reconciliation Forum. General Guei refuses to attend in protest against the arrest of his close aide Captain Fabien Coulibaly.

November 2001 - Opposition leader Alassane Ouattara returns, ending year-long exile in France and Gabon.

August 2002 – Alassane Ouattara's RDR opposition party given four ministerial posts in new government.

September 19, 2002 - Mutiny in Abidjan by soldiers unhappy at being demobilised grows into full-scale rebellion, with Ivory Coast Patriotic Movement rebels seizing control of the north.

September 20, 2002: The body of Ivory Coast's former military ruler General Robert Guei, accused of being behind an army uprising in the west African country, was found dead in a road near a large hospital in Abidjan. Defense Minister Moise Lida Kouassi told the press on 19 September that he believed Guei had been killed in an abortive coup attempt that started at around 03.00, when "about 280 soldiers" descended on Abidjan and more on towns in Bouake and Korhogo. Mortar and automatic weapons fire started in a district where the country's military police have a base, and spread to other parts of the city. Gunfire also broke out in the northern city of Khorogo, a stronghold of Ivory Coast's opposition. Armed youths in civilian clothes were reported to be roaming the streets.

Up to 800 disgruntled troops staged the attacks, to protest their pending demobilization. Those involved were wearing a mix of street clothes and military dress, so it was not clear which branch of the security forces they belonged to (if any). After about five hours of fighting, at least 10 people had been killed and dozens wounded. By the 20th, fighting was still taking place in several places. Death toll appears to be about a hundred, with somewhat more wounded. A former French colony and the world's top cocoa producer, Ivory Coast was once regarded as a haven of peace and stability, until Guei staged the 1999 coup that toppled President Henri Konan Bedie. - Adam Geibel

September 22, 2002: Although the man thought to be leading the coup attempt (former dictator general Robert Guei) died on 19th, the fighting continues in the cities of Bouake and Korhogo. Some 2,000 government troops, with some armored vehicles, have massed in Bouake. The government has called for the rebels to hand in their weapons, many stolen from army bases and being handed out to civilians. The government blamed an unnamed "rouge nation" for "hiring mercenaries" for the attempted coup. Since Ivory Coast's population is 36 percent foreign born, this statement was calculated to get the native born population fired up.

While often touted as a West African success story, it is still corrupt, with a large percentage of the young men unemployed and not very happy about the government.

France has announced that it is sending several hundred troops to protect the thousands of French citizens (and the French backed government) in Ivory Coast.

September 23, 2002 The Ivory Coast is home to 20,000 French citizens, about 8,000 of those being dual- or tri-nationals (including a large Lebanese community). Residents of Bouake said they heard heavy and automatic weapons firing around 18:45 on the 22nd, but a French businessman told AFP later in the evening that all was calm.

While quibbling about joining in on a war on Iraq, 6,000 troops in five ex-colonies remain on permanent guard in Africa; joint multilateral peacekeeping forces and ensure that defense pacts are adhered to. Contrary to it's earlier post-colonial period strategy, the French no longer provide African countries with military assistance but stand ready to intervene at any moment. Senegal and Chad each host about 1,000 soldiers each, with 600 troops in Gabon and 2,700 in Djibouti. In a crisis, these troops can be brought in as reinforcements much faster than if they were stationed in France and with greater flexibility in terms of sending equipment and vehicles.

Some of the Transall C-160 transports used to fly the 200 French reinforcements to Abidjan went on to wait on standby in nearby Senegal and Gabon, ready to return at a moment's notice. The main worry for French authorities in such situations is when French nationals get caught in crossfire (many of the rebels are wearing civilian clothes.)

Government state television announced on the night of 21 September that 270 people had been killed since the coup started, with another 300 wounded. After initially refusing to negotiate with the mutineers, unless they surrendered, Prime Minister Pascal Affi NGuessan offered to negotiate with the mutineers, if they laid down their arms.

By accusing foreigners of backing the coup attempt, the government has sparked off a wave of anti-foreign violence. Gangs of pro-government youths armed with machetes were reportedly roaming the streets of Abidjan, targeting foreigners from predominantly Muslim neighboring countries.

Once considered a peaceful country that welcomed millions of immigrant workers to build up the nation after it's independence from France in 1960, up to 40 percent of the 16 million population is now foreign. The immigrant issue has fueled political, religious and ethnic divisions between the largely Muslim north versus the predominantly Christian south and west. These splits were kept under control by the country's post-independence president, Felix Houphouet-Boigny until he died in 1993. Rampant xenophobia became commonplace afterwards. - Adam Geibel

The US State Department urged Americans to avoid travel to Ivory Coast for the next 30 days. The rebels do not appear to be numerous (fewer than a thousand armed men in two cities). But the army has been reluctant to attack, if only because the enormous damage that would result, as well as civilians caught in the cross fire (many of the rebels are wearing civilian clothes.)

September 24, 2002: The UN and the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) have both weighed in on the Ivory Coast's coup, condemning the actions of mutineers. The central and northern towns of Bouake (350 km north of the capitol Abidjan) and Korhogo (634 km north) were still under the control of rebel soldiers by 23 September despite government counterattacks. Government troops targeted the Bouake military training college in the east of the central city. Rebels in Korhogo were under attack by a unit of the paramilitary gendarmerie before the mobile phone network (their link to the outside world) was abruptly cut off.

In Bouake, a brief but intense barrage of gunfire during the night of 22 September was probably the beginning of the "ferocious battle" promised by the government, but counter-attack against the mutineers which quickly petered out. Some analysts thought that the Ivorian government and mutinous troops were both trying to avoid further bloodshed, where possible.

The French contingent had flown into the capital, Yamoussoukro (100 kilometers) south of Bouake. Their commander, Colonel Charles de Kersabiec, noted that his rescue force has light armor, 15 jeeps, and three Cougar helicopters for Medevac. He told the press that this intention is to maintain peace and protect foreigners and French nationals. They set up camp at Yamoussoukro's airport, preparing to evacuate 1,000 foreigners in Bouake: 600 of which are French nationals, plus 170 children from Canada, the Netherlands and the United States boarding at the International Christian Academy (originally established for the children of missionaries).

At least 5,000 people were displaced and hundreds of residential shelters burnt down in the suburbs of Abidjan. Red Cross officials noted that the displaced included immigrants from Burkina Faso, Liberia and Mali, as well as a number of Ivorians. The authorities said the uprising was assisted by mercenaries and an unnamed neighboring country from the north, now widely thought to refer to Burkina Faso. - Adam Geibel

September 25, 2002: The United States' European Command dispatched 200 Special Forces troops to the Ivory Coast on 24 September, joining 600 French troops already in the country. The Americans' mission is to safeguard 100 American schoolchildren trapped in Bouake. Ranging from 5-year-olds to 12-year-olds, the young Americans are among 200 foreigners holed up at the boarding school for missionaries' children. There are a total of 2,000 American citizens in the Ivory Coast.

Heavy gunfire had splashed the International Christian Academy in Bouake since the mutiny began, more from errant rounds than deliberate targeting. Gunfights broke out again on the 24th, with identically-dressed troops so chaotically engaged that observers could make no sense of the fighting. - Adam Geibel

The French, who have several hundred troops nearby, are reluctant to move on Bouake for fear of being drawn into the fighting. The rebels are soldiers part of a battalion recruited years ago by a now-deposed dictator and their loyalty to anyone else was always suspect. The government attempt to disband the battalion, and the reaction of the troops, seems to prove those suspicions. The American Special Forces have sent a small advance party into Ivory Coast, with the rest of the troops staying in Ghana. It is thought the main reason for the American troops being their is to motivate the French to rescue the kids.

September 27, 2002: French troops evacuated more than 1,200 westerners from the Ivory Coast town of Bouake on 26 August: more than 60 percent were French or other Europeans, US and Lebanese citizens About 600 of the town's 1,000 expatriates were French. The remainder came from other African nations or had double citizenship. The French ERC 90 F4 six-wheeled armored cars apparently convinced the Ivory Coast mutineers to behave, since their 350-vehicle convoy mission was uneventful. Further evacuations were scheduled on the morning of the 27th, for any other people wishing to leave Bouake. But with most of the foreigners safely out of town of 500,000, the general feeling among the remaining civilians is that there will be a bloodbath.

After heavy fighting on the 25th, correspondents found more than 100 bodies in the town's morgue. There was no fighting on the 26th, but several thousand excited demonstrators took to the streets of Bouake to demonstrate support for the rebels. The mutineers were seizing territory between Korhogo and the Mail border (to the northwest), capturing hearts and minds with their good treatment of civilians.

But the population realizes that the Ivory Coast's government can finally launch their counteroffensive against the mutineers. Three Nigerian "Alpha Jet" fighters were flown into Yamoussoukro, even as President Laurent Gbagbo tried to convince his neighbors that the foreign mercenaries backing the rebels had heavy weapons. Meanwhile, unemployed youths have been recruited to join the original force of 400 mutineers. They are paid the equivalent of $7 a day, but where the rebels get the money remains a mystery. - Adam Geibel

September 28, 2002: The Italian Catholic news agency MISNA reported on 27 September that rebel forces in the Ivory Coast had attacked and conquered Odienne, 500 miles north west of Bouake and close to the Guinea border. Norwegian missionaries in the city were requesting evacuation.

The rebels in Bouake said they beat off a government assault during the night of 25-26 September and captured an army truck. Their commander is former Warrant Officer Tuo Fozie, who fled the Ivory Coast into exile in 2000. Fozie told journalists that General Guei (killed on 19 September) had had nothing to do with the uprising. Neither had opposition leader Alassane Ouattara, a former prime minister who took refuge with the French ambassador after claiming that Ivorian security forces had tried to kill him. Ouattara's home was torched by security forces early on the 22nd. The mutineers have demanded that all soldiers in exile be allowed to return and that those in prison be freed.

In response to his request for a regional peacekeeping force, West Africa's leading powers assured President Laurent Gbagbo they would stand with him. Nigeria had already dispatched 60 troops, in addition to three Alpha jets. It's in the neighborhoods' best interest, since the Ivory Coast is sub-Saharan Africa's third biggest economy, the catalyst for the French-backed West African CFA franc currency zone and a vital port for the landlocked countries to the North. At the Ghanaian border town of Elubo, 125 miles away from fighting, thousands of dollars in revenue and taxes were being lost each day articulated commercial cargo trucks sat idle.

The Ivory Coast also produces 40 percent of the world's cocoa crop. News of the fighting pushed cocoa futures above 16-year highs and on the 27th traders said that if fresh beans did not come on the market in the next two months, the situation would be "catastrophic".

Refugees entering the Malian border town of Zegoua reported that the rebels controlled many towns in the North. One man claimed that the rebels, finding children aboard his bus, filled the tank with gas and escorted it to the border. When they requisitioned something (like the fuel at a gas station in Korhogo), they paid in new bank notes rather than simply looting it. However, the rebels did sack an arms depot in the Ivorian town of Nielle (40 miles from the Malian border) on the 22nd.

The last French military vehicle left the rebel-held city of Bouake around 14.30 GMT on the 27th, after the troops had escorted out all foreigners who wanted to leave (750 that day following the 1200 foreigners on the 26th). With approximately 20,000 French citizens in the country, the 200-man French escort unit was drawn from the 500 men of the 43rd Marine Infantry Battalion (based in Port Bouet adjacent to the Abidjan Airport), which had been reinforced on the 22nd by an additional 250 men flown in from other French African garrisons. This column then took up a covering position only 12 miles to the East (near the town of Brodo) to make sure things didn't get out of hand, while other French troops secured the airport at Yamoussoukro and other sites.

The Ivorian government has had about 2,000 troops (back by tanks and armored cars) outside Bouake since the 19th. According to America's State Department, the Ivorians had the majority of their Army in the First Military Region concentrated in and around Abidjan, its principal units there being a rapid intervention battalion (airborne), an infantry battalion, an armored battalion, and an air defense artillery battalion. The Second Military Region (located in Daloa) is assigned one infantry battalion.

The Third Military Region (headquartered in Bouake) was home to an artillery, an infantry, and an engineer battalion. The Fourth Military Region maintained only a Territorial Defense Company headquartered in Korhogo. The fifth region is the Western Operational Zone, a temporary command created to respond to the security threat caused by the civil war in neighboring Liberia.

Like many African wars of the recent past, the fighting style of both government and rebels can best be described as "medieval": a mob nominally resembling a unit, in a mix of civilian clothes and military uniforms but all heavily armed, descend upon a target (or hold a position) while kicking out as much fire as they can, for as long as the ammunition on hand lasts. Retirement points seem to be awarded for those who show the most attitude and firing postures worthy of a music video. Sometimes a show of force (by simply firing their weapons in the air and yelling) is enough to get the other side to displace - one rebel unit was able to force a dozen government border guards at the border town of Pogo to turn tail on the 22nd this way. - Adam Geibel

September 30, 2002: Being in France's sphere of influence, the Ivory Coast's military and gendarme was armed with a selection of aging French weapon; from MAS 49 rifles and AA52 machine guns to Brandt mortars. However, both government and rebel troops have recently been photographed with the ubiquitous AK-47 assault rifle and RPG-7 grenade launcher. Where did these new weapons come from?

In late July 2000, Ukrainian arms dealer Leonid Minin chartered an Antonov-124 transport aircraft in Moscow, had it flown to Kiev (Ukraine) where it was loaded with 113 tons of weaponry: 10,500 AK-47s and 330 RPG-7s, along with sniper rifles, night vision equipment and assorted munitions. The weapons were supplied and transported by Moscow-based air cargo firm Aviatrend. The shipment was then directed to Abidjan, where General Robert Guei signed for them. Guei had also ordered five million rounds of ammunition from Aviatrend, as well. Apparently, the shipment cost $150,000 in cash and $500,000 worth of African diamonds. Aviatrend is run by former Soviet test pilot and longtime Minin associate Valery Cherny. Minin was arrested in August 2000 by an Italian vice squad for having prostitutes at his party in Milan and when incriminating arms dealing documents were discovered, a special branch team was called in to investigate. - Adam Geibel

October 1, 2002: What started as a coup attempt in the Ivory Coast is now a civil war. The Ivorian government has declared the center and north of the country a war zone. Over the 28-29 September weekend, rebel forces in the north advanced south towards the town of Tiebissou (only 26 miles north of the administrative capital, Yamoussoukro). Most of the gendarmes [government military police] in the rebels' path fled before they arrived.

Early on 29 September, French forces and helicopters backed by US C-130 transport planes and Hummers armed with .50 caliber machineguns evacuated 320 church and aid workers and other (mostly Western) foreigners from Korhogo. The operation was placed under French command and began at dawn, although the escort forces' arrival startled the rebels at Korhogo airport. Shots fired during the French helicopters' approach were met with 7.62 mm machine gun suppression fire, which caused the mutineers to run away. Spokesman Lieutenant Colonel Ange-Antoine Leccia described the event as "a minor accident".

Leaders from the 15-nation Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) met in Ghana the same day, ending their meeting with a pledge by the West African leaders to mediate between the government and the rebels. If these negotiations failed to end the conflict, the leaders agreed to dispatch a regional military force. On the night of the 28th, the French had promised logistical help but no troops for direct action.

Yet the rebels remain a curious force, having no known overall leader and claiming to have no ties to any political group or foreign nation. At least some of them are from the Ivorian Army's 3rd Battalion. However, many sources describe them as "disciplined" and all government counterattacks to date appear to have failed. One rebel commander, Tuo Fozie, told the press that he would resist any ECOWAS intervention as an attempt to deprive the rebels of success: "If Ecomog comes here, there won't be peace for 20, 30, 40 years. There must be justice".

The "white flight" from the Ivory Coast's north is cause for concern to those who remain behind and a complete about-face from Africa's independence days, when the locals cheered as Europeans fled as the new nation-states were being handed over to African rulers. Food supplies in many occupied cities were running low and communications largely cut off. Ivorian refugees attempting to leave Bouake were turned back by rebel checkpoints, although apparently without any violence. - Adam Geibel

October 2, 2002: The French military announced on 1 October that it was sending 70 additional troops from the 11th Paratrooper Brigade to join the hundreds already in Ivory Coast. French Foreign Legionnaires have also been recently seen in the area. However, the presence of French and American troops haven't defused the situation - heavy gunfire was reported on the 1st near Tiebissou, 25 miles north of Yamoussoukro. The rebels had also captured Sakassou (about 26 miles southwest of Bouake) and Seguela, toward the Guinea border.

Paris-based American diplomat Richard Buangan, who was helping coordinate the evacuations, said embassy staff were trying to contact about 70 U.S. citizens (mostly missionaries) to check on their welfare and advise some to move to more secure areas.

Rebel spokesmen are sounding less like disgruntle mutineers and more like men who want to topple the government. In Bouake, a "Lieutenant Elinder" told the press that their aim was to "restore justice, peace and the rule of law among all Ivorians". The rebels also announced their name on the 1st (the Patriotic Movement of Ivory Coast), but their leadership remains unclear. There is local speculation that the men staging the former French colony's first rebellion are veterans of the wars in Sierra Leone and Liberia (the Ivory Coast's western neighbors), "floating groups looking for trouble". A good place to start looking would be among the ranks of Sierra Leone's Revolutionary United Front (RUF). Deposed and recently dead President Guei was funneling weapons and munitions to that group in 2000. - Adam Geibel

The unrest in Sierra Leone can be traced to the growing Moslem-Christian strife, which is made worse by tribal disputes. As with many West African nations, the coastal tribes are Christian, while the interior ("northern") tribes are Moslem. For decades, Ivory Coast managed to avoid the religious and tribal based politics, but this is no longer the case. The Christians have been trying to run the country themselves, but the northern Moslems are now fighting back, and the rebellion of these northern soldiers is part of that.

October 3, 2002: The situation in the Ivory Coast remains fluid and confused, since all of the telephone lines are down in the north and contacts can only be made on cell phones. The standstill on the battlefield
- as previously reported by the international press - doesn't match Ivory Coast State radio and television broadcasts, which are reporting clashes between government troops and rebel forces around Bouak. The Italian Catholic news agency MISNA also reported fighting along the Tiebissou to Sakassou and Tiebissou to Bouak roads.

On 2 October, AFP reported the capture of the cities of Segel, Katiola, Bouna (along border with Ghana and Burkinafaso) and Kong (about 120 miles west of Bouna). MISNA claims these are not real conquests, but merely rebel forces seeking alternative routes to the Ivorian commercial capital of Abidjan. During their bypass, the rebels avoid French and loyalist barricades around Tiebissou, encountering little resistance by the few gendarmes left and enrolling sympathetic youths from the villages.

The rebels captured the village of Sakassou (25 miles south of Bouake) on the 1st but were stopped from advancing east by French soldiers on an evacuation mission. A French military spokesman noted that while the army had not stopped anyone, they had set up a security perimeter of 13 miles around the official capital, Yamoussoukro. He said the rebels were still 30 miles from the city.

Meanwhile, the situation grows worse for both the civilians who have become refugees and those left behind. Food supplies are dwindling in Boake, Adibjan and Korhogo, while hospitals and other care centers were reportedly closed.

So why would France care so much about one of it's former colonies? While the safety of it's citizens is laudable, the real motivation for wars usually lie behind the question "who benefits?". Western Europe reportedly consumes over 40 percent of the chocolate sold worldwide and the EU imports about 90 percent of it's cocoa from West Africa, mainly the Ivory Coast. The chocolate trade is worth some $3 billion a year across the European Union.

Cocoa shortages had already sharply driven prices up this year by about 60 percent and if the fighting continues, could exacerbate poor supplies of cocoa beans for the third consecutive year. Although the main cocoa-growing areas are in the south and the west, production could be affected by growing tension between immigrant cocoa plantation workers from Burkina Faso and Ivorians. Analysts say the next three months are vital, as the bulk of the crop is shipped between October and the end of December. Reuters reported that fuel shortages and a ban on tanker-truck travel into the interior had virtually brought the Ivorian cocoa industry to a halt, hitting both buyers and exporters. Do the math, then watch for more Legionnaires. - Adam Geibel

October 4, 2002: The northern Moslem rebels finally got themselves organized and in touch with the government. A deal was quickly worked out for a ceasefire, followed by negotiations over the ethnic, political and religious differences that divide the country from north to south. Soldiers and civilians who had fled the country over the last three years, because of persecution by southerners, played a large role in the uprising.

October 5, 2002: The ceasefire agreement signing between the Ivory Coast's government and it's mutinous soldiers was delayed, with both sides expressing dissatisfaction with the wording. The government was reluctant to commit to some aspects (such as the suggestion of a peacekeeping force in the country) while the mutineers felt they were not granted proper status. They also had a problem with the government moving more troops up to Bouake. The signing was scheduled for 16:00 GMT but by 18:00, none of the delegates had turned up. There was no time specified for another signing attempt.

Mohammed Ibn Chambas, the executive secretary of the Economic Community of West Africa States (ECOWAS), led the group of ministers from Nigeria, Niger, Mail, Togo, and Ghana in ceasefire negotiations at Bouake. The peace mission arrived in French army helicopters and was taken through quiet streets to a French school, although rebel leaders kept the foreign ministers waiting for an hour before driving up in a convoy of pickup trucks. Rebel leader Tuo Fozie climbed out, shook hands and saluted the delegation.

Save for the cameras and television crews, the talks could have been straight out of a scene from the 19th century. While French soldiers formed a protected cordon around the cluster of tiny pastel school chairs placed under the school's tin-roof pavilion, the representatives gathered for 90 minutes before agreeing to stop operations and sign a ceasefire on the 5th.

What follows the ceasefire is anyone's guess. The rebels conquered 40 percent of the country in 15 days and will be loath to give up their gains. President Laurent Gbagbo certainly won't turn over power willingly, yet his government must depend on the French if they want to stick around. Given recent African military history, the phrase "ceasefire" is usually interpreted as "reload" by all parties. The rebels may be using this opportunity to arm more sympathetic youths and infiltrate them past French blocking positions, while the Loyalists are probably praying for the arrival of ECOMOG troops. - Adam Geibel

October 9, 2002: As expected, the Ivory Coast lost it's opportunity for a ceasefire. President Gbagbo told ECOWAS on 6 October that both sides had moved too far from what was agreed at Accra, that his government would not be treated on the same footing as the rebels and that the insurgents must be disarmed before further debate. On the 5th, the mediators waited all day for the government to provide a document attesting to the signing authority of its representative, but it was never delivered. The delegates went home with the conclusion that "it's basically a problem for Ivory Coast - If they want outside support they have to invite us."

Within hours, government troops were on the move. So were the rebels, apparently: unidentified saboteurs damaged the French television channels TV5 and Horizon transmitters in Abidjan overnight.

The rebels claim to have beaten back several loyalist local offensives launched on 6 October, chiefly around Bouake. An AFP correspondent found an army reconnaissance unit of five vehicles, including a pick-up with a heavy machine-gun, at Kouasiblekro (only four miles from Bouake) around 09:50. President Gbagbo's forces moved to seize the rebel-held city in a pincer movement from east and south around 13.00 local time. Fighting was still going on by mid-afternoon at a commando camp and at the city's southern entrance, reportedly punctuated with artillery fire.

The rebels at Korhogo (125 miles north of Bouake) dispatched a column of 40 vehicles loaded with men early on the 6th to reinforce Bouake's defenses, followed by 30 more troop-laden vehicles that afternoon.

About 100 rebels had been detailed to hunt down government infiltrators inside of Bouake, after capturing 100 suspected gendarmes who had slipped into the city overnight on the 5th/6th. The rebels taunted one loyalist prisoner with threats of "we are going to eat you".

Army sources admitted that over 400 loyalist troops in a convoy of 15 all-terrain vehicles (some fitted with 20mm cannons) were moving to Bouake. Ivorian military sources said that since the uprising broke out on 19 September, the army had acquired these cannon-armed four-wheel-drive vehicles and type-unspecified armored vehicles from Belgium (for $9 million), as well as night-vision goggles and sniper rifles. French troops near Yamoussoukro saw 300 Ivorian troops moving north on the night of the 5th, toward rebel-held areas. The government hasn't been doing well in the "Minds and Hearts" department. As loyalist troops moved out of Tiebissou, local residents emerged to discover that Ivorian forces had looted shops and restaurants.

Gbagbo's forces also launched an offensive at Sakassou (25 miles from Bouake), moving unopposed from the East to within six miles of the outskirts.

A rebel commander said his men had "violently repulsed" a 19-vehicle army column near the western town of Seguela (60 miles west of Bouake) late on the 5th, although the claim could not be independently verified. Government military officials could not be reached and the phone lines to Seguela were cut.

Heavy weapons fire erupted on the morning of the 7th, near Bouake's commando camp and a sappers' camp. An AFP journalist reported a dozen wounded rebels being transported to hospital, while the rebels admitted losing two vehicles and two troops killed, with an unknown number of wounded. However, they claim to have captured an armored vehicle, an all-terrain vehicle with two machine-guns and a pick-up loaded with ammunition. The French and rebels reported that one government convoy apparently feared being encircled and left Bouake overnight, heading southeast. The rest of the loyalist units had pulled back by late afternoon on the 7th, vowing to take the city on the 8th.

The rebels promised their own counterattack on the 8th, although there was no mention of specific targets. Meanwhile, loyalist troops at Yamoussoukro's airport unloaded fresh ammunition from a foreign-registered aircraft onto new pickup trucks.

The columns on both sides seem to be ad-hoc units, reinforced with whatever heavy weaponry can be mustered up (there were only four 105mm howitzers in the country, before the mutiny). Most of the 'heavy stuff' will probably come from 106mm recoilless rifles and 120mm mortars. While some government armored cars were photographed in the first few days of the mutiny, none of the AMX-13s, AML-60/90s or ERC-90s have been reportedly engaged in the fighting.

The rebels also have their own PYSOPS capability, with the local traditional hunters known as Dozos. This secret society has magical overtones, which supposedly affords their members keen sight and amplified hearing. The locals believe that a Dozo cannot be killed by a bullet or knife, since his amulets prevent metal from entering his body. Dozos were frequently hired to guard vehicles, direct traffic or patrol religious sites.

Light skirmishing could be heard in Bouake's suburbs throughout the morning of the 8th, while bands of pro-rebel youths armed with sticks and iron bars roamed the streets in a hunt for loyalist infiltrators. - Adam Geibel

October 15, 2002: On 9th October, the Ivory Coast's rebels refused President Gbagbo's demand to lay down their arms as a precondition for peace talks, and announced they would go on the attack. However, the mutiny-turned-civil war is turning brutal. During the see-saw fighting in Bouake, there were rumors of massacres in at least two neighborhoods. During a temporary retreat, some rebels were attacked and a few burned alive by local citizens. In a few hours, the rebels regained control of the neighborhoods and unleashed all their fury on the locals, indiscriminately killing and destroying houses.

By the 10th, there were an estimated 150,000 civilians fleeing the city. While governmental troops concentrated on Bouak, the rebels took over the city of Vavoua in western Ivory Coast on the 7th, although some may not have been fast enough: the rebels claim to have captured at least 30 loyalist soldiers.

After hearing that the Gbagbo government was so confident of routing the rebels and that they required no help combating the "armed terrorists", Nigeria recalled it's three Alpha jets and their 17-man detachment on 7 October.

On the 13th, the rebels entered Daloa (the main cocoa processing center, 250 miles north-west of the main city of Abidjan) and Angola sent troops to help the loyalists (which Angola initially denied). President Gbagbo has courted Angola since the elections two years ago and his personal bodyguard was trained by those foreign troops. Two Angolan BMP-1 armored vehicles arrived that morning and an Angolan state airline capable of carrying 120 men arrived late on the 14th. Angolan effectiveness may not be the best (one of the BMPs broke down a day after arriving), but they did help the Congo-Brazzaville government defeat rebels a few years ago.

The Ivory Coast rebels had agreed in principle to freeze their frontlines, as long as they were not attacked by government troops, but when they heard that 500 Angolan troops were in-country, they called off negotiations and demanded Gbagbo's resignation. The rebels also complained that France was actively aiding the government, since they captured 300 new French weapons at Daloa - while the French have made it clear that they were providing logistical support. The 1,000 French troops in-country have so far not been deliberately engaged by the rebels and - if the rebel leadership has any sense - will not be targeted.

The fighting is starting to play hell with the region's economy. In the western port of San Pedro, banks closed indefinitely and while trading continued normally, shipping companies warned they could continue operations for only a few more days unless the banks reopened. The Abidjan Port Authority was barred from unloading all containers midday on the 13th at the request of Ivory Coast's gendarmes and in one or two days, the docks will be jammed. Abidjan is the largest port in Ivory Coast and one of the most important in west Africa. - Adam Geibel October 17, 2002: Witnesses in Daloa reported that the rebels had fled the town and government troops are in control, following heavy fighting on 14 October. Four Angolan armored vehicles supposedly fought alongside government troops in the battle for the city, along with Angolan "technical advisers". Barrages of machine gun fire and occasional explosions could still be heard for the next two days, indicating that some rebels were still in the area.

However, as late as 15 October, the Angolan Presidency was still denying that the Angolan Armed Forces (FAA) were involved in the Ivory Coast's internal crisis and that they had armored vehicles in-country. Photographic analysis can't be denied - western news sources clearly showed a BMP-2 Infantry Fighting Vehicle with it's engine hatch raised. This vehicle was not in the Ivorian inventory.

The Loyalists have also claimed that the rebels have received support from outside of the county, specifically pointing to heavy weaponry not in the Ivory Coast's arsenal. Several western press photographs show rebel-operated pickup trucks fitted with ZPU-1 single-barrel 14.5mm machineguns. While these weapons were not on the pre-mutiny lists for the Ivorian Army, Burkian Faso had 30 of them and this lends credence to loyalist claims of Burkianian meddling. Of lesser interest were the new-looking World War II-era Russian PPSH43 submachineguns carried by some rebels (again, not an Ivorian weapon).

Far behind the scenes, this could well be another war for oil. The Ivory Coast contains an estimated 100 million barrels of recoverable oil reserves, with offshore reserves first discovered in the 1970's. During the twenty-year period from 1970 to 1990, over 100 wells were drilled offshore, resulting in the discovery of several commercial oil and gas fields.

President Gbagbo issued the rebels an ultimatum, warning that the rebellion would be ended either by war or peace this week - after his army had received military supplies. Meanwhile, the rebels opened their own website (www.supportmpci.org) titled "Mouvement Patriotique de Cote d'Ivoire -- For a united and democratic Cote d'Ivoire, where every citizen lives under the protection of the law". The site is bilingual, in both French and English. - Adam Geibel

October 18, 2002: Long one of the most stable nations in West Africa, Ivory Coast achieved this status due to a string of able politicians who did not exploit tribal, national (many foreign workers) and religious (Christians in the south, Moslem in the north) differences. That changed in 1999 when an army coup put an unpopular general in charge. Since then, the tribal and religious differences have become something to fight over and hostility towards the millions of foreign workers has increased. Most of these foreign workers come from Moslem nations to the north, and the Christians who have long run Ivory Coast feel that these Moslem nations are providing weapons and other support to Moslem rebels in the north. Rebels have signed a ceasefire, but the government has delayed doing so.

October 22, 2002: For a brief four days, it looked as if the Peace Accord in the Ivory Coast would hold: There had been no reports of fighting since the peace deal, signed by the rebels on the 17th and approved by President Gbagbo, took effect on the 18th. While rebels in Bouake rested at their posts, the loyalists continued to build up strength behind their own lines and in a suburb of Abidjan, about 3,000 pro-government youths marched to call on the army to take the offensive.

French officers said that between 19 and 21 October, half of their 1,000 troops would move west from their current positions to deploy along the front between the Patriotic Movement of Ivory Coast rebels and President Gbagbo's forces. Vowing to retaliate "very strongly" if attacked, the French will deploy patrols, set up observation posts, checkpoints and previously agreed upon contact points between government and rebel forces.

On the 20th, French reconnaissance and contact teams reached Bondoukou (near the Ghana border) and Mbahiakro (50 miles south of Bouake). On the 21st, they extended their buffer zone through Bonoufla, a small town in the western cocoa-growing region. The French have also taken up posts at Tiebissou and Brobo (about 15 miles east of Bouake), as well as the Man and Touba regions. The buffer zone now separates Daloa, the country's third largest city, from the town of Vavoua, under rebel control.

The worst French nightmare is that this war could very easily degenerate into an ugly fight between ethnic and religious groups, with wholesale atrocities. The loyalists accused the rebels of violating the ceasefire on the 20th, by looting homes at an air base at Bouake. The rebels have already accused the government of planting Angolan-supplied antipersonnel landmines in Daloa, the northeastern town of Bondoukou, and in M'Bahiakro in the center of the country.

A textbook example of how things unravel occurred on the 17th, when Muslim-owned shops in Daloa were sacked. Paramilitary gendarmes broke into a shop owned by wealthy Muslim merchant Khalilou Toure and looted it, after raiding his home and finding a weapon (which would be a reasonable thing to have, in a time of national uncertainty). The gendarmes then went to Daloa's main market, where most of the traders are Muslim and fired shots into the air to scare away the crowd. Gangs of youth (mainly ethnic Betes, who predominate in Daloa) jumped on the bandwagon and pillaged other Toure-owned shops, as well as various Muslim-owned stalls in the market. One Lebanese merchant in Daloa described the atmosphere as unhealthy and expected to see old scores settled.

The day before, paramilitary gendarmes and police exchanged gunfire for several minutes at a working class district in the main city of Abidjan. The shooting began when gendarmes tried to ring a building of the anti-riot police squad in the Abidjan quarter of Yopougon. It was not clear why the gendarmes tried to encircle the police building.

The only shooting in Daloa after the ceasefire was supposedly from loyalist soldiers firing in the air at around six in the evening, simply to announce the curfew. However, a more sinister explanation soon surfaced: on the night of the 20th, "uniformed personnel" descended on the Daloa neighborhood of Orly 2 and gathered a crowd of Muslim residents. They stripped the people and then demanded 5,000 CFA (seven US dollars) from each person. Those who paid were allowed to leave, those who didn't were shot. Daloa residents claim that 42 people were killed that night. The figure was unofficially raised to 56 dead on the 21st, with 19 bodies still unclaimed in the streets. Ivorian army spokesman Colonel Jules Yao Yao had heard of atrocities being committed in government-held areas by "people in uniform." He called on Ivorians to report such acts and warned that those guilty "could be shot on sight."

The Ivorian army seemed to have retaken the initiative with the recapture of Daloa, thanks to an infusion of new weapons and possibly some foreign advisors (either mercenaries or state-sponsored). During the battle of Daloa, some locals reported the presence of loyalist fighters "of mixed race" in new combat fatigues, tough-looking and totally silent, giving rise to speculation on the intervention of Angolan soldiers. Two rebels were killed and about 12 wounded on the 17th, after a government ambush about 13 miles from Daloa. A group of about 150 rebel reinforcements had left the town of Vavoua (31 miles from Daloa) when they came under fire from government troops using a tank and snipers. The rebels later claimed the attackers were Angolan soldiers.

The loyalist army's apathy (obvious since the beginning of the conflict) was dissipated by the dismissal of Minister of Defense Moise Lida Kouassi's on 12 October. Army leaders had demanded that he be relieved before they were ordered into action. To further prepare his counteroffensive, Gbagbo sent one special advisor to Paris and another to Israel, seeking financing, weapons and to strengthen his intelligence services. The Ivorian government allegedly signed a contract with Eurocopter's Romanian subsidiary for the purchase of three Pumas, an unspecified number of Alouettes and reconnaissance planes, but the transaction apparently collapsed. According to other sources, up to six Angolan "tanks" that arrived in Ivory Coast were delivered with service personnel. Yet the Ivorian government claims that their two tanks (BMP2s) were ordered

(and paid for in cash) from the recognized Israeli supplier to the Angolan Army and only "transited" through Luanda.

The country remains a tinderbox. Many Western diplomats suspect that the rebels have foreign support, pointing out that their arsenal, uniforms and equipment (like satellite phones) cannot have come from government stores and arsenals (as the rebels claim). Despite the truce agreement, on the 18th the State Department urged Americans to depart the Ivory Coast and there were unconfirmed rumors that the UN had ordered families of its staff to leave. - Adam Geibel

October 31, 2002: Rebels have taken control of the northern half of the country. This is where most of the cocoa growing goes on (40 percent of the world total), and disruption of this has led to a jump in cocoa prices worldwide. ECOWAS plans to send 2,000 peacekeepers in the next two weeks, but the rebels fear that the government is hiring South African mercenaries to fight them first. The disruption of the cocoa trade is catastrophic for the Moslem north, whose anger with the Christian south over economic issues brought about the current crises in the first place.

November 1, 2002: On the morning of 30th October, Togos President Gnassingbe Eyadma met with the delegations from the Ivory Coast's two sides separately, prior to reuniting them behind closed doors in an afternoon meeting. Being in the same room might be as close as the two sides get, for now.

Gbagbos marching orders to his delegates now in Togo's capital Lome were a repetition of his mantra since dissident soldiers began their mutiny almost six weeks ago: "We are ready to negotiate as soon as the assailants put down their arms. If that is done, we are ready to discuss anything". The rebels, rightfully fearing medieval-style retribution from loyalist forces if they lay down their weapons, want to negotiate an agreement first. They also want Gbagbo to step down. This is traditionally known as a "Mexican Standoff". Stay tuned. - Adam Geibel

November 6, 2002: The office of the Ivory Coast's President Gbagbo denied that South African mercenaries were fighting alongside his country's army on 31 October even as western wire services were reporting their presence in Adibjan. At the time, the rumor was that 40 mercenaries were already in-country and another 160 were enroute. An unnamed source told Reuters that the plan was put together by a French "godfather", but relied mostly on South African manpower and was backed by Russian-built helicopters including Mi-8s for transport and at least one Mi-24 "Hind" gunship.

Meanwhile, Nigeria will not supply troops for a 2,000 man peacekeeping force mandated by the Economic Community of West African States

(ECOWAS). Nigeria is currently involved in a standoff with its neighbour Cameroon over the disputed Bakassi Peninsula. However, Gambia will is considering sending 137 troops but no one else has stepped up to the plate.

Any peacekeeping troops who are sent would receive American logistical support, primarily through one contracted IL-76, food and fuel, as well as equipment from the U.S.-run ECOWAS depot in Sierra Leone. The total value of the U.S. military assistance, which should last from six months to a year, is worth $2 million.

Meanwhile, the hatred remains firmly in place. Thousands of rebel supporters demonstrated in Bouake on 3 November, cheering a rebel leader who promised that they would never lay down their arms. - Adam Geibel

November 11, 2002: The Ivory Coast rebels are bracing themselves for more fighting after pulling, out of peace talks with the government on 9 November because of the murder of Benoit Dakoury-Tabley. They also sent 600 men and supplies from the north of the country to their central stronghold of Bouake. Rebel spokesman Cherif Ousmane explained that shots fired in the town were merely rebel units firing off "practice rounds" with recently received heavy weaponry. The rebels also claim that Gbagbo's army was moving tanks towards the frontline town of Tiebissou, south of Bouake.

A wave of murder, abduction and torture by unknown death squads has raised questions over how far elements of the Ivory Coast's security forces might allow the West African country's peace process to progress. President Gbagbo is "a hostage" (as one one civil servant described it) caught in the middle: on one side are people telling him he has to make concessions for peace and on the other, that his own army and people will get rid of him if they think he is caving in.

However, the rebels assured mediator Togolese President Gnassingbe Eyadema on the 10th that they had not broken off peace talks permanently. Meanwhile, Mali's General Oumar Diarra (a senior ECOWAS official) stressed that the suspension of the peace talks did not jeopardize the deployment of the peacekeeping force. - Adam Geibel

November 12, 2002: Bulgarian mercenaries have apparently joined contract soldiers from France and South African in Ivory Coast, to help the government deal with the rebels. Earlier on 11 November, between 50 and 60 foreign mercenary instructors and helicopter pilots were seen helping the Ivory Coast's regular army use recently acquired Russian-made weapons and vehicles (including heavy machine guns and armored personnel carriers). However, Bulgarian Foreign Ministry Spokesman Lyubomir Todorov quickly told the press that his government had no knowledge of any mercenaries.

Local sources reportedly said that primarily Bulgarian crews were helping the army fly three Mi-24 Hinds and two Mi-17 transports. Civilians first reported pilots practicing aboard two MI-24 combat helicopters off the Grand Bassam seaside resort (25 miles from Abidjan) . These helicopters arrived in Cote d'Ivoire in late October.

However, Ivorian sources became indignant at any suggestion that the mercenaries were anything other than trainers or that they might fight alongside Ivorian soldiers. Meanwhile, the rebels claim to have fixed two Alpha jets, but no one has seen them in the air. - Adam Geibel

November 22, 2002: Negotiations between the Patriotic Movement of the Ivory Coast (MPCI) and the government have stalled, because the MPCI delegation did not appreciate the rebels' proposals being leaked to an Ivorian newspaper. West African mediators handed both delegations in nearby Togo a fresh draft peace plan on the 21st.

The UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) launched a $16 million appeal in a bid to avert a possible humanitarian crisis. The money would cover basic requirements such as shelter, water, sanitation, food, health, education and protection over the next three months.

The threat of more fighting remains, since both sides have been rearming during the impasse in the Togo talks. - Adam Geibel

November 25, 2002: A leading Ivorian rebel spokesman accused the government of Ghana of providing military support to the Ivory Coast government and of allowing its northwest border territory to be used by loyalist troops. These would become rear area bases for launching attacks on rebel positions across the frontier. The rebel Ivory Coast Patriotic Movement (MPCI) accusations were immediately rejected by both Ghanaian and Ivorian authorities.

President Laurent Gbagbo also has to worry about the situation unraveling inside the Ivory Coast still under his control. The resignation of Transport Minister Marcel Amon Tanoh on 25 November was a blow for Gbagbo's efforts to present a united front against the rebels. Tanoh, an opposition party member, resigned because of the inability of the government to end the abuses, rapes, disappearances and murders committed by the death squads. Security forces have denied any responsibility and suggested the rebels might be murdering people in order to discredit Gbagbo. Human rights groups are investigating at least 50 suspected death squad killings in the city of Abidjan, since the failed coup - cum - war started on 19 September. - Adam Geibel

November 28, 2002: Fighting broke out on 27 November in the Ivory Coast, between the western town of Man and Seguela in the northwest. Rebels riding 20 four-wheel-drive vehicles attacked government forces at the garrison in Man. Man lies among rich cocoa plantations and the surrounding region is the heart of strong popular support for the president. However, the rebels denied any new assault and French forces reported no sign of fighting.

The same day, the Ivory Coast's opposition leader (and former prime minister) Alassane Ouattara left the French ambassador's residence in Abidjan, where he took refuge since September. A large part of the Ivorian press and the nation's public are convinced that "Ado" (from the initials of Alassane Dramane Ouattara) is the real hidden inspirer of the revolt. According to various Ivorian and international press sources, Alassane Dramane Ouattara and his wife are already in exile in Gabon. While Ouattara's move is designed to help defuse the situation, he could wind up doing the exact opposite if he somehow reaches rebel forces - Adam Geibel

November 29, 2002: Ivory Coast rebels drove a 150-man government garrison out of Man, a city of 135,000 people about 310 miles in the heart of cocoa plantation area northwest of the commercial capital of Abidjan. An Ivorian officer said that the attackers had cut off water and electricity in the town. The attackers (some dressed in civilian clothing) had overrun the city's streets in all-terrain vehicles, shooting in all directions. Farther west, rebels also took the town of Danane (near the Liberian border, 600 km west of Adibjan). Heavy artillery, mortar and sustained ground fire could be throughout the 28th , while hundreds of Ivorian and Liberian refugees had crossed to temporary safety in Liberia. The government immediately dispatched reinforcements from the capital, Yamoussoukro, although the route to Man requires a seven-hour drive.

One odd twist to this offensive is that the main rebel group (the Patriotic Movement of Cote d'Ivoire or MPCI) has denied involvement in the western fighting. The MPCI is based in the country's north and center. The Ivorian Popular Movement (MPI, also known as the "Patriotic Movement for the Greater West") claimed that they had attacked Danane. The MPI is close to the late former military leader General Robert Guei. A third, previously unknown group - the Movement for Justice and Peace - also appears to be operating in the west.

Meanwhile, in Abidjan's main administrative "Le Plateau" district, a heavier military presence was reported. Groups of men in civilian clothes could be seen filling sandbags around the Presidential Palace under the supervision of uniformed troops

French peacekeepers reported a lull in the fighting later on the 29th, indicative that both sides were probably low on ammunition. The French Foriegn Minister also managed to convince Burkina Faso's President to meet his Ivorian counterpart Laurent Gbagbo to resolve their differences.

December 1, 2002 The final toll from the French Peacekeepers' skirmish with rebels at the Man airport was one wounded and 10 rebels killed. French forces have since withdrawn from that region, although Ivorian government troops replaced on the afternoon of 1 December. However, the rebels who overran the city of 135,000 last week claimed that they still held Man. Local reports indicate that this rebel group includes both undisciplined, looting Ivorians and Liberians. Danane definately remains in rebel hands and they also knocked out a government BMP-2 Infantry Fighting Vehicle at Vavoua (500 kilometers northwest of Abidjan) on 30 November.

Late in the afternoon of 29 November, French peacekeeping troops in Ivory Coast came under rebel attack north of Bangolo. The next day, another patrol was fired on near Man's airport while they made preparations to evacuate 80 French nationals. In both cases, the French patrols returned fire and there were no casualties among their troops. The recently-appearing Movement for Peace and Justice (MPJ) is suspected of initiating these firefights. This same group also fought with government troops at Toulepleu (about 60 miles south of Danane, which was taken by the rebels on the 29th). The French have made it blatantly clear that attacks on their troops and nationals is not a reasonable idea. - Adam Geibel December 3, 2002: Renewed fighting in the civil war in the Ivory Coast could develop into a South African "battlefield", with mercenaries from that country fighting on both sides. Fighting troops loyal to President Laurent Gbagbo last month admitted that South African, French and Bulgarian soldiers are helping to train soldiers. The Liberians are reportedly providing air support and (with the help of an unknown number of South African mercenaries) lending expertise and training to the rebels.

The Ivory Coast government recruited 48 South Africa mercenaries last month, who are allegedly former members of the special forces, 32 Battalion, the Selous Scouts and ex-Zimbabwean soldiers. If accurate, some of these soldiers must be getting long-in-the-tooth. The contract soldiers will earn between $6 000 and $10 000 a month, on three-month renewable contracts.

An Ivorian military convoy of at least 60 vehicles that moved into Man on the 1st was supported by these mercenaries. A government Mi-24 helicopter, with some South Africans on board, crashed on that afternoon during a fight with rebel forces. It is not clear if the chopper was shot down, or what happened to the occupants.

Residents who had fled Man to safety said that government troops bombarded Man throughout the night. While Loyalists claimed to have begun mopping-up operations in Man on the 2nd, other witnesses saw both rebel and government troops in the town during the day. - Adam Geibel

December 5, 2002: Ivorian loyalist troops supported by mercenaries attacked the rebel-held border town of Toulepleu on 4 December. Neither side has shown an advantage in this battle yet.

Recent rebel attacks in the west had forced 30 Ivorian government soldiers to flee over the Liberia border and seek safety. All were were turned over to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and repatriated. Responding to Ivorian government and news wire reports, Liberia's Information Minister admitted that while it is possible that mercenaries from his country might be involved in the conflict, his government does not sanction them. Over 9,000 Liberian nationals had also fled the fighting and crossed the Liberia border, while another 1,900 civilians had crossed into Guinea on 30 November - 1 December.

The Ivory Coast's two new rebel groups - the Movement for Peace and Justice (MPJ) and the Ivorian Popular Movement of the Great West (MPIGO)- now say they want to join forces with the main rebel group, the Patriotic Movement of the Ivory Coast (MPCI.) A MPCI spokesman said that while they had not been contacted directly, the merger of the two new groups would strengthen the MPCI's negotiating hand in peace talks.

Meanwhile, French troops escorted another 27 foreign civilians out of Touba and moved them to safety in Daloa by late afternoon on 4 December, after a 12-hour, 190 mile trip. There had been no incidents with rebel forces on this mission. - Adam Geibel December 6, 2002 The Ivory Coast's nasty little war has taken a foul turn, with apparently heavy urban combat. Refugees fleeing Man told the press that there were hundreds of dead, most of them rebels recognizable by their distinctive yellow or black headbands. Residents said bodies were being collected and buried, but no official death toll has been given. Those slain earlier in the week are already starting to stink. Soldiers at a roadblock four miles south of the city admitted on the 5th that they were still hunting rebels in the city. A French expatriate who fled the city saw two loyalist Mi-24 helicopters, two "tanks" and heavy machine guns in action during fighting on the 1st.

There is a legitimate concern that atrocities committed earlier in other parts of the country will be repeated in Man. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) appealed to both rebels and loyalists in the Ivory Coast on 5 December to stop summary executions, and to treat wounded and captured combatants "with humanity." - Adam Geibel

December 7, 2002: French troops discovered a mass grave in rebel-held territory in northwestern Ivory Coast about 40 miles from the key town of Daloa, on the afternoon of 5 December. The French spokesman said the grave near Pelezi was "a mound 30 meters long and two meters high, from which bodies protruded." A villager who had led the French soldiers to the grave also pointed out a nearby well where there could be more bodies.

Ivory Coast Patriotic Movement (MPCI) rebel commander Zacharias Kone demanded an international inquiry. There are no details yet on how fresh the grave was, the number of dead or who the victims might be, but the MPCI claimed that government troops bombarded the nearby town on the night of 4 December, killing 12 civilians and wounding a similar number. The rebels allege that loyalists rounded up the Malian, Burkinabe and Nigerian expatriates, herded them to the sites and beat them before throwing them into the graves. Loyalists point out that the graves were found in an area controlled by rebels. - Adam Geibel

December 10, 2002: Ivory Coast suffers from a problem common in West Africa. In addition to the tribal loyalties, there are the religious differences. Moslems in the north, Christians in the south. The combination of tribal and religious loyalty requires little to set off a civil war. And that's what is happening in Ivory Coast. The government, controlled by Christian southerners, is invoking religious and tribal hatreds when recruiting southerners to put down the rebellion in the north. The rebels are largely driven by distrust of the southerners who are in charge, especially since northern politicians have, for decades had more power in the area. For centuries, the Moslems, bolstered by technology, weapons and a new religion brought by Moslem traders further to the north, had an edge over the southerners. Colonialism brought Christianity to the south, and a feeling that now it was the southerners turn.

December 11, 2002: Villagers in the Ivory Coast's western region said the recent massacre started when six trucks with military markings arrived on 27 November, carrying uniformed soldiers. Accusing villagers of feeding rebels, soldiers went house to house with a list of names rounding up cocoa and coffee field workers. Over 27-28 November, the soldiers shot some victims on the spot and gathered others for execution. The locals estimate 120 people were killed.

Another mass grave was discovered in Bouak, nearly 180 miles north of the commercial capital Abidjan, containing 86 bodies from the beginning of the revolt. The rebels had attacked the 3rd Gendarme Battalion's barrack and various police posts. Other civilians saw the rebels arbitrarily killing those who "took sides" at their roadblocks.

On 8 December, the government called for nearly 3,000 men between the ages of 20 and 26 in mostly pro-government Abidjan to volunteer for the army at their headquarters on the 10th. What good these untrained volunteers can do is debatable, since an Ivorian newspaper pointed out that there were too many aging soldiers holding non-commissioned rank and even went so far as to question whether they were up to the job. The Defense Minister has also admitted that only those units in the field are actually armed.

By 9 December, life was slowly returning to normal in Man. Loyalist troops were roaming the streets and local Red Cross representatives estimated that there were 150 bodies in the streets. However, other towns in the West were reportedly falling to various rebel factions.

Diplomacy is failing: on the 9th, the main rebel group threatened to abandon peace talks while Togo's president, Gnassingbe Eyadema, traveled to the Ivory Coast to meet President Gbagbo. On 6 December, Liberian President Charles Taylor urged that an African task force by immediately deployed in the Ivory Coast. - Adam Geibel December 13, 2002 On 11 December, 2002 Ivorian loyalist troops regained control of Blolekin, about 35 miles from the Liberian border. According to the local press, government-hired mercenaries also took part in the attack, which penetrated at least 35 miles into the area controlled by the MPIGO (Ivorian Peoples Movement for the Great West).

Meanwhile, the larger rebel group Ivory Coast Patriotic Movement (MPCI) said warned that France would incur the wrath of west African nations if it "involved itself in one way or another in the crisis." The warning came a day after France said it would reinforce its troops in Ivory Coast and offered to host a meeting of the belligerents to defuse the crisis. - Adam Geibel December 22, 2002: The situation in the Ivory Coast has turned sour for the government in mid-December. The first reports on 15 December were from a soldier who had escaped from the battle front. He reported that Biakouma and Semien, north-east of the town of Man, had been taken by two rebel groups and about 135 persons had been killed. Like many African wars, the Ivory Coast rebellion would involve forces hopping from town to town, since the population centers are islands of resources. The key to this war will be the economic center of Abidjan, a city of high-rises, highways, and international businesses, as well as one of Africa's most vital economic hubs and ports.

Rebel and loyalist troops in Man dueled with heavy artillery throughout the night of the 17th. By morning, the city of 135,000 had fallen to the rebels and France decided to send an additional 1,500 peacekeeping troops by the end of December. About 300 troops, light armor and helicopters boarded the military naval transport vessel Foudre at the Toulon naval base, in southern France.

Positively identified was the Foreign Legion's 1st Company/ 2nd Paratrooper Regiment, which was flown in to take up at positions on the Sassandra River near Guessabo, 37 miles west of Daloa. These Legionnaires set up posts armed with anti-tank missiles and rocket launchers, vowing to block any rebel attempt to cross the Sassandra and make a sprint for the commercial capital, Abidjan. The 150 paratroopers were also armed with a tough new mandate - to shoot anyone threatening their ability to enforce the ceasefire.

This is a new French tactic, since they swore off being Africa's policeman in the late 1990s. Prime Minister Lionel Jospin then ushered the ``ni-ni'' (neither-neither) policy for Africa: neither indifference, nor interference. In the case of the Ivory Coast, the stakes are too high to ignore: cocoa prices have been climbing sharply since the rebellion started and manufacturers promise a sharp spike for the New Year. Then again, there are also the largely unexploited oil fields just offshore.

Meanwhile Senegal has called on the United Nations to intervene in the war and is irked at the French government, for not allowing it's 600 troops on standby since late November to enter the embattled country. Senegal currently holds the rotating presidency of a 15-nation ECOWAS west African bloc, and does not like being slighted.

The rebels claim that they know the local terrain well enough not to be obliged to pass through Duekoue (which is only 55 miles south of Man) to get to Abidjan.

Ivorian Popular Movement of the Far West (MPIGO) rebels overran Bangolo, about 25 miles from Man, on the 20th after encountering virtually no loyalist resistance. In Dakar, Senegal, opposition leader Alassane Ouattara joined the rebels for the first time in demanding that President Gbagbo end the crisis by stepping down.

French troops exchanged fire with advancing rebels near the western town of Douekoue on the 21st, using their light armored vehicle cannon on targets while a truck-borne mortar unit set up near a school. The rebels took the town of Blodi, just outside Duekoue, which straddles a secondary road that would allow them skirt French positions and push on to Abidjan. Loyalist forces initially fled, leaving 40 French troops posted near Blodi to face a rapidly-approaching convoy of rebels in pickup trucks and other vehicles.

The French fired one warning round, quickly followed by a second and when the rebels responded with assault rifle fire, French forces blasted the lead rebel vehicle with rounds from one of their light armored vehicles. French light armor also destroyed the next two pickup trucks. While light-arms fire drove back French troops attempting to inspect the destroyed vehicles, they saw one body and one rocket launcher. Soldiers think four to seven other rebels were killed, but their bodies were taken away by comrades.

While the Far West Ivory Coast People's Movement (MPIGO) end-run was stopped and no French soldiers were wounded, the Ivory Coast Patriotic Movement (MPCI) claimed that the action against the MPIGO unit clearly showed that the forces of the former colonial power were "exceeding their mandate and acting like real conquering forces of occupation". Could this be MPCI's excuse to join the fight against the French? - Adam Geibel December 27, 2002: The light armored unit has apparently arrived just in time. Between 14.00 and 14.30, a French patrol was attacked by 30 to 40 rebels just north of Duekoue on the road to Bangolo. The French unit extricated itself with the help of it's own 81mm mortars, without suffering casualties. Due to heavy vegetation, it was impossible to estimate rebel casualties - although the rebels did fall back to the North. The French presence around Duekoue is vital, since it's not only a crossroads but also a gathering place for refugees. About 24,000 displaced civilians from across western part of the country have sought shelter in and around the town. MPCI faction rebels also allegedly attacked a government position in Prikro, a town east of the rebel stronghold Bouake. French troops enforcing a fragile cease-fire confirmed the clash but said there were no losses.

A 19.00-to-dawn curfew in the main city of Abidjan was also extended the same day, further strangling the economic center. Once known as "Paris Of West Africa" that now lies only 150 miles from the front lines. Policemen stand watch at roadblocks while smoke from burning immigrant shanties drifts across the city are indicators of an environment not conducive to business.

A United Nations human rights mission met with representatives of civil society and women's organizations, human rights experts and the diplomatic corps on 26 December. The UN representatives had arrived earlier in the week, to assess the human rights situation behind what has become a civil war. Government goon squads are apparently just as prevalent as rebel thugs. Villagers in Blolekin, a cocoa center 90 miles from the Liberian border, were murdered by Liberian-backed rebels. More rebels had prevented workers from going to their cocoa plantations, looted villages, wrecked homes and shops, then fled with cars and cocoa trucks to the border.

Reporters have been told about death squads in Abidjan coming in the night, taking away politicians, merchants, and opposition party leaders. On the night of 24 December, ten men in fatigues in an armored vehicle belonging to the riot police arrived at Abidjan's Lama Fofana High School, which apparently was suspected of being a rebel hide-out. They promptly set fire to a Volkswagen auto, three computers, 600 desks and 60 classrooms.

However, another counterbalance to these lawless elements is waiting in the wings.

The Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) initially agreed on September 29 to send a force with contingents from Senegal, Ghana, Togo, Niger and Benin. Both sides claim to want to work things out diplomatically, but negotiations have stalemated in Lagos. President Gbagbo has sent a 10-point plan to the mediator of the peace talks, but the draft copy of the plan apparently addresses only a few of the rebels' core demands. - Adam Geibel December 28, 2002: While the rest of African is quietly reloading during this season of Peace, the civil war in the Ivory Coast continues to simmer. At Abidjan, they landed 300 additional French troops with about 20 trucks, a dozen jeeps, more than 30 light armored vehicles and five helicopters. The reinforcements had just made the 10-day journey from Toulon aboard the Landing Platform Dock Ship "Foudre" and would immediately join the Peacekeeping Force. In addition to French Marine battalions, there are elements of the 2nd Dragoon Regiment, 8th Paratrooper Regiment and the 2nd Foreign Legion Paratrooper Regiment involved in "Operation Licorne".

December 29, 2002: Far West Ivorian Popular Movement [MPIGO] rebels clashed with a 2nd Foreign Legion Paratrooper Regiment outpost north west of Duekoue. Fire from 81mm mortars and three Sagaie wheeled armored vehicles drove the rebels off after 30 seconds, without casualties on either side. It was the second clash in two days.

A rebel leader soon apologized for the clashes and claimed that the French were fired on by mistake, but also accused them of tolerating government mercenaries in Duekoue. He swore that there were no Ivorian soldiers in the town, only hired fighters.

If rebel units can bypass Duekoue, their path to the coast would be open and the situation could get even uglier. A large French community lives in San Pedro, the country's second largest port where a good proportion of Ivory Coast's cocoa is shipped and an obvious rebel objective. - Adam Geibel December 31, 2002: The French peacekeepers' presence in the Ivory Coast cannot last forever and the longer the crisis lasts, the greater the hatred becomes between the different ethnic groups along the cease-fire line. Like a cop involved in a domestic dispute, the French are turning from the problem-solvers to the focus of that hatred. Putting an all-African peacekeeping force between the combatants will allow the diplomats more time to work out their issues, but the question remains "are the Africans up to the job"?

The Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) has been preparing a 1,500-strong regional peacekeeping force, but they are already running into problems. The first 100 troops had been due to land on 30 December, with most of the units expected in-country around 10 January 2003. However, there was the last minute change was due to "communication difficulties," the first batch of 50 to 60 troops will not arrive until 3 January.

There have been other organizational hang-ups. Despite Gambia's willingness to provide an infantry company, some of the Francophone members have showed reluctance to have the former English colony's troops on the job. French foot-dragging has irritated Senegal, but the Senegalese simply put 650 of their troops on alert for Ivory Coast duty anyway. A bold move has to be made by someone soon, or the rebels will wind up getting into a serious fight with the French.

January 2, 2003 Relations between the French peacekeeping force and the Ivorian Army were further strained when an Mi-24 gunship strafed civilians in the village of Menakro on 31 December. French troops at Beoumi said that the 11 villagers killed and unknown number wounded "were shot at as though they were rabbits." The fishing village, about 100 kilometers north of the capital of Yamoussoukro, sits on the shores of a large inland lake is also 40 kilometers behind the ceasefire line monitored by the French. The lakeside village is about 65 kilometers west of the rebel stronghold of Bouake, as well as an important ferry crossing between eastern and western Ivory Coast.

MPIGO rebels and Liberia looters also crossed over from Liberia early on 1 January and took everything of value not nailed down at an oil palm plantation near the village of Neka, 200 kilometers from the port of San Pedro. Many plantations in the cocoa-growing far west of Ivory Coast have been abandoned, where 40 percent of the world's supply of the cocoa beans are harvested. The Liberians have been having a field day of violence with the Burkina Fasian farmers in the area, stealing and killing at will. When government forces and foreign mercenaries recaptured Blolekin earlier in December, the rebels scattered into the bush and stopped farmers going to their plantations.

Diplomatically, this the country is stuck in a 'one step forward, two steps back' loop. President Gbagbo promised to win the war in his New Year's message of "lay down your arms and then we can talk", the day after the French had held peace talks with the rebels (who had even apologized for shooting at the peacekeepers).

One bright spot was the rebels' release of American doctor William Foster, two French nationals, two Canadians and one Lebanese. Foster is a Lutheran doctor from a Missouri-based missionary order who was pressed into service by the MPIGO rebels to treat their wounded in late November.

He had called authorities in mid-December, using a rebel phone, from the rebel-held western town of Toulepleu on the Liberian border (about 300 miles northwest of Abidjan).

An Abidjan newspaper had claimed that the State Department had decided to dispatch intervention forces stationed in Ghana, since the crisis broke out, to go in and look for Reverend Foster. The State Department also supposedly pressured the US ambassador to make the necessary contacts with both the government and the rebel groups, and tell them to either find the missing Baptist missionary or face American troops. Whether this was just typical wartime hyperbole, a planted story or just dumb luck, Foster was shaken loose. The six hostages were freed on 30 December. - Adam Geibe

January 4, 2003 According to President Gbagbo, the last government-hired mercenaries will leave the Ivory Coast on 4 January. French foreign minister de Villepin, would also be leaving Abidjan the same day, after a 48-hour visit. At a joint news conference, both men told the press that the faltering peace process would gain a new lease of life and Gbagbo vowing to rein in government forces.

That same day, 28 peacekeeping troops from Benin, Ghana and Togo arrived at Abidjan airport, and a flight carrying 21 Senegalese soldiers arrived about 45 minutes later. The rebels have also hinted that they would not immediately launch an attack on key positions, giving France a chance to first intervene. With so much love suddenly in the air, the French government announced that they would host a conference in Paris on settling the crisis on 15 January 2003. - Adam Geibel

January 7, 2003 Another cease-fire in the Ivory Coast evaporated on 6 January, when a rebel splinter faction opposed to the 17 October ceasefire attacked French troops for three hours. A group of about 40 rebels armed with mortars attacked a French position north of Duekoue on the road to the rebel-held city of Man (100 km away). Another group of 30 simultaneously attacked a French outpost northeast of Duekoue on a dirt road to Blodi. The French counterattacked, but the rebels recovered their injured and dead as they retreated. When the smoked cleared at around 14:00, there were 30 dead rebels and nine wounded French soldiers. French sources were initially unsure of which of the three rebel groups the splinter dissidents belonged to, but MPIGO leader SGT Felix Doh claimed responsibility for the attacks.

MPIGO also took the town of Grabo on the 4th, when government troops fled before them without a fight. A local civilian claimed that this rebel group included "several English speakers" (most likely Liberians) and that looting was widespread. The Liberian fighters are notorious for drug use and extreme violence. The government tried to claim that their troops had been battling Liberian raiders, but had beaten them back. Grabo is 200 km south of Duekoue and less than 100 km from the port city of San Pedro (where 2,200 refugees are taking shelter and a large French expatriate community lives). The UNHCR also reported that 32,800 Liberians and 20,800 Ivorians refugees had been registered at various border posts in Liberia.

Things were looking so much better for the French on the 4th. They had managed to get the main rebel group, the Ivory Coast Patriotic Movement (MPCI) and the Ivorian government to agree to a handshake ceasefire. The amphibious assault ship Foudre had also left Ghana's Tema Harbor for Abidjan, with that country's peacekeeping contingent on board. - Adam Geibel

January 9, 2003 Rebel leader sergeant Felix Doh claimed that Ivorian government helicopter gunships attacked his forces at Grabo on the morning of 9 January. A French unit at Pont-Yaka (30 miles south of Grabo) confirmed fighting in the region, but said it was taking place at Olodio, a village 12 miles south of Grabo.

The Ivory Coast's two western rebel groups - Doh's Popular Movement of Ivory Coast's Far West (MPIGO) and the Movement for Justice and Peace (MJP) - had just signed a truce with French troops in Duekoue on the 8th and promised to attend peace talks scheduled to take place in Paris next week. However, both groups had also pointed out that they were not signing anything with the Ivorian government. After the attack, Doh said he still planned to attend the meeting and had dutifully reported it to the French army.

The talks are due to start on the 15th and appear to be the only hope for ending the war, short of wholesale French retaliation. Former prime minister Alassane Ouattar's opposition party Rally of Republicans has been keeping a low profile, since all of its top leadership are in France. Meanwhile, President Gbagbo pleaded for peace in a 8 January newspaper interview and said he would even consider an amnesty for some of the rebel leadership.

The French are particularly concerned with their expatriate community in the port city of San Pedro (368 km southwest of Abidjan) which has become the latest transit town for thousands of refugees. The city normally has 430,000 residents and it's local curfew was just extended, from 9 PM to 7 PM overnight to 6 AM. About 400,000 civilians have fled the central and northern regions towards the south, while an estimated 60,000 to 100,000 have left the western town of Man and sought refuge in towns like Daloa, Duekoue, Bouafle, Issia and others in the western region. Another 140,000 mainly west African migrants workers had crossed the border into Burkina Faso, Ghana, Guinea, Liberia and Mali. The United Nations agencies in the commercial capital of Abidjan want to set up a civil-military cell in the city "as soon as funds are available".

While the Ivorian government claims that Burkina Faso masterminded the rebellion and that notoriously uncontrollable Liberian fighters are involved in the west, there is the lingering suspicion that someone outside of the immediate area is instigating the constant clashes. If so, the most likely suspect would be Libya. - Adam Geibel

January 14, 2003 Leaders of all three Ivorian rebel groups left for the Paris peace talks on 14 January, traveling through Senegal so that they could lunch with President Wade (who currently chairs ECOWAS). The day before, the Ivory Coast's government had signed a ceasefire with both the MPJ and MPIGO rebel groups in Lome, Ghana. The Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) was also a signatory to this ceasefire, which took effect at midnight. The Patriotic Movement of Ivory Coast (MPCI) rebel leaders had already signed a ceasefire on 17 October.

Meanwhile, the French warship Orage took on 179 Senegalese soldiers with their vehicles and equipment and moved them to Ivory Coast , to join a 24-man advance team who had been in-country the beginning of January. Another "support group" of about 40 Senegalese troops followed by air.

Meanwhile, the UN Refugee agency (UNHCR) has urged the government to stop recruiting Ivorian youths from amongst the crowds of refugees, since they become somewhat overenthusiastic militiamen. In the same letter, the UNHCR asked that Liberian refugees be allowed passage through the checkpoints manned by pro-government Ivorian youth groups. - Adam Geibel

January 15, 2003 The Ivory Coast's new Prime Minister, Seydou Diarra, is visiting Accra (Ghana), where he is scheduled to meet with the three Ivorian rebel movements - MPCI (Patriotic Movement of the Ivory Coast), MPIGO (Ivorian Peoples Movement for the Great West) and the MPJ (Movement for Peace and Justice).

The humanitarian situation in the Ivory Coast is extremely serious and could deteriorate even further. The western part of country, along the Liberian border, remains a lawless and violent place. A UN representative reported that "Liberian militias were running rampant and drugged kids with guns were committing every kind of atrocity possible." Loyalist and rebel forces clashed along Liberian border at Toulepleu (about 15 km inside the border) on 11-12 February. Even in Government-controlled areas, life was not easy for Ivoirians. The UN claims that the government had authorized attacks on shantytowns, as well as harassment by police and young vigilantes. - Adam Geibel

January 16, 2003 While French and ECOWAS peacekeepers were building up strength in the Ivory Coast and the leadership of all three rebel groups were meeting with government representatives in Paris for peace talks, rouge elements back in the jungle have rekindled their mischief-making.

About 40 MPIGO and MPJ rebels with mortars, heavy machine-guns and rocket-propelled grenades attacked government positions in the western town of Blolequin on 16 January. There were no casualties in the army's ranks, although MPIGO leader Felix Doh claimed that it was actually government troops who attacked his men. Heavy artillery fire was heard near the town of Toulepleu, close to the Liberian border and almost 90km south of French positions around Danane. News of the fighting also caused the price of cocoa to jump 3.7% in the London markets.

The Ivorian government wants to work closer with their Liberian counterparts, to extradite Liberian mercenaries involved in the civil war. Sam Bokarie (alias General Mosquito), former commander of the defunct Sierra Leonean Revolutionary United Front (RUF), has surfaced in the Ivory Coast fighting alongside western rebels and looting vehicles that are being sold in the Liberian capital Monrovia. While most politicians claim to have no idea how Bokarie got to the Ivory coast, the Ivorian government is charging that he arrived thanks to an international conspiracy through neighboring Burkina Faso. However, the lawless elements aren't restricted to the country's west. In MPCI-controlled territory, armed men ransacked Guinea's consular office in Bouake on the 11th.

January 20, 2003 The Ivory Coast's assorted rebel groups might have finally gone too far. Liberia accused Liberian rebels and mercenaries "fighting alongside Ivory Coast government troops" of attacking and seizing the border town of Beam. However, all known accounts have armed Liberians fighting on the side of Ivory Coast's rebels, rather than the government. Liberian defense officials claim that Ivory Coast government militiamen also came to the border at least twice last week, to warn that they would attack Liberia if they did not stop fighting alongside the rebels in Ivory Coast.

Refugees from Danane and Man who fled over the border into Guinea say that armed groups in the far west of Ivory Coast have been robbing, raping and attacking civilians. Meanwhile, the main rebel group the Patriotic Movement of Ivory Coast (MPCI) plans to have a protest march in Abidjan, although the Ivorian government has stated that they will prevent any such demonstrations. The MPCI claimed that its top man in Abidjan, Ange Felix Kouassi, was detained by police on the 19th.

Liberia is rife with problems that may infect it's neighbors. On January 12, unidentified armed fighters (some dressed in military attire and others in 'T' shirts, all believed to be LURD rebels) from neighboring Liberia infiltrated Sierra Leoneon territory and attack a number of towns and villages near Buedu. A three-hour long battle between the marauders and the army left two soldiers and an unknown number of invaders dead. - Adam Geibel

Until diplomats can work things out, the Government must hide behind a cordon of peacekeepers and keep it's ports open, so that the cocoa crop can go out to the world's markets. There are five times as many troops at San Pedro now, under an agreement with the shipping companies to ensure that they can continue to export the cocoa.

On 13 January, world market cocoa prices fell near to a two-week low as the cease-fire reduced concern of a disruption to exports. As an example of the sort of money that can be made manipulating the cocoa market, cocoa for March delivery fell $78 (or 3.6%) to $2,077 a metric ton (the lowest closing price for a most-active contract since 31 December 2002). Prices had risen by more than a fifth in the last six weeks of 2002 and had remained 53 percent higher than levels in early 2002. - Adam Geibel

January 29, 2003 President Laurent Gbagbo returned overnight on the 27th, after approving a peace deal in Paris that sparked massive anti-French protests back home. The protests started on the 25th, after Gbagbo named former diplomat Seydou Diarra as his country's new consensus prime minister. Diarra, a neutral figure who has held the post before in Ivory Coast, was tasked with heading an inclusive national unity reconciliation government.

The crowd, angry at the concept of France dictating Ivorian politics, had appeared each day since then. They dispersed for awhile after Gbagbo appealed for calm on the 26th. Protesters armed with sticks, machetes and makeshift weapons set bonfires outside the French embassy and lobbed burning tires and metal objects inside the compound. French soldiers backed by Puma helicopters, fired stun grenades to disperse the mob lapping at the embassy walls.

The rioters also attacked French-owned businesses, including the main office of flagship carrier Air France, several offices of the French mobile telephone firm Orange and demonstrated in front of a French military garrison near the airport in Abidjan, the country's economic hub. Traffic was hindered by massive roadblocks of burning tires.

Meanwhile, unscrupulous elements are exploiting the chaos. The Ivorian military reported that unidentified armed men of staging a bloody attack on their forces in the western town of Toulepleu at 14.00 on the 23rd. The government claimed to have killed 25 of the 400 to 500 attackers, mostly Liberian mercenaries. They admitted losing four dead and 15 wounded, but captured a notable number of weapons. MPIGO rebel chief Sergeant Felix Doh "categorically" denied that his men were in any way involved in the Toulepleu attack.

The French also killed eight to ten unidentified attackers on the 22nd, when they repulsed a ten-minute assault on their positions at Duekoue. Duekoue has been the scene of four earlier clashes between the rebels and French soldiers. - Adam Geibel

January 30, 2003 The Ivory Coast's armed forces, police, customs and other security services have refused to accept President Gbagbo's Paris peace talks promise to include the rebels in key interior and defense ministries. The Italian Catholic MISNA reported that three MPCI (Patriotic Movement of the Ivory Coast) commanders were captured in Sakassou (around 220 kilometers north of the capital) and later executed in the rebel capital Bouak. They were the commanders of the three main road blocks along the routes into Bouak, but it remains unclear whether the motive behind the executions was an internal MPCI power struggle or MPCI "house cleaning" in an effort to conform to the Paris peace agreement.

Unrest in the capital, Abidjan, continues, with the fear that the youth protests could turn into a 'witch hunt' of French nationals. Abidjan airport was still closed and Air France has temporarily suspended flights to the Ivory Coast. One oddity of the continuing protests have been the pro-American, anti-French sentiments expressed by the crowds. To the echoes of "goooooooood morning America" outside Abidjan's US embassy, youths waved placards saying: "Like Judas, France has betrayed Ivory Coast," "Down with France, long live the US" and "No more French, from now on we speak English. US Marines prudently stood guard on the embassy's roof until afternoon, when the crowd dispersed.

Meanwhile, calm had returned to Agboville, a town about 80 kilometers north of the capital. On the afternoon of the 28th, ethnic Abbeys, a Christian minority in the town despite being dominant in the region, tried to attack Agboville's main mosque. The attack was rebuffed by Dioulas, an ethnic group from the predominantly Muslim north, but sparked a wave of violence in which both sides are said to have used locally manufactured guns. Between eight and ten people were killed, with 30 injured. Several shops were burnt or pillaged and a church was razed. However, Agboville was tense with security forces keeping watch, since there were also reports that the men from the surrounding Abbey villages were preparing to advance on Agboville. - Adam Geibel

January 31, 2003 Violent clashes broke out on the morning of the 30th at the Ivory Coast's international airport between French troops and hundreds of supporters of the Ivorian President. About 5,000 protesters massed at the airport by midmorning, and numbers of them held the tarmac for about 45 minutes. The crowd had stormed the tarmac and taunting French passengers trying to escape, injuring at least two French soldiers with rocks. When Ivorian troops could not control the situation, heavily armed French forces in armored vehicles and helicopters then took the airport.

While France is ready to evacuate all of its nationals, the role of French peacekeeping troops might expand. President Charles Taylor returned from the Paris peace talks to disclose that peacekeeping troops would also be deployed on the Liberian side of the border. ECOWAS and United Nations troops would also be accepted. - Adam Geibel

February 5, 2003 The UN has authorized French and ECOWAS peacekeepers (when they arrive) to use force to protect civilians.

February 7, 2003 The UN has ordered "non-essential" staff out of the country because of continuing violence. The World Bank soon followed, with both organizations sending over a thousand foreign staff out of the country.

February 9, 2003 Another 450 French soldiers arrived, along with 190 gendarmerie (police), which brings the French armed strength to some 3,000 men. The French troops arrived via commercial flights, with their weapons and equipment coming via military transports.

One of the principal leaders of the violent, pro-government protests against the peace deal, has now agreed to back the French brokered arrangement. He has also agreed that rebel leaders be allowed to join the new government.

Rebel leaders have arrived in the capital, but not allowed yet to take up their government jobs, as specified in the peace deal. The rebels have threatened to resume fighting, and take control of the non-Moslem southern half of the country, if the southerners do not abide by the terms of the peace deal.

France is evacuating any of the 16,000 French citizens in the country that wants to go.

February 19, 2003 Starting at around 7 AM, MPCI forces with machetes raided towns in central Ivory Coast. According to a local Catholic priest, the rebels looted and killed. Several people were beheaded, while others had their hands and feet amputated. Although the MPCI claimed that it knew of no clashes near the central sugar-growing town of Zuenoula, villagers who fled the surrounding countryside also confirmed the attack. Zuenoula is about 300 km northwest of the economic capital Abidjan.

MPCI rebels then engaged the army with RPGs, mortars and Kalachnikovs. The Ivorian military forces responded with heavy artillery. Helicopters then backed ground troops as the army launched what it described as a mopping-up operation. The army admitted that they lost one soldier killed and 12 wounded during the rebel assault. The government has urged the population to not remain in the villages and in the country side but instead to find shelter in the cities and to remain at home. - Adam Geibel

February 28, 2003 Rebel MPIGO leader Felix Doh claimed that Ivorian army helicopters had attacked the town of Bin Houye. The attack near the southern limit of MPIGO-controlled territory killed about 20 civilians and wounded many others. Doh said that he had "given orders to take the offensive... once helicopters start bombarding, I think the ceasefire is over". The MPCI will not join the national unity government, unless it is given the top positions in the interior and defense ministries (which it has claimed it was promised under the earlier Marcoussis accord). Two platoons of the Liberians United for Reconciliation (LURD) rebel group attacked Toe Town (inside Liberia) on February 27. They were allegedly armed and supported by the Ivorian government, having just fought alongside Ivorian troops against their rebels.

Also at the end of February, Amnesty International reported that the MPCI had executed about 60 gendarmes and 50 of their children, when they took over the town of Bouake in October 2002. Some of the victims were executed in a military prison while others were killed at the site of a mass grave after being made to bury their comrades. These killings may have been a retaliation for gendarme atrocities allegedly committed a year prior.

The war in the Ivory Coast could take an uglier turn, if the catalyst behind the fighting turns from economic and political disenfranchisement to religious zealotry. While the sides have been divided between the traditionally Islamic north and the Christian south, the fighting hasn't become a crusade - yet. However, the country's most prominent Muslim cleric was claiming that his people have been targeted by state-backed "death squads", who have unleashed a reign of terror. The Ivory Coast plans to file a suit at the International Criminal Court (ICC) for a fresh probe into mass killings. - Adam Geibel

March 4, 2003 A national unity government in the Ivory Coast is supposed to take over on March 10, but defense officials on both sides of the Liberian border reported renewed fighting as proxy groups attacked small towns. The Ivorian army made an "appropriate response" on March 1 to an attack by "mostly English-speaking enemy forces" near Toulepleu, some 20 km south of Bin-Houye. This is a dangerous development, since the Liberian government has ordered the full redeployment of troops withdrawn from the area several months ago. The Liberians have also not ruled out sending troops into the Ivory Coast to deal with the invaders. United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan also noted that Liberian rebels could engulf the whole of West Africa in an economic and humanitarian crisis.

March 8, 2003 French troops repulsed attacks by small swarms of rebels in western Ivory Coast, only hours after the warring factions signed a deal in Ghana to try to end the Ivory Coast's civil war. The French army said that groups of 15 rebels tried to punch through onto the main highway in the west, between Duekoue (towards a strategic river crossing) and the cocoa center of Daloa.

All of the rebel efforts were repulsed and two French soldiers were lightly wounded. During the afternoon, about 50 French military vehicles (including nearly 30 armored personal carriers) headed toward the western front on the road between Guessabo and Daloa. French troops backed by at least four Gazelle helicopters running reconnaissance flights cleared the area around Duekoue while Ivorian troops maintained positions in the town.

The rebels claim that their attacks were a reaction to a Liberian "Lima Force" rebels (now based in Ivory Coast) attacked their positions in the western town of Bangolo on the 7th. The rebels wanted revenge against the Ivorian army, but the French army got in between. The French army detained about 110 men with guns and about 60 civilians fleeing from Bangolo into Duekoue that night. The detainees appeared to be Liberian members of the Lima Force.

Trouble for the French began brewing up earlier in the week. On March 5, the "Young Patriots" (supporters of President Gbagbo) ordered Ivorians to attack and burn any French military vehicles patrolling in Abidjan that are not accompanied by an Ivorian Army officer. This stemmed from a March 4 pro-government newspaper report that a rebel attack on Ivorian army positions at Zuenoula was preceded by French scouts and helicopter overflights. The Ivorians considered these actions direct aid to the rebels. The newspaper reported that the rebels suffered 'several dozen' casualties and even the French lost 46 troops killed, at the cost of one government soldier wounded. While presumably complete fiction, this is the 'truth' that at least half of the country is being fed by elements of their government.

Another newspaper noted almost daily confrontations between the French and the army, government security forces or civilians. One example was at 7 AM on March 3, when a patrol of 15 Frenchmen in two armored vehicles and a jeep attracted the attention of some villagers. The locals objected to the French moving through their community, without reason or justification. When confronted with questions about burying weapons (presumably for rebel use later), the French reacted with scorn. The locals set up road blocks, demanded the French dismount and then deflated their tires. When one of the Frenchmen pushed an old woman, fistfights broke out. The village's mayor and the Abidjan District governor were forced to board the French vehicles and spend nearly two hours calming the crowd down. - Adam Geibel

March 9, 2003 The rebel MPCI group has been training a special unit called 'Warriors of the Light'. They supposedly muster 1,000 soldiers, most of them traditional Dozo hunters from the north (and known for their "magical" power).

The Ivory Coast's Ambassador to Iran described potential bilateral economic agreements as "favorable" and called for expansion of cooperation in various economic sectors. Considering that the northern rebels are primarily Muslims, this is an interesting development. - Adam Geibel

March 13, 2003 The Ivory Coast's new power-sharing coalition formed up for the first time, but the rebels and the country's main opposition party did not attend a first cabinet meeting. The rebels did not attend for "logistical reasons", but accused President Gbagbo of trying to impose his choices on them. They also said they were not putting into question the new government and would attend future cabinet meetings.

One week after the disruption of water supplies and electricity services to much of southwestern Ivory Coast, sanitary conditions for tens of thousands of displaced people living in makeshift camps are degrading rapidly. - Adam Geibel

March 16, 2003 ECOWAS force commander General Fall proposed increasing the size of the regional military mission in the Ivory Coast from 1,264 to 3,411. This will enable ECOWAS to cope with the additional responsibilities imposed by the Marcoussis accord and the United Nations Security Council Resolution 1464.

The day before, French troops handed over a frontier military post to West African ECOWAS peace keepers. The ECOWAS force has troops soldiers from Benin, Niger, Ghana, Senegal and Togo. - Adam Geibel

March 17, 2003 The war is bad for business, wreaking havoc on local companies now faced with closure if the borders do not open up soon. Local firms have lost an estimated $228 million in earnings since the start of the war on September 19, 2002. Road links between Ivory Coast, its neighbors and the vast hinterland have been cut since then (except for the road linking it to its eastern neighbor Ghana). Outgoing trans-border commercial traffic using the remaining land route has plummeted, from an average of 250 vehicles daily to about 20 at present.

Lucrative markets in landlocked Burkina Faso and Mali are also gone, since they sealed their borders with Ivory Coast. Niger is also cut off. Many countries depending mainly on goods shipped through the Ivory Coast city of Abidjan (West Africas second port) have turned towards other ports in Benin and Ghana. The Ivory Coast, once a former jewel in Frances African empire hailed as a model of free enterprise, has also been crippled by the flood of foreign workers fleeing the country. - Adam Geibel

March 19, 2003 The Ivory Coast's army chief General Doue has stated that there will be no military coup like that in the Central African Republic. Some Ivorian newspapers earlier accused Doue of plotting a coup in January to coincide with peace talks in France. Meanwhile, the rebel factions were meeting in Bouake, trying to agree a common position ahead of a second attempt to unite all of the country's factions in a power-sharing government.

An even deadlier problem in the Ivory Coast is also being addressed. About one million of the Ivory Coast's 16 million residents are HIV-positive, so the United Nations has slated $155 million for the country over the next five years to fight the AIDS pandemic. - Adam Geibel

March 24, 2003 With the arrival of a final group of 35 Senegalese peacekeepers, the ECOWAS force (known as ECOFORCE) reached its prescribed strength of 1264. A Ghanaian contingent took over from the French on March 15 at Bondoukou. The French forces will be stationed behind their ECOWAS counterparts. - Adam Geibel

March 25, 2003 The Ivory Coast's military accused MPIGO and MJP rebel groups apparently high "on alcohol and drugs" of killing 42 civilians in a village near the Liberian border, but there was no independent confirmation of the claim. French military peacekeepers positioned in the western town of Duekoue said two fleeing villagers had reported that "things could have been happening near Bangolo".

March 26, 2003 Ivory Coast President Gbagbo signed a decree naming the interim defense and interior ministers in a unity government aimed at ending a ruinous rebel war. Meanwhile, 14 suspected pro-government fighters who had been in French custody escaped during an anti-French rally by 5,000 to 6,000 members of the 'Young Patriot' movement in the western town of Daloa.

March 28, 2003 Over the last four days, ECOFORCE contingents from Benin, Niger, Senegal and Togo have taken over from French troops along the 600-km buffer zone line, which stretches from the area around Bondoukou (close to the border with Ghana) to the Sassandra River in the western part of the country.

The United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) claims that "near catastrophic conditions prevail" in the north-eastern part of the country, and that a convoy of relief supplies has been dispatched to the area. Saudi Arabia's ambassador to Cote d'Ivoire, Mohammed Ahmad al-Rasheed, was found dead two floors down from his Adibjan apartment. The circumstances surrounding his death were not immediately clear.

March 29, 2003 Ivorian police dispersed a morning demonstration in Abidjan by about 500 people protesting rebel atrocities during the civil war. The police used tear gas and repeatedly charging the crowd. Tension remains high in Abidjan, where some demonstrators set up barricades on the streets after pulling back from clashes with police.

April 2, 2003 MPCI rebels clashed with ECOMICI and government troops near Daloa at around 1:00 GMT, but met heavy resistance from the ECOMICI troops and were forced to retreat. While retreating, they ran into an Ivorian army unit lost 10 men. The army claimed to have only suffered three men wounded. The West African troops were also attacked by rebels on March 30. - Adam Geibel

April 6, 2003 The Patriotic Movement of Ivory Coast (MPCI) has insisted things are looking up in Korhogo, the main town within their area of control the Ivory Coast's north. The rebels regularly air warnings on a private local radio and television channel such as the blunt message: "For all thieves who are caught, a bullet in the hand and one in the head." - Adam Geibel

April 8, 2003 MPIGO rebels claimed that the army pounded the western town of Danane with two Mi-24 "Hind" gunships, killing 35 to 40 civilians and destroying six trucks. Danane is a key base for the insurgents and the gunships piloted by experienced mercenaries are the most potent weapon in the loyalist arsenal. - Adam Geibel

April 9, 2003 Due to the alleged helicopter attack, the three allied rebel factions have put on hold plans for their ministers to start working in the coalition government. The Liberian government also dismissed the Global Witness environmental group report that Monrovia has sent mercenaries to Ivory Coast and uses logging revenues to finance regional destabilization. - Adam Geibel

April 10, 2003 The MPCI rebels claimed that the government would use Mi-24 gunships stationed at Bondoukou and mercenary pilots to attack their units at Bouna on the 11th. They also claimed that government ground units would attack MPIGO positions at Danane, Bin-Houye, and Zouan-Hounien. Government units had been put on full alert the day before.

On 2 April, the UK-based Private Military Company Northbridge Services (www.northbridgeservices.com) was accused by Foreign Secretary Jack Straw of recruiting British, South African, French and other ex-servicemen to serve in Ivorian government units. Northbridge rebutted that it offers a wide range of services for "legitimate governments", multinationals and aid groups. Northbridge pointed out that Mr Straw's comments came "as a great surprise when it was he that strongly supported the use of private military companies in a office Foreign and Commonwealth Office". Apparently, some contracts are more equal than others.

During the first week of April, diplomats in Ivory Coast's main city Abidjan heard rumors that more than 300 fresh mercenaries were to be hired and arrive in April.

White men with Slavic-sounding or South African accents have been seen at the best hotels, long after President Gbagbo's January 2003 promise to send mercenaries home. On March 31, the Ivorian opposition Le Patriote newspaper claimed that the state had hired 1,000 South Africans skilled in urban warfare through several South African companies. A spokesman for Gbagbo denied the paper's allegations. - Adam Geibel

April 12, 2003 At 1230, the government claimed that MPIGO, MJP and MPCI rebels attacked defense and security forces in Zuenoula. After two hours of heavy and light artillery exchange, the rebels were routed and only minimal damage was reported.

The MPCI claimed, in a letter to the UN, that the government was planning an offensive in the west. They gave details from two classified documents they apparently stole from Mi-24 pilots living in Abidjan. The attacks could only be launched after one week of rain had fallen, which would limit the rebels' ability to counter any moves.

The MI-24s would also be used in an attack on Bouake, the plan being to capture the town within five hours after the gunships strafed rebel positions from an altitude of 50 meters. The attack called for 1,500 seasoned government troops and 1,000 recruits, backed by whatever armored vehicles the government had and 12 South-African made armored vehicles. The rebels also listed recent munitions deliveries to the government: 500 AK47s and 100 GPMGs, along with a million cartridges, plus six 81mm mortars, 1,000 RPG7 rounds and 2,000 hand grenades. - Adam Geibel

April 14, 2003 Despite recent skirmishing, five of nine former rebels have taken up their ministerial posts in a new government of national reconciliation, following a weeks-long delay. The five are civilians, however, as the other four are probably exercising caution while bullets are still flying.

At 0300, about 500 rebels on 30 vehicles (including six vehicles equipped with 14.5 mm machine guns) coming from Danane attacked government forces at Binhoue. There was no initial casualty count. - Adam Geibel

April 15, 2003 The U.N. Security Council is holding consultations on the Ivory Coast and in an open letter to the United Nations Security Council, Human Rights Watch accused both the government and rebel groups of responsibility for serious human rights abuses against civilians in western Ivory Coast. They also noted that Liberian combatants are fighting on both sides. - Adam Geibel

April 16, 2003 Ivory Coast rebels said that government gunships were continuing to attack western rebel-controlled areas, killing nine people: six on the 15th and three on the 14th in the towns of Zouan-Hounien, Danane and Mahapleu. These towns are all close to Ivory Coast's border with Liberia.

Italian priests reported that on the afternoon of the 14th, two government helicopters attacked MPIGO posts in Zouan Houmien after the rebels apparently attempted to regain control of the town in a heavy offensive. They also reported that 14 civilians were wounded. - Adam Geibel

April 17, 2003 Rebel and government forces clashed in the central region of Monoko-Zohi, even as the country's new unity government and main insurgency called for an immediate end to hostilities. ECOWAS peacekeepers were dispatched to the scene that evening to investigate the incidents. The MPCI accused loyalist troops of attacking their positions in Monoko-Zohi and trying to get through to Vavoua, but the rebels claimed to have pushed them back to Belleville (30 kilometers from the cocoa-producing town of Daloa). The MPCI said it now had Belleville under control and an Ivorian army spokesman confirmed this claim. - Adam Geibel

April 26, 2003 MPIGO rebels learned that their leader, Felix Doh, had been killed the night before by foreign fighters who had laid an ambush for him. The MPCI had issued a statement saying Doh had been captured and executed in an ambush by Liberian soldiers fighting for the Ivorian government and by armed groups from Sierra Leone. The MPCI leader said that Doh's body and his bullet-riddled car had been found by rebel fighters during a mopping-up operation, following fighting with foreign forces resisting the attempts to disarm them.

Doh, who represented MPIGO at Ivory Coast peace talks in France in January, had a conversation with French journalists by satellite telephone that same day. He claimed that about a dozen of his bodyguards had been killed in Danane and his house ransacked during an attack by Sierra Leonean fighters. He also claimed to have been outside the Ivory Coast, in western Europe.

In the week prior, there had been incidents as MPCI rebels began an operation to disarm and repatriate Liberian combatants who had fought on their side. - Adam Geibel

April 28, 2003 The UN and other observers are left scratching their collective heads over who actually killed MPCI leader Felix Doh and what his death will mean for the Ivory Coast's nasty little civil war.

There had also been reports that Sam Bockarie, a former Revolutionary United Front (RUF) commander in Sierra Leone, had led the unit that kidnapped and killed Doh. Another MPCI member claimed that his death had been a settling of scores by others in the MPCI who suspected Doh of plotting against them.

Some locals expected that there'll be more scores settled, now that there is a power vacuum. Other rebels would want to use the opportunity to stop fighting or just do improve their own financial positions. - Adam Geibel

April 29, 2003 United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan appealed to the Security Council for $85 million in aid for Ivory Coast, to help 2.8 million civilians affected by the war. The UN estimates that there are 750,000 internally displaced people within the Ivory Coast, while an estimated 400,000 people have been forced to flee to five neighboring countries: Burkina Faso, Mali, Guinea, Liberia and Ghana. This was the UN's third appeal to donors for humanitarian assistance to the Ivory Coast. It had earlier sought a total of $22 million, of which only $9 million had been provided (mainly as food aid).

Kofi Annan claimed that another $47 million would be required to sustain the ECOFORCE peacekeeping troops for the next six months. Five foreign ministers from the Economic Community of West African States are on a tour begging pledges to bolster the force. During the ministerial delegation's first stop in Washington on the 28th, the United States pledged $4 million in addition to the $5 million it has already given to ECOWAS.

The council resolution drafted by France nearly four weeks ago that proposed a U.N. operation with 255 military and civilian staff has been stalled by U.S. objections to it's projected one-year cost of $27 million. The US sent the measure back to the U.N. peacekeeping department for budget trimming. Coincidentally, the peacekeeping planners are led by Frenchman Jean-Marie Guehenno and yet both U.S. and French diplomats insist the dispute has nothing to do with France's fight against U.N. approval for the invasion of Iraq. A legitimate American gripe might be that U.N. missions are typically ineffective and that only a fraction of each dollar gets up to the frontline, after all the leeches have had their turn siphoning off funds to line their private bank accounts.

ECOWAS wants to expand the current 1,200-strong peacekeeping force to 3,200 troops and the French already have up to 4,000 troops in-country. However, French General Emmanuel Beth has his troops arrayed behind the ECOFORCE outposts and has used the Sanssandra River to define the cease-fire line. Pro-government sources have noted that MPIGO rebels have crossed the Sanssandra several times and the French have done nothing but complain about government use of Mi-24 gunships (which some see as a case of 'sour grapes', since the Ivorians never bought the Puma gunships France offered them).

The French, never one to worry about local or even global public opinion when they can obfuscate the blame later on, have already alienated the southern Ivorians (remember the chanting demonstrators a few months ago lauding America and denigrating the French?). Whether true or not, the southern Ivorians' perception is that the French willingly aid the northern Islamic-oriented rebels and deliberately hamstring the Gbagbo government.

So are the French incapable or unwilling to solve the problems in the Ivory Coast? To a certain extent, they are incapable of solving the problem with the forces currently in-country. To shut down the rebels would require more political will-power and assets than they care to commit at this time, particularly for a population they probably perceive as a bunch of ingrates.

Furthermore, one has to consider France's goals for the region: to stabilize the area enough so that they can exert enough political control to have cheap access to the Ivory Coast's cocoa and - eventually - oil assets. However, they don't want to expend a lot of political or financial capital to achieve these goals.

As far as financing the ECOFORCE operations in their own African 'back yard', a perfect French strategy is to keep the rebels in check and let America, via the UN, foot the bill. If France does nothing, they can spin their role out on the world's stage as valiant martyrs. If America holds fast and demands that the French actually be responsible for the problems they allowed to fester, then America will look like the bad guy. - Adam Geibel

April 30, 2003 A Liberian military delegation flew into the Ivory Coast to discuss deploying a joint force, to try to stop the cross-border fighting. This force would cooperate with French and West African peacekeepers already on the ground. The deployment was decided at a weekend meeting by the leaders of the two states and represents something of a milestone, since the Liberian government says any Liberians fighting in Ivory Coast are mercenaries and the Ivory Coast has said Liberia's regular forces were helping the rebels. - Adam Geibel

May 2, 2003 The biggest clashes in the run-up to the ceasefire occurred during the evening at Zouan Hounien, a town 30km south of Danane. The army claimed that a rebel force of about 300 backed by armored cars attacked government positions there. Government forces also came under attack at Grabo, a border town 70km inland from the coast.

May 3, 2003 A ceasefire between Ivory Coast's armed forces and the three rebel movements came into force at midnight. The ceasefire pact covers the whole of the country, including the violent west and contains a clause that provides for the disarmament of both mercenaries and armed groups on both sides. Under the agreement, all parties also accepted the deployment from West African and about 900 peacekeeping troops from France. - Adam Geibel

May 5, 2003 The Ivory Coast's armed forces and three rebel groups in this troubled west African country have agreed to a weapon-free zone, where both sides could move freely without arms. Both the army and the rebels also agreed that French and West African peacekeepers should be free to move throughout the country. The West African peacekeeping force's spokesman said that the two sides had rejected the idea of a buffer zone and opted instead for a "zone of confidence." The actual boundaries of the zone will be figured out during an upcoming meeting on May 18 in Bouake, the headquarters of Ivory Coast's main rebel movement. - Adam Geibel

May 6, 2003 West African peacekeepers played down reports of fresh skirmishes, noting that it takes time for all of the remote groups to get the word about the new ceasefire and the Ivorian army was unaware of any fresh fighting.

A rebel spokesman said that government troops and foreign mercenaries attacked rebel positions in the villages near the country's western border with Liberia. The army spokesman was unaware of any fighting, counterclaiming that they had held those towns for so long that if there was fighting there, they must be attacking us. Rebel allegations couldn't be independently verified from the towns.

The rebels claim to have shown their commitment to peace by forcing their former foreign comrades back to Liberia. They are now demanding that the government must now get rid of their own allies, although the army has consistently denied having any Liberians on its side at all.

The government contends that renegade fighters still roam the lawless frontier. Officials claim that a joint military operation (including both the army and rebels, as well as French and West African peacekeepers) will soon be deployed to western Ivory Coast to enforce the cease-fire. - Adam Geibel

May 7, 2003 As an indicator that reconciliation may be a distant goal, West African peacekeepers were building a wall on the road outside Tiebissou to mark the demarcation line between government and rebel-controlled territory. The four foot high wall was one of seven under construction at peacekeeper checkpoints.

Those living in areas controlled by rebels say pensioners and civil servants have been unable to get at their money since the start of hostilities. Banks in the rebel-held north have been closed since September and the route to government held cities like the official capital Yamoussoukro and the coastal business center of Abidjan is clogged with roadblocks and checkpoints.

The local adult civilians are also worried that the longer the younger rebel recruits are allowed to taste the power they have during a war, the harder it will be to disarm them. Even if all sides stop skirmishing, there remain major unresolved questions to be solved before thousands of fighters will let themselves be disarmed - like who gets the defense and security positions in a new power-sharing government. Weeks of diplomatic jockeying have produced no agreement on these two posts. - Adam Geibel

May 8, 2003 Armed men opened fire on a French military patrol near the western Ivory Coast town of Guiglo and two attackers were killed in the subsequent exchange of fire. There were claims that the gunmen were Liberians fighting for the Ivorian government, while the French described them as "plunderers".

The day before, French peacekeepers near Guiglo intercepted and disarmed about 110 Liberians fighting alongside Ivorian government forces. They had been trying to cross a ceasefire line.

Meanwhile, at least 140 Liberians are in MPJ custody in the western town of Man, allegedly "for their own protection". Some of the Liberians had fought alongside the Ivorian rebels, while others were civilians (even women and children) arrested simply because of their nationality. This is part of the rebels plan to clear the area of Liberians, once and for all. - Adam Geibel

May 10, 2003 This morning, for the first time since the start of the civil war, a train convoy departed in the morning from the commercial capital of Abidjan headed for the rebel stronghold of Bouak, in central Ivory Coast. President Gbagbo also lifted the overnight curfew first introduced on 19 September, the day the Civil War started. - Adam Geibel

May 11, 2003 Ivorian authorities have been recruiting Liberian refugees at a refugee camp at Nicla (inside Liberia). One refugee pointed out that serving in the Ivorian army might eventually would lead to an opportunity to try to overthrow Liberian President Taylor.

Other Ivorian militia groups (with names like the Cobras, Flic Flac or the Front for the Total Liberation of Ivory Coast) have been forming in the south, estimated to number around 60,000 primarily drawn up from unemployed Ivorian men.

The Group of Patriots for Peace claims to be a counter-force to the rebels and have about 6,000 volunteers. The group's second in command, Secretary-General Toure Moussa Zeguen, is opposed to a French-brokered peace plan and has accused Burkina Faso along with an opposition political leader of being behind the rebels. - Adam Geibel

May 12, 2003 UN High Commissioner for Refugees Rudd Lubbers met with President Gbagbo and other senior Ivorian officials, to discuss the fate of Liberian refugees (there are an estimated 9,000 in Nicla camp alone). Known locally as "Limas", around 200 of the young men (and some children) among the Guiglo refugee camp's 9,000 inhabitants were recruited by the Ivorian government to fight the rebels and died in combat. Their nickname comes from the radio call sign for the letter "L" , which stands for Liberian.

Many of the Guiglo fighters had also been sent across the nearby border to join rebels fighting Liberia's President Charles Taylor. Lubbers is trying to defuse local animosity against the displaced persons. The human rights group Refugees International (RI) estimated that at least 400,000 "foreigners" had fled the fighting in the Ivory Coast alone. For an idea of what countries have a stake in protecting their people, that figure includes about 200,000 Burkinabe, 70,000 Guineans, 48,000 Malians, and 44,000 Liberians. However, the term "foreigners" is a misnomer since many of those were born or raised in the Ivory Coast.

As part of his eight-day, five-nation mission to West Africa, Lubbers will meet leaders from the Ivory Coast, Ghana, Liberia, Sierra Leone and Guinea to discuss similar problems that plaque the entire region. - Adam Geibel

Details about West Africa's refugee problem are available at:
www.refintl.org

May 13, 2003 Oil is an underlying factor in the Ivory Coast's civil war. Canadian Natural Resources discovered oil on the Acajou South prospect about 15 miles off the Ivory Coast in 3,050 feet of water. Tests have been encouraging for economic development of the discovery.

The war had also briefly scared away many foreign ship owners from Africa's biggest tuna port, Abidjan, In 2001, the port handled 167,224 tons of frozen tuna, with fresh and off-grade tuna totaling another 60,126 tons. The fishing industry, both for local consumption and export, has picked up since the lifting of the overnight curfew.

With all that potential profit at stake, no wonder the French have invested a total of 4,000 troops for "peacekeeping" duties and the UN Security Council will be sending 76 unarmed military observers (to be known by its French acronym of MINUCI), to monitor the ceasefire and assist other peacekeeping forces in the country.

The current truce has held for a week, but indicators that the ceasefire will hold are in doubt. While the rebels and army haven't had any direct contact, the slaughter of civilians continues with depressing vigor. In the West (near government-held Duekoue), over 100 local Guere men, women and children had been killed since the 8th by Burkinan immigrants. The area north of Duekoue is rebel-held by rebels, but ethnic militias and armed Liberian refugees have also been operating in the remote area.

The question of who will be the permanent Defense and Security ministers also remains a stumbling block to disarmament, yet the Ivorian government has been acquiring additional air assets (although to date none of them have been effectively employed against the rebels). In addition to five Mi-24 gunships based at Adibijan, two MiG-23s were acquired and landed at that air base on April 27. Two British "Strike Master" light aircraft were also acquired, although they were in such poor shape that they had to be sent to neighboring Guinea's capital city Conakry for overhaul. - Adam Geibel

May 16, 2003 President Gbagbo gave his approval to the deployment of "impartial" forces in western Ivory Coast, up to the Liberian border. On May 1, the French peacekeepers had told the Ivorian chief of staff, Liberians and rebels that they were ready and willing to deploy about 900 men in western Ivory Coast within 48 hours. - Adam Geibel

May 17, 2003 The Romanian Aviation Company (IAR) is supplying the Ivory Coast with four IAR 330 Puma helicopters built under Eurocopter license for $12 million. Two were transported to the Ivory Coast via an Antonov 22 cargo plane and the other two will be delivered by year's end. All four were upgraded with the SOCAT [Romanian acronym for Anti-Tank Optronic Search and Combat] navigation system.

However, one was made especially for presidential use, with 10 leather upholstered seats, an air conditioning equipment specially designed for the African climate. The president's armchair can to turned it into a bed and a hi-fi sound system, toilet, refrigerator and bar were also added. - Adam Geibel

May 21, 2003 President Gbagbo defended his government's purchase of weapons, as a way of preventing further coup attempts. The President claimed that the rebels had more weapons than his own army, although he did not specify what exactly he was buying to counterbalance that or for how much. The only purchase recently detailed by Ivory Coast authorities has been the Romanian helicopter contract.

Meanwhile, ECOWAS leader and Ghanaian President John Kufuor okayed the deployment of West African peacekeepers into the western regions of the Ivory Coast. - Adam Geibel

May 22, 2003 Without good road networks, railways are an important economic lifeline in many African countries. Controlling or cutting them can figure heavily in any conflict.

The first freight train in eight months left Abidjan, carrying cement and fertilizer to the rebel-held north of the country. Radical anti-rebel youth groups ripped up a small section of the track in central Abidjan in the morning, hoping to prevent the train from leaving. Railway officials eventually got the diesel engine hauling three flatbed wagons moving with a military escort that night, after the line had been repaired.

The 638 km long French-owned SITARAIL railway links the port of Abidjan with landlocked Burkina Faso to the north. This freight train only went as far as Ferkessedougou, near the Burkinabe frontier. The railway normally carries most of Burkina Faso's imports and exports, as well as the oil imports to Mali and Niger.

Most of SITARAIL's 1,062 employees were laid off without pay since the trains stopped running in September 2002. Regular service should resume by the end of May. - Adam Geibel

May 23, 2003 Troops in the Ivory Coast launched a combined operation to secure the west of the war-torn country bordering Liberia, with government units and selected rebel forces working with French and West African peacekeepers. While fighting between the army and rebels has tapered off since the truce three weeks ago, lawless elements on the western edge of the country have been raping and robbing civilians.

Led by two Ivorian officers in a four-wheel drive vehicle, a convoy of 115 trucks and armored vehicles (mostly French), carrying 400 troops clad in body armor, left the western town of Guiglo for the Liberian border town of Toulepleu. That morning, another convoy of rebels, ECOWAS and French troops left the western town of Duekoue (about 30 kilometers north of Guiglo and still under rebel control). Movement for Peace and Justice (MJP) chief Gaspard Dely was serving as a liaison officer for the rebels.

The plan is that both columns will extend the ceasefire line right up to the border, creating a "zone of confidence" in the west. The French and West African peacekeepers, along with rebel forces, will monitor the north and the Ivorian government soldiers will be in charge of the southern portion of the western frontier.

About 750 to 800 French troops are involved and the head of the French force in Ivory Coast, General Bruno Dary, will consider his operation a success if they arrived in Bangolo and Teapleu without firing a single shot. The operation would take between two and three weeks.

The long military convoys stunned locals along the road to Toulepleu and some expressed doubt that the French can quickly stop the chaos. - Adam Geibel

May 30, 2003 Burkina Faso and the Ivory Coast have agreed on a new system for monitoring their common border and crossing points for road and railway traffic, as well as intensifying border patrols. The armies of both countries, as well as French and West African peacekeepers, would take up these duties by June 30.

The border points had officially been closed since the war started in September 2002. The reopening of the trade route to Burkina Faso should also help the neighboring landlocked Mali and Niger, which have relied on the port of Abidjan to handle much of their external trade. All three countries want to clear tens of thousands of tons of goods stuck on Adibjan's warehouses for the past eight months. - Adam Geibel

June 3, 2003 While the extended ceasefire line seems to have stopped the rampaging lawlessness in the country's western border regions, fighting in Liberia has sent at least 15,000 refugees into camps in the southwestern corner of the Ivory Coast. As sorry as their plight is, the Ivorians have little sympathy and even less tolerance for them. However, outright violence hasn't been reported - yet. - Adam Geibel

June 6, 2003 The United Nations appointed Brigadier General Abdul Hafiz of the Bangladeshi Army to head the initial 26-strong United Nations military observer contingent of the UN Mission in Cote d'Ivoire (MINUCI). This group is charged with advising the Security Council on military affairs, monitoring the local situation and establishing links between French, ECOWAS, government and rebel units.

The Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) is looking for western donors to fork over nearly US $40 million, so they can double or even triple their 1,200-strong peace-keeping force. The Netherlands have offered $580,000 and may double that figure, while Belgium has pledged $712,000. The US, France and Britain contributed most of the initial $13 million cost of deploying the ECOWAS force for six months were still considering whether to make any further financial commitment.

Burkina Faso and the Ivory Coast will set up new surveillance systems on their common border and intensify patrols by their armies along with French and West African peacekeepers to enable cross-border road and railway traffic shut down eight months ago to resume by 30 June. - Adam Geibel

June 10, 2003 The country may be returning to a state of normalcy and some of the rebel leadership has recently taken to apologizing to the nation for the chaos they caused. Abidjan's vice governor was even in the United States, claiming that his country was safe for tourists after the power-sharing deal between the government and rebels was signed. - Adam Geibel

June 12, 2003 A first contingent of about 60 paramilitary gendarmes from Senegal, Ghana and Benin arrived, the vanguard of a force of 300. The day before, skirmishing between government troops and their former Liberian allies was reported at the village of Papadougou (near the western town of Duekoue). The Liberians had killed several civilians during a looting spree and the government retaliated by killing seven of them. - Adam Geibel

June 17, 2003 Ivorian army and rebel representatives agreed to pull their forces back from their current positions. The accord demands that the fighters from the three rebel groups be confined in 16 special camps situated around the main northern cities, behind the ceasefire line. - Adam Geibel

June 18, 2003 The Ivorian government, in anticipation of expanding their armed forces, is actively recruiting local youths to train as mechanics. The Ivorian Air Force is looking for 154 mechanics for fighters and helicopters, as well as 30 pilots (10 fighter, 10 transport, 10 gunship and 5 transport helicopter).

Ordinarily the requirement for pilots is filled by recruiting foreigners. In February, the government had six helicopter gunship pilots: a former member of the British B-squadron SAS, a Frenchman and four South Africans (all former employees of "military services" company Executive Outcomes).

The local press also claims that President Gbagbo has hired 24 additional mercenaries and specifically named Christian "Garnier," a Frenchman actually named Christian Founier who was thought to be in charge of the President's close security. These men had been in the country for a week and were training presidential security guards at the police academy. - Adam Geibel

June 23, 2003 Following the recent restoration of law and order in the Ivory Coast's "wild west" by French and West African peacekeeping forces, the health of thousands of refugees returning to their villages has been threatened by contaminated ground water. Various militias threw the bodies of their victims into wells and streams, in an effort to cover up their crimes. - Adam Geibel

June 27, 2003 Communications Minister Guillaume Soro was attacked when he tried to visit the headquarters of state television in Abidjan, by members of a hardline paramilitary youth organization opposed to any concessions to the rebels . Soro is also the Secretary General of the Patriotic Movement of Cote d'Ivoire (MPCI), the main rebel group. He was forced to hide in the building's infirmary for two hours, until police restored order. Soro claimed that the attack amounted to a failed assassination attempt.

Tension between the government and rebel supporters had been building up before the attack, slowing down progress towards the planned demobilization and disarmament of rebel units. The disarmament process had been due to begin on August 1. - Adam Geibel

June 30, 2003 The Ivory Coast's rebel military leaders declared a state of emergency and blocked access to the parts of the country under their control, accusing the president of failing to fulfill promises meant to end civil war. They also ordered all nine of their representatives to the three-month-old national reconciliation government to come home, after the attack on Soro.- Adam Geibel

July 2, 2003 Rebel military commanders watered down their threat to withdraw from a national reconciliation government and ordered all their ministers to return to rebel capital Bouake.

The day before, Spanish officials discovered a container with Kalashnikov assault rifles, machineguns, sub-machineguns and 560 magazines when they inspected a ship off Barcelona. The ship's manifest showed the container was loaded in South Korea and was headed for Senegal, but police suspected that the Ivory Coast was a more likelier destination. If this is true, one can only wonder who the recipients were - the army and rebel forces seem to have all the weapons they need, which leaves the pro-government youth militias in the port city of `Adibjan as likely suspects. - Adam Geibel

July 3, 2003 A team of 26 unarmed United Nations military observers began deploying in Ivory Coast. The number could rise to 76 before the end of MINUCI's six-month initial mandate. - Adam Geibel

July 4, 2003 The government and rebels officially declared an end to the civil war that began on September 19, 2003. Both sides made the announcement to head off a serious threat to national reconciliation and to reassure Ivory Coast's 16 million people.

President Gbagbo approved a draft amnesty law for the rebels and urged parliament to pass it quickly, which would clear the path for their demobilization and disarmament. The amnesty specifically covers acts of desertion and military rebellion, allowing soldiers and policemen who joined the rebels to be reintegrated into the security forces. The amnesty goes back well before the outbreak of the civil war itself on September 19, 2002 but specifically excludes economic crimes, violations of the international humanitarian law and "serious violations" of human rights. - Adam Geibel

July 7, 2003 The Ivory Coast isn't out of the jungle yet. Police fired teargas to drive back hundreds of stone-throwing militia youths as they tried to smash their way into Abjidjan's television station. There had also been clashes between the youths and police on the 5th. - Adam Geibel

July 9, 2003 The rebels have accused the Gbagbo government of signing a "working contract" with former DGSE (General Director of External Security - the French military intelligence service) and DST (Directorate of Land Supervision, the French equivalent of the CIA) officers to recruit mercenaries under the cover of an English insurance company, using the false pretext of securing the Ivory Coast's economic infrastructure (such as the port of Abidjan).

An antigovernment daily newspaper printed their claim that a dozen of these mercenaries entered the Ivory Coast the week before and that the rebels promptly placed them under close surveillance. The rebels suspect that they were hired by retired intelligence officers, who were planning a neo-colonialist agenda that would ultimately benefit the French Defense Ministry.

Even when there isn't a civil war, private security companies keep a lot of west African industries and warehouses from being pilfered. For instance, the UK Foreign Affairs Committee listed the firm SPS Guards as a Private Military Company, since they provide security guards, alarm systems and rapid response teams in Abidjan for an $105,000 annually renewed contract. However, the South African firm Securicor bought out SPS-Guards in early 2003. The Florida-based security company Wackenhut also bought a 60% stake in SEGES, an Ivory Coast security firm, back in 1994. - Adam Geibel

July 11, 2003 Liberian ULIMO (United Liberation Movement in Liberia) and LURD (Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy) rebels who have fought in Sierra Leone and the Ivory Coast have infested neighboring Guinea's forest region and turned it into a high-risk zone. - Adam Geibel

July 10, 2003: Three people were killed and a dozen more wounded when armed gendarmes used bulldozers to raze huts in Adibjan's 'Jerusalem' shantytown, which left at least 8,000 people without shelter. Destruction of these shantytowns was also done following the September 2002 coup attempt, since they were believed to house the coup supporters. Human rights agencies said that the government program was simply targeting foreigners. - Adam Geibel

July 16, 2003 About 2,000 armed men (both former government and rebel fighters) are still at large in western Ivory Coast, preying on the civilian population and preventing relief agencies from freely delivering supplies in the lawless region close to the Liberian border. These armed Ivorian civilians, Liberian refugees and mercenaries were seldom if ever paid, but turned to looting towns and villages on both sides of the frontline. The raids were often accented by rapes and slaughters.

French and West African peacekeepers had set up a Zone Of Confidence in the west, but failed to disarm these gunmen and many simply moved further south into the Tai national park. This has forced about 30,000 refugees down to the port of Tabou, south of the Tai national park.

Meanwhile, at least half a dozen pro-government, anti-French militias that have sprung up in southern Ivory Coast consider the current cease fire just a lull before the real war starts and are now training in the open (although without showing real weapons). - Adam Geibel

July 23, 2003 The United States and several European donors pledged sufficient funding to keep the 1,400-strong West African peacekeeping force deployed in the Ivory Coast until the end of November, but failed to provide the additional sums required to increase the unit's size to 3,200. France, which had provided the largest chunk of initial funding was still mulling the extent to which it would provide further assistance. The current ECOWAS mission costs $1.3 million a month to keep in the field. - Adam Geibel

July 24, 2003 The Chief of Staff for the French Forces, General Henri Bentegeat detected an encouraging spirit of reconciliation since his last visit in December, but told the Ivorians that more progress needed to be made on disarmament agreements or the country risks ruining all of the progress made in ending its civil war. Disarmament is due to begin in August and finish in mid-September, but the rebels have threatened to pull out of the process after accusing President Gbagbo delaying the naming of key defense and security ministers.

That isn't stopping Bohoun Bouabre, the Ivory Coast's minister of economy and finance from stumping around New York to assure potential American investors that his country is safe and open for their business. Meanwhile, Canadian Natural Resources Ltd. was awarded three major contracts for the development of the Baobab Field, which is located on 25km offshore from the Ivory Coast. The field has estimated recoverable reserves of 200 million barrels of oil. The Ivory Coast's state-owned PETROCI Holding has a 15 percent interest in this new oil field. Qu'elle surprise. - Adam Geibel

July 27, 2003 Cleaning up after the Ivory Coast's little civil war is getting more expensive by the day. Neighboring Burkina Faso is looking for donors to support a three-year $32 million plan to help reintegrate up to 320,000 refugees. The Burkinabe residents in Cote d'Ivoire fled over the past 10 months during a wave of persecution of Burkinabe and other West African immigrants. Burkinabe government officials claim that the real figure is closer to 500,000 and the exodus is still continuing, with convoys bringing 500 more expatriates a week. - Adam Geibel

July 28, 2003 The South African government is apparently getting serious about curbing uncontrolled mercenary activity by its citizens. The first person to be arrested under new laws for recruiting mercenaries for African wars was taken into custody at around 4PM on the 26th. Richard Rouget was arrested after stepping off a flight from Harare, Zimbabwe while hunting rifles, documents, were confiscated after a search of his residence. Rouget was charged with recruiting mercenaries to fight in the Ivory Coast, which is a violation of the 1988 Foreign Military Assistance Act. This law prohibits any citizen from participating in foreign conflicts without prior government approval.

From the Truth Commission files on the 1988 murder of Godfrey Motsepe, Rouget allegedly led a group of mercenaries in Europe that was doing reconnaissance on the African National Congress. In June 1985 and using the alias 'Sander's, Rouget became a mercenary officer of Bob Denard's Comorian Presidential Guard.

According to the 'Richard Rouget Safaris' website, he is a graduate of the French Military Academy, serving until 1984 as a commissioned officer in the French Army's air-mobile infantry. Having first set foot in Africa as a soldier, he has lived on the continent since 1985 and is now a South-African citizen.

In the 70s, Rouget had been active in extreme right-wing movements like GUD ("Groupe Union Dfense", a student union) and PFN ("Parti des Forces Nouvelles"). Without completing his studies, he entered the French Army and rose to the rank of warrent officer ("sous lieutenant").

The regulation quite clearly states that authorization has to be granted by the government, which reading between the lines means that the South Africans can see a use for Private Military Companies but has a big problem with unregulated mercenaries. The flip side of the argument may be that Private Military Companies might view the South African government as too incompetent to be involved in their business. Meanwhile, the South African government was working to trace other South Africans who may be working with Rouget. - Adam Geibel

July 29, 2003 Students staged a protest in Adibjan, demanding compensation of about $500 each for having missed classes this past year due to the civil war. The protesting students claimed to be representing nearly 14,000 peers from the Ivory Coast's north. Other youth groups in Abidjan are vocally pro-government. Police were deployed to guard French-run establishments and prevent a replay of earlier violent protests that targeted foreign and Western businesses in Abidjan. Even though they're only armed with knives, iron bars and sticks, these youth groups are potentially dangerous to the peace process, since they've threatened to derail things in their rabid support of the president. - Adam Geibel

August 4, 2003 The Security Council voted unanimously to extend the authorization for more than 5,000 French and West African peacekeepers maintaining a fragile cease-fire in the Ivory Coast.

Meanwhile, in South Africa, Richard Rouget admitted that he had helped 12 South Africans to find jobs (at $6,000 a month each) train and fight alongside the Ivory Coast's soldiers. Rouget claimed that he was only an intermediary for the 12 South Africans, using connections made through his hunting business. The Pretoria Regional Court also imposed a suspended five-year prison sentence, should he be convicted of another offense under the Foreign Military Assistance Act within the next five years. - Adam Geibel

August 6, 2003 Ivory Coast's parliament approved a general amnesty for "all offenses against the security of the state" (which includes political unrest and rebel activities) between 2000 and 2002. Not everyone is so forgiving. Dissenters accused the parliament members who support the bill of being "assailants and assassins", claiming the people who committed crimes ought to be brought to justice. - Adam Geibel

August 7, 2003 The Ivory Coast celebrated it's 43rd Independence Day with parades and speeches, but fear of political instability still infects the nation's two largest cities. While former rebels celebrated alongside government troops and ECOWAS peacekeepers in some towns, some former rebel leaders skipped the party in Abidjan in preference for those in the rebel stronghold of Bouake. - Adam Geibel

August 13, 2003 The US considers Ivory Coast peaceful enough to allow American diplomats to return to the Ivory Coast capital.

August 25, 2003 Peace talks are stalled over a stalemate on who will have which senior government jobs. Meanwhile, foreign aid is being withheld until the new government has been decided on.

Former rebel leader Ibrahim Coulibaly was arrested in Paris, along with ten followers.

August 26, 2003 Two French soldiers were killed during an encounter with some drunk rebel gunmen, who opened fire on the soldiers.

August 27, 2003 At least two dozen people were arrested in the capital and charged with plotting a coup against the government. The plotters were said to be working for Ibrahim Coulibaly, the leader of a 1999 coup attempt.

August 29, 2003 Rebels and government forces continue to build up their forces in preparation for what appears to be a resumption of the fighting. Charges have been tossed back and forth about assassination plots and new coups.

August 31, 2003 Oil, more than chocolate, is becoming the driving economic factor for the Ivory Coast. The Nigerians announced the arrest of several executives of the Ocean and Oil company in Lagos, as part of the on-going crackdown on the theft and sale of Nigeria crude oil. The Nigerians can be quite Kafkaesque, since some officials from other oil companies were detained for several hours (and in some cases, several days) without their alleged offences being made known to them.

In addition to smuggling the crude out on small ships, an estimated 130 trucks (usually with a total capacity of 30 tons) were leaving Port Harcourt every night with crude to Ivorian factories. After the Ivorian oil men had been made aware of this on 6 August 2003, they refused to allow three Nigerian tankers to offload.

Nigeria and the Ivory Coast signed an agreement on August 19, for Nigeria to supply 30,000 barrels of crude oil per day (bpd) to the Ivorian state-owned 60, 000 to 80,000 bpd oil refinery. The contract will be renewed annually. The Ivory Coast only has an oil reserve of around 50 million barrels and produces 11,000 barrels per day (bpd) of oil, compared to the country's demand put about 32,000 bpd.

The regional smuggling is a double-edged sword. In addition to destabilizing West Africa's legitimate economy, pirates and ethnic militias around Nigeria's delta area are believed to be using the profits from the illegal oil transfers to buy modern assault rifles, machine guns, and rocket launchers. Pirate attacks on legitimate oil shipping would then make the Ivorian refinery owners more likely to turn to unreliable smugglers, which creates a vicious cycle of instability. - Adam Geibel

September 2, 2003 The Ivorian government kept 11 soldiers and seven civilians detained for questioning about an alleged plot to assassinate President Laurent Gbagbo, his wife and several senior officials. Only Air force general Abdoulaye Coulibaly was released on the night before (after four days of "investigations") because he had not been properly arrested and insufficient evidence was found to link him to the conspiracy.

More than 50 people had been arrested in the Ivory Coast on August 30, in connection with the alleged plot. It was not immediately clear whether some of those thought to have been arrested had been released quietly or whether they were still being held secretly by the government.

In France, many of the ten alleged conspirators detained were linked to General Robert Guei's military government, which ruled the Ivory Coast after a 199 coup d'etat in 1999 until elections in 2000. Coulibaly had turned power over to Guei, rather than taking over himself. Plot ringleader Master Sargent Ibrahim Coulibaly was also linked to a failed coup on September 2002, which plunged the country into civil war.

The conspirators had planned to kill Gbagbo and his wife Simone, who is the parliamentary leader of the president's Ivorian Popular Front (FPI) party in Abidjan during the last week of August while they were driving in an official motorcade. On 26 August, Gbagbo unexpectedly postponed a ceremony to rename part of the capital's Boulevard Giscard d'Estaing Boulevard des Armees, in honor of those who died defending the country in the civil war. - Adam Geibel

September 10, 2003 In another sign that hostilities are winding down, Burkina Faso and the Ivory Coast re-opened their common border. Nearly 30 percent of Burkina Faso's population depends on cross border trade with the Ivory Coast for survival, while thousands of Burkinabe worked in Ivory Coast's cocoa and coffee plantations. At least 350,000 workers fled back to Burkina during the rebellion, following widespread harassment of "foreigners" by security personnel (particularly in Abidjan's suburban 'shanty towns'). - Adam Geibel

September 11, 2003 Trying to capitalize on the current peace and reunite the country, Prime Minister Seydou Diarra set up a committee to separate and disarm the ex-belligerents in a bid to still divided from civil war. Like many other simmering conflicts, the peacekeepers and diplomats are in a race to get the guns out of the hands of ill-disciplined fighters and then find something for them to do, before they go back to the thrill of killing their neighbors. However, many of the Ivory Coast's rebels may have had enough. Rebel leader "Sergeant Wattao" (whose real name is Issiaka Ouattara) is head of the Anaconda Brigade. He told the press that while he wants his men to find positions in the new coalition army, he wants "to be far away from Ivory Coast, so nobody can blame me for anything anymore." - Adam Geibel

September 15, 2003 President Laurent Gbagbo and visiting French defense minister Michele Alliot-Marie met in an effort to rekindle implementation of the peace agreement. The defense minister said that French troops would deploy across the country, but only if the ongoing reconciliation process produces results.

The ECOWAS executive secretary of the west African regional bloc warned this weekend that the reconciliation process in Ivory Coast is in danger and accused Ivorian leaders of undermining a peace deal. Ibn Chambas was speaking before Ivorian President Laurent Gbagbo on Sunday urged his supporters to mount protests against the rebel groups which were brought into government under an ECOWAS-mediated peace deal. - Adam Geibel

September 17, 2003 A Parisian court freed former Ivory Coast coup-maker Ibrahim Coulibaly (on $22,000 bail) and five accused accomplices, but ordered that a sixth suspect remain in custody. The court ordered Coulibaly to hand over his passport, to report regularly to a police station and banned him from leaving France or contacting any of those facing the same charges. Two others released were Hassan Sahkr (a Lebanese expatriate suspected of being the group's financier) and Mamadou Diomade (a lawyer suspected of having enrolled recruits). Three mercenaries were also freed without bail. - Adam Geibel

September 18, 2003 The United Nations special envoy to the Ivory Coast brushed aside rebel objections to the way President Gbagbo appointed the new ministers of defense and external security, then announced that he expects the demobilization and disarmament of rebel forces in the north of the country to start on 1 October. - Adam Geibel

September 19, 2003 More than two months after the conflict was declared over, the Ivory Coast marked the one-year anniversary of its civil war with commermorations, speaches and troop formations in Abidjan. However, opposition leader Alassane Ouattara placed the blame for the year of warfare on Gbagbo, questioning the president's legitimacy and "the impunity given to those responsible for intolerable human rights violations".

Locals articulated how the war has taken a toll on the once stable country. In their estimation, everything had gotten worse: basic social services, schools, health services, agriculture and trade. Measles, meningitis and cholera have reappeared, while only about 80 percent of health services are not functioning and four-fifths of staff had not returned to their posts. - Adam Geibel

September 21, 2003 Train services between landlocked Burkina Faso and the Ivorian port of Abidjan resumed after a 12 month long interruption by the civil war. The border was officially reopened to road traffic on September 10, but the first freight train from Abidjan only reached the southeastern town of Bobo Dioulasso on the 21st. President Gbagbo had blocked the resumption of normal road and rail links with Burkina Faso until recently, due to the perception that those northern neighbors supported the rebels.

Burkinafaso has traditionally relied on the rail link from Abidjan to Ouagadougou to carry most of its external trade, which is also used by landlocked Niger and Mali to import fuel. Denied use of 1,150 km long rail line, the three neighboring countries relied more on road transport to alternate West African ports (like Ghana's Sekondi/Takoradi, Togo's Lome, Benin's Cotonou, Guinea's Conakry and Senegal's Dakar. However, truck transport in the region is more expensive and less reliable, while the road infrastructure isn't up to the task of additional traffic. - Adam Geibel

September 25, 2003 The rebel ministers refused to meet a UN special envoy to discuss their withdrawal from the national reconciliation government, in protest of President Gbagbo's refusal to give the coalition body adequate powers. However, one of nine rebel ministers in the coalition government disobeyed the movement's orders and turned up for a cabinet meeting anyway.

ECOWAS is taking the MPCI move seriously and asked the rebel ministers to return to the seat of government and continue the disarmament dialogue. In London, cocoa market reacted with a 5.5 percent price surge but analysts don't think supplies will be seriously curtailed in the near future. In late 2002, the civil war sent cocoa prices to 17-year highs with market fears about the impact of the fighting on world supply. - Adam Geibel

September 27, 2003 French peacekeepers deployed to secure the commercial center of rebel-held Bouake, after a three-day long shootout resulted in at least 23 dead and at least 37 wounded. Initially, the French were unsure if the clashes were between individuals or organized militia groups.

The fighting started when a stampede broke out in a branch of the West African Central Bank and security forces tried to secure the premises. The bank had failed to move an unusually large sum of money out of the Bouake branch (despite repeated requests) and rebel forces were stuck guarding it.

Earlier reports claimed that there were at least 25, mostly civilian deaths, of people who were trying to grab money when the fighting broke out. A medical official contradicted this, claiming that all of the dead and wounded were all soldiers hit by bullets.

There are 5,300 French and West African peacekeeping troops deployed to keep the two sides apart. The French defense minister noted that this incident would prompt forces on the ground to consider the usefulness of extending the mandate of their peacekeeping forces. - Adam Geibel

October 2, 3003: The streets of Abidjan were packed with around 70,000 pro-Gbagbo supporters, demanding the rebels disarm. Authorities closed highways leading into the skyscraper-lined downtown and local merchants closed up, fearing that youth gangs in the crowd would get out of control. - Adam Geibel

October 3, 2003 The Security Council expressed concern about the fresh violence and urged all sides to stick to a January peace deal. Meanwhile, the Ivorians are desperately courting the Iranians to invest in their country, particularly with construction materials. The Ivorians need to build production facilities for their cocoa beans. There is also a need for as many as 15,000 houses right now, as well as 40,000 more within the next three years. While economic information can seem innocent, it can also open a door for Iranian-backed radical Islamic influence in a country already split along tribal and religious lines. - Adam Geibel

October 4, 2003 Tens of thousands of people marched in the rebel stronghold of Bouake, in a show of force that underscored the bitter divisions still felt throughout the Ivory Coast. "New Forces" leader Guillaume Soro accused the president of reneging on a peace accord, while others demanded that Gbagbo quit. - Adam Geibel

October 7, 2003 The Ivory Coast has frequently accused the government of Burkina Faso of instigating the civil war in Ivory Coast and supplying the rebels. Apparently, the Burkinans are now suffering the same intrigues.

In Burkina Faso's capital Ouagadougou, it was announced that 12 people had been arrested on October 2, for planning with a foreign country to overthrow the government of President Blaise Campaore. The State Prosecutor claimed that "serious evidence" existed of their plans, but declined to give further details.

Captain Wally Luther Diapagri (who works at the Trade Ministry) was reportedly the coup leader and planning started as early as in 2000. Diapagri reportedly recruited other soldiers and civilians including another captain, army sergeants, warrant chiefs and corporals, as well as a church pastor. Most of the soldiers arrested last week had belonged to President Compaore's security detachment, before being deployed to other units. Captain Bauoulou Boulibi had served at the military detachment of Bobo Dioulasso (the country's second most important city). The suspects were in custody at a military facility and the case will be prosecuted by a military court. The investigations were going on and more arrests were expected. The UN reported that an unnamed "African country" had given over $178,731 to buy weapons and the plotters were waiting for arms shipments, but that their activities had been followed by the secret services.

Burkina Faso is a country ruled by Captains, so the allegations are quite serious. The latest coup (also the bloodiest) brought Captain Blaise Compaore to power on 15 October 1987. The President (and former Captain) Thomas Sankara was killed in that regime change. - Adam Geibel

October 8, 2003 The army warned the rebels (now known as the "New Forces") that they would take action unless the rebels quickly returned to their peace and disarmament program. The army's front-line commander, Lieutenant-Colonel Philippe Mangou, said that rebels should reestablish contacts with the army, return to a committee meant to oversee disarmament and stop all hostile actions. - Adam Geibel

One of the 12 suspects arrested in Burkina Faso for allegedly plotting a coup against President Blaise Compaore died in police custody on the night of October 8. The suspect, Moussa Kabore, was born in the neighboring Ivory Coast, but became a Sergeant in a Burkinian army unit based in Ouagadougou. Kabore, supposedly hanged himself using a piece of cloth cut from his military uniform. An autopsy was ordered to be carried to confirm the cause of death on the 9th. Following Kabore's death, the chief prosecutor ordered a revision of the detention conditions of the coup suspects, each of whom was staying in an individual bedroom.

That same day, Lieutenant Phillipe Minoungou was also arrested in connection with the coup attempt, while trying to jump over a fence into the United States embassy. Minoungou had been serving at the elite Burkian military unit of Po, 100 km south of Ouagadougou.

Alleged coup mastermind Captain Diapagri had supposedly visited "key officials" in the Ivory Coast and Togo in September. Skeptics in the Ivory Coast don't believe that the alleged coup attempt in Burkina Faso was so simply 'foiled' and think it indicates that Compaore and company are worried that the failure of Ivorian rebels marks the beginning of internal turbulence in their own country. To delay this, he is trying to rally his compatriots around a "Burkinabe" patriotism. - Adam Geibel

October 9, 2003 One of the 12 suspects arrested in Burkina Faso for allegedly plotting a coup against President Blaise Compaore died in police custody on the night of October 8. The suspect, Moussa Kabore, was born in the neighboring Ivory Coast, but became a Sergeant in a Burkinian army unit based in Ouagadougou. Kabore, supposedly hanged himself using a piece of cloth cut from his military uniform. An autopsy was ordered to be carried to confirm the cause of death on the 9th. Following Kabore's death, the chief prosecutor ordered a revision of the detention conditions of the coup suspects, each of whom was staying in an individual bedroom.

That same day, Lieutenant Phillipe Minoungou was also arrested in connection with the coup attempt, while trying to jump over a fence into the United States embassy. Minoungou had been serving at the elite Burkian military unit of Po, 100 km south of Ouagadougou.

Alleged coup mastermind Captain Diapagri had supposedly visited "key officials" in the Ivory Coast and Togo in September. Skeptics in the Ivory Coast don't believe that the alleged coup attempt in Burkina Faso was so simply 'foiled' and think it indicates that Compaore and company are worried that the failure of Ivorian rebels marks the beginning of internal turbulence in their own country. To delay this, he is trying to rally his compatriots around a "Burkinabe" patriotism. - Adam Geibel

October 10, 2003 Hundreds of pro-government militia took to the streets of the commercial capital, Abidjan, to protest against ongoing conflict and demand that French-owned water and electricity companies stop serving areas under rebel control. The Group for Peace and Progress (GPP) harassed traders in the low-income suburbs, disrupting traffic and threatening residents.

While the French contingent will number around 3,700 men by the end of October, according to Operation Unicorn spokesman the large-scale deployment of French troops in the north would not start anytime soon.

Since then, the French have been making noises about deploying into the northern part of the Ivory Coast in greater force. On 16 September, after a visit by French Defense Minister Michele Alliot-Marie, the ministry had announced that France was ready to deploy troops into the north of the country "in the weeks to come".

At the behest of the New Forces, several hundred soldiers from the French and West African peacekeeping forces were deployed in Bouake at the end of September, to secure the banking quarter where violent incidents triggered by a bank robbery had caused at least 23 deaths. - Adam Geibel

October 11, 2003 According to some Ivorian journalists, the New Forces (former rebels) recently conducted a census of their 40,000 armed and unarmed fighters. The town of Bouake and its environs has more than 12,000 armed soldiers under the command of Staff Sergeant Cherif Ousmane (alias "Cheetah"). There are more than 8,000 fighters in the town of Man and over 2,000 in Korhogo (the support base of the New Forces). These figures do not include the country's eastern zone (Bouna and other towns). - Adam Geibel

October 16, 2003 A pro-government newspaper in Abidjan insinuated that the MPCI rebel delegation visiting the United States was actually a thin excuse for a weapons buying spree. They claim that rebel leader Dacoury Tabley openly contacted US and eastern European weapons dealers, making arrangements to have additional munitions delivered to their Bouake bases. The paper also insinuated that the rebels were using nearly $73 million in Central Africa Francs that supposedly disappeared during the September holdup of the Bouake branch of the Central Bank of West African States as a bankroll. - Adam Geibel

October 21, 2003 French radio station Radio France Internationale (RFI) correspondent Jean Helene was shot in the head by a man in uniform, as 11 opposition militants were released from police custody.

The incident near the national police headquarters was the aftermath of a government "round up the usual suspects" move. The police had hauled in 11 members of Ivory Coast's main opposition party (all followers of former Prime Minister Allasane Ouattara) over the course of several days. They were accused of being involved in a plot to kill ``high political, political, administrative and military personalities." What wasn't clear was whether this was a new plot, or just a follow-up on the dozens of detentions in August (after an alleged plot to hit the president's motorcade with rocket launchers). - Adam Geibel

October 24, 2003 The government fired the National Police chief, in the wake of the investigation of Jean Helene's murder. While Security Minister Martin Bleou rejected calls for his resignation, he promised to reform the police force, improve police training and remove heavy weapons from police officers. Authorities had arrested a police sergeant, whom witnesses and officials said had challenged Helene's presence outside the central police headquarters. The policeman claims the shooting was unintentional.

The West African press, in condemning the killed, have speculated that it might have been a pre-ordered 'execution'. One writer argued that the French media brought it on themselves, noting that the Ivorian antagonism toward the French media was based on their "obnoxiously" one-sided coverage the Ivorian crisis. - Adam Geibel

October 27, 2003 The Ivorian government is getting sued for allowing strong-arm extortion tactics to be used against a $45 million cell phone network company. Representatives of the two U.S. companies (Western Wireless International, and Modern Africa Fund Managers, LLC) announced that they had suspended operations of Cora de Comstar, a three-year-old company serving close to 33,000 cellular phone customers and employing 200 telecommunications workers, because of repeated violent harassment of company personnel and raids on corporate premises.

Legal action has been initiated against the Ivorian government and Alexander Galley, a convicted French felon accused of conducting physical attacks on the company in an effort to establish a claim to ownership. On October 10, Galley (along with government militia and police) raided the Cora de Comstar headquarters in Abuja, looting cash reserves and destroying equipment.

Charges of assault and theft had previously been filed against Galley in the courts, but each time the charges were dropped because Galley was able to buy off judges. Curiously enough, an "Alexander Galley" (real name Raphael Gnardre Dago) was named on the June 2001 UN Security Council resolution banning international travel for Liberian Government officials and others presumed to be working with that government. - Adam Geibel

October 28, 2003 "Freelancing" has struck the rebel-held north as well, when a convoy of 10 pick-up trucks and four-wheel drive vehicles full of armed men tried unsuccessfully to break into a branch of the Central Bank of West African States (BCEAO) in the northern rebel-held town of Korhogo. The forces of two local rebel commanders fought them off, after an intense late-night gunfight. However, no one was killed in the exchange of fire and local people jeered as the attackers drove off.

Korhogo is close to the town of Ouangolodougou, near the border with Mali and Burkina Faso. The attackers were rebel fighters loyal to an unnamed warlord who was currently outside the Ivory Coast.

On the same day before dawn, intruders broke into the Man BCEAO branch (580 km northwest of Abidjan and also in rebel-controlled territory), opened a safe and stole computer equipment. It was not yet clear whether any money was missing, but the bank raid was followed by an outbreak of shooting later that morning. The gunman calmed down during that day, as over 100 French peacekeeping troops were dispatched to restore order in the city.

Originally the headquarters of MPIGO (the Ivorian Popular Movement of the Great West), Man has been plagued for the last several months by sporadic fighting between rival rebel factions. A senior Patriotic Movement of Cote d'Ivoire (MPCI) commander claimed that he had seen no evidence of any break-in at the local bank and that the shooting had simply been the result of clashes between rival rebel factions in the town.

These bank jobs are similar to the assault on the Bouake BCEAO branch on September 25. As much as $83 million in CFA banknotes was stolen and 23 people killed in that crime. - Adam Geibel

October 30, 2003 The presidents of Ghana and Nigeria flew into the Ivory Coast on a mission to kick start a faltering peace process and defuse simmering tensions. They held talks with their Ivorian counterpart and the country's prime minister, who heads a shaky power-sharing government meant to shepherd Ivory Coast to elections in 2005. The rebels have said they would only return if Gbagbo stepped down. Gbagbo's supporters say the rebels are only making excuses to delay disarmament. - Adam Geibel

October 31, 2003 Newspaper vendors halted distribution of the Ivory Coast's daily papers, as a protest against being harassed and beaten up by pro-government youths known as "young patriots". These young thugs want to stop to the sale of newspapers linked to opposition parties, or those perceived to support rebels who launched an uprising last year and triggered civil war. The venders are demanding additional security from the government. - Adam Geibel

November 3, 2003 At least 14 people had been shot dead in four days of fighting between between rival factions of the 200-strong rebel garrison in the northern town of Ferkessedougou, near the frontier with Burkina Faso. This squabble lasted until a delegation of senior rebel officials from the rebel capital arrived in the town to restore order. During a visit to Ferkessedougou, a UN correspondent noted that many of the rebel fighters were addicted to sniffing solvents, which they poured onto handkerchiefs all day and inhaled. - Adam Geibel

November 8, 2003 Fighting has broken out between local farmers and foreigners in one of the Ivory Coast's central cocoa-growing areas, forcing several hundred to flee their homes. The Gagnoa cocoa-growing region (300 kilometers west of the economic capital) produces about one quarter of the cocoa grown in the Ivory Coast. The dispute was apparently sparked by foreign farmers refusing to sell their beans to newly created local village cooperatives, which were offering a rather low price. The army sent a unit to the area to restore order, after fighting broke out there on the 6th. - Adam Geibel

November 10, 2003 Former rebel "New Forces" have set up roadblocks to collect fees from travelers in the northern areas under their control. They have also held up a UN plane for "four hours of unjustified delays", shooting into the tarmac to get their point across. Some groups have fought over spoils from three bank robberies and threatened to kill seven MINUCI military officers who were reconnoitering. - Adam Geibel

November 11, 2003 West African leaders called on the UN to convert the regional ECOWAS peacekeeping mission operating in the Ivory Coast into a full-fledged UN peacekeeping force. Niger and Togo agreed to contribute 70 troops, to safeguard rebels officials in the power-sharing government.

ECOWAS currently has 1,500 troops on the ground and France 4,000 troops stationed in its former colony. Secretary General Kofi Annan warned in a report that the Ivorian peace process was in "serious difficulty". An ECOWAS representative said that a UN force would be better suited to ensure peace in Ivory Coast, but gave no further explanation. However, a UN force would probably mean European troop representation and more importantly, more money for the ECOWAS troops.

The Secretary-General also recommended a six-month extension of the tiny UN mission's mandate there, in the hope that governmental authority can be restored throughout the country. MINUCI (the UN Mission in Cte d'Ivoire) currently has 34 UN military liaison officers in-country monitoring security and helping build confidence, although Annan has approved the deployment of the remaining 42 officers. Annan has also proposed a $29.9 million budget for the mission, from May 13, 2003 to June 30, 2004. - Adam Geibel

November 18, 2003 The coalition of rebels known as the "New Forces" have decided to call the government on it's "talking trash". The Patriotic Movement of Cote d'Ivoire (MPCI) Chief of Staff said that his troops had declared a "state of emergency" and recalled all MPCI military commanders to Bouake because of an "act of war" that had been signed by Ivorian army chief of staff and President Gbagbo. They said their actions were in response to government preparations to launch attacks on their positions.

The rebels then rolled out a "massive" display of heavy weapons in Bouake (379 kilometers north of the commercial capital Abidjan), hours after declaring a state of emergency in areas under their control. A convoy of trucks loaded with rebel troops, antiaircraft guns and rocket-propelled grenades drove around the city in the early afternoon.

Some trucks headed along the highway from Bouake to the north. More heavily armed fighters, dressed in combat gear, patrolled the streets, telling civilians they were "searching for infiltrators" (remember, these are the same guys who spend their days getting high sniffing glue).

Apparently, some recent declarations by government officials raised the rebels' hackles. Gbagbo had made a speech to ECOWAS heads of states in

Accra on November 12, where he said that his army was well equipped and could flush the rebels out within two weeks. - Adam Geibel

November 19, 2003 The United Nations and friends launched an international appeal for $60 million, to assist over one million people affected by the war in the Ivory Coast (including those who fled to Burkina Faso, Ghana and Mali).

The Prime Minister and the "New Forces" Secretary General held talks with the Ghanaian President, in an attempt to put the stalled Ivorian peace process back on track. Little progress was made. - Adam Geibel

November 21, 2003 Another diplomatic scramble has begun to defuse rebel threats. The Ivorian President met with France's foreign minister in Gabon, after which President Gbagbo would head from to Mali and then Burkina Faso. Luckily for all involved, there has been no fighting for the last six months and the biggest problem remains criminal activities.

France maintains a 4,000-strong contingent of peacekeepers that monitors the ceasefire while keeping the army and rebels apart. The French had heard about the rebel declarations of renewed violence but were not sure exactly what they planned to do. It was unclear if the French were referring to the rebels, or themselves.

On the 17th, French President Jacques Chirac reiterated the need to "swiftly and fully" implement the Paris Marcoussis accord and the week before, the European Union said that it would continue to withhold aid to Ivory Coast until it saw real "progress" in the process. - Adam Geibel

October 24, 2003 The government fired the National Police chief, in the wake of the investigation of Jean Helene's murder. While Security Minister Martin Bleou rejected calls for his resignation, he promised to reform the police force, improve police training and remove heavy weapons from police officers. Authorities had arrested a police sergeant, whom witnesses and officials said had challenged Helene's presence outside the central police headquarters. The policeman claims the shooting was unintentional.

The West African press, in condemning the killed, have speculated that it might have been a pre-ordered 'execution'. One writer argued that the French media brought it on themselves, noting that the Ivorian antagonism toward the French media was based on their "obnoxiously" one-sided coverage the Ivorian crisis. - Adam Geibel

October 27, 2003 The Ivorian government is getting sued for allowing strong-arm extortion tactics to be used against a $45 million cell phone network company. Representatives of the two U.S. companies (Western Wireless International, and Modern Africa Fund Managers, LLC) announced that they had suspended operations of Cora de Comstar, a three-year-old company serving close to 33,000 cellular phone customers and employing 200 telecommunications workers, because of repeated violent harassment of company personnel and raids on corporate premises.

Legal action has been initiated against the Ivorian government and Alexander Galley, a convicted French felon accused of conducting physical attacks on the company in an effort to establish a claim to ownership. On October 10, Galley (along with government militia and police) raided the Cora de Comstar headquarters in Abuja, looting cash reserves and destroying equipment.

Charges of assault and theft had previously been filed against Galley in the courts, but each time the charges were dropped because Galley was able to buy off judges. Curiously enough, an "Alexander Galley" (real name Raphael Gnardre Dago) was named on the June 2001 UN Security Council resolution banning international travel for Liberian Government officials and others presumed to be working with that government. - Adam Geibel

October 28, 2003 "Freelancing" has struck the rebel-held north as well, when a convoy of 10 pick-up trucks and four-wheel drive vehicles full of armed men tried unsuccessfully to break into a branch of the Central Bank of West African States (BCEAO) in the northern rebel-held town of Korhogo. The forces of two local rebel commanders fought them off, after an intense late-night gunfight. However, no one was killed in the exchange of fire and local people jeered as the attackers drove off.

Korhogo is close to the town of Ouangolodougou, near the border with Mali and Burkina Faso. The attackers were rebel fighters loyal to an unnamed warlord who was currently outside the Ivory Coast.

On the same day before dawn, intruders broke into the Man BCEAO branch (580 km northwest of Abidjan and also in rebel-controlled territory), opened a safe and stole computer equipment. It was not yet clear whether any money was missing, but the bank raid was followed by an outbreak of shooting later that morning. The gunman calmed down during that day, as over 100 French peacekeeping troops were dispatched to restore order in the city.

Originally the headquarters of MPIGO (the Ivorian Popular Movement of the Great West), Man has been plagued for the last several months by sporadic fighting between rival rebel factions. A senior Patriotic Movement of Cote d'Ivoire (MPCI) commander claimed that he had seen no evidence of any break-in at the local bank and that the shooting had simply been the result of clashes between rival rebel factions in the town.

These bank jobs are similar to the assault on the Bouake BCEAO branch on September 25. As much as $83 million in CFA banknotes was stolen and 23 people killed in that crime. - Adam Geibel

October 30, 2003 The presidents of Ghana and Nigeria flew into the Ivory Coast on a mission to kick start a faltering peace process and defuse simmering tensions. They held talks with their Ivorian counterpart and the country's prime minister, who heads a shaky power-sharing government meant to shepherd

Ivory Coast to elections in 2005. The rebels have said they would only return if Gbagbo stepped down. Gbagbo's supporters say the rebels are only making excuses to delay disarmament. - Adam Geibel

October 31, 2003 Newspaper vendors halted distribution of the Ivory Coast's daily papers, as a protest against being harassed and beaten up by pro-government youths known as "young patriots". These young thugs want to stop to the sale of newspapers linked to opposition parties, or those perceived to support rebels who launched an uprising last year and triggered civil war. The venders are demanding additional security from the government. - Adam Geibel

November 3, 2003 At least 14 people had been shot dead in four days of fighting between between rival factions of the 200-strong rebel garrison in the northern town of Ferkessedougou, near the frontier with Burkina Faso. This squabble lasted until a delegation of senior rebel officials from the rebel capital arrived in the town to restore order. During a visit to Ferkessedougou, a UN correspondent noted that many of the rebel fighters were addicted to sniffing solvents, which they poured onto handkerchiefs all day and inhaled. - Adam Geibel

November 8, 2003 Fighting has broken out between local farmers and foreigners in one of the Ivory Coast's central cocoa-growing areas, forcing several hundred to flee their homes. The Gagnoa cocoa-growing region (300 kilometers west of the economic capital) produces about one quarter of the cocoa grown in the Ivory Coast. The dispute was apparently sparked by foreign farmers refusing to sell their beans to newly created local village cooperatives, which were offering a rather low price. The army sent a unit to the area to restore order, after fighting broke out there on the 6th. - Adam Geibel

November 10, 2003 Former rebel "New Forces" have set up roadblocks to collect fees from travelers in the northern areas under their control. They have also held up a UN plane for "four hours of unjustified delays", shooting into the tarmac to get their point across. Some groups have fought over spoils from three bank robberies and threatened to kill seven MINUCI military officers who were reconnoitering. - Adam Geibel full-fledged UN peacekeeping force. Niger and Togo agreed to contribute 70 troops, to safeguard rebels officials in the power-sharing government.

November 11, 2003 West African leaders called on the UN to convert the regional ECOWAS peacekeeping mission operating in the Ivory Coast into a

ECOWAS currently has 1, 500 troops on the ground and France 4,000 troops stationed in its former colony. Secretary General Kofi Annan warned in a report that the Ivorian peace process was in "serious difficulty". An ECOWAS representative said that a UN force would be better suited to ensure peace in Ivory Coast, but gave no further explanation. However, a UN force would probably mean European troop representation and more importantly, more money for the ECOWAS troops.

November 18, 2003 The coalition of rebels known as the "New Forces" have decided to call the government on it's "talking trash". The Patriotic Movement of Cote d'Ivoire (MPCI) Chief of Staff said that his troops had declared a "state of emergency" and recalled all MPCI military commanders to Bouake because of an "act of war" that had been signed by Ivorian army chief of staff and President Gbagbo. They said their actions were in response to government preparations to launch attacks on their positions.

The rebels then rolled out a "massive" display of heavy weapons in Bouake (379 kilometers north of the commercial capital Abidjan), hours after declaring a state of emergency in areas under their control. A convoy of trucks loaded with rebel troops, antiaircraft guns and rocket-propelled grenades drove around the city in the early afternoon.

Some trucks headed along the highway from Bouake to the north. More heavily armed fighters, dressed in combat gear, patrolled the streets, telling civilians they were "searching for infiltrators" (remember, these are the same guys who spend their days getting high sniffing glue).

Apparently, some recent declarations by government officials raised the rebels' hackles. Gbagbo had made a speech to ECOWAS heads of states in Accra on November 12, where he said that his army was well equipped and could flush the rebels out within two weeks. - Adam Geibel

November 19, 2003 The United Nations and friends launched an international appeal for $60 million, to assist over one million people affected by the war in the Ivory Coast (including those who fled to Burkina Faso, Ghana and Mali).

The Prime Minister and the "New Forces" Secretary General held talks with the Ghanaian President, in an attempt to put the stalled Ivorian peace process back on track. Little progress was made. - Adam Geibel

November 21, 2003 Another diplomatic scramble has begun to defuse rebel threats. The Ivorian President met with France's foreign minister in Gabon, after which President Gbagbo would head from to Mali and then Burkina Faso. Luckily for all involved, there has been no fighting for the last six months and the biggest problem remains criminal activities.

France maintains a 4,000-strong contingent of peacekeepers that monitors the ceasefire while keeping the army and rebels apart. The French had heard about the rebel declarations of renewed violence but were not sure exactly what they planned to do. It was unclear if the French were referring to the rebels, or themselves.

On the 17th, French President Jacques Chirac reiterated the need to "swiftly and fully" implement the Paris Marcoussis accord and the week before, the European Union said that it would continue to withhold aid to Ivory Coast until it saw real "progress" in the process. - Adam Geibel

November 24, 2003 Liberia's transitional leader, Gyude Bryant, held talks with President Laurent Gbagbo about security along the two countries' troubled border, the peace process under way in both countries and how to prevent the movement of armed men across the porous border.

Meanwhile, United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan told the Security Council that the Ivory Coast could slide back into war and that he would soon send an assessment mission there, in order to prepare recommendations for improving the work of the UN's peacekeeping mission (MINUCI). - Adam Geibel

November 27, 2003 There are allegations that pro-government militias are continuing to kill, torture and harass civilians with impunity. Drawn mostly from the south central Bete tribe (the same as the president's), they were targeting mainly immigrants from other West African countries along with other ethnic groups.

Meanwhile, unchecked disease threatens parts of the country. With relief agencies providing the backbone of healthcare in the rebel-held north, that region could face major outbreaks of meningitis and typhoid as the dry season sets in. The months of November, December and January are critical periods for outbreaks of these killer diseases. - Adam Geibel

November 29, 2003 About 200 hard-line supporters of the president, reportedly accompanied by soldiers, were dispersed by French peacekeepers' teargas as they tried to reach the rebel stronghold of Bouake.

In one of the Ivory Coast's a major cocoa-growing areas (about 220 kilometers northwest of Abidjan), three more tribesmen were killed in clashes (bringing the death toll in three days of violence to at least nine). Tribesman armed with machetes and rifles had been clashing with foreign farm workers and immigrants around cocoa plantations in the Gagnoa area since the 27th. The army sent pickup truck-mounted troops backed by helicopter gunships to secure the area. - Adam Geibel

December 1, 2003 A pro-government mob set upon the base of the French 43rd Marine Infantry Battalion in the commercial capital Abidjan, before French military police dispersed them with teargas. French troops left the base in APCs to confront the 250-strong, rock-throwing mob that demanded that the French withdraw from a buffer zone in central Ivory Coast. The French news agency AFP reported that Ivorian security forces briefly intervened but then stood back, despite a ban on public protests. French soldiers then put up barbed wire fencing outside the base, before the protesters returned to pelt the installation with stones, and preventing any cars carrying Europeans from approaching.

Niger sent 50 more troops to reinforce their contingent of 250 peacekeepers already supporting the ECOWAS mission. The French stated that they have no intention of leaving until the mission is accomplished and a military spokesman in Paris described the Ivorian officers' demands as "irresponsible and inopportune".

The night before, Ivorian state TV was interrupted when a group of soldiers forced its way into the television building in Abidjan and read a statement saying: "We are asking the president to allow us to resume the war." Claiming that they had what they needed to "liberate" the country within 48 hours, they demanded that peacekeepers let them move to rebel-controlled areas and that whites leave the front lines. However, they stressed that their actions were not a coup and that they supported the president. - Adam Geibel

December 3, 2003 Around 1,000 hard line backers of the president defied a ban on public rallies and mounted a third day of protests in Abidjan. The day before, 300 riot police dispersed several hundred protesters gathered outside a French military base in Abidjan, who were calling for the former colonial power's troops to quit the country. - Adam Geibel

December 4, 2003 French soldiers and irregular troops loyal to President Gbagbo have engaged in several skirmishes along this line of trust in recent days. Local newspapers fretted that this twist to the civil war would become a trap for the 4,000 French peacekeepers in the country. - Adam Geibel

December 5, 2003 The Ivorian military would begin to pull back from a ceasefire line that cuts through the center of Ivory Coast, with internationally supervised disarmament to begin December 15. The day before, President Laurent Gbagbo decelerated that the civil war is over, after a meeting between military chiefs and the rebels in the capital Yamoussoukro. - Adam Geibel

December 12, 2003 Militants launched three simultaneous attacks in different parts of Abijdan, attacking a military police outside the national television station in Abijdan and leaving at least 19 dead (18 attackers and one military policeman). The assailants wore black clothes bearing the name "Nindja," which was one of the militias supporting President Laurent Gbagbo. - Adam Geibel

December 14, 2003 The government and rebel factions in divided Ivory Coast took tentative first steps towards disarmament. The military began to pull back heavy weaponry along the 640-kilometer buffer zone separating the rebel-held north from the government-run south. Government tanks and artillery were stored in armories at three sites, to help reduce tensions.

Checkpoints on both sides lining the country's main highways had also been dismantled. All but the entry-exit checkpoints for major cities and weapons caches stored before December 25.

Military leaders on both sides also laid the groundwork for the resumption of public utility services and the reopening of schools nationwide. - Adam Geibel

December 24, 2003 As of this week, most of the more than 100 checkpoints lining the country's highways have been torn down. Two days before, New Forces ministers decided to end their three-month boycott of cabinet meetings of the unity government, but there are no meetings planned until early next year. - Adam Geibel

December 26, 2003 An Abidjan court freed two generals and six other ranks on bail, who had been held for the last three months in connection with a suspected coup bid. The state prosecutor had originally arrested 11 soldiers and seven civilians suspected of plotting against the president.

As just another example of how wars have a rippling effect beyond the borders of the embattled country, Burkina Faso complained that the Ivory Coast's civil war in Cote d'Ivoire had led to a $146 million shortfall in revenues needed to execute their current budget (or more than 11 percent of planned government spending for 2003). - Adam Geibel

December 31, 2003 Adama Coulibaly, the Ivorian rebel warlord who controls Korhogo and the rebel armored battalion there, also has a not-so-secret mercenary group of 42 Liberians. What is unusual is that the Liberians are commanded by a woman in her mid-30s. She claims to have killed men in combat and nearly been killed herself in early 2003, while fighting alongside Ivorian rebel forces. She'd also claimed to have killed at least one white soldier (presumably a mercenary) during a heavy fighting for the town of Bangolo (50 kilometers south of Man) in late 2002. Under the terms of an agreement on 4 July 2003, the government and rebels both committed to getting rid of any mercenaries remaining in their ranks.

January 1, 2004 An advance party of 20 French troops reached the northern towns of Korhogo (634 kilometers north of Abidjan) and Ferkessedougou, as the peacekeepers started to deploy more widely in the rebel-held north. The reconnaissance team would hold talks with rebel military commanders to map out the deployment of more French soldiers.

Humanitarian agencies should be among the first to benefit from the new deployment, since the French will help to rehabilitate schools, health centers and other public buildings in the north in addition to maintaining security there. - Adam Geibel

January 2, 2004 Temptation causes discipline problems even in First World armies. Four French soldiers tasked with guarding a bank in Bouake was sent back to Paris, to face criminal charges after being found carrying a bag of cash worth $72,000. The four were from the 126th infantry (based in Brive-la-Gaillarde) were detained after allegedly trying to buy diamonds and gold, then accused of "aggravated theft" in November and December. The men were placed under judicial investigation, one step short of formal charges.

The main suspect told military police he found a sack stuffed with cash as he was patrolling the vicinity of the bank. Authorities believe the money belongs to a branch of the West African central bank in the rebel base of Bouake, where a bloody battle for spoils between bands of rebels and looters left at least 25 dead in September.

The government of Burkina Faso arrested an army major in connection with a coup plot against their president, which was first revealed in September. Burkina Faso has accused government officials in the Ivory Coast and Togo of complicity in the affair. He was the 15th member of the armed forces to be arrested in connection with the alleged coup plot since September. The major had originally been a suspect but released.

Burkinabe President Blaise Campaore has enjoyed close links with the Libyan leader Muamar Ghaddafi for years and often been accused as acting as Ghaddafi's agent in the destabilization of West African countries like Sierra Leone, Liberia and the Ivory Coast. - Adam Geibel

January 6, 2004 Former rebel ministers ended their three month boycott of the coalition government in Abidjan, with most of them returning to the economic capital to meet President Gbagbo. - Adam Geibel

January 7, 2004 Four men armed with AK-47s arrived in the western village of Kahin and started shooting, killing one local. The village had been torched the day before and French forces found six bodies in a nearby village of the 5th. The killings probably stemmed from ethnic differences that pit local tribes against immigrant farmers who form the backbone of Ivory Coast's cocoa workforce, rather than a resurgence of rebel activity. - Adam Geibel

January 9, 2004 The Ivory Coast called on the United Nations to set up a peacekeeping operation, instead of leaving the job to West African and French forces. If all Ivorian parties took the necessary steps to show irreversible progress by February 4, UN secretary-general Kofi Annan would recommend a force of 6,240 peacekeeping troops (including 200 military observers) be sent to the Ivory Coast. This plan would incorporate the 1,500 West African peacekeeping troops already in the country but would exclude 4,000 French peacekeepers, who would work alongside the UN force under separate command. This is despite the misgivings of the United States have been wary of approving any new peacekeeping venture in Ivory Coast because of the cost. While UN peacekeeping missions are financed by all 191 UN member countries, the United States pays 27 per cent of the peacekeeping budget.

At least one person was killed and ten wounded, when a rogue group tried to break into a bank in the rebel stronghold of Bouake triggered a 2 a.m. shootout with rebels defending the building. Heavily armed West African troops later deployed around the building. - Adam Geibel

January 10, 2004 The Prime Minister officially launched the campaign to disarm the Ivory Coast's assorted armed groups, which will be difficult since there are no accurate figures on how many men are under arms. The only definite figure is that the Ivorian military had 18,500 troops enlisted before the war began in September 2002.

The current plan has the country broken down into zones, each with an armory and a disarmament camp. This will allow independent monitors to inventory weapons and fighters, as well as prepare camps for fighters to enter a demobilization and rehabilitation program. What those former fighters will actually do after they stand down is an unanswered question. - Adam Geibel

January 13, 2004 The French peacekeeping force urged the government army and police to send reinforcements to help it maintain order in the troubled west, after reporting that 18 people had been killed there in two weeks of ethnic clashes. Tension was rising in villages around the town of Bangolo (600 kilometers northwest of Abidjan), where French soldiers had found the bodies of 18 people killed in ethnic fighting since 29 December.

Bangolo lies inside the demilitarized "Zone of Confidence," just a few kilometers from the rebel frontline. Only French and West African peacekeeping troops are allowed to bear arms there, but French forces had asked the government's paramilitary gendarmerie to send reinforcements to the West to help patrol towns and villages south of the demilitarized zone (on or near the road between Duekoue, 45 km south of Bangolo, and Toulepleu on the Liberian border). - Adam Geibel

January 15, 2004 A humanitarian aid worker who recently returned to Abidjan from a visit to the 'Wild West' claimed that while the December-March cocoa harvest was in full swing, fighting to control of the cocoa plantations was heating up. Lebanese cocoa buyers from Liberia were stocking up on cut-price beans in both the government and rebel-held sectors for smuggling to nearby Guinea. - Adam Geibel

January 20, 2004 As many as 30,000 former fighters could go through the Ivory Coast's disarmament, demobilization and reintegration (DDR) program, which pro-government militias, rebel groups and civilians who fought on both sides, as well as 4,000 people recruited into the national army soon after war broke out in September 2002.

The preliminary cost of the DDR program is estimated at $111.3 millions, of which the Ivorian government is expected to contribute $22 million. The World Bank, the European Union, the United Nations, the French Cooperation Agency were among donors who would foot the bulk of the DDR bill. Disarmament and demobilization could take up to four months, while reintegrating the former combatants into society could require as much as two years. Each combatant will receive a reintegration package of about $924 in six monthly installments - Adam Geibel

January 22, 2004 The French were discovering a lot of things as they extended their patrols in the North and warned of continuing tension. In rebel-held Korhogo, four people were killed as two rival rebel groups fought a gun battle for the control of a disputed petrol tanker.

There have recently been a series of clashes between rival factions of the rebel movement near the borders with Burkina Faso and Mali. About 300 French peacekeepers were deployed to the northern towns of Korhogo and Ferkessedegou in early January to help stabilize the situation. These troops discovered that the rebels were holding an unspecified number of prisoners (including Liberians and suspected government infiltrators) in several containers in Korhogo. - Adam Geibel

February 8, 2004 A rebel warlord in the northern city of Korhogo was dragged out of a nightclub and ritually shot dead by unidentified assailants in the early hours. Depending on what source is to be believed, Adama Coulibaly (better known by his nom de guerre "Adams") was either killed by one of his own Liberian bodyguards or masked assassins sent by the rebel leadership in Bouake (stemming from the petrol tanker incident in January). - Adam Geibel

February 18, 2004 Despite the presence of French peacekeeping troops, two Burkinabe immigrants were killed and at least seven others seriously wounded in machete attacks by local Guere tribe youths in the western government-controlled town of Duekoue (500 kilometers northwest of the commercial capital Abidjan).

Ethnic rivalries and land disputes, marauding bands of armed Liberians, squabbling rebel warlords and the threat of Liberian rebel fighters spilling back over the border all combine to make the 'Wild West' an explosive place. The civil war displaced around 150,000 people and even nine months after the ceasefire, killings and violence remain commonplace. There are just too many weapons are in the hands of young people drafted into fighting forces or vigilante groups, and not enough gainful employment for those who would put down their AK-47s. - Adam Geibel

February 26, 2004 Deploying a multifaceted United Nations peacekeeping force in the Ivory Coast for six months would cost about $303 million. The current UN mission in the Ivory Coast (MINUCI) has 34 military officers and a small number of civilian employees.

As another example of how interdependent West Africa is, health workers are increasingly worried that the Ivory Coast could suffer a polio outbreak spilled over from northern Nigeria, where Islamic clerics halted a new vaccination drive this week. - Adam Geibel

February 28, 2004 The UN Security Council approved a resolution to set up the United Nations Operation in Ivory Coast (UNOCI) for an initial period of 12 months. This will put 6,240 UN peacekeepers (including 200 military observers and 120 staff officers, and up to 350 civilian police officers) in the Ivory Coast, starting on April 4.

Meanwhile, the leader of the 'New Forces' (former rebels) announced that his fighters will not lay down their weapons before elections set for late next year, unless all key issues of the peace accord were met. Last week the prime minister of the national reconciliation government announced that the process would begin on 8 March. - Adam Geibel

February 29, 2004 People living in the rebel-held north still have few jobs and civil servants still aren't back on the job, so basic services like health and schooling remain lacking. But many locals in the heavily Moslem area claim that they don't mind living under the rebels, since they no longer feel like second-class citizens. Their biggest complaint is a lack of banks, without which businesses are extremely difficult to start. As such, the northerners are looking forward to UN peacekeepers extending the security blanket the handful of French troops currently provide. - Adam Geibel

March 15, 2004 Three projects aimed at disarming and demobilizing thousands of former fighters (including child soldiers) were launched by the Government and UN over the last week.

Meanwhile, the $304 million UN Security Council decision to send more than 6,000 peacekeepers in by the beginning of April hit a slight snag. The Angolan contingent (ever sensitive to revolutionaries) has yet to work out to their satisfaction a plan so that neither government or rebels benefit from their deployment. - Adam Geibel

March 25, 2004 The anti-government demonstration went ahead in the commercial capital (Abidjan), and was met with force by the police. At least two dozen people were killed. Among the dead were two policemen, and twelve civilians killed by demonstrators armed with machetes.

March 26, 2004 The power-sharing government collapsed as rebels and the main opposition party pulled out. This was because of 25 people dieing in an anti-government demonstration in the commercial capital (Abidjan) that the government had declared illegal. The rebels and opposition parties said they would continue demonstrating. The government is believed to be just going through the motions of negotiating with the northern rebels, and really wants to marshal enough forces to crush the rebels.

May 1, 2004 Last July's peace deal is stalled. The government apparently is plotting to retake the northern part of the country from the rebels, and the rebels suspect this is the case and are preparing for it. The rebels are also bitter that the 4,000 French peacekeepers did nothing to stop the government troops from firing on demonstrators in the commercial capital (Abidjan) last month. It is thought that several hundred people were killed by government and police during April, as retaliation for the March 25 demonstrations against the government. There are only 1,300 West African peacekeepers in the country, although the force is to grow to 6,240 in the next few months. But the peacekeepers and French troops will operate as separate forces. French and UN diplomats are trying to get the government and rebel leaders to abide by 2003 peace deal, but are not having much success. The northern rebels, who are largely Moslem, are talking about seceding and forming a new country.

May 20, 2004 The government has fired three rebel leaders who had jobs as government ministers. The rebels in the Moslem north claim that the government is hiring foreign mercenaries fro Liberia and Chad for a planned reconquest of the north. This is unlikely, as there are 4,000 French troops and several thousand (of an eventual 6,000) UN peacekeepers in the country. But the government only controls the southern part of the country and reunification is not likely to come without compromise. Neither the government nor the rebels have very effective military forces. Each side has thousands of men with guns and some heavy weapons. But there is no competent military leadership or logistical support system. The national economy has collapsed because the war has halted the lucrative cocoa trade. The southerners expect the UN to disarm the rebels in the north, while the rebels expect the UN to force the government to give northerners a fair share of government jobs and leadership positions. It's common, in Africa, for the tribe of the national leader to get a monopoly on government jobs.

June 8, 2004 Fighters loyal to warlord Ibrahim Coulibaly attacked an army installation, apparently in an attempt to steal weapons. Five soldiers and two civilians were killed, as well as fifteen of the attackers. Another fifteen attackers were captured. Following that, pro-government mobs in the commercial capital (Abidjan attacked foreigners, blaming foreign plots and agents for the unrest in the country.

June 10, 2004 Anti-French (and foreigner in general) violence in southern Ivory Coast has led to a widespread call for French troops to leave. The popular belief is that the French are holding the Ivory Coast army back fro sweeping north to put down the rebellion. The army does not appear any more capable to defeating the rebels now than they were a year ago.

June 21, 2004 In the north, a rebel commander fought, and defeated, forces said to be backed by the presidents of Ivory Coast and Guinea. Ivory Coast has basically turned into a patchwork of warlord controlled territories. French and UN peacekeepers try to keep the roads open for foreign relief operations, but otherwise avoid taking sides in the occasional skirmishes between warlord forces.

June 23, 2004 The civil war has been going on since September, 2002, and shows no signs of ending. The rebels in the north are not very united, and the government, which controls the south, cannot muster the military power to defeat the rebels.

July 30, 2004 Negotiations between the government and the rebels concluded with an agreement to give rebel commanders senior government jobs, and restore government control in the north.

August 5, 2004 So far, there is no movement in restoring government control in the north. The problem remains that immigrants, who have entered the northern part of the country in the past few decades, and come to dominate the farming economy up there, are the envy of the less successful native Ivorians. The immigrants are thought to be a majority of the population in the northern part of the country. The immigrants were attracted by available land, and good government in the Ivory Coast. But native born politicians used resentment against the success of the migrants to pass laws allowing the confiscation of many of the farming operations and businesses created by the migrants. Rather than see that happen, the northerners armed themselves and drove out the army and government officials. The current stalemate arises from the fact that most native Ivorians now want to drive our the migrants, but the migrants don't want to give up all they have created and leave.

August 8, 2004 At least ten northern rebels have fled to neighboring Mali, to avoid getting killed by violent factional fighting. UN investigators recently found a mass grave containing the bodies of 99 rebels who lost out in a June battle between northern rebel factions. Other dissident rebels have fled to Burkina Faso. While the government is trying to assemble an effective farming force, the northern rebels have split into warlord dominated factions and are fighting among themselves.

There are 4,000 French peacekeepers in the country, who mainly see that the government and rebel troops do not move into each others territory. There are another 6,200 UN peacekeepers on the way, who will supervise disarming of the rebels and pro-government militias.

September 14, 2004 A dozen French soldiers, guarding a bank in the north, broke into the vault and stole $120,000 in local currency. The soldiers were arrested a week later and sent back to France for prosecution. The French were guarding the bank in rebel territory because two other banks had been looted earlier.

September 24, 2004 The 6,000 UN peacekeepers and 4,000 French troops are distrusted by the government and the rebels, feeling that the foreigners favor the other side. Both the government and rebels want all the foreign troops out of the country. This, of course, would allow the civil war to resume. There are national elections scheduled for October, 2005. This is supposed to elect a new government that will be acceptable to everyone. It's uncertain if that will work. The rebellion began two years ago, and was interrupted by French and UN peacekeepers. But the basic economic issues between the northerners and southerners have not been resolved. A 400 kilometer long "cease fire line" keeps government and rebel forces from each other. The main complaint of the southerners is that four million migrants from foreign countries have moved into the north and prospered. But this prosperity is seen achieved at the expense of many of the "native born" southerners. It's all about money and tribal identity among 16 million people in the country.

October 7, 2004 For most of the week, pro-government crowds have demonstrated in front of French peacekeeper barracks. There have been some violence, and the French threaten to round up the demonstration leaders if the pro-government forces don't back off.

October 11, 2004 Rebel and pro-government militias are to begin disarming, and getting paid several hundred dollars per man, on the 15th. However, the pro-government forces show no interest in granting all inhabitants of northern Ivory Coast full citizens rights. This is the root cause of the current unrest, and the northern rebels are aware of it. Many people in the country believe that the disarmament won't work and fighting will resume.

November 4, 2004 The cease fire was broken today with government air raids on rebel bases in the north of the country. There were several dozen casualties, and a rebel controlled TV station was damaged. A resumption of the ground war would be difficult, as there are 6,000 UN peacekeepers, and 4,000 French troops, patrolling the border between government controlled southern Ivory Coast, the the rebel controlled north. But the UN has stopped all humanitarian work in the country until it is clear how much fighting there will be.

November 5, 2004 The UN has warned the Ivory Coast president that he risked unspecified retribution if he continued breaking the cease fire. Meanwhile, pro-government gangs have attacked and destroyed four opposition newspapers in the southern (government controlled) part of the country. The remaining 16 newspapers in the government controlled area are generally pro-government.

November 6, 2004 The government's two newly acquired Su-25 warplanes bombed a French barracks in the rebel held north. Nine French soldiers were killed (along with an American aid worker) and 23 were wounded. In retaliation, French in the south seized the airport outside the commercial capital (Abidjan), where the Ivory Coast air force is based, and destroyed five air force aircraft on the ground (including two Russian made Su-25s and three Mi-24 helicopter gunship). France also announced that it had moved three Mirage F1 fighters from Chad to an airbase in nearby Gabon. This means that the Ivory Coast air force is being encouraged to stay on the ground, or die. There are apparently still two Mi-24 helicopter gunships available to the government, plus some older Alpha jets. The Su-25s were the most lethal aircraft the government had, however. The Su-25 is the Russian equivalent of the American A-10 ground attack aircraft. The Su-25 is a 19 ton aircraft with a 30mm cannon and the ability to carry four tons of bombs, rockets and missiles. Russia and other East European countries (or gunrunners) provide these aircraft, including pilots, ground crews and bombs, for those who can pay, and provide a place for the warplanes to operate from.

November 7, 2004 Mobs of pro-government men are forming in the commercial capital (Abidjan) and threatening to retake the airport from French troops. In response, France is sending another 300 troops to help out in the commercial capital (Abidjan). France has some serious problems in Ivory Coast, as 14,000 French citizens live there. Ivorians in the south expected France to help the government defeat the northern rebels. But France has instead urged the government to work out a deal with the rebels. Too many southern politicians were intent on crushing the rebels, and urged mobs of like minded young men to join the army and militias, or just intimidate those who sided with France. There us some fighting in the north, as some government troops or militias have gotten past peacekeeper roadblocks. But France is angry with the government now, and appears ready to take sides by making more attacks on government forces, even if mainly in self defense.

November 8, 2004 France moved more troops into the commercial capital (Abidjan) in order to protect thousands of French, and other foreign, residents. Mobs of nationalistic young men have been burning and looting the homes and businesses of French citizens. The nationalistic southerners blame the French for not helping the government to defeat the northern rebels. Now France has destroyed the Ivory Coast air force and is aiding UN peacekeepers in preventing government troops from entering rebel controlled territory in the north. The tension, and violence, is a result of decades of prosperity in Ivory Coast, and the migration of thousands of people (many of them Moslem) from neighboring countries, to take advantage of the economic boom. This became a growing political issue in the last decade, and led to civil war two years ago. The economy is now in ruins, and the southerners, who are overwhelmingly native Ivorians, see the expulsion of anyone not from a native Ivorian tribe, as the solution to all problems. But many of the "foreigners" have been here for decades and are willing to fight rather than leave.

The government has called off its invasion of the north, and is trying to deal with the French troops taking over the capital (in order to protect foreigners, both African and European).

November 9, 2004 Four days of street violence in the commercial capital (Abidjan) have left at least ten dead and over 300 wounded. Government controlled media has stirred things up by claiming that French troops are attempting to replace the current president Gbagbo. This story has a basis in fact, as France has remained a kingmaker in its former colonies. A combination of generous economic aid, and a willingness to send in troops to prop up a cooperative government, has defined the politics of countries like Ivory Coast since the French colonial governments shut down in the 1960s. Ivorians know that France wants the differences between the government and the rebels settled peacefully. But the people also know that the government refuses to back off from its demand that many of the residents of the north be expelled to the countries they, or their parents or grandparents, migrated from. France will not back ethnic cleansing, but the southerners see this as an essential policy lest the "original Ivorians" lose control of their own country.

People in the West will become aware of Ivory Coast whether they want or not because Ivory Coast produces 1.4 million tons of cocoa a year, and the unrest there has stopped shipments. Cocoa is the raw material for producing chocolate and Ivory Coast produces 40 percent of the world supply. The annual harvest is in progress, mainly in the north of the country. Some 80 percent of the crop is harvested between October and January.

November 10, 2004 Ivory Coast president Laurent Gbagbo, who came to power in 2000 via fraud and demagoguery, is running out of options. He refuses to make peace with the northern rebels, mainly because he has gathered support among southerners by promising to expel migrants (up to several generations back) and make life better for "real Ivorians." The UN and France won't put up with that, and are threatening sanctions (against arms imports) and other restrictions if Gbagbo doesn't come up with another strategy. His current one isn't working. His army cannot overwhelm the 11,000 UN and French peacekeepers, and unleashing mobs of angry civilians in the commercial capital (Abidjan) has only further weakened the economy.

November 11, 2004 The rioting in the commercial capital (Abidjan) has caused several thousand foreigners to flee the country and has destroyed a large portion of the economy in the city. So far, about three dozen people have been killed, and over a thousand wounded. The mobs are looting businesses, factories and even public facilities. As a result, many services, including electrical power in some areas, no longer operate.

November 14, 2004 About a quarter of the 24,000 Westerners in the country have fled, as mobs of nationalists attack and rob any foreigners they can find. There is also a large Lebanese and Arab community (about 100,000 people), and over a thousand of these have fled as well. The mobs believe that the "foreigners" are siding with the northern rebels. However, there are about 60 different ethnic or tribal groups in Ivory Coast. Some of these tribes cover several different countries, making it difficult to tell who is a native of Ivory Coast, and who is not.

Many in the south also fear that France will replace President Gbagbo. In the past, French troops have helped keep leaders of former French colonies in office, and have eased unpopular dictators out as well. But the situation in southern Ivory Coast will require more than a change of government. Tribal and religious violence has been stirred up, and that nastiness is very difficult to put back into the bottle. The French have 5,000 troops in the country, but that is not enough to put down all the violence.

The exodus of the foreigners will cripple commercial activity, as these people either operate, or own, many businesses that are key parts of the economy. President Gbagbo has fired the head of the armed forces, and replaced him with a more hard line fellow. At the moment, the northern rebels are standing aside, and watching as the pro-government southerners destroy their economy, and much infrastructure and other property.

November 16, 2004 The UN has imposed a 13 month arms embargo on Ivory Coast, with the threat of additional embargos on senior Ivorian politicians if the arms embargo does not work. Ivorian officials have already said they will try to get around any embargo.

November 17, 2004 While most of Ivory Coasts new weapons (especially the warplanes) have come from Eastern Europe, at least one UAV was purchased from an Israeli firm. The UAV has been flying over northern Ivory Coast, collecting information on rebel military capabilities. Apparently, Israeli personnel were hired to operate the UAV and run the reconnaissance operation.

November 18, 2004 UN efforts to talk the government out of invading the rebel held north have partially succeeded. The government has stopped the pro-war campaign in the government controlled electronic media. The pro-war radio broadcasts were a major problem in keeping the peace, and this hate filled programming has stopped, for the moment. Many of the broadcasts were directed against France, but some 6,000 French troops in Ivory Coast persuaded the government to change their programming.

November 19, 2004 Over 20,000 Ivorians demonstrated against France, and French troops opened fire, killing and wounding some of the demonstrators.

November 20, 2004 Rebels in the north are now determined to get president Gbagbo out of office. The rebels feel that Gbagbo is the main cause of all the violence, and the recent resumption in the fighting.

November 21, 2004 Four days of violence against French troops the commercial capital, and country's largest city, Abidjan, has left over 600 wounded, and over 60 dead. So far, 8,300 French civilians have fled Ivory Coast, along with a thousand other foreigners and some 13,000 Ivorians. The government is trying to work out a way to go to war against the northern rebels without running into UN and French peacekeepers.

November 27, 2004 Hostility to the UN in the south has gotten so bad that a UN food aid aircraft was fired upon when it landed in the town of Man. Nationalist attitudes in the south blame the French and the UN for the division of the country, playing down the fact that the northerners blame the southerners for the problems.

December 5, 2004 Despite continued tension, the lack of large scale fighting in the last few weeks has encouraged most of the refugees who fled to Liberia, to return home.

December 23, 2004 Tribal violence, over ownership of cocoa growing land, left at least 14 dead in western Ivory Coast. The breakdown of the government has allowed many land disputes to get resolved by tribal vigilantes. The unrest, vigilantes and banditry has encouraged both the government and the rebels to try and make peace.

December 25, 2004 Despite the popularity of resuming the civil war among nationalistic southerners, the parliament has passed a series of laws that resolve most of the nationality problems that anger so many northerners. The civil war began in the 1990s, as southerners, resentful of migrants moving into northern Ivory Coast to supply workers for the booming cocoa industry, tried to restrict who could become a citizen (and participate in politics, either by running for office or voting.)

January 14, 2005 Northern rebels missed the January 6th deadline to disarm, saying they did not trust UN peacekeepers to protect them from government forces.

January 24, 2005 After much negotiation, the UN allowed the government to move four damaged combat aircraft, as the air force attempts to make repairs. The aircraft include one lightly damaged Mi-24 helicopter gunship and a Strike Master ground attack jet that can still fly. Two more severely damaged Su-25 ground attack aircraft are being moved by road, under UN supervision. The UN won't allow the aircraft back into service until the peace deal with the northern rebels is completed.

January 27, 2005 In retaliation for the UN allowing air force aircraft to be repaired, rebels have prevented government owned cotton to be moved out of rebel held areas. The government owns the organization that sells the cotton. The cotton harvest was just completed.

January 30, 2005 Government and rebel forces refuse to complete the terms of the two year old peace agreement. There is a lack of trust. This is stoked by items like a UN report that accuses the president's wife, Simone Gbagbo, of running a death squad that killed nearly a hundred political opponents. President Gbagbo's dirty politics were largely responsible for causing the civil war in the first place. Gbagbo is still in power, and he apparently believes he can use wheeling and dealing with the UN and peacekeepers to defeat the northern rebels.

March 1, 2005 A pro-government militia tried to cross the truce line into rebel held territory. This triggered a battle that left about 30 militiamen dead, and nearly 90 captured.

March 13, 2005 The government isn't saying much, but thousands of pro-government volunteers and militiamen are moving towards the truce line, and the UN and French peacekeepers that guard it. The northern rebels openly say they expect the government forces to try and get past the peacekeepers, and try to conquer the north. The peacekeepers believe they can stop a major movement of government forces north, but cannot prevent small groups from going north and raiding. The government denies any involvement in this. Peace efforts are going nowhere.

March 17, 2005 UN observers accused government park rangers of killing 13 civilians while following orders to clear squatters from a state park. The chaos of the civil war has forced refugees to live wherever they can.

March 24, 2005 Pro-government militias are sneaking past peacekeeper roadblocks to raid pro-rebel villages in the north. The rebels threaten to retaliate if the government doesn't stop the violence.

April 6, 2005 The government has agreed to make peace with the northern rebels, and to disarmament and resolution of existing disputes.

April 13, 2005 A senior army commander was arrested for plotting to overthrow the government. Many Ivorians are not happy with the division of the country, which they blame on rabble rousing by president Gbagbo.

April 14, 2005 After five months of boycotting the government, rebel government ministers have resumed working in their government jobs. At the same time, rebel and government negotiations resumed peace talks.

April 16, 2005 While the government, under diplomatic pressure, especially from the UN, has agreed to end the war threats, and make peace with the northern rebels. But president Gbagbo has unleashed forces they may not be able to control. Gbagbo has set native Ivorian tribes against the many immigrants who have moved into the north over the last few generations to help build the cocoa growing industry. This has led to other ancient tribal disputes being revived, and a general sense of unrest. Now, many Ivorians see their country sliding towards the same kind of chaos that recently destroyed Sierra Leone and Liberia.

May 14, 2005 The government and the northern rebels signed a disarmament deal. Beginning on June 27, the rebels, and most of the armed government supporters, will disarm. This operation would include rebels being given government jobs and the differences between northerners and southerners being settled by negotiation and without violence.

May 25, 2005 The agreed upon disarmament got off to a false start when pro-government militiamen showed up and offered only a single AK-47. In other words, they won't disarm.

June 2, 2005 Fighting erupted in the west, near the Liberian border. A Guere village was attacked by Dioula tribesmen. Over a hundred died, and many more were wounded. Nearby Ivory Coast troops refused to intervene, and the killing stopped when UN peacekeepers arrived hours later. The Ivory Coast army is more interested in shaking down travelers along the main roads (where the soldiers establish roadblocks and demand bribes to let people pass.) The two tribes have been fighting over land for a long time.

June 17, 2005 Tribal violence broke out in southeast Ivory Coast.

June 18, 2005 The government has appointed a military governor for the western parts of the country that have suffered from tribal violence lately. The military governor is expected to motivate soldiers to do their job and keep the peace.

June 22, 2005 Violence broke out in the west again, leaving two dead and several wounded.

June 24, 2005 The UN agreed to try and raise 850 more troops and 375 police for peacekeeping operations. France wanted a larger increase in the current 6,200 troops in the peacekeeping force. The violence appears to have been caused by tribal feuds.

June 25, 2005 The disarmament, which is supposed to take place starting on the 27th, does not appear ready to happen. Neither side trusts the other, and both sides are split by factional and tribal disputes.

June 29, 2005 Rebels accuse the government of hiring mercenaries from Guinea to attack their positions.

June 30, 2005 UN inspectors found 22 military jeeps at the port of Abidjan. This is a violation of the UN arms (and military equipment) embargo imposed last November.

July 9, 2005 The rebels and the government have agreed to a disarmament schedule, in preparation for the October 15 elections. There have been disarmament schedule agreements before, but they fell apart because of squabbling over details.

July 23, 2005 Unidentified gunmen attacked a prison and police post outside the capital, and killed five policemen. Four of the attackers were killed as well, but over 1,500 prisoners were set free. The government blamed rebels for the attack.

July 26, 2005 The government says the armed men who attacked a prison over the weekend were from Burkina Faso and Mali, two countries that back the rebels. The government captured gunmen from those nations.

July 28, 2005 The Israel and the UN are investigating charges that an Israeli firm exported Israeli weapons to Ivory Coast, in defiance of the UN weapons embargo. UN investigators say they could find no evidence of any combat in the areas the government claimed there was on July 23rd

July 30, 2005 Pro-government militias are chasing down local and foreign journalists and threatening them. This has made it difficult, or impossible, to double check government claims. Peacekeepers believe that some recent attacks on government forces were actually staged by the government, to provide cover for government attacks on rebel positions.

August 1, 2005 At the last minute, the government and rebels refused to proceed with the previously agreed upon disarmament. There are 40,000 rebel and 5,500 pro-government gunmen are supposed to be demobilizing. One of the disputes is over the number of sites for people to assemble for disarming. The government wants no more than 100 sites, while the rebels want at least 140.

August 2, 2005 A Togolese peacekeeper had his cell phone stolen, and was shot, in the capital. This appears to be a robbery, not a political statement.

August 7, 2005 Government forces are increasingly interfering with the movement of peacekeeping forces. Military roadblocks and obviously organized crowds on the roads are the usual methods. The peacekeepers are protesting, but the government claims it has nothing to do with it, and cannot do anything.

August 9, 2005 The rebels have turned down South Africa as a mediator, accusing the South African as being pro-government. The mediation has been going on since last November.

August 15, 2005 The rebel north has few government services, and is basically run by warlords who support themselves, and their gunmen, with smuggling and theft. Roads and other infrastructure are crumbling. The standard of living has declined by nearly half in the north, somewhat less in the government controlled south. Most of the national wealth came from the cocoa production in the north, which is now much diminished by disorder up north.

August 26, 2005 The northern rebels have withdrawn from the mediation process and refused to participate in the October 30 national elections. The rebels believe the international community is really backing the government. The rebels are particularly keen to see president Laurent Gbagbo removed, blaming him for all the trouble in the first place.

August 31, 2005 A UN peacekeeper was stabbed to death in rebel held territory.

September 3, 2005 France accuses the rebels of rearming and recruiting new fighters for their militias. Both sides has agreed, last April, to disarm. But this process did not begin on schedule, or at all. The rebel warlords who run the north are apparently content to leave the nation partitioned. The government in the south is not strong enough to defeat the warlords, and the 6,000 UN peacekeepers, and 4,000 French troops are not willing to remove the rebel gunmen. The rebels are not willing to participate in elections, while the government is. This means that if the elections go forward, the current government will be re-elected and nothing will change.

October 18, 2005: France is investigating a general, who formerly commander peacekeepers in Ivory Coast, about covering up the death of an Ivorian civilian killed by French troops. There have been several incidents of misbehavior by French troops in Ivory Coast, including several soldiers who looted an abandoned bank. There is an increasing amount of banditry and lawlessness in Ivory Coast, and French peacekeepers often administer summary justice to criminals, or suspects, they seize. Usually, the "justice" is a beating, or some other rough treatment. But in some cases, the suspects have died in custody, and this has become a big deal in Ivory Coast, where the French are seen as foreign occupiers by residents of the south (who back expelling many northerners who were born in neighboring countries.)

October 23, 2005: President Laurent Gbagbo is the main problem in the current civil war, and refuses to leave office, or give up any power to a prime minister. The rebels refuse to negotiate with any government headed by Gbagbo (who started the war by trying to declare many northern Ivorians "foreigners" three years ago, because they, or their parents, migrated from neighboring countries to ease a worker shortage in the booming cocoa industry up there.) The UN is threatening Gbagbo with sanctions, to little effect. November 2, 2005: Cocoa production has kept going in the Moslem north, but it is lower because of the higher costs of production. Many bribes must be paid to soldiers and warlords, in order for the crop to be moved south, into the Christian south. The warlords are enjoying all this wealth, and are reluctant to give it up without some kind of "compensation." Thus neither president Gbagbo, nor the northern rebels, have any real incentive to change the current situation.

October 24, 2005: President Laurent Gbagbo's term of office has expired, new elections were not held (because he and the rebels could not agree on the details), and Gbagbo insists that he can legally stay in office. The rebels, and many other Ivorians, disagree.

October 28, 2005: NGOs have begun a major media campaign protesting the governments hiring of Liberians for the army. The main NGO complaint is that many of the Liberians hired are teenagers. Of course, teenagers have served in local military organizations for thousands of years, but the NGOs use the "child soldier" angle to bring attention to themselves, and to assist in fund raising. The government is hiring Liberians (including many who have been living in Ivory Coast for many years) because they are considered more loyal to president Gbagbo.

October 30, 2005: In the capital, and elsewhere in the country, thousands of protestors demonstrated against the lack of elections and presidentLaurent Gbagbo extending his rule one year. November 24, 2005: President Gbagbo is so far successful in keeping the UN from forcing a peace deal on the country. Gbagbo is determined to crush the rebels up north, despite the presence of peacekeepers. Gbagbo recently resisted UN pressure to accept a prime minister that was sympathetic to the rebels. Therefore, the situation in Ivory Coast could drag on for years, with the UN wringing its hands, and the government and rebels scheming to develop an edge for the next round of fighting.

November 15, 2005: Despite the UN arms embargo, the government is putting two Russian Su-25 bombers back into service. The aircraft were damaged a year ago, and others destroyed, by a French air attack. That was in retaliation for an Ivory Coast army attack on French troops. The government is bringing in foreign technicians to do the repairs. The UN is not sure if this is a violation of the arms embargo, so for the moment, the government lawyers have won a battle for the revived air force (by not triggering more UN sanctions while the warplanes are repaired). The two Su-25s being restored to service could be decisive weapons against the poorly armed and led rebel forces.

November 17, 2005: Both the government are smuggling in weapons, despite the UN embargo against new weapons. The rebels are getting money by extorting large sums from those working the diamond fields in the rebel territory. The rebels refuse to let the UN inspect the diamond mining areas. The government still controls much of the lucrative cocoa production, and taxes it heavily.

November 24, 2005: President Gbagbo is so far successful in keeping the UN from forcing a peace deal on the country. Gbagbo is determined to crush the rebels up north, despite the presence of peacekeepers. Gbagbo recently resisted UN pressure to accept a prime minister that was sympathetic to the rebels. Therefore, the situation in Ivory Coast could drag on for years, with the UN wringing its hands, and the government and rebels scheming to develop an edge for the next round of fighting.

December 1, 2005: About twenty gunmen, in civilian clothes, attacked a military police barracks in Ivory Coast's largest city Abidjan. The attackers, unidentified, were driven off in the darkness.

December 2, 2005: The deadlock between the government, in the south, and the rebels, in the north, is causing the country to be ruled by warlords and outlaws. Despite pressure from the UN, and the presence of 10,000 peacekeepers, the government and rebels will not agree to a deal to share power. The country is drifting into total social collapse, like so many other countries in Africa. President Gbagbo postponed a promised trip to the rebel stronghold of Bouake.
- Adam Geibel

December 16, 2005: The UN has banned the sale of Ivory Coast diamonds. These are mined in the rebel held north of the country. The diamonds are being sold by various factions to buy arms and may gunmen. The UN has also renewed for another year, the arms embargo on Ivory Coast.

January 2, 2006: Two army bases near the southern city of Abidjan were attacked, and looted of weapons and munitions. Ten people were killed, including three soldiers. Later, 32 people were arrested for involvement in the attacks, including three soldiers. The country is seeing the growth of more warlords, and to be a warlord you need weapons. Soldiers are also angry about not getting paid, and willing to use their weapons to get what they want.

January 5, 2006: While a new government has been formed in the last week, and accepted by most factions, there is no end to the civil war. The rebel leaders have become warlords, and the looting of the national wealth is proceeding. The UN is trying to raise money to hire more peacekeepers so that the warlords can be encouraged to disarm. Unfortunately, the country appears stuck in "loot" mode for some time.

January 6, 2006: In the last three months, the rebel held part of the country exported 130,000 tons of cocoa. That's about a third of the national production.

January 7, 2006: The attack on army bases in the capital earlier this month apparently involved several dozen men from Burkina Faso January 16, 2006: In protest to UN recommendations that the parliament be suspended, supporters of president Laurent Gbagbo began rioting in the capital. Gbagbo controls the current parliament, which was elected without representing the northern rebels.

January 17, 2006: Several hundred FPI supporters stormed a UN base, but were driven back with tear gas and troops firing warning shots.

January 18, 2006: The FPI (the ruling party Ivorian Popular Front) is demanding the 10,000 French and African Union (AU) peacekeepers get out. The party leader, president Laurent Gbagbo, will not compromise with the northern rebels, nor will he allow a new parliament, which he does not control, take office. Gbagbo wants to destroy the northern rebels, but does not have the military power to do so. He can't push past the 10,000 peacekeepers either.

January 20, 2006: The leaders of the pro- Gbagbo youth organizations called off the violent anti-UN demonstrations. These riots failed to spur the peacekeepers into using their weapons, and causing a lot of civilian casualties. This, the pro-Gbagbo crowd hoped, would cause the UN to be demoralized and withdraw from the country. The rioters did about two million dollars worth of damage, including looting of NGO compounds they broke into.

January 24, 2006: The UN decided to keep peacekeepers in Ivory Coast until December 15th.

January 25, 2006: The government of Laurent Gbagbo is using the radio stations they control in the south to push an anti-UN/French/foreigner message. Gbagbo believes that he has the military force to conquer the rebellious north. Gbagbo also realizes that the French and UN peacekeepers are too strong for his forces to overcome, so he must find some way to convince the French and UN peacekeepers to leave. The UN is not willing to simply remove Gbagbo, if only because he merely represents the attitudes of many in south Ivory Coast. The result is stalemate, and it will remain stalemate for some time.

January 27, 2006: Because of the anti-UN violence, the UN has pulled a fifth of its 2000 staff out of the country. This will hamper relief efforts, especially since several NGOs have also pulled their staff out. The anti-UN rioters have done a lot of looting, cleaning out food warehouses and aid organization headquarters. The rioters have gone after refugee camps holding 13,000 people from Liberia and other countries. The Ivorians want the refugees out.

January 31, 2006: Fear of more anti-UN violence is driving farm workers, in the west, back to their villages, to defend their families. This is threatening the April Cocoa harvest, and what's left of the economy. Several years of civil disorder has impoverished what used to be one of the most prosperous countries in Africa. The anti-UN groups, who are supporters of president Laurent Gbagbo, have threatened more violence if UN peacekeepers try to reoccupy their bases in western Ivory Coast. The Gbagbo gangs are demanding that the rebels up north disarm, and that the peacekeepers get out of the country.

February 2, 2006: President Laurent Gbagbo's most powerful force is his young gangs, which can mobilize thousands of young men to attack anything from unarmed civilians, to well armed peacekeepers. The UN now says that it will meet force with force, but Gbagbo apparently doesn't believe it. The UN has enough peacekeepers to prevent Gbagbo troops from advancing north, but not to control the pro- Gbagbo gangs. If the UN does not shut down the gangs, the country will slip further into anarchy and poverty.

February 3, 2006: Despite efforts to regulate the "blood diamond" trade, illegal diamond mining in northern Ivory Coast continues, and is a major source of income for the northern rebels. The diamonds are smuggled across the border to Mali, where a network of dealers have well established methods for getting past the diamond industry attempts to stop the sale of "blood diamonds."

February 6, 2006: The UN has moved several hundred of its peacekeepers from Liberia to Ivory Coast, in anticipation of more anti-UN riots. The UN has called for more permanent peacekeepers for Ivory Coast, but is having a hard time getting members to donate money and troops. Meanwhile, in western Ivory Coast, things have quieted down enough for relief organizations have resumed distributing food and other aid.

February 9, 2006: The U.S. placed travel and financial sanctions on three leaders of the "Young Patriots" movement in Ivory Coast. This group is behind the street violence in government controlled Ivory Coast, and openly back (and apparently take orders from) president Gbagbo.

February 11, 2006: The UN has billed the Ivorian government $3.5 million for damages done to UN facilities during last months riots. The UN believes the government instigated and directed the riots.

February 21, 2006: It's now common knowledge that the pro-government mobs of unemployed young men are bought and paid for by the government and pro-government businesses. Free food, and ten dollars a day per man, during active operations (riots and demonstrations) keeps the pro-government youth movement ("Young Patriots") going. The UN and France have lost patience with president Laurent Gbagbo's tactics and told him to make peace with the rebels, or else.

March 2, 2006: After much pressure from the UN, France and others, rebel and government leaders finally met to try and settle their differences.

March 8, 2006: Rebel leader Guillaume Soro agreed to rejoin the government and move to the capital. The rebels had left the capital in October, 2004, because they feared attack by government forces.

March 10, 2006: For the first time in three years, government employees are returning to the north. The initial civil servants arriving are 13 university professors.

March 15, 2006: Accompanied by a bodyguard of UN peacekeepers, rebel leader Guillaume Soro has arrived from the north, and settled in the capital, to continue peace negotiations.

September 8, 2006: The northern rebels threaten to restart the war if elections are not held next month, as promised. The government did not hold elections last October, when they were first scheduled to take place. The UN agrees that, because of lack of government cooperation, elections cannot be held next month. President Gbagbo wants to destroy the northern rebels, but does not have the military power to do so. He can't push past the 10,000 peacekeepers. However, he can keep delaying new elections until the UN and French give up and withdraw their peacekeepers. Then, Gbagbo apparently believes he can resume the civil war, and win it.

August 15, 2006: The government continues to delay making peace and reuniting the country. The government has stalled the process of issuing ID documents to the 20 percent of the population that does not have them. Also delayed, are the new presidential elections.

September 6, 2006: Suddenly, the government found itself under attacks from a new direction. There were riots in the capital when it was revealed that several tons of toxic waste had been unloaded from a ship last month, and left in local garbage dumps, and near sources of drinking water. As a result, several thousand people were sick from the fumes, and several appear to have died from it. A local firm has contracted to safely dispose of the toxic waste, but just deposited the stuff in garbage dumps around the capital to save money. Such expedient disposal of toxic waste from Europe and the United States is common in Africa. Government officials are easy to bribe, and there plenty of out-of-the-way places to dump the stuff.

September 7, 2006: The government (the 32 cabinet ministers) resigned as a result of the toxic waste scandal.

September 16, 2006: Popular anger against the toxic waste dumping led to the formation of a new government. Some of the old ministers were physically attacked, or their homes burned down. The most notable thing about the 130,000 gallons of "toxic waste" was that is was not all that toxic (it was slops, containing petroleum and cleaning chemicals) from the holds of a tanker, that was foul smelling (rotten eggs) because of the presence of hydrogen sulfide. Normally, this stuff if transferred to a treatment facility, which costs several hundred dollars. But there was no such treatment facility in Ivory Coast, although the ship paid a local Ivorian company to take care of the stuff. It was Ivorians who left the stuff in several garbage dumps around the capital. To further complicate matters, the ship owner insists that chemical analysis of fluids remaining in the ship show no presence of hydrogen sulfide. It also appears that most of the illness was the result of panic and hysteria because of the smell from the hydrogen sulfide. This chemical can be dangerous, but only in large quantities. Most of the damage apparently resulted from the smell, media attention and rumors. But given the poor state of government in Ivory Coast, this is not surprising. Corruption and incompetence has created a government that does not work every well at all, and it doesn't take much (like the smell of hydrogen sulfide), to set people off.

September 21, 2006: The UN admitted that the presidential election could not be held by the end of October. The main reason is lack of cooperation by president Gbagbo in registering voters. No one has any idea of when this problem might be cleared up. Officially, the UN mandate for Gbagbo to continue as president, a year after his terms has expired, also ends on October 31.

September 22, 2006: The ruling party in the south has demanded that French peacekeepers leave the country. France ignored this.

September 25, 2006: The president of South Africa, Thabo Mbeki, arrived to mediate the dispute between the government and the rebels in the north. This won't work because the northern rebels did not accept Mbeki, who was selected by the African Union (where South Africa has a lot of influence.) Mbeki is a personal friend of Ivory Coast president Gbagbo, which was the main reason why the northern rebels rejected this choice.

September 30, 2006: In the north, the economy, and infrastructure, has broken down. The northern rebels are split into a coalition of factions. They are only really united when it comes to dealing with the government in the south. As a result, the water and electricity systems have fallen apart in the north, mainly due to lack of maintenance, and looting of facilities. There is no government in the north to guarantee the safety of water and electricity facilities, or the staff that runs them, so little is done. President Gbagbo knows this, and believes that if he can get the 4,000 French and 7,000 African peacekeepers out of the country, he can reconquer the north and reunite the country. ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States), which has supplied most of African peacekeepers, is opposed to this, as they see Gbagbo as a corrupt despot and the cause of most of the trouble in Ivory Coast. But ECOWAS and the French have to agree to remove Gbagbo and run the country until elections can be held. This would be very difficult, for Gbagbo does have followers who would fight. Gbagbo's basic position, which caused the civil war, is that most of the people in the north, because they are emigrants, or the children of emigrants, are not really citizens of Ivory Coast and should leave. The Ivory Coast armed forces, and pro- Gbagbo militias in the south, are not strong enough to toss out the peacekeepers. And then there's the cost issue. Maintaining 11,000 peacekeepers is expensive, France and the African nations are getting tired of paying for it. Everyone would like the situation to be resolved peacefully, but Gbagbo has made "expulsion of the foreigners" really popular in the south. And the "foreigners" in the north are not willing to go.

March 4, 2007: The government and the rebels sign a peace deal that will make the head of the rebels the prime minister.

April 7, 2007: President Gbagbo names a new government led by former rebel leader Guillaume Soro, who is now the prime minister.

April 16, 2007: French and UN peacekeepers begin dismantling checkpoints which separated government and rebel forces, and divided the country.

June 27, 2007: The last of the hundred or so military and civilian prisoners, held by government and rebels forces, were released, as per the March peace deal.

June 29, 2007: Someone fired a rocket at an aircraft carrying the prime minister, Guillaume Soro. Four people died, but Soro was unharmed.

July 1, 2007: Several arrests were made, of men suspected of carrying out the earlier attack on the prime minister. The men had hidden themselves at the airport, armed with an RPG and AK-47s. They fled after firing at the prime ministers landing aircraft.

July 11, 2007: Despite the four month old peace agreement, the most important steps have not yet been taken. The army and rebel militias have not been reduced in size andintegrated, as per the peace deal. Both sides have six more months to do this, as well as decide who, in the north, is a citizen (and eligible to vote) and who is not, then hold new elections. The issue of which migrants are citizens is what sparked the civil war five years ago and, in theory, the peace deal should make many migrants, or descendents of migrants, voters, and those voters may be sufficient to get the pro-government, and Christian dominated, party out of power. The north is mainly Moslem. The five years of conflict has done much damage to the economy and infrastructure, Unemployment is about 50 percent, andthere are still 700,000 internal refugees (out of a population of 18 million). It's all about money. For decades, migrants from neighboring countries were allowed in to help with the booming cocoa market. But when growth in the cocoa market stalled (and competition from Ghana and Indonesia increased),the Christian southerners sought to expel many of the Moslem migrants in thenorth. Fighting broke out in 2002, but neither side was strong enough to prevail. That is still the situation. There is a peace agreement, but no real progress towards achieving peace.

June 1, 2009: An uneasy truce continues. The north and the south made a deal over money, religion and power, but cannot agree on how, or when, to carry it out. All this is watched over by peacekeepers set up between the factions. A case of peacekeeping creating a situation where there is no war, but no solution to the conflict either.

November 25, 2010: The UN ordered another 500 peacekeepers to Ivory Coast, to reinforce the 8,600 already there.

November 28, 2010: After several years of delays, and much pre-election violence, a national vote to pick the next president was held. There was not as much violence as expected, and the voting was carefully monitored by foreign observers.

December 2, 2010: The Ivory Coast election commission declared Alassane Ouattara the winner of the presidential election.

December 7, 2010: Russia refused to back a UN declaration against self-proclaimed president Gbagbo. Russia is alone in this, and the rest of the major powers believe they can turn Russia around on this.

December 9, 2010: The UN threatened Gbagbo with sanctions, that would force family members in the West back to Ivory Coast, and lead to freezing of assents abroad.

December 18, 2010: Self-proclaimed president Gbagbo ordered all UN and French troops from the country. Both France and the UN called on the army to back the legitimate president, Alassane Ouattara, and refused to back down. France and the UN believe they hold the stronger hand, and that Gbagbo has run out of options, and knows it. Gbagbo has stolen lots of government money, and has homes in many countries.

Pro-Gbagbo security forces have no such guarantees that they will not be punished for their sins. The security forces have been particularly violent against anti-Gbagbo demonstrators, killing or wounding hundreds in the last few weeks. To stop the violence, the pro-Gbagbo police and soldiers have to be made to stand down. That will be difficult to achieve, and in similar situations, the former cops and soldiers either go work for a warlord, or flee and become bandits.

The UN and U.S. have offered Gbagbo an exile free of war-crimes prosecutions, but so far, the offer has not been accepted. Gbagbo has another opportunity to survive all this. Russia has backed Gbagbo, and may be able to cancel the UN peacekeeping mandate, which expires at the end of the year. If the UN troops were withdrawn, Gbagbo believes he could force the French out, and defeat the northern warlords as well. That's a lot of "If's" and may be an If too far.

It's all about money. For decades, migrants from neighboring countries were allowed in to help with the booming cocoa market. But when growth in the cocoa market stalled (and competition from Ghana and Indonesia increased), the Christian southerners sought to expel many of the Moslem migrants in the north. Fighting broke out in 2002, but neither side was strong enough to prevail. That is still the situation. There is a peace agreement, but no real progress towards achieving peace. After three years of delays, with Gbagbo hoping the nations supplying the peacekeepers would get tired of it all and just go, elections were finally held. Gbagbo lost, declared himself the newly elected president anyway, and ordered all foreign troops out. Northern forces are spoiling for a fight, to finish off Gbagbo and his nationalists once and for all.

Gbagbo , under pressure from the UN, eventually signed a power sharing deal in early 2007. This was to allow the economy to rebuild, and national elections to be held. Despite the peace agreement, the most important steps were never completed. The army and rebel militias were not reduced in size and integrated, as per the peace deal. Both sides had less than a year to do this, as well as decide who, in the north, is a citizen (and eligible to vote) and who is not, then hold new elections. The issue of which migrants are citizens is what sparked the civil war in 2002 and, in theory, the peace deal should make many migrants, or descendants of migrants, voters, and those voters may be sufficient to get the pro-government, and Christian dominated, party out of power. The north is mainly Moslem. Five years of conflict had done much damage to the economy and infrastructure. Unemployment was about 50 percent, and there were still 700,000 internal refugees (out of a population of 18 million).

By late 2006 the northern the economy, and infrastructure had broken down. The northern rebels were split into a coalition of factions. They were only really united when it came to dealing with the government in the south. As a result, the water and electricity systems fell apart in the north, mainly due to lack of maintenance, and looting of facilities. There was no government in the north to guarantee the safety of water and electricity facilities, or the staff that runs them, so little was done. President Gbagbo knew this, and believed that if he could get the 4,000 French and 7,000 African peacekeepers out of the country, he could invade and conquer the north and reunite the country. ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States), which supplied most of African peacekeepers, was opposed to that, as they saw Gbagbo as a corrupt despot and the cause of most of the trouble in Ivory Coast. But ECOWAS and the French had to agree to remove Gbagbo and run the country until elections can be held. This would be very difficult, for Gbagbo does have followers who would fight. Gbagbo's basic position, which caused the civil war, is that most of the people in the north, because they are emigrants, or the children of emigrants, are not really citizens of Ivory Coast and should leave. The Ivory Coast armed forces, and pro-Gbagbo militias in the south, were not strong enough to toss out the peacekeepers. And then there's the cost issue. Maintaining 11,000 peacekeepers is expensive, France and the African nations are getting tired of paying for it. Everyone would like the situation to be resolved peacefully, but Gbagbo has made "expulsion of the foreigners" really popular in the south. And the "foreigners" in the north are not willing to go.

For the last eight years, cocoa production continued in the Moslem north, but the exports declined because of the higher costs of production. Many bribes had to be paid to soldiers and warlords, in order for the crop to be moved into the Christian south. The warlords are enjoying all this wealth, and were reluctant to give it up without some kind of "compensation."
Thus neither president Gbagbo, nor the northern rebels, have any real incentive to change things. By 2006, the deadlock between the government, in the south, and the rebels, in the north, caused the country to be ruled by warlords and outlaws. Despite pressure from the UN, and the presence of 10,000 peacekeepers, the government and rebels would not agree to a deal to share power. The country was drifting into total social collapse, like so many other countries in Africa.

Efforts to achieve a permanent peace agreement were hampered by a lack of trust. This was stoked by things like a UN report accusing the president's wife, Simone Gbagbo, of running a death squad that killed nearly a hundred political opponents. President Gbagbo's dirty politics were largely responsible for causing the civil war in the first place. Gbagbo was still in power, and he apparently believed he could use wheeling and dealing with the UN and peacekeepers to defeat the northern rebels. Many Ivorians were not happy with the division of the country, which they blamed on rabble rousing president Gbagbo. That's why Gbagbo lost the recent election, and why he continues to break the rules to stay in power.

By the end of 2004, the parliament passed a series of laws that resolved most of the nationality problems that angered so many northerners. The civil strife had begun in the 1990s, as southerners, resentful of migrants moving into the north to supply workers for the booming cocoa industry, tried to restrict who could become a citizen (and participate in politics, either by running for office or voting.) But by 2004, the breakdown of government has led to other problems. It had allowed many land disputes (over valuable cocoa growing fields) to get resolved by tribal vigilantes. The unrest, vigilantes and banditry encouraged both the government and the rebels to try and make peace.

Laurent Gbagbo, who came to power in 2000 via fraud and demagoguery, did not have many options. He refused to make peace with the northern rebels, mainly because he has gathered support among southerners by promising to expel migrants (up to several generations back) and make life better for "real Ivorians." Ivory Coast was the source of 40 percent of the world's cocoa, but most of that activity was in the north, under the control of the "foreigners." The UN and France would not put up with the Gbagbo plan, and threatened sanctions (against arms imports) and other restrictions if Gbagbo doesn't come up with another strategy. His army could not overwhelm the 11,000 UN and French peacekeepers, and unleashing mobs of angry civilians in the commercial capital (Abidjan) only further weakened the economy.

This led to the first round of fighting in 2002. The French sent in troops, to at least prevent escalation, and with UN help, a ceasefire was achieved in 2003. But in late 2004, the ceasefire was broken with government air raids on rebel bases in the north. There were several dozen casualties, and a rebel controlled TV station was damaged. A resumption of the ground war was prevented by 6,000 UN peacekeepers, and 4,000 French troops, patrolling the 400 kilometer long border between government controlled southern Ivory Coast, and the rebel controlled north. The UN stopped all humanitarian work in the country for a while. Southern troops were prevented from going north by peacekeepers, but northerner supporters in the south were attacked. The southerners also hired some Su-25 ground attack aircraft (along with pilots and maintenance personnel) from Belarus, and these were used to attack French troops, killing nine of them. The French retaliated, wiping out the southerner's air force, and creating a rift between the nationalist southerners and France.

A former French colony and the world's top cocoa producer, Ivory Coast was once regarded as a haven of peace and stability, until a 1999 coup that toppled president Henri Konan Bedie. Long considered a peaceful country, that welcomed millions of immigrant workers to sustain a booming economy after its independence from France in 1960, up to 40 percent of the 16 million population is now foreign. The immigrants inflamed political, religious and ethnic frictions between the largely Muslim north and the predominantly Christian south and west. Until his death in 1993, these disputes were kept under control by the country's post-independence president, Felix Houphouet-Boigny. But like Yugoslavia in the 1990s, the ancient ethnic and religious animosities were still there, and were exploited by rival politicians after Houphouet-Boigny was gone. Elections were held and Laurent Gbagbo, a southern nationalist, won. He tried to improve his control of the country by forcing northerners out of the security forces, and have millions of them declared foreigners, and ineligible to vote.

December 19, 2010: Despite a three year long ceasefire, and ample foreign support to hold elections, the country again faces civil war. The presidential elections were held last month, and the northern (rebel) candidate (former prime minister Alassane Ouattara) won. Laurent Gbagbo, who won a legitimate election in 2000, declared the vote a fraud, and had himself declared the winner, with 51 percent of the vote. But the foreign observers and the UN insisted that Ouattara had won with 54 percent.

February 15, 2011: UN sanctions have caused most (and eventually all) foreign banks to be closed, cutting the country off from the international banking system.

February 27, 2011: Three peacekeepers were wounded when ambushed by Gbagbo supporters.

March 1, 2011: President Gbagbo has banned UN and French aircraft from operating in Ivory Coast. The UN and France told Gbagbo they would ignore the order.

March 3, 2011: Two UN attack helicopters arrived, with a third on the way.

March 10, 2011: Gunfire has been heard outside the capital.

France and the UN slowly persuaded Gbagbo and his opponents to stop shooting and agree to an election to decide who is in charge. That didn't turn out too well. Most of the French troops have been replaced by UN peacekeepers.

This led to the first round of fighting in 2002. The French sent in troops, to at least prevent escalation, and with UN help, a ceasefire was achieved in 2003. But in late 2004, the ceasefire was broken with government air raids on rebel bases in the north. There were several dozen casualties, and a rebel controlled TV station was damaged. A resumption of the ground war was prevented by 6,000 UN peacekeepers, and 4,000 French troops, patrolling the 400 kilometer long border between government controlled southern Ivory Coast, and the rebel controlled north. The UN stopped all humanitarian work in the country for a while. Southern troops were prevented from going north by peacekeepers, but northerner supporters in the south were attacked. The southerners also hired some Su-25 ground attack aircraft (along with pilots and maintenance personnel) from Belarus, and these were used to attack French troops, killing nine of them. The French retaliated, wiping out the southerner's air force, and creating a rift between the nationalist southerners and France.

Until his death in 1993, these disputes were kept under control by the country's post-independence president, Felix Houphouet-Boigny. But like Yugoslavia in the 1990s, the ancient ethnic and religious animosities were still there, and were exploited by rival politicians after Houphouet-Boigny was gone. Elections were held and Laurent Gbagbo, a southern nationalist, won. He tried to improve his control of the country by forcing northerners out of the security forces, and have millions of them declared foreigners, and ineligible to vote.

A former French colony and the world's top cocoa producer, Ivory Coast was once regarded as a haven of peace and stability, until a 1999 coup that toppled president Henri Konan Bedie. Long considered a peaceful country, that welcomed millions of immigrant workers to sustain a booming economy after its independence from France in 1960, up to 40 percent of the 16 million population is now foreign. The immigrants inflamed political, religious and ethnic frictions between the largely Muslim north and the predominantly Christian south and west.

Despite a four year long ceasefire, and recent elections foreign observers declared free and fair, Ivory Coast has been sliding once more into civil war. The presidential elections, held four months ago, were won by the northern (rebel) candidate (former prime minister Alassane Ouattara). Laurent Gbagbo, who won a legitimate election in 2000, declared the vote a fraud, and had himself declared the winner, with 51 percent of the vote. But the foreign observers and the UN insisted that Ouattara had won with 54 percent. While Ouattara has the support of most of the people, Gbagbo has the support of most of the people with guns, and those guns are increasingly used against anyone who openly opposes Gbagbo. The UN has condemned Gbagbo, and imposed more and more sanctions. Gbagbo has not been impressed, and no one wants to go in and try to disarm Gbagbo's trigger-happy supporters. If full scale civil war resumes, the deaths could be much higher (the tens of thousands.)

Gbagbo has taken over the foreign banks, but that only enabled him to gram bash on hand. No new money is coming in for him to use for payroll (of civil servants, armed forces and mercenary fighters). The seizures enabled a partial payment on government salaries, but another month of this and there will be no more cash left.

The New Forces and Alassane Ouattara have called for more supporters in the south to make themselves known. This has resulted in more people openly supporting Ouattara, and in retaliation, pro-Gbagbo troops have opened fire several times. There have been more of these incidents in the last two weeks.

Ivory Coast has suffered over 400 dead in the last few months, as the loser in last November's election (Gbagbo) disputes that outcome. Actual losses may be 2-3 times higher, because journalists and other investigators are getting shot at. More than 400,000 people have fled the violence, or threat of renewed fighting. The most important export, cocoa, has become increasingly difficult to get out of the country because of the increasing violence. Thus the price of cocoa has hit a 32 year high of over $3,700 a ton. It was not supposed to work out this way.

March 11, 2011: President Gbagbo is broke, with all the foreign banks closed and no access to cash to pay his followers and troops. The AU (African Union) has ratified the election of Alassane Ouattara, while Gbagbo continues to insist Ouattara lost. The northern rebels (calling themselves the New Forces) have begun advancing (without announcing it). Gbagbo is in a difficult position. The UN. already has 9,000 personnel in the country, most of them armed. Another 2,000 peacekeepers are on the way (from Liberia.) The UN 10,000 UN and French peacekeepers have orders to fight only if attacked. Thus Gbagbo's troops stay away from the peacekeepers. But the peacekeepers are also apparently letting New Forces sneak past checkpoints. The peacekeeper "truce line" across the country is not absolute. The roads are blocked, so large numbers of troops cannot move north or south, nor can armored vehicles or artillery. But small units of men, armed with rifles, rocket launchers and machine-guns, and move back and forth. The New Forces are apparently doing this. The troops and gunmen loyal to Gbagbo are poorly armed and not much more numerous than the peacekeeping force. Many of Gbagbo's best gunmen are mercenaries, and the longer the banks are closed, the more of these guys desert. The New Forces are armed and equipped in the same fashion as Gbagbo's men, but have better morale, and growing support in the south. Several southern villages and towns have apparently fallen to the New Forces. Gbagbo is pulling his best fighters back to the capital and large towns. Gbagbo is willing to turn the situation into a nasty civil war, that will mostly devastate the south, where most of his supporters live.

March 12, 2011: Government forces tried to drive armed Ouattarra supporters out of the capital, Abidjan, and failed.

March 15, 2011: Alassane Ouattarr offered Laurent Gbagbo a coalition deal, in which Gbagbo and his followers would have positions in a new national unity government. Gbagbo refused.

March 16, 2011: Government troops used mortars to fire on an Abidjan suburb that had come out for the Republican Forces.

March 19, 2011: President Gbagbo called for his young supporters to join the army, and thousands have turned out to do just that. This has been done before, and many of the recruits are simply given a rifle, quickly shown basic operation of the weapon, and taken off to war. These untrained recruits tend to flee the first time they are fired on, or quickly get killed if they try and fight back.

March 21, 2011: The UN told Gbagbo that peacekeepers had spotted the attack helicopter and truck mounted rocket launchers government forces had obtained, and if these weapons were used, peacekeepers would be ordered to come after Gbagbo.

March 22, 2011: Republican Forces have captured another town (Blolequin).

March 23, 2011: ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States) met to discuss armed intervention in Ivory Coast. It was agreed that this was too expensive, and might go on for a while. So ECOWAS again criticized Gbagbo and asked him to leave.

March 25, 2011: It's been a particularly bloody week, with over 50 dead and several hundred wounded. This amounts to about ten percent of all the casualties in three months of fighting. A major cause of the increase has been Gbagbo troops using their mortars and machine-guns to fire blindly into areas filled with lots of civilians, and very few Republican Forces gunmen.

March 27, 2011: Republican Forces advanced in three areas. Columns of armed men in vehicles moved into the towns of Duekoue, Bondoukou and Daloa.

Gbagbo is increasingly receptive to some kind of compromise. In other words, he wants a safe way out of the country and a prosecution-free future in someplace where he can spend the fortune he has acquired through over a decade of corrupt rule. Many of his key supporters sense this as well, which explains the uninspired performance of his armed supporters. Another complication is that not all the armed groups fighting Gbagbo are pro- Ouattarr. The UN fears that if the election dispute is not settled soon, the center and southern part of the country could descend into years of factional fighting. That could have an impact on the price of chocolate, which has dropped a bit from its recent record high of $3,700 a ton, to $3,400. Ivory Coast is the source of most of the world's chocolate.

Republican Forces fighters are annoyed that NATO has intervened against a dictator in Libya, but not against the one in Ivory Coast. The difference is that Libya has oil, while Ivory Coast only has most of the world's chocolate. Moreover, the bad guys were winning in Libya, while the bad guys are slowly losing in Ivory Coast. The price of success is steep.

Since the civil war began nine years ago, the rebels have improved their fighting skills, and maintained high morale. The government troops have suffered lots of desertions, more dependence on mercenaries, untrained (but armed) civilians and eroding morale. Gbagbo is seen as corrupt and a demagogue. He gives rousing speeches and steals everything in sight. Most Ivorians are tired of this.

Particularly hated is the violence and destruction the armed Gbagbo supporters tend to carry out. As a result of this, nearly a million Ivorians have been forced to flee their homes. Nearly a hundred thousand have fled to neighboring Liberia. There have been several thousand casualties from the post-election fighting. The 11,000 peacekeepers prevent many areas from being fought over, as the peacekeepers literally keep the peace in many areas. For example, Alassane Ouattarr and his staff live in a Abidjan hotel, guarded by UN troops. Elsewhere in the city, Gbagbo occupies the presidential palace, and his supporters use most of the government buildings. Gbagbo's men stay clear of the UN peacekeepers, as attacking these professional troops could bring the UN forces into active combat against the Gbagbo fighters. This would be disastrous for Gbagbo, who depends on fewer than 20,000 armed men to keep him in control of southern Ivory Coast. This combination of professional soldiers and armed volunteers can barely slow down the rebel forces, and would be overwhelmed if the UN peacekeepers joined in the fight.

March 29, 2011: Armed supporters of the winner of last November's election, Alassane Ouattarra, now call themselves the Republican Forces. Incumbent president Laurent Gbagbo still has most of the armed forces, and many armed supporters in the south. But the Republican Forces not only have the moral high ground, they also have better morale. International sanctions against Gbagbo, and the fact that the November election made it clear most Ivorians want Gbagbo out, have given the Republican Forces an edge on the battlefield. Thus the government (Gbagbo) forces are being pushed out of some parts of the capital, Abidjan. Republican Forces are closing in on a key crossroads town (Duekoue) near the Liberian border. Because of the UN arms embargo, Gbagbo depends on this Liberian connection for smuggled ammo and weapons, as well as mercenary gunmen. With Duekoue gone, that access will be severely limited. So far in the last month, the Republican Forces have captured five towns like Duekoue. Government troops put up a fight, but they always lose.

March 30, 2011: Republican Forces roll into Yamoussoukro, the administrative capital (since 1983). Republican Forces immediately departed for Abijan, 240 kilometers to the southwest, the commercial capital (since 1983.) Actually, Abijan still contains many national government bureaucracies, and is the largest city (over 5 million) in the country. Resistance from pro-Gbagbo forces increased between Yamoussoukro and Abijan. Nothing serious, but the Gbagbo loyalists would delay the advancing Republican Forces for several hours at a time, and then flee.

The UN imposed more economic and travel sanctions on Gbagbo and key allies.

March 31, 2011: Republican Forces roll into Abijan, the commercial capital (since 1983). Resistance from pro-Gbagbo forces is light at first, apparently because so many Gbagbo supporters out in the countryside had quietly switched, leaving Gbagbo supporters in Abijan someone blind to who was heading for the city, and how fast. As word got around that the Republican Forces were in the city, general Phillippe Mangou Mangou (the head of the pro-Gbagbo army) took his wife and five children and apparently sought asylum at the South African embassy.

April 1, 2011: Republican forces briefly seized control of the state operated TV network. But within hours, pro-Gbagbo forces had retaken control of the TV facilities.

April 2, 2011: In Abidjan, pro-Gbagbo forces recaptured a bridge leading to the Presidential Palace, making it easier to defend Gbagbo, who is using the palace.

April 3, 2011: French troops took control of the airport at Abidjan, making it easier to evacuate foreign citizens. In Ghana, police have arrested over 70 Gbagbo supporters who crossed the border with their weapons. Ghana does not want armed men crossing the border, and is sending more troops to the frontier area near the ocean. Ghana is the closest foreign territory to Abidjan, where the final battle for control of Ivory Coast will take place. In Abidjan, three days if heavy fighting appeared to end, replaced by occasional gunfire and a lot of movement of troops and supplies.

April 4, 2011: General Phillippe Mangou Mangou (the head of the pro-Gbagbo army) left his asylum and apparently went back to work for Gbagbo. Five days ago, Mangou took his wife and five children and apparently sought asylum at the South African embassy.

Investigators are trying to sort out who did what to who in the western town of Duekoue last week. There, between March 27-9, a force of men armed with guns and machetes, killed over 800 people. The killings took place as the Republican Forces made their way south, encountering little resistance. Between last November's election and March 26, 450-500 people had died in sporadic violence. April 5, 2011: The Republican Forces (armed supporters of the winner of last November's election, Alassane Ouattarr) continue to battle for control of the nation's largest city. In the last 24 hours, the UN has responded to Gbagbo troops firing on civilians by ordering peacekeepers to attack Gbagbo bases and ammunition storage sites. After five days of fighting, there are growing food shortages as trucks avoid areas where there is a lot of gunfire. Incumbent president Laurent Gbagbo still has some of the armed forces defending him, along with some armed supporters from the south, but he is out numbered, cornered and apparently trying to make a deal. Republican Forces are closing in on the presidential palace and government buildings. Gbagbo representatives have been trying to arrange safe and comfortable exile for Gbagbo and his family (some of whom have been seen in neighboring Ghana.) While Gbagbo and his entourage might get away quickly, his much larger number of supporters (especially the ones with weapons) will still be around. The north-south disputes in Ivory Coast will take a lot longer to resolve, and there will be violence.

April 5, 2011: The Republican Forces (armed supporters of the winner of last November's election, Alassane Ouattarr) continue to battle for control of the nation's largest city. In the last 24 hours, the UN has responded to Gbagbo troops firing on civilians by ordering peacekeepers to attack Gbagbo bases and ammunition storage sites. After five days of fighting, there are growing food shortages as trucks avoid areas where there is a lot of gunfire. Incumbent president Laurent Gbagbo still has some of the armed forces defending him, along with some armed supporters from the south, but he is out numbered, cornered and apparently trying to make a deal. Republican Forces are closing in on the presidential palace and government buildings. Gbagbo representatives have been trying to arrange safe and comfortable exile for Gbagbo and his family (some of whom have been seen in neighboring Ghana.) While Gbagbo and his entourage might get away quickly, his much larger number of supporters (especially the ones with weapons) will still be around. The north-south disputes in Ivory Coast will take a lot longer to resolve, and there will be violence.

April 6, 2011: Gbagbo and several hundred of his most reliable troops have retreated to a bunker complex (in his official residence) in Abidjan, while other Gabgbo loyalists fight Republican Forces gunmen throughout Abidjan, and southern Ivory Coast. Republican Forces fighters were forced back when they got to within 200 meters of the Gbagbo residence/headquarters/bunker.

April 7, 2011: The UN deployed peacekeepers around Gbagbo's residence and bunker complex in Abidjan. The UN is trying to persuade Gbagbo to stop fighting. To help that along, peacekeepers have been seizing or destroying heavy weapons and vehicles belonging to Gbagbo loyalists.

April 8, 2011: In Abidjan, pro-Gbagbo forces attacked, and pushed Republican Forces gunmen back from some neighborhoods. But this advance did not last, and the gains were lost over the next 48 hours. This advance by Gbagbo forces included firing on the French embassy. That was decisive in persuading France and the UN to take a more active role in fighting pro-Gbagbo fighters.

April 10, 2011: Pro-Gbagbo troops, dug in around Gbagbo's bunker in Abidjan, continue to fire at areas where UN peacekeepers are stationed. Even the hotel that has served as Alassane Ouattarr's headquarters has come under fire. French and UN armed helicopters have been shooting back.

April 11, 2011: French troops, using armored vehicles and armed helicopters, forced Laurent Gbagbo to leave his bunker and surrender. Some kind of deal may have been made, and Gbagbo was placed under house arrest.

April 12, 2011: France announced that its peacekeeping force will be cut from 1,700 to a few hundred troops. A specific date was not mentioned. Five army generals, that had long supported Gbagbo, openly pledged their allegiance to the elected president Alassane Ouattarr. The generals ordered their troops to stop fighting, and the throughout the south, the order was generally obeyed. But there are still over a million refugees, who fled from the Republican Forces as the northerners moved south over the last few weeks. Thousands of the refugees have weapons.

April 13, 2011: While president Laurent Gbagbo has surrendered, many of his armed followers have not. And they have good reason to keep on fighting. As is usually the case when tribes are involved, the northerners and southerners always used ethnic affiliation to sort out "us" and "them". But like in all African countries, there has been migration, with people moving out of their traditional tribal areas over the decades. That can get you killed when the tribes take sides and fight for control of the country. Now Gbagbo's coalition of southern, Christian tribes is on the defensive as the northern, Moslem (and often immigrant) tribes move south to assert their power. The southern diehards set off bombs and snipe at the invaders. The northerners respond by shooting anyone suspected of being hostile. That can mean just a name and accent that indicates a southern tribe too closely allied with Gbagbo, and a (real or imagined) unfriendly look. The attitude is that it's better to kill the guy, before he gets you with a bomb or bullet in the back. This sort of friction has already caused thousands of civilian deaths as the northern Republican Forces moved south. The hostility, and violence, between northerners and southerners will continue for a while. Some southern leaders will try to establish themselves as warlords, although most are expected to get out of Ivory Coast with their lives, families and money. Many have already moved their families, and some other assets, to neighboring, or Western, nations. Some southern leaders brought in mercenary fighters from Liberia, and other African nations. These men are probably fleeing, but will often fight if cornered. The Republican Forces are apt to just kill any foreign mercenaries (real or suspected) they encounter. As the Republican Forces moved south, they were reminded daily that 46 percent of the people voted for Gbagbo during last year's elections.

April 14, 2011: The pro-Ouattara Republican Forces have been renamed the Republican Forces of the Ivory Coast (FRCI). The first task of FRCI is to restore order in the south, particularly Abidjan, and disarm remaining Gbagbo loyalists, and most of the anti-Gbagbo militias that had joined the pro-Ouattarr forces in the last few months. This won't be easy, but it has been helped by most army units switching sides, along with their commanders.

April 17, 2011: The U.S. State Department has warned Americans going to Ivory Coast to pay very close attention to their personal safety, because of the large number of guys with guns still running around.

April 20, 2011: Fighting broke out in Abidjan between the FRCI and pro-Ouattarr militias that refused orders to disarm. There are still hundreds of armed pro-Gbagbo gunmen running around the city.

April 27, 2011: Ibrahim Coulibaly, the leader of a pro-Ouattarr militia, killed himself rather than surrender his force to government troops that surrounded him in his Abidjan stronghold. The government ordered all militias to disarm, but only some of the members were allowed to join the army. Coulibaly, who controlled several thousand armed men at the end, has been a warlord and rebel, often against former allies, since the late 1990s. Ouattarr insisted that Coulibaly disarm, and Coulibaly preferred death instead. Coulibaly and his followers were the most dangerous, and unruly, of six militias that joined forces with Ouattarr to overthrow former president Laurent Gbagbo. Not everyone had the same idea of what would happen after Gbagbo was out of power. Coulibaly, for example, was a longtime rival of the new defense minister Guillaume Soro, and demanded that Ouattarr find someone else run the defense ministry.

April 30, 2011: Most pro-Gbagbo armed groups have agreed to surrender their weapons and stop fighting, in return for security and amnesty.

May 1, 2011: Former president Laurent Gbagbo has accepted his defeat and is now willing to call on his followers to surrender, which he later did on TV.

May 4, 2011: Troops captured the business district from pro-Gbagbo forces, dispersing or killing the rebel fighters.

The country's highest court, the constitutional council (and its several pro-Gbagbo members), proclaimed Alassane Ouattarr the president.

Switzerland has frozen $81.45 million in bank accounts that appear to belong to former president Gbagbo, and were probably stolen.

May 5, 2011: In Abidjan, the last rebel (pro-Gbagbo) stronghold, a naval base in the port area, was captured. There are still pro-Gbagbo gunmen in Abidjan, but they no longer have a base to operate from. The most dangerous of these rebels are Liberian mercenaries, who roam from neighborhood to neighborhood, seeking a safe way out of the city and back to Liberia. With no base, the pro-

Gbagbo forces can no longer disrupt life in the city, and traffic is back, as is commercial activity. This has been happening for weeks, neighborhood-by-neighborhood, but now seems to include the entire city.

May 6, 2011: Over a thousand people have died in three months of violence. But the new army, FRCI (Republican Forces of the Ivory Coast) has suppressed most of the individuals and groups that are still armed and dangerous. This is especially true in Abidjan, the largest city in the country and home of a third of the 15 million population. The city is also largely pro-Gbagbo (who did receive 46 percent of the vote in last year's election). Thus Ouattarr has had to make friends of many pro-Gbagbo people and groups. Most of the Gbagbo era military high command have come over to Ouattarr's side, and been accepted. Gbagbo justified being president-for-life by convincing most southerners that the northerners were foreigners (many were, or were the children of those who had come to work in the booming cocoa plantations). But cocoa is the basis of the country's prosperity, and the northern migrants did work that not enough southerners wanted to do.

May 21, 2011: Alassane Ouattara was finally sworn in as president, after winning an election last November, and a civil war.

May 26, 2011: Six weeks after the brief civil war ended, much of the country is still a mess. There are still a million internal refugees. Apparently over 3,000 died in the fighting and civil disorder. The final battles were fought mainly in the south, particularly Abidjan (the largest city in the country and home of a third of the 15 million population). The city is also largely pro-Gbagbo (who did receive 46 percent of the vote in last year's election). There was not a lot of fighting, but there was an enormous amount of looting and destruction. Thus a lot of people are out of work, as well as out of a home. Most of the victims of this economic destruction were Gbagbo supporters.

June 1, 2011: The new government has been formed by president Alassane Ouattara, and it consists of 36 ministers. The senior official is prime Minister Guillaume Soro, who is also defense minister. Ouattara has asked the West for $20 billion in reconstruction aid over the next five years.

The UN is pressuring the government to shut down the pro-Ouattara death squads. That has proved difficult, as these killers are among the most enthusiastic Ouattara supporters. There are a few such killings a week, and the government apparently believes that the violence will decline as most known pro-Gbagbo supporters flee the capital. But the hard core pro-Gbagbo people will still be out there. But in Abidjan, and most of the south, peace has returned.

June 16, 2011: Despite the installation of a new, elected, government last month, violence continues in the south. About 3,000 supporters of both Gbagbo and Ouattara have died since last November, most in the fighting between armed groups. There are still over 400,000 refugees in the country, nearly all of them former supporters of former dictator Laurent Gbagbo. There is still some violence against pro-Gbagbo groups in the south. During the five months after the national elections last November, Gbagbo police and thugs killed anti-Gbagbo people in Abidjan (the largest city in the country and home of a third of the 15 million population). When the armed supporters of Alassane Ouattara (the northerner who won the election) moved south in March, they sought out the most enthusiastic Gbagbo supporters. In some cases, organized and armed Gbagbo supporters sought out the advancing Ouattara men and fought it out. But, just as in the elections, the Gbagbo forces were outnumbered and outfought. While some tribal and religious violence and animosity remains , the war is over.

September 13, 2012: All pro-Gbagbo newspapers have been shut down. The government accuses these news outlets of advocating a resumption of the civil war.

September 21, 2012: Several attacks on soldiers and police near the Ghana border left ten dead (seven of them attackers). The attackers were believed to be supporters of former president Gbagbo and operating from bases across the border in Ghana. In response to this violence the Ghana border crossings were closed.

September 25, 2012: The Ghana border was closed again, after having been opened the day before.

Laurent Gbagbo himself is still imprisoned (in the Netherlands) and waiting prosecution by the International Criminal Court for crimes against humanity.

Laurent Gbagbo's supporters remained organized and served as the official political opposition. But the government believed the southerners were planning a coup or revolution and last month arrests of important southern politicians (who were Gbagbo supporters) began. The arrests continued this month and now we have armed violence returning in the south. There was some violence last month, and it has continued into September.

It's all about money. For decades migrants from neighboring countries were allowed in to help with the booming cocoa business. But when growth in the cocoa industry stalled (and competition from Ghana and Indonesia increased), the Christian southerners sought to expel many of the Moslem migrants in the north. Fighting broke out in 2002, but neither side was strong enough to prevail. That was the situation until last year, when northern forces moved south and deposed Gbagbo by force.

Gbagbo, under pressure from the UN, eventually signed a power sharing deal in early 2007. This was to allow the economy to rebuild and national elections to be held. Despite the peace agreement the most important steps were never completed. The army and rebel militias were not reduced in size and integrated, as per the peace deal. Both sides had less than a year to do this, as well as decide who, in the north, was a citizen (and eligible to vote) and who was not, then hold new elections. The issue of which migrants were citizens is what sparked the civil war in 2002 and, in theory, the peace deal should make many migrants, or descendants of migrants, voters and those voters might be sufficient to get the pro-government, and Christian dominated, party out of power. The north is mainly Moslem. Five years of conflict had done much damage to the economy and infrastructure. Unemployment was about 50 percent and there were still 700,000 internal refugees.

By late 2006, the northern economy and infrastructure had broken down. The northern rebels were split into a coalition of factions. They were only really united when it came to dealing with the government in the south.
As a result, the water and electricity systems fell apart in the north, mainly due to lack of maintenance and looting of facilities. There was no government in the north to guarantee the safety of water and electricity facilities, or the staff that runs them, so little was done. President Gbagbo knew this and believed that if he could get the 4,000 French and 7,000 African peacekeepers out of the country he could invade and conquer the north and reunite the country. ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States), which supplied most of the African peacekeepers, was opposed to that, as they saw Gbagbo as a corrupt despot and the cause of most of the trouble in Ivory Coast. But ECOWAS and the French had to agree to remove Gbagbo and run the country until elections could be held. This would be very difficult, for Gbagbo had followers who would fight. Gbagbo's basic position, which caused the civil war, was that most of the people in the north, because they were emigrants or the children of emigrants, were not really citizens of Ivory Coast and should leave. There's one major problem with this. The Ivory Coast armed forces and pro-Gbagbo militias in the south were not strong enough to toss out the peacekeepers. And then there's the cost issue. Maintaining 11,000 peacekeepers was expensive. France and the African nations was getting tired of paying for it. Everyone wanted the situation to be resolved peacefully but Gbagbo had made "expulsion of the foreigners" really popular in the south. And the "foreigners" in the north were not willing to go.

During eight years of de-facto division, cocoa production continued in the Moslem north but the exports declined because of the higher costs of production. Many bribes had to be paid to soldiers and warlords, in order for the crop to be moved into the Christian south. The warlords were enjoying all this wealth and were reluctant to give it up without some kind of "compensation." Thus neither president Gbagbo nor the northern rebels had any real incentive to change things. By 2006, the deadlock between the government, in the south, and the rebels, in the north, caused the country to be ruled by warlords and outlaws. Despite pressure from the UN and the presence of 10,000 peacekeepers, the government and rebels would not agree to a deal to share power. The country was drifting into total social collapse, like so many other countries in Africa.

Former president Gbagbo's dirty politics were largely responsible for causing this mess in the first place. When Gbagbo was still in power he apparently believed he could use wheeling and dealing with the UN and peacekeepers to defeat the northern rebels. Many Ivorians were not happy with the division of the country, which they blamed on rabble rousing president Gbagbo. That attitude led to Gbagbo losing the 2010 election.

Many Gbagbo supporters still have their weapons and their dislike for the northerners. Gbagbo's party, the FPI, is still around and remains active. The country remains divided by tribal and religious differences. President Ouattara has to satisfy demands for justice from his supporters and opponents.

Abidjan is still largely pro-Gbagbo (who did receive 46 percent of the vote in the 2010 election). There was not a lot of fighting in Abidjan last year but there was an enormous amount of looting and destruction. Thus a lot of people are out of work, as well as out of a home. Most of the victims of this economic destruction were Gbagbo supporters and they are still angry.

Over 3,000 died in the civil war that ended two years ago. There are still refugees across the border in Ghana, most of them supporters of former dictator Laurent Gbagbo. There is still tension between Gbagbo supporters and anti-Gbagbo people in Abidjan (the largest city in the country and home of a third of the population). When the armed supporters of Alassane Ouattara (the northerner who won the election) moved south 18 months ago they sought out the most enthusiastic Gbagbo supporters. In some cases, organized and armed Gbagbo supporters sought out the advancing Ouattara men and fought it out. But, just as in the elections, the Gbagbo forces were outnumbered and outfought. Animosity and resentment by Gbagbo loyalists based in Ghana has led to increased violence in southern Ivory Coast. Ghana has sought to shut down the Ivory Coast rebels but has had limited success.

September 27, 2012: Despite the installation of a new, elected government sixteen months ago, violence continues in the south. In the last six weeks about a hundred people have been killed or wounded during attacks on army and police installations in the south. The attackers have been defeated in all cases but it appears that the animosity between the Christian south and Moslem north is reviving in this country of 21 million.

November 30, 2012: The International Criminal Court (ICC) has issued warrants for the arrest of Simone Gbagbo for crimes against humanity.

Her husband Laurent is already in custody of the court and awaiting trial. November 30, 2012: The International Criminal Court (ICC) has issued warrants for the arrest of Simone Gbagbo for crimes against humanity. Her husband Laurent is already in custody of the court and awaiting trial.

December 21, 2012: Gunmen attacked police and a power station in Abidjan (the largest city) and killed ten and wounded about six. The attackers were believed to be backers of former president Gbagbo.

Gbagbo himself is still imprisoned (in the Netherlands) and waiting prosecution by the International Criminal Court (ICC) for crimes against humanity. That trial is supposed to start in February. That court is trying to extradite Gbagbo's wife Simone from Ivory Coast but the government wants to prosecute her themselves. The same applies to other corrupt Gbagbo allies.

Since the elections, Gbagbo supporters have remained organized and served as the official political opposition. But the government believes the southerners are planning a coup or revolution and last August arrests of important southern politicians (who were Gbagbo supporters) began. The arrests continued into September and that appears to have triggered the resurgence of armed violence in the south. Except for some attacks earlier this month, the violence has died down. Many of those Gbagbo supporters arrested 3-4 months ago have been released on bail.

Former president Gbagbo's dirty politics were largely responsible for causing this mess in the first place. When Gbagbo was still in power, he apparently believed he could use wheeling and dealing with the UN and peacekeepers to defeat the northern rebels. Many Ivorians were not happy with the division of the country, which they blamed on rabble rousing president Gbagbo. That attitude led to Gbagbo losing the 2010 election.

When the armed supporters of Alassane Ouattara (the northerner who won the election) moved south 21 months ago, they sought out the most enthusiastic Gbagbo supporters. In some cases organized and armed Gbagbo supporters sought out the advancing Ouattara men and fought it out. But, just as in the elections, the Gbagbo forces were outnumbered and outfought.

The new government has brought law and order to the country, even areas in the south with a lot of Gbagbo supporters. There are not believed to be a lot of armed Gbagbo partisans running free and foreign investors appear convinced of that. Government services are being returned to the north, where warlords have ruled for a decade. While the services are appreciated, the taxes to pay for them are not.

There was not a lot of fighting in Abidjan last year but there was an enormous amount of looting and destruction. Thus, a lot of people are out of work, as well as out of a home. Most of the victims of this economic destruction were Gbagbo supporters and they are still angry. Many Gbagbo supporters still have their weapons and their dislike for the northerners. Gbagbo's party, the FPI, is still around and remains active. The country remains divided by tribal and religious differences. President Ouattara has to satisfy demands for justice from his supporters and opponents.

December 26, 2012: Despite the installation of a new elected government 19 months ago, some violence continues in the south. The attackers have been defeated in all cases, but it appears that the animosity between the Christian south and Moslem north is not going away in this country of 21 million. Police have arrested nearly a hundred suspects over the past few months. This was because of an outburst of violence last August and September (during which about a hundred people were killed or wounded during attacks on army and police installations in the south). Abidjan is still largely pro-Gbagbo (who did receive 46 percent of the vote in the 2010 election).

October 25, 2013: IVORY COAST: Ouattara crackdown on illicit gold mining’

AFRICA MINING: President Alassane Ouattara signed a decree on Oct. 18 in order to end illicit gold mining in the country. Interior and security minister Hamed Bakayoko and defence minister Paul Koffi were ordered to deploy security forces in mining areas.

Ivory Coast - Guillaume Soro, from battle dress to business suit’

WAN (June 18, 2013) - Guillaume Soro has played numerous roles on his way up from student politics to rebel leader and then president of the National Assembly. In the space of less than a decade, he has been able to forge wide-ranging and varied contacts in the military, institutional and business spheres, making him a rare specimen in post-Félix Houphouët-Boigny Ivory Coast. In the course of his rapid rise to prominence, the man who is the second highest-ranking person in Côte d’Ivoire’s state hierarchy of at the age of 41 has been constantly accompanied by a handful of collaborators who began their careers at his side. This loyalty reflects the values of the Senufo people to which he belongs but is, above all, part of the strategy adopted by Soro, who is designated by the Ivorian constitution as Alassane Ouattara’s official successor, to gain power. Such “brothers in arms” as Souleymane Koné, Moussa Dosso, Hervé Touré and Issiaka Ouattara today have high-ranking state posts as ministers, military commanders and heads of public institutions. All admire Soro as the man who opposed the doctrine of “Ivorian-ness” and the regimes of Robert Guéï and Laurent Gbagbo. They enable him to exercise his influence in all strategic domains after having been prime minister without interruption from 2007 to 2012. This inner circle has been enlarged by friendships formed during Côte d'Ivoire's chaotic history over the last 10 years. Apart from the president and first lady, the contact network of the former warlord has been enriched by such personalities as Mustapha Chafi, special adviser to President Blaise Compaoré of Burkina Faso, architect Pierre Fakhoury and a variety of figures from the Rassemblement des Républicains (RDR) party, which Guillaume Soro hopes to lead in the expected contest for the presidency in 2020.

April 14, 2014 - A moment of silence for the victims of April, 2011 in Cote d'Ivoire'

AFRICAN HERITAGE: Everyone remembers those days in early April 2011, and in particular 11 April, when the planes of the ONUCI and the French army bombed all strategic sites in Abidjan including the military camps, the TV station, and the presidential palace, killing thousands, and dragging the president out like a mere bandit. Now, to have just one side of the post-electoral crisis present at the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague is simply a farce! To have Laurent Gbagbo and Charles Blé Goudé at the Hague is a farce, when we all know that the violence grew out of a contentious presidential election between two parties. Where are Alassane Ouattara and Guillaume Soro? It is also sad to note that only Africans are being judged at The Hague, when crimes were also committed in Iraq, Afghanistan, Syria, etc. It's a moment of silence to all the victims of the post-electoral crisis of Côte d'Ivoire, to all those who stood for their convictions, to all those who believed in casting a peaceful vote, and to all those who believed in their beautiful country, peace to all.

March 18, 2014: IVORY COAST – President awards first of this year's licences. Presidnt Alassane Ouattara began awarding this year's first mining licences in Ivory Coast on March 12.

Guro people And Their Beautiful Mask.
By Dolor Abigail

Former Human Resources at Visiting and Travel (2015–2020)

Guro masks are usually embedded with hidden information of spiritual importance. The craftsmanship of the Guro national symbol image is related to the land and agricultural practices. This is also due to their African ancestors. It reflects the symbolic meaning of the animals on the mask.

Among all animals, Guro honoured five. Antelope, hyena, leopard, crocodile and elephant. These animals mainly live in tropical forests inhabited by 200,000 tribes.

Hyenas are considered to be big animals that live on land. We see the hyena as smart and resourceful. Leopards symbolize strength, bravery, and enterprise. Crocodiles are regarded as the king of the swamp. Guarding the water bodies found in the backyard of the tribe.

Elephants are considered elegant, kind, powerful, royal and loyal. Every animal mask depicting the Guro God is always worn during the ceremony. Certain masks describing antelope and porcupines are not allowed to be seen by women.

Again, these animals are believed to represent the connection between humans and the spiritual world.

Have you come in contact with Guro masks?

Guro People: The Unbeatable Mask Makers

The Guro people of Côte d'Ivoire are also referred to as Gouro, Dipa, Lo or Kweni. They are known for their rich mask traditions. With colourful, vibrant, and precise attention to detail.

We know that the people were ancient hunters. They are also agricultural people, who speak Mandarin. The community speaks the language of the Mande branch. A Niger-Congo African language. Guro people live in the valley of the Bandama River in Côte d'Ivoire.

This clan is a larger Mande ethnic group in West Africa. In terms of lifestyle, they practice African culture. You can find them mainly distributed in the Haut-Sassandra and Marahoue regions. With Betes on the west and Baules on the east.

The History Of The Guro People

Guro mask dancer

Guro initially came from the north and northwest. Driven by Mande invasions in the second half of the 18th century.
In the beginning, the Guro refer to themselves as Kweni. The title "Guro or Gouro" was bestowed on them by their neighbours (Baule). Guro is a Baule African name culture. Their culture is nearly similar to Baule as a result of intense relations.

Based on the record, the population is between 800 to a million. Do you know that the Guro people are direct descendants of Sundiata Keit? The pre-colonial and West African Mali epic hero?

After the breakdown of the Mali empire, they migrated southward to Ivory Coast. To escape the Mandinka expansion during the 13th and 16th centuries.

Substantial interaction with neighbouring countries in the east is also important. It puts the ancient Luo people at the heart of a complex history. A time of immigration, trade, and war. It shaped their artistic African traditions. Also, it formed the artistic beliefs of their neighbours and the region more greatly.

Relationship Between Guro And Baule People

Guro chief with his dynamic staff

Today Guro's eastern neighbours are Baule and Asante. The Akan language is the medium of communication between the tribes. The military expansion of the Akans began in Ghana in the 17th century. This act prevented Guro's eastward movement.

The Akan immigrants settled along the east bank of Lac de Kossou and incorporated it into Baule. Subsequently, cloth trade between the Guro society and the Baule led to ethnic ties. Furthermore, it strengthens their cultural ties.

Recently, Baule knitting is more famous than Guro knitting. It is believed that the Guro taught Baule people knitting. Historically, these two groups also developed loom pulleys. Simple machines decorated with figures and animals. The Asante people adjacent to Baule in eastern Ghana, also have a vibrant history of loom carving and weaving.

Most of the Baule wood carving art has influenced Guro. Baule has, in turn, impacted Guro's traditional lifestyle. Primarily in the textile and clothing sectors.

Religious Beliefs Of Guro People of Cote d'Ivoire

Guro performer

Their religion involves many cults and gods. A master of the soil makes sacrifices to the earth. This is for the benefit of the village and the residents. We also have fortune-tellers in each village. Before we make important decisions, we seek his opinion.
Luo people are very traditional. No compromise believe in their ancient African culture. They have secret societies of men and women, and people will join these societies.

Male society is Je and the female society is called Kne. These secret societies wear masks. An important mask of the Guro people is Zamble. Guro mask also depicts Gu's soul, the wife of the supernatural creature Zamble.

These masks, coloured or brown and black, are composed of intricate details. The Zamble mask is considered to be the most beautiful of Guro masks. It is also the most popular collectable mask.

In other words, in the Guro culture, there is a difference between the masquerade party. One is focusing on the cult and the other is on a secular masquerade party. Because of our nature, I went to other villages in Africa to find the meaning of God and his existence.
A sequence of three sacred masks revolves around Zamble. A mythical male whose appearance combines the characteristics of an antelope and a leopard. Nevertheless, his beautiful wife Gu, his wild and incredible brother Zuali enhances his potency.

Several representative masks are owned by specific families. The mask is used as a place of sacrifice. Usually proposed by the fortune-teller to improve their well-being. Other forms of Guro masks are only authorities of entertainment. They are manufactured by personal entertainers.

About Guro Mask (Zamble mask)

Guro masks are usually embedded with hidden information of spiritual importance. The craftsmanship of the Guro national symbol image is related to the land and agricultural practices. This is also due to their African ancestors. It reflects the symbolic meaning of the animals on the mask.
Masks are objects of pleasing and dignified beauty. They appear in various social and spiritual rituals. The faces are of two types: anthropomorphic and zoomorphic.

Among all animals, Guro honour five. Antelope, hyena, leopard, crocodile and elephant. These animals mainly live in tropical forests inhabited by 200,000 tribes.

What is the symbolism of the four animals on the mask? The antelope is loved for its elegance and speed. According to a folktale, it is a belief that the mythical antelope teaches us to cultivate.
Hyenas are considered to be big animals that live on land. We see the hyena as smart and resourceful. Leopards symbolize strength, bravery, and enterprise. Crocodiles are regarded as the king of the swamp. Guarding the water bodies found in the backyard of the tribe.

Elephants are considered elegant, kind, powerful, royal and loyal. Every animal mask depicting the Guro God is always worn during the ceremony. Certain masks describing antelope and porcupines are not allowed to be seen by women.

Again, these animals are believed to represent the connection between humans and the spiritual world.

Differences Between Guro And Baule Mask

Baule art and Guro art are very similar and sometimes difficult to distinguish. However, there are subtle differences between the two styles. For example, Guro masks usually have longer faces. Likewise, the raised forehead and nose bridge of the Guro mask forms an S-shaped pattern.

An additional hallmark of the Guro mask is the essence of the tattoo marks on their bodies. Guro tattoo marks replicate the scars on tribal men. These marks are frequently cut on the forehead and cheeks.

Next, the Guro face has a small mouth and sharp teeth. The hairdo on the mask is carefully crafted with geometric patterns. It is mainly divided into five parts. Subsequently, most Guro masks have large wooden collars. Neckbands also assist to portray the raffia jacket worn by dancers.

One final difference between the Guro mask and Baule is that every human mask often adds animal features. It can be the ears of an elephant, the horns of an antelope, or the superstructure of a bird's head.

This trend of adding animal features to masks is so great. Guro sculptor's best mask is a mix of different animal characteristics.

Zamble Mask: The Most Intricate Mask

Zamble mask combines the attributes of hyena, antelope, leopard and crocodile. Like all Guro masks, they can be coloured, brown and black. The Zamble mask has the most intricate carving of all Guro masks.

Highly skilled attention and detail are a must-have. Deliberate repetition of the ridges on the mask is a faithful reproduction. The amazing thorough rendering of the zamble mask makes it bold and daring. This realistic quality is highly regarded by art lovers.

At Je ceremony, the zamble mask is the first to emerge. All Guro masks have concealed tribal meanings and some are fatal to women. But their incredibly subtle texture makes them overwhelming. Guro mask depicts some of the best artworks in Africa, and the zamble mask is the most coveted.

Male And Female Cults

A male secret society is responsible for the social, administrative and judicial organization of the tribe. It is also responsible for making decisions and protecting tribal members. Je society guards and uses all the Guro masks.

Women also have a secret society called Kne. They are more of a religious group.

Zaouli Dance

Zaouli is a piece of popular music and dance practised in the Guro community. It is the Bouaflé and Zuénoula provinces of Côte d'Ivoire. A tribute to feminine beauty. Zaouli was inspired by two masks: Blou and Djela.

The second name is Djela lou Zaouli. Meaning Zaouli, daughter of Djela. In an exhibition, this approach combines sculpture (mask), weaving (clothing), music (band and song) and dance. African dance is of great significance to the people. That is why there is a dance in every African country.

We have traditional dances from South Africa, traditional dances from Nigeria, cultural dances from Ghana, school dances and dance from Columbia

There are seven types of Zaouli masks. Each one translates a specific legend. Carriers and practitioners include sculptors, artisans, instrumentalists, singers, dancers and celebrities. (guarantors of community customs and traditions). The dance is educational and entertaining. Packed with Aesthetic functions. It provides environmental safety and communicates the cultural characteristics of its bearers. Also, it promotes integration and an atmosphere of togetherness. Amateurs learn under the supervision of experienced practitioners. Messages exist during musical performances and learning.

The community organizes two to three performances a week. This help to ensure the viability of Zaoli. As the guarantor of tradition, traditional chiefdoms also play a key role in the process of dissemination. Inter-village dance competitions and festivals provide further opportunities for review.

Economy

Although men's main occupation used to be hunting. Now, the Guro are farmers. Their subsistence crops include plantains, rice, and yam. Cash crops include coffee, cocoa, and cotton.

They also practice rotating farming. While men clear the fields, the women do most of the other works. In the late 20th century, some of their public lands were replaced by industrial plantations.

In the southern part of the Guro People's Territory, arboriculture includes palm wine extraction. While in the northern part, cola oil and nuts are exchanged for dried fish from Niger. The exchange of daily necessities in the market is usually carried out by women. Other heavy goods are traded by men.

Before abandoning their villages during the colonial period, the men cleared the land. Women planted crops such as cocoa, rice, cotton, yam, and coffee according to the season.

Adding to the masks trade, the ancient Luo people also carved figures. These figures often stand with arms bend. While their faces are similar to a mask. The smaller figure is an elegant female head mounted on a Guro loom.

Administrative Head

The people are guided by the oldest member of the community. Villagers also form village committees. In the traditional Guro society, there is no position of a village chief. Nonetheless, a prominent clan leader is considered outstanding.

He is consulted when resolving disputes and represent the village in front of outsiders.

Trezan, the owner of the land, distributes the land to the people and makes sacrifices. The village is composed of several descendants. It is the basic social and economic unit of Guro society.

Conclusion

The mask-making of the Guro tribe is very popular. Their most popular mask is the zamble mask. This is a complex and beautiful mask that leaves a smile in the hearts of art collectors.

Although the people use to be hunters, they are now known for their agricultural practices. The design of their traditional clothing also makes them unique.

Historically, Luo people are ruled by chiefs. He represents and presents the village to tourists. Part of his job is to resolved disputes, and organize several festivals during the week. This help in maintaining the tradition.

In terms of religion, they believe in traditional African religions. Unlike other parts of African countries where the belief system is Christianity and Islam.

La France a-t-elle encore un pouvoir sur ses anciennes colonies ?

Brian Gogarty 1 an

La France exerce encore une certaine influence sur ses anciennes colonies, notamment en Afrique occidentale. Toutefois, cette influence est surestimée et elle diminue aujourd'hui.

Mais c'est un sujet brûlant, j'en ai bien conscience.

La Françafrique

Tout d'abord, parlons de l'influence de la France en Afrique francophone. Cette influence existe réellement et elle est souvent néfaste pour les pays africains qui la connaissent. En tant que français, je me dois de le reconnaître.

Pour comprendre le pouvoir de la France sur ses anciennes colonies, il faut remonter à l'époque de la décolonisation, vers 1960.
À l'époque, la colonisation n'était plus possible car c'était déjà une pratique révolue. La France de 1960 n'avait plus rien à voir avec la France colonialiste du temps de Jules Ferry. C'était une époque dépassée, tout comme la marine à voiles.

Mais tout le monde ne l'avait pas encore compris. En revanche, de Gaulle l'avait compris. C'est pour cela qu'il a accepté d'accorder l'indépendance aux colonies.

Charles de Gaulle, le décolonisateur.

Cependant, cette indépendance n'était pas complète. En effet, de Gaulle ne voulait pas pour autant renoncer aux richesses africaines (bois exotiques, minéraux, pétrole, etc). Lui et plusieurs de ses successeurs ont donc fait en sorte de garder des relations avec les anciennes colonies.

Ainsi, la France soutenait les gouvernements de ces pays, même des dictatures féroces, dans tous les domaines. Et en échange, ils restaient sous la tutelle de l'Élysée et favorisaient ses intérêts. La France pouvait donc continuer d'exploiter ses anciennes colonies.

Paris est même allé jusqu'à effectuer des coups d'État. Par exemple, Léon Mba, le président gabonais qui était lié à l'Élysée, fut renversé en 1964 à cause de sa dérive autoritaire. L'armée française est donc intervenue pour le remettre au pouvoir. Et ce n'est pas le seul exemple.

https://www.google.fr/url?sa=t&source=web&rct=j&url=https://fr.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/L%25C3%25A9on_Mba&ved=2ahUKEwiA6JfpltXqAhU78uAKHQ59DEEQFjALegQIAhAB&usg=AOvVaw3yW5r0H5wHvUT3nnDqGc8N

Les Africains, premiers responsables

Toutefois, les premiers responsables de cette situation sont les Africains eux-mêmes. Lorsque ces nouveaux pays ont accédé à l'indépendance, rien ne les obligeait à garder une influence française dans leurs affaires.

Vers 1960, comme je l'ai déjà dit, la colonisation n'était plus possible. Les Français étaient contraints de se retirer de leurs colonies, ils ne pouvaient donc pas obliger les gouvernements africains à garder des liens avec eux.

Si en 1960, les nouveaux dirigeants africains avaient refusé de garder une influence française, que se serait-il donc passé ? La France aurait refusé de se retirer de ces pays et aurait continué d'y imposer le régime colonial ? Ces pays seraient alors restés des colonies françaises, comme du temps de Jules Ferry, jusqu'à nos jours ? Ce n'est pas du tout réaliste !

Affiche de propagande coloniale des années 1890. Mais en 1960, ceci était totalement révolu. Qu'en serait-il aujourd'hui ?!

La France était donc obligée de partir de ces pays. Si leurs gouvernements ont accepté néanmoins de garder des liens avec elle, c'est parce qu'ils le voulaient, cela les arrangeait. Ce sont eux, les premiers responsables.

Les temps changent

Mais aujourd'hui, la situation a bien changé, la France a perdu beaucoup de son influence sur ses anciennes colonies. La Françafrique a disparu progressivement au fil des décennies. La situation n'est plus comparable aux années 60 ou 70. La France ne mène plus de coups d'État en Afrique depuis longtemps.

Certes, de nos jours, l'Élysée conserve encore des liens avec certains États africains, et des entreprises françaises continuent sans doute d'exploiter des ressources naturelles au détriment des populations locales.

Une mine d'or. Les ressources naturelles sont abondantes mais elles sont souvent exploitées par des entreprises étrangères et leurs profits ne reviennent pas au pays. Il y a donc bien exploitation.

Cependant, cette exploitation se réalise uniquement en profitant de la corruption des élites incompétentes et cupides. Autrement dit, ces entreprises françaises (et pas que françaises) peuvent agir ainsi parce que les autorités africaines corrompues décident de les laisser faire.

De plus, et c'est probablement l'élément le plus important, les Français ne sont plus que des profiteurs parmi d'autres en Afrique.

En effet, d'autres puissances étrangères sont entrées dans le jeu ces dernières décennies, notamment les puissances asiatiques comme la Chine, le Japon, l'Inde. Et ces pays sont maintenant beaucoup plus populaires que la France auprès des États africains.

https://www.google.fr/url?sa=t&source=web&rct=j&url=https://www.nofi.media/2019/04/afrique-francophone/64812&ved=2ahUKEwjv9rjJkNXqAhVqxYUKHaU1CE4QFjAEegQIDRAI&usg=AOvVaw3Ye9j64ZG1mOazcyaQkewR

https://www.google.fr/url?sa=t&source=web&rct=j&url=https://www.lemonde.fr/afrique/article/2020/02/06/la-france-en-afrique-un-partenaire-d-affaires-de-moins-en-moins-particulier_6028642_3212.html&ved=2ahUKEwjj2tjKkdXqAhWrx4UKHaPHBtcQFjAKegQIChAB&usg=AOvVaw0TRfHro6aeDLLyJp7HN7JV

Cet élément est décisif parce que la France n'est maintenant plus la seule puissance étrangère à vouloir profiter des richesses de l'Afrique francophone. Et cela, les dirigeants africains le savent, ils en profitent donc pour jouer sur la concurrence.

Autrement dit, si la France ne les satisfait pas, ils menacent de se tourner vers la Chine, le Japon ou l'Allemagne. Ils en profitent alors pour s'opposer de plus en plus à la France. Évidemment, cette situation ne plaît pas à l'Élysée mais ils n'ont pas le choix.

Irresponsabilité

La France a donc perdu beaucoup d'influence sur ses anciennes colonies et elle continue d'en perdre. Elle s'est faîte largement détrônée par les puissances asiatiques.

Désormais, ce sont les Chinois qui exploitent le plus les richesses de l'Afrique francophone. Et encore une fois, ce sont les gouvernements africains corrompus qui les laissent faire, personne ne les force. Ce sont des irresponsables.

Il faut donc arrêter de dire que c'est la faute des autres. Les problèmes actuels de l'Afrique ne sont pas causés essentiellement par les pays étrangers comme la France ou la Chine. C'est aux Africains eux-mêmes de prendre leurs responsabilités. Suivre Brian Gogarty

Questions similaires

La France est-elle prospère à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait la France ?

Pourquoi les anciennes colonies britanniques semblent-elles avoir moins de ressentiments envers l'Angleterre que les anciennes colonies françaises vis-à-vis de la France ?

Pourquoi la France n'a-t-elle pas comme toutes ses colonies viré tous les Français de chez elle ?

Que pense le peuple français de la surexploitation des ex colonies par la France ?

Quelle colonie était la plus importante pour la France ?

Que deviendra la France sans ses colonies d'Afrique ?

Pourquoi la France ne veut-elle pas se retirer complètement dans les affaires intérieures et extérieures de son ancienne colonie ?

Que serait la France aujourd'hui si elle possédait encore toutes ses colonies ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle du mal à regarder son histoire coloniale en face ?

Pourquoi la France ne peut pas laisser ces colonies de gérer ces problèmes sociaux et La Côte d’Ivoire est-elle le pays d'où viendra la chute de la France en Afrique ?

Hervée Tia · Suivre Lieu : Afrique de l'ouest (1992–aujourd'hui) Mis à jour le 1 an Réponse originale : La Côte d'Ivoire est-elle le pays par où viendra la chute de la France en afrique ?

Et à votre avis, elle chuterait pour se retrouver où exactement ?

La Côte d'Ivoire est-elle le pays d'où viendra la chute de la France en Afrique ?

Je tiens tout d'abord à saluer l'optimisme de votre question, qui non seulement présuppose qu'il existe quelques velléités de la chute de la France en Côte d'Ivoire, mais qu'en plus, il y a une sorte de compétition entre la Côte d'Ivoire et d'autres pays pour le prix du premier révolutionnaire.

Siège social de Bolloré Africa Logistics à Abidjan

Je pourrais bien vous donner une réponse en une phrase, mais permettez-moi de développer quelque peu ma réponse, pour mieux situer les personnes qui voudront bien la lire.

Pour commencer, je propose que nous recherchions ensemble les raisons qui motiveraient les partisans de la chute de la France en Côte d'Ivoire : Faisons un état des lieux de la présence française en Côte d'Ivoire.

Au plan économique, on dénombre plus de 200 filiales de groupes français implantées en Côte d'Ivoire[1]. Elles exercent notamment dans le secteur primaire (exploitation de matières premières telles que le cacao, le café, le bois, les ressources minières,etc.) et le secteur tertiaire avec le transport aérien, les banques, la grande distribution, la logistique pour ne citer que ces activités. Je précise que les secteurs primaire et tertiaire demeurent les poumons de l'économie de CI vu qu'ils emploient 48% et 46% de la population active[2].

Séchage des fèves de cacao dans les plantations avant l'acheminement vers les compagnies

Au plan démographique, il est question d'environ 20.000 Français résidant en Côte d'Ivoire[3]. Je précise que le pays compte environ 23 millions d'habitants dont 6 millions d'étrangers.

Enfin, aux plans militaire et diplomatique, la base militaire du 43e BIMA[4]créée en 1973 est toujours en activité et compte à ce jour environ 1000 soldats[5]. Elle s'étend sur une modique superficie de 230 hectares. Il y a également l'ambassade de France en Côte d'Ivoire, située dans la cité administrative et des affaires d'Abidjan.

Je vous épargnerai la liste des écoles françaises ouvertes au sein de la capitale Abidjan. Mon but avec cette présentation était de vous donner une idée de l'implantation française dans divers domaines d'activités ici en Côte d'Ivoire.

Je le signifiais dans une réponse récente[6] les Ivoiriens ne nourrissent pas d'aversion ni d'obsession particulières contre la France. Certes beaucoup aimeraient une nouvelle donne dans les relations entre la l'hexagone et ses anciennes colonies, mais la France est seulement une minuscule partie des véritables préoccupations du citoyen lambda ici.

En outre, peut-être faites-vous allusion à la fameuse polémique sur le franc CFA[7] considéré comme un moyen pour la France d'exercer une domination certaine sur l'économie de ses anciennes colonies. Pour "calmer les ardeurs", nos dirigeants ont décidé la création d'une nouvelle monnaie nommée Éco[8]. Mais à ce niveau, je doute que l'on soit proche du "divorce". Savez-vous que la nouvelle monnaie en question détient le même taux de parité fixe avec l'euro à savoir 1 euro = 655,96 franc CFA = 655,96 Eco. Pour vous, c'est cela, le début de la "révolution" qui causerait "la chute" de la France en Afrique ?

Je dois vous dire que l'Ivoirien a un certain nombre de préoccupations plus importantes au quotidien, ces préoccupations principales s'appellent :

L'accès à l'emploi (taux de chômage officiel 25%)

L'accès aux logements décents pour tous

La lutte contre la corruption (106è mondial en la matière)[9]

La répartition des richesses (le salaire minimum officiel étant de 60000 francs CFA par mois soit 92 euros).

L'accès facile aux infrastructures socio-économiques de base sur toute l'étendue du territoire.

La cohésion sociale qui s'est fragilisée avec les différentes crises politico-militaires traversées par le pays pendant la décennie passée.

Je ne vois pas tellement l'utilité de dresser un tableau plus sombre vu que le lieu et le moment me semblent mal indiqués, mais nous pouvons constater ensemble que nous n'avons pas de raison évidente de souhaiter une rupture avec la France, des milliers de personnes subiraient les conséquences de cette situation et le tissu social s'en trouverait davantage mis à mal.

Je ne prétendrai pas détenir la science infuse bien sûr, peut-être que certains de mes compatriotes prendront le contre-pied de ma réponse. Toutefois, je n'aimerais pas me lancer de manière hasardeuse dans des théories du complot interminables en alléguant que la France est la cause de tous nos problèmes quotidiens cités plus haut. Je l'aurais peut-être pensé si je vivais ailleurs et que je n'avais aucun contact avec la réalité du terrain, mais c'est tout le contraire. Je suis confrontée à la réalité, à mon grand enchantement d'ailleurs.

Notes de bas de page

[1] France – Côte d'Ivoire : au delà des 200 filiales de grands groupes français…

[2] Économie de la Côte d'Ivoire — Wikipédia

[3] La population française installée en Côte d'Ivoire augmente de 4,36 % (Rapport)

[4] 43e bataillon d'infanterie de marine — Wikipédia

[5] Les effectifs des Forces françaises en Côte d'Ivoire vont être portés à 900 militaires d'ici l'été 2016

[6] http://Réponse à Si vous venez d'un pays qui a été colonisé dans le passé, que pense votre peuple des pays qui étaient autrefois au pouvoir ? Que pensent les Vietnamiens des Français, les Brésiliens des Portugais, etc? par Hervée Tia https://fr.quora.com/Si-vous-venez-dun-pays-qui-a-%C3%A9t%C3%A9-colonis%C3%A9-dans-le-pass%C3%A9-que-pense-votre-peuple-des-pays-qui-%C3%A9taient-autrefois-au-pouvoir-Que-pensent-les-Vietnamiens-des-Fran%C3%A7ais-les-Br%C3%A9siliens-des/answer/Herv%C3%A9e-Tia?ch=99&share=93b819f1&srid=I7j3b

[7] Le Franc CFA en débat

[8] https://www.rti.ci/info/economie/25991/du-franc-cfa-a-leco-quest-ce-qui-va-changer

[9] Indice de perception de la corruption 2019: la Côte d'Ivoire classée 106è mondial

Questions similaires

L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait l'Afrique ?

Si en 2019 un président africain décidait de sortir son pays du franc CFA, la France va-t-elle bombarder son palais comme elle l'a fait à Laurent Gbagbo de la Côte d'Ivoire ?

Sans l'Afrique que deviendrait la France ?

Que se passerait-il si la France se retire un jour totalement de l'Afrique, autant militairement qu'économiquement (Tout pays confondue) ?

Puisque les coûts de main-d'œuvre sont de loin moins chers en Afrique de l'Ouest, pourquoi la France n'a-t-elle pas déplacé ses usines de la France vers l'Afrique de l'Ouest?

Pourquoi est-ce que le monde ne dit rien sur le colonialisme économique imposé à l'Afrique par la France ?

Que serait la France d'aujourd'hui sans l'Afrique ?
Comment l'immigration est-elle perçue en Côte d'Ivoire ?
Quelle est la différence entre la France des années 70 et la France d'aujourd'hui ?
Que peut faire la France pour contrer la montée en puissance de la Chine en Afrique ?
La Turquie est-elle en train de battre la France sur la scène internationale ?

Le Franc CFA utilisé en Afrique de l'Ouest et en Afrique centrale est-il une monnaie d'assujettissement des anciennes colonies de la France ?

Est-il vrai que la France pourrait vendre une partie de ses réserves d'or pour relancer l'économie africaine ?

La chute de la France en Afrique sera-t-elle progressive et négociée ou brutale et sanglante ?

De quel pays africain partira la chute de la France en Afrique ?

La vie difficile des femmes veuves en Côte d'Ivoire

David-GDK Connaissances: Anglais 8 mars

Les femmes ivoiriennes qui ont perdu leur mari -par exemple lors de la crise post-électorale qui s'est déroulée il y a une dizaine d'années- sont nombreuses. Parmi elles : Kadi Kado, âgée de 50 ans, mère de quatre enfants qu'elle élève seule depuis le décès de son époux, lors de la crise post-électorale de 2011.

"On vit au jour le jour", raconte-t-elle au micro de la DW. "Quand je dis au jour le jour, c'est avec les dons, je veux dire que je survis avec mes enfants". En plus de ces difficultés financières, Kadi Kado a été victime d'un accident cardiovasculaire en octobre dernier, qui a laissé des traces et rend, davantage encore, son quotidien compliqué.

Les charges s'accumulent

Mais Kadi Kado refuse de baisser les bras. Elle travaille comme assistante dans une école privée. Un travail pour lequel elle perçoit un salaire net de 90.000 francs CFA, soit 137 euros par mois. "Ça me permet au moins d'avoir un peu d'argent pour payer le loyer de cinquante mille francs", explique la mère de famille. Mais son salaire reste insuffisant pour faire face à ses nombreuses charges, telles que l'électricité ou l'eau. Elle a d'ailleurs encore des arriérés de loyer depuis sa maladie. Sa voix se remplit parfois de larmes quand elle en parle.

Une situation difficile aussi pour sa fille, Mariam-Nicole, âgée de 21 ans, étudiante en gestion commerciale. Consciente de la situation que traverse sa mère, Mariam-Nicole a un seul objectif : celui de réussir à l'école. "Moi je ne la plains pas", dit la jeune fille. "Mon objectif aujourd'hui, c'est d'enlever ma maman de cette situation. Si ma maman fait déjà l'effort de me mettre à l'école, j'ai conscience que l'effort qu'elle fait c'est pour que je réussisse."

Quotidien difficile aussi pour les enfants

Au décès de son père en 2011, Salif Bocoum, l'aîné de la famille, a dû arrêter ses études pour apprendre le métier de couturier. Sans argent pour s'installer à son propre compte, Salif fait de petits contrats chez des créateurs de modes pour subvenir à ses besoins et venir en aide à sa famille.

La vie de la veuve Kadi et de ses quatre enfants n'est pas un cas isolé. Les crises politiques à répétition en Côte d'Ivoire ont fait beaucoup de veuves et d'orphelins. Souvent, ces femmes sont seules à s'occuper de leurs enfants, délaissées par les pouvoirs publics.

Kadi Kado espère de l'aide pour trouver un travail mieux payé et aussi financer un atelier de couture pour son fils aîné, qui pourrait alors subvenir aux charges de ses autres enfants.

Les stars d'Afrique
Côte d'Ivoire : démission du Premier ministre Patrick Achi

· Suivre Publication par David-GDK mer.

Le Premier ministre ivoirien Patrick Achi a annoncé sa démission du gouvernement ce mercredi 13 avril 2022.Le Premier ministre Patrick Achi a remis sa démission au Président de la République Alassane Ouattara, ce jour, lors du Conseil des ministres. La démission du Premier ministre Patrick Achi entraîne également la démission du gouvernement ivoirien. « Dans ce contexte d'extrême exigence internationale, qu'elle soit sous continentale ou mondiale, vous avez clairement exprimé votre volonté de procéder à un réaménagement du gouvernement, je voudrais donc respectueusement vous présenter ma démission en tant que Premier ministre ainsi que celle de l'ensemble du gouvernement », a-t-il déclaré.

Une démission acceptée par Alassane Ouattara. « M. le Premier ministre, vous venez de me remettre votre démission ainsi que celle de votre gouvernement, je l'accepte en vue de renforcer l'efficacité de l'action du gouvernement et pour tenir compte de la conjoncture économique mondiale actuelle, j'ai décidé de la réduction du nombre de ministres du gouvernement », a déclaré le président de la République ivoirien. Il a expliqué « qu'il est impératif de réduire les dépenses de l'Etat tout en les réorientant vers la résilience sociale et sécuritaire. La réduction du nombre de ministre entraînera certainement le départ de certains d'entre vous », a regretté Alassane Ouattara. Le président ivoirien a annoncé la nomination d'un nouveau premier ministre dès la semaine prochaine et d'un gouvernement resserré d'une trentaine de membres. Ce fidèle du chef de l'État ivoirien, avait été nommé à la primature le 26 mars 2021 après le décès d'Hamad Bakayoko.

Fournis par Journal du Cameroun

AfriStar
Côte d'Ivoire : Abidjan à l'épreuve des constructions anarchiques

· Suivre Publication par David-GDK 10 h

- Les effondrements d'immeubles à répétition dans la capitale économique de la Côte d'Ivoire sont révélateurs d'une anarchie urbaine qui ne cesse de gagner du terrain.

Quatre personne ont trouvé la mort, le 7 mars dernier, dans l'effondrement d'un immeuble de quatre étages dans la commune de Cocody, dans le nord d'Abidjan. Une dizaine de jours auparavant, un autre immeuble s'est effondré à Treichville, dans le sud de la capitale économique de la Côte d'Ivoire, faisant cette fois-ci sept morts. Le 13 mars 2021, toujours à Cocody, un immeuble de cinq étages en cours de construction s'est effondré donnant lieu à un bilan de neuf morts... Et la liste est encore longue. A l'issue d'une séance de travail tenue le 8 mars dernier avec le Premier ministre ivoirien (démissionnaire), Patrick Achi, le ministre de la Construction, du Logement et de l'Urbanisme, Bruno Nabagné Koné, a indiqué que son département a enregistré une vingtaine d'effondrements avant 2020, neuf (9) en 2020, deux (2) en 2021 et deux (2) en 2022. Loin d'être de simples accidents fortuits, ces effondrements à répétition constituent un vrai phénomène à Abidjan où l'anarchie urbaine défigure la ville et où les drames se succèdent.

- Constructions sans architecte

Angèle Beugré, architecte et membre du Conseil national des architectes de Côte d'Ivoire, chargée de la vie sociale et de l'international affirme à l'Agence Anadolu que « pour tous les effondrements d'immeubles qu'il y'a eu en Côte d'Ivoire depuis la création de l'Ordre dans les années 70, aucun architecte n'a été associé au projet ».

Dans ses bureaux de Cocody, elle explique que « les architectes de Côte d'Ivoire ne sont impliqués que dans 20% des projets de construction sur tout le territoire national. Il y'a donc 80% de constructions qui se font sans architecte ».

Un fait qui pour elle « est une grosse anomalie. C'est une profession de chef d'orchestre qui sait mettre en valeur les compétences requises pour le projet en fonction de ce que demande le client », ajoute Angèle Beugré, là où recourir selon elle aux services d'un architecte aurait aidé à éviter tous ces drames. « C'est la principale solution. Un architecte ne travaillera pas seul. Il se mettra toujours en accord avec un bureau de contrôle de sondage géotechnique et un ingénieur », poursuit-elle.

- Mécanisme de contrôle

Un avis partagé par Sidi Aïdara, ingénieur travaux publics et chef d'entreprise dont le siège est aussi dans la commune de Codody. « Normalement, la chaîne de procédure pour faire un bâtiment, hormis les volets administratifs jusqu'au permis de construire, comporte un mécanisme de contrôle, parce qu'on n'est pas juge et partie. Si vous me confiez la construction de votre villa, je dois me faire contrôler mais c'est le client qui paye. Ce côté de la loi, certains semblent l'ignorer. c'est facturé entre 2 et 3% de la valeur du bien », nous a expliqué ce diplômé de l'Enstp (Ecole nationale supérieure des travaux publics) de Yamoussoukro, la capitale politique ivoirienne.

Pour Aïdara, les populations ou les maîtres d'ouvrages commettent souvent des erreurs en ne s'adressant pas aux professionnels du secteurs.

« De manière générale, la population ne s'y connait pas. Donc on prend un parent ou un ami qui s'y connait un peu ou qui a déjà construit. Comme il a un ouvrage qui tient depuis des années, il passe pour l'expert. Quand on a un chantier qui est fait dans les règles de l'art, un laboratoire vient pour faire des essais de sol. Il vous dit par exemple, pour un immeuble de R+3, le bon niveau de sol pour faire votre fondation. Quand vous finissez de creuser, ce laboratoire revient vérifier pour voir si c'est le bon sol », a-t-il ajouté.

- Responsabilité partagée

Sidi Aïdara, qui suit des cours d'architecture actuellement, estime que relativement aux effondrements d'immeubles à Abidjan, la responsabilité est partagée. « De manière générale, on dira que la responsabilité est partagée. Il y a la responsabilité sociétale de l'Etat et puis après, nous en tant que professionnels, on doit se battre pour mériter notre place. C'est à dire qu'un constructeur aujourd'hui doit être à même de dire à son client quelle procédure légale suivre pour réaliser un bon projet. Le client, on considère qu'il n'est pas sachant », a-t-il expliqué.

Mais aujourd'hui, Angèle Beugré et Sidi Aïdara estiment qu'il ne faut pas céder à la panique quant au choix des logements en hauteur ou de type pavillonnaire. « Si on se rue vers les villas basses, il y en aura plus. Nos parents ne vont pas quitter les 220 logements (quartier emblématique de la commune d Adjamé, NDLR). C'est un bâtiment d'Etat mais qui tient depuis de nombreuses années », rassure l'ingénieur. Tout comme Mme Beugré pour qui « aujourd'hui même, l'architecte va proposer qu'on passe plus dans des projets immobiliers en hauteur compte tenue de la rareté du foncier. L'objectif c'est d'arriver à mettre la population en confiance et aussi à mettre uniquement des professionnels dans le processus ».

A l'issue du recensement 2021 de la population, la Côte d'Ivoire compte 28 millions d'habitants, dont le un cinquième vit dans la seule ville d'Abidjan. Une pression démographique de taille sur le domaine foncier et sur l'habitat qui crée un étalement urbain, chose qui fait qu'aujourd'hui, par exemple, la commune d'Abobo (est d'Abidjan) se confond à la ville d'Anyama. C'est également le cas de la commune de Cocody et la ville de Bingerville.

Source: AA.com

AfriStar
Élection à la FIF: Drogba, Yacine Diallo et Sory Diabaté étalent leur vision

· Suivre Publication par David-GDK 9 h

Les candidats à l'élection de la présidence de la Fédération ivoirienne de football (FIF), l'ex-footballeur international Didier Drogba, Yacine Diallo et Sory Diabaté, étalent leur vision à des émissions télé ou sur les réseaux sociaux durant la campagne, en cours.

L'homme d'affaires, Idriss Yacine Diallo, lui, veut rassembler pour développer le football ivoirien tout en faisant des présidents de club, des partenaires décisionnels plutôt. Pour une gouvernance optimum, il veut mettre en place un comité de surveillance.

Il envisage, s'il est élu, de recruter deux coachs pour l'équipe nationale, mobiliser un pool d'investisseurs et de sponsors, arrêter un smig, un salaire minimum pour les joueurs, et de projeter le football ivoirien à l'horizon 2030.

Ses fans sont nombreux sur les réseaux sociaux. Suite à une émission télé, l'un écrit sur sa page Facebook "j'ai vu un candidat parler, en premium aux 81 votants avant de faire connaître sa vision à l'ensemble des Ivoiriens".

L'ex-footballeur international, président de la liste "Renaissance", Didier Drogba, promet "une nouvelle ère" du football ivoirien, au lancement de sa campagne, assurant qu'il a "toutes les chances de gagner cette élection".

La candidature de l'ancien attaquant vedette ivoirien, Didier Drogba, est portée par la ferveur publique, mais cela ne suffit pas pour gagner, il faut convaincre les 81 grands électeurs, qui départageront les candidats le 23 avril 2022 à Yamoussoukro.

"Le football moderne: C'est de l'argent...Celui qui vous parle d'autres choses...Il ment. Si c'est pour attirer de l'argent dans le football ivoirien, il n'y a qu'un seul vainqueur : il s'appelle Didier Drogba", lance un internaute.

"Les autres candidats peuvent venir avec des ressources mais le ‘’Pulling power’’ économique de Didier Drogba n'a pas d'égal dans notre pays", écrit-il, avant d'ajouter que l'ex-footballeur international a déjà des grandes marques de renommée mondiale qui l'accompagnent.

M. Sory Diabaté, l'un des membres de l'équipe sortante, se veut le candidat "pour la grandeur du football ivoirien". Il compte coopérer avec l'Etat de Côte d'Ivoire pour permettre un meilleur traitement des athlètes et assurer le rayonnement du secteur. M. Diabaté prévoit un budget de 48 milliards FCFA sur les quatre ans que dure le mandat, soit 12 milliards FCFA par an.

Certains candidats sont "dans une histoire de calcul-Etat", déplore un internaute, citant M. Sory "je promets 500.000 fcfa à 20 joueurs de Ligue 1 comme salaire mensuel mais je verrai l'État pour voir comment payer. Selon mes calculs ça va coûter 5 milliards 480 millions par an sur 10 ans au contribuable."

A quelques heures du vote prévu le samedi 23 avril à Yamoussoukro, des fans du football ivoirien s'inquiètent sur un autre report à l'horizon. L'on peut lire sur les réseaux sociaux "qu'un courrier a quitté la FIF pour la CAF et la FIFA demandant le report des élections au motif qu'il faut d'abord boucler les enquêtes de moralité".

"Même si un proche de la présidente du Conor (Comité de normalisation) dément l'information, nous restons cependant vigilants. Le poulain est dans les cordes et un temps supplémentaire ne fera que l'enfoncer", martèle l'internaute.

La campagne bat son plein. Absent, mercredi soir, sur le plateau de la RTI 1, la télévision nationale, pour un débat contradictoire entre les trois candidats, M. Didier Drogba, selon la journaliste a indiqué que son staff a annulé sa venue à cinq minutes de l'émission.

Son équipe de campagne rapporte que Drogba a engagé son agenda en plusieurs points et les dates qui lui sont proposées sur des plateaux télé se chevauchent avec certains rendez-vous déjà pris et confirmés.

AfriStar
Urgent : Drogba battu, Idriss Diallo élu président de la FIF

· Suivre Publication par David-GDK

Didier Drogba ne sera pas le prochain président de la Fédération ivoirienne de football. L'ancienne star de Chelsea a été battu dès le premier tour. Yacine Idriss Diallo a été élu président de la FIF. ll est arrivé en tête avec 59 voix contre 21 voix, l'ancien capitaine de l'équipe nationale. Sory Diabaté arrive même devant Drogba avec 50 voix, à l'issue d'une longue Assemblée générale élective (AGE) ce samedi 23 avril 2022.

Qualifiés au deuxième tour, Idriss Diallo devance d'un cheveu Sory Diabaté, 63 voix à 61. «Je ne serai pas le président d'un camp contre un autre camp », a-t-il lancé aux dirigeants des clubs de 1ère, 2e, 3e divisions.

News Nigeria

In 2018, Yaya Toure's agent, Dmitri Seluk said Pep Guardiola will never win the UEFA Champions League again because of an African voodoo curse, that was placed on him for treating Yaya Toure badly.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 15h

Pep Guardiola sold Yaya Toure to Manchester City in 2010. Guardiola joined Manchester City in 2016 and Yaya Toure only started one Premier League game and played in 10 league games in 2017/2018.

Yaya Toure accused him of not liking African Footballers.

Qui connait un mathematicien africain ?

Hervée Tia · Suivre Lieu : Afrique de l'ouest (1992–aujourd'hui) 6 mo

Ils ne sont pas bien cachés. Vous les apercevrez dans l'enceinte des universités sur le continent et ailleurs, dans des administrations ou au travers d'articles et de recherches sur internet pour les plus connus.

Israël Tankam a déjà donné quelques noms dans sa belle réponse. En Côte d'ivoire, les plus connus sont probablement les professeurs Saliou Touré et Joséphine Guidy Wandja.

Saliou Touré est spécialisé dans l'analyse harmonique sur les groupes de Lie et les espaces riemanniens symétriques (ne me demandez pas ce que c'est, je n'ai fait que recopier un passage sur le net!)[1]. Il compte plusieurs titres et fonctions à son actif, entre autres : ex-ministre de l'éducation nationale, de l'enseignement supérieur, ex-président de l'Union Mathématique Africaine, ex-directeur des Nouvelles Éditions Ivoiriennes (au programme dans les écoles ivoiriennes), pour ne citer que ces titres aujourd'hui président du comité exécutif de la Société Mathématique de Côte d'Ivoire et de l'Université Internationale de Grand-Bassam.

[2]

Joséphine Guidy Wandja est connue pour être la première femme agrégée africaine et docteure d'État en mathématiques, première femme africaine titulaire d'un doctorat de 3ème cycle en mathématiques et la première femme africaine professeure de mathématiques dans une université[3].

[4]

Et parmi les plus jeunes pouces, on pourrait parler d'Isaac Jean-Eliel Konan, ancien prodige du lycée scientifique de Yamoussoukro, désormais docteur en mathématiques depuis l'année dernière (à ses 26 ans). Double médaillé d'Or aux Olympiades Panafricaines de Mathématiques (2009 et 2010), il remporte une médaille d'Argent aux Olympiades Internationales de Mathématiques en 2010.

Notes de bas de page

[1] Saliou Touré — Wikipédia
[2] Log into Facebook
[3] Joséphine Guidy Wandja — Wikipédia

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les animaux devraient-ils être protégés ? Les dodos ne manquent à personne, non ?
Je ne comprends pas pourquoi on doit conserver les animaux sauvages et dangereux?

Quels sont les exemples d'animaux qui sauvent délibérément d'autres animaux et/ou des personnes dans la nature ?

Quel est l'animal le plus dangereux sur Terre ?
Quel animal de compagnie préférez-vous entre le chien et le chat ? Et pourquoi ?

Est-ce que le fait de porter des vêtements décourage les animaux sauvages de vouloir attaquer les humains, ou est-ce que cela n'a aucun effet ?

Si quelqu'un élève un animal sauvage depuis qu'il est bébé, y a-t-il de fortes chances que l'animal, une fois adulte, s'attaque à son propre maître ?

Si les animaux sauvages, à la fois prédateurs et proies, ont adapté leur apparence pour devenir un camouflage dans leurs habitats naturels, pourquoi aucun d'entre eux n'est vert ?

Est-ce que les animaux sont racistes ?
Quelles sont les marques d'intelligence animale les plus terrifiantes ?
Existe-t-il des animaux sauvages élevant d'autres animaux pour leur propre

La France a-t-elle encore un pouvoir sur ses anciennes colonies ?

Brian Gogarty , lieu : Ploemeur, Bretagne, France (1997-présent) Répondu 17 juil. 2020

La France exerce encore une certaine influence sur ses anciennes colonies, notamment en Afrique occidentale. Toutefois, cette influence est surestimée et elle diminue aujourd'hui.
Mais c'est un sujet brûlant, j'en ai bien conscience.

La Françafrique Tout d'abord, parlons de l'influence de la France en Afrique francophone. Cette influence existe réellement et elle est souvent néfaste pour les pays africains qui la connaissent. En tant que français, je me dois de le reconnaître.

Pour comprendre le pouvoir de la France sur ses anciennes colonies, il faut remonter à l'époque de la décolonisation, vers 1960.

À l'époque, la colonisation n'était plus possible car c'était déjà une pratique révolue. La France de 1960 n'avait plus rien à voir avec la France colonialiste du temps de Jules Ferry. C'était une époque dépassée, tout comme la marine à voiles.

Mais tout le monde ne l'avait pas encore compris. En revanche, de Gaulle l'avait compris. C'est pour cela qu'il a accepté d'accorder l'indépendance aux colonies.

Charles de Gaulle, le décolonisateur.

Cependant, cette indépendance n'était pas complète. En effet, de Gaulle ne voulait pas pour autant renoncer aux richesses africaines (bois exotiques, minéraux, pétrole, etc). Lui et plusieurs de ses successeurs ont donc fait en sorte de garder des relations avec les anciennes colonies.

Ainsi, la France soutenait les gouvernements de ces pays, même des dictatures féroces, dans tous les domaines. Et en échange, ils restaient sous la tutelle de l'Élysée et favorisaient ses intérêts. La France pouvait donc continuer d'exploiter ses anciennes colonies.

Paris est même allé jusqu'à effectuer des coups d'État. Par exemple, Léon Mba, le président gabonais qui était lié à l'Élysée, fut renversé en 1964 à cause de sa dérive autoritaire. L'armée française est donc intervenue pour le remettre au pouvoir. Et ce n'est pas le seul exemple.

https://www.google.fr/url?sa=t&source=web&rct=j&url=https://fr.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/L%25C3%25A9on_Mba&ved=2ahUKEwiA6JfpltXqAhU78uAKHQ59DEEQFjALegQIAhAB&usg=AOvVaw3yW5r0H5wHvUT3nnDqGc8N

Les Africains, premiers responsables

Toutefois, les premiers responsables de cette situation sont les Africains eux-mêmes. Lorsque ces nouveaux pays ont accédé à l'indépendance, rien ne les obligeait à garder une influence française dans leurs affaires.

Vers 1960, comme je l'ai déjà dit, la colonisation n'était plus possible. Les Français étaient contraints de se retirer de leurs colonies, ils ne pouvaient donc pas obliger les gouvernements africains à garder des liens avec eux.

Si en 1960, les nouveaux dirigeants africains avaient refusé de garder une influence française, que se serait-il donc passé ? La France aurait refusé de se retirer de ces pays et aurait continué d'y imposer le régime colonial ? Ces pays seraient alors restés des colonies françaises, comme du temps de Jules Ferry, jusqu'à nos jours ? Ce n'est pas du tout réaliste !

Affiche de propagande coloniale des années 1890. Mais en 1960, ceci était totalement révolu. Qu'en serait-il aujourd'hui ?!

La France était donc obligée de partir de ces pays. Si leurs gouvernements ont accepté néanmoins de garder des liens avec elle, c'est parce qu'ils le voulaient, cela les arrangeait. Ce sont eux, les premiers responsables.

Les temps changent

Mais aujourd'hui, la situation a bien changé, la France a perdu beaucoup de son influence sur ses anciennes colonies. La Françafrique a disparu progressivement au fil des décennies. La situation n'est plus comparable aux années 60 ou 70. La France ne mène plus de coups d'État en Afrique depuis longtemps.

Certes, de nos jours, l'Élysée conserve encore des liens avec certains États africains, et des entreprises françaises continuent sans doute d'exploiter des ressources naturelles au détriment des populations locales.

Une mine d'or. Les ressources naturelles sont abondantes mais elles sont souvent exploitées par des entreprises étrangères et leurs profits ne reviennent pas au pays. Il y a donc bien exploitation.

Cependant, cette exploitation se réalise uniquement en profitant de la corruption des élites incompétentes et cupides. Autrement dit, ces entreprises françaises (et pas que françaises) peuvent agir ainsi parce que les autorités africaines corrompues décident de les laisser faire.

De plus, et c'est probablement l'élément le plus important, les Français ne sont plus que des profiteurs parmi d'autres en Afrique.

En effet, d'autres puissances étrangères sont entrées dans le jeu ces dernières décennies, notamment les puissances asiatiques comme la Chine, le Japon, l'Inde. Et ces pays sont maintenant beaucoup plus populaires que la France auprès des États africains.

https://www.google.fr/url?sa=t&source=web&rct=j&url=https://www.nofi.media/2019/04/afrique-francophone/64812&ved=2ahUKEwjv9rjJkNXqAhVqxYUKHaU1CE4QFjAEegQIDRAI&usg=AOvVaw3Ye9j64ZG1mOazcyaQkewR

https://www.google.fr/url?sa=t&source=web&rct=j&url=https://www.lemonde.fr/afrique/article/2020/02/06/la-france-en-afrique-un-partenaire-d-affaires-de-moins-en-moins particulier_6028642_3212.html&ved=2ahUKEwjj2tjKkdXqAhWrx4UKHaPHBtcQFjAKegQIChAB&usg=AOvVaw0TRfHro6aeDLLyJp7HN7JV

Cet élément est décisif parce que la France n'est maintenant plus la seule puissance étrangère à vouloir profiter des richesses de l'Afrique francophone. Et cela, les dirigeants africains le savent, ils en profitent donc pour jouer sur la concurrence.

Autrement dit, si la France ne les satisfait pas, ils menacent de se tourner vers la Chine, le Japon ou l'Allemagne. Ils en profitent alors pour s'opposer de plus en plus à la France. Évidemment, cette situation ne plaît pas à l'Élysée mais ils n'ont pas le choix.

Irresponsabilité

La France a donc perdu beaucoup d'influence sur ses anciennes colonies et elle continue d'en perdre. Elle s'est faîte largement détrônée par les puissances asiatiques.

Désormais, ce sont les Chinois qui exploitent le plus les richesses de l'Afrique francophone. Et encore une fois, ce sont les gouvernements africains corrompus qui les laissent faire, personne ne les force. Ce sont des irresponsables.

Il faut donc arrêter de dire que c'est la faute des autres. Les problèmes actuels de l'Afrique ne sont pas causés essentiellement par les pays étrangers comme la France ou la Chine. C'est aux Africains eux-mêmes de prendre leurs responsabilités.

Questions similaires

On entend souvent dire que "la France est riche parce qu'elle a pillé/pille encore d'autres pays (notamment ses anciennes colonies). Est-ce cohérent ? La France a-t-elle des atouts qui lui sont propres et lui permettent d'être "au top" malgré tout ?

L'affaire Traoré montre-t-elle à quel point la France est encore raciste et colonialiste ?

Que pense le peuple français de la surexploitation des ex colonies par la France ?
Pourquoi la France n'assume-t-elle pas son passé colonial ?

Pensez-vous qu'un jour les ex-colonies françaises demanderont des réparations pécuniaires massives à la France pour l'occupation de leurs territoires et avec quelle chance de succès ?

La France est-elle prospère à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait la France ?

Pourquoi la France n'a-t-elle pas comme toutes ses colonies viré tous les Français de chez elle ?

La France doit-elle s'excuser perpétuellement pour avoir eu des colonies en Afrique ?

Pourquoi les Français n'arrivent-ils pas à tourner la page de l'Algérie et du colonialisme ?

Que pensez-vous de l'affirmation de Anasse Kazib « L'Histoire de la France

USJK Football

Posted by USJK Football Sat

Didier Drogba: "I remember this story very well. Di Matteo, Chelsea's coach at this time, did as usual and gave us a list of the opposing team's top scorers. Example lists with Wayne Rooney-22 goals, Robin van Persie-15 goals, and so on.

Then, one day, we faced Barcelona in UCL Semi-final and when he was put on the scorer's list, in third place there was Xavi with 14 goals, in second place Alexis Sanchez and Cesc Fàbregas were 15 goals away.

But we all started to laugh when the top scorer appeared on the screen. It was Leo Messi. With 63 goals including 14 goals in the Champions League. 63 goals this season!

It was such a crazy number that we looked at each other with disbelieving faces and started laughing. What else could we do? I even took a photo of the number of goals because it was outrageous. ”

Lionel Messi scored 91 goals that year 😳 🐐

Related: USJK Football

.

In 1989, Zinedine Zidane began his senior professional career at the French club Cannes, where he spent three years. In his first full season at the club, he helped them secure their first-ever European football berth by qualifying for the UEFA Cup after finishing fourth in the league.

After three years at Cannes, he joined Bordeaux in 1992 where he played alongside fellow countrymen Christophe Duggary and Bixente Lizarazu.

In 1995, it was reported that Blackburn Rovers manager Kenny Dalglish made a move to sign Zidane but club owner Jack Walker decided to talk him out of it, saying: "Why do you want to sign Zidane when we have Tim Sherwood?"

Also, in 1996, Zidane was reportedly offered to Newcastle United for £1.2 million, but the club turned down the offer after watching him, claiming that he was not good enough to play in England's top-flight division.

Zidane spent four years at Bordeaux before leaving for Juventus in 1996. During his time at Bordeaux, he won the 1995 Intertoto Cup and finished runner-up in the 1995–96 UEFA Cup. He was also named Ligue 1 Player of the Season in 1995-96.

Related: USJK Football

The legendary referee Pierluigi Collina ❤️

The only referee who had the VAR in his eyes 😅

This referee could communicate in 4 languages on the field (French, Spanish, Italian, and English). Before each game, he studied the game and the players of the teams he would lead and learned the names of the players.

During the 2002 World Cup Final in Japan, Ronaldo gave him his shirt and the ball. The players from Brazil and Germany have congratulated him on his performance. He was ruthless with his cardboard, charismatic, and respected. Footballers had huge respect for him and even fear, just of his presence. This is also the only ref who has been on a video game jacket.

Picture of the day: Sublime Ivory Coast

Posted by excluding tax 6 Nov.

A true legend

Landscape in Bondoukou, northeastern Ivory Coast

Hello Abidjan

IVORY COAST: Côte d'Ivoire Sublime, a meeting place to discover and rediscover Côte d'Ivoire in all its forms.

My name is Hervée. I was born and raised in Ivory Coast quite a few years ago. I have spent my entire life in this beautiful country, I have seen it change from year to year and today I believe I know enough to share with you what life is like here.

In addition to being from the Ivory Coast, I am in service as a senior technician at the Ministry of Tourism and Leisure. In general, I don't talk much about my work to lay people around me because it requires a lot of energy! For example, you have to explain and re-explain that I don't work with any tourists, I'm more dealing with "those who work with tourists ": the owners and managers of establishments. It is also necessary to explain and re-explain that the ministry does not deal only with tourist sites, but also with establishments of accommodation, relaxation... Afterwards, it is still necessary to explain to people that tourism is not limited only to beaches and the visit of the great buildings... I stop there but you will have understood.

Coming back to the subject, I created this space in order to share more targeted and detailed content on Côte d'Ivoire. This name came to mind almost instinctively, especially since it has a link with my profession: Sublime Côte d'Ivoire being the name of a vast program to revitalize the tourism sector in Côte d'Ivoire ... No no, don't leave yet! I am not here to offer or sell you any product. I'm already waging a merciless war on spam every day here on Quora , and I separate my professional life perfectly from my adventure here.

Well! Côte d'Ivoire is this piece of land in West Africa in the shape of a square with curved sides.

This is the country where people laugh at serious things (politics, economy, cost of living) and get carried away at fun things (football, cinema, music).

It is this country where traders almost never have any money, where every foreigner is called " my brother " and every foreigner is called "my darling". It is also this country where two people who barely meet on a bus or taxi can talk and laugh as if they were long-time friends...in short, you will know more over time.

I end by saying Akwaba * and thank you for your interest. I wish you a pleasant discovery. Your questions, answers, comments and shares are welcome.

Akwaba: vernacular word meaning welcome. A statue of the same name is even erected at a roundabout not far from the exit/entrance of Abidjan airport, a symbol of the hospitality of a people... a symbol also of the slowdowns that traffic in the Ivorian capital! But relax...

Images: Ivory Coast Tourism

Footnotes
[1]Ivory Coast | Culture, History, & People

Associated: Why not help African countries develop to stop the migrant crisis?

Alexander Roswilo Previous location: Africa (1975 – 2019) 3 years

It is difficult, if not impossible, for Europe.

[1]

The migratory crisis is only the consequence of an upstream phenomenon; bad governance . It is the African rulers who must make all the appropriate investments to protect the populations from want . Boris Guiffot clearly explained the various investments to be made. The problem is that these leaders are overwhelmed by the issues on the continent between capitalism and globalization.

[2]

Marc admitted it goes very quickly on the continent. The population is growing exponentially and the models administered by international institutions or European governments are not working to curb poverty. Europe has no solution to this phenomenon

[3]because the only one she could find at her level is to reduce her own birth rate . Better, Europe is in full decline so it has its own problems to manage (Answer by Alexandre Roswilo to Is France not witnessing its own decline?). I explained it with the Chinese case (Answer from Alexandre Roswilo to How long do you think China can still hold out under this regime before it implodes like the USSR?), Westerners have never been able to cope with such demographic issues on such a large scale . In Africa, especially sub-Saharan Africa, countries have not yet reached their demographic transition[4]

[5]Many of these countries are still underpopulated.

[6]

ÉVOLUTION DU PIB DES GRANDES ÉCONOMIES 2016-2050
(en milliards de dollars US et en parité de pouvoir d'achat)

CLASSEMENT EN 2016			CLASSEMENT EN 2050
RANG	PAYS	PIB PPA	RANG	PAYS	DIRECTION	PIB PPA
1	Chine	21 269	1	Chine	→	58 499
2	USA	18 562	2	Inde	↑	44 128
3	Inde	8 721	3	USA	↓	34 102
4	Japon	4 932	8	Japon	↓	6 779
5	Allemagne	3 979	9	Allemagne	↓	6 138
9	Royaume-Uni	2 788	10	Royaume-Uni	↓	5 369
10	France	2 737	12	France	↓	4 705
21	Egypte	1 105	14	Nigéria	↑	4 348
22	Nigéria	1 089	15	Egypte	↑	4 333
29	Afrique du Sud	736	27	Afrique du Sud	↑	2 570

Source: PWC
[7]

So, for many, Africa has become a ticking time bomb. Others would have liked to stop the process but it is too late. Many claim that the problem isrelated to tyranny and corruption Which is half wrong. A large number of current migrants come from perfectly democratic countries with a real alternation of power that have implemented modern policies.

But that is not enough. These democratic regimes only legitimize the predation of the wealthy classes who have succeeded in being born and prospering on the continent since independence. So many factors that promote the impoverishment of the bulk of the population. Corruption is gaining even more ground. The two giants of the continent, South Africa and Nigeria are a perfect illustration of this.

Unemployment hits record highs in South Africa [8]

[9]Youth unemployment shadowed by economic growth
[10]In 2050, there will be 2.5 billion Africans, many will be intellectuals with a high level of competence to be valued. What is certain is that nothing will stop them as now to find a good job to earn a better living.

The only way to contain all these individuals on the continent would be no longer to promote but above all to promote African entrepreneurship I'm not saying it's a small counter or place of commerce that Africans open here and there along the roads, but real boxes that can recruit hundreds or thousands of individuals.

[11]Entrepreneurial survival in Africa: the case of Guinean companies

[12]But there again, there is a fool's game. The leaders of world capitalism (the United States, China and the EU) are already waging a fratricidal war on the continent to control African markets. Nobody is stupid between Westerners and Chinese to understand that it is the market of the future with these billions of inhabitants.

[13]

What is left for businesses better for African entrepreneurs if only crumbs!

[14]Do you think these few Africans poorly paid by these multinationals will compensate well for the trickle down theory
[15] that liberal theorists put forward!

Footnotes

[1]Image on infomigrants.net
[2]Image on statista.com
[3]Alexandre Roswilo's response to How long do you think China can still hold out under this regime before it implodes like the USSR?
[4]Demographic transition
[5]Page on ined.fr
[6]Image on pinimg.com
[7]Image on afriquenmemoire.org

[8]Unemployment breaks records in South Africa - RFI
[9]unemployment in south africa
[10]Youth unemployment shadowed by economic growth
[11]https://www.cairn.info/revue-mondes-en-developpement-2011-3-page-125.htm
[12]https://www.cairn.info/revue-mondes-en-developpement-2011-3-page-125.htm
[13]Image on la-croix.com
[14]Image on legrandsoir.info
[15]Runoff theory - Wikipedia

Similar questions

Could an armed conflict break out between Algeria and France?

Why do sub-Saharan Africans treat North Africans as if they are not Africans?

Why did Africans help sell other Africans into slavery?

What is the importance of colonization for Africans?

Why are some French people against the massive arrival of African immigrants in France?

Could a non-European country one day join the euro zone or the EU?

Associated:Can we control our borders, set up immigration quotas, criminalize illegality and abolish family reunification without derogating from European law?

Mina Daoud Bachelor's degree in political science & law degree 1 year

Yes, yes and yes !

Contrary to what some politicians may say — who would like us to leave the ECHR, the EU or even that we illegally derogate from the treaties and European law — we can recover control of our immigration policy and our borders without leaving the European Union.

You see, most French people mistakenly believe that the European treaties are unconditionally binding on EU members and that the only way to derogate from them (legally, I mean) would be to either renegotiate them or withdraw*.

However, nothing is more wrong !

Yes, as a general rule , European law takes precedence over French law (the European courts are however not superior in the hierarchy, in particular because the national courts are also responsible for enforcing European law).

Nevertheless, the European legal order recognizes three sources of law:

Primary sources (the Treaty on EU, the Treaty on the Functioning of the EU, the constitutions of member countries, etc.).

Secondary sources (all treaties which do not deal directly with the competence of the European institutions, including commercial treaties).

Additional sources (legal acts adopted in accordance with a legislative procedure, all regulations, etc.)

It goes without saying that the primary sources have a qualitative value which the secondary sources of course do not have and that the latter in turn have more value than the complementary sources.

On the other hand — and this is what some seem to forget or perhaps do not know — only secondary and complementary European sources take precedence over their national equivalents.

Indeed, the constitutions of the member countries always take precedence over the European treaties, whether these are considered as primary or secondary sources.

— for example, in a decision in contradiction with the decisions of the CJEU, the Court of Karlsruhe (≈ the German Constitutional Court), which considers the purchase by the ECB of eurozone government bonds as unconstitutional , ordered the Deutsche Bundesbank to immediately abandon the program.

In fact, modifying the Constitution so that it corresponds perfectly to the European treaties is a French specificity (or almost) , which in fact limits the room for maneuver of French justice and necessarily harms somewhat the legitimacy of justice (the source of law is further removed from the people).

So we could simply have our Constitution amended — probably by referendum — to include a whole battery of measures, including: the impossibility to apply for asylum (or to benefit from any regularization) if one entered the territory illegally; the introduction of the offense of complicity with smugglers and stowaways (or measures which would open the way to the introduction of this offense into French law); the penalization of clandestinity make the right to asylum an exceptional measure that only takes into account the dangers that weigh solely on the applicant in question; the introduction of economic and humanitarian immigration quotas to be determined by the Assembly ; deprivation of nationality for such and such a conviction, etc.

I would also use it for:limit the interpretations that judges can make; recall that the source of law remains the sovereign people (not the judges, whether French or not) through their representatives who adopt all the laws on which the judges' decisions are based; recall the pre-eminence of the Constitution over the treaties (that way, it's clear!); especially to abolish the right to family reunification (the refusal of the Council of State to suspend family reunification at the request of V. Giscard d'Estaing - judging that this was a constitutional principle - even though this notion does not was included in French law only by legislative means under the Giscard presidency is a legal aberration).

Obviously, if that were to happen, expect a real showdown between the European institutions (the treaties are optional when it does not suit them) and the French institutions.

— as is already the case between European justice and German justice, on the one hand, and European justice and Polish justice, on the other.

But hey, if we pass *ad referendum — as I recommend — they will have a hard time opposing it for a few decades (by the time the political climate changes).

*Indeed, in the name of the principle of national sovereignty and in full compliance with international law, following the accession and entry into force of a treaty, all parties have the right to withdraw from the said treaty. .

Similar questions

Could an armed conflict break out between Algeria and France?

Why do sub-Saharan Africans treat North Africans as if they are not Africans?

Why did Africans help sell other Africans into slavery?

What is the importance of colonization for Africans?

Why are some French people against the massive arrival of African immigrants in France?

Could a non-European country one day join the euro zone or the EU?

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location
On south coast of West Africa

Official title of the State
The Republic of Cote D'Ivoire (English)

Republique de la Cote D'Ivoire (French)

Ivory Coast or Côte D' Ivoire:

Flag description:

Three equal vertical bands of orange (hoist side), white, and green; orange symbolizes the land (savannah) of the north and fertility, white stands for peace and unity, green represents the forests of the south and the hope for a bright future. Note: similar to the flag of Ireland, which is longer and has the colors reversed - green (hoist side), white, and orange; also similar to the flag of Italy, which is green (hoist side), white, and red; design was based on the flag of France.

Neighbours

Liberia, Guinea on W, Mali, Burkinafaso on N, Ghana on E.

Land boundaries; total 3,110 km. Border countries; Burkinafaso 584 km, Ghana 668 km, Guinea 610 km, Liberia 716 km, Mali 532 km.

Founder of The Nation
Monsier Felix Houphouet-Boigny

Local divisions
19 regions and 81 departments

Government type
Republic - semi-presidential

Legislation chamber
Unicameral - National Assembly

Form of State
Republic

Current government operating under a power sharing agreement supervised by international mediators. President is the Chief of State Prime Minister is the Head of Government President is elected for a five year term by popular vote with no term limits. A multi-party transitional government with one legislative house. The National Assembly 225 seats, members are elected by direct popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch President Head of Government Cabinet : Separated by chief of State and head of government. President elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms, eligible for a second term. Head of Government to be appointed by the president with the legislature's approval.

Council of Ministers appointed by president, however, under the current power-sharing agreement, the Prime Minister has the power to appoint too.

Former rulers

1960 - 1993 Félix Houphouët-Boigny

1993 - 1999 Aimé Henri Konan Bedie

1999 - 2000 Army General Robert Guéï
2000 - 2011 Laurent Gbagbo 2011

2011 - - present Alassane Drammane Ouattara

Judicial chamber

Supreme Court; consists of four chambers, namely Judicial chamber for criminal cases, Audit chamber for financial cases, Constitutional chamber for judicial review, and Administrative chamber for civil cases.

Capital city

Yamoussoukro (politically) Altitude 31 mtrs /102 ft .

Geographic coordinates - 6.49N , 5.17W. A political capital of Cote D'Ivoire since 1983, located 240 km northeast of Abidjan, named after locals Queen Yamousso & the King Kouassi N'Gokro, founded in 1939.

Abidjan (economically) Altitude 215 mtrs.

Geographic coordinates - 5.25N ,4.2W. Remaines commercial and administrative centre, lies on the southeast coast of the country in the gulf of Guinea on the Ebrie Lagoon. Its name derived from Ivorian local dialect "Tchan m'bi djan", meaning for "I am quite a bit busy", it consisted of Grand-Bassam & Binger ville, which are now considered to form a suburb of the current Abidjan city that founded in 1931.

Names of main towns

Bouake, Daloa, Korhogo, Man, Duekoue

Date of independence

August 7,1960.

Religions (Major)

Traditional 50 %, Muslims 15%, Catholic christians 12%. Indigenous 11.9%, None 10.1 %. Note: the majority of foreigners (migratory workers) are Muslim (70%) and Christian (20%).

Main spoken languages

French (official), Bawle, Diowa, Bete are widely spoken. Over sixty native dialects spoken.

Currency unit

Guinean Franc =100 Centimes

Area in Km2
322,463.00

Country area comparison in Africa

28 out of 55 states

Demographic terms:

Average annual population growth rate 2.105 %

Birth rate 31.48 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 10.43 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 56.19 years

Male 55.27 years ; Female 57.13

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 35, Female: 55

Average per capita income

USD 1, 800

Population density

Urban population (%)

55

Contributor groups

Farming, fishing: 28, Industry: 17, Social service: 55

Main Export items

Cocoa, coffee, timber, petroleum products, textiles, cotton, bananas, pineapples, palm-oil, fish.

Economy is based on

Agriculture

Climate

Tropical

Extremes:

Lowest point; Gulf of Guinea 0 mtr
Highest point; Mt. Nimba 1,752 mtrs

Weather of the Capital city (Yamoussoukro) average temperature 26.3°c

Altitude: 31 mtrs /102 ft

Hottest Month: February-April 24-32oc

Coldest Month: August 22-28oc

Driest Month
January 41 mm average Rf.

Wettest Month
June 495 mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

GMT/UTC+0

Public holidays

January 1 (New year), May 1 (labour day), August 7, November 1, December 7, 25, All Roman Catholic holidays, All Muslim holiday

Ethnic groups

Baule 25%, Bete 20%, Senufo 15%, Malinke 11%, (over 60 tribes).

Topographic & Environmental concern

Forests cover the W. half of the Country and range from a coastal strip to half way to the N.E. A sparse inland plain leads to low mountains in NW. Côte d'Ivoire has the highest level of biodiversity in West Africa with over 1,200 animal species and 4,700 plant species. The country is, however, struggling with severe deforestation, with only 2 per cent of the country as of 2005 covered with forest. Côte d'Ivoire has also been in the news over a toxic waste dumping saga, which was connected to the deaths of some 15 people and the negative health effects of 100,000 others. Environment: deforestation (most of the country's forests - once the largest in West Africa - have been heavily logged); water pollution from sewage and industrial and agricultural effluents. A UN human rights expert has said there was evidence to suggest the waste belonging to Dutch commodity trading company Trafigura, caused deaths and illness.

Economy Overview

Industry
Foodstuffs, beverages, wood-products, oil refining, trucks & buses assembly, textiles, fertilizer, building materials, electricals, commercial ship repair.

Chief crops

Cocoa (40% world's production), coffee, bananas, palm kernels, corn, rice, manioc, sweet potatoes, sugarcane, cotton, rubber trees, timber.

Natural resources

Petroleum, Natural gas, Diamonds, Manganese, Iron ore, Cobalt, Bauxite, Copper, Gold, Nickel, Tantalum, Silica sand, Clay, Cocoa beans, Coffee, Palm oil, Hydropower

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 8

Grassland: 41

Forest woods: 20

Other: 31

Marine:

Coastline; 515 km.

Commercial Sea ports:-

Abidjan (main port), San-Pedro

Development prospect;-

Long-planned infrastructure projects have sparked back into life under the new government, including a highway between Abidjan and the administrative capital Yamoussoukro, and a third bridge over the Ebrié lagoon. The government awarded France's Bouygues the $325m contract for the bridge, which should ease Abidjan's growing congestion. French companies have retained the lion's share of the market despite jostling from the US and India.

All rounds effort to revitalise institutions, and the need to generate an over 60 percent Cocoa based government revenues planned. Both foreign and local investment will be hindered if security remains a problem in Abidjan. Meanwhile, outside of the commercial hub, the government's reach in areas administered by the rebellion is tenuous. The government has not yet dismantled parallel taxation and racketeering networks in the north.

At a time of declining appetite for risk, frontier-market watchers have also been sent a negative signal when the government defaulted on a $29m eurobond coupon in late January 2011. Despite tacit approval from the IMF, this second default on the twice-restructured eurobond may hinder future cash-raising efforts on international markets.

Mining is also set to receive a boost. Companies say that gold production capacity will hit 13tn, up from current annual production of 7tn. The mining ministry will also increase the number of mining permits. Oil companies are planning about a dozen new wells over the next two years. Côte d'Ivoire produces around 40,000 barrels per day, but has maritime borders that straddle the Jubilee oil field, thought to contain vast untapped reserves.

Mining supremo: Since coming to power in May 2011, President Alassane Dramane Ouattara has made it a personal point of honour to restore transparency in the extractive industries. He has directly involved himself in management of the sector at the expense of his mines minister, Adama Toungara, and, more generally, the functioning of the mining administration. Prospecting and operating companies have been most affected as they have seen their applications for permits and rights renewals frozen. This has resulted in a negative investment climate which is pushing some discouraged operators to leave the country, as did Canadian gold producer Newmont recently.

“ADO” has a plethora of advisers to take care of the dossiers “sent up” from the mines ministry and thus maintain his control over the sector. The key figure among them is Philippe Serey Eiffel, coordinator of the presidential advisory corps and head of the presidential economic service. He works closely with Daouda Thiam, the natural resources adviser at the presidency. These two, along with Amadou Gon Coulibaly, secretary general at the presidency, and ADO’s brother, Birahima Téné Ouattara, who is minister of presidential affairs, form a quartet on who everything in the Cote d’Ivoire mining sector depends. One result of the all-powerful position of the head of state is that the mines minister, who is above all an oil expert, and his staff serve simply to rubber stamp decisions taken over their heads. This has not, however, prevented Adam Toungara from using his family connections, notably his brother Mamadou Latif Toungara, to build up his own contacts networks.

Unlike Toungara, ADO has been very careful to ensure that none of his family serve as intermediaries for the mining companies. As a result, the Ouattara clan have positioned themselves as messengers of the companies at the mines ministry as a means of avoiding the wrath of the president. This is flattering to Toungara but the minister is nevertheless careful not to encroach on the president’s territory. He has been close to ADO for a long time and owes his appointment to him. The only exception to the rule is the president’s brother, Birahima Téné Ouattara, who, as presidential affairs minister, is a veritable second prime minister who has a say on all matters, including mining questions. Away from the presidential and ministerial power structures, the men at the helm of the private sector mining companies represent another power base, whose allegiance is partly to the former Laurent Gbagbo regime and partly to the new Ouattara regime. Finally, the war lords from the diamond-rich northern party of the country who support Guillaume Soro are still free of central administration interference. Source: ION.

KENYA

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview & Diary Refreshes

Kenya became a British protectorate in 1895 and a colony in 1920. White settlement was encouraged and by the 1940s European settlers had achieved considerable prosperity. African population growth resulted in increasing pressure for land. Jomo Kenyatta whos known for his quotation “When the Missionaries arrived, the Africans had the land and the Missionaries had the Bible. They taught how to pray with our eyes closed. When we opened them, they had the land and we had the Bible” formed the first national organisation in 1944.

On his return to Africa in 1952, he organized a number of independent measures for Africans which enraged the white settlers, But when the Mau Mau rebellion erupted in 1952, a state of emergency was declared, parties were banned and Kenyatta was tried and sent to prison. and the same year he was charged with being the head of the violent terrorist group known as the Mau Mau who were murdering many whites. He was sentenced to seven years hard labor but always professed his innocence.

Eventually he led Kenya to independence in 1963. African members were elected to the legislative council in 1957 and the state of emergency was lifted in 1960. Political parties were legalised and Africans formed a majority on the legislative council. Two parties emerged: the Kenya Africa National Union (KANU) and the Kenya African Democratic Union (KADU). KANU won a general election in 1961 but refused to form an administration until the release of Kenyatta. At independence in 1963, Kenyatta became Prime Minister. The following year KADU dissolved itself and Kenya became a republic with Kenyatta as its first President. A new opposition party was banned in 1969 and Kenya remained a de facto one-party state for the remainder of Kenyatta's rule. On his death in 1978 Daniel Toirotich Arap Moi becomes president and later turned Kenya into a de jure one-party state. In 1991, under pressure from Kenyan activists and the international community, this was reversed. With multi-partyism restored, several opposition parties emerged: FORD Kenya, FORD Asili, Democratic Party, Social Democratic Party, National Development Party of Kenya and other smaller parties. However, KANU retained control, winning contentious elections in 1992 and 1997 against a divided opposition and amidst allegations of election abuse. The Kenyan political environment remained turbulent throughout the 1990s.

Former name: British East Africa:

Kenya was formerly a British colony and gained it's independence on 12th December, 1963 with a constitution that provided for devolved governance in Kenya via a bicameral legislature and regional assemblies.

Kenya was a de-facto one party state, since the ruling Kenya African Nationalist Union (KANU) made itself the sole legal party in Kenya, during and after independence.

Headship since independence; Instrumental self-administration

In August, 1978 Jomo Kenyata commonly known as "Mzee", meaning for "elderman" dies in office. He ruled Kenya from 1964 until his sudden death at age of 82, under his leadership, Kenya developed into one of Africa's most stable and prosperous nations. At the same month, President Jomo Kenyatta (Mzee) was succeeded by his VP Mr. Daniel Toirotich Arap Moi, who tookover the presidency as constitutionally required successor. Daniel Toirotich Arap Moi makes Mwai Kibaki his vice president while he keeps the Finance portfolio.

In August, 1982, there were allegations of conspiracies to overthrow the government of president Daniel Toirotich Arap Moi, the attempted coup by the Kenyan Air Force, was put-down by forces loyal to the president, at least 120 people died and there was widespread looting in towns, 12 ringleaders were subsequently sentenced to death and some 900 others received jail sentences, and the entire Kenyan Air Force was disbanded and replaced by a new unit.

In 1988 Mwai Kibaki is dropped by President Daniel Arap Moi as VP and demoted to the Ministry of Health.

In 1991, political rival ex-VP Mwai Kibaki resigns from the ruling KANU and helps from the Democratic Party, running for president in the following year when newly multi-party election system introduced.

1992, Kenyan president Daniel Arap Moi made a political liberalization allowing the country's first-multi party elections in three decades, the balloting was marred by violence and fraud, political turmoil occured over the following years.

In December, 2002, Mwai Kibaki's Democratic Party forms a strategic alliance with other opposition parties to form the National Rainbow Coalition. NARC wins the elections with landslide victory, president Daniel Toirotich Arap Moi graciously accepted defeat showing great maturity and statesmanship, and got retired. This election has proved so far that the foundation of Kenyan democracy is rock-solid.

In 9th January, 2003 following the fair and peaceful multi-party elections, Mr. Mwai Kibaki is wheelchaired to Parliament (Bunghe) to be sworn in as 3rd Kenyan president.

In 2005, President Mwai Kibaki holds a Constitutional Referendum that the electorate rejects. And Kibaki dismisses his cabinet.

In December, 2007 national elections were held, the results of which are bitterly contested and widespread political violence breaks out. National Accord agreed and Grand Coalition is formed.

On the 27th of August, 2011 President Mwai Kibaki formally ushered in a modern, brand new constitution for Kenya at a colourful public cremony in Nairobi, his promulgation of the new basic law effectively ended the independence era "Lancaster house constitution", giving birth to what proudful Kenyans are dubbing the Second Republic. The veteran politician Mwai Kibaki is known for his abolishing school fees for poor children and in return a million extra children showed up at schools in Kenya.

Origins of name: Kenya is named after a mountain of the same name.

Kenya At A Glance

Situated on the equator on Africa's east coast, Kenya has been described as "the cradle of humanity".
In the Great Rift Valley palaeontologists have discovered some of the earliest evidence of man's ancestors.

In the present day, Kenya's ethnic diversity has produced a vibrant culture but is also a source of conflict.

After independence from Britain in 1963, politics was dominated by the charismatic Jomo Kenyatta. He was succeeded in 1978 by Daniel arap Moi, who remained in power for 24 years. The ruling Kenya African National Union, Kanu, was the only legal political party for much of the 1980s.

Violent unrest - and international pressure - led to the restoration of multi-party politics in the early 1990s. But it was to be another decade before opposition candidate Mwai Kibaki ended nearly 40 years of Kanu rule with his landslide victory in 2002's general election.

Despite President Kibaki's pledge to tackle corruption, some donors estimated that up to $1bn had been lost to graft between 2002 and 2005. Other pressing challenges include high unemployment, crime and poverty; most Kenyans live below the poverty level of $1 a day. Droughts frequently put millions of people at risk.

With its scenic beauty and abundant wildlife, Kenya is one of Africa's major safari destinations.

Kenya was shaken by inter-ethnic violence which followed disputed elections in 2007. Several prominent Kenyans stand accused of crimes against humanity for allegedly inciting the violence, and the authorities are increasingly sensitive to any attempts to stir up communal tension.

Kenya's military entered Somalia in October 2011 to curb the threat of the Islamist militant al-Shabab movement, which it accused of the kidnap and killing of tourists and aid workers. Kenyan troops are now largely integrated into the overal Amiscom African Union forces in Somalia. There have been some reprisal attacks in Kenya itself.

Kenya Weather: Kenya is a country about as large as France and situated in East Africa between 5°N and 5°S. It has a very diverse relief with a low coastal plain on the Indian Ocean shore, extensive inland plateaux regions between 915 m/3,000 ft and 1,500 m/5,000 ft and several mountain ranges and isolated peaks such as Mount Kirinyaga, which rises to 5,200 m/17,000 ft and has a permanent snow-cap.

Although Kenya lies athwart the equator, annual rainfall over most of the country is surprisingly low and rather variable from year to year. This is because the intertropical belt of cloud and rain passes rather quickly across Kenya in April and October and because the predominant seasonal winds, the north and south monsoons as they are called in East Africa, have a track parallel to the coast and have already passed over large areas of land before reaching Kenya. Because of the reduction of temperature with altitude, temperatures over much of Kenya are subtropical or temperate, similar to those in California, and summer in France or southern Britain rather than those elsewhere in equatorial Africa. Only the coastal lowlands experience the constant high temperatures and humidity associated with equatorial latitudes. Even here they are less oppressive than one might expect, because of the regular daytime sea breezes and longer hours of sunshine. It is not surprising that with such a favourable climate - sunny, only moderately wet, and not too hot - and a great variety of scenery, wild life, game parks, and good communications, Kenya has many attractions for the tourist. The variety of relief and the range of altitude in Kenya produce a considerable number of distinctive local climates and local weather too numerous to be detailed here. The country can be divided broadly into four climatic regions, each with certain features of equatorial climates. There is a double rainy season between March and May and between November and December, with two intervening dry seasons. There is a small difference of temperature from month to month through the year. Both these features can be seen in the three tables for Kenya included here. The four climatic regions are:

The Coastal Region: Including (with towns and cities in parentheses) part of Coast province (Mombasa, Lamu). The average annual rainfall is over 1,000 mm/40 in, except in the north where it is rather less. The wettest season is in April and May as the intertropical rain-belt moves north. The second rainy season in October and November, sometimes called the 'little rains' in Kenya, is less conspicuous. Some rain, often in the form of night or early morning showers, occurs in all months. Temperatures remain quite high around the year as does humidity; but the weather is less oppressive than might be thought because of the regular and strong onshore winds in the daytime and the greater number of sunshine hours which average seven to eight a day in all months. The weather, however, can feel sultry, particularly at night. The table for Mombasa is representative of this region.

The Northern Frontier Districts and the Lower Inland Plateaus: Including (with towns and cities in parentheses) Northeastern province (Garissa, Wajir) and the northern parts of Eastern (Marsabit) and Rift Valley provinces. Much of this region has a very low annual rainfall for an equatorial region. Rainfall is generally below 500 mm/20 in and in the far north is often below 250 mm/10 in. In the lower districts temperatures are high round the year, there is much sunshine, and the region is typical of hot desert areas like the adjoining southern parts of Somalia and Ethiopia. Humidity is low and, apart from occasional excessive heat, it is a healthy climate.

The Kenya Highlands: Most of this region lies between 1,220 m/4,000 ft and 2,150 m/7,000 ft and occupies the centre and west of the country on either side of the eastern Great Rift Valley, extending to the Ugandan border. It is the most densely populated part of the country and contains the most productive agricultural land. There is a double rainy season but rainfall is moderate and only exceeds 1,250 mm/50 in a year on the higher parts. Over most of the region the sunniest time of the year is from December to March. The cloudiest period is from June to September when there is much drizzle but little heavy rain. This period is often called 'winter' in the Kenya Highlands and the evenings may feel chilly compared with the sunnier months. The table for Nairobi is representative of much of the region. The table for Kisumu on the shores of Lake Victoria, which is virtually an inland sea, shows that there is rather more rainfall in each month here. This is a consequence of the greater humidity picked up by winds crossing the lake and a liability for thunderstorms to break out during the night.

The Higher Mountain Regions: These are the small regions above 2,500 m/8,000 ft and isolated higher mountains such as Mount Elgon (on the Ugandan border) and Mount Kirinyaga. Here temperatures fall low enough for frost to occur and at higher levels some precipitation may be snow. Mount Kirinyaga has permanent snowfields.

A Republic in East Africa on the Indian Ocean.

Deemed the "Cradle of Mankind" as some of the remnants of the earliest man have been found here. The Kikuyu people who lived around present day Mt. Kenya referred to it as Kirinyaga or Kerenyaga, meaning "mountain of whiteness" because of its snow capped peak. Kenya is famous for its abundance and variety of wildlife in the world. It's in central Kenya during the state of Britain emergency b/n 1952 and 1960, within the aim of getting-back ancestral farmlands seized by British colonial masters. Historians say, the Mau-Mau movement was directed against the European colonialism, when the British colonial government's brutal repression of the Kenyan independence struggle climaxed, spearheaded by what came to be known as the Mau-Mau movement. The Mau Mau fighters were being amassed in remote concentration camps in Kenya beyond the fact, that the Mau Mau uprising was considered and presented by western news agencies as being led by murderous tribalists.

As example in both Kenya and Algeria this time, there were large populations of white people, or settlers, originally from Britain and France, who did not intend to go back to Britain or France. The Kenyan population there had therefore resorted to violence to try and kick the white settlers out. Anyway many agree the movement helped Kenya achieve it's independence, while some others say, their actions have also been blamed for crimes against white-farmers and bloody clashes with British forces throughout the decade. The Mau-Mau movement consisted mainly of the ethnic-Kikuyu tribesmen. The rebellion came to an end in 1956, with the defeat of the movement, the death toll stood at more than 30,000. The Mau-Mau guerillas, civilians and troops with an additional 30,000 ethnic-Kikuyu rebels had been thrown into detention camps where many of them died there. The end of the Mau-Mau rebellion marked the beginning of the process of change that would bring Kenya onto independence.

Many Kenyans men and women aged in their 70s and 80s are the lead claimants in the reparations case against the British government. The veterans say they suffered barbaric treatment, including torture, as the British colonial forces suppressed the Mau-Mau rebellion. Some human rights groups has said 90,000 Kenyans were executed, tortured or maimed during the crackdown, and 160, 000 were detained in appalling conditions. They want the UK government to officially acknowledge responsibility for atrocities committed by local guards in detention camps administered by the British in pre-independence era. "European colonizers came with the Holy-Bible in their hands and while Africans were praying looking towards heaven, the colonizers were buisy surveying African land to own it eventually" quoted the late Jomo Kenyatta, a non-member of the Mau-Mau movement during the Kenyan liberation struggles.

Before independence, one of the two leading parties in the coutry, the Kenyan African Democratic Union (KADU), had fought for for the devolution of state power to the regions because KADU feares domination of the smaller ethnic-groups by the larger ones. Though the KADU's concerns were seen by the Kenya African National Union (KANU) which that formed the first post-independence administration, as largely driven by the interests of white settlers of British origin who wanted to further their anti-nationalist agenda. The Kenyan African Democratic Union (KADU) wrapped its devolution of state power struggle in African garbs, calling it "Majimbo", but the party's demands were tainted by an underlying racist desire to restrain the hand of the incoming government from the affairs of the "White Highlands", owned exclusively by white settlers. Neverthless, the Kenya African Democratic Union (KADU) and it's white backers got their way at the independence talks at "Lancaster House" in London in 1961, and Kenya gained independence in December, 1963 with a constitution that provided for devolved governance in Kenya via a bicameral legislature and regional assemblies. But within one year of Kenyan independence, the KADU itself was no more, and it's heavy weight members crossed to join the KANU, and thus effectively dissolved the party and it's Majimbo agenda. That gave Jomo Kenyatta a free hand to introduce sweeping constitutional changes in 1965 that among other things, abolished KADU's Majimbo plan and transfered much of the taxation and service delivery powers of the regional assemblies to the central government.

Jomo Kenyatta as it's head, began to argue strongly for change, then the two Kenyan parties namely, Kenyan African National Union (KANU) and Kenya African Democratic Union (KADU), formed a coalition government in 1962, which Mr. Jomo Kenyatta assumed as first prime minister of Kenya independent nation, a year later, in May 1963 legislative elections were made, which the KANU won it. In 12th December, 1963 independence officially declared and Mr. Jomo Kenyatta sworn into office as president of Kenya indepndent nation, and a republic have founded a year later. In 1964, Kenya became a one-party state following the voluntary dissolution of the rival opposition KADU party, some elite-oposition politicians who opposed Jomo Kenyatta, however found themselves arrested and held in custody for long periods often without trials among them were Jaramogi Oginga Odinga, Tom Mboya, Ronald Ngala and John Kariuki. "Mzee", meaning for "elderman" ruled Kenya from 1964 until his sudden death in August 1978, at age of 82, under his leadership, Kenya developed into one of Africa's most stable and prosperous nations. And Kenyatta was succeeded by his vice president Mr. Daniel Toirotich Arap Moi, who tookover the presidency in a constitutional way. Kenya was a de-facto one party state, snce the ruling Kenya African Nationalist Union (KANU) made itself the sole legal party in Kenya, since independence. There were allegations of conspiracies to overthrow the government of president D.T Arap Moi, the attempted coup by the Kenyan Air Force in August, 1982, was put-down by forces loyal to the president, at least 120 people died and there was widespread looting in towns, 12 ringleaders were subsequently sentenced to death and some 900 others received jail sentences, and the entire Kenyan Air Force was disbanded and replaced by a new unit. In 1992, the Kenyan president Daniel Arap Moi made a political liberalization allowing the country's first multi party elections in three decades, the balloting was marred by violence and fraud, political turmoil occured over the following years. In the multi-party elections of December, 2002, president Daniel Toirotich Arap Moi admitted defeat, stepped down following fair and peaceful elections then got retired.

A one time vice-President under President Daniel Arap Moi, who makes Mwai Kibaki his vice president, Kibaki also keeps the Finance portfolio, running as the candidate of the multi-ethnic, united opposition group, National Rainbow Coalition (NARC), defeated KANU sole candidate Mr. Uhuru Kenyatta and assumed presidency ending one party Kenya African Nationalist Union (KANU) entrenched rule. Having been elected the third president of Kenya, he is wheeled to Parliament (Bunghe) to be sworn in on the 9th of January, 2003. Mr. Muwai Kibaki's re-election in the Kenyan national elections of December, 2007, brought charges of vote rigging from the opposition Orange Democratic Movement (ODM) candidate Mr. Raila Odinga and unleashed two months of violence in which as many as 2000 people died.

The country is now under Government of National Unity (GNU) followed by a UN sponsored talks in late February produced a power-sharing accord bringing the opposition leader Mr. Raila Amollo Odinga into the government in the restored position of prime minister since 2008, to end months of violence after his supporters claimed he had been cheated of victory by allies of president Mwai Kibaki. The 28th of February, marked couple of years since Kenya signed a UN sponsored power-sharing deal that ended two terrifying months of post-election violence that Kenya saw over 2,000 people dead and 500, 000 families internally displaced.

The unwillingness of the ex-ruling-Kenya African National Union (KANU) to seriously the colonial fundamental issues that had been so effective against African interests meant that regional inequalities in development and resources mis-management continued to fuel the demand for devolution throughout Kenya's half-century of independence. Therefore it came as no surprise when in August, 2010 devolution became one of the most divisive issues in the run-up to the constitutional referendum on 4th August, 2010 where the vote were finally tallied 66% to 34% in favour of ratifying the new constitution. A referendum on constitutional reform is intended to limit the powers of the president and set up a commission to settle land disputes that fuelled past violences in Kenya, the vote on new constitutional reform was part of a deal that ended deadly clashes after a disputed election of December, 2007. The vote on new constitution also provides an opportunity to re-shape the country's political landscape, among the measures which will now go ahead are the introduction of a bill of rights, land reform and new curbs on the president's power, and for Kenya's security forces to show that they are capable of carrying out their professional duties in line with international standards and norms. Kenya has adopted a new constitution, more than three weeks after it was overwhelmingly approved in a national referendum, in a resounding " Yes" vote on the 4th of August, 2010. The new constitution will bring a more decentralised political system, which will limit the president's powers and replace corrupt provincial governments with local counties. It is also hoped that the changes will help bring an end to the tribal differences that have brought violence to the country in the past. On the 27th of August, President Mwai Kibaki formally ushered in a modern, brand new constitution for Kenya at a colourful public cremony in Nairobi, his promulgation of the new basic law effectively ended the independence era "Lancaster house constitution", giving birth to what proudful Kenyans are dubbing the Second Republic.

What, in fact, carried the day were the guarantees on devolution entrenched in Chapter 11 of the constitution, which provided for the following: That there shall be a country government for each of the country's 47 counties, to be headed by governor. That, the county governments shall have reliable sources of reliable revenues (15% from central government, and anymore they can raise themselves via taxes, fees and other activities), and an Equalisation Fund that would ensure that all 47 counties will be equitably resourced financially. Generally the devolution exercise is meant to achieve eight objectives, chief among which are: To give powers of self-governance to the people; to recognise the right of communities to manage their own affaires; and to enhance their participation in decisions affecting their lives. According to an expert, "it's a big leap in the democratisation process of the country. This constitution is a major transformation of this Republic". But the people of Kenya will have to wait untill the next national election between August to December, 2012 at least to enjoy their newly-given constitutional powers. The first Kenyan constitution was negotiated with the British colonists in London when Kenya acceeded to independence in the early 1960s. The Kenyan constitution amended as a republic about eleven times, it's to be recalled that the 2008 amendments established the coallition government and the position of premiership. Kenya has been the only peaceful country in the region continuously for decades, hence the relative growth of it's economy in the rest of the region.

The capital Nairobi has been hit by a spate of grenade attacks a week after Kenya sent air and ground troops to Somalia to pursue Al-Shabab militants following spate of cross-border kidnappings. The Al-Shabab had threatened reprisals if Kenyan troops did not leave Somalia. Several foreigners have been seized in Kenya by suspected Somali militants and reportedly taken into Somalia. The Al-Shabab denies carring out any kidnappings.

Thousands of mourners lined the route of the procession to the state funeral of Nobel Peace Prize winner Wangari Maathai in October, 2011. It took place at Uhuru National Park, Nairobi's largest open space that she fought to save from developers. The head of state during the procession praised her courage, tenacity, and "selfless service to the nation". "The best way we can honour her is to carry out on the great work she started especially in the fields of environmental conservation, social justice, human rights and democracy", President Mwai Kibaki told the crowds gathered at Freedom corner where the service took place, the site of the 60-storey office block she successfully campaigned against being built in the 1980s. Mrs. Wangari Maathai, who died in September after a battle with ovarian cancer, became the first African woman to win the Nobel Peace Prize in 2004 following her nationwide campaign to plant more trees and to promote women's rights and transparent government. Her countrymen admired her as "the Woman who did simple things in a great way". Her remains were to be placed in a Bamboo-frame coffin made of papyrus reeds and water hyacinth and draped with a Kenyan flag, because she opposed in live against cutting of trees. After the funeral, she was cremated at a private ceremony. Trees have been planted in her memory and some roads in Nairobi are also set to be named after her.

Two presidential candidates and others in Kenya are to stand trial over crimes against humanity following post-election violence in 2007, the International Criminal Court (ICC) has ruled’ Finance Minister Uhuru Kenyatta and former minister William Ruto will both face charges. They are among five prominent Kenyans - all of whom deny the accusations - who will stand trial. Kenya's president Mwai Kibaki has appealed for people to stay calm after the news."Our great nation has had its share of challenging times," President Mwai Kibaki said in a statement. Mr Uhuru Kenyatta - son of Kenya's founder President Jomo Kenyatta and a man who has been ranked as one of its richest citizens - is to stand trial with cabinet secretary Francis Mutaura. The pair, both allies of President Kibaki, are accused of crimes against humanity, including murder and persecution.

CGTN Africa: Jomo Kenyatta (Mzee),
Many institutions bear his name. He upgraded the economic status of the country after independence. But his reign faced dark shadows when three prominent politicians were assassinated. Up to date he is accused of acquiring massive pieces of land. He is Jomo Kenyatta, the first president of Kenya.

Uhuru Kenyatta

A former Deputy Prime Minister of Kenya, Uhuru Kenyatta stands accused by the International Criminal Court of Crimes against Humanity following Kenya's post-electoral violence in 2008. Uhuru Kenyatta, who recently resigned as Kenya's deputy primeminister of finance, was indicted on the 8th March, 2011 on five counts of crimes against humanity. As a supporter of the incumbent president Mwai Kibaki, Uhuru Kenyatta is alleged planned, financed, and coordinated the violence perpetrated against perceived opposition supporters during the post-election violence from 27 December, 2007 to 29 February, 2008. All the charges against Uhuru Kenyatta were confirmed by pre-trial chamber I on 23 January, 2012.

Henry Kosgey

He was indicted on 8 March, 2011 on four counts of crimes against humanity with regard to the situation in Kenya. On 23 January, 2012 the ICC pre-trial chamber decided not to confirm the charges against Kosgey, therefore ending the proceedings at the ICC.

Francis Muthaura

He was indicted on 8 March, 2011 on five counts of crimes against humanity. As the head of the public service, secretary to the cabinet, and Chairman of the National Security and Advisory Committee of president
Mwai Kibaki, he is alleged to have planned, financed, and coordinated the violent response against opposition supporters during the post-election violence of 2007. All the charges against him were confirmed by pre-trial chamber II on 23 January, 2012.

William Ruto

He was indicted on 8 March, 2011 on four counts of crimes against humnity. On 1st August, 2011 the charges were reduced to three counts. Ruto, a top leader in an ad-hoc Kalenjin organization, is accused of being criminally responsible for the murder, deportation, torture, and persecution of civilians in the towns of Kapsabet, Nandi Hills, Turbo, and the greater Eldoret areas of Kenya during the 2007 post-election violence.

Joshua Arap Sang

He was indicted on 8 March, 2011 on three counts of crimes against humanity. A broadcaster for the kass FM Radio-station in Kenya, Sang is accused of inciting Kalenjin youths to target civilians of Kikuyu, Kamba, and Kissi ethnic-groups, who were perceived to be supporters of the "Party of National Unity".

On the 27th of August, President Mwai Kibaki formally ushered in a modern, brand new constitution for Kenya at a colourful public cremony in Nairobi' In his promulgation of the new basic law which effectively ended the independence era "Lancaster House Constitution", giving birth to what proudful Kenyans are dubbing the Second Republic. Kenya's attempt at devolution of state power has a long history. The new Kenyan Constitution at the promulgation ceremony what it says about general elections has raised great debates. According to the new Kenyan Constitution, when the general elections come, Kenya will have it's first taste of gubernatorial polls. Up for grabs are 47 seats for would be county governors in the country's 47 counties. The counties are the newest administrative prefectures, created in the most radical reforms in the entire history of decentralisation in the country. The current 8 provinces including the capital Nairobi which stered by provincial commissioners appointed by the president, will effectively be phased out. As the new constitution of Kenya, 2012 is would be a transitional year. Kenya begins a transition from a centralised to a devolved government, starts the journey of empowering 47 county governments that will be charged with managing the affairs of the people at the grassroots level. The 47 governors will be elected directly by the people. They will be "mini presidents" with powers of control over county resources, finances and administrative functions. "Just as the president, who is a politician, runs a government through the cabinet and civil service, the governor of county also will run the county using using the county executive and the county civil service" said a constitutional expert. Already county governors' seats have attracted numerous political veterans greenhorns alike. Seasoned business managers, Civil service technocrats, and plethora of other opinion-shapers have expressed interest in the new gubernatorial seats.

Kenya's police say an explosion which injured 33 in the capital, Nairobi, may have been caused by a bomb, after initially blaming an electrical fault' The blast tore apart a shopping complex on Moi Avenue at lunchtime. A witness has said a bag was abandoned next to her just before the explosion. Prime Minister Raila Odinga has said the blast had a terrorist link. Militant group Al-Shaabab has repeatedly threatened to stage revenge attacks after Kenya sent troops to Somalia. There has been a string of grenade and bomb blasts across Kenya in recent months, killing several people. Five of those injured are said to be in a critical condition. Police spokesman Eric Kiraithe told the BBC he no longer believed an electrical fault had caused the blast, as police commissioner Mathew Iteere had initially suggested me 28 people are said to have been injured by the blast. In a statement, Mr Kiraithe said the cause of the explosion had not been established. "The investigating team is exploring the possibility that the blast was caused by criminals using an improvised explosive device," he said. "Initial examination of the scene indicates that the possibility of a conventional bomb is remote." Mr. Raila Odinga told reporters at the site of the blast: "This is terrorism... this is a heinous act, we are under threat, but we will not be cowed." Kenya Power, the country's sole electricity distributor, has also ruled out any electrical malfunction as the cause of the blast. The BBC's Kevin Mwachiro says glass and shoes and clothes from the small shops inside the building were scattered across the street. TV pictures have shown people pouring into the streets from nearby buildings to get away from the scene of the fire, the AP news agency reports. Moi Avenue is a major road which would have been busy during the lunch hour, AP says. According to an eyewitness, there was a huge blast and debris flew in different directions injuring people in the vicinity, the Nation newspaper reports.

Kenya Has Banned Its Citizens From Going To The Middle East For Domestic Work Due To Growing Concerns About Abuse' The east African nation became another country in a long list to ban their citizens from arranging domestic work in the Middle East. Maids working in countries like Saudi Arabia, usually coming from Africa, the Sub-Continent and South-East Asia, have continuously been the targets of abhorrent mistreatment: from sexual abuse to intense mental abuse and even murder. The horror stories that foreign domestic workers bring back from the Middle East have become notorious. One woman returned with 24 nails and needles in her body. Another woman came back with a broken wrist. Some walked out of the plane completely wrapped in bandages. A few even needed to be carried out on stretchers. Earlier this year, the Philippines said they would not lift the ban on their maids getting work in Jordan until the country addressed cases of abuse and purged the recruitment process of 'undesirables'. Lebanon has a name from itself too, a few months ago even the UN urged the country to look into a case where an Ethiopian maid, who later killed herself, was filmed being beaten in the street outside the Ethiopian consulate; it's also only a year since the Madagascan government chartered a plane to help 86 Madagascan maids escape Lebanon, some of whom had been working as 'Slave Maids' for as long as 15 years. These are not isolated incidents, they are becoming so numerous that they can now be seen as cold statistics for the systematic and unheeded racism and elitism that is rife across the Middle East. It seems that people from the areas are seen less as people and simply labour. Over the last few years the UAE, and Dubai especially, have come under increasing pressure to protect construction workers: men, usually from the Sub-Continent, who, like the maids, had been recruited in their home countries by promises of good salaries and good treatment, who had arrived in the country to immediately have their passports and documents taken from them, be paid an amount barely enough to sustain themselves, let alone families back home, and to live in cramped inhuman conditions, sleeping in construction huts with upwards of 15 other men. One of the latest construction plans in the oil-rich country was for a new Guggenheim gallery to be built, though this has been put on hold, rumours say because of the treatment of workers. This is hopefully a sign for the future. The international community is often scared to condemn actions in the Gulf countries for fear of hurting economic interests, though maybe people might start to see that its time to stop worrying about selfish interests and worry more about the human situations and costs that a lack of action can cause.

Socio-political Pieces in the East and Horn of African jigsaw in the Kenyan perspective'

OPINION: If all goes according to plan, East Africa will be uniquely positioned to supply the economies of the Gulf and South Asia with food and energy. The resources and the labour supply are assured, but the most critical piece is the politics. Can the relative success of the East African Community (EAC) in moving towards a single market and political cooperation survive a radical expansion? South Sudan will be the next member, and Ethiopia is not far behind. Given Ethiopia's position as the fastest-growing state in the region, with the biggest army, diplomats say a face-saving formula will be found to invite it to join the community this year. Somalia, whose civil war has drawn in armies from four East African states, also wants to join the EAC – partly because it doesn't trust the Ethiopian-dominated Inter-Governmental Authority for Development (IGAD). Almost every state in East Africa has announced that it has substantial oil and gas re- serves. To Uganda's more than 2bn barrels of reserves have been added oil finds in Ethiopia's south Omo region, oil in Kenya's Turkana basin and Tanzania's spectacular gas finds in Lindi and Mtwara. Sudan and South Sudan are established – if antagonistic – oil producers and exporters, and the more adventurous exploration companies report finding substantial deposits along Somalia's coastline. Key to the new East African project are the region's two biggest economies: Kenya and Ethiopia. The political differences between Nairobi's competitive party system and Addis Ababa's developmental authoritarianism are not insurmountable. Going back to the Cold War, pro-US Kenya cooperated with pro-Soviet Ethiopia. This time the imperative for political and economic cooperation is far stronger. After initial scepticism about Kenya's invasion of Somalia, Ethiopia now sees it as giving an important boost to the African Union (AU) force there. Kenya's troops, unlike Ethiopia's, are coming under the AU command. And Kenya's plan to take Kismayo port, the main supply point for the Al-Shabaab insurrectionists, will change the dynamics. To prevent a nationalist backlash, the AU forces will have to secure a new accord with the differing clans to keep out Al-Shabaab. After the bloody aftermath of its 2006 invasion, Ethiopia has been more willing to accept Kenya's idea of a negotiated security pact across Somalia's complex clan structure. Incremental successes in Somalia this year are encouraging both sides, while American and European security experts watch closely but sceptically. Policy makers in Nairobi and Addis Ababa say they accept they are in Somalia for the long haul – even if that message is difficult to sell to their people. Another difficult message is for Addis Ababa and Nairobi to persuade Uganda and Tanzania to stay in the party. Prospects of rapid development of oil production in Kenya may obviate Uganda's plans for a refinery supplying the region from its production centre in Bunyoro. President Yoweri Museveni, who wants to be an executive president of the EAC, has little enthusiasm for Kenya's Lamu project and did not attend the commissioning ceremony with other regional leaders in April. Tanzania, a member of the Southern African Development Community, is pulled in another direction. South African companies are playing a leading role in the development of its gas and mining industries. But the East African project needs full backing from Kampala and Dar es Salaam. In all of this, Kenya's role – as a central point between Ethiopia, Tanzania and Uganda – will be critical. But first it has to hold a credible national election and appoint a foreign-policy team to shape a strategy that can win support across the region.

A team led by Meave Leakey announced August 8, 2012, the discovery of a face and two jawbones belonging to Homo rudolfensis' Homo rudolfensis was a species of the genus Homo that is known only through a handful of representative fossils, the first of which was discovered by Bernard Ngeneo, a member of a team led by anthropologist Richard Leakey and zoologist Meave Leakey in 1972, at Koobi Fora on the east side of Lake Rudolf, now Lake Turkana in northern Kenya. The scientific name Pithecanthropus rudolfensis was proposed in 1978 by V. P. Alekseyev. It was later changed to Homo rudolfensis by Bernard Wood,for the specimen Skull 1470 (KNM ER 1470).

Kenya Not to Cancel Power Purchase Deal With Ethiopia'

Kenya has dismissed calls for the cancellation of a multi-million dollar power purchase agreement with Ethiopia in protest of a massive hydropower project that water scientists say will alter the lives of residents of Turkana region in Kenya. Prime Minister Raila Odinga said despite ongoing efforts to expand electricity generation through investments in green energy initiatives, the demand for electric power in the East African nation would continue to grow, which justifies the need to import power from neighboring Ethiopia to meet the shortfalls."We will lower the cost of energy through the importation of power from Ethiopia," Odinga said. Environmentalists say the 1.7 billion U.S. dollar hydropower project would alter the lives of half a million residents of Lake Turkana and other regions neighboring Southern Ethiopia. There are fears that the Omo River, which supplies water to the Gibe III Dam under construction, would affect water levels on Lake Victoria if its course is altered as proposed in the design of the power plant. Kenyan parliamentarian, Ekwe Ethuro, who represents Turkana, said his constituents were deeply concerned that the environmental impact of the project could far outweigh the benefits. "Any project that alters the flow and course of the Omo River will have effects," Ethuro said. Odinga said Nairobi was aware of the environmental impacts the Dam project would have on the residents of Turkana, but insisted the analysis by Kenyan scientists working on the project showed it would be temporary. "Omo River is the biggest river flowing into Lake Turkana. Our concern it (project) will undermine the flow of the river. Our scientists are working on it. It is true there will be a disruption but this is temporary. The bulk of the water will flow into the irrigation project," Odinga said, to much parliamentary opposition. Odinga said although there were possible environmental impacts, Kenya was in no position to stop Ethiopia from using the waters of Omo River as a resource. "We have engaged Ethiopia constructively. Ethiopia will sell electricity to us and we are financing this project because it will lower the cost of energy," Odinga asserted. The two governments formed a joint council to deal with matters arising as a result of the use of the Omo River waters, amid complaints from international non governmental organizations. Kenya aims to raise its annual electricity output to 15,000 megawatts while Ethiopia's target is to raise electric power production to 37,000 MW and become the region's biggest exporter of power. The two countries signed a power purchase agreement in 2011 and agreed on the terms of constructing a regional power inter- connector to link their grids and implement the regional trade in electricity.

The Mau Mau Massacre Documents Revealed'

The fullest account yet of a massacre which took place during the Mau Mau rebellion in Kenya in the 1950s, has been given in Foreign Office documents released by the National Archives. Eleven Kenyans were beaten to death by prison warders at the Hola detention camp. Dozens more were injured. There were no prosecutions after the Hola massacre. Survivor Wambugu Wa Nyingi is one of three Kenyans currently suing the UK government for alleged torture. The newly declassified documents reveal that in 1958 there were serious problems of discipline at the Hola detention camp near Garissa, eastern Kenya, where Mau Mau suspects were being held.

Poison theory: Detainees complained of being treated "like slaves" while carrying out enforced work on an irrigation scheme. Another grievance was over their diet, which they claimed was responsible for many diseases. On 3 March, 1959, 11 Kenyans died at Hola. Initial public statements suggested the men had been poisoned by contaminated water. But three days later, Kenya's governor, Evelyn Baring, wrote to the secretary of state for the colonies, Alan Lennox-Boyd, saying preliminary reports had been "misleading".The colonial secretary began to demand daily updates from Nairobi.

"I am sure you will understand my anxiety to have fullest possible information by morning of Tuesday March 10 at the latest. Please let me know what further publicity you propose and whether or not disciplinary proceedings or charges are likely to follow from these findings", wrote Mr Lennox-Boyd. On 9 March, Mr Baring sent this telegram to London: "The injuries are reported to be consistent with being caused by heavy sticks or batons and/or boots". In Parliament, the colonial secretary was to face awkward questions about whether the government had, in effect, had a plan authorising the unlawful use of violence against detainees in Kenya. Mr Lennox-Boyd wanted to establish how many British officers and African warders were alleged to have been implicated in the assaults on detainees at Hola. The governor replied that two European prison officers had been in charge. He said there were also 40 warders with batons, supervising the prisoners at work, and a special platoon of 51 warders as a riot squad, equipped with batons and shields.

'Flowery officialese' As an inquest got under way in Nairobi in March 1959, Mr Baring sent another cable to London about the proceedings: "Government Chemist told of examination water from cart and stomach contents. Both negative, no poisonous substances found". The hearing on 26 March saw the Hola camp commandant, Michael Sullivan, giving evidence. The telegram from Government House in Nairobi to the Secretary of State read: "Sullivan proved very bad witness. An unintelligent man with poor education. He would not directly answer questions but took refuge in rambling statements couched in flowery officialese. Magistrate not impressed". Summing up the magistrate's findings, Mr Baring told London: "Broadly, death was caused by shock and haemorrhage due to multiple bruising caused by violence". He went on: "Evidence as a whole so conflicting and unreliable that impossible to be certain of exact happenings on March 3 when things got out of control of one man"..... "Not a single witness of Hola Prison Staff, warders or detainees made any real attempt to tell truth".

In May 1959: The colonial secretary wrote again to Mr Baring: "Public opinion is extremely sensitive on Hola problem.... I am sure you will agree we should try to let this unhappy incident drop out of sight as soon as possible". Mr Wa Nyingi and his two fellow claimants won a legal case in the UK in October to make a claim against the British government. The government accepts that the colonial administration tortured detainees, but denies liability. By Peter Biles, BBC World Affairs Correspondent

Raila Odinga, president in waiting'

ION - January 20, 2013: After having come close to beating Mwai Kibaki in the December 2007 presidential election, Raila Odinga looks to be favourite to win the next one, the first round of which is set to take place in March 2013. Son of historic opposition leader Jaramogi Oginga Odinga, he joined the opposition to the Daniel arap Moi regime but later rallied to it. His early political career was marked by imprisonment and exile and he fell only just short of election to Kenya’s supreme office in the 2007 election. The result of the election was widely contested and resulted in several months of inter-communal violence. At the start of 2008, he was appointed prime minister at the head of a coalition government. He has taken up the mantle of his father and, with it, his political enmities: just like his father with the first Kenyan president, Jomo Kenyatta, Raila Odinga is engaged in a constant running battle with Deputy Prime Minister Uhuru Kenyatta. Although he followed in his father’s footsteps in going into politics and founding his own party, the Orange Democratic Movement (ODM) in 2005, he is a self-made man where business is concerned. He has set up a number of companies: East African Spectre operates a factory producing gas canisters; Spectre International, which took over a decrepit state-controlled company, runs an ethanol-producing plant and Pan African Petroleum imports oil. With such prosperous companies under their control, Odinga and his wife figure among Kenya’s wealthiest citizens. Today, these businesses have become a family affair, with several members of the Odinga clan involved in running them. Mwai Kibaki, a Kikuyu, having had two terms of office, Odinga considers that it is time for a Luo like himself to take over the presidency rather than the Kikuyu Kenyatta. But political alliances are volatile in Kenya and Odinga will not be certain of becoming the fourth president of Kenya until the very last minute, even with current vice president Kalonzo Musyoka as his running mate.

Kenya's DPM and presidential candidate Uhuru Kenyatta wins election by slim margin'

'NAIROBI (Reuters) - March 9, 2013: Uhuru Kenyatta, the son of Kenya's founding president, won the presidential election with a slim margin of 50.03 percent of votes cast, provisional figures showed, just enough to avoid a run-off after a race that has divided the nation. Kenyatta, who faces international charges of crimes against humanity, secured victory over his main rival, Prime Minister Raila Odinga, who trailed with 43.28 percent of the vote. To secure an outright win a candidate needed more than 50 percent of the votes. Kenyatta, the deputy prime minister, achieved that but with a margin of just 4,100 of the more than 12.3 million votes cast. The first-round win, which must be officially confirmed by the Independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission, means Kenyans who waited five days for the result of the vote will not now face a second round that would have prolonged uncertainty. The winner also needs to get at least 25 percent of the votes in 24 counties out of 47. This is expected be confirmed by the electoral commission. The commission is due to announce the official result on Saturday at 11 a.m. (0800 GMT).

But such a narrow win will almost certainly prompt legal challenges from Odinga's camp, which complained about the election process throughout. Odinga also lost in a disputed vote in 2007 that led to weeks of tribal killings. John Githongo, a former senior government official-turned-whistleblower, urged the rival coalitions, Odinga's CORD and Kenyatta's Jubilee, to ensure calm. "Jubilee and CORD, what you and your supporters say now determines continued peace and stability in Kenya. We are watching you!" he said on Twitter. International observers broadly said the vote and count had been transparent so far and the electoral commission, which replaced an old, discredited body, promised a credible vote. Provisional figures displayed by the election commission showed Kenyatta won 6,173,433 votes out of a total of 12,338,667 ballots cast. Odinga secured 5,340,546 votes. The result will pose a dilemma for Kenya's big Western donors because Kenyatta is due to go on trial in The Hague on charges of crimes against humanity, accused of orchestrating the tribal violence five years ago.

REBUILDING A REPUTATION:The United States and other Western states warned before the vote that diplomatic ties would be complicated with a win by Kenyatta who has been indicted by the International Criminal Court along with his running mate, William Ruto. Western nations have given a broad range of views on how to deal with Kenya under Kenyatta and to what extent they will be ready to deal with his government. "It won't be a headache as long as he cooperates with the ICC," said one Western diplomat. "We respect the decision of the majority of the Kenyan voters." Both Kenyatta and Ruto deny the charges and have said they would cooperate to clear their names. However, Kenyatta had to fend of jibes during the campaign by his rival Odinga that he would have to run government by Skype from The Hague while he attended hearings. Kenyans hope this vote, which has until now passed off with only pockets of unrest on voting day, would restore their nation's reputation as one of Africa's most stable democracies after mayhem last time. Cars drove through the streets honking their horns, and one taxi driver shouted "50+1, that's OK," referring to the 50 percent plus one vote threshold required by law to win the vote, as noisy pockets of people yelled on the rainy streets.

The test will be whether any challenges to the outcome are worked out in the courts, and do not spill into the streets. Odinga's camp had said even before the result that they were considering legal action, but said they would pursue it through the courts and the newly reformed judiciary. That is a change from 2007, when Odinga said he could not trust the judiciary at the time to treat the case fairly. Kenyatta's camp had also complained about delays in counting and other aspects of the process. But many Kenyans had said this race was more transparent than previous votes. Turnout reached 86 percent of the 14.3 million eligible voters, in a nation where tribal loyalties largely trump ideology at the ballot box. Uhuru Kenyatta, comes from the Kikuyu tribe, Kenya's biggest ethnic community, accounting for about a fifth of Kenya's 40 million people, and Odinga, 68, is a Luo. Their ethnic groups alone could not have secured victory, so both picked running mates from other tribes to beef up their support.

Kenya - Electoral Politics’

Updates: Kenya's Deputy Prime Minister Uhuru Kenyatta has been confirmed as the winner of the presidential election, and vowed to work with his rivals. He won 50.07% of the vote, officials said, narrowly avoiding a run-off. But his main challenger, Raila Odinga, alleged massive fraud and said he would challenge the results of the "tainted election" in the Supreme Court. Mr Kenyatta is set to face trial at the International Criminal Court over violence that followed the 2007 polls. He is accused of fuelling the communal violence that saw more than 1,000 people killed and 600,000 forced from their homes.
'System failures'

After the results were announced, Mr Kenyatta told cheering supporters he would serve all Kenyans "without fear or favour". Speaking at the Catholic University in Nairobi, he called on Mr Odinga and other leaders to "join us in moving our nation forward." Earlier, the Independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission (IEBC) said the latest elections had been complex, but also credible and transparent. It said the turnout, at 86%, was the largest ever. IEBC chairman Issack Hassan praised the candidates who had already conceded victory and urged others to follow suit. However, Mr Odinga, the current prime minister, said the electoral commission had "failed Kenyans" and that democracy itself was "on trial". But after announcing his Supreme Court challenge, he also appealed for calm, saying: "Any violence could destroy this nation forever." This was the tightest of races with the narrowest of margins. He says that how Mr. Odinga now handles his supporters will determine whether his dispute stays in the courts or spills out on the streets.

Court process: Mr Kenyatta's Jubilee Coalition party said it was "proud and honoured for the trust" bestowed on it, adding that it had taken a message to the people and that "we are grateful to the people of Kenya for accepting this message". Early on Saturday, small groups of Kenyatta supporters celebrated in Nairobi, hooting car horns and singing. But the newly confirmed president could face difficult relations with Western countries. In July, he is due to go on trial at the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague for alleged crimes against humanity. Mr Kenyatta's running mate, William Ruto, also faces similar charges. Both men deny the accusations. In his victory speech, Mr Kenyatta restated his promise to co-operate "with all nations and international institutions". The ICC has agreed to postpone Mr Ruto's trial by a month until May after his lawyers complained of not having enough time to prepare his defence.

Countries including the US and UK have hinted that Mr Kenyatta's election as president would have consequences for their relations with Kenya. The comments have been dismissed in Nairobi as foreign interference. A new electronic system for transmitting vote results was designed to eliminate the risk of fraud, and thus avoid a repeat of the post-poll violence of 2007. But the count has been plagued with technical glitches, including a programming error that led to the number of rejected votes being multiplied by a factor of eight. Mr Odinga's Cord alliance had earlier complained that votes from 11 constituencies were missing, in effect leaving him more than 250,000 votes short.

Votes cast: 12,330,028

Uhuru Kenyatta: 6,173,433 (50.07%)

Raila Odinga: 5,340,546 (43.31%)

Turnout: 86%

Kenya Election At The Scene:

Politics: Presidential elections in 2007 led to widespread unrest, denting the country's reputation for stability. A power-sharing government was eventually formed. A referendum on a new constitution in August 2010 produced a resounding "yes" vote

Economy: The economy has been recovering over recent years.

International: Kenya's military entered Somalia at the end of 2011 to fight al-Shabab Islamist militants, but has seen some violence spill back over its borders

Kibera slum is not normally considered friendly turf for Uhuru Kenyatta. Yet residents remained calm after the election of Kenya's richest man as their next leader. People are placing their faith in the new constitution and recent judicial reforms. Raila Odinga is challenging the results in the Supreme Court and people say they will wait for the legal process to run its course. Some point to the reforms as a reason for the relative calm compared with five years ago, when Kibera was a flashpoint. "Our behaviour is being shaped by the new constitution," said Steve, a Kibera resident. But there are worries about the future. Many hope Mr Kenyatta will uphold the new constitution and continue to co-operate with the International Criminal Court, where he is fighting charges of crimes against humanity. While the mantra across Kenya is "amani" (peace), some campaigners are warning against a "peace coma" - a failure to address past injustices which would prevent Kenya from moving on.

Uhuru Kenyatta

Aged 51

Son of founding President Mzee Jomo Kenyatta

Heir to one of the largest fortunes in Kenya, according to Forbes magazine

Entered politics in 1990s, groomed by former President Daniel Arap Moi to be his successor

Known as "njamba" ("hero") in his Kikuyu language

Indicted by ICC on charges of crimes against humanity for 2007 post-election violence - which he denies Married father of three.

March 16, 2013: Raila Odinga files Kenya election appeal '

Kenyan Prime Minister Raila Odinga has filed a Supreme Court appeal against Uhuru Kenyatta's narrow victory in the presidential election's first round. Mr Kenyatta beat Mr Odinga comfortably by 50.07% to 43.28% on 4 March, avoiding a run-off by only 8,100 votes. But Mr Odinga has accused the electoral authorities of manipulating the result. Police fired tear gas to disperse about 100 supporters of his Coalition for Reforms and Democracy (Cord) who had gathered outside the Supreme Court. The police had warned them that they would not be allowed to do so. Some of the crowd were wearing t-shirts bearing slogans including "I support the petition" and "Democracy on trial".The presidential, legislative and municipal elections held 12 days ago were the first since the 2007 poll which set off ethnic and political violence in which more than 1,200 people were killed. Mr Kenyatta and his running mate, William Ruto, are facing trial on charges of crimes against humanity at the International Criminal Court (ICC) for allegedly fuelling the unrest. They deny the charges.

'Strong case' Lawyers for Mr Odinga said their petition to the Supreme Court included allegations of vote manipulation, as well as problems with the registration of voters and an electronic vote counting mechanism. "I have no hesitation whatsoever in lawfully challenging the election outcome," Mr Odinga told reporters outside his offices in Nairobi. "These failures dwarf anything Kenyans have ever witnessed in any previous election," he added. However, the prime minister urged his supporters not to resort to violence. "We cannot begin what is supposed to be a new era under a new constitution in the same old ways," he added, referring to the charter adopted in 2010. The Minister of Lands, James Orengo, a senior Cord official, said the party had a constitutional right to file the petition and a "strong case". "Expect a new election, and this time around no monkey-business. I think we're going to win and win in the first round," he told KTN TV" I can assure you that we have the evidence, and we have the will and the preparedness to prosecute the petition," he added.

Mr Orengo nevertheless promised that Cord would respect the Supreme Court's ruling if it went against the party, and urged Mr Kenyatta and his supporters to declare that they would do likewise. In his acceptance speech last Saturday, Mr Kenyatta described the election as "free and fair" and a "triumph of democracy". The Independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission (IEBC) has also insisted that the vote was credible and that it is ready for any legal scrutiny. International observers said the election was largely free, fair and credible, and that the electoral commission had conducted its business in an open and transparent manner. Mr Odinga was the runner-up to Mwai Kibaki in the 2007 presidential election, which he also said was stolen.

March 29, 2013: The Impact Of Kenya's Polls On The Region'

The Star Opinion: Kenya hosts the third largest UN complex outside the US and Europe. For decades now, Kenya has been the landing pad for many operations – military, humanitarian and rescue missions – in the Horn of Africa and the larger Great Lakes Region, South Sudan, Ethiopia and to some extent Uganda during the civil war in the early 1970s. The Port of Mombasa has been the lifeline of many countries in East Africa and the Great Lakes Region. Beneficiaries of this gateway to the Indian Ocean have included Uganda, Burundi, Rwanda, the DRC, Northern Tanzania and at one time served Zambia before theTazara Railway line was built to connect Zambia to the port of Dar es Salaam. The unique position that Kenya commands in East Africa is the reason why the elections early this month became the business of every organisation and government with interest in the development of the region. The international community has invested heavily in the country and continues to do so in the hope that all will be well. If Kenya falls apart, many things can go wrong. Many organisations, governments, humanitarian agencies, individuals and the thousands of refugees will suffer irreparable damage.

We have a new constitution which will be three years old this August. The recent elections were the first to be held under the new dispensation. Kenyans had very high hopes that it would go well and catapult the country to new levels of economic development. The Kenyan voters thoroughly scrutinised the campaign manifestos of the main political parties which focused on infrastructure, regional trade, regional integration and freedom of movement of people, goods and services and peace within the EAC. President Kibaki is in office on borrowed time. He will vacate the office as soon as a new President is confirmed by the Supreme Court of Kenya. If the Supreme Court nullifies the results, Kenyans will go back to the polls in 60 days with another possible rerun if none of the candidates garners more than 50 per cent of the votes cast. If this happens, Kenya may not get a new President for the next four or five months, if one factors in three weeks following completion of elections before a new President is sworn in.

Mwai Kibaki's departure will have a direct impact on the region's economic development. Together with President Museveni, they have toyed with the idea of having a more efficient railway line running from Mombasa through Malaba and Busia to Kampala and a possible extension to Kigali and Bujumbura in the foreseeable future. It remains to be seen whether the new regime will pursue such ventures with vigor and whether the new President will find chemistry with Museveni. Five months before Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia passed away, the three leaders of the region – Zenawi, Salva Kiir of South Sudan and Kibaki performed a groundbreaking ceremony in Lamu to launch a multibillion dollar infrastructure project that would connect South Sudan, Kenya and Ethiopia and facilitate the export of South Sudan oil through the new Lamu Port. The road, rail and oil pipeline will open up trade and human traffic between the peoples of Eastern Africa. The pace and completion of this massive project will very much depend on the new Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn and whether he, Salva Kiir and the new Kenyan President will appreciate the need for this project. Or will the ongoing talks between Salva Kiir and Omar El Bashir stall the project should South Sudan choose to deal with the old foe?

As Kenya puts its political house in order, it may be necessary for other member states of the East African Community to play their part and move some common projects forward. One such project is the Lake Victoria Basin Commission launched in 2006 with its headquarters in Kisumu. This is the greatest natural asset that belongs to all the member states of the East African Community. The lake needs to be restored to its former glory by carrying out massive environmental clean up, removal of the hyacinth that has become a menace choking fish and denying the region's fishing community their time honoured livelihood. The lake has an idle dry dock at the Port of Kisumu which used to be the conveyor belt for goods and passengers ferried from Mombasa and Dar es Salaam to Northern Tanzania's Mwanza and Musoma and Uganda's Entebbe and Jinja during the days of the East African Railways and Harbours under the then East African Common Services. With stable governments in the Great Lakes region, water transport around the lake should be revived to reactivate trade among the states sharing the waters of Lake Victoria. Investments in tourism ventures including luxury yatches should freely ply the ports in Kisumu, Entebbe, Mwanza and Jinja. If transport across the lake is revived, pressure on our roads will be greatly reduced as bulk commercial products including oil can be transported across the lake to Northern Tanzania, Uganda, Burundi, Rwanda and DRC. As Kenya awaits the outcome of the Supreme Court verdict this weekend, the rest of Africa must wish Kenya well during these trying moments. Jerry Okungu is a Media Consultant

March 30, 2013: Kenya Supreme Court Rejects Raila Odinga's Election Petition'

The Supreme Court of Kenya has this evening rejected the election petition by Hon. Raila Odinga. The election petition filed by the Cord presidential candidate and Kenya's Prime Minister challenged the declaration of Jubilee's Uhuru Kenyatta as winner of the March 4 presidential election. The issues included in the petition were whether Uhuru Kenyatta and William Ruto were validly elected and declared President-elect and Deputy President-elect respectively. The petition also sought determination on whether the presidential election was conducted in a free, fair, transparent and credible manner and whether the rejected votes ought to have been included in determining the final tallies of votes. The Supreme Court, a six-judge panel, has ruled that Kenyatta and Ruto were validly elected and declared President and Deputy-President respectively and that the election was free and fair. "The decision was unanimous," Chief Justice Willy Mutunga said while reading the ruling. The panel, however, ruled that the rejected votes should not have been included in the final tally of votes. Raila joins a long line of election petitions denied in Kenya's history.

KENYA - More from the BBC:

Kenya's Supreme Court has upheld Uhuru Kenyatta's presidential election victory, rejecting several petitions challenging the vote.

Chief Justice Willy Mutunga announced the decision, which was unanimous, saying the poll was free and fair.

Main challenger PM Raila Odinga, who lodged the appeal, said he would fully respect the verdict. Official results said Mr Kenyatta beat Mr Odinga by 50.07% to 43.28%, avoiding a run-off by just 8,100 votes.

There was tight security at the Supreme Court as the judgement was read out. Violence after a disputed election in 2007 left more than 1,200 people dead.

The presidential, legislative and municipal elections held on 4th March were the first since the 2007 poll. Mr Kenyatta and his running mate, William Ruto, are expected to be sworn in as president and vice-president on 9th April. But they are facing trial on charges of crimes against humanity at the International Criminal Court (ICC) for allegedly fuelling unrest after that election. They deny the charges. Plea for calm.

Chief Justice Mutunga said the court's decisions had been unanimous on all the issues they were asked to rule on.

He said that Mr Kenyatta and Mr Ruto had been "validly elected" in a poll carried out in a "free, fair, transparent and credible" manner.

"It is the decision of the court that the said elections were indeed conducted in compliance with the constitution and the law," he said.

"At this historical moment in our country, the Supreme Court has discharged its constitutional duty in conformity with the solemn oath each one of us took," he added.

"It is now for the Kenyan people, their leaders, civil society, the private sector and the media to discharge theirs, to ensure that the unity, peace, sovereignty and prosperity of the nation is preserved. God bless Kenya."

Supporters of Mr Kenyatta took to the streets of central Nairobi, tooting their horns, blowing on vuvuzelas and chanting.

Outside the courthouse, police used tear gas to chase away people protesting against the ruling but the area is now quiet.

There were also reports of tear gas being fired at stone-throwing youths in the western city of Kisumu, a stronghold of Mr Raila Odinga.

And there was an angry mood in the Nairobi slum of Kibera, our correspondent says, with people chanting "no Raila no peace".

Outgoing President Mwai Kibaki has urged people to stay calm and accept the result, but much will depend on Kenyans' faith in their newly reformed judiciary, our correspondent says. Petitions had been filed to the court by Mr Odinga and by civil society groups, who claimed irregularities had affected the election result and called for fresh elections.

Mr Odinga expressed "dismay" at the conduct of the election and said that he did not regret making the challenge. But he said that he fully respected the decision and wished Mr Kenyatta and his team well.

"Although we may not agree with some of [the court's] findings, our belief in constitutionalism remains supreme," he said at a news conference after the verdict.

"We must soldier on in our resolve to reform our politics and our institutions."

'Triumph of democracy'

UK Prime Minister David Cameron congratulated Mr Kenyatta on his election victory.

"The prime minister urged the Kenyan people to be proud of the strong signal they have sent to the world about their determination to exercise their democratic right peacefully," Mr Cameron's office said in a statement.

A European Union statement said: "Kenyans can be proud that the political reform process of their country is bearing fruit.

"With continued efforts to implement the new constitution, Kenyans can build the globally competitive and prosperous nation they aspire to be." Mr Kenyatta has called the election, which was largely conducted peacefully, a "triumph of democracy".

The Independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission (IEBC) has insisted that the vote was credible, despite technical failures with an electronic voter ID system and the vote counting mechanism.

International observers said the poll was largely free, fair and credible, and that the electoral commission had conducted its business in an open and transparent manner.

Note: Go to read Kenya – Timeline Diaries below

April 2, 2013: Kenyan Body to Monitor Lamu Port-South Sudan-Ethiopia Project'

Addis Ababa — The Kenyan government has setup an independent body to monitor the implementation of a massive regional infrastructure development project known as the Lamu Port - Southern Sudan - Ethiopia Transport Corridor (LAPSSET). The 11-member body which comprises five high ranking government officials and other private sector representatives was established by outgoing Kenyan president, Mwai Kibaki The monitoring body will be tasked to control and follow developments of constructions to the different components of the $24bn three-nation-run project on behalf of the Kenyan government. "The headquarters of the authority shall be in Nairobi with field offices in Lamu, Isiolo, Lokichoggio, Marsabit and Moyale," Kibaki told Kenyan media outlets.

Construction of the Lamu Port-South Sudan-Ethiopia Transport Corridor will eventually link Kenya, South Sudan and Ethiopia by an advanced transport network, which it is hoped will boost cross-border trade. It will also create multiple business opportunities in the sectors of tourism and agriculture. It will further enhance social ties and friendship between peoples of the three East African neighbors. The Lamu project will further enable to connect the three countries to other central and western costs of Africa providing services to an estimated population of 160 million. Ethiopia, Kenya and South Sudan will share the cost of Africa's biggest infrastructure project which is expected to be accomplished in 2016. The African Development Bank (AfDB) will finance part of the project, particularly road section of the Lamu port project. The bank has already funded $12mn for the design work of the road component.

NEGATIVE IMPACTS:

Although the project will bring socio-economic benefits, some rights groups and environmentalist however argue that the project has potential negative impacts particularly against tens of thousands of Indigenous communities living along the LAPSSET transport corridor. Gezai Zeru, a Geologist and environmentalist told Sudan Tribune that the massive project will primarily force the indigenous peoples to lose their ancestral land and territories. "They will also lose resources and the lacks of natural resources will eventually lead to tribal conflicts which could have a potential of spilling cross borders" he said. The indigenous peoples of Awer, Sanye, Wardei, Orma, Samburi, Borana and Turkana pastoralists could in the long term be forced to change their traditional livelihood practices. "As a result of forced eviction their cultures and traditions could also fade" Gezai added. Source: Sudan Tribune

April 4, 2013: Kenya Declares Public Holiday to Allow for Swearing in of the New President'

The government has disclosed that Tuesday next week will be a public holiday to pave way for the swearing-in ceremony of President-elect Uhuru Kenyatta and his deputy William Ruto. Head of Public Service and chairman of the Committee to the Assumption to the Office of President, Francis Kimemia on Thursday gazzeted April 9 as a public holiday. “In pursuant to section 12 of the Assumption of the Office of the President ACT, 2012, Tuesday 9, April, 2013, the day the President-elect shall be sworn in at Moi International Sports Centre, Kasarani from 10 am to 2 pm shall be a public holiday,” said Kimemia in a gazette notice. The outgoing head of state, President Kibaki will share this last official public holiday function with his successor. The day is expected to witness the tripartite presence of Kenya’s second President, retired Mzee Daniel Moi who took over from Uhuru’s father Mzee Jomo Kenyatta in 1978, as well as the outgoing and incoming Presidents. Kimemia said the move will give Kenyans time to also observe the handover. According to the programme, Uhuru must arrive at the stadium before the incumbent President. There will be some entertainment in between the arrivals. According to the law guiding the change of guard, Uhuru will, during the swearing in ceremony, take and subscribe to oath or affirmation of allegiance and the oath or affirmation for the execution of the functions of the President. The oaths will be administered by the Chief Registrar of the Judiciary Mrs Gladys Boss Shollei and witnessed by Chief Justice Dr Willy Mutunga. The Assumption of the Office of President Act states that in the absence of the Chief Justice, the Deputy Chief Justice would undertake the task. However, deputy CJ-designate Justice Kalpana Rawal is yet to be cleared by Parliament, and can’t take part in the event. Source: Standard Digital

April 9, 2013: Uhuru Kenyatta sworn in as Kenyan 4th president'

BBC News: Uhuru Kenyatta has been sworn in as Kenya's new president, following his victory in March against Raila Odinga. Dignitaries and tens of thousands of people witnessed the inauguration at a stadium in the capital, Nairobi. Mr Odinga did not attend the ceremony after his attempt to overturn Mr Kenyatta's victory in court failed. Mr Kenyatta and his deputy, William Ruto, face charges at the International Criminal Court relating to post-election violence five years ago. They were on opposite sides at the time and both deny the accusations. Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir, who faces an ICC arrest warrant over the conflict in Darfur, was not in Nairobi for the inauguration. Mr Kenyatta is the son of Kenya's founding father, Jomo Kenyatta, and is heir to one of the largest fortunes in Kenya.

Laptops promise: He served as deputy prime minister, minister for trade, and finance minister under outgoing President Mwai Kibaki. The crowd, waving inaugural address, Mr Kenyatta said he would govern for all Kenyans. "We will leave no community behind... Where there's disillusionment, we'll restore hope," he said. The new government would abolish maternity fees in its first 100 days and children starting school next year would be given laptops, he added. In an apparent reference to the ICC case against him, he said: "I assure you again that under my leadership, Kenya will strive to uphold our international obligations, so long as these are founded on the well-established principles of mutual respect and reciprocity." The crowd, waving Kenyan flags, burst into rapturous welcome as the 51 year old took the oath of office, becoming Kenya's youngest president. In his inaugural address, Mr Kenyatta said he would govern for all Kenyans. "We will leave no community behind... Where there's disillusionment, we'll restore hope," he said. The new government would abolish maternity fees in its first 100 days and children starting school next year would be given laptops, he added. In an apparent reference to the ICC case against him, he said: "I assure you again that under my leadership, Kenya will strive to uphold our international obligations, so long as these are founded on the well-established principles of mutual respect and reciprocity." US and European diplomats attended the inauguration, despite warning before the election that they would have limited contact with Mr Kenyatta if he is voted into office.

Kenyan flags, burst into rapturous welcome as the 51 year old took the oath of office, becoming Kenya's youngest president.In his

Blackmail: Among the African leaders present for the inauguration were South Africa's Jacob Zuma, Nigeria's Goodluck Jonathan and Uganda's Yoweri Museveni. Mr Museveni told the cheering crowd that he wanted to applaud Kenyans for rejecting the "blackmail" of the ICC. He supported the ICC when it was formed, but it was now being used by "arrogant actors" who were trying to "install leaders of their choice in Africa and eliminate those they don't like", he said. Mr Odinga - the outgoing prime minister - did not attend the ceremony, choosing to be on holiday in South Africa instead. Other senior members of his Coalition for Reforms and Democracy (Cord) party have also stayed away to signal their opposition to Mr Kenyatta's presidency, correspondents say.

According to official results, Mr Kenyatta beat Mr Odinga by 50.07% to 43.28% in March, avoiding a run-off by just 8,100 votes. Mr Odinga challenged the result, but said he would respect the Kenyan Supreme Court's ruling in Mr Kenyatta's favour. The election was Kenya's first after a disputed poll in 2007, which led to violence that left more than 1,200 people dead. Mr Kenyatta is due to appear at the ICC for his trial in The Hague later this year, accused of crimes against humanity. He denies the charges. Kenya is a party to the Rome Statute, the treaty which established the ICC in 2002. But like most African countries, it has refused to enforce the ICC warrant for Mr Bashir's arrest. Earlier, Kenyan government spokesman Muthui Kariuki told the BBC that Mr Bashir had been invited and would not be arrested if he accepted the invitation. After Mr Bashir visited Kenya in 2010, a Kenyan court ruled that the government must arrest him if he returned, in line with its international obligations under the Rome Statute. The government is appealing against the ruling.

April 10, 2013: President Designate Pledges Free Laptops for School Children During Swearing in Ceremony' News updates: President designate Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta, son of Jomo Kenyatta,Kenya's founding president and International Criminal Court suspect, is now officially the fourth president of Kenya. Kenyatta was sworn in at a ceremony held at the Moi International Sports Center, Kasarani, in Nairobi, on Tuesday afternoon, closing the chapter on the tense and vigorous electoral process that left the country more divided than ever before in spite of the absence of violence. Amid the pomp and ceremony, Kenyatta promised to work closely with all Kenyans, including those who did not vote for him to take Kenya forward socially, politically and economically. "Our nation has now successfully navigated the most complex general election in our history. Our journey began three years ago, with the promulgation of a new constitution, and ended 11 days ago, with a landmark Supreme Court decision. Ours has been an unusual story. An unconventional path. We have been praised and criticised in turn – depending on who was telling our story," Kenyatta said.

Tempered Hope: "Yet while some watched the unfolding national events with skepticism, resigned to what they believed was the inevitability of chaos, others, the vast majority, looked upon our nation with a tempered hope; cheering us on not only because they believed in us but because they knew that if Kenya succeeded they too would succeed. For all that has been said of our nation, the records of history will attest to a number of undeniable facts." he added. He thanked Kenyans for exercising restraint and good judgement in times of tumultuous moments in government. "Where the system failed, Kenyans did not. Where decisions were delayed and ambiguity prevailed, Kenyans were patient-seeking and waiting for clarity. Where contentious issues rose up to stir up dissent, Kenyans exercised restraint, peacefully sought redress and submitted themselves again to the constitution and the rule of law- united in the belief that God's judgement would guide that of men," he said. He has promised free maternity health care to all women within 100 days of taking office and free lap tops to school-going children, beginning next year. Kenyatta becomes the first Kenyan president under the devolved system of government that was introduced by the new constitution to trim the powers of the president. He was born in 1961, just two years before Kenya attained independence under his father, Jomo Kenyatta as President, and his competitor, Raila Odinga's father, as vice-president.

Propped up by a Former President: He was named Uhuru, Kiswahili for independence, in anticipation of the freedom the country was to receive after years of colonisation from the British government. A graduate of political science from Amherst College in the US, Kenyatta first ventured into politics as a presidential candidate in 2002, when former Kenyan dictator, Daniel Arap Moi, propped him up as his preferred successor. However, Mwai Kibaki the outgoing president won the election. In the 2007 election, Kenyatta teamed up with Kibaki against outgoing prime minister Raila Odinga. The election ended in a stalemate and Kibaki was sworn in at night, leading to outrage and massive violence, during which more than 1,000 people were killed and about 350,000 displaced. A coalition government was formed with Kibaki as president, sharing power with Odinga, who became the prime minister bringing the unrest to an end. Kenyatta was appointed Odinga's deputy and minister for trade, and later finance minister. He was named alongside his deputy, William Ruto, journalist Joshua Sang, former head of public service, Francis Muthaura, former police ccommissioner, Hussein Ali and former industrialisation minister, Henry Kosgey, as the key perpetrators of the infamous 2008 post-election violence. Henry Kosgey and Hussein Ali have since been exonerated by the ICC while accusations against Muthaura were dropped for lack of enough evidence, after key witnesses said to have recanted their statements.

Divided: Opinions on the suitability of Kenyatta's presidency are divided. Although his supporters maintain that the charges against him are framed by his enemies and that he won fair and square, some feel that he should have not sought any elective post until cleared by the ICC, and that the election was illegitimate. "It has tainted the image of our country to have an international suspect reign over a developing country like Kenya. It will negatively impact on our country. He should have waited until set free by the courts," said Carolyne Anywera, a student at the University of Nairobi. Businessman Jim Ambuka said: "To me, he is a president of his supporters, not majority of Kenyans. I am not convinced by the supreme court's verdict. I see an individual who wants to use power to protect himself against ICC rather than to lead the nation to prosperity." His supporters think otherwise. "Uhuru Kenyatta is our hero. He means good for the country. We know very well the international community wanted to serve their own interest in the country," said Paul Kamau, a hawker in Nairobi. "Uhuru Kenyatta means well for Kenya, and that is manifested in his speech today and before. He has always said he will remain cooperative to the ICC. I therefore see no fuss about the future of Kenya," added Eric Ngugi. Now that Uhuru holds the mantle of leadership, all will be watching how he will juggle between ICC case and service to his country. Will he pull a trick on the ICC similar to that of Sudan's President Omar al-Bashir? Source: The Guardian

April 24, 2013: Kenya, Ethiopia to help rebuild Somalia'

NAIROBI, Kenya – Kenya and Ethiopia have reaffirmed their commitment to continue working together with Somalia to help its government towards reconstruction. Speaking after holding bilateral talks with the Ethiopian Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn in Nairobi, President Uhuru Kenyatta said that conflict in Somalia had affected its neighbours. The Head of State said: “On IGAD and regional peace and development, we focused on our efforts to contribute to sustainable peace, reconstruction and development in Somalia.” “Kenya and Ethiopia remains strategic partners especially within the IGAD framework in the search for peace and political stability of Somalia. Kenya and Ethiopia continue to bear a disproportionate burden occasioned by the long standing crisis which afflicted that neighbourly state more than 20 years ago,” the president added, saying that they also touched on efforts towards the positive developments on the negotiations between Sudan and South Sudan. The president reaffirmed his government’s commitment to enhancing the relations with Ethiopia while opening opportunities that benefit people in the two countries.The Head of State said the bilateral relations between the two countries were not only hinged on a long tradition of friendship but also on a Special Status Agreement. Within the framework of co-operation for mutual benefit, the two Heads of State also conferred on the modalities of actualising the Lamu Port-Southern Sudan-Ethiopia Transport Corridor (LAPSSET) project as part of the common destiny, as neighbours and a region. President Kenyatta and the Prime Minister also spoke on matters relating to the African Union, of which Desalegn is the current chairman. With regard to the AU which is commemorating 50 years since its launch, the president assured that Kenya would remain a strong supporter of the pursuit of Africa’s unity and vision of a common development agenda. Source: Capital FM News

May 27, 2013: African leaders urge ICC to transfer charges against President Uhuru Kenyatta — Associated Press - ADDIS ABABA, ETHIOPIA — African leaders asked the International Criminal Court to transfer charges against Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta to the Kenyan legal system. The African Union summit, which ended on Monday in Addis Ababa, agreed to press the United Nations to move the charges against Kenyatta and his deputy, William Ruto, to Kenya. African leaders believe that the ICC prosecutions “have degenerated into some kind of race hunt” of Africans, African Union chairman Hailemariam Desalegn said. Kenyatta and Ruto both face trials later this year at the ICC in The Hague on charges of crimes against humanity over allegations they helped orchestrate the tribal attacks that followed Kenya’s 2007 election, in which more than 1,000 people died. Africa’s leaders, who are in the Ethiopian capital for a three-day summit to mark the 50th year anniversary of the founding of the continent-wide organization, voted to endorse Kenya's proposal that the ICC charges against Kenyatta and Ruto should instead be handled domestically in Kenya.

Last week the executive council of the AU, composed of African foreign ministers, approved the same proposal. The Ethiopian prime minister charged that 99 percent of those indicted by the ICC are from Africa and he alleged that the ICC's prosecutors intentionally target African leaders. "The African leaders have to come to a consensus that the process the ICC is conducting in Africa has a flaw," Hailemariam said. "The intention was to avoid any kind of impunity . but now the process has degenerated into some kind of race hunting. We object to that." The African Union leaders' decision was criticized by Human Rights Watch. "Five years after the post-election violence, Kenya's authorities have repeatedly failed to live up to promises to hold those responsible to account in national trials," said Elizabeth Evenson, senior international justice counsel at Human Rights Watch in Brussels, Belgium. "The African Union's call to have the Kenya cases handled nationally should fool no one as to the prospects for meaningful justice in Kenya. Recent events at the Security Council and African Union underscore the need for the international community to redouble efforts to press Kenya to put politics aside and let the ICC's cases run their independent judicial course."

Ramtane Lamamra, head of the AU peace and security council, late Monday defended the AU leaders' decision. "This does not mean that Africa is for impunity . in this particular case you have the need to balance the overwhelming and overarching need for justice with equally important needs of democracy and respecting the freely expressed will of the people," said Lamamra. He said the U.N. Security Council should help end what he called the unfair and targeted prosecution of African leaders. Lamamra said African leaders during the summit also endorsed proposals to immediately establish a standby military force to respond to crises in the continent. He said that 50 years after independence; it is regrettable that Africa's security relies on foreign countries' interventions, such as France's current operations in Mali. The force and its financing will be made from voluntary contributions of African countries, added Lamamra. Already South Africa, Uganda and Ethiopia pledged to contribute to the force, according to the official.

June 6, 2013: Mau Mau torture victims to receive compensation - Minister William Hague'

Kenyans tortured by British colonial forces during the Mau Mau uprising will receive payouts totalling £20m, Foreign Secretary William Hague has announced. He said the UK government recognised Kenyans were tortured and it "sincerely regrets" the abuses that took place. A lawyer for the victims said they "at last have the recognition and justice they have sought for many years". Thousands of people were killed during the Mau Mau revolt against British rule in Kenya in the 1950s. Mr Hague also announced plans to support the construction of a permanent memorial to the victims in the Kenyan capital, Nairobi.

"I would like to like to make clear now, and for the first time, on behalf of Her Majesty's government, that we understand the pain and grievance felt by those who were involved in the events of the emergency in Kenya," he told the Commons. "The British government recognises that Kenyans were subject to torture, and other forms of ill-treatment at the hands of the colonial administration. "The British government sincerely regrets that these abuses took place and that they marred Kenya's progress towards independence." Mr Hague said 5,228 victims would receive payments totalling £19.9m following an agreement with lawyers acting for the victims, who have been fighting for compensation for a number of years. The compensation amounts to about £3,000 per victim and applies only to the living survivors of the abuses that took place. Mr Hague said Britain still did not accept it was legally liable for the actions of what was a colonial administration in Kenya. The British High Commissioner in Nairobi also made a public statement on the settlement to members of the Mau Mau War Veterans' Association in Kenya. BBC east Africa correspondent Gabriel Gatehouse said the reaction there was "muted".

'Big milestone'

He said it may have been because the announcement had been expected or because it was marred by the UK government continuing to deny liability for some of the abuses. That said, it was a "big milestone" for the Mau Mau veterans, said our correspondent. In a statement, Martyn Day, of law firm Leigh Day, said it took "courage to publically acknowledge for the first time the terrible nature of Britain's past in Kenya". "The elderly victims of torture now at last have the recognition and justice they have sought for many years. For them the significance of this moment cannot be over-emphasised," he said. Archbishop Desmond Tutu - who backed the case and last year wrote to Prime Minister David Cameron accusing Britain of trying to evade its legal responsibility to the victims - said the settlement was a "balm" for both the victims and perpetrators. "It sends a signal to the world that no matter how badly human beings behave towards one another, goodness ultimately prevails," said the South African Nobel Peace Prize laureate.

But Bryan Cox, of Tandem Law, said there were "thousands" of further claims that remain unresolved and "the matter was far from over". He said the law firm was working with more than 8,000 Kenyans who were still awaiting an agreement with the UK government. The UK has argued that all liabilities for the torture by colonial authorities was transferred to the Kenyan Republic upon independence in 1963 and that it could not be held liable now. But in 2011, the High Court in London ruled that four claimants did have "arguable cases in law". Their lawyers allege Paulo Muoka Nzili was castrated, Wambuga Wa Nyingi was severely beaten and Jane Muthoni Mara was subjected to appalling sexual abuse in detention camps during the rebellion. A fourth claimant, Ndiku Mutwiwa Mutua, died last year.

Violent campaign:

After the ruling, the case went back to the High Court to consider a claim by the UK Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) that the actions had been brought outside the legal time limit. The FCO said it had faced "irredeemable difficulties" in relation to the availability of witnesses and documents. But in October last year, the court ruled the victims had established a proper case and allowed their claims to proceed to trial despite the time elapsed. At the time, victims' lawyer Mr Day said he would be pressing for a trial "as quickly as possible" but would also be pushing for the government to reach an out-of-court settlement. The Mau Mau, a guerrilla group, began a violent campaign against white settlers in 1952, but the uprising was eventually put down by the British colonial government. The Kenya Human Rights Commission says 90,000 Kenyans were executed, tortured or maimed, and 160,000 people were detained in appalling conditions, although a number of historians believe the figure is lower.

Background

The Mau Mau, a guerrilla group, began as a violent campaign against white settlers in 1952

The uprising was eventually put down by the British colonial government

The Kenya Human Rights Commission says 90,000 Kenyans were executed, tortured or maimed

It says 160,000 people were detained in appalling conditions

Kenya gained independence in 1963

Accession to power of Mr. Uhuru Kenyatta – March, 2013 through national election.

Tentative Election calendar, February/March

Kenya – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

Evidence of some of the earliest human settlements has been found in Kenya, suggesting that it was the cradle of humanity from which descendents moved out to populate the world.

600 - Arabs begin settling coastal areas, over the centuries developing trading stations which facilitated contact with the Arab world, Persia and India.

16th Century - Portuguese try to establish foothold on Kenyan coast but are driven off by Swahili states and Omani Arabs by late 17th century.

1830s - Omani Arabs consolidate control of coast.

1895 - Formation of British East African Protectorate.

Early 1900s - White settlers move into highlands, railway built from Mombasa to Lake Victoria.

1920 - East African Protectorate becomes crown colony of Kenya - administered by a British governor.

1944 - Kenyan African Union (KAU) formed to campaign for African independence. First African appointment to legislative council.

1947 - Jomo Kenyatta becomes Kenyan African Union (KAU) leader.

1952 - Secret Kikuyu guerrilla group known as the Mau Mau begins violent campaign against white settlers. State of emergency declared. Jomo Kenyatta arrested.

1953 – Jomo Kenyatta charged with management of Mau Mau and jailed. KAU banned.

1956 – The Mau Mau rebellion put down after thousands killed - mainly Africans.

1959 – Jomo Kenyatta released from jail but under house arrest.

1960 - State of emergency ends. Britain announces plans to prepare Kenya for majority African rule. Kenya African Union (KAU) formed by Tom Mboya and Karamogi Oginga Odinga.

1961 - Kenyatta freed and assumes presidency of Kenya African National Union (KANU)

1963 - Kenya gains independence, with Kenyatta as prime minister.

1964 - Republic of Kenya formed. Kenyatta becomes president and Odinga vice-president.

1966 – Karamogi Odinja Odinga, a Luo, leaves KANU after ideological split, forms rival Kenya People's Union (KPU).

1969 - Assassination of government minister Tom Mboya sparks ethnic unrest. KPU banned and Odinga arrested. KANU only party to contest elections.

1974 – Jomo Kenyatta re-elected.

1978 – President Jomo Kenyatta dies in office, succeeded by Vice-President Daniel Torotich Arap Moi.

June 1982 - Kenya officially declared a one-party KANU state by National Assembly.

August 1982 - Army suppresses air force coup attempt. Private Hezekiah Ochuka rules Kenya for about six hours.

1987 - Opposition groups suppressed. International criticism of political arrests and human rights abuses.

1989 – Kenyan political prisoners freed.

1990 - Death of the foreign minister, Robert Ouko, in suspicious circumstances leads to increased dissent against government.

August 1991 - Forum for the Restoration of Democracy (Ford) formed by six opposition leaders, including Oginga Odinga. Party outlawed and members arrested. Creditors suspend aid to Kenya amid fierce international condemnation.

December 1991 - Special conference of KANU agrees to introduce a multi-party political system.

1992 - Approximately 2,000 people killed in tribal conflict in the west of the country.

August 1992 - FORD splits into two factions - Ford-Asili (led by ex-government minister Kenneth Matiba) and Ford-Kenya (led by Odinga).

December 1992 – Daniel Arap Moi re-elected in multi-party elections. Kanu wins strong majority.

1994 – Karamogi Odinja Odinga dies. Opposition groups form coalition - the United National Democratic Alliance - but it is plagued by disagreements.

1995 - New opposition party - Safina - launched by palaeontologist Richard Leakey. Party refused official registration until November 1997.

1997 - Demonstrations calling for democratic reform. World Bank withholds disbursement of $5bn in structural adjustment credit.

December 1997 – Daniel Arap Moi wins further term in widely-criticised elections. His main opponents are former vice-president Mwai Kibaki and Raila Odinga, son of Oginga Odinga.

August 1998 - Al-Qaeda operatives bomb the US embassy in Nairobi, killing 224 people and injuring thousands.

1999 – Daniel Arap Moi appoints Richard Leakey to head government drive against corruption.

April 2001 – Richard Leakey appears in court to face charges of abuse of power and perverting the course of justice.

June 2001 – Kenyan Parliament passes a law allowing the import and manufacture of cheap copies of anti-Aids drugs.

2001 - Ethnic tensions culminate in several violent clashes. In December thousands flee and several people are killed in rent battles involving Nubian and Luo communities in Nairobi's Kibera slum district.

July 2002 - Some 200 Maasai and Samburu tribespeople accept more than $7m in compensation from the British Ministry of Defence. The tribespeople had been bereaved or maimed by British Army explosives left on their land over the last 50 years.

November 2002 - Terror attack on Israeli-owned hotel near Mombasa kills 10 Kenyans and injures three Israelis. A simultaneous rocket attack on an Israeli airliner fails. A statement - purportedly from al-Qaeda - claims responsibility.

December 2002 - Elections. Mwai Kibaki wins a landslide victory, ending Daniel arap Moi's 24-year rule and Kanu's four decades in power.

January 2003 - Government bill proposes anti-corruption commission. Moi critic John Githongo appointed anti-graft czar.

November 2003 - International Monetary Fund (IMF) resumes lending after three-year gap, citing anti-corruption measures.

December 2003 - Government decides to grant former president Daniel arap Moi immunity from prosecution on corruption charges.

March-July - 2004 Long-awaited draft of new constitution completed. Document requires parliament's approval and proposes curbing president's powers and creating post of prime minister. But deadline for enactment is missed.

July-August 2004 - Food crisis, caused by crop failures and drought, dubbed "national disaster" by President Kibaki. UN launches aid appeal for vulnerable rural Kenyans.

October 2004 - Kenyan ecologist Wangari Maathai wins the Nobel Peace Prize.

Controversy over jail conditions amid intense media coverage of inmate deaths at Meru jail in the east.

January 2005 - Clashes over land and water rights leave more than 40 people dead.

February 2005 - Corruption takes centre stage when it is claimed that graft has cost Kenya $1bn under Kibaki. Leading anti-graft official John Githongo resigns. International donors voice unease.

July 2005 - Parliament approves a draft constitution after days of violent protests in Nairobi over aspects of the draft which demonstrators say give too much power to in the president's hands.

November-December 2005 - Voters reject a proposed new constitution in what is seen as a protest against President Kibaki. The president replaces his cabinet; some nominees reject their appointments.

January 2006 - Government says four million people in the north need food aid because of a drought which the president calls a "national disaster".

January-February 2006 - Government ministers are linked to a corruption scandal involving contracts for a phantom company, Anglo Leasing. One of them, Finance Minister David Mwiraria, resigns and says allegations against him are false.

March 2006 - Armed police, acting on government orders, raid the offices and presses of the Standard group, one of Kenya's leading media companies.

April 2006 - Three days of national mourning are declared after an aircraft carrying several prominent politicians crashes in the north.

April 2006 - Visiting Chinese President Hu Jintao signs a contract allowing China to prospect for oil off the Kenyan coast. His African tour has focused on trying to satisfy China's hunger for energy and raw materials.

October 2006 - UN says some 35,000 Somalis escaping drought, Islamist rule and looming conflict have arrived in Kenyan camps since early 2006.

November – December 2006 - Regional flooding renders thousands homeless. Some 100,000 Somali refugees cut off by floodwaters in the north-east are supplied by air drops.

May – 2007 A Kenya Airways plane crashes in Cameroon, killing all 114 on board. An official investigation finds pilot error was to blame.

December 2007 - Disputed presidential elections lead to violence in which more than 1,500 die.

The government and opposition come to a power-sharing agreement in February and a cabinet is agreed in April.

October 2008 - Report into post-election clashes calls for international tribunal to try those implicated in violence. Many political leaders are reluctant to implement the commission of inquiry's recommendations, with some arguing that prosecutions could trigger further clashes between communities.

December 2008 - Kenya Anti-Corruption Commission (KACC) accuses seven current and former MPs of taking illegal allowances worth $250,000.

August 2009 - Visiting US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton criticises Kenya for failing to investigate the deadly violence after the 2007 election.

Kenya says that at least 10 million people, or one third of the population, are in need of food aid. The government mobilises the military to distribute food, water and medicines to areas hit hardest by drought.

October 2009 - The government says it will co-operate with the International Criminal Court (ICC) to try key suspects in post-election violence.

January 2010 - The US suspends $7m of funding for free primary schools in Kenya until fraud allegations are investigated.

February 2010 - President Kibaki overturns a decision by Prime Minister Raila Odinga to suspend the country's agriculture and education ministers over alleged corruption. The row threatens the coalition government.

July 2010 - Kenya joins its neighbours in forming a new East African Common Market, intended to integrate the region's economy.

August 2010 - New constitution designed to limit the powers of the president and devolve power to the regions approved in referendum.

Controversy over release of national census figures that include tribal affiliations.

December 2010 - A grenade explosion kills three people on a Kampala-bound bus in Nairobi.

March 2011 - Governments of Kenya, DR Congo agree to investigate illegal gold trade, in which Kenyan allegedly plays a key role.

April 2011 - Truth commission begins public probe into 3,000 killings at Wagalla airstrip during a 1984 crackdown on ethnic Somalis, a hushed-up chapter in Kenya's history.

Six politicians appear before the International Criminal Court in The Hague, accused of links to 2007-8 post-election violence.

June-September 2011 - East Africa hit by worst drought in 60 years.

August-September 2011 - Suspected Somali militants raid Kenyan coastal resorts and a refugee camp, targetting foreigners.

October 2011 - Kenyan troops enter Somalia to attack rebels they accuse of being behind several kidnappings of foreigners on Kenyan soil.

Kenya suffers several apparent reprisal attacks.

October 13, 2011: Two Spanish doctors, working for a foreign aid group, were kidnapped from a Kenyan refugee camp and taken back to Somalia, apparently to be held for ransom.

In Mogadishu, a roadside bomb went off, wounding a member of the TNG.

Many foreign aid organizations cut back their work in Kenyan refugee camps until better security is provided. The kidnapping of two Spanish doctors yesterday was just the latest in many attacks by Somali raiders. There have been three such attacks in the last month.

October 14, 2011: Kenya vowed to punish al Shabaab, and other criminal groups in southern Somalia, who have been increasingly attacking Kenyans, foreign tourists and refugee camps full of Somalis.

October 16, 2011: Several thousand Kenyan troops crossed into Somalia, taking with them artillery and armored vehicles. The target is the port of Kismayo, some 200 kilometers to the east.

October 17, 2011: Al Qaeda released photos showing al Qaeda representatives dispensing food, cash and other aid in Somalia. Few details were given, but this was apparently an attempt to counter the negative publicity their ally al Shabaab had gotten by preventing foreign aid to reach millions of Somalis.

Kenyan police, after being alerted by their counterparts in Britain, arrested two British teenagers near the Somali border. The two boys, aged 17 and 18, were the children of Somalis who had fled to Britain and become citizens there. But al Shabaab uses the Internet to urge young ethnic Somalis to return to Somalia and help establish a religious dictatorship there.

France announced that a wheelchair-bound Frenchwoman kidnapped by Somalis from a beach resort in northern Kenya on October 1st, did not long survive her captivity and apparently died within a week of being taken. The victim was quite ill and required medication several times a day. The kidnappers could not provide the medication.

In Mogadishu, a car bomb went off near a government building, killing six. Al Shabaab was believed responsible.

Along the Kenyan border, Kenyan warplanes bombed al Shabaab positions in Somalia. Several thousand Kenyan troops are advancing on the port of Kismayo, which serves as the "capital" for al Shabaab. This is where al Shabaab is believed to be holding the two Spanish doctors they recently kidnapped from Kenya.

October 18, 2011: In the northern statelet of Puntland, government troops disarmed local militiamen in areas where there had been anti-government violence.

October 19, 2011: Kenyan and TNG officials met in Mogadishu to work out details of how they will coordinate their actions against al Shabaab fighters along the Kenyan border. Kenyan troops entered Somalia three days ago, to find two kidnapped aid workers, and to discourage al Shabaab from crossing the border to plunder and kidnap.

While more Somali pirates are active this year, they are having a more difficult time against better defended ships. Last year, 28 percent of attacks were successful and 35 ships were taken by October. This year, only 12 percent of attacks were successful and only 24 ships were taken in the same period.

In Mogadishu, small groups of al Shabaab fighters continue battling TNG (Transitional National Government) troops and AU peacekeepers. The TNG is seeking to clear out all al Shabaab forces from the city, as even a small number of them can carry out terrorist attacks.

Kenya has said it wants to clear al Shabaab out of the border area and then help TNG gunmen keep al Shabaab out of this zone, and out of Kenya.

In the past, the Kenyan tribes were not as organized or powerful as the Ethiopians (who have been a local superpower for over a thousand years.) But in this post-colonial world, the Kenyans have a modern trained and equipped military. While the Somalis are still fiercer, they are not bulletproof. The Kenyans have lots of guns and bullets and know how to shoot. To al Shabaab's dismay, the Kenyans keep coming and keep killing. The Somalis will fight back, and the Kenyan troops will suffer casualties, but they won't be run out of Somalia. The Kenyans will make their point, and leave. And, like with the Ethiopians, the border will quiet down. Somalis are not happy about this. For centuries, the Ethiopians were regarded as worthy opponents, while the Kenyan tribes were seen as perennial victims. Now the Kenyans are acting like Ethiopians, and that's a change many Somalis are not happy with.

The Ethiopians, like so many others in the region, and the world, are fed up with the political/economic/ social mess inside Somalia. So in early 2009, the Ethiopians pulled their troops back to bases just across the border in their Ogaden province, and continued to send in raiding parties when (not if) Somali factions come raiding. This kept the Somali raiders out; as the Somalis were now assured that the better armed (and quite deadly) Ethiopians would come after the raiders in Somalia. The Ethiopians and Somalis have been at it in this way for centuries.

Ethiopia had a similar situation five years ago, with Islamic radical Somali troops increasingly active inside Ethiopia (which borders Somalia). So Ethiopia invaded, which it has often done in the past when Somali raiders became a problem. Ethiopia sent some of these troops to Mogadishu, at the behest of the United States, to drive out Islamic radicals (the Islamic Courts Union). The Ethiopians were told that the UN and AU (African Union) would organize a force of 8,000 peacekeepers to relieve the Ethiopian troops. But that went slowly, and after two years, only 3,400 of the peacekeepers have arrived, and they have not done much peacekeeping.

October 20, 2011: Kenya says its troops have killed at least 75 al Shabaab fighters so far and are over a hundred kilometers inside Somalia. Al Shabaab threatens massive retribution for this invasion, but based on past experience this is unlikely. Ethiopia has frequently invaded Somalia when Somali raiders became a nuisance, and that solved the problem.

Al Shabaab declared the Red Crescent, along with the Red Cross, were now banned from al Shabaab controlled territory. This puts several million Somalis at risk of starvation. Al Shabaab accused the aid agencies of bringing in food that was past its use-by date and that the free food aid was lowering prices in markets thus hurting local farmers.

November 23, 2011: Kenya has apparently let loose some of their secretive paratroop commandoes in Somalia. Kenyan troops moved into Somalia last month, and the target of this attack, the Somali al Shabaab Islamic terrorist organization, promised swift retaliation. The terrorist attack never came, or at least not yet. While al Shabaab has a fearsome reputation, they have not done well against professional troops. While most of the Kenyan Army has a reputation for lackadaisical performance, there are exceptions. For example, the 20th Parachute Regiment has long been considered an elite, highly selective and well trained unit. The 20th even has its own "best of the best"; D Company. This last outfit is considered on a par with Western commando organizations and has trained with, and been trained by, them.

January 31, 2012: In the central Somali town of Galkayo, an al Shabaab suicide bomber failed in his attempt to kill a pro-government militia leader. The bomb went off, killing two security guards.

February 2, 2012: Kenyan troops captured the port town of Badhadhe, which is near the Kenyan border and 180 kilometers south of the al Shabaab held port of Kismayo. During the operation, Kenyan helicopter gunships attacked a large group of al Shabaab (over 200 men and at least 20 vehicles). Kenya claimed to have killed a hundred al Shabaab and destroyed at least ten vehicles.

February 3, 2012: In Mogadishu, a small American UAV, apparently a 2 kg (4.4 pound) Raven, crashed into a hut in a refugee camp. A similar incident took place last year in Mogadishu. Four Ravens were supplied to the AU peacekeepers and these UAVs operate up to ten kilometers from the operator. The U.S. operates larger UAVs from Camp Lemonnier in Djibouti and in Ethiopia. Camp Lemonnier has existed since 2003 and currently holds 3,500 personnel. The base has a lease that lasts until 2020.

February 4, 2012: Kenya publicized its amnesty program for Kenyan Somalis who have joined al Shabaab. Recent victories by Kenyan troops over al Shabaab made Kenyan Somalis more likely to accept amnesty, as happened during similar situations in the past.

Kenyan jets attacked several ground targets near the coastal town of Badhadhe. At least ten al Shabaab members were killed.

February 5, 2012: Al Shabaab attacked the town of Beledweyn in central Somalia. The key town was captured by Ethiopian troops two months ago, and this night assault was expected. The al Shabaab forces were repulsed.

February 6, 2012: The famine in Somalia is officially over as a large harvest matures and food is plentiful. But only for a few months and over a million people are still in refugee camps inside Somalia as well as Ethiopia and Kenya. These people need foreign food aid to survive, as do many more who live harvest-to-harvest. In the last eight months, over 100,000 famine refugees had fled to Kenya and Ethiopia. Many refuse to return to Somalia because of the continued fighting between al Shabaab and various opponents. These include Somali troops and militias as well as AU (African Union) peacekeepers and Ethiopian soldiers.

March 2, 2012: Britain has given the Kenyan Air Force an MX-15 stabilized reconnaissance turret and assisted in mounting the equipment in a Kenyan Y-12 aircraft. The 45 kg (100 pound) MX-15 can spot and identify ships and boats 20 kilometers away. The MX-15 can operate at night and its zoom feature enables the operator to see if men in a boat are armed with weapons (like AK-47s and RPGs). The Kenyans will use their MX-15 equipped Y-12 to more effectively patrol their coast, especially near the Somali border.

The 5.3 ton Chinese Y-12 is a twin turbo-prop aircraft that has a crew of two and carries up to 17 passengers or 1.5 tons of cargo. Cruising speed is 250 kilometers an hour and normal endurance is about five hours.

April 30, 2012: Apparently Eritrea supplied ammo and guns to the South Sudan Democratic Movement (SSDM) rebel group in South Sudan. Ammunition taken from the SSDM by South Sudanese security forces allegedly came from the same lots as ammo Eritrea gave the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF). The ONLF opposes the Ethiopian government.

May 1, 2012: Ethiopia reported that its two main refugee camps for people fleeing Sudan's Blue Nile state now house 29,494 refugees. The camps are located at Tongo and Sherkole.

May 3, 2012: Ethiopian security forces arrested ten Merille tribal militia fighters who are accused of murdering three Kenyan policemen. The men participated in a raid on a Kenyan police camp in April. The Merille people have been fighting with the Turkana people. Both tribes are pastoralists. The tribes have clashed over water rights. Both tribes conduct cattle raids (mass theft of cattle herds). The Kenyan and Ethiopian government are trying to end the violence. Kenya recently arrested two Kenyan men for smuggling weapons to the Turkana.

May 4, 2012: Ethiopia will be one of four African countries attending the G8 summit later this month. The Prime Minister of Ethiopia, Meles Zenawi, and the leaders of Ghana, Tanzania, and Benin will discuss food security issues with the G8 leaders.

May 5, 2012: 300 Djiboutian peacekeepers have deployed near Beledweyne (central Somalia). The Djibouti contingent will secure an area north of the town. Ethiopian and pro-Somali government forces attack and clear an area of Al Shabaab fighters. African Union peacekeeping units then deploy into the liberated zone.

May 6, 2012: A senior Ethiopian opposition political leader said that Ethiopia must end tribal politics. The opposition leader said Ethiopia has only two tribes: the rich and the poor.

May 7, 2012: The government of Ethiopia denied reports that Ethiopian tribesmen were fleeing into South Sudan. A recent UN report asserted that Anuak tribal civilians had fled fighting between Ethiopian security forces and Anuak rebels in Ethiopia’s Gambella region (western Ethiopia, bordering on South Sudan’s Jonglei state).

May 10, 2012: Ethiopian troops and pro-Somali government forces killed 17 al Shabaab fighters. The Al Shabaab fighters had been operating road blocks in the Bakool region. The official statement did not specify where the Ethiopian-led attacks occurred, but an Al Shabaab spokesman said that its fighters had engaged Ethiopian forces near the town of Hudur.

May 12, 2012: The Ethiopian commander of the United Nations Interim Security Force for Abyei (UNISFA) confirmed that South Sudan had pulled all of its forces out of the region. Abyei is claimed by both Sudan and South Sudan. Ethiopia has now deployed 3,716 soldiers with the United Nations Interim Security Force for Abyei (UNISFA) on the Sudan-South Sudan border. Another 83 Ethiopian military observers are also serving with the force. UNISFA has an authorized maximum force of 4,200 military personnel.

An armed incident occurred in Beledweyne. An Ethiopian military vehicle hit a land mine inside the city. Several soldiers were wounded by the mine blast. Subsequent fire from the Ethiopian convoy killed two people in Beledweyne.

May 14, 2012: Al Shabaab fighters attacked a Kenyan position near Badade (Lower Jubba area, southern Somalia, near the Kenyan border). Six died in the resulting firefight.

May 15, 2012: Ethiopian police charged ten people with belonging to al Qaeda. Nine of those charged were Ethiopian citizens. The other accused terrorist has Kenyan citizenship. Investigators claimed the ten people were planning to conduct terror attacks in Ethiopia and that the group had links to militant Islamist terror cells in Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Kenya, and the Philippines.

May 16, 2012: In Mombasa, Kenya attackers threw grenades outside a local nightclub. A security guard was killed and five people were wounded. One of the attackers was wounded and captured. The attackers may belong to an al Qaeda-affiliated Islamist terror organization.

A TNG victory will be more durable (and Kenya's military effort in Somalia more effective) if the southern clans are prepared to assume a positive security role in their region. The peace would be even more durable if the clans participate in Al Shabaab's final defeat. The Ethiopians, however, may argue that the time to pursue nice-nice politics will come after Kismayo falls. (Austin Bay)

The KDF has shown that it is willing to use force to protect Kenya. It is also demonstrating that it is willing to use force to protect Kenya's friends.

The KDF has been training militiamen from Ras Kamboni (sometimes referred to as the Ras Kamboni fighters). Arming, training, and supplying these militiamen serve immediate security purposes. Paying them creates political goodwill. These militiamen could play a role in an attack on Kismayo. They could also play a role in politically stabilizing the city and the region. Arming, training, supplying, and paying Ras Kamboni fighters certainly demonstrates that good relations with Kenya has its rewards.

Kenya was the impartial mediator in Sudan. Not so in Somalia. In the Kismayo region Kenyans are heavily armed outsiders with a definite, self-serving political-security agenda. The KDF wants the people of the Kismayo region to treat Al Shabaab as their occupier and the KDF as their ally. That may seem like a long shot goal but day by day Al Shabaab is losing territory to the AU and TNG, and the southerners are aware of that.

The Kismayo region political-military (pol-mil) effort posited in this scenario utilizes political skills employed in the southern Sudan peacemaking mission. Both have very detailed intelligence requirements. Detailed really means detailed, which is one reason the process takes time. For example, the personal ambitions and histories of individual local leaders always affect the process. Talks can end (or never start) and agreements can unravel because Clan Leader X just despises Clan Leader Y. (Why does X despise Y? Negotiators need to know. They might need to seek an agreement between Clan Y and Clan Z first because Clan Leader X trusts Clan Leader Z.)

Several of Kenya's international allies (the U.S., Ethiopia, Britain, and Australia) have special forces personnel trained to facilitate these tricky political discussions and security operations. The Kenyans have their own cadre of personnel with a track record for conducting successful multi-tribal and inter-clan negotiations in neighboring nations. Kenyans helped resolve several violent Dinka-Nuer tribal disputes in southern Sudan, prior to the 2005 Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) that ended Sudan's north-south civil war.

But to dismiss out of hand the methodical approach the KDF leaders claim they are pursuing is a mistake. So here's a scenario: the Kenyans have re-considered their operations in southern Somalia in light of their strategic goal of securing territorial integrity. Real security requires a stable, peaceful political relationship with the people of southern Somalia. So the KDF wants to begin building that political relationship on the ground in Somalia.

The Ethiopians would likely add a substantial armored punch to an assault on Kismayo, and from a Kenyan military and political perspective that would be worth waiting for. The Ethiopians might accuse the Kenyans of failing to meet their commitment or, worse, letting Ethiopians do the bleeding. That could lead to political friction between two nations that increasingly see themselves as allies and economic partners.

Cynics suggested that the Kenyans were delaying an assault on Kismayo until Ethiopian forces could participate in the attack. The cynics have a case. A senior Ethiopian officer serving in Somalia was quoted this week as saying that Ethiopian forces had fulfilled their mission in Somalia and that Ethiopian forces might help liberate Kismayo. He also told the press he wondered why Kenyan forces had not yet taken Kismayo and indicated that they were supposed to attack it when Ethiopian forces were attacking Baidoa in February. This is another public signal that Kenya and Ethiopia are coordinating their military campaigns. Kenya certainly had the ground and air combat power to attack Kismayo then and still has the power.

Earlier this year Kenyan military officials suggested that the KDF was being methodical, not reluctant. A direct attack on Kismayo runs the risk of degenerating into a huge and bloody urban street battle. To avoid that the KDF said it sought political dialog with various Somali clans in the Kismayo area. Last month a statement attributed to senior government officials (no names) indicated that Kenyan Army officers were in fact working with several clans and clan militias (yes, they often have different agendas as well as rivalries) to reach a consensus on policing the Kismayo region.

Critics also point to Kismayo. Last fall the Kenyan military made it clear that the Somali seaport of Kismayo was a key objective. Al Shabaab used it as a communications and supply link to Yemen and Eritrea. It is also a pirate haven, which is no surprise, since Al Shabaab maintains close ties with Somali pirates. When Kenyan forces took Ras Kamboni in October 2011, the government said that Kismayo would be next. A mission accomplished moment? It is now late May 2012, and Al Shabaab still controls Kismayo. Incursion critics ask why Kismayo remains in Al Shabaab's hands. Failure to seize Kismayo has become a political problem. Is the KDF reluctant or incompetent?

Kenyan forces in Somalia are supposed to eventually become part of the AU peacekeeping force. Though that strikes many as a good political move (East African nations support it, the AU supports it), some analysts are wondering if re-hatting Kenyan forces will commit Kenya to an even longer military presence in Somalia. See the emerging political problem? If Kenyan forces provide their own backfill and an insurgency erupts critics (and then the political opposition) will scream quagmire. And they already are.

Ethiopia (seeking to avoid another extended stay in Somalia) has said it will withdraw most of its forces, as AU peacekeepers assume the area protection and security mission. AU peacekeeping forces have begun backfilling in the areas from which Ethiopian/pro-TNG forces have driven Al Shabaab Islamist fighters. So far, no AU peacekeepers have backfilled behind the KDF.

Eventually we will learn just how closely specific Kenyan combat operations in the south were coordinated with the Ethiopian/pro-TNG coalition combat operations in central and south-central Somalia. There is no doubt that coordination has occurred at the campaign level.

As the KDF entered the fray in the Somalia's south, Ethiopia launched its own Somalia incursion in November 2011. Pro-Somali government militia fighters (ie, supporters of the Somalia Transitional National Government, TNG, also called the Transitional Federal Government) were soon operating with Ethiopian forces. Al Shabaab, already battling African Union forces in the Mogadishu region, now faced two new axes of attack. Various militant Islamist groups (Islamic Courts Union then Al Shabaab) had been fencing with Ethiopian forces in central and south-central Somalia since the official Ethiopian military withdrawal in January 2009 (what supposedly ended the 2006 war). However, the Kenyan operation was threatening what had been an Al Shabaab rear area (and certainly a comparatively safe area).

At the moment, the majority of the Kenyan people still seem to agree that their government had to do something about the cross-border attacks by Al Shabaab terrorists in 2011, and militant Islamist trouble-making in Kenya (three examples: kidnapping tourists, harassing aid organs, and trying to get Kenyan Muslims to launch a revolt). In October 2011, the government did do something, in a major way. Kenyan military and paramilitary police units have crossed international borders before, in either hot pursuit operations (usually pursuing cattle raiders) or raiding base camps (usually of tribal raiders). The Somali incursion was not a raid but a full-fledged, extended offensive military operation by the Kenyan Defense Forces (KDF, Kenyan Army). Kenya supported its ground forces with air and naval forces. Moreover, it was the first such offensive operation by Kenyan military forces since the country became independent. The government insisted that defending Kenya's territorial integrity was the strategic objective of Operation Linda Nchi (Swahili for Operation Protect the Nation). To achieve that strategic objective the KDF had two military operational objectives: drive Al Shabaab away from the Kenya-Somalia border region and, in the process, significantly damage (if not destroy) the militant Islamist organization's military capabilities in southern Somalia. The real strategic triumph would be to translate Al Shabaab's loss of territory and military damage into a fatal political defeat for Al Shabaab.

May 20, 2012: As the Kenyan military incursion continues in Somalia, many Kenyans have begun asking the government to tell them how long the conflict will last. The questions echo similar ones Ethiopians asked as the Ethiopian invasion in 2006, led to a prolonged three-year struggle with Somali militant Islamist militias.

June 8, 2012: The U.S. government announced that it is offering $33 million in rewards for information that leads to the capture of senior Al Shabaab leaders. The US is offering seven million dollars for Al Shabaab's founder, Ahmed Abdi aw-Mohamed Nom de guerre is Godane.

June 10, 2012: An Ogaden rebel website accused an Ethiopian paramilitary police unit of burning down the center of the town of Degahbour on June 8.

Local Somalis report that some Al Shabaab fighters have returned to the town of El Bur after Ethiopian forces pulled out on June 10.

June 12, 2012: The Kenyan military intends to launch a final assault on the Al Shabaab-held seaport of Kismayo sometime in August and Kenya wants international participation in the operation. That means several things. Kenya has asked the U.S. to provide funding assistance. Ethiopia has suggested that it may send troops south to help the Kenyans attack Kismayo. Kenyan forces are now flagged as members of the AMISOM peacekeeping operation in Somalia so conceivably other AMISOM peacekeepers (form Uganda, Burundi, possibly Djibouti) could participate. Kenya has also approached the European Union and asked for naval support.

June 15, 2012: The Kenyan government denied that it is letting the U.S. use Kenyan territory or airspace to conduct aerial surveillance missions. The Kenyan denial, however, was very carefully worded. Kenya basically said that it does not know about any U.S. use of Kenyan airspace but Kenya does share intelligence information with the US.

June 15, 2012: Armed guards on British merchant ships now have permission to fire first when approached by pirates. Armed guards have to comply with laws applicable to the country of the owner of the ship they are on. Some European nations have very restrictive rules about the use of firearms and the pirates were taking advantage of this to get close before opening fire.

The United States declassified some of its military activity in Somalia, admitting that it was American guided missiles, often launched from UAVs that caused the deaths of numerous al Qaeda and al Shabaab leaders.

June 16, 2012: Kenyan media reported that the Kenyan military has lost 12 people in operations in Somalia. Five died in combat and seven in accidents. The figures are unconfirmed.

June 16, 2012: A suicide car bomber attacked troops outside Mogadishu (Afgoye), killing himself and two soldiers. Al Shabaab took credit.

June 17, 2012: In Mogadishu a car bomb went off in a market, wounding three people. Al Shabaab took credit.

June 18, 2012: UN officials accused Eritrea of torturing political prisoners and conducting summary executions of political prisoners. Human rights violations by the Eritrean government include forced labor.

Kenyan authorities arrested several men, including two Iranian nationals, who were allegedly planning terrorist attacks in Nairobi and Mombasa. The group is connected to the Somalia's Al Shabaab. The group had stored chemicals used in making explosives at a golf club near Mombasa.

Ethiopia arrested 14 gunmen who were involved in the April murder of 19 people in the Gambella region (western Ethiopia). The group ambushed a passenger bus. The same group of gunmen had been involved in a skirmish with South Sudanese security forces.

June 18, 2012: In the port of Hobyo, which is halfway down the east coast of Somalia, two groups of pirates fought each other. There were several casualties, and the fighting was apparently the result of one pirate group trying to steal from the other. Hobyo has long served as a base for pirates.

Somali pirates are having a bad year. For the first half of 2011, they captured 28 ships. For the same period this year, only five have been taken. Pirate mother ships are under constant attack and most large ships operating near the Somali coast now have armed guards. The loss of mother ships makes it difficult for the pirates to go long distances to find unguarded ships. The seafaring nations are hoping that the defeat of al Shabaab on land will enable Somali security forces to shut down the pirate operations.

The Somali government is offering amnesty and jobs in the armed forces for al Shabaab members. The government wants to prevent, as much as possible, al Shabaab men from becoming Islamic terrorists. Many current al Shabaab are just young guys looking for a job. Al Shabaab offered one, which seemed like a good deal when al Shabaab controlled most of southern Somalia. For the last year that job has become too dangerous for most Somalis. Those who have not been killed or captured have often deserted or accepted amnesty. For many Somalis, who you carry a gun for is just business.

Kenya wants Somalia declared pacified so it can shut down the Dadaab refugee camp near the Somali border and force the 450,000 refugees back into Somalia. The camp has become a major problem for Kenya, becoming the base for a growing number of Somali criminal gangs and terrorizing a growing number of Kenyans living near the camp. While foreign aid groups protest this plan, many of these same foreign aid groups will not allow their foreign employees to work in the camp.

Kidnapping foreigners for ransom is becoming popular and robbery has always been in fashion.

Even with al Shabaab completely gone (not likely to happen soon), Somalia still has a major problem with the fact that it is the most unruly region on the planet. Sometimes described as a "failed state," that itself is optimistic. For most of the last thousand years, Somalia has been described as an unruly region, not a unified state. Turning the place into a functioning nation is going against the nature of Somalia, which is normally a collection of tribes and warlords. Central government is not highly respected, feared, or easily obeyed.

The core al Shabaab members are preparing to shift to being terrorists. That means trying to blend in or go hide in a thinly populated area. This is particularly unpleasant for Kenya, which has suffered from Islamic terrorism for decades. But it's a step up from al Shabaab launching raids across the border and providing logistical support for terrorists in Kenya. The demise of al Shabaab will put an end to all that. The Islamic terrorists are handled like another criminal gang in Kenya, one that specializes in mass murder rather than stealing. In Somalia the final blow to al Shabaab will be the capture of Kismayo, which is now surrounded by the Kenyan armed forces (the army on the land side, the navy off shore). Without Kismayo al Shabaab cannot afford to pay a lot of gunmen or buy weapons and equipment. They go back to being a bunch of Islamic fanatics with a dream.

June 21, 2012: Al Shabaab has lost its fearsome reputation and that has proved to be a very costly defeat. More local militias are forming to drive out al Shabaab gunmen. With so many al Shabaab gangs destroyed (by combat and desertions), the remainder have fewer allies to call on if they run into local opposition. Many local al Shabaab groups had turned into gangsters, living off extortion and theft. Word has gotten around about the many defeats al Shabaab has suffered this year and encouraged more opposition to the Islamic radical group.

June 22, 2012: Ethiopia announced that it will keep troops in Somalia until Somalia passes a national constitution and has a military that is able to protect the country. This is a major change from what Ethiopia said it would do earlier this year. At one time Ethiopia indicated that its forces would leave Somalia this fall.

An Ethiopian criminal court convicted a UN security guard of communicating with a terrorist group, sentencing him to seven years in jail. The government said that the guard had used his job to gather information for the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), an Ethiopian rebel group.

June 23, 2012: Djibouti opened its new Djibouti Naval Operations Center. The U.S. and France helped Djibouti build and equip the center, which will be used to track ship movements in Djiboutian territorial waters, the Red Sea area, and very likely the Gulf of Aden. One of its missions is counter-piracy. The European Union's EU NAVFOR squadron will also be involved with the center.

The government of South Sudan said that Ethiopian forces had captured a Jonglei tribal spiritual leader who had fled South Sudan. The spiritual leader opposes South Sudan's tribal disarmament policy in Jonglei state. Ethiopia has indicated that it will send the spiritual leader back to South Sudan. Ethiopian forces also captured some of the leader's supporters who were accompanying him.

June 26, 2012: An Al Shabaab claimed its fighters ambushed a Kenyan Army convoy near the town of Haluqua (inside Kenya, near the Somali border), killing 23 Kenyan soldiers and wounding nine. The claim is unsubstantiated and Kenya did not report an incident. Both Kenya and Al Shabaab, however, acknowledge that there is a fight going on in the Somali town of Badhaadhe. Kenya reported that it killed five Al Shabaab fighters. Three Somalia Transitional National Government (TNG) soldiers were killed in the firefight which occurred when Al Shabaab fighters attacked a Kenyan and TNG base in the town.

June 27, 2012: Twenty-three Ethiopians involved in opposition politics were convicted of terrorism. An Ethiopian journalist was also convicted on terrorism charges. They all face life imprisonment now. The defendants argued that they were prisoners of conscience and were not engaged in terrorism but legitimate democratic political action.

In the central Somali town of Baladweyne an al Shabaab roadside bomb struck an Ethiopian Army convoy. There were no casualty reports. Ethiopia still occupies Baladweyne.

June 29, 2012: Gunmen attacked a convoy and seized four foreign aid workers near the Dadaab refugee camp. Their Kenyan driver was killed in the attack.

June 30, 2012: Kenyan authorities are looking for a group of gunmen who kidnapped four aid workers at the Dadaab refugee camp (about 100 kilometers from the Somali border). The Kenya deployed helicopters, search aircraft, and ground troops to find and rescue the captives.

In neighboring Kenya gunmen attacked a church in the town of Garissa. The attackers killed two policemen, stole their rifles, and then killed 15 and wounded 40 inside the church. The policemen had been assigned to guard the church because of rising violence in the region. Attackers also struck a second church in Garissa using grenades. Three people were wounded by grenade fragments. Garissa is not far from the Kenya-Somali border and militant Somali Islamists have been threatening to launch more attacks on Kenyan Christians. The Kenyan government has pointed out that Kenyan Muslims also feel threatened by the Islamist attacks. Several Kenyan tribes have both Muslim and Christian members. The attack on a worshipping congregation is similar to attacks launched by the Nigeria militant Islamist organization, Boko Haram. Al Qaeda and the Somalia Islamist group Al Shabaab have claimed that they are organizing militant Islamists throughout Africa.

July 1, 2012: Every so often Ethiopia calls attention to the Eritrean refugees living in refugee camps inside Ethiopia. The refugees are always good for horror stories about food shortages, arbitrary arrests, and corruption in Eritrea. Between 60,000 and 70,000 refugees live in the camps. Others gather in Ethiopia's capital, Addis Ababa. However, last year more and more Eritrean draft dodgers began crossing the border. The complaint is broader than avoiding military conscription; many of the draft dodgers are in fact draftees who have deserted after serving far longer than what they regard as a reasonable tour of duty. According to the conscripts who have deserted, a draftee's initial service, at least for those lacking political connections, can last for several years. These refugees have told reporters that sometimes draftees serve for a decade, not just in the military but in various government jobs or even businesses owned by the ruling party. Eritrea began mass military conscription in the mid-1990s, as a means of building up its military in the face of what its government called the threat from Ethiopia. The strategic concept was the creation of an armed people. If the far larger and stronger Ethiopia attacked, the Ethiopian Army would ultimately have to fight everyone in Eritrea. At least that was the idea. Initial military training and service lasted 18 months. Sometimes draftees worked on road and military-related construction projects. Now it appears the definition of military-related construction has changed. The continual influx of draftees who have deserted has to have some deleterious effect on Eritrea's armed forces, but how large an effect is open to speculation. It is clearly an indication of declining morale. One recent report quoted refugees who claimed that some Eritrean Army units (ie, the ones of which they had direct knowledge) had only 25 percent of their assigned personnel. How much a given conscript actually knows about his unit's authorized level of personnel is a fair question to ask because he might be assigned to a reserve unit. However, many of the refugees interviewed indicated that units throughout the army are under-strength. Eritrea could carry these under-strength units on its order of battle as full-strength units in order to inflate the size of its army and thereby deter Ethiopia, but that wouldn't fool Ethiopian military intelligence analysts for very long.

July 3, 2012: Ethiopia has emerged as East Africa's political powerhouse, despite being landlocked. Eritrea controls what used to be Ethiopia's seaports, before Eritrea became a separate nation in 1991. Since then Ethiopia has relied upon Djibouti and the Somaliland Republic for port access. Last year Ethiopia and Djibouti discussed constructing a new railroad line between the two countries. Recently Ethiopia announced that it had reached a deal with two major construction companies to extend and improve its railroad network. One company is Turkish and the other is Chinese. The project is long term, but by 2020 Ethiopia plans to have an additional 5,000 kilometers of railroad track. The project is designed to improve transportation within Ethiopia but the strategically critical link is a new rail link from northern Ethiopia to Djibouti's Port Tadjourah.

The 20 Para is sometimes confused with GSU (General Service Unit), the commando unit of the national police. GSU has been around for over half a century, and is regarded as the final defense for any attempt to overthrow the government. Both GSU and 20 Para have been heavily involved in counter-terror operations, as well as suppressing the tribal wars along the borders with Uganda, Somalia and Ethiopia. These tribal feuds have gotten a lot nastier during the last two decades, as the area was flooded with cheap, Cold War surplus weapons (mainly AK-47s and RPGs.) This has given 20 Para and GSU plenty of combat experience, and a reputation for ruthlessness.

While 20 Para is technically an airborne infantry battalion (called a "regiment"), they rarely are used like that. Instead, they are regarded as the most reliable and effective unit in the army of 63,000 troops. There are believed to be only a few hundred troops in 20 Para, and when not training, they are often used for intelligence collection (usually in civilian clothes) inside Kenya. The fight against Islamic terrorism inside Kenya has used 20 Para a lot, and the "Kenyan recon patrols in Somalia" that are sometimes mentioned in the news, are probably 20 Para as well.

July 6, 2012: Kenyan Defense Forces soldiers fighting in Somalia formally joined the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM) peacekeeping force. The KDF expeditionary force in Somalia will now operate as part of AMISOM.

July 10, 2012: Ethiopian Army soldiers serving with the United Nations Interim Security Force for Abyei (UNISFA) reported that they had ended a riot in Abyei that involved members of the Dinka Ngok tribe. The Dinka Ngok were celebrating South Sudan's first year of independence. The tribesmen encountered two members of the Misseriya tribe (a pro-Sudan, predominantly Moslem tribe).

July 12, 2012: The Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) claimed that an Oromo militia force killed five Ethiopian federal police officers in the Gidda Ayana area. The OLF statement suggested a battle erupted when the police officers tried to disarm the local militia.

July 15, 2012: Egypt's new president, Mohammed Morsi, visited Ethiopia to discuss political relations. Egypt and Ethiopia remain at odds over use of Nile River water. Egyptian officials continue to argue that Ethiopia's new Grand Renaissance Dam will sharply reduce the amount of water flowing downstream.

July 18, 2012: Djibouti acknowledged that political opponents who argue that the French and U.S. bases in Djibouti make the country a terrorist target have a case. However, the government said that the terror threat is limited and can be dealt with. The Djiboutian government has said that its relationships with France and the U.S. actually provide long-term stability.

July 25, 2012: An Ethiopian opposition party announced that it had formed an alliance with three rebel groups. The Alliance for Freedom and Democracy (AFD) said it will pursue peaceful political change but the rebel groups will continue to fight. The new alliance includes the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), and the Sidama Liberation Front (SLF). The Sidama region is located in southern Ethiopia near the Kenyan border.

July 26, 2012: The Kenyan government said that it will appeal a Kenyan High Court ruling that ended the government's ban on the Mombasa Republic Council (MRC), a separatist group advocating the independence of the Mombasa region. The government regards the MRC as an outlaw organization.

August 1, 2012: Kenyan forces killed 30 Al Shabaab fighters in a battle in the Somali town of Harbole. Two Kenyan soldiers were wounded. The KDF reported that it also destroyed three Al Shabaab technical vehicles (pick-up trucks mounting machine guns). Harbole is located near the town of Afmadhow (south of Kismayo).

August 3, 2012: One person was killed and six were wounded in a bomb attack in Nairobi, Kenya. The attack occurred outside the Moi Air Base, where the headquarters of Kenya's air force is located. Police indicated that the real target may have been a supermarket located near the air base and that the suicide bomber accidentally detonated the device early. The attack is still under investigation.

August 6, 2012: Ethiopian and Somali Transitional National Government (TNG) forces are operating near the towns of Buurhakaba and Diinsoor. Buurhakaba is about 60 kilometers southeast of Baidoa. The composite group is attacking Al Shabaab positions near the town. TNG troops backed by other

Ethiopian Army units are also nearing the town of Diinsoor. Diinsoor is 100 kilometers west of Baidoa. The TNG-Ethiopian Army force reportedly engaged an Al Shabaab militia force near Diinnsoor on August 4.

August 7, 2012: Kenyan military forces will participate in a disaster response field training exercise to be held in Rwanda in October. Some 1,800 troops from East African nations will participate in the exercise.

August 8, 2012: Kenyan jet fighter-bombers attacked an Al Shabaab position in the village of Birta-Dheer north of Kismayo.

August 14, 2012: Kenyan forces have been moving closer to Kismayo. Kenya and Ethiopia have both said that they intend to attack the Somali seaport in August. It is August. Kenyan naval and air forces reportedly attacked Kismayo on August 12 and August 13. Al Shabaab claimed that five civilians died in the naval gunfire attack of August 12.

August 15, 2012: Kenyan paramilitary police killed three suspected al-Shabaab infiltrators along the Kenya-Somalia border (Lamu East district). Four infiltrators were wounded but escaped. The police also recovered three AK-47 automatic rifles.

August 16, 2012: The Kenyan military (Kenyan Defense Forces, KDF) reported that its soldiers killed 73 Al Shabaab rebels in a battle in Somalia's Fafadun region. Two Kenyan soldiers died and three were wounded in the battle. The KDF also captured 40 automatic rifles.

August 17, 2012: The Ethiopian government confirmed that Ethiopian security forces attacked a South Sudanese rebel group operating inside Ethiopia (Gambela region) on August 13. At least 18 rebels were killed in the attack while three Ethiopian soldiers were wounded. The rebel group fled from South Sudan in June after its former leader, George Athor, was killed.

August 19, 2012: The Kenyan government acknowledged that talks with southern Somali clans continue. The East African Inter-Governmental Agency for Development (IGAD) is sponsoring the talks.

Ethiopia agreed to a peace deal with the Benishangul People's Liberation Movement (BPLM) rebel group. The government said that it hoped the agreement would end an insurgency that has lasted over 17 years. The BPLM maintained base camps inside Sudan across the border from Ethiopia’s Benishangul Gumuz state. Ethiopia claimed that the Sudanese government supported the BPLM. The government and the BPLM reached a peace agreement in 2005 but that deal fell apart in 2006.

August 20, 2012: Five people were killed and three wounded when gunmen raided a village in Kenya’s Mandera West District (Kenya-Ethiopia border), while 17 people were also kidnapped and at least 70 head of cattle were stolen. The area attacked is predominantly Moslem. Many of its inhabitants are ethnic Somalis. The Mandera region (East, Central, and West) sits in the angle formed by Kenya's borders with Somalia and Ethiopia, and both the Ethiopian and Kenyan governments regard the area as being subject to attacks by Al Shabaab. However, one report indicated that the clash may involve a feud between two clans.

August 21, 2012: Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi died in Belgium at the age of 57. Meles had been ill for almost a year and was in Belgium receiving treatment for his illness. The government has yet to reveal what the illness was, though one obituary indicated he was suffering from an infection associated with the illness. Ethiopian Deputy Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn was quickly sworn in as acting prime minister. Hailemariam is Meles designated successor. Meles had led Ethiopia since 1991 (first as president then as prime minister), and was in charge during the war with Eritrea (1998-2000). He emphasized economic development. According to the World Bank, Ethiopia's GDP growth from 2000 to 2010 averaged around 8.5 percent a year – solid growth for any nation anywhere but superb for the chaotic Horn of Africa. However, he was also a tough autocrat who jailed, physically intimidated, and systematically repressed his domestic political opponents. He was regarded as a staunch enemy of Islamist militants and a reliable ally of the U.S. Ethiopian government officials emphasized that there would be no change in Ethiopian policy despite Meles' death. However, when strong men do die, the possibility of a power vacuum and subsequent power struggle is very real.

August 22, 2012: Kenya reported that 52 people died in tribal fighting in the Tana River district (Coast province, southeastern Kenya). Members of the Orma and Pokomo ethnic groups fought over cattle grazing rights.
Most of the slain died from machete wounds, though several people were burned alive when their huts were set on fire. In 2001, around 130 people died in tribal fighting between the Orma and Pokomo.

August 27, 2012: One person was killed in the Kenyan port of Mombasa as rioting Moslems fought with police in the wake of Moslem cleric Sheik Aboud Rogo being murdered in Mtwapa (a suburb of Mombasa) when the van he was traveling in was ambushed and sprayed with automatic weapons fire. Rogo had been accused of recruiting fighters for Somalia's Al Shabaab Islamist group and Kenyan courts had charged Rogo with terrorism. Kenyan officials reported that Moslem rioters had attacked four churches in the Mombasa area.

August 28, 2012: Kenyan forces in Somalia still say they intend to launch an assault on the port of Kismayo. August, however, is almost over and August was supposed to be the month of the big attack on the Al Shabaab-held seaport. Kenyan naval forces have launched several gunfire attacks over the last three weeks. The attacks appear to be little more than raids intended to rattle the militiamen defending the port. One attack, however, allegedly killed several civilians. This past spring Kenyan government officials and military commanders began meeting with clan leaders in southern Somalia with the intent of getting the clans help to hammer out a political agreement for governing Kismayo and southern Somalia after Al Shabaab is evicted from the area. Kenya doesn't want Blackhawk Down Mogadishu type chaos in Kismayo and southern Somalia after the big attack. The code phrase for chaos the Kenyans are using is an administrative vacuum. Some of the talks have taken place in Nairobi, Kenya's capital. At least three major clans were involved in the discussions in Nairobi: the Marhan, Ogden, and Harti. If a power-sharing arrangement with the southern Somali clans has been made, no one is talking about it. In July Ethiopian officers indicated that Ethiopian Army units would participate in the assault on Kismayo. The speculation then was that Ethiopian armor would be valuable in the assault. There is another column marching toward Kismayo from the north, however, official reports do not mention Ethiopian forces as being part of the column, only Ugandan and Burundian military forces. A composite force consisting of African Union peacekeeping troops and Somalia Transitional National Government (TNG) troops took the fishing town of Merca on August 27. Merca is about 70 kilometers north of Kismayo.

August 29, 2012: AMISOM killed 42 Al Shabaab rebels in the Aglibah area (southern Somalia).

August 30, 2012: It's generally agreed that Eritrea is the worst country in Africa when it comes to protecting journalists. Three Eritrean journalists who were arrested in 2001 have died in prison.

August 31, 2012: Sudan's governing political party, the National Congress Party (NCP), reported that Eritrea has agreed to act as a mediator between the Sudanese government and the Sudan People's Liberation Movement-North (SPLM-N) rebel group. The SPLM-N operates in Blue Nile and South Kordofan states.

September 2, 2012: Ethiopia conducted public funeral services for its deceased prime minister, Meles Zenawi who was in power for 21 years.

September 3, 2012: Kenya charged a Kenyan Muslim cleric with inciting violent protests in Kenya's main port city, Mombasa. The accused, Abubaker Ahmed, denied the charges. Riots broke out in Mombasa after gunmen killed Aboud Rogo Mohammed, a senior Muslim cleric. Kenya and the U.S. claimed that both clerics have ties to Al Shabaab.

Spanish police recently seized 22,272 pistols which were being smuggled to Djibouti. Customs inspectors found the weapons in a container which was supposedly carrying textiles from Turkey to the port of Djibouti.

Kenya claimed that their airstrikes in Somalia killed 31 Al Shabaab fighters, along with some civilians.

September 4, 2012: Kenyan warships shelled the Kismayo port area twice and airfield three times. Locals also say Al Shabaab fighters were test firing weapons mounted on their technical vehicles (armed trucks and SUVs).

September 5, 2012: Kenya confirmed that AMISOM forces are preparing for an attack on the Somali port of Kismayo. Kenya now has 5,000 troops in Somalia, all of them deployed in southern Somalia.

September 6, 2012: Djibouti's Group d'Intervention de la Genarmerie Nationale (GIGN) is participating in a four-week long training exercise with U.S. forces. The GIGN is Djibouti's elite crisis response unit and is manned by both military and police personnel. The course includes training in combat emergency medical techniques and close quarters combat.

Kenyan police found at least 150 bomb detonators in a house in a suburb of Nairobi. The police believe the detonators may link to the Al Shabaab terrorist organization.

September 7, 2012: The Kenyan government reported that 12 people died in a new series of clashes in the Tana River area. One of the most serious took place near the town of Tarasaa. The Pokomos said that a group of Orma tribesmen attacked their village.

September 10, 2012: The Ethiopian government announced that it will pardon and free two Swedish journalists who were accused of providing aid to rebel groups.

September 11, 2012: Kenyan forces, along with Somali government troops, took the town of Harbolle. The AMISOM forces claimed that 50 Al Shabaab fighters died in fighting in and around the town.

September 12, 2012: The Ethiopian government confirmed that it will continue to pursue peace negotiations with the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) rebel group. Ethiopian and ONLF representatives met in Nairobi, Kenya on September 7 and 8, and conducted preliminary discussions. The ONLF operates in the Ogaden desert region, which borders on Somalia. The Ethiopian announcement comes two days after an ONLF website claimed that Ethiopian security forces had massacred 14 civilians in the Wardher region on September 6.

Egypt and Ethiopia have agreed to continue discussions about water rights in the Nile River basin. Egypt now has a population of around 83 million and its Ministry of Water Resources wants to increase Egypt's allotment. Ethiopia points out that it has 85 million people and that the various treaties governing Nile water allotments ignore the rights of upstream states (like Ethiopia). Ethiopia has begun work on the Renaissance Dam on the Blue Nile which will eventually create a lake with an estimated 65 billion cubic meters of water --- water that is obviously not heading downstream to Egypt.

There are also the usual logistical problems that crop up when multi-national forces conduct, or at least try to conduct, coordinated operations. Some of the national contingents have radios that are incompatible with one another. There are also allegations of political in-fighting among some of the national contingents. Kenya and Uganda reportedly disagree over pending assignments within AMISOM. Peacekeepers get paid in hard currency and the billets are considered to be good jobs, especially compared to a soldier's work back home. Uganda has also accused Kenya of using its diplomatic clout to get choice AMISOM assignments for its senior officers. (Austin Bay)

September 14, 2012: Kenyan and Somali troops, along with fighters from the pro-Somali government Raskamboni militia attacked Al Shabaab positions in the Bibi area (60 kilometers northwest, along the road to Afmadow, from the Al Shabaab-held port of Kismayo). Despite the news of the victory at Bibi, the big attack on the Al Shabaab-held Somali port of Kismayo appears to be delayed – again. AMISOM (African Union Mission in Somalia) peacekeeping forces have deployed in a loose cordon about 60 kilometers from the port (like the new position at Bibi). Kenyan naval vessels occasionally conduct gun and missile attacks on the port. So what are the problems? The major problem is with which anti-al Shabaab clans (who have been aiding the Kenyans) will control what in a liberated Kismayo. AMISOM is also concerned about civilian refugees. They also want to limit civilian casualties. AMISOM would like to empty the port of some 180,000 civilians but does not want Al Shabaab to take advantage of an evacuation operation by having its fighters slip out of the city along with the evacuees. This tracks with previous statements from AMISOM but from Kenya in particular. Kenya does not want to leave a political vacuum in southern Somalia after Al Shabaab is evicted and it wants Somali clans to play a positive role in maintaining security. The fewer civilian casualties there are, the higher the likelihood that the clans will cooperate.

September 15, 2012: Ethiopia's governing party, the EPDRF (Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front), announced that acting Prime has been in power for over two decades and wants to keep it that way. The ruling party is actually a multi-ethnic coalition (mainly Amharas, Oromos, and Tigrayans) that negotiates disputes rather than risking civil wars.

Minister Hailemariam Desalegn will become prime minister. Hailemariam succeeds the recently deceased prime minister Meles Zenawi. The EPDRF

September 17, 2012: Tribal cross-border raids remain a problem for Ethiopian and Kenyan security forces. Both governments are trying to improve surveillance and security along their mutual border. The Kenyan government is trying to address long-simmering tribal conflicts in other areas as well, especially in its north-eastern region which borders Somalia. In August and again earlier this month an outbreak of serious inter-tribal fighting occurred in Kenya's Coast province. The fighting between the Orma tribe (herders) and the Pokomo tribe (farmers) led the Kenyan parliament (on September 12) to pass a resolution authorizing the Kenyan military to intervene in the fighting. The Kenyan government knows that the Somali Islamist group Al Shabaab wants to exploit ethnic, religious, and political divisions inside Kenya.

October 1, 2012: Kenyan naval vessels shelled Al Shabaab coastal positions in the Kismayo area as sporadic fighting continued in the area.

October 2, 2012: AMISOM units extended their control over the Somali port of Kismayo. Al Shabaab fighters claimed they set off a bomb in the port. They also said they would launch further attacks on AMISOM soldiers. The Somali government estimated the Al Shabaab still has between 4,000 and 5,000 fighters in southern Somalia.

Ethiopia released 75 Eritreans captured in March during a cross border raid on a military camp. The prisoners were Eritrean soldiers and Ethiopia held them as prisoners of war. Seven of the released Eritrean applied for political asylum in Ethiopia.

October 9, 2012: Kenya claimed that its military forces killed over 3,000 Al Shabaab fighters since it intervened in Somalia in October 2011. Kenya lost 22 soldiers in Somalia.

October 11, 2012: Ethiopian troops in armored vehicle and trucks are reportedly massed in the Somali border town of Luq. A Somali National Army (SNA) commander reported that the Ethiopian soldiers are preparing for a major offensive on Al Shabaab controlled territory.

October 12, 2012: Al Shabaab has threatened Kenya with further retribution for its involvement in Somalia. An Al Shabaab spokesman vowed to wage war on Kenyan soil.

October 14, 2012: Kenya held ceremonies commemorating Kenya Defense Forces Day. This is also the first anniversary of Kenya's intervention in Somalia.

October 15, 2012: A Kenyan municipal leader was hacked to death in the Coast province town of Kwale. Police called the man's murder a revenge slaying for the arrest of Mombasa Republican Council (MRC) leader Omar Mwanbyadzi. A gunfight broke out when police arrested Mwanbyadzi and two people died in the firefight.

Kenya charged Sheik Mohammed Dor with inciting violence in the country. Dor is a member of parliament and represents a Muslim area. Dor denied the charges. He is also accused of supporting the Mombasa Republican Council (MRC). The MRC is a separatist organization which favors secession for the Coast province.

October 16, 2012: Somali government and Kenyan military forces said that they are confronting a security vacuum in the city of Kismayo. Somali forces have arrested several dozen suspected Al Shabaab fighters in the port city.

October 17, 2012: A grenade attack in Coast state wounded ten Kenyan policemen. The policemen were searching a house and had found a weapons cache. Police attributed the grenade attack to the Somali Al Shabaab. Kenyan authorities believe Al Shabaab is responsible for several grenade attacks and shootings in Coast state that have occurred this year.

October 18, 2012: Peace negotiations between Ethiopia and the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF) have broken down again. Kenya was serving as the mediator in the newest round of talks. The ONLF said that Ethiopia had demanded that the rebel group recognize the authority of the Ethiopian constitution as a pre-condition for talks. The ONLF said that the condition was unacceptable because the talks were supposed to begin without pre-conditions. There is a Kismayo connection to the talks. Many ethnic Ogaden Somalis live in Kismayo and surrounding areas. Kenya had hoped that positive negotiations between the ONLF and Ethiopia would help improve political cooperation among Ogaden clans in southern Somalia.

October 20, 2012: The African Union peacekeeping operation Somalia (AMISOM) is touting the seizure of the Somali port of Kismayo as a victory but one that does not signal the defeat of the Somali Al Shabaab Islamist militia. The Kenyan military performed extremely well in the latter phases of the attack on the port and Kenyans are proud of the Kenya Defense Force's (KDF) achievements. However, diplomats in the Horn of Africa know the real victor in Somalia is Ethiopia. The Kenyans were more acceptable military interveners than the Ethiopians because so many Somalis regard the Ethiopians as invaders, even if a large majority of Somalis oppose Al Shabaab. Ethiopia is the geographic nexus of the horn. It borders on Sudan, South Sudan, Eritrea, Djibouti, Somalia, and Kenya. It is also the region's economic powerhouse.

Ethiopia's alliance with Kenya gives it a reliable security partner in the Horn. Trouble with Islamist Sudan (northern Sudan) brought Kenya and Ethiopia together. Tribal disturbances along the Kenya-Ethiopia border forced their governments to work together on bi-lateral security issues. The Somali experience, however, has sealed that alliance. (Austin Bay)

October 23, 2012: Ethiopia continues to congratulate itself on the peaceful (so far) transition of power following the death of Meles Zenawi in August' Meles Zenawi ruled Ethiopia for 21 years. Ethiopia has also had a history of very violent power transitions. The new prime minister, Hailemariam Desalegn, was Meles hand picked successor, so he arrived with the mantle of authority. Meles made Hailemariam his second-in-command in 2010, and, in retrospect, it appears Meles had a power transfer plan in mind. Ethiopia has new national elections in 2015.

November 14, 2012: Kenyan Military To Hunt Killers Of Police'

Kenya's President Mwai Kibaki has ordered Kenyan security forces to hunt down suspected cattle rustlers believe to have killed more than 32 police officers. Kenya's President Mwai Kibaki has ordered security forces to hunt down suspected cattle rustlers believe to have killed more than 32 police officers. There has been blunt warning to the culprits from the military. Kenya's military have issued a warning to cattle raiders as they prepared to go to northwest Kenya to crack down on an armed group which killed more than 32 police officers in an ambush. The military said cattle raiders should be prepared "to die because it is easy for the government to compensate their loss of life." The Kenyan Human Rights Commission, Samuel Tororei, condemned these remarks saying warnings of this sort were not prudent. "The police should have issued a warning, urging the rustlers to stop their criminal acts, but threatening them with death is against human rights principles." The killings came as the government was trying to media between the Turkana community, which reportedly stole cattle from the Samburus tribe, and accusation followed counter-accusation.

Cattle raiding is rife in Samburu partly because the area borders on countries with a history of civil wars and conflicts, such as South Sudan and Ethiopia, in which small arms are readily available. Such weapons are easily smuggled into Samburu. But the scale of deployment by the Kenyan military had yet to be decided. Military spokesman Major Emmanuel Chirchir said they were waiting for our formal instructions and directions from the National Security Council before "we make any decisions about the size and scale of any deployment." Force or coercion used to obtain information. Meanwhile, hundreds of civilians are fleeing the area, fearing their lives will be in danger when security forces start their hunt for the attackers who killed police officers. President Mwai Kibaki and other government official said they were committed to bringing peace to the area. "No part of this country can be safe haven for bandits," said the president said in a statement. The crackdown will also involve the disarming the pastoral communities, which analysts fear will be a challenging excise for the Kenyan security forces. "We have witnessed a number of cases in which Kenyan security operators are reported to have used force or coercion in order to secure information and get groups disarmed," Emmanuel Kisiangani, Kenya expert at the International Crisis Group told DW's Africalink show.

Although clashes over cattle, land and water are frequent among tribes in Kenya, Samburu's violence and the kind of weapons used in Samburu has shocked many. Those weapons include rocket-propelled grenades. "I think it is time to equip the police with armoured vehicles so that they are better protected," said Police Commissioner Mathew Iteere said. Pressure to improve the force is mounting as Kenya heada to the polls in March next year. Elections in 2007 left 1, 200 people dead and displaced around 300,000 in ethnic related violence.

November 16, 2012: East Africa: Cassava Virus on Verge of Epidemic in Region'

Revealation: NAIROBI — A new variant of a cassava disease is affecting large parts of East Africa, especially in the area's Great Lakes Region, putting a crucial source of food and income at risk, according to the UN Food and Agriculture Organization. FAO experts say Cassava Brown Streak Disease (CBSD) is on the verge of becoming an epidemic, and have called for an urgent increase in funding, research, training, surveillance and other measures to help farmers and breeders. The appearance of the disease in previously unaffected areas, and the lack of continued funding for research and development work to address CBSD in the region, have added to the threat already presented by Cassava Mosaic Disease (CMD). In Rwanda, a surveillance analysis conducted by the National Agricultural Research Institute in 2010 showed a 15.7 percent rate of infection on local varieties and 36.9 percent in improved varieties. "None of the cassava varieties currently being distributed to farmers seem to be tolerant to the effects of CBSD. We urgently need to get information on the extent and severity of the outbreak, and to support investments to identify disease-tolerant varieties and coping strategies for farmers," said Jan Helsen, leader of FAO's European Union-funded Regional Cassava Initiative in Eastern and Central Africa.

Hidden signs: One of the challenges facing those who are trying to stem the spread of CBSD is timely detection of the disease. "The disease manifests itself in different ways depending on local conditions. In some cases it shows symptoms only on the roots. An apparently healthy plant may be found to have spoiled roots only when harvested, with obvious consequences for food security," Helsen explained. Cassava can account for as much as a third of the total calorie intake for people in countries such as Burundi, Rwanda, Uganda or DRC. "Thanks to the foresight of, and the scientific support from, the International Institute of Tropical Agriculture (IITA), efforts are underway to understand the epidemiology of the disease, but more support will be needed for this work, and to select and bring on CBSD-tolerant varieties," Helsen added.

Key staple: Short-term measures needed to tackle CBSD include stepping up disease surveillance and conducting regular inspections; increasing the sensitization of communities to the threat of CBSD; and using hands-on training for farmers, like FAO's farmer field schools, to introduce community-based practices to prevent the introduction or spread of the disease, such as the removal of infected plants. Recommended measures also include banning the distribution of infected plants between districts and zones, and, in the event of infection, using coping strategies such as the early harvest of cassava, before symptoms appear and significant damage can be done.

Building resilience: Since around 2006, FAO and the Catholic Relief Services (CRS) have implemented two regional cassava projects, funded respectively by the European Union and the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, to support vulnerable farmers affected first by CMD and now by CBSD. The projects have provided access to clean, or virus-free, planting material. The projects aim to develop capacity in disease preparedness and strengthen the resilience of farmers to outbreaks of both diseases. "Fortunately, there are now eight varieties under development by IITA and its national partners in the region which are resistant to Cassava Mosaic Disease and which show some level of tolerance to CBSD. Under existing programme arrangements, these varieties could be made widely available in the next 18-24 months, assuming that resources can be identified to support multiplication and distribution activities," said Helsen.Helsen says National Cassava Steering Committees have been set up to manage the response to the disease, but they need more time and funds to ensure that some of the CBSD-tolerant varieties in the pipeline can be multiplied and made available across the region.

Next steps:More extensive surveillance will be carried out in Rwanda again this year, along with Burundi and the DRC, which will give a more complete picture of the occurrence and spread of the disease. To help raise awareness of the impact of the disease, FAO and CRS are currently undertaking a rapid survey on the impact of CBSD on household food security across the region. Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (Rome)

November 16, 2012: East Africa: Urgent Action Needed to Stem Cassava Virus Threatening Region - UN Agency' Updates: The United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) is urging swift action to tackle a cassava virus that is affecting large parts of East Africa and threatening a staple food crop for much of the region. The Cassava Brown Streak Disease (CBSD), a new variant that is particularly affecting countries in the Great Lakes region, is on the verge of becoming an epidemic, according to a news release issued today by the Rome-based FAO. The agency has called for an urgent increase in funding, research, training, surveillance and other measures to help farmers and breeders. "The appearance of the disease in previously unaffected areas, and the lack of continued funding for research and development work to address CBSD in the region, have added to the threat already presented by Cassava Mosaic Disease (CMD)," stated the agency. Cassava can account for as much as a third of the total calorie intake for people in countries such as Burundi, Rwanda, Uganda and the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC). Surveillance conducted by Rwanda's National Agricultural Research Institute in 2010 showed a 15.7 per cent rate of infection on local varieties and 36.9 per cent in improved varieties. "None of the cassava varieties currently being distributed to farmers seem to be tolerant to the effects of CBSD," said Jan Helsen, leader of FAO's European Union-funded Regional Cassava Initiative in Eastern and Central Africa. "We urgently need to get information on the extent and severity of the outbreak, and to support investments to identify disease-tolerant varieties and coping strategies for farmers." FAO noted that timely detection of the disease has been a challenge because it manifests itself in different ways depending on local conditions. An apparently healthy plant may be found to have spoiled roots only when harvested. The agency is calling for short-term measures such as stepping up disease surveillance and conducting regular inspections increasing the sensitization of communities to the threat of CBSD and using hands-on training for farmers. It is also recommending a ban on the distribution of infected plants between districts and zones, and, in the event of infection, using coping strategies such as the early harvest of cassava, before symptoms appear and significant damage can be done.

January 24, 2013: Kenya civil society group urged government to end abuse of refugees'

A number of civil society groups, including the Jesuit Refugee Service, strongly urged the Kenyan government on Tuesday to end police harassment and abuse of refugees and protect the basic human rights of all refugees and Kenyan citizens. "Since the Kenyan government announced in December that all refugees and asylum-seekers in Nairobi should move to Dadaab and Kakuma camps, we have seen a dramatic increase in attacks on refugees and Kenyans of ethnic Somali origin", said

Lucy Kiama, Executive Director of the Refugee Consortium of Kenya speaking on behalf of the Urban Refugee Protection Network (URPN), an umbrella organization of agencies promoting human rights of refugees in Kenyan cities. "Worryingly, the harassment and abuse are perpetrated not only by criminal gangs but also by the very law enforcement officials who are supposed to protect everyone in this country", Lucy Kiama added.

"We have also seen an increase in police-round ups, arbitrary arrests and harassment of refugees and persons of specific ethnicities by security officers in Nairobi. The URPN has documented reports of extortion, physical abuse and loss of property". URPN said these incidents were sparked by the government's 18 December order for all Somali refugees and asylum seekers to move to Dadaab Refugee Camp northeastern Kenya, and for all other refugees and asylum seekers in the country to move to Kakuma refugee camp in the northwest of the country. The groups also voiced concerns about media coverage which they said links refugees to insecurity without producing evidence. "This has aggravated xenophobic attitudes towards refugees and asylum seekers who are law-abiding people seeking protection from persecution and conflict in their home countries", said Solomon Wasia, Programme Coordinator on Forced Migration, Kituo Cha Sheria.

"Refugees and asylum seekers are not a threat to national security". At the same time, URPN said it condemned all acts of terrorism and that it remains committed to helping the Kenyan government to build a strong asylum system – which would exclude criminals from refugee status, as is the practice in international law. The group also raised concerns over the instruction from the Ministry of Provincial Administration and Internal Security to the Ministry of Special Programmes to offer humanitarian assistance during the relocation as this sort of activity is not an emergency but a deliberate action and holding refugees at Thika Municipal Stadium amounts to arbitrary detention.

The URPN calls on all security officers to respect fundamental human rights and for all members of the general public to be tolerant of all persons regardless of nationality as we strive to work towards efforts for collective security and protection of human rights for all. The Urban Refugee Protection Network (URPN) is a coordination forum comprising of agencies working on protection and the promotion of human rights and welfare of refugees in urban areas in Kenya. Refugee Consortium of Kenya (RCK), Kituo Cha Sheria (KCS), Kenya Human Rights Commission (KHRC), Heshima Kenya, Centre for Domestic Training and Development (CDTD), HIAS Refugee Trust of Kenya (HIAS), Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS), International Rescue Committee , RefugePoint, Katiba Institute.

Notes to editors: The Jesuit Refugee Service focuses on the issue of urban refugees through global advocacy campaigns, as well as with educational and livelihoods programmes for refugees living in urban areas. Specifically in Eastern Africa, JRS works to assist refugees in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia; Nairobi, Kenya; and Kampala, Uganda. JRS is a member of the Urban Refugee Protection Network (URPN).

February 11, 2013: Two playful lions at Nairobi streets stop traffic'

Nairobi - Kenya: Two lions brought rush-hour traffic to a standstill in Nairobi, Kenya when they decided to have a lie down in the middle the street. It was during the morning commute on the the edge of the Nairobi National Park that two young males appeared on the side of the road and strolled out in front of cars and trucks for a roll-around. The African lions' antics caused tail backs as they found the busy road the perfect place to rub themselves in buffalo faeces, Amateur South African snapper Gareth Jones was one of the drivers stuck in the traffic jam last month and decided to get out and photograph the unique scene at 6.40am.

February 12, 2013: Kenya Presidential Debate-2013 - The historic Electoral debate took place’

Candidates and their political party: Mohammed Abduba Dida, ARC, Raila Odinga, CORD Coalition, Uhuru Kenyatta, Jubilee Alliance, Musalia Mudavadi, Amani Coalition Martha Karua, MP, NARC-Kenya, Peter Kenneth, MP, Eagle Alliance, James ole Kiyiapi, RBK, Paul Muite, Safina

February 20, 2013: Landlocked Neighbours Worried By Possible Kenya Poll Violence'

Kenya's landlocked neighbours are stocking up on fuel and food to prevent the kind of disruption they suffered after being cut off from the port of Mombasa by angry rioters following a disputed election five years ago. About 200 million people in Uganda, Rwanda, Burundi, South Sudan and eastern Congo could be affected if Kenya goes through a fresh bout of fighting when it holds presidential and parliamentary elections on March 4. The port of Mombasa serves its wide hinterland with imports that include oil, clinker which is used to make cement, steel, bitumen for road construction and second-hand cars, while the main exports include tea, coffee, and horticultural products.

Some 95 percent of all the cargo coming in through the port is trucked by road. Truck drivers at a weigh bridge in the small town of Athi River on the fringes of the capital Nairobi said there were already fears of violence."Everybody is scared about the elections, especially the foreign truck drivers. Last time some of us were attacked and goods were lost," said Charles Mburu, 36, who has driven trucks for the last eight years. "Our employers are not just insuring the goods and trucks, but also the drivers. You have to be certain that they will compensate you in case of an attack." Supporters of Prime Minister Raila Odinga, the opposition leader at the last vote, claimed he lost his bid for the Kenyan presidency after President Mwai Kibaki rigged the vote, setting off a bloodbath in which more than 1,200 people were killed and 300,000 displaced. After the December 2007 election, machete-wielding youths blocked roads and looted trucks they had hijacked. They burnt tyres to cut the road from the port and uprooted railway lines, strangling trade to Uganda, Rwanda and Burundi for weeks. Odinga is back in the race for the presidency, and has a narrow lead over Deputy Prime Minister Uhuru Kenyatta, according to opinion polls, raising the spectre of a close vote and a possible dispute over the result. Kenya, Uganda and Tanzania all suffered inflationary pressures in 2008 due to the impact of the post-election crisis that damaged regional growth. This pushed Uganda's headline inflation rate to over 10 percent in January 2008, while the country's revenue body reported daily revenue losses of up to $600,000. Burundi's top hard currency earners coffee and tea were also hit hard - the tiny landlocked country transports over 80 percent of its produce through Kenya. "Our tea stocks in Bujumbura expired for consumption because we could not export or send it to Mombasa," said Jacques Bigirimana, commercial director at state-run tea board.

PLAN B: Banks and importers have been taking defensive positions by buying dollars in Kenya and Uganda, traders said. The Uganda shilling hit a 14-month low against the dollar on Jan. 4 due to aid cuts by at least five western countries, including Uganda's biggest bilateral donor Britain, after officials in the prime minister's office were accused of embezzlement, and jitters over election violence in Kenya. The Kenyan shilling has also taken a knock from the cautious importers stockpiling dollars, and is down 1.7 percent so far this year, despite the central bank selling dollars to shore up the local currency. "If chaos breaks out in Kenya again, both the currencies will come under serious pressure due to investor flight," said Ignatius Chicha, head of markets at Citibank in Nairobi. To mitigate against disruption of the supply of goods, the company operating Kenya's railway system has bolted down the railway track to prevent any chance that it may be damaged.

Opposition supporters in Nairobi's Kibera slums, one of Africa's largest urban settlements, manually uprooted miles of railway tracks in protest at what they said was a stolen vote, preventing the cargo from reaching Uganda. "There is a learning curve from what happen in 2008," said Karim Sadek, the managing director of Egypt's Citadel Capital, owner of a Kenyan company that manages its railway line. "God forbid, if anything happens, we will of course have contingencies. I won't be sitting here, saying it won't affect the business, it will affect the business, seriously," he said. "In the flash areas where violence happened last time, we've welded the rail. So 10 km of rail is a heavy proposition to lift," he said. Companies with a regional presence also said they would take steps to prevent being caught unawares again. The Ugandan unit of Shell is building large reservoirs of fuel as a back up at Jinja, east on the capital Kampala on the shore of Lake Victoria. "... We're building up some reserves on our own and some other oil companies are doing the same, and that collective effort gives a good back up," Ivan Kyayonka, Shell Uganda's country manager said.

Abid Alam, managing director of one of Uganda's biggest constructions firms, the Alam Group, said his firm had bought huge stocks of raw materials to prepare for any disruptions. Alam said last time around his company suffered badly, with fuel and other supplies disrupted. "This time there's a lot of uncertainty surrounding the forthcoming elections and it is scary to use the Mombasa-Uganda-Rwanda transport corridor," Alam said. "Mombasa must not be looked at as a Kenyan port but a regional port that must be secured from any internal political strife." Kenya's Bidco Oil Refineries, one of the largest consumer goods maker with exports across the region, said it has already moved stocks to neighbouring countries to avoid disruption. "We've taken measures to ensure that all our clients are well stocked both in Kenya and outside," said Vimal Shah, its chief executive officer.

'NOT A SINGLE DROP': Worsening security in Kenya would also mean aid groups could be unable to reach millions of people displaced in fighting in eastern Congo who may be going hungry, a spokeswoman for the World Food Programme (WFP) said. The United Nations agency, which distributes more than 400,000 tonnes of food to nearly seven million people in east, central and southern Africa annually, has also made plans for supplies to be moved through Kenya to Uganda. The agency also plans to have its ships dock in the port of Dar es Salaam in Kenya's neighbour Tanzania, and Djibouti. "We have moved most of the food stocks we will need downstream to Eldoret and Tororo," Challiss McDonough, WFP's spokeswoman in the region, said, referring to the north-western town of Eldoret near the border with Uganda, and Tororo, just inside the landlocked country. The stocks could last for two months, she added. The Mombasa port handled 22 million tonnes of cargo last year, up from 20 million tonnes in 2011, with about two-thirds of the total traffic of cargo destined to its neighbours, meaning they almost totally depend on its smooth operation.

February 22, 2013: Kenya's Elections - Rebuilding Reputation - Chatham House (London)

Analysis: Kenya is preparing for the first general election since the disputed contest in 2007, and the weight of expectation - both domestic and international - is huge. The country's international reputation as a safe, stable democracy with a burgeoning economy and good international ties built on commerce and tourism was ripped away by the violence that followed the 2007 election. Over 1,000 Kenyans died in inter-communal clashes, and almost 700,000 were displaced. The election on 4 March will be the most complex that Kenya has ever faced. This is the first election since the new constitution was introduced in 2010 as part of a process of reform aimed at addressing some of the grievances that contributed to 2007's violence. Since independence in 1963, political power in Kenya was becoming increasingly concentrated in the hands of an ever-narrowing group of elites close to the presidency.

To address this, the 2010 constitution initiated a process of devolution and Kenyans will now vote for six representatives on polling day. However, the process of educating voters about their new civic rights and the counting of votes has not been tested on a national scale. At a recent Chatham House event, speakers expressed concern that preparation by the Independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission (IEBC) was insufficient, undermining voters' confidence that the elections will be conducted in a free and fair fashion. There are not only practical challenges to the election. In January 2012, the International Criminal Court (ICC) confirmed charges against four prominent Kenyan political figures for their alleged role in organizing the violence which blighted the last elections. Those accused of committing crimes against humanity include the presidential candidate and current Deputy Prime Minister Uhuru Kenyatta, and his running mate, the leading politician William Ruto.

Debate about the ICC's indictment rages on in Kenya and has become something of a political football. During a recent televised presidential debate, current Prime Minister and presidential candidate Raila Odinga quipped that Kenyatta would find it difficult to run Kenya's government via Skype from The Hague. While some Kenyans see the ICC's involvement as illegitimate and ill-informed international meddling, it is undeniable that the Court's involvement has had a bearing on the electoral campaign. The clearest sign of this is the uniting of Kenyatta and Ruto on a Jubilee Alliance ticket. These political figures, and the Kikuyu and Kalenjin communities which they respectively represent, were on opposing sides at the last election, and their collaboration lessens the chance of ethnic violence between the communities they represent.

Many of Kenya's international partners have had to tread a delicate line between supporting the ICC process as the best means for finding justice for the post-election violence in 2007, and not appearing to favour any presidential candidate. The dedication of technical assistance to the IEBC by 23 High Commissioners and ambassadors may prove to be the sort of international involvement that is welcomed by the majority of Kenyans. Kenya's importance in East Africa will also be thrown into relief if the election is badly-run or met by violence. The port at Mombasa is an economic lifeline for land-locked countries in the region, and so reports that Uganda, Rwanda and South Sudan are stocking up on fuel and food in case election violence disrupts the flow of goods from Mombasa, do not come as a surprise. Prolific discussion of the elections in Kenya's active media outlets and on social media demonstrate how significant the March elections are for Kenya. Open debate plays a significant positive balance to the potential pitfalls of the process. The smooth running of these elections would go some way to restore the international reputation of the country, but far more important would be what it signifies for Kenyans - that the process of improving political representation and dismantling a culture of impunity is well underway. Adjoa Anyimadu is a Research Assistant for the Africa Programme

February 22, 2013: Kenya-Ethiopia Power Project Bids Finalised'

THE tender for the construction of the 1000-km long Kenya-Ethiopia power line will be advertised next week with construction scheduled to begin before the end of the year , the Kenya Electricity Transmission Company said yesterday. Apart from the transmission line, converter stations will be erected at Wolayta-Sodo (Ethiopia) and Suswa (Kenya), with a power transfer capacity of up to 2,000MW. The contractors for the converter stations have already been shortlisted, according to Ketraco managing director Joel Kiilu. The project, that will link Kenya and Ethiopia's power grids has received all the required fundings and will take an estimated 36 months and should be operational by 2017. Ethiopia has a more stable power output and its power is also cheaper than Kenya's. Kenya hopes the project will lead to lower energy costs and attract more investors. A government study on the least-cost power development plan by the ministry of energy has recognised that power imports from neigbouring countries are cost effective. The integration of the power systems is hoped will create a "power pool" plugging into Ethiopia's massive hydro-power resources, enabling Ethiopia to sell its surplus electricity to Kenya. The $1.26 billion (Sh107.1 billion) cross-border power line will be co-financed by the two governments, World Bank, AfDB and the French Agency for Development. Plans are also afoot to put up a new 127 km line between Lesos and Tororo at a cost of Sh4.9 billion to link the power grids of Kenya and Uganda. Work on this project is expected to kick off in April this year. Ketraco has however raised concern over the high compensation amount for the affected communities. The company, that was formed in 2008, said it has so far paid out Sh3 billion as compensation. Source: The Star

March 2, 2013: Kenya 2013: Somaliland for Raila Odinga'

Electoral Campaign: Could Raila Odinga finally be that neighbour with sugar? The Republic of Kenya will be electing a new President for the first time since the 2007 Presidential election that was marred by violence and corruption. The world will be closely watching the outcome of the election with hopes of Kenya redeeming itself from the past election.

Their neighbors are also paying considerable attention towards the election. The people of Somaliland are keeping a keen eye on the Presidential election to see who will lead their neighboring country. At a time where the Horn of Africa has recently seen a change of leadership, the government of Somaliland remains hopeful of achieving statehood. Ethopia's former strongman Meles Zenawi passed away last summer and was replaced by youthful Deputy PM & Foreign Minister Hailemariam Desalegn. Somalia moved on from its transitional period and selected rookie politician Hassan Sheik Mohamud as their new President. President Mohamud has picked up where the transitional government left off by preparing to continue the talks between Somaliland and Somalia. Prime Minister Hailemariam has picked up exactly where Zenawi has left off, maintaining Ethiopia's close – but not close enough – relations with Somaliland. Kenya's outgoing President, Mwai Kibaki, hasn't acknowledged or reached out to Somaliland during his two terms as President and just as Kenyans are eager see him go, Somalilanders are ready for change as well.

The presumed front runner, Raila Odinga, is no stranger to Somaliland. During his tenure as PM, he's gone to unexpected heights by inviting and welcoming delegations from Somaliland. He met with several ministers including the Foreign Minister of Somaliland, Mohamed Abdullahi Omar. Odinga is the only high-ranking politician in Africa to do so. His fellow party members have also made headlines declaring their support for the Republic of Somaliland. Richard Onyonka, Kenya's Assistant Minister of Foreign Affairs and ODM party member, announced in May 2011 that his government supports the independence of Somaliland and that he would advocate for its recognition. This time around, if Odinga is elected, the international attention that we've tirelessly been yearning for will fall in to place. That doesn't mean we will achieve recognition right away. In 2011, the world welcomed South Sudan as a new country and it enlightened the people of Somaliland. We prematurely assumed that we would be granted recognition and follow their steps to statehood. A year and a half later, South Sudan hasn't made any effort to explore the idea that we've dreamed of. This is an example why it is imperative that we keep in mind that a new relationship with Kenya – if Odinga is elected- will be built slowly and carefully.

We will likely see an Odinga government that will start focusing on enhancing Kenya's current diplomatic relations with Somaliland. There will be a primary focus on battling Al-Shabaab. After Kenya was devastated by terrorist attacks within the past year, an Odinga government will be looking for support to achieve this. The current Somaliland government's strong attitude towards national security and its efforts of countering Al-Shabaab is exactly what Odinga will be after and it will beyond any doubt strengthen our relations. Raila Odinga has reached out to Somaliland when our calls have been ignored. From his years as an opposition politician to PM of Kenya, His sincerity and loyalty towards Somaliland hasn't been seen before by any African politician. As he rose through the ranks, he hasn't forgotten us. And as he seeks the highest office in Kenya, we wish him nothing but the best. Indepth Africa by Robleh M. Lafcanbe

March 4, 2013: Kenya votes in tight elections after deadly attacks'

Agence-France Presse: Long lines of Kenyans queued from way before dawn to vote Monday in the first election since the violence-wracked polls five years ago, with a deadly police ambush hours before polling started marring the key ballot. The tense elections are seen as a crucial test for Kenya, with leaders vowing to avoid a repeat of the bloody 2007-8 post-poll violence in which over 1,100 people were killed and observers repeatedly warning of the risk of renewed conflict. Voters standing for hours in snaking lines several hundreds of metres (yards) long -- and several people thick -- crowded peacefully outside polling stations to take part in one of the most complex elections Kenya has ever held. People beganlining up outside polling stations from as early as 4:00 am (0100 GMT) to cast their votes, two hours ahead of the official opening of the polls. In middle-class areas of Nairobi, parked cars blocked the streets around polling stations, with progress slow in some centres as malfunctioning electronic registration equipment caused delays. Ahmed Issack Hassan, Independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission (IEBC) chairman, said he was "aware of the challenges faced in various parts of the country" and were addressing them, appealing for voters to "be patient".

Tensions were high on the coast including in the port city of Mombasa where six policemen were killed in two separate attacks, including an ambush by some 200 youths armed with guns and bows and arrows, hours before the opening of polling stations. "Six policemen and six attackers were killed during the confrontation," Kenyan police chief David Kimaiyo told reporters, adding that 400 officers were being sent to the coastal province to beef up security. Kimaiyo said the attackers were suspected members of the Mombasa Republican Council (MRC), a group seeking the secession of the coastal region popular with tourists. Police have blamed the MRC for a string of attacks last year, and the group had threatened to boycott the polls. Despite the attack, voters packed the streets in the city. "We are not worried, we are voting," said architect Said Said, waiting to cast a ballot at a primary school. The Kenya National Commission on Human Rights said the attacks "were coordinated and aimed at interrupting voting in these areas." A remote-controlled bomb was also set off in the northeastern town of Mandera -- a town on the border with war-torn Somalia where Kenyan troops are battling Al-Qaeda linked insurgents -- but resulted in no casualties, police said. Slow progress but calm queues: Polling stations were supposed to close at 5:00pm but anyone in the queue by closing time will be allowed to vote. A polling station that opened one hour late will stay open for an extra hour, electoral officials said. Neck-and-neck rivals for the presidency, Prime Minister Raila Odinga and his deputy Uhuru Kenyatta, have publicly vowed there will be no repeat of the bloodshed that followed the disputed 2007 polls. Crimes against humanity trials later this year at The Hague-based International Criminal Court (ICC) for Kenyatta and running mate William Ruto have raised the stakes: should they win the vote, the president and vice-president could be absent on trial for years. Both front-runners have said they are confident of winning the absolute majority needed to avoid a second round run off vote. "We can win these elections in the first round... At the end of the day we will definitely be declared the winner," Odinga said after voting in Nairobi's Kibera shanty town, the scene of some of the worst ethnic clashes after the 2007 poll. Kenyatta, voting in his hometown of Gatundu some 90 kilometres (55 miles) north of Nairobi, said he was "ready and prepared for whatever outcome" Kenyans chose. Kenyans are casting six ballots, voting for a new president, parliamentarians, governors, senators, councillors and special women's representatives, with some 14.3 million registered voters and more than 30,000 polling stations. Preliminary results are expected within 48 hours but could take up to seven days, officials have said. Around 100,000 police have been deployed to ensure the election is peaceful, and about 23,000 observers, including 2,600 international monitors, are watching the vote, officials say. In the western town of Kisumu - the heartland of Odinga supporters who went on the rampage in 2007-2008 after he was controversially pipped to the top job by President Mwai Kibaki -- people blew whistles and sang as they waited to vote. "We slept here last night because we want real change and we want our candidate -- Raila," said Susan Morell, 30. "We want real change but we want peace. We will accept the result as it comes out because we are sure of winning."

The 2007-2008 violence exposed widespread disenchantment with the political class, deep tribal divisions and shattered Kenya's image as a beacon of regional stability. More checks are in place this time to limit vote rigging, while a new constitution devolving powers has made the poll less of a winner-take-all race.

Masai people queue to vote in Ilngarooj, Kajiado

County, Maasailand, on March 4, 2013. Long lines of Kenyans queued from way before dawn to vote in the first election since the violence-wracked polls five years ago, with a deadly police ambush hours before polling started marring the key ballot. Graphic presenting the two main candidates in Kenyan presidnetial elections. A man casts his ballot as people queue ready to vote in Mombasa on March 4, 2013. Long lines of Kenyans queued from way before dawn to vote in the first election since the violence-wracked polls five years ago, with a deadly police ambush hours before polling started marring the key ballot. Masai tribespeople leave after voting in Ilngarooj, Maasailand, on March 4, 2013. Long lines of Kenyans queued from way before dawn to vote in the first election since the violence-wracked polls five years ago, with a deadly police ambush hours before polling started marring the key ballot.

March 5, 2013: Uhuru Kenyatta takes commanding lead after half of the votes counted'

(DW) - Kenya’s deputy prime minister Uhuru Kenyatta has opened up a commanding lead as vote counting continues following the country’s presidential election. Officials though have cautioned that that the outcome of the vote remains far from clear. Preliminary results announced on Tuesday morning gave Uhuru Kenyatta a significant lead over his closest rival in the presidential race, Prime Minister Raila Odinga. With about a third of the votes counted, Kenyatta had received around 2.65 million votes to 2.05 for Odinga. This figures represented 53 and 41 percent of the counted votes respectively. Odinga appeared to remain confident about his chances, though, with a spokesman saying counting in his strongholds had not yet been completed. The head of the electoral commission also warned against jumping to conclusions and said that Kenyans will likely have to wait a couple of more days for the final results. "The law allows the commission to declare the results within seven days. Yesterday we voted. Today is the first day after the elections, " Isaak Hassan said. "We've got six more days, that is the legal position. We hope within 48 hours we will be able to announce."

Concern over high number of spoiled ballots: His comments followed complaints from the camps of both of the frontrunners about the slow pace of the vote counting. Hassan said the commission was working to speed up the process. He also expressed concern about the number of spoiled ballots cast, describing this as "quite worrying." Figures obtained by the news agency Associated Press indicated that so far, the electoral commission had found more than 300,000 spoiled ballots. Officials estimated the turnout for Monday's election at 70 percent of the country's 14 million registered voters. If no candidate wins at least 50 percent of the presidential vote, the two top finishers will face each other in a run-off election, to be held on April 11. Although many Kenyans had to stand in line for hours to cast their ballots, election day was largely peaceful, apart from a series of attacks in the Mombasa area, which killed more than a dozen people. On Tuesday, the authorities charged three suspected members of the separatist Mombasa Republican Council (MRC) with murder in connection with the deaths of four police officers killed in the election-day attacks. The group advocates the secession of the Mombasa region from Kenya to form a separate country. Fears remain about how Kenyans may react once the results of Monday's presidential election are announced. Following the 2007 vote, when President Mwai Kibaki was quickly declared the winner, supporters of Odinga, who was also a candidate back then, took to the streets to protest. Several weeks of violence ensued in which more than 1,000 people were killed. Presidential candidate and Deputy Prime Minister Kenyatta is facing criminal charges at the International Criminal Court in The Hague stemming from the 2007 violence. (DW)

March 6, 2013: A runoff between Raila Odinga and Uhuru Kenyatta is likely'

NPR) -- Kenyans on Monday held their presidential vote. Prime Minister Raila Odinga and Deputy Prime Minister Uhuru Kenyatta are the top two contenders. Kenyans were growing increasingly frustrated that the announcements of public vote tallies ceased close to 48 hours after polls closed. The breakdown of the electronic vote system has meant less than half of preliminary results were released. Officials — who have been working to ensure violence doesn't break out this election — are calling for patience. "The delay is giving rise to conspiracy theories. People are panicking about the delay in the results of the elections. But unlike last election there is a level of restraint," said Kevin Muriunge, a 25-year-old student. Referring to long voting lines during Monday's vote, Alojz Peterle, a former president of Slovenia and the chief observer in the European Union observer mission, said that Kenyans have demonstrated they are capable of great patience. "But even more patience is called for now," he said. The election commission chairman announced late Tuesday that hundreds of thousands of ballots that were rejected for not following the rules would be counted in the overall vote total. That makes it very difficult, given the tight race, for either top candidate to reach the 50 percent mark needed to win outright. Election observers from around the world said Wednesday that Kenya carried out a credible election Monday, but the groups reserved final judgments until the election process is completed. Some observers said it appeared a runoff between Odinga and Kenyatta is likely. The partial preliminary results on Tuesday had shown an early lead for Kenyatta. Odinga's camp told supporters that the votes from his strongholds had not yet all been tallied.

The statement from Kenyatta's coalition Wednesday implied that the British high commissioner pressured the commission to make the decision on the spoiled ballots, thus ensuring a runoff. John Stremlau, an election observer with The Carter Center, the body run by former U.S. President Jimmy Carter, said that it might be better for Kenyatta's coalition to use "foreign powers" as a whipping post than attacking Kenyans. "It does seem to me to be a mindset of the old colonial era that the foreign powers would be dictating to the (election commission) in any way," Stremlau said, adding later: "There are going to be accusations in every election ... and they must be backed by evidence. Show the proof and let the judges decide and we'll all be better off." Franklin Bett, an official in Odinga's party, echoed that statement. "Talk is easy. Let them come with the evidence," he said. William Ruto, Kenyatta's running mate, on Tuesday had also blamed "foreign missions" for swaying the electoral commission on its ballot decision. The decision "is meant to deny us a first-round win," Ruto was quoted as saying.

Kenya is the lynchpin of East Africa's economy and plays a vital security role in the fight against Somali militants. The U.S. Embassy in Kenya is the largest in Africa, indicating this country's importance to U.S. foreign policy. The U.S. has warned of "consequences" if Kenyatta is to win, as have several European countries. Because Kenyatta is an ICC indictee, the U.S. and Europe have said they might have to limit contact with him, even if he is president. Aisha Abdullahi, the commissioner for political affairs at the African Union, said it was good that Kenyan officials had planned for a backup system — the physical tallies of votes — given the breakdown in the electronic transmission system. He blamed the break-down on a failure of central computer servers. "Yes, we in Africa are trying to catch up with you guys with electronic things. We are not yet as proficient as Western Europe or North America," said Festus Mogae in response to a question from a European reporter. Mogae is a former president of Botswana and head of the Commonwealth observer mission. "That it's failed is no surprise to me. It often does in our countries."

March 6, 2013: Kenyans await outcome of tight presidential race'

NAIROBI (Reuters) - Kenyan authorities hope to deliver the final outcome of a presidential vote on Wednesday, after partial results gave a lead to a politician wanted in The Hague over tribal violence after the last election over five years ago. Counting since Monday's vote has been slow, and a new electronic system has been plagued by hitches, leading to complaints by political parties and anxiety among voters fearful that a flawed process could lead to another violent dispute. Deputy Prime Minister Uhuru Kenyatta, 51, has kept an early lead since results started trickling in after polls closed on Monday, but some strongholds for his rival Prime Minister Raila Odinga, 68, have yet to declare their results. The last election saw some 1,200 people killed in ethnic violence after outgoing president Mwai Kibaki was declared the victor over Odinga amid charges of voting fraud. This time, Monday's vote saw at least 15 people killed in pockets of violence but no repeat so far of unrest on such a large scale. But the biggest test of whether calm prevails will be whether the candidates and their supporters accept the outcome. The stakes are high for both candidates and a dispute over the fate of a sizable number of rejected ballots could rein in Kenyatta's early lead and raise the chances of an April runoff. The election commission has said it hopes to tally all the results on Wednesday, but has seven days from Monday's vote to declare the official outcome.

"We are afraid because we don't know what's going to happen next," said Charles Kabibi, 27, a gardener in the port city of Mombasa, whose concerns have risen with the wait. "It makes us nervous and it's just adding to the tension." Uhuru Kenyatta and his running mate, William Ruto, are both wanted in The Hague on charges of unleashing death squads after the last vote in 2007. Both men deny the charges. The United States and other Western states, big donors that view Kenya as vital in the regional battle with militant Islam, have already indicated that a victory by Kenyatta would complicate diplomatic relations.

CALL FOR CALM: Provisional results displayed by the election commission on Wednesday with just under 60 percent of polling stations still to report showed Kenyatta, son of Kenya's independence leader and one of Africa's richest men, leading with 53 percent, against 42 percent for veteran politician Odinga. But the numbers ignore more than 330,000 rejected votes counted so far, which the election commission says will now be included. Once factored in, Kenyatta's chances of securing more than 50 percent in the first round give him an outright win would be sharply eroded. "We want to believe that this is not an attempt to deny the Jubilee Coalition a first-round victory as is clearly now on the wall," Ruto told reporters, referring to a results screen. "We urge every Kenyan to be calm and very patient and await the official release of these results by the commission." He also suggested foreigners might have prompted the commission's change of heart, adding: "We are very concerned at the level of involvement of ambassadors and foreigners in canvassing for various positions around this hall." Odinga's camp has also questioned parts of the election process before, during and after the vote, hinting at the potential for legal challenges. After problems with the electronic system, the electoral commission said it would rely instead on results being delivered manually to a national tallying centre overnight. "We can confirm that our returning officers are expected to bring the physical results at anytime now, which will lead to the final results. What matters here is the final result and they are coming in," Ahmed Issack Hassan, chairman of the election commission, said late on Tuesday.

TARNISHED IMAGE: Despite the glitches, he said the vote would be fair and credible. "We therefore continue to appeal for patience from the public," he said earlier in the day. "Nobody should celebrate, nobody should complain." To try to prevent a repeat of the contested outcome that sparked the violence after the December 2007 vote, the new, broadly respected election commission is using more technology to prevent fraud, speed up counting and increase transparency. But the new system has come up short of expectations. Kenyans, who waited patiently in long lines, hope the vote will restore the nation's image as one of Africa's more stable democracies, damaged by the tribal blood-letting in 2007. Election officials said turnout was more than 70 percent of the 14.3 million eligible voters. Kenya is East Africa's biggest economy and, although led by authoritarian leaders accused of corruption for most of its half century of independence, has been spared the civil wars that devastated neighbours like Somalia, Sudan, Uganda and Rwanda.

It won support from the West for sending troops to Somalia to fight al-Shabaab Islamist militants. Highlighting the threat, an explosion struck a predominantly Somali neighbourhood in Nairobi late on Tuesday, injuring one person. Investors initially applauded peaceful voting and signs the result could yield a clear winner, strengthening the shilling against the dollar. But as Tuesday wore on and nerves about the wait set in, the currency gave up its gains. As in past elections in Kenya, much of the voting has been on ethnic lines, with Kenyatta enjoying strong support among his Kikuyu tribe, Kenya's largest, and Odinga backed by the Luo, the tribe which includes the family of U.S. President Barack Obama. In a country with a handful of large tribes and dozens of smaller ones, both candidates lead broader coalitions and are also relying on support from the tribes of their running mates. All the candidates have pledged to accept the outcome, and ordinary Kenyans speak passionately about their determination not to allow a repeat of the violence five years ago. Streets have been all but deserted with many businesses closed, including supermarkets and security personnel were beefed up countrywide in readiness for possible demonstrators."We are worried about violence and the businesses are not doing well," said Francis Mwangi, 25, a technician in Mombasa. "People are not working because they're waiting for results so they can start once more."

March 13, 2013: Kenya: protecting women and children in Kakuma Camp'

Kakuma – Bridging the gender gap and protecting women and children are priorities for most, if not all, NGOs and UN agencies in the camp. Year after year, campaigns are organised to raise awareness of the plight of women, and education and training courses seek to strengthen the position of women. Concerted efforts are made to ensure the many cases reported receive public attention and the perpetrators punished for their crimes. Yet despite the increasing camp population, 20 percent in 2012, reaching 110,000 and with further increases expected in 2013, available resources are being stretched to the limit, and tensions in and among refugee families and communities frequently reach breaking point. With the increase in the camp population, the need for protection for survivors and those at risk has grown substantially, particularly for children. The huge increase in the number of vulnerable girls in need of protection from forced marriage and child abduction means that more resources are needed to cater their needs away from those who condone the practices. Most of these girls end up with little or no access to education.

Small steps: With all this it is easy to become overwhelmed by the enormity of the problem. Yet there is also a quiet revolution taking place. Women are protected in the JRS Safe Haven; NGOs, like JRS, provide courses to help women find jobs and lend them resources to start businesses. Although it often seems like a drop in the ocean, many lives of women and their children are saved and situations changed for the better. Yet, for others, sexual- and gender-based violence (SGBV) continues to be an everyday occurrence, with hundreds of cases reported every year; the situation got so bad that in 2012 JRS dramatically increased the numbers of women-headed families in its Safe Haven facility to serve 105 survivor women and children, offering them important counselling services. Moreover, participants are also offered courses in the adult education programme, tailoring, and a pre-school for the children. The Safe Haven is a highly protected facility where SGBV survivors and persons with protection risks are admitted to heal from the trauma they may have suffered at the hands of the perpetrators. Further, during this time, durable solutions are sought to ensure that they are not exposed to the same risks again. Moreover, in 2012 JRS provided scholarships to 73 girls at risk of SGBV to pursue their education, away from the rampant violence in the camp, in Kenyan schools where they are able to study in a safer environment.

"My uncles wanted to marry me off to a very rich old man…. JRS then gave me a scholarship, protection, food and clothing. Now I know my rights and will not allow anybody to take away what belongs to me. I've taken several [vocational] courses and I know I'll get a good job when I get resettled [in another country]", said Elizabeth*, recipient of JRS protection services, vocational training courses and scholarship for vulnerable girls in Kakuma refugee camp. Some refugee women are also able to give back to others after they receive assistance. After Agnes* defied the wishes of her relatives by marrying a man from another ethnic group, they tried to kill her husband. Aware of her right to make choices, Agnes reported the matter to the police. Afterwards, JRS sponsored her education and training, and later hired her as a community counsellor. "This has helped me to build self-awareness and develop healthy coping mechanisms, including helping others facing similar situations", she said.

But there are many women in the camp who lack a basic education, who are unable to read and write in the languages used in Kenya. Not only does this prevent women from being autonomous in everyday life, as Jane* found out it can also have other consequences. After her husband beat her for the umpteenth time and tried to prevent her from seeing her children, she tried to report him. Due to her inability to speak in English or Kiswahili, she faced serious difficulties reporting him at the police station. These problems continued right through to the court process. Although Jane was not deterred, for too many other women, these obstacles would have been too much. Eventually Jane was offered protection in the JRS Safe Haven where she enrolled in adult literacy education and tailoring classes. Now she is able to communicate effectively in both Kiswahili and English. Her case was referred to court where she raised her complaints and was granted custody of her children. "Learning wasn't easy for me but I managed", Jane said with a smile of satisfaction.

Insufficient: But small steps are not enough to protect women in Kakuma camp who are frequently put at risk of SGBV when carrying out the simplest daily activities, such as collecting firewood, going to food distribution centres, hospital, or schools. More needs to be done to address the complex cultural, economic and political causes.While international and regional laws assert refugee rights and protection, the reality is far removed from these legal concepts. Patriarchal cultural practices have obstructed gender equality and especially empowerment of women in Kakuma; the socioeconomic deprivation of protracted crisis in isolated camps where the rule of law is far from guaranteed. The legal obligations of the Kenyan state and the international community have been undermined by a lack of political will. It is only through this political will, and solid investment, which prioritises the well-being of refugees, can real strides towards the reduction of sexual violence be expected.

March 16, 2013: Kenyan opposition leader Raila Odinga filed a legal challenge contesting the election results. Election officials declared that Uhuru Kenyatta won a very narrow victory. Police in Nairobi used tear gas to disperse a small crowd (100 to 150) of Odinga’s supporters. One person was injured during the demonstration. Odinga’s legal complaint alleged vote fraud, fraudulent voter registration and inaccurate counting. Odinga, however, urged his supporters to continue to avoid post-election violence. So far that is the big story in Kenya.

Despite the deep political divisions and accusations of vote fraud, the country has not experienced any significant violent clashes related to the election, and certainly nothing like the violence which followed the 2007 disputed election.

March 20, 2013: The International Criminal Court (ICC) announced that it will not drop the criminal charges against Kenya's presumed next president, Uhuru Kenyatta. Kenyatta is charged with crimes against humanity, committed in the violent aftermath of the 2007 elections that left 1,200 people dead. Kenyatta allegedly helped plan the clashes and attacks on opposition political supporters.

March 28, 2013: A gun battle erupted in the Kenyan town of Malindi when 100 members of the separatist Mombasa Republic Council (MRC) tried to storm and rob a casino. The attackers killed a policeman who was part of a small detachment protecting the casino. A larger force of police officers responded to the attack and killed six of the attackers. Police described the incident as a gang attack, but a hundred fighters is a very large gang. Malindi is a resort town on the Indian Ocean in Coast Province. It is located 120 kilometers north of Kenya's main seaport, Mombasa, about midway between Mombasa and Lamu.

March 31, 2013: The Kenyan government increased security throughout the country after the country's Supreme Court ruled that Uhuru Kenyatta had been properly elected president. The court rejected a challenge by Kenyatta's opponent, Raila Odinga. After the decision, a riot broke out in the town of Kisuma where two people died before police could calm things down. The government is trying to avoid a repeat of the 2007 post-election violence.

April 9, 2013: Uhuru Kenyatta was sworn in as Kenya's president. However, he remains under indictment by the International Criminal Court (ICC). The ceremonies were peaceful.

April 19, 2013: Kenyan authorities claimed the secessionist Mombasa Republic Council (MRC) has ties to Islamist militant extremist movements in eastern Africa. The implication is that the MRC is linked to al Shabaab in Somalia. The government believes the MRC has also received help from Iran.

May 10, 2013: The Kenyan government asked the UN to terminate the International Criminal Court (ICC) crimes against humanity case against Kenya's president, Uhuru Kenyatta, and vp William Ruto.

May 28, 2013: Kenya Plunged into Darkness in Nationwide Power Blackout'

East Africa's biggest economy, Kenya, was on Tuesday plunged into a nationwide power blackout, said the country's sole power distributor - Kenya Power. Kenya Power has over 2 million customers connected to the national grid whom it supplies with 1,250 megawatts against a demand of 1,700 megawatts, with most of the fuel generated from hydro power stations run by KenGen. The company said the blackout was brought about by the failure of two transmission lines carrying 400 megawatts (MW) of electricity from a geothermal power source in the Rift Valley, where KenGen is tapping vast reserves of steam energy in a geologically active region.

This set up a ripple effect, knocking out the national interconnected grid and generating system - which relies on hydro-power for the lion's share of its electricity - leading to a national power outage, the company said. Businesses in the country of 40 million people often rely on diesel generators to make up the gap between power demand and output and cite frequent localized power blackouts as one of the key barriers to economic growth. Growth is forecast to grow 6 percent this year from 4.6 percent last year and 4.4 percent in 2011. Kenya Power said it was attempting to re-start the grid "to restore power as quickly as possible", and had launched an investigating to find out why the two transmission lines failed.

May 30, 2013: A senior International Criminal Court (ICC) prosecutor said that the Kenyan government must prove to the ICC that Kenyan courts can genuinely prosecute President Uhuru Kenyatta for crimes against humanity. Kenyatta and his chief deputy, William Ruto, are charged with planning and inciting post-election violence in 2007 that killed over 1,200 people. The ICC has indicted the men for crimes against humanity. Kenya has asked that it be permitted to try the men. The ICC is stressing the word “genuine” because ICC prosecutors think Kenya will conduct a sham trial. The ICC can pass jurisdiction to a nation’s courts if the national courts can conduct credible criminal investigations and a credible court room trial.

June 6, 2013: The United Kingdom announced that it will compensate five thousand Kenyans for their suffering during the 1950s Mau Mau rebellion. The individuals compensated were held in detention camps. Many were abused and several claimed they were tortured by British colonial authorities. The British compensation offer is an attempt to settle a variety of claims, some of which have been in litigation for years. UK attorneys made the argument that the independent (since 1963) Kenyan government had taken over responsibilities for the colonial government and it should be liable for any damage claims. In November 2012, claimants produced official files that documented attempts by colonial security officials to cover up the March 1959 Hola detention camp incident. At Hola 11 prisoners were beaten to death. No prison official was ever properly investigated or held responsible for the murders. The UK decided to pay the damage claims. Each claimant will receive around $3,900. The Mau Mau rebellion was a complex insurgency. The number of people who died during the rebellion is disputed. 10,000 is a common figure. The rebellion began in 1952 and ended in 1960.

July 12, 2013: Saudi princess free on $5 million bail in California'

AMY TAXIN, Associated Press SANTA ANA, Calif. (AP) — A Saudi princess charged with human trafficking was freed after posting $5 million bail, but authorities imposed strict travel requirements and GPS tracking to keep her in Southern California. Meshael Alayban, 42, who prosecutors said is one of the six wives of Saudi Prince Abdulrahman bin Nasser bin Abdulaziz al Saud, was released Thursday after posting the hefty bail amount a day after her arrest. Earlier in the day she had appeared in court wearing a dark blue jail jumpsuit to answer to one felony charge of human trafficking. She did not enter a plea. Her arraignment was postponed to July 29. Alayban was arrested after a Kenyan woman who worked for her as a maid alleged she was held against her will and forced to work. The maid led police to a condominium where Alayban's family was staying, authorities said. Orange County District Attorney Tony Rackauckas said after court Thursday that the woman was subjected to "forced labor," and likened Alayban to a slave owner.

July 15, 2013: ICC Rejects East Africa Venue for Ruto, Sang Case

Capital FM (Nairobi) Kenya: International Criminal Court (ICC) trials against Deputy President William Ruto and Joshua arap Sang will open at The Hague on September 10, 2013. This was after ICC judges turned down a request by the two to have the opening session held in Kenya or Tanzania. "The judges of the International Criminal Court (ICC) have decided, in a plenary session, that the commencement of the trial against William Samoei Ruto and Joshua arap Sang will take place at the seat of the court in The Hague, Netherlands, rejecting the joint defence request to hold hearings in Kenya or in Tanzania," the ICC's Public Affairs Unit said. The judges made several considerations which included the high costs that the court would have to incur if the trials were not heard at Hague-based court. They also factored in the security of victims and witnesses which has been a concern raised by victims and the Office of The Prosecutor (OTP) as much as they were paying attention to the principal of bringing the trials closer home as possible. The court further considered the impression it will create if the trials (opening statements) are heard in Kenya or Tanzania.

"They reached this conclusion after taking into consideration numerous factors, such as security, the cost of holding proceedings outside The Hague, the potential impact on victims and witnesses and on proceedings in The Hague, as well as the length of the proceedings to be held away from the seat of the court and the potential impact on the perception of the court," the statement said. In the ruling, the judges also said Ruto will be required to be physically present during the opening statements of parties to the case. This decision was also pronounced when the judges allowed Ruto to skip sessions of the hearings. Even though there are some judges who were in favour of the opening session of the trials being heard in Arusha or Kenya, there was no two thirds majority required to change the seat of the court. "After carefully considering the arguments both in favour of and against holding the opening statements in the case in Nairobi or Arusha, the judges did not reach the required two-thirds majority necessary for a decision to change the seat of the court." Ruto and Sang in January 2013 made a joint application asking the court to have their trial moved from The Hague to Kenya or Tanzania.

The same request was also made by President Uhuru Kenyatta's defence team. Defence teams in the two cases argued that having the trials in Kenya or Tanzania would bring the cases closer home and also cut down travel costs. The Victims' Legal Representative in the Ruto-Sang case, Wilfred Nderitu, also supported the idea even though over 80 percent of the victims he represented were in favour of the trials being heard in The Hague. He said having the trials heard in Kenya or Tanzania "was important to have some ownership of the process which would trickle down to more representative participation of the victims." He also said it would help build regional institutions especially improving criminal justice systems. The OTP was opposed to the trials being heard outside The Hague and raised concerns over the security of witnesses.

Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda explained; "The prosecution's concern is that the attempts to interfere with trial witnesses would increase if the trials were held in Kenya and to a lesser extent, in Arusha, Tanzania where the accused have significant influence, where the public interest in the trial is extremely high and where the court has not infrastructures in place to ensure the security of trial witnesses." The registry had suggested that trials could only be heard up to a maximum of one month at the International Court Tribunal for Rwanda in Arusha. "With regards to the observations provided above, the registry respectfully submits that there are no technical obstacles to put in place the necessary requirements for any in situ case scenario in Arusha, as the existing facilities allow for a similar level of provision as provided by the ICC, except for having protected witnesses testifying in public session with voice and facial distortion," Silvana Arbia said in her application in February. The trial of President Kenyatta is scheduled for November 2013.

July 15, 2013: Kenya: ICC - Trial of Kenyan VP to Open in The Hague'

Voice of America (Washington, DC)The International Criminal Court has rejected a request from Kenya's deputy president to begin his trial in Africa. The ICC said Monday that the trial of Kenyan Deputy President William Ruto will commence September 10 at the ICC's headquarters in The Hague. William Ruto and co-accused Joshua Arap Sang are facing charges of crimes against humanity, for allegedly helping to organize deadly ethnic violence that followed Kenya's 2007 presidential election. Defense lawyers had asked the ICC to hold at least parts of the trial in Kenya or neighboring Tanzania. An ICC statement said judges favored the idea in principle but decided to hold the trial at the Hague because of several factors, including security, cost considerations, and the potential impact on victims and witnesses. Monday's decision does not affect the trial of Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta, who is also facing charges of crimes against humanity in connection with the Kenyan post-election violence.

Uhuru Kenyatta's trial is due to begin November 12 in the Hague. More than 1,100 people were killed and several hundred thousand displaced in riots and fighting that erupted across Kenya after the disputed 2007 election. The president, his deputy and Sang are all cooperating with the ICC and appeared before the court in April 2011. All have denied the charges against them. Despite the charges, Kenyatta won a first round victory in Kenya's March presidential election, with Ruto running as his deputy.

August 5, 2013: Kenya: ICC Moves Witnesses to Europe Ahead of Hague Trial'

The International Criminal Court (ICC) has relocated five top witnesses from an African country ahead of the start of hearings for the post election violence cases against President Uhuru Kenyatta, his Deputy William Ruto and journalist Joshua Arap Sang. The five were flown from a neighbouring country to another location in the region from where they will board flights to different destinations in Europe in readiness to testify in the cases. Ruto and Sang's cases come up for hearing starting September 10 at The Hague. Witnesses who have been in the neighbouring country are linked to the Kiambaa KAG Church fire where more than 30 people were killed at the height of the poll violence on January 1st 2008. The Star has established that the relocated witnesses have crucial evidence on the church incident and they have been residing at safe houses in the neighbouring country's capital city. Before they were flown out by officials from the ICC Witness Protection Unit there were fears about their security which led to the relocation on a night flight two days ago. ICC Chief Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda is expected to use the witnesses to testify during the hearings. "They are no longer here. They were taken to other locations for safety purposes two days ago," said a source related to one of the witnesses and who was living with them for the last two months.

Source said security agents of the neighboring nation had learnt of the existence of the witnesses in that nation leading to the security fears by ICC's protection Unit. One of the five witnesses was a worker at the home of a top politician who has a farm near the Kiambaa Church and the witness is said to have witnessed the incidents at the church. Also moved are their family members especially children. Yesterday the National Association of Human Rights Activists (NARA) released a report indicating that human rights defenders including those linked to the ICC cases were under serious threats and intimidation in the country. Speaking to Journalists in Nyeri town NARA Chairman Ken Wafula said some of the defenders who have been working with post election violence victims and witnesses had been forced to flee from the country for safety. "They are living under constant threats of death, intimidation and arbitrary arrests by agents of the state and other linked to the ICC cases,"said Wafula.

Wafula said the activists have been victims of hate mails and hate speech from politicians and they have had their families unnecessarily harassed within the last few years. The report known as "A cry for justice:The State of Human Rights Defenders in Kenya" has been handed to the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) Keriako Tobiko with recommendations on how to deal with the situation. It lists names of the human rights defenders who have been dealing with the ICC cases among others who face the threats. "The Director of Public Prosecution (DPP) should recall all the files bearing criminal proceedings on human rights defenders for review to determine whether sufficient evidence exist to sustain the cases," said Wafula. He said the police, prosecution and courts have knowingly or unknowingly been used as instruments to oppress, repress, suppress and subjugate human rights defenders even when most cases against them do not meet the basic prosecutorial standards. Wafula says the Witness Protection Unit in the country should be strengthened and made more independent so that it can handle crucial witnesses including those linked to high profile cases like those at the ICC.

August 7, 2013: KENYA - Major fire at Nairobi airport'

A fire has broken out at the main international airport in the Kenyan capital, Nairobi. The Kenya Airports Authority (KAA) said Jomo Kenyatta International Airport (JKIA) had been closed and passengers evacuated. There have been no reports of any casualties and the cause of the fire is not clear. The BBC's Emmanuel Igunza, who is at the airport, says the fire is now under control.

Nairobi airport closes as fire crews tackle blaze'

A huge fire has ravaged the main international airport in the Kenyan capital, Nairobi. Jomo Kenyatta International Airport (JKIA) - a key regional hub - has been closed, passengers evacuated and incoming flights diverted. The fire is now said to have been contained but there have been reports that it took emergency services a long time to respond. Images from the scene showed flames leaping from one of the main buildings. There have been no reports of any casualties and the cause of the fire is not clear. Jomo Kenyatta International Airport is the regional hub for East Africa, with many long-distance flights landing there to connect to countries across the region. The airport is the main gateway for European tourists - and it is now the height of the tourist season - and is also crucial for the country's key flower export industry, so the fire could have a huge economic impact, says the BBC's Emmanuel Igunza at the scene.

Shares in Kenya Airways fell in early trading

Despite earlier official statements that the airport had been closed indefinitely, presidential spokesman Manoah Esipisu said domestic flights and international cargo flights would resume later on Wednesday.

Water shortage: The cabinet secretary for transport, Michael Kamau, earlier described the fire as "very severe", and although it is contained firefighters are still battling the flames. Dark smoke could be seen billowing into the sky across much of Nairobi as the fire - which began at approximately 04:30 local time (01:30 GMT) - took hold. Passengers arriving on international flights - some still in their seats - reported hearing explosions from the terminal building. Fire engines did not begin to arrive for one to two hours after the fire broke out, witnesses told our correspondent - by which time the blaze was ravaging the cavernous and ageing arrivals hall. Kenya's police and fire units are poorly resourced and the state response was supplemented by the Red Cross and private security firms including - airport authorities said - the British multinational company G4S. One witness told AP news agency she had seen soldiers and police trying to douse the inferno using buckets of water. Witnesses said traffic jams prevented emergency vehicles getting through, leading the interior ministry to appeal to cars to get out of their way. Shocked would-be passengers stood outside the airport, bags in hand, watching the blaze.

Nairobi resident Barry Fisher - who had hoped to travel to Ethiopia on Wednesday - described the scene as chaotic. "There was no-one stopping any traffic going to the road to the airport," he told AP news agency. "A number of fire trucks and ambulances were trying to negotiate their way through the lane... They were trying to weave their way through a solid two lanes of cars." American student Emily Mosites was in the airport trying to get a flight to Kisumu when the fire broke out. "There was no emergency direction on leaving - I just stood there watching the fire. There were no officials to tell anyone what to do. "I wasn't told whether or not there were any flights departing. So I thought this was insane and decided to leave."

The government also admitted that firefighters had run "dangerously low on water" and water tankers had had to be sent to bolster supplies. Interior Minister Joseph Ole Lenku said the airport had "lost the arrival areas and a number of offices have been gutted". "We have heightened security to make sure people are safe.... We will make sure we establish the true cause of the fire," he told journalists. Cabinet secretary for transport Michael Kamau earlier said the blaze began in the immigration zone, which he said was deep inside the affected building, making it difficult for firefighters to reach. He paid tribute to the work of the emergency services. President Uhuru Kenyatta - whose father the airport was named after - has toured the burning building to see the damage. Incoming flights have been diverted to regional airports and to Mombasa, where the BBC's Odhiambo Joseph said there were chaotic scenes with hundreds of passengers stranded. Correspondents say authorities will be keen to get the airport fully operational as soon as possible - and an airport authority committee is looking at how to do so. The blaze comes two days after aircraft were delayed for several hours after the failure of a hydrant needed for refuelling planes at the airport.

August 8, 2013: KENYA - After big fire, Nairobi airport re-opens for domestic flights' AP:

NAIROBI, Kenya - A small fire that an under-resourced fire brigade reacted slowly to swelled into a raging inferno that engulfed the arrival hall at Kenya's main international airport Wednesday, an official said, shutting down East Africa's largest airport and forcing the cancellation of dozens of flights. By late Wednesday, the airport re-opened for domestic and cargo flights, an official said. The massive, early-morning fire sent billows of black smoke high into Nairobi's sky. The blaze burned for more than four hours before officials declared it contained, and flames continued to burn two more hours after that. The fire broke out on the 15th anniversary of the bombings of the U.S. Embassy buildings in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, in neighbouring Tanzania, but there were no immediate signs of terrorism in the fire. Kenya's anti-terror police boss, Boniface Mwaniki, told The Associated Press that he was waiting for more information before making a judgment.

No serious injuries were reported. Two people were treated for smoke inhalation from the fire, which began a bit before 5 a.m. and turned airport banks and foreign exchange bureaus into black char. "There were enormous flames and so much smoke," said Katie Price, an American aid worker who arrived in Nairobi early Wednesday from Malawi. The fire gutted Jomo Kenyatta International Airport's arrival hall, where passengers pass through immigration and retrieve their luggage. The fire did not damage the domestic or departure terminals, which are separated from the arrivals hall by a road. "It was huge, the smoke billowing, and it didn't seem to be stopping," said Barry Fisher, who had hoped to fly to Ethiopia on Wednesday morning. Nairobi is the capital of East Africa's largest economy, but it lies in a region where public sector services like police and fire units are hobbled by small budgets, corrupt money managers and outdated or no equipment.

Nairobi's most respected paper, The Daily Nation, reported last month that Nairobi County doesn't have a single working fire engine. One engine, the paper said, was auctioned off in 2009 because the county hadn't paid a $100 repair bill. Many of the responding units to Wednesday's fire were from private security firms. An Associated Press reporter on the scene saw uniformed officers line up with buckets in hand, apparently to battle the blaze. "I would have expected more fire engines to respond faster," said a British passenger, Martyn Collbeck, who had been scheduled to fly to London on an early morning KLM flight. A top government official at the site of the fire said an initial assessment showed that a complacent response helped a small fire grow into an uncontrollable inferno. Some airport fire engines weren't filled with water and others didn't have personnel to drive them, said the official, who insisted on anonymity because he wasn't authorized to release details of an ongoing investigation.

The airport, also abbreviated as JKIA, re-opened later Wednesday for domestic and cargo flights. Plans were under way to change a domestic unit into an international terminal so those flights could resume as well. International airlines, including South African Airways, Etihad and Emirates among others, cancelled flights to Nairobi. Qatar Air said its Nairobi flights were being rerouted to the Kilimanjaro airport in Tanzania. No U.S. carriers fly direct to Nairobi. Delta in 2009 tried to open such a route but the Transportation Security Administration nixed those plans because of security concerns. Kenya President Uhuru Kenyatta visited the scene and expressed concern over disrupted travel plans. A presidential statement said the cause of the fire is being investigated and that "there is no reason to speculate at this point."

"We reassure international and local travellers that arrangements are being put in place to restore normal operations. The airlines are working to assist stranded passengers and advise them on the measures being put in place to resume services," said Stephen Gichuki, the director of the Kenyan Airports Authority. The Nairobi airport is the busiest in East Africa, and its closure affected flights throughout the region and beyond. Michael Kamau, the cabinet secretary for transport and infrastructure, said the fire began at 5 a.m. in the immigration section of the arrivals hall. Inbound flights were diverted to the coastal city of Mombasa, he said. Kenya's Red Cross said that flights were also being diverted to Dar es Salaam, Entebbe, Uganda and the Kenyan cities of Eldoret and Kisumu.

The police and fire fighting response was slow, witnesses said. Long after the fire began it was still possible to drive into the airport complex. "There was no one stopping any traffic going to the road to the airport," Fisher said. "A number of fire trucks and ambulances were trying to negotiate their way through the lane. ... They were trying to weave their way through a solid two lanes of cars." By early afternoon, passengers began to grumble that minimal assistance was being offered. Medr Gudru, a 66-year-old German, had hoped to fly home on Wednesday but the fire stranded him with no information, he said. "This is too much. It was very nice here but this is just a mess," he said. Kenya Airways, the country's flagship carrier, diverted five flights to Mombasa and said all of its transit passengers were being moved to hotels. The airline reported that one passenger and one employee suffered from smoke inhalation. Jane Waikenda, the director of the Department of Immigration Services, sent out rapid-fire messages on Twitter in a bid to soothe frayed nerves. "I would like to reiterate that we doing what must be done to have full immigration services up," she wrote, before adding moments later: "you can never please everyone. We appreciate being held accountable as we strive to serve all Kenyans fairly." Price said that airport officials set up a makeshift terminal in the cargo area, where nearly two dozen immigration officials lined up to stamp passports.

KENYA - First international flights after Nairobi airport fire'

A plane from London was the first to land at Jomo Kenyatta International Airport at 06:30 local time (03:30 GMT), Kenyan airport authorities said. Other planes from Bangkok and Kilimanjaro also arrived. The cause of the fire is not yet known. Kenyan authorities say no serious injuries were reported. The Nairobi airport is a regional hub serving more than 16,000 passengers daily and its closure caused widespread disruption. International flights into the city had been diverted to other airports in Eldoret and the coastal city of Mombasa. On Wednesday the interior ministry announced the resumption of domestic and cargo services. The fire took about four hours to bring under control, by which time the arrivals hall had been gutted.

'Completely destroyed'

The Kenya Airport Authority told the BBC that Kenya Airways flights were arriving and taking off "now at more or less normal operations". Other international airlines had not yet clarified their operations, it added. The fire started in the airport's international arrivals and immigration area at around 05:00 on Wednesday and spread quickly. Questions are being asked about why so few fire engines were available initially. It appears that some engines got stuck in the Kenyan capital's notorious traffic jams. Many engines at the scene also quickly ran out of water. Soldiers and police even came with buckets to help put out the fire, Sylvia Amondi, who was at the airport to pick up a relative who had been due to arrive there, told AFP news agency. "The international arrivals station has been completely destroyed, the roof has caved in and the floor is covered in debris and water," she said. A third of Europe's flower imports, and many fresh vegetables, come from Kenya and the Kenya Flower Council exporters' association described the fire as "disastrous". Shares in Kenya Airways, which uses the airport as its main hub, fell 2% after the fire. Foreign airlines which use the terminal include British Airways, Emirates, Qatar Airways, KLM, Turkish Airways, South African Airways and Ethiopian Airways. Several cancelled flights to Nairobi on Wednesday. The country's anti-terrorism chief, Boniface Mwaniki, has said he does not believe the fire - which happened on the 15th anniversary of the bombings by al-Qaeda of the US embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam, Tanzania - was connected to terrorism. Correspondents say the airport is old and overcrowded.

Jomo Kenyatta Airport

Busiest airport in east and central Africa, and seventh busiest in Africa

Handles six million passengers a year

Hub for neighbouring countries as well as cities as far away as Lagos, Johannesburg and Cairo - as well as gateway to continent for Europe and Asia

Serves 49 destinations in 23 countries, across five continents

Key export point for Kenya's flower industry, one of the country's top foreign exchange earners - Kenyan flowers account for 35% of flowers imported into the EU

August 9, 2013: Kenya: Government to Build 2.5 Million Capacity Air Terminal'

Capital FM (Nairobi) By Kennedy Kangethe: Nairobi — The government is set to build a new temporary terminal with a capacity of 2.5 million passengers. President Uhuru Kenyatta who visited the Jomo Kenyatta International Airport (JKIA) on Friday evening said the new terminal will be ready in coming weeks. "We also intend to do a full refurbishment of Terminals 1, 2 and 3 once our new temporary terminal is ready," he revealed.

The president said that Terminal 4 that is currently under construction will come on stream earlier than the projected March 4, 2014. "Passengers are coming in and going out, as it ought to be. They are not as comfortable as we'd like them to be, but we are working on that," he said. To enhance passenger comfort, the President offered the use of the Presidential pavilion to boost operations of the airport. He said that Airport capacity is up to about 70 per cent while safety and security have significantly been enhanced. The President spoke JKIA after inspecting progress made towards returning the airport to normal operations. The airport resumed operations to all traffic at midnight Thursday. He said the cost of loss experienced during the incident has not been quantified. The government has also overhauled national disaster services, creating one coordinating agency to take charge during such incidences. "We have received massive support, including financial, security equipment and others, from lending institutions and friendly governments to get this important regional hub back to full operations, and we are grateful to them," he said.

September 4, 2013: Kenya/Ethiopia help dismember Somalia'

NewStatesman: - Analysis By Martin Plaut - A new deal has recognised Jubaland, a strip of land in southern Somalia and bordering on Kenya and Ethiopia, as yet another quasi-independent entity in the region. After nine days of late night meetings and plenty of arm-twisting, the fragile government of Somalia was finally forced to accept that a further slice of its territory had slipped beyond its control. The deal, signed in Addis Ababa, recognised Jubaland as yet another quasi-independent entity. This strip of land in southern Somalia and bordering on Kenya and Ethiopia, it is the illegitimate heir of both of these countries. Jubaland is of critical importance to the whole of southern Somalia. Trade through the port and airport of Kismaayo is a lifeline for the region. In theory Jubaland will be the 'Interim Juba Administration' and last for just two years, while Somalia re-forms itself into a Federation. In reality it is now outside Mogadishu's control – just like those other fragments of Somalia, including Puntland, Galmadug and the self-declared independent state of Somaliland.

President Hassan Sheikh Mohamud, who was only sworn in as Somali president a year ago, was unable to resist the intense pressure of his neighbours and agreed to the deal. The entire sorry saga was witnessed by Nicholas Kay, the UN's Special Representative in Somalia; welcomed by Catherine Ashton for the European Union and supported by the African Union. Nkosazana Dlamini Zuma, the South African chair of African Union described the agreement as "historic", declaring that it was "a further illustration of the capacity of the Somalis to triumph over their differences." It is hard to see what there was to welcome. The deal officially recognises Ahmed Mohamed Islam (known, like all Somalis by a nickname - 'Madobe') as the 'leader' of Jubaland. Yet only a month earlier Sheikh Madobe was described in a major UN report as a “spoiler” and one of the chief threats to Somali stability. The Sheikh was said to be "subverting the efforts of the Federal Government leadership and its partners to extend the reach of Government authority and stabilise the country, particularly in Kismaayo."

What the Baroness Ashton and her colleagues have done is anoint a man who has been roundly denounced by the Monitoring Group, established by the UN Security Council. Its July report pointed out that the Sheikh had been a member of the short-lived Union of Islamic Courts, which was ousted by Ethiopia during its 2006 invasion of Somalia. What happened next is interesting. As the report puts it: "Madobe's forces returned to Kismayo in August 2008, when Al-Shabaab and Hizbul Islam recaptured the city following the withdrawal of Ethiopian troops from Somalia." At this time the Sheikh Madobe was a key player in the al-Qaeda linked network. But, as is ever the case in Somalia, clan and inter-clan rivalry came into play and the Sheikh fell out with his former allies. He threw in his lot with the African peacekeepers and the Federal Government. But Sheikh Madobe did not cut his ties with al-Sabaab altogether and the UN report accuses him of continuing the export of charcoal from territory controlled by the Islamists – a trade long since outlawed by the UN because of its catastrophic impact on the Somali environment.

Under the new arrangement the Sheikh retains the port and the airport, although he is required to hand control to the Federal Government within six months. Since this would cut his income and hence his power, there seems little chance of the handover ever taking place. The outcome has been a triumph for Somalia's neighbours, even though Kenya and Ethiopia will continue to vie for influence in this critical part of the country. The Kenyan foreign ministry has long seen the establishment of a buffer state along its northern border as vital to its security interests. Thanks to Wikileaks, we know that Kenya's Foreign Minister, Moses Wetangula, practically begged the United States for its support when he saw Johnnie Carsons, President Obama's most senior US Africa official, in January 2010. The Kenyans were requesting backing for an invasion of Somalia to create Jubaland, but the Americans were far from keen. As the confidential embassy telex puts it: "Carson tactfully, but categorically refused the Kenyan delegation's attempts to enlist US Government support for their effort." It was, said the telex, the third time Wetangula had made the appeal, but Carsons resisted, pointing out – rightly – that "the initiative could backfire." Critically, Carsons warned that: "if successful, a Lower Juba entity could emerge as a rival to the TFG" (Somalia's Transitional Federal Government). This is exactly what has now come about.

Brushing these concerns aside, Kenya sent its troops into Somalia in October 2011. As predicted, they found it very heavy going and it was to take almost a year before al-Shabaab were driven from Kismaayo. For the Ethiopians, the establishment of Jubaland is a further fragmentation of Somalia, its sworn enemy since the Somalis invaded their country in 1977. It was an attack that is imprinted on Ethiopian memories, fuelling a determination to see the end of a powerful, centralised Somali state. As if the situation was not complicated enough, newly created Jubaland could be sitting on reserves of oil. Several fields have been detected in the waters along the Kenya-Somali border, but, like many African frontiers, the location of the border is a matter of dispute. The Somali government refuses to recognise oil licenses granted to multinational companies by Kenya, and has persuaded several oil-majors, including Total and the Norwegian state owned Statoil, to withdraw their claims. But, said the UN in July, the Italian firm, ENI, was still pressing ahead with its claims. As Jonnie Carsons remarked in 2010, Jubaland “raises more questions than it answers.”

September 12, 2013: Kenya finds '70 year supply' of water in desert region'

By Hannah McNeish, VOA NAIROBI — Satellite technology has revealed that the drought-stricken Turkana region of northern Kenya lies atop two giant underground lakes, or aquifers. Estimates indicate the finds could solve the barren region's water problems and provide all of Kenya with enough water for the next 70 years. The government of Kenya and the U.N. agency UNESCO on Wednesday announced huge new water finds in one of the most arid parts of the country. Kenya’s minister of environment, water and natural resources, Judi Wakhungu, said the two aquifers in Turkana -- a northern region long mired in poverty and conflict from a lack of water -- could not only transform the lives of local communities, but also the country.

“What we found in Turkana basin and Lotipiki basin is very exciting because it’s over 200 billion cubic meters of water," she said. "This means that if we use this water sustainably we will have enough water for the next two generations.” Exploration company Radar Technologies International found the underground lakes using satellite technology. RTI’s General Manager Alain Gachet said that the huge estimates could be the tip of the iceberg. “It’s a complex model but we based our estimation only on the superficial, on the first 300 meters," he said. "And the lake is one-and-a-half kilometers deep, maybe completely soaked with water. So I consider we were very conservative with these reserves, as we considered only the first 300 meters.”

Gachet says the resource could turn pastoralists from beggars embroiled in cross-border water conflicts with South Sudan and Uganda into potential thriving and peaceful communities able to grow their own food.

That would be welcome news to residents of Turkana, where the malnutrition rates can soar as high as 37 percent. Gachet admits that there could be some environmental damage to the area, but that people came first. “You know, when people are dying of thirst, you don’t think of the environmental impact, besides the fact that you are going to give water to these people and their cattle," he said. "The first impact is positive. So for sure, better have water than no water.”

Gretchen Kalonji, assistant director-general for natural sciences at UNESCO, which protects areas of scientific and natural interest, also stressed the human need. “It’s an area which as you know is extremely short in water and you know, it witnessed the worst drought in 60 years in 2011, where I think 12 million people ended up displaced, and a large number fo people ended up dying, so that’s important to keep in mind,” she said. Wakhungu said the find was “historic” as for the first time, the people of Turkana would have clean drinking water. She said the reserves could completely transform the lives of people there, first through agriculture and then industrial production. “If managed well, it means the notion of drought, the notion of lack of water, is now history for the Turkana people,” she said. Unlike the water in Lake Turkana, which has higher levels of alkaline, the underground water is drinkable, and Wahungu said that local communities would be able to start drinking it within a month.

Wakhungu said the search for water will soon go nationwide in the hope that other areas suffering water shortages, such as the Kenyan coast, might soon turn from dustbowls into breadbaskets. “We are so encouraged by this technology that we are now going to roll this out and do a groundwater mapping exercise for the whole country,” she said. In a continent where the fear of “water wars” is strong, Gachet also hopes that his technology can keep the peace. His mantra is “a little water is war, a lot of water is peace, as you can share with neighbors."

September 21, 2013: Gunmen opened fire on shoppers at a Kenya mall - Upscale Mall becomes war zone in Kenya terror attack’ NAIROBI, Kenya By REUBEN KYAMA and NICHOLAS KULISH — An upscale mall popular with the Kenyan elite and the foreign diplomats and businesspeople who call Nairobi home turned into a war zone on Saturday, as gunmen opened fire on shoppers in an apparent terrorist attack, killing at least 20 people and wounding dozens more. At nightfall, the mall remained sealed off to the public as police officers and soldiers searched floor by floor for the gunmen, who were still believed to be inside with hostages. Witnesses described hearing explosions and gunfire as they fled, leaving behind blood, broken glass and carnage in what was apparently one of the worst terrorist attacks in the country’s history. Joseph

Momanyi, 26, an employee at the Nakumatt grocery store there, said that as he was running away he heard the attackers shouting that “Muslims should leave” the complex. The authorities said it was too early to identify the culprits, but suspicion immediately focused on the Shabab, the ferocious Somali militant group that has been linked to past attacks in Kenya, including a grenade and gunfire attack on two churches last year that killed 15 people.

Kenya is widely considered a beacon of stability in an often unstable region. The United Nations has a hub here, as do many nonprofit organizations and corporations. The country’s economy is heavily dependent on tourist revenue, with peaceful safaris and gentle holidays on the coast attracting people from all over the world. But Kenya has found itself ever more enmeshed in the bloody volatility of Somalia since October 2011, when Kenyan military forces invaded Somalia to help Somali forces fight the Shabab. And even before the rise of the Shabab, Kenya was a target for terrorist attacks. In 1998, Al Qaeda militants bombed the American Embassy in downtown Nairobi, killing 200 people, mostly Kenyans. Gen. Abbas Guled, secretary general of the Kenyan Red Cross, said in a phone interview on Saturday that 20 people had been killed and more than 50 wounded. The police had not yet confirmed any fatalities. Stephen Opiyo, 25, who was working at a supermarket there, said: “We heard gunshots and started running, trying to find an escape route. I saw many people who had suffered gunshot injuries, and some have been taken away to hospital.”

Witnesses described attackers using AK-47 rifles and throwing grenades. Photographs from the scene showed a woman’s bloody body being lifted out of a car, the glass of the window shattered. Vivian Atieno, 26, who works on the first floor of the mall, described “intense shooting,” starting around 11 a.m., before she escaped through a fire exit. Haron Mwachia, 20, a cleaner at the mall, said he escaped by climbing over a wall. “I heard several gunshots and managed to run away,” he said. “It was a horrible experience to me, and I was extremely afraid,” he said. “I’ve never seen anything like it.” Military helicopters hovered overhead as the police kept bystanders away from the scene. The police said they had surrounded the mall, and they were seen clearing the shops one by one. “Our officers are on the ground carrying out an evacuation of those inside as they search for the attackers, who are said to be inside,” Inspector General David Kimaiyo of the Kenyan police told Agence France-Presse.

Agence France-Presse reported that the gunmen had taken at least seven hostages, citing police officers and security guards at the scene. The Red Cross reported around 5 p.m. on its Twitter account that the hostages were being released. Benson Kibue, the Nairobi police chief, told The Associated Press that it was a terrorist attack and that there were probably no more than 10 gunmen involved. Earlier, Mr. Kibue said the attack had been part of an attempted robbery. Saturday’s attack ruptured the bubble of safety that surrounds the affluent districts of the Kenyan capital. The mall, called Westgate, is in many ways like an American shopping mall, with a Converse store, a tapas restaurant and a corner where children can play while their parents shop and eat.

On weekends, Westgate is bustling with shoppers, including well-to-do Kenyans and members of the city’s large contingent of expatriates. Brightly lighted, with peach-colored pillars and a marble stairway, the Westgate mall has more than 80 stores covering 350,000 square feet. Many shopping malls in Nairobi have security guards outside, checking vehicles, searching bags and using metal-detecting wands on visitors before they enter. But the guards — lightly armed, if at all — would be no match for assailants armed with automatic rifles. For years, there have been growing concerns that the Shabab would try to pull off a significant attack here in reprisal for Kenya’s deployment of troops in Somalia. The group has executed revenge attacks on other African countries that have sent troops to Somalia, including Uganda. In July 2010, the Shabab killed more than 70 people who had gathered at a restaurant and a rugby field in Kampala, the Ugandan capital, to watch the final match of the World Cup.

September 22, 2013: Death toll rises to 59 in Kenya mall attack; hostages still held’

NAIROBI (Reuters) Updates: - Gunfire erupted on Sunday at an upmarket shopping mall in Kenya's capital Nairobi, where at least 59 people were killed and several more held hostage by gunmen from a Somali Islamist group that has declared allegiance to al Qaeda. The shooting, lasting about 30 seconds, came after a period of tense quiet in the standoff, a Reuters witness said, speaking from close to the shopping centre that has several Israeli-owned outlets and which is frequented by Westerners and Kenyans.

Foreigners, including a Canadian diplomat, were killed in Saturday's attack at Westgate mall, claimed by the Islamist group al Shabaab. Shortly after the shots were fired, troops in camouflage ran crouching below a restaurant terrace along the front of the building that had been buzzing with customers when assailants charged in. One witness said they first told Muslims to leave. For hours after the brazen attack, the dead were strewn around tables of unfinished meals. At one food outlet, a man and woman lay in a final embrace after they had been killed, before their bodies were later removed. In the darkness of Sunday morning, music still played.

Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta, facing his first major security challenge since his election in March, said his close family members were among the dead. The assault was the biggest single attack in Kenya since al Qaeda's East Africa cell bombed the U.S. Embassy in Nairobi in 1998, killing more than 200 people. In 2002, the same militant cell attacked an Israeli-owned hotel on the coast and tried to shoot down an Israeli jet in a coordinated attack. Interior Minister Joseph Ole Lenku told reporters the death toll had risen to 59, and that security forces were doing everything they could to rescue hostages still inside the mall.

He added that 175 people had been taken to hospital after an assault that could prove a costly setback for east Africa's biggest economy, which relies heavily on tourism revenues. The dead included children, and the wounded ranged in age from 2 to 78. Many victims were at a cooking competition when assailants opened fire on them, witnesses said. The focus of attention on Sunday was on Nakumatt supermarket, one of Kenya's biggest chains.

DAZED: Soldiers joined the security operation backed by armored personnel carriers in the hours after the attack that was launched around 12.30 p.m. (0930 GMT) on Saturday. Security forces have been combing through the mall, clearing the floors. As helicopters hovered over the capital, a paramilitary officer at the scene, a rifle slung over his shoulder, said: "They will be arranging how to attack (the assailants)." One woman emerged on Sunday morning after she had been hiding under a car in the basement. She was holding one shoe and looked dazed, and was making a frantic phone call to her husband who later met her.

France said two of its citizens were killed, and Canada said two Canadians died, including a 29-year-old diplomat. A Chinese woman was also killed, China's official news agency said. U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, who offered assistance to Kenya in the incident, said several U.S. citizens had been hurt and the wife of a U.S. diplomat working for the U.S. Agency for International Development was killed. Al Shabaab, which is battling Kenyan and other African peacekeepers in Somalia, had repeatedly threatened attacks in Kenya if Nairobi did not pull its troops out of their country. The group appeared to taunt the security forces, saying on its official Twitter handle @HSM_Press that there would be no negotiations whatsoever with Kenyan officials over the standoff. "10 hours have passed and the Mujahideen are still strong inside #Westgate Mall and still holding their ground. All praise is due to Allah!", the group said late on Saturday, although its account on Twitter was suspended on Sunday morning.

VIGIL: Kenyatta, who faces charges of crimes against humanity at a trial starting in November at the International Criminal Court, vowed to defeat the militants who have said it is time to shift the war to Kenyan soil. "We have overcome terrorist attacks before," he said. Relatives of hostages still trapped in the mall kept vigil overnight at a nearby religious community centre. "I want her to come out alive," said Kevin Jamal, as he joined Kenya Red Cross Society volunteers and waited for news about his sister who he said was being held inside. He said security forces could have done better. "They should not allow themselves to be outmaneuvered by less than 20 people," he said.

A private security firm would normally search patrons of the mall using metal detectors and open the trunks of cars entering parking areas, but the guards would be unarmed. Nakumatt closed its other stores on Sunday, local media reported, while the mall was cordoned off and surrounded by police and paramilitary forces. Ole Lenku said the government believed that there were 10-15 attackers who security forces had been able to "isolate", but no communication had yet been established with them. Those rescued said at least one of the assailants was a woman. One militant was shot and arrested in clashes following the initial siege, but died shortly afterwards at a hospital.

Witnesses said the attackers were armed with AK-47 rifles and wore ammunition belts. Police said they stormed in during a children's cooking competition hosted by a radio station at the mall, just as the winners were about to receive prizes. Kenya sent its troops into Somalia in October 2011 to pursue militants it blamed for kidnapping tourists and attacking its security forces. Al Shabaab's last big attack outside Somalia was a twin strike in neighboring Uganda, targeting people watching the World Cup final on television in Kampala in June, 2010. Seventy-nine people died.

September 23, 2013: Kenyan authorities arrest 10 WestGate suspects'

NAIROBI: The Kenyan Police have confirmed, via their Twitter page, that about 10 suspects have been taken in for questioning in relation to the Westgate attack. One suspect is reported to have been shot in the heat of the exchange. Earlier today, Kenyan authorities confirmed that they have regained control of the entire building except the supermarket where the terrorists are camped. It is unclear if any progress has been made beyond this point. This attack continues to make headlines across the world. Presidents from nations all over the world have expressed their support and sympathy for the Kenyan people, while urging the authorities to do all that is possible to save the hostages. According to official sources, possibly all the hostages may have been taken out of the building. Since the unit behind the attack is made up of people from different nations, there would be a lot of international attention on the suspects and their trials. The authorities have not confirmed if any of the arrested suspect appears on the list released by al shabab earlier or if the list assisted them in making the arrests.

September 24, 2013: Kenyan president declares Terrorists defeated’

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) Kenya's president proclaimed victory Tuesday over the terrorists who stormed a Nairobi mall, saying security forces had "ashamed and defeated our attackers" following a bloody four-day siege in which dozens of civilians were killed. President Uhuru Kenyatta said the dead included 61 civilians whose bodies have been recovered so far and six security forces, while some 175 were injured, including 62 who remain hospitalized. Three floors of the mall collapsed and several bodies were trapped in the rubble, said Kenyatta. His office later said a terrorist's body was among those in the debris. Five other extremists were killed by gunfire and another 11 other suspects had been arrested, he said; authorities had previously announced the arrest of seven at the airport and three elsewhere "These cowards will meet justice as well their accomplices and patrons, wherever they are," Kenyatta said, in a televised address to the nation. Kenyatta, 51, has visited wounded survivors in hospital and made other emotion-filled speeches about the terrorist attack, which has been the harshest test of his leadership since he became president in April. "Fellow Kenyans, we have been badly hurt and feel great pain and loss. But we have been brave, united and strong," said Kenyatta, the son of the country's founding president, Jomo Kenyatta. "Kenya has stared down evil and triumphed."

KENYA: why did an Al Shabaab Islamist unit attack a shopping mall in the centre of Nairobi?

The Al-Shabaab Leader Sends Message to Kenyans’

(Mogadishou): The overall commander of Al-Shabaab, Mukhtaar Abdirahman Abu Zubeyr sent a voice message to the people of Kenya.The message is about the recent attack carried out at the Westgate. Abu Zubeyr thanked the attackers and termed them as the 'Westgate Mujahidin' while he also termed the attack as the 'Badar Attack'. "On Saturday 21 Sept 2013, 10 days after the 12th Anniversary of 9/11, one of the attacks in history that Muslims carried out started in Nairobi, during which some of the selfless Mujahidin have written its history using their blood and revenged on behalf of the Muslims who are being weakened, whereas those Mujahidin have reacted to the attack that was carried out in the Muslim land and the massacring of their weak people" Abu Zubeyr said. Abu Zubeyr claimed that the attack was revenge against the Westerners for their support for the Kenya's incursion into Somalia. "It was surprising to the leaders of Kenya who attacked the Islamic Regions without thinking twice. It was revenge against the Westerners who supported the Kenya's invasion and who are shedding the blood of the Muslims for the interests of their Petroleum Firms". The commander of Al-Shabaab called the people of Kenya to choose between two options. "Decide today and withdraw your army from the Somali regions, or else be ready for a lot of bloodshed in your land, economic devastation and displacement". The commander added. He accused them of the responsibility of the incursion by their government into Somalia. He said that people of Kenya have opted for war in which they can't win. "We are telling the people of Kenya that you have involved in a war which you are not suppose to involve, a war that is against your interests. You lost your security and your economy. You lost your sons. You are part of the perpetrators of the genocide which your army has done in Kismayo and in the other areas because you are the people who elected the politicians. The army of Uhuru that massacres the Muslims is armed using the tax that you pay and you have supported the decision for the war". He stressed that. He told the people of Kenya that their country has no ability to cope with a prolonged war and that they will not be able to withstand for more bloody attacks in Kenya. He advised them to pull out their forces from Somalia. Source: Radio Dalsan

September 24, 2013: KENYA: Police Alert at Border With Ethiopia'

EAN: Security has been tightened at the border of Ethiopia and Kenya following the Westgate attack. Marsabit county commissioner Isaiah Nakoru said the security apparatus in the region have been upscaled and the patrols intensified to ensure that the suspected attackers don't flee out or into the country. He said all police chiefs have been ordered to beef up their security checks and ensure no one gets in or out of the country. Nakoru directed all lodges, hotels, bars and Public Service Vehicle operators in the region to review their security arrangements, including screening visitors. He was addressing officers at Marsabit Catholic Hall on Sunday when he presided over a forum for uniformed officers. Nakoru said officers have been deployed in communal places such as churches to check on the security. He said adequate security measures have been put in place to avert the terrorist attack by the al Shabaab.

October 1, 2013: Beyond the Nairobi Massacre’

Mareeg: NAIROBI - By Michael Meyer - Kenya heaved a collective sigh of relief when the four-day siege at Nairobi’s Westgate shopping mall finally ended. Yet the aftermath of the massacre is in many ways turning out to be as dramatic – and grisly – as the event itself. The sophistication of the plot has stunned investigators. The attackers – members of the Somali Islamist extremist group al-Shabaab – spent weeks reconnoitering the site. They knew every exit and safe haven, and they appear to have leased a shop where they pre-positioned ammunition, explosives, and heavy weaponry. Their use of social media was a case study in digital virtuosity.

The attackers issued a clear demand: Kenya must withdraw the forces that it deployed two years ago as part of an international effort to drive al-Shabaab out of Somalia and return the country to government rule and a semblance of normal life. Their strike, they said, was intended chiefly as a warning to Kenya's government: change your policy, or else. The attackers also made a great show of telling the world that they had taken special care to safeguard the lives of fellow Muslims during the assault. Tell that to a colleague here in Nairobi who was trapped in the mall for five hours as gunfire echoed all around. She emerged unharmed to find that two members of her family were dead and a third wounded. The survivor was a nine-year-old boy, shot in the hip. As he lay bleeding, terrorists trained their guns on his mother and 15-year-old sister. Recite a passage from the Koran, they ordered. Being Muslim, they did so. The terrorists shot them anyway.

"Why did you do that? Why did you shoot them?" the little boy wailed. "Because," replied one of the gunmen, "they were not wearing the hijab." Amid the chaos, a French woman grabbed the child and carried him to safety. We have heard many such stories in recent days. Brutal as they sound, worse is likely to come. A police doctor working with forensic teams left the scene in shock, telling reporters of seeing bodies beheaded, and others bearing clear evidence of unspeakable torture. He recounted entering the still-smoldering ruins of the mall last week and seeing bodies hanging from hooks. Many of those taken hostage suffered terrible deaths. There were bodies with their noses and ears wrenched off with pliers. Others had their eyes gouged out. The terrorists seem to have used knives to shave some victims' fingers like pencils, he said, forcing them to write their names in their own blood. At least 72 people were killed in the attack.

How much that toll increases, and how graphic investigators will be in describing the scenes they encounter, remains to be seen. It is important to understand what is at stake in this gruesome episode, not only for Kenya but for the region and beyond. President Uhuru Kenyatta made clear almost immediately that last week's events will not weaken Kenya's determination to maintain its policy on Somalia, even as he confirmed that he, too, lost loved ones in the Nairobi massacre. The warlords of al-Shabaab are not the only threat to the region's security. Today, an arc of crisis stretches from Somalia on the Indian Ocean across the African Sahel to the Atlantic coast. Sudan, another country in Kenya's neighborhood, is fractured by rebellion. In the south, secessionist groups are fighting in Kordofan and Blue Nile. To the west, in Darfur, protesters burned government buildings in the provincial capital of Nyala while the siege in Nairobi played out. Days later, riots erupted in cities across Sudan, including the capital, Khartoum.

According to news reports, security forces have shot over 100 people, adding to a toll of casualties that has made this year one of the deadliest in Sudan's recent history. Diplomats view these developments with alarm.

Over the past year, Darfur has spun out of government control. As Darfur goes, many analysts say, so goes Sudan. Conditions across the wider Sahel are similarly worrisome. Mali may be stable for now, but, with the separatist Tuareg rebels in country's north having just suspended their participation in peace talks, many experts believe that it is only a matter of time before the conflict there reignites and spreads. Drug barons and local warlords control increasingly large swaths of territory from Guinea on the Atlantic coast through Senegal to Mali, Niger, and beyond. Libya is already partitioned among rival warlords, with a "national" government that operates only at the indulgence of the armed groups that support it. Against this background, the stakes in Kenya's fight against terrorism in and emanating from Somalia are high. It is not a struggle that Kenya should wage alone.

Michael Meyer, former Communications Director for United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon and the UN mission in Darfur, is Dean of the Graduate School of Media and Communications at Aga Khan University in Nairobi.

October 2, 2013; Somali Al-Shabab threatens to escalate attacks in Kenya'

PRESS TV: Somalia's al-Shabab militant group has threatened to increase its deadly attacks against Kenya, days after they killed tens of people at a mall in the Kenyan capital. The al-Shabab fighters vowed to transform Kenyan cities and towns into what they call grave yards, on Wednesday. "We will strike Kenyans where it hurts the most, turn their cities into graveyards and rivers of blood will flow in Nairobi," the militants said in a statement. This comes after Kenya refused to pull its soldiers out of Somalia. "The Kenyan government's decision to keep its invading force in Somalia is an indication that they haven't yet learnt any valuable lessons from the Westgate attacks." Late last month, nearly 70 people were killed after Somalia's al-Shabab fighters stormed the Westgate mall, a shopping center popular with rich Kenyans and foreigners in Nairobi. Dozens of others are reportedly still missing following the hostage-taking that took place in the building.

The group claimed responsibility for the attack. Al-Shabab leader Ahmed Godane said the raid was in retaliation for the Kenyan military's invasion of southern Somalia in October 2011. Kenya currently has over 4,000 army soldiers stationed in southern Somalia, where they have been battling the al-Shabab. The Kenyan forces are part of the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM) that gets training and equipment from the United States. Somalia has not had an effective central government since 1991, when warlords overthrew former dictator Mohamed Siad Barre. However, MPs meeting in Mogadishu elected Hassan Sheikh Mohamud as the new president of Somalia with a big majority in September 2012. The weak Western-backed government in Mogadishu has been battling al-Shabab fighters for more than six years and is propped up by the 10,000-strong AMISOM forces from Uganda, Burundi, Djibouti, and Kenya. SZH/PR

October 5, 2013: KENYA - U.S. Navy SEAL seize al-Shabaab leader in Nairobi attack response: NY Times’

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - A U.S. Naval commandos seized a senior leader of the al Shabaab militant group from a seaside villa in Somalia in response to a deadly attack on a Nairobi WestGate shopping mall last month, the New York Times quoted U.S. officials as saying. The SEAL team seized the unidentified target in a predawn firefight after approaching the beachfront house in the Somali town of Barawe by sea, the paper reported on its website "The Barawe raid was planned a week and a half ago," the newspaper quoted an unnamed U.S. security official as saying. "It was prompted by the Westgate attack," he added, referring to a militant assault on a Nairobi shopping mall two weeks ago in which at least 67 people were killed. The Times quoted witnesses as saying that the firefight lasted more than an hour, with helicopters called in for air support. The Times report quoted a spokesman for al-Shabaab as saying that one of its fighters had been killed in an exchange of gunfire but that the group had beaten back the assault. The U.S. officials said it was unclear whether the SEAL team's target was taken alive or killed.

October 5, 2013: Assassinations of Muslim clerics in Kenya boosting al-Shabaab'

MOMBASA, Kenya REUTERS – Updates: The killings of popular Muslim clerics in Kenya's port city of Mombasa is strengthening support for Somali militants who massacred at least 67 people in a Nairobi shopping mall two weeks ago, a prominent Islamist said on Saturday. The apparent assassination of Sheikh Ibrahim Omar on Thursday night raised religious tensions in Kenya's commercial and tourism hub. Young Muslims, streaming out of a mosque where Omar had preached, torched a church, burned tires and fought the police on Friday. Four people were killed during the day-long riots. Abubakar Shariff, whom the U.N. and the U.S. accuse of funding al Shabaab, said Omar's killing would boost recruitment and support for the Somali group among Kenyan Muslims convinced the cleric was gunned down by Kenyan security agencies. "After this attack I think more youth will be willing to go over," the Kenyan Islamist told Reuters at his home in Mombasa, a city in which several prominent Muslim preachers have been killed over the past 18 months. "(The extrajudicial killings) make Muslims realize or sympathize with Al Shabaab because they see a Christian government killing Muslims and they sympathize with them," added Shariff, whose assets have been frozen by western powers.

The Kenyan police have repeatedly denied killing Omar. "The city is calm," said Robert Kitur, Mombasa County Police Commander, on Saturday as businesses re-opened and cars returned to Mombasa's palm-lined streets.

The U.N. Monitoring Group on Somalia has called Shariff a "leading facilitator and recruiter of young Kenyan Muslims for violent militant activity in Somalia" and imposed financial sanctions on him. He denies funding or recruiting for al Shabaab. One of the Westgate mall attackers was a Kenyan of Arab origin, who was born in Mombasa and travelled to Somalia with his uncle at the age of 16, a Kenya Defence Force spokesman said on Saturday. A group of Kenyan Muslim leaders on Friday condemned the Mombasa riots and said the police should properly investigate the "extrajudicial" killing of Omar and three other people who were in a car with him. "Coming in the wake of the deplorable Westgate (mall) attack, the killings point to a worrying and deteriorating security situation in the country which needs to be addressed urgently," the leaders said in a statement.

DRIVE-BY SHOOTINGS: The drive-by shooting of Omar was strikingly similar to that of Sheikh Aboud Rogo, a firebrand cleric who had been Omar's mentor, last year. Both men were popular with youths along Kenya's Indian Ocean coastline where many Muslims feel marginalized by the mainly Christian government. They both died on the same stretch of road outside Mombasa, their cars sprayed with bullets. Shariff said Omar's killing was linked to the deadly raid on Westgate mall, the worst militant strike on Kenyan soil since al Qaeda bombed the U.S. Embassy in Nairobi in 1998. Al Shabaab have formal links with al Qaeda.

Shariff said Kenyan authorities had been planning to link Omar to the Westgate raid by planting evidence in his car, but this was thwarted by the quick arrival of witnesses on the scene. The police deny attempting to plant evidence and say Omar's death is being treated as a regular criminal investigation. Shariff said he believed the Westgate attack was "justified" under Islamic teachings as Kenyan forces were doing the same to civilians in Somalia. The killings of Muslim clerics had made Kenyan security agencies complacent, he added. "It happen because Kenyan Anti-Terror Police Unit or the Kenyan intelligence started eliminating potential targets ... thinking they removed every threat to the security of Kenya," Shariff said. "Westgate happen because they relaxed."

October 7, 2013: Kenya identifies four suspects involved in WestGate attack’

(EAN) Updates: The Kenyan military on Saturday revealed the names of four terrorists who took part in the September 21st attack on Westgate Mall in

Nairobi. The spokesman for the Kenya Defence Forces, Major Emmanuel ChirChir said the four were Abu Baara al-Sudani, Omar

Nabhan, Khattab al-Kene and Umayr. The military has also released CCTV footage of the four, armed with guns and walking around the mall during the attack. The footage, however, did not show the terrorists attacking or killing any civilians. Contrary to earlier reports, none of the attackers were from the West. Police have also ruled out the possibility that Samantha Lewthwaite, a British citizen, was involved in the attack. She is one of the terrorists who took part in the bombing of London's transit system in 2005 and the Kenyan police have been trailing her for a long time. According to Kenya Police, the four men had received terrorism training from Islamist militant groups. Al-Sudani, a Sudanese citizen, had received training from Al-Qaeda and was the leader of the group.

ChirChir described him as "an experienced fighter and sharpshooter." Nabhan, a Kenyan of Arab origin, left his home town of Mombasa for Somalia at the age of 16. He is reported to be the brother of Saleh Ali Nabhan, a top Al Qaeda member based in Somalia, who was killed by U.S. forces in a raid in southern Somalia in 2009. Al Kene was an American-Somali Islamist militant from Mogadishu and is linked to Al-Shabab. Umayr's full name and nationality has yet to be established. The Kenya Police claim that all four terrorists were killed when the mall collapsed. However, their charred bodies are still undergoing DNA identification. ChirChir told Reuters, "I confirm these were the terrorists, they all died in the raid." The latest information that only about four to six terrorists stormed the crowded mall on September 21st raises questions about how such a small number of people were able to hold off Kenyan security forces for up to four days. This revelation also contradicts earlier accounts from witnesses and the Kenyan security forces. Earlier some witnesses reported that some of the attackers had managed to escape from the mall by hiding among the hostages. Kenyan authorities had also previously stated that between 10 and 15 terrorists were involved in the attack.

October 11, 2013: KENYA - Coal until geothermal is ready'

(EAN) The government will rely on coal to fire its electricity power plant in its plan to triple capacity to 5000 MW by 2017, as it is cheaper than geothermal power.

October 12, 2013: African Union urges ICC to defer Uhuru Kenyatta case'

BBC News: The African Union summit in Ethiopia has demanded a deferral of The Hague trial of Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta, due to start in November. It also agreed a resolution stating no sitting African head of state should appear before an international court. With both Kenyan and Sudanese presidents facing ICC cases, African leaders have long complained that the court unfairly targets them. The AU had discussed withdrawing from the ICC, but failed to get support. Senior figures including Kofi Annan have criticised plans to quit the ICC.

October 12, 2013: African Union demands ICC trial of Kenyatta be suspended'

(EAN) Updates – News updates: African leaders at the African Union summit in Addis Ababa have called for the International Criminal Court's (ICC) trial of Kenya's President Uhuru Kenyatta to be delayed. Failing this, the continent's leading body decided it is acceptable for President Kenyatta to absent himself from the proceeding which is scheduled to begin on November 12th. President Kenyatta had earlier requested the court grant him permission to attend the proceeding via video link, but nothing came of the request. Under the laws of Kenya, it is unacceptable for the President and his deputy to be out of the country at the same time. But according to the ICC's schedule, both men are expected to be at the Hague at the same time. Explaining the importance of the AU's directive to the ICC and UN Security Council, AU Commission Chairperson Nkosazana Dlamini-Zuma said "We should not allow Kenya slide back [to the destabilised state it was in 2007 following widespread violence after disputed elections] for any reason and the AU is keen to see stability and an improved security situation in Kenya. This requires the undivided attention of its leadership."

There have been concerns about the effect the absence of both leaders will have on the stability of Kenya. These questions have taken on extra importance in light of last month's attack on the Westgate mall and other terrorists attacks in Nairobi in the past few weeks. Earlier in the week, President Kenyatta made it unequivocally clear that he would not shirk his national responsibilities in order to answer to the ICC. There are reports that Kenyatta's legal team have also requested the court halt the proceeding against him as there are concerns he will not get a fair trial. There had been widespread concerns that this gathering, which is focused on the continent's ailing relationship with the international court, will evolve into a platform to generate support for a mass pull out of the ICC. However, this has failed to happen, African leaders seem to be united on one stand and the AU seems to be determined to take charge of its affairs. This request by the AU is the culmination of many months of complaints by numerous African leaders and individuals about the ICC's questionable handling of African cases.

October 14, 2013: Kenya - UK Gov't to Compensate and Apologise to Mau Mau Victims'

(EAN) Summary & Comment: LONDON - UK Foreign Secretary William Hague announced a £14m compensation package in the British House of Commons and expressed "sincere regret" to the more than 5000 victims who have been fighting for years for reparation from the UK government. The Kenya Human Rights Commission says 90,000 Kenyans were executed, tortured or maimed, and 160,000 people were detained in appalling conditions. Most have died since independence. The UK government is expected to announce compensation for and express regrets to the victims who were tortured during the Mau Mau uprising in Kenya in the independence struggle. UK Foreign Secretary William Hague will announce the £14m compensation package in the House of Commons and thereafter express “sincere regret” to the more than 5000 victims who have been fighting for reparation from the UK government. The Mau Mau uprising which emerged in the 1950s fought bitter battles with then the British administration demanding for land and end of the oppressive colonial rule. The victims say they were mistreated-some through torture and other abuses while in detention.

The Mau Mau case becomes the first compensation settlement resulting from the official crimes committed under the British colonial rule. One claimant Mwai Wanughigi in reaction to the compensation scheme said there had been no consultation over the amount they would receive. He said the £3,200 (350,000 Kenyan shillings)per claimant would be inadequate. "These people were relocated, deprived of everything, today they are not able to buy anything when you give them 350,000 Kenyan shillings - and I assure everybody, that figure is not acceptable by any standard," he told the BBC News agency. The case traces its course back in 2002 when the Kenyan government lifted the ban on Mau Mau, that the survivors of the torture began considering legal action. It was not until 2008 when the survivors sought for permission from the High Court in London to sue the British government for damages. It is in October last year, the court ruled the victims had established a proper case and allowed their claims to proceed to trial despite the time elapsed. The British government held that the claim should not be heard, arguing that the Mau Mau veterans should sue the Kenyan government instead, under the legal principle of state succession.

The success of the Mau Mau case follows discovery of crucial documents which the UK Foreign and Commonwealth Office (FCO) had kept hidden for decades. The secret papers revealed that senior colonial officials had authorised appalling abuses of inmates held at the prison camps established at the height of the rebellion. One survivor Wambugu WaNyingi told the high court in London last year during the case that he was detained on the Christmas eve of 1952 and held for nine years, much of the time in shackles. He was beaten unconscious during a particularly notorious massacre at a camp at Hola in which 11 men died. The Mau Mau rebellion consisted of a diverse movement within the Kikuyu, Embu and Meru areas of Kenya's central highlands.Support for the rebellion came from those who objected to Britain's imperial presence, from agricultural workers denied land ownership, and from Nairobi's unemployed. The Kenya Human Rights Commission says 90,000 Kenyans were executed, tortured or maimed, and 160,000 people were detained in appalling conditions.

October 25, 2013: KENYA/SOMALIA – Marine Transport Resurfaces'

(EAN) A Kenyan firm has joined forces with a Singapore shipping company and a Somalian concern to create a Mombasa-Mogadishou shipping route.

October 25, 2013: 15 Kenyan immigration officials fired over WestGate attack'

(EAN) The Kenyan government has dismissed fifteen immigration officials following an investigation into last month's deadly attack on the Westgate mall. Authorities say the officials are being dismissed for their involvement in issuing illegal immigrants with Kenyan identification documents. The officials, which includes senior and mid level immigration officers, are set to be arraigned before a court. Kenya's Cabinet Secretary for the Interior, Ole Lenku said the government wants "to remove all those who may have been part of the network that is facilitating the issuance of Kenyan identification documents to illegal immigrants who turn out to be criminals." He added that "The government is committed to do everything in its power to ensure that Kenyans live in [a] secure and peaceful environment".

The terror attack of September 21st was the deadliest Kenya has experienced in over a decade, leading the government to launch an extensive investigation into the event. All government institutions are set to be audited by security personnels as part of stringent investigations into the siege which left at least 67 people killed and 175 injured. Somali based terror group, Al-Shabab, have since claimed responsibility for the carnage and promise more in a bid to pressurize Kenyan authorities to withdraw from Somalia. Kenya, which shares a northern border with Somalia, is looking to better manage the influx of unregistered immigrants into the country. Security experts believe members of Al-Shabab may be moving through this border into Kenya in search of new recruits and to further develop their network. As part of the efforts to stem this largely uncontrolled illegal immigration, Kenyan authorities are seeking to amend laws which deal directly with the registration of persons.

The government has also recruited some more experienced officers to the immigration department as way of systematically revamping the entire service. The Minister said the government is hopeful "These officers will help to streamline and revamp the immigration department to avoid a recurrence of security lapses we have witnessed in the past." As part of the investigations into the 21st September attack, the Kenyan government is scheduled to carry out a strict examinations of all Kenyan identity cards issued within the last two years. According to reports, about 350,000 identity cards in registration centres across the Kenya have not been claimed. Authorities are giving a waiting period of three months, after which the cards will be destroyed.

October 25, 2013: KENYA – Mwai Kibaki advising Kenyatta on the ICC'

(EAN) Former President Mwai Kibaki deems that his successor Uhuru Kenyatta would have a lot to lose by ceasing cooperation with the International Criminal Court.

October 25, 2013: KENYA - NIS chief stays in his job'

(EAN) During the meeting of the National Security Council (NSC) on 15 October under leadership of President Uhuru Kenyatta, the latter persuaded the head of the National Intelligence Service (NIS, formerly NSIS), General Michael Gichangi, not to resign as he had planned to do so.

October 29, 2013: Paul Kagame of Rwanda pushes Uhuru Kenyatta to defy ICC'

(EAN) President Paul Kagame of Rwanda is encouraging his Kenyan counterpart Uhuru Kenyatta not to go to the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague for his trial which is due to start on 12 November, 2013.

November 1, 2013: KENYA - Government launch anti-corruption website'

(EAN) The Kenyan Strategic Digital Communications Unit have launched a website to allow citizens report instances of corruption directly to President Uhuru Kenyatta. The revolutionary website allows people to anonymously report cases of corruption along with documents like videos, audio recordings and other incriminating materials as evidence. This move is seen as part of the government's efforts to curb widespread corruption in the administration and improve the country's reputation. Recently, human-rights group Transparency International revealed that many Kenyans choose not to report when they encounter corrupt officials because it is believed their complaints will be ignored. The human rights group ranks Kenya 139th out of 176 countries on its global corruption perception index. State House Spokesperson Monoah Esipisu has commended the government's initiative. He described it as a clear example of President Uhuru's tough stand on corruption and other official malpractices. "The president is committed to a clean government and this site advances his intentions to act strongly against corruption," he said.

This digital assault on corruption also sees Kenyan authorities set up an SMS code (33000) to enable people send complaints via text message directly to the head of state. Kenya, like many African countries, has struggled with widespread corruption and this decadent culture is thought to be a major impediment to economic and social progress. Although offering and collecting bribe is considered a crime under the laws of Kenya, the practice has steadily increased. Last year, Kenyan activist Anthony Ragui set up a website – similar to the government's – to tackle corruption in the East African nation. The 'I Paid a Bribe' website has over three-thousand accounts of outrageous demands made by corrupt officials seeking bribes as well as schemes people use to outsmart them. The website also has some inspiring stories of honest officials who refused to be bribed. According to a tweet on the President's Twitter account, Kenyans have already started reporting corrupt officials through the website. Pundits believe more people will be motivated to report corruption once they are convinced their reports will be taken seriously. The Strategic Digital Communications Unit is expected to reveal a draft social media policy for the public service soon. This policy is expected to regulate all Kenyan official communication on the internet.

December 12, 2013: Kenya Celebrates 50 Years of Independence'

EAN - Kenya is celebrating 50 years of independence from British colonial rule. While there is plenty to be merry about, many Kenyans are using the occasion to reflect on the journey ahead and the work to be done as the country grows into a regional economic powerhouse. The celebrations officially kicked off on Wednesday midnight with the Kenyan flag being raised in the Uhuru Gardens in Nairobi. This was done as part of a re-enactment of the historic moment in 1895 when Kenya became politically free of British colonialism. Also as part of celebrations to mark the event, the Kenyan flag is set to be raised at the peak of Mount Kenya. Several climbers are reported to have already set out for the snowy peak. The Kenyan government has also unveiled a special 50 Kenyan Shilling coin to mark the celebrations, which will last until Friday, 13th December. President Uhuru Kenyatta made history earlier when he address the nation on the same grounds as his father Jomo Kenyatta in 1963. President Kenyatta also planted a tree next to one planted by his father during the independence celebrations 50 years ago.

"On this night 50 years ago Kenyans gathered at these grounds, that night was at once the dusk of oppression and the golden dawn of liberty," he remarked. Several delegates from across Africa and the world have sent congratulatory messages and joined Kenya in her celebrations. Britain, Kenya's former colonists, said on Wednesday that it would support the building of a memorial for all those who were brutally killed in the Mau-Mau uprising. Britain's Minister for Africa, Mark Simmonds officially opened a competition for Kenyans to design the building of the memorial in association with the Mau

Mau War Veterans Association and several other parties. “Kenyans were subject to torture and other ill treatment at the hands of [the] colonial administration, and we expressed sincere regret that these abuses took place", Minister Mark Simmonds said. Kenya's independence story begins with the Mau-Mau rebellion orchestrated by Kikuyu ethnic groups.

The freedom fighters, who preferred to refer to themselves as Kenya Land and Freedom Army, fought a historic war between 1952-1960 against the British colonial administration–aided by British troops and soldiers from other African nation. The death of the group's leader, Dedan Kimathi in 1956 marked the end of the rebellion. The Mau-Mau rebellion led to the death of about 10,000 Kenyans. Although this rebellion contributed much to the country's campaign for independence, it also created divisions within the ethnic groups of the young nation. Recently, it was revealed that several of the surviving Mau-Mau warriors still continue their fight for land over 50 years after their bloody war against the British. According to reports, despite several promises from the government, several of the surviving fighters say they have not received the land promised to them by Kenya's first president.

January 22, 2014: East African Community to Launch Single Tourist Visa Next Month'

EAN NAIROBI, KENYA - After its much publicised failure to kick off as expected on January 1st, reportedly due to logistical constraints, the East African Community's single tourist visa is set to be launched next month. According to President Yoweri Musuveni of Uganda in his opening address to the East African Legislative Assembly meeting in Kampala on Tuesday, the implementation of the single visa scheme fits appropriately into the entire East African Community integration strategy, which also includes the establishment of a customs union, a common market and a single currency. He disclosed that the lack of a comprehensive national identification system in Uganda is one of the reasons the launch of the single tourist visa was postponed. Reports had earlier emerged that the scheme was allegedly postponed due to logistical constraints. Officials however promised to resolve these issues within a few weeks.

The visa, which will ultimately cost tourists less time and money, is expected to drastically improve tourism in East Africa. Despite boasting of some of the world's most fascinating natural sites, the tourism industry in east Africa has not grown as fast as many observers expect. The single visa scheme therefore intends to attract tourists with the combined appeal of the entire east African community. But Tanzania and Burundi continue to object to the implementation of the single tourist visa scheme. Protests from these two nations against the scheme last year led Rwanda, Uganda and Kenya (the other members of the east African community) to form a splinter faction, which has been labelled the Coalition of the Willing – putting the other two nations de facto in the opposing Coalition of the Unwilling.

Samuel Sitta, the Minister for East African Cooperation recently revealed that one of the reasons the Tanzanian government objects to the launch of the single tourist visa is due to some disagreements over the revenue sharing agreement between members states of the community. Currently, tourists are required to pay about $50 to renew their visa at the entry point of each nation. However, under the single visa scheme, tourists are required to pay a flat fee of $100 at their first point of entry, which will allow them access to all countries in the community, without any need to renew their visas at each entry point.

Meanwhile, East African leaders have also relayed plans of launching an East African Community passport to give citizens free access to other member states. Since the beginning of this year, however, citizens have been permitted to travel into the territories of other member states with their national identification cards only.

Uhuru Kenyatta at the ICC: Is Justice Deferred, Justice Denied?

By Alemayehu G. Mariam (January 26th, 2014) - I am getting a little jittery over the repeated delays, postponements and all the backpedalling talk about "false evidence" and "lying witnesses" in the Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta International Criminal court trial. I don't want to say I smell a rat but I feel like I am getting a whiff. Is the stage being set to let Kenyatta off the ICC hook?

There has been feverish efforts to defer, delay and dismiss Kenyatta's prosecution as a sitting head of state since January 2012 when the International Criminal Court's (ICC) Pre-Trial Chamber confirmed charges against him. In May 2013, Kenya's Ambassador to the U.N. Macharia Kamau filed a 13-page "Confidential" letter with the President of the UN Security Council seeking to take the Kenyatta case out of ICC hands and directing it to relinquish jurisdiction to Kenyan courts. In the same month, Hailemariam Desalegn, the ceremonial prime minister of Ethiopia and rotational chairman of the African Union, went on the warpath accusing the ICC of going on an African safari "race hunting" black African leaders. In June 2013, the ICC delayed Kenyatta's trial until November 12 having determined Kenyatta's defense team needs adequate time to prepare for trial. In September 2013, Hailemariam formally demanded that the ICC drop charges against both Kenyatta and Ruto. At the 68th UN General Assembly, Hailemariam hectored that the ICC is undermining the "ability of the Kenyan leaders in discharging their constitutional responsibilities" and that dropping the charges “is very critical to support the peace building and national reconciliation processes in [Kenya].”

In October 2013, the African Union (AU) held a special summit to discuss the Kenyata /Ruto ICC trial and to demand that the ICC relinquish jurisdiction to Kenyan courts. In the alternative, they vowed to stage a mass walk out of African countries from the Rome Statute. They gathered in Addis Ababa in a pathetic spectacle like panicked prey fleeing a stalking predator (race hunter) seeking safety in numbers. They huffed and puffed, ranted and raved against the ICC, but the threatened "mass treaty- cide" flopped . The Sturm und Drang of a mass walkout on the Rome Statute proved to be nothing more than a tempest in a teapot. The AU subsequently filed a request with the Security Council to delay Kenyatta's trial by one year. In mid-November 2013, the Security Council rejected a resolution to delay the trial. Ambassador Kamau declared, "The deferral has not been granted. Reason and the law have been thrown out the window, fear and distrust have been allowed to prevail." Surprisingly, the U.S. did the right thing. U.S. UN Ambassador Samantha Power affirmed, "The families of the victims of the 2008 post-election violence in Kenya have already waited more than five years for a judicial weighing of the evidence to commence. We believe that justice for the victims of that violence is critical to the country's long-term peace and security. It is incumbent on us all to support accountability for those responsible for crimes against humanity." Last week, it was announced that Kenyatta's trial set to begin on February 5, 2014 has been postponed once more for three months to give the Prosecutor time to reassess evidence against Kenyatta after "a witness withdrew and another admitted giving false evidence."

False evidence and lying witnesses? For the past month, there has been disturbing talk of "false evidence" and "lying witnesses" in the office of the ICC Prosecutor. On December 19, 2013, ICC Chief Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda said, "On December 4, a key second witness in the case confessed to giving false evidence regarding a critical event in the Prosecution's case. This witness has now been withdrawn from the Prosecution witness list… Having carefully considered my evidence and the impact of the two withdrawals, I have come to the conclusion that currently the case against Mr Kenyatta does not satisfy the high evidentiary standards required at trial… I therefore need time to complete efforts to obtain additional evidence and to consider whether such evidence will enable my office to fully meet the evidentiary threshold required at trial." In March 2013, when the ICC prosecutor dismissed its case against former Kenya head of Civil Service and co-defendant Francis Muthaura, Bensouda said his dismissal has no impact on her case against President-elect Uhuru Kenyatta. "Logic dictates that the withdrawal of charges against one indirect co-perpetrator does not have an automatic knock-on effect with the respect to the charges against another alleged indirect co-perpetrator. The fact that multiple individuals are charged in the same Document Containing Charges under the same mode of liability does not require lock-step decisions to be taken with respect to each co-accused … Whereas Kenyatta was allegedly in charge of the provision of financial and logistical support to the direct perpetrators, Muthaura allegedly secured the support of the Mungiki and directed the latter to commit the crimes in Nakuru and Naivasha (and) provided institutional support for the execution of the crimes on behalf of the PNU Coalition."

Arguments to let Kenyatta and Ruto off the ICC hook: Various legal, political and policy arguments have been advanced to get Kenyatta and Ruto off the ICC hook either by "delaying" their trial until they leave office, granting one-year "deferrals" and postponing the trial indefinitely or dismissing the ICC charges and returning the matter to the jurisdiction of Kenyan courts. Among the major arguments include the following: Prosecuting Kenyatta and Ruto violates Kenyan sovereignty. Kenyatta and Ruto are entitled to immunity from prosecution because they were found "innocent" in the March 2013 election. The evidence against Kenyatta and Ruto is "false and manufactured". The Office of the ICC Prosecutor is unfair and has engaged in a pattern and practice of abuse of prosecutorial powers resulting in a denial of due process to Kenyatta and Ruto. The ICC and the Prosecutor have unchecked powers and are accountable to no one. By prosecuting Kenyatta and Ruto, the ICC has usurped the powers of the U.N. Security Council. The Rome Statute violates the U.N. Charter and its prosecution of Kenyatta and Ruto is illegal and beyond its legal authority (ultra vires). Kenya is ready, willing and able to prosecute violators of crimes under the Rome Statute in its own courts. The ICC prosecution of Kenyatta and Ruto is pointless.

After the dust settles, what African dictators really want is a double standard of justice. They want the ICC to allow them to be prosecuted and adjudicated by their own hand-picked prosecutors and judges at the time of their own choosing.

Handwriting on the wall: "Double standard of justice for African 'leaders' accused of crimes against humanity." Are all the delays, postponements and deferrals gentle hints and winks that some kind of a political "deal" has been cut between the ICC, Kenyatta, the African Union and the UN Security Council to eventually let Kenyatta off the hook? Is all of the talk about recanting and lying witnesses a trial balloon (a way of testing public opinion and gauging potential public reaction) and part of the political theatre to prepare international public opinion for the inevitable dismissal of charges against Kenyatta for lack of evidence? Is there some sort of orchestration (I did not say conspiracy) between the ICC, the African Union, Kenyatta and the U.N. Security Council to let Kenyatta off on a legal technicality? Don't read me wrong. I am just reading the handwriting on the wall and asking questions. That's all.

Will Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta in 2014 walk out of the International Criminal Court "for lack of evidence" and declare to the world, "I told you I was innocent. The ICC's accusations against me were nothing more than race hunting and legal lynching . The ICC is out to get black African leaders… One last thing, Omar al-Bashir of Sudan is also falsely accused. Dismiss the charges against him too…"

Call me suspicious if you like. It is a professional trait; defense lawyers are notoriously suspicious and have hypersensitive olfactory senses to smell rats (I said I just feel like I am getting a whiff). While I am talking about lawyers, let me say that the mantra of the criminal defense lawyer is "deny, delay and defend the case". I am beginning to wonder in the Kenyatta trial if the ICC is getting cold feet and trying to extricate itself from a highly controversial case by adopting a new mantra: "Defer, delay and dismiss the case". I am just thinking out loud. To me, justice deferred, delayed and dismissed is justice denied.

The evidence against Kenyatta: Just as "one swallow does not a summer make", one or two witnesses do not a criminal case make. Kenyatta is charged in a five count indictment under article 25(3)(a) of the Rome Statute for the crimes against humanity including murder (article 7(l)(a), deportation or forcible transfer (article 7(l)(d), rape (article 7(l)(g), persecution (article 7(l)(h), and other inhumane acts (article 7(l)(k). The allegation are based on evidence shocking to the conscience and detailed in a 155- page document based on the testimony of hundreds of witnesses . When the Pre-Trial Chamber confirmed the allegations against Kenyatta, it wrote, "the Prosecutor has provided sufficient evidence to establish substantial grounds to believe that the contextual elements common to all crimes against humanity are fulfilled…"

Much of the testimonial evidence against Kenyatta is independently corroborated and documented. For instance, the ICC Pre-Trial Chamber determined "there are substantial grounds to believe that on 3 January 2008 at the Nairobi Club… Mr. Kenyatta met with Mungiki members [sometimes referred to as the "Kenyan mafia"] and directed them to commit the crimes charged." There is substantial evidence to show Kenyatta and others "agreed to pursue an organizational policy to keep the PNU [former president Kibaki's Party of National Unity] in power through every means necessary, including orchestrating a police failure to prevent the commission of crimes". There is substantial evidence to show Kenyatta and Co., "devised a common plan to commit widespread and systematic attacks against perceived ODM supporters by: (i) penalizing them through retaliatory attacks; and (ii) deliberately failing to take action to prevent or stop the retaliatory attacks”.

There is substantial evidence to show Kenyatta "taking the role of mediator between the PNU and the Mungiki criminal organization, facilitated a series of meetings from November 2007" in which "senior PNU government officials, politicians, businessmen and Mungiki leaders solicit[ed] the assistance of the Mungiki in supporting the government in the December 2007 elections". There is substantial evidence to show that in the post-election period, Kenyatta and others "facilitated the meetings with the Mungiki with a view to organizing retaliatory attacks against perceived ODM [Orange Democratic Movement] supporters in the Rift Valley [and] strengthen the PNU's hold on power after the swearing in of the President". There is substantial evidence to show Kenyatta and others "contributed to the implementation of the common plan, by securing the non-intervention of the Kenya Police and by failing to punish the main perpetrators of the attacks."

It seems the ICC Prosecutor's position is that the alleged false testimony of two witnesses completely undermines the Prosecution's case. It is not at all clear why the two witnesses gave false testimony in the first place and how the ICC Prosecutor's office failed to further corroborate their testimony before filing charges. It is, however, a fact that witnesses against Kenyatta have been threatened and bribed. In February 2013, Prosecutor Bensouda claimed Kenyatta bribed a witness to withdraw his testimony and not to testify in the case. Bensouda stated, "Witness 4 revealed in May 2012 interview that he had been offered, and accepted, money from individuals holding themselves out as representatives of the accused to withdraw his testimony against Uhuru… The witness provided emails and bank records that confirmed the bribery scheme. In light of these cumulative revelations, the prosecution considers it is not useful to call him as a witness." Kenyatta's defense team has also demanded the ICC turn over to Kenyan authorities the evidence given by the "self confessed criminals so they can face the full force of the law." Prosecutor Bensouda had asked the Court to grant the witnesses courtroom protective measures, including voice and image distortion, use of pseudonyms and in camera sessions for identifying evidence. Should it come as a surprise to anyone that witnesses who face massive retaliatory actions by the Kenyan Government suddenly declare they have given false testimony to save their lives?

I believe the whole "lying witnesses" "false evidence" talk is disingenuous. The case against Kenyatta is not based on the testimony of a couple of witnesses. There are hundreds of witnesses who gave evidence. There is "substantial evidence" to bring Kenyatta to trial and let the Court determine whether that evidence points to Kenyatta's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. It is incomprehensible that ICC Prosecutor should hinge her entire case on the veracity or recantation of one or two witnesses.

There is a mountain of circumstantial evidence against him. There is no reason not to proceed with the trial.

Time for an ICC Witness Protection Program? Witness intimidation, paying off witnesses, subornation of perjury and witnesses changing stories are nothing new particularly in high profile criminal trials. It is not uncommon for witnesses to recant (take back) testimony before or after trial. It is not uncommon for intimidated witnesses not to cooperate with prosecutors or make themselves intentionally unavailable as witnesses at trial. For instance, witnesses ("snitches") in the criminal trials of Mafia bosses and other underworld figures have been known to recant or withdraw their testimonies because of intimidation and threats to themselves and family members. Jurors have been bribed by criminal bosses to return not guilty verdicts. In fairness, witnesses are also pressured by prosecutors who offer "cooperating" witnesses secret deals in the form of reduced charges and sentences and other benefits to give testimony. The recantation of the Kenyatta witnesses raises unsettling and puzzling questions. It seems they are withdrawing their testimonies not because they actually gave "false testimony" but because they fear certain retaliation if they appear at trial and testify. Their recantations should not be taken as genuine but as the product of fear of persecution and prosecution.

I believe there is a reasonable solution to the problem of recanting witnesses in the Kenyatta trial: Create an "International Criminal Court Witness Protection Program" for deserving witnesses. In the U.S., the Federal Witness Protection Program provides protection to threatened witnesses before, during, and after a trial. In the program, witnesses and their family are provided new identities and documentation and relocated. Since the program was launched in 1971, nearly ten thousand witnesses and family members have been placed in the witness protection program. Incredibly, "95% of the witnesses in the program are criminals."

I believe the ICC should launch its own "Witness Protection Program" for witnesses coming forward to testify against suspects charged with crimes against humanity, genocide and other infamous crimes. The numerous Munguki ("Kenya's mafia") Mafia) face real (not imagined) threats of persecution and prosecution not only from the Government of Kenya but also the wrath of their own organization for attracting such unwelcome attention of the government. The Munguki witnesses should be presented the option of testifying the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth at the trial of Kenyatta and being placed in a witness protection program outside of Kenya. Without an ICC witness protection program, it would nearly impossible to get cooperating witnesses with credible evidence to come forward. Few would be brave enough to pay the cost in their lives to bring the truth to light. Without a witness protection program, I believe many African criminals against humanity in power today would feel assured that they will laugh their way out of the International Criminal Court certain in the k nowledge that no one in their countries would dare testify against them and expect to live. The ICC should learn this fundamental lesson from the Kenyatta case.

Could the ICC let Kenyatta off the hook? I want to make it absolutely crystal clear that I have no evidence or objective basis to believe or suspect the ICC will let Kenyatta off the hook for political or other reasons. I need to state no reasons in defense of my faith in the integrity of the institution as I have volunteered myself to be a " Witness for the ICC." I will readily accept any criticism suggesting that my anxiety about the ICC letting Kenyatta off the hook is a figment of an overactive and suspicious legal imagination. I much prefer to think that it is a product of a "thought experiment", an exploration of hypothetical counterfactual propositions and imaginary situations to think through possible consequences and outcomes of real problems. This commentary is my "thought experiment" about thinking the unthinkable, the unimaginable: 1) "The ICC has dismissed the charges against Uhuru Muigai Kenyatta for lack of substantial evidence."

I agree fully with the observations of U.S. UN Ambassador Samantha Power: "The families of the victims of the 2008 post-election violence in Kenya have already waited more than five years for a judicial weighing of the evidence to commence. We believe that justice for the victims of that violence is critical to the country's long-term peace and security. It is incumbent on us all to support accountability for those responsible for crimes against humanity." In other words, justice deferred, delayed and dismissed is justice denied!

Africa: Uhuru Kenyatta Roots for an African Army'

Addis Ababa, Ethiopia — (January 30, 2014) - President Uhuru Kenyatta has challenged African countries to scale up their contribution to peace and stability in the continent. He backed the call made by the African Ministers of Defence for all countries to meet their obligations in ensuring an African Standby Force is ready for deployment by 2015. "Our partners and friends have been of great help to us. But to rely on outside help for our security would be to sully our independence. In any case, the help is often inadequate to our needs, and its application inflexible," President Kenyatta said. He was addressing the 22nd Ordinary Session of the African Union Heads of State and Government Summit in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia on Thursday. As part of Kenya's 50th anniversary and an expression of solidarity with the continent's determination to secure its future, President Kenyatta announced a voluntary contribution of $1 million (Sh86 million) to the AU Peace Fund.

"Whichever way it is used, we have made concrete our commitment to solidarity and peace in this time of conflict," President Kenyatta said.

On the Central Africa Republic and South Sudan, the President said the conflicts have reminded the continent of the need to galvanise support to pre-empt political differences before they deteriorate into full-blown wars. "These conflicts, so near to us, remind us that we must join hands with our neighbours to prevent them from breaking, and respond to them when they do break, as occasionally they will," the President said.

He disclosed that with partners in East Africa, Kenya is building a Rapid Deployment Capability as part of the East Africa Standby Force. The President said his Government has already a fully-fledged Rapid Deployment Capability to be activated in emergencies.

"It is not enough - the full value of this capacity will be realised only when all our states stand equivalent capabilities, and can meet any threat to our nations, regions and the continent quickly, firmly and judiciously," he said.

Saying Africans are reviving the promise of prosperity in regional and continental cooperation, President Kenyatta said the countries should use the bonds of solidarity to defend their legacy

On agriculture and food security, the President commended African countries' efforts to free themselves from foreign domination by ensuring self-reliance in food production.

"More than 30 of us have committed ourselves to spend 10 percent of GDP on our agricultural sectors," the President said.

He said innovation in science and technology has improved production, citing the example of tissue culture, which has doubled banana yields and tripled the yield per hectare in Kenya.

"No one can deny our progress. No one can deny that much remains to be done. The broad shape of the road ahead is clear. We have proven adept users of markets, information and new technologies. Let us put them to use in delivering ourselves from hunger," President Kenyatta said.

In his address, Mauritanian President Mohamed Ould Abdel Aziz, the incoming AU Chairman, said for most African countries, agriculture constitutes "the development battlefield where the war on poverty, hunger and indignity could be won".

"The agenda of agricultural transformation is strategically positioned to provide enormous opportunities for inclusive and sustainable development in Africa," he said.

The AU Chairman said following the adoption of the Comprehensive Africa Agriculture Development Programme (CAADP) in 2003, the continent has made significant strides in agricultural growth targets. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA/KENYA: Kenya charges 2 police officers for the kidnapping of 2 Ethiopian rebel negotiators' (AP) NAIROBI, KENYA – Two Kenya police officers have denied kidnapping two officials of the Ethiopian rebel group the Ogaden National Liberation Front. The two men were charged Thursday with the Jan. 26 kidnapping of Sulub Abdi Ahmed and Ali Ahmed Hussein, members of the ONLF team that was negotiating with the Ethiopian government. According to Abdi Rahman Mahdi, the chief negotiator for the rebels, after the pair's abduction the two were driven to the Kenya-Ethiopian border where they were picked up by Ethiopian helicopters. Mahdi said if the two are not released by Ethiopia unconditionally, negotiation between the ONLF and Ethiopian government will not resume. Negotiations broke down in October 2012. The rebels want an independent state for Ethiopia's Ogaden region, which is mostly inhabited by ethnic Somalis.

KENYA/ETHIOPIA – 2 Kenyan cops due in court for the abduction of ONLF negotiators with Ethiopia' (AP) NAIROBI, Kenya Updates: Two Kenyan police officers will be charged in court with the kidnapping of two officials of the Ethiopian rebel group, the Ogaden National Liberation Front, a Kenyan official said Monday.

Nairobi Criminal Investigations chief Nicholas Kamwende said witnesses identified the two Kenyan officers as having allegedly abducted of Sulub Abdi Ahmed and Ali Ahmed Hussein on Jan. 26 outside a restaurant in the capital, Nairobi.

The two police officers were brought to court on Monday but the reading of their charges was postponed until Thursday.

Court documents show that Kenyan police believe that after their abduction Ahmed and Hussein were taken to Ethiopia. The rebels want an independent state for Ethiopia's Ogaden region, which is mostly inhabited by ethnic Somalis.

Ahmed and Hussein were part of Ogaden rebel team in Kenya for negotiations with the Ethiopian government, said Abdi Rahman Mahdi, the chief negotiator for rebels told AP from London in a telephone interview.

Mahdi said on the day they were abducted, Ahmed, a negotiator, and Hussein, a member of the negotiation team's secretariat, were invited for lunch by an unknown person.

When the two walked out of the restaurant after lunch, six men came out of two cars and attempted to grab them but they resisted causing a melee, Mahdi said reconstructing event from witnesses and accounts given to him by the Kenya police.

Mahdi said Ahmed and Hussein were subdued when one of the abductors pulled out a police identification card and shouted for help from the crowd gathering around to see the commotion claiming that he was arresting two terrorists "who were planning to bomb the country."

He said with help from some people from the crowd the abductors forced Ahmed and Hussein into the cars using blows and kicks. Mahdi said the two were driven to Moyale, at the Kenyan-Ethiopia border where they were picked up by helicopters

"We fear for their lives and their well-being," he said. Mahdi said he did not think the Kenyan government knew about the abduction and claimed it was solely the work of the Ethiopian military commander in charge of Eastern Command under which the Ogaden region falls.

Shimelis Kemal, an Ethiopian government spokesman, said he has no information about the alleged kidnapping of Ogaden officials in Nairobi.

Mahdi said without the unconditional release of the two rebel members negotiations with Ethiopia will not resume and Kenya will no longer be safe as a venue to hold the talks. He said Kenya has been working to revive the talks.

"If they're not returned safely it will be very hard for us to face another round of talks with Ethiopia let alone coming to Kenya," he said.

Negotiation between the Ethiopian government and Ogaden rebels broke down in Oct 2012 after the Ethiopian government side walked out of the talks. Mahdi claimed the Ethiopian government made demands for the talks to begin which the rebels refused because both parties had agreed there should be no pre-conditions for the talks to be held.

The Ogaden rebels are blamed for the 2007 attack on a Chinese-run oil field in the region in which scores died. (Text ends)

ETHIOPIA/KENYA : Police officers deny abducting Ethiopian ONLF rebel negotiators’

BBC (February 6, 2014) Two Kenyan police officers have pleaded not guilty to kidnapping two Ethiopian rebels in the capital, Nairobi. Painito Bera Ng'ang'ai and James Ngaparini are alleged to have driven to the Ethiopian border and handed them over to Ethiopian officials. The men are from a splinter group of the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), fighting for independence for the Somali-speaking Ogaden region. They were in Kenya to facilitate peace talks with the Ethiopian government. Correspondents say their alleged abduction on 26 January is threatening to scupper the next round of talks. Sulub Abdi Ahmed and Ali Ahmed Hussein are senior negotiators for the ONLF in the talks being brokered by the Kenyan government.

The ONLF told the BBC Somali Service that it believed the Ethiopian government was behind their kidnapping. But Abdinur Abdullahi Farah, a security adviser to the president of the Somali region, as the Ogaden is officially known, told US VOA radio that the men had given themselves up voluntarily. Rebels in the Ogaden region have been fighting for independence since the 1970s and the ONLF has been at the forefront of the fight since it was founded in 1984. The Ogaden is an ethnic Somali part of Ethiopia. One ONLF faction has signed a peace deal with the government, but another has continued to fight the army.

Controversial Kenyan polygamy law: Female MPs storm out of parliament’

BBC News (March 21, 2014) - Female MPs in Kenya have stormed out of a late-night parliamentary session in a row over the legalisation of polygamy. The law is intended to bring civil law, where a man is only allowed one wife, into line with customary law, where some cultures allow multiple partners. But male MPs voted to amend the new marriage bill to allow men to take as many wives as they like without consulting existing spouses. Traditionally, first wives are supposed to give prior approval. Correspondents say about 30 of Kenya's 69 female MPs were in the 349-member chamber for the debate but were outnumbered by their male counterparts. The women walked out in disgust over the matter. The marriage bill now passes to the president to sign before it becomes law.

This is Africa: MP Samuel Chepkong'a, who proposed the amendment, said that when a woman got married under customary law, she understood that the marriage was open to polygamy, so no consultation was necessary, Kenya's Daily Nation newspaper reports. Mohammed Junet, an MP representing a constituency from the western Nyanza province, agreed. "When you marry an African woman, she must know the second one is on the way and a third wife… this is Africa," Kenya's Capital News website quotes him as saying.

But female MPs argued that such a decision would affect the whole family, including the financial position of other spouses. "It behoves you to be man enough to agree that your wife and family should know," Capital News quotes Soipan Tuya, the women's representative from Narok County, as saying.

The BBC's Angela Ngendo in the capital, Nairobi, says the new marriage legislation has been under discussion for several years and some initial proposals were scrapped at committee stages. Plans to ban the payment of bride prices were dropped - although a person must be 18 to marry and this will apply to all cultures.

Proposals to ensure equal property and inheritance rights were also watered down - a woman will be entitled to 30% of matrimonial property after death or divorce. Under current Kenyan law, a woman must prove her contribution to the couple's wealth. There was also a proposal to recognise co-habiting couples, known in Kenya as "come-we-stay" relationships, after six months, but this too was dropped. It would have allowed a woman to seek maintenance for herself and any children of the union had the man left.

Kenya's marriage bill

Bans marriage for those under 18

All marriages - even customary unions - must be registered

Legalises polygamy, allowing men to marry without consulting other spouses

A woman entitled to 30% of matrimonial property

Specifies that marriage is between a man and a woman, but does not explicitly ban custom of an infertile woman marrying a younger woman

Proposals dropped: Banning bride price payments, recognising cohabiting, or "come-we-stay", relationships.

PRESS: End of Kenayatta and Ruto's honeymoon period’

ION (March 28, 2014) - Ever since President Uhuru Kenyatta and Vice President William Ruto came to power a year ago, their main battle has been to try to delay their trial before the International Criminal Court (ICC). During this period, they have had to deal with problems at home getting steadily worse: crime and terrorist acts have grown steeply and the new institutions (county governorships and the senate) are in a muddled state, and so on. Not only that, there has been infighting among the presidential staff to extend their prerogatives, leading to internal bureaucratic squabbles. It's no easy matter to keep election promises in a context like this, while also trying to rein in the public deficit. In addition, corruption still looms as large as ever in the higher echelons of the civil service, fuelled by a good economic outlook, particularly in the energy sector. The overall record of this first year of Kenyatta and Ruto's five year term has turned out quite chaotic.

Kenya: Somali Kenyans are treated like second-class citizens’

Nairobi (HAN) April 13, 2014 - The same question remains unresolved despite the collective national pretense that all Kenyans are equal, writes Ahmednasir Abdullahi.

There is a great urgency for President Uhuru Kenyatta to call for a national convention to determine once and for all the fate of Kenyan Somalis in Kenya.

Are Kenyan Somalis Shiftas who should move with their camels to Somalia? Or should Kenyan Somalis be confined to what was once called the Northern Frontier Districts (NFD)? Are Kenyan Somalis genuine and bonafide citizens?

"A second class citizen is defined as: a person whose rights and opportunities are treated as less important than those of other people in the same society"

Who Is Somali? Kenyan man Talk about Somalis - influence of Kenyan Security minister

"This act of cowardice perpetrated against innocent and peace-loving Kenyans who were going about their normal activities is barbaric," Joseph Ole Lenku said in a statement.

These are questions that have stubbornly refused to go away since 1963. They are questions the country can no longer ignore. The questions need urgent answers.

Kenya and Kenyan Somalis, for the first time since 1963, need to negotiate on the way forward. And President Uhuru must provide leadership to the process.

Uhuru's father tried to solve the Somali question through the barrel of the gun. He succeeded in putting out the fire for secession but failed to win the hearts and minds of Kenyan Somalis. His successor, Daniel arap Moi, tried to solve the Somali question by using force, thinking that those who would survive would flee with their camels.

Mwai Kibaki simply thought that such a question was too absurd. Uhuru, in office for 12 months, faces the same question his father faced in his first year as Prime Minister.

The mass arrest of Somalis in Nairobi in the past two weeks and the inhumane and degrading camp they are being held in shouldn't be blamed on the Interior Minister Joseph ole Lenku and Police Inspector-General David Kimaiyo.

To do so would be too naive. True, both gentlemen have little understanding of the security challenges facing the country. But that doesn’t mean they are in charge or even privy to the end game of the exercise.

Mr Lenku was a beverage manager in a two star hotel in the outskirts of Nairobi, while Mr Kimaiyo, a Bible-wielding police officer, spends more time in Bible studies than in mapping out security strategies. How can one blame these two innocent Kenyans for what has befallen the Somali community?

DENATIONALIZED THROUGH SCREENING

From 1963 to date, Somalis in Kenya have been subjected to one form or another of indiscriminate gross human rights abuse.

The army and police in government-sanctioned massacres have killed hundreds in the past 50 years. Somalis in Kenya seem to be, in law and in fact, second-class citizens.

The entire community was denationalised through the screening exercise of 1989, with thousands expelled and others issued with pink cards to certify their Kenyan nationality.

Northern Kenya has since 1963 remained under-developed due to deliberate governmental policy. The health services, education sector and other socio-economic indicators are at byzantine level.

National identity cards are restricted, disenfranchising thousands during election periods. Even the government is contesting, through the courts, the population numbers of Kenyan Somalis.

Then we have the five-year ritual when the government, through its actions like the current screening in Nairobi, reminds the community — just in case they forgot — that they are not real citizens after all.

Fifty years since 1963 has taught one painful lesson to Kenyan Somalis: That Somalis will never be accepted or treated as true citizens of Kenya.

The reason is simple. Because this country has failed to address the Somali question in Kenya, and why Somalis voted to secede and fought to secede in 1960s, the same remains unresolved despite the collective national pretence that all Kenyans are equal.

Kenyan Somalis at times naively buy into this national delusion until they are violently awakened to the reality by events like the current exercise, and then put in their rightful place.

Fifty years of abuse and neglect is too long to endure. But it is not that Kenyan Somalis don’t want to be part of Kenya. It is Kenya that does not want Somalis in Kenya.

May 12, 2014: COOPERATION: China signs mega east Africa rail deal’

Nairobi (AFP) - China on Sunday signed a deal to build a $3.8 billion rail link between Kenya's Indian Ocean port of Mombasa and Nairobi, the first stage of a line that will eventually link Uganda, Rwanda, Burundi and South Sudan. Under the terms of the agreement, Exim Bank of China will provide 90 percent of the cost to replace the crumbling British colonial-era line with a 609.3 kilometre (379 mile) standard-gauge link and Kenya the remaining 10 percent.

Construction is due to start in October and take three-and-a-half years to complete, with China Communications Construction Co. as the main contractor. Once the Mombasa-Nairobi line is completed, construction would begin to link east Africa's largest economy with Kampala, Kigali, Bujumbura and Juba. The deal was signed at State House in Nairobi and witnessed by presidents Uhuru Kenyatta of Kenya, Yoweri Museveni of Uganda, Paul Kagame of Rwanda and Salva Kiir of South Sudan.

"This project demonstrates that there is equal cooperation and mutual benefit between China and the East African countries, and the railway is a very important part of transport infrastructure development," Chinese Premier Li Keqiang said.

May 12, 2014: KENYA: African Union: Reject Immunity for Leaders’

African Groups say Plan Would Harm Regional Court

(HRW) Justice ministers and attorney generals of African Union (AU) member countries are scheduled to meet in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia on May 15 and16, 2014, to consider a draft protocol to expand the authority of the African Court on Justice and Human Rights to include criminal jurisdiction over genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity. A proposal providing immunity for heads of state and senior government officials from prosecution for such crimes is being considered as part of the amended protocol.

“Exempting sitting heads of state and senior government officials from African Court jurisdiction on grave crimes would shield the powerful from the reach of the law,” said Sulemana Braimah, executive director of the Media Foundation for West Africa. “This is fundamentally at odds with the AU Constitutive Act, which rejects impunity.” The consideration of the draft protocol comes at a time of intense opposition to the International Criminal Court (ICC) by some African leaders, particularly in the face of the ICC’s proceedings against Uhuru Kenyatta and William Ruto, who were later elected as Kenya’s president and vice president. “Impunity remains one of the biggest threats to human rights protection in Africa,” said Thuso Ramabolu, human rights officer at Lesotho’s justice, irrespective of their official positions. Immunity poses grave alarm and would create an incentive to hold on to power indefinitely."

Transformation Resource Centre. “It’s crucial for people responsible for mass atrocities to face

International conventions, including the Convention against Torture, the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, and the Geneva Conventions of 1949 recognize the imperative of accountability for grave crimes irrespective of the title or position of those responsible. The irrelevance of official capacity before international criminal courts has become entrenched in international law since the post-World War II trials before the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg. Immunity with respect to serious crimes is also barred before some domestic courts in Africa. (Text ends)

May 12, 2014:KENYA: Groups say Refugee journalists under attack in Kenya'

Reporters Without Borders (RSF), the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), and the Rory Peck Trust—three international organizations dedicated to defending freedom of information and journalists worldwide— are writing to express concern over the Kenyan government's recent decision to transfer all urban refugees to designated areas.

Research conducted by organizations indicates that refugee journalists, whose work makes them highly visible at home and recognizable in their respective communities in exile, make up a particularly vulnerable population. Transferring them to designated areas that are known to be penetrated by Somali insurgents and Ethiopian intelligence agents, puts them at risk of continued threats and persecution for their work.

As known, in December 2012, Kenya's Department of Refugee Affairs (DRA) issued a directive ordering all refugees to be relocated to designated areas. After Kenya's High Court declared the directive unconstitutional in 2013, the DRA appealed the decision. The official status of urban refugees remains ambiguous.

Kenya expels hundreds of Somalis'

AFP (May 23, 2014)

Nairobi - Hundreds of Somalis have been expelled from Kenya, with 98 in the latest batch detained and sent back in a major crackdown on suspected Islamists, Human Rights Watch (HRW) said Friday. The crackdown, which has seen people held in police cells or a football stadium, follows a spate of attacks in Kenya by suspected supporters of Somalia's Al-Qaeda-linked Shebab rebels.

A batch sent to Somalia by airplane on Tuesday was the fourth round sent home, taking the total expelled to 359, HRW said. "Deporting people to conflict zones in Somalia shows a total disregard for their rights and their safety," said HRW's Gerry Simpson, adding that returning refugees against their will to a war zone is unlawful.

"What little remains of Kenya’s shaky reputation for respecting basic refugee rights is fast disappearing," Simpson added. The UN's refugee agency has said it was "concerned" at the wave of arrests and has demanded access to those detained.

The Shebab on Thursday vowed to move their war to Kenya, in a broadcast by a top commander urging fighters to rise up against Nairobi. Kenyan troops crossed into southern Somalia in 2011 to fight the Shebab, later joining the now 22,000-strong UN-mandated African Union force battling the Islamists.

Fighter jets, believed to be from Kenya, pounded Shebab strongholds this week, as part of the latest push against the insurgents by the AU force, which said it was targeting its "senior leadership and foreign fighters" and boasted of having killed over 50 rebels.

The Shebab, who claimed responsibility for the September 2013 attack on Nairobi's Westgate mall in which at least 67 people were killed, have also been blamed for a string of grenade blasts and killings. Late Thursday a grenade blast in the port city of Mombasa wounded two police officers.

Kenya's key tourism industry has been badly damaged after western nations issued warnings advising travellers to avoid Mombasa due to the threat of attacks. Last week two British tour operators evacuated hundreds of tourists from coastal resorts.

Islamist gunmen kill at least 48 in Kenya attack’

Mombasa (Kenya), AFP (June 16, 2014)

At least 48 people were killed when suspected Shebab militants from Somalia stormed into a Kenyan coastal town and launched a major assault on a police station, hotels and government offices, officials said on Monday.

Around 50 heavily-armed gunmen drove into the town of Mpeketoni, near the coastal island and popular tourist resort of Lamu, late on Sunday. Witnesses said they first attacked a police station, before starting to randomly shoot at civilians, some of whom had been watching the World Cup in local bars and hotels.

District deputy commissioner Benson Maisori said several buildings in the town — which is around 100 kilometres (60 miles) from the border with Somalia — were burned down including hotels, restaurants, banks and government offices.

“There were around 50 attackers, heavily armed in three vehicles, and they were flying the Shebab flag. They were shouting in Somali and shouting ‘Allahu Akbar’ (‘God is Greatest’),” he said.

Local resident and witness John Waweru, 28, said he lost two of his brothers to the attackers.

“The attackers came in around 9pm. I heard them shouting in Somali as they fired around. I lost two of my brothers, and I escaped. I ran and locked up myself in a house,” he told AFP.

The fierce gun battles continued until after midnight, but by dawn on Monday the town of Mpeketoni was reported calm with security forces saying they were in pursuit of the attackers and authorities recovering the dead.

“The number of bodies taken to the mortuary is 47, while one has died in hospital,” a local police officer said, as the Kenyan Red Cross also confirmed 48 people had died.

“Our officers are still combing the area,” Kenyan police chief David Kimaiyo told AFP. “It is an atrocity we would not want to see repeated anywhere else.”

“We suspect the involvement of Al-Shebab in this attack. We are appealing for calm as we do our best the search for the attackers. It is a very unfortunate incident.”

Kenyan troops crossed into southern Somalia in 2011 to fight the Shebab, later joining the now 22,000-strong African Union force battling the Al-Qaeda-linked militants.

The Shebab vowed revenge, carrying out a string of attacks on Kenyan soil, including last September’s assualt on Nairobi’s Westgate mall in which at least 67 people were killed.

‘Bodies on the road’

The town of Mpeketoni, a trading centre on the main coastal road, lies on the mainland some 30 kilometres (20 miles) southwest of Lamu island, a popular tourist destination whose ancient architecture is listed as a UNESCO World Heritage site.

Kenyan army spokesman Major Emmanuel Chirchir described how the gunmen had stormed the town, overwhelming local police officers, and firing from vehicles “shooting people around in town.”

Chirchir also said the attackers were “likely to be Al-Shebab,” although there was no immediate claim of responsiblity from the Islamists themselves.

Military surveillance planes were launched shortly after the attack began.

Attackers tried to storm a police post including an armoury, but Maisori said officers had defended the building and fought the gunmen off.

Residents in villages surrounding the town also reporting that the gunmen attacked settlements as they pulled out after fighting in Mpeketoni. (Text ends)

“There are six bodies here, a man and a child in their house, four lying on the road,” said Mohammed Hassan, a local resident of Kibaoni, a small settlement some five kilometres (three miles) outside the town.

Last month one of the Shebab’s most senior commanders, Fuad Mohamed Khalaf, released radio broadcasts urging fighters to strike Kenya.

Hundreds of British tourists were also evacuated last month from beach resorts near Kenya’s port city of Mombasa following new warnings of terror attacks from Britain’s Foreign Office.

Britain this week released warnings to citizens in several East African nations — including Djibouti, Ethiopia, Kenya and Uganda, who all have troops in Somalia — speaking of the threat of attacks at public screenings of the World Cup.

The Shebab claimed responsiblity last month for killing two Kenyan soldiers in the same district as Sunday’s attack, although further north nearer to the lawless border zone with Somalia. (Text ends)

KENYA: Aircraft that transports Khat to Somali capital crashed in Kenya’ ‘

Euronews (July 2, 2014) - TV footage taken from the crash site showed the aircraft had been transporting tonnes of the mild drug Khat when hit a commercial building shortly after take off from the city’s main international hub. The plane had reportedly been heading to the Somali capital of Mogadishu. Early investigations into the accident suggest the plane had been flying low and might have hit an electrical pole before crashing. Recently banned in Britain, Khat remains popular in parts of east Africa, particularly in Ethiopia and Somalia.

Kenya: Commissioner Warns Ethiopia ‘Assassins’

Africa, Immigration, Politics BY STEPHEN ASTARIKO, The Star (July 14, 2014)

Garissa county commissioner Rashid Khator has warned illegal immigrants from Ethiopia against committing crimes in Kenya. Khator said the criminals are sent from Ethiopia as hired assassins. The criminals are part of the Oromo Liberation Front rebels, who oppose the national government. Last week, a rebel crossed into Kenya and killed a businessman in Garissa town. The man was arrested while in a group of three while trying to flee after killing a businessman in the town. Khator was addressing residents in Garissa town on Saturday.

Report from Xinhua: The Kenyan police said Sunday they have arrested five key suspects behind a spate of insecurity which has rocked the northern Kenya, particularly Garissa town, scarred by previous terrorist attacks. Detectives have also released identities of the serial killers who have claimed five lives within two months. Regional Criminal Investigation Department commander Musa Yego told Xinhua that the police are interrogating three Ethiopians and two Kenyans in the last two days with regards to bomb and grenade attacks in Garissa town. “We are happy that we have made a breakthrough to unravel unexplained killings that have thrown our town into security scare in the last two months,” Yego said. “Among those arrested are three Ethiopian suspected to be from the Somali region (Ethiopia), while two others were Kenyans, a taxi driver and a landlord,” he added.

Yego said the taxi driver was helping to transport the killers to their destination during their killing spree in the town, while the landlord had been giving accommodation to the foreign criminals by renting his houses to them without informing the security agencies of their illegal presence in the country. The investigators are being helped with investigation by one of the assailants, who was arrested last Wednesday by members of the public shortly after killing a prominent businessman along Gulled hotel area. Yego said the police have recovered some vital documents, including an Ethiopian passport and communication tracks, that indicates there are teams of people believed to be security officials from the Somali region of Ethiopia sneaking into the country through Moyale and Mandera border points on a mission to kill people they suspect to have associations with a rebel group back at home and cause tribal clashes in the county.

“The passport carried by the suspected killer who was arrested in Garissa briefly after killing a businessman indicates he entered the country through Moyale border before heading to Nairobi, where we believe he met some people, before traveling to Garissa to cause a felony,” he noted. Yego urged the residents in northeast region to be on the look out and avoid embracing people from other countries and giving them accommodation without first establishing their motive in the country. Two of the assassins, Khalif Hassan, 38, and Abdirahman Abdi, 40, who are the team leaders are among those in custody at Garissa police station now. While speaking to Xinhua on phone from London, the Oromo National Liberation Front (ONLF) foreign secretary Abdirahman Sheikh Mahdi blamed the attacks in Garissa on Ethiopian intelligence officers of changing their tactics to fight them by carrying out criminal activities inside friendly country to discredit them. “They want to carry out killings inside Kenya and in turn blame on us so that Kenya, which has been hosting hundreds of thousands of our refugees and asylum seekers, can turn hostile against our people," he said. Source: Xinhua

Report from Kenya Standard Media: Garissa, Kenya: Two armed people were on Tuesday evening shot and seriously wounded in Garissa town, Garissa County. The two were shot by a gang of unidentified assailants along Ngamia Road adjacent to Gulied Hotel in the middle of Garissa town at around 4pm. Police were alerted of the shooting by members of the public. When police responded to rescue the victims, they found two pistols in their possession. Speaking to The Standard at the Garissa General Hospital the local County Commissioner Rashid Khator said the two, who were being treated at the hospital, were under police watch. We suspect the two were planning criminal activities before they were shot by another group of armed people who may have been following them, Khator said.

Our officers have handed over the recovered firearms to balistic experts to ascertain their origin and whether they were used in the renewed mystery killings witnessed in Garissa town in the recent past," he said. He added that the victims will help the security agentsÃ,Â unravel the mystery. Curious public onlookers jammed the hospital disrupting medical services to the patients, forcing security personnel accompanying the wounded culprits to use teargas canisters to disperse them. Khator decline to comment whether the attackers could be the members of the Somali Islamist group Al-Shabaab who have claimed responsibility for previous killings in the town. A sources who sought anonymity said the victims who were shot are close relatives of the cleric who was shot dead recently near Khalif Mosque a few metres from the scene of Tuesday attack. (Text ends)

August 9, 2014 UN: Drought and war in East Africa put 14 million people at risk, In Ethiopia 2.7 million refugees are in dire need of supplies. EAST AFRICA, NAIROBI (AFP) – Poor rains and multiple conflicts across eastern Africa have put over 14 million people in need of food aid, three years since extreme drought devastated the region, the United Nations said Friday.

"The situation is very worrisome," said Matthew Conway, spokesman for the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) for Eastern Africa. "There are similarities to the situation that we saw leading to the 2011 crisis," he said, adding that the United Nations was appealing for $2.6 billion (1.9 billion euros) in aid. Conditions are still far from the crisis in 2011, when some 12 million people in four nations were hit by one of the worst droughts in 60 years, with parts of Somalia declared famine zones. The 14.4 million people classified by the UN as food insecure are spread over nine nations, with the hardest hit countries including war-torn South Sudan and Somalia.

Aid workers say famine could be declared in South Sudan within weeks if fighting continues, while last month the UN warned Somalia is sliding back into an acute hunger crisis. Arid northern Kenya, which like much of the region suffers from recuring droughts, is also struggling. Oxfam said failed or poor rains, conflict and drought have contributed to the rising food insecurity in the region. “It is imperative that we learn from the lessons of 2011,” Oxfam’s regional director Fran Equiza told AFP. “Early intervention has the potential to save thousands of lives and keep millions more from the brink of starvation.”

Some 2.7 million people are in dire need of supplies in Ethiopia and 1.3 million in Kenya, many of them refugees from neighbouring Somalia. Some 120,000 are in need in Djibouti. In Sudan, five million people are at risk, while in South Sudan 3.5 million are struggling. Tens of thousands are also in need in Burundi, Rwanda and Uganda. More than 250,000 people, half of them children, died in the devastating 2011 famine in Somalia. (Text ends)

KENYA: Raila Wants Kenya Withdrawn From Somalia'

Nairobi (CapitalFM) — Coalition for Reforms and Democracy leader Raila Odinga says it is time for Kenya to withdraw its troops from neighbouring Somalia.

The former Prime Minister who addressed members of the Somali community in Eastleigh said the continued stay of Kenya Defence Forces soldiers in Somalia is hurting Kenyans. "It is high time the Government should evaluate whether there is any reason to still have our soldiers at Somalia. Does their continued stay in Somali bring peace to our country?" he posed. "We went there because there were many attacks then by the thugs." President Uhuru Kenyatta has insisted that he has no intention of withdrawing the troops from the war torn country until they accomplish their mission. Kenyan forces that are now fighting under the AMISOM command moved into Somalia in 2011 and have continued to boast of major success in neutralising the Al Shabaab militia. Odinga also challenged the Government to enhance security instead of launching ad-hoc operations that are allegedly targeted at one community. "The kind of operation we saw here was discriminatory; this should not happen," he argued. The Usalama Watch operation has seen over 2,000 people arrested and screened with more than 200 being deported to their countries for lack of legal documents. Explosive materials and illegal fire arms were recovered but critics of the operation argue it was targeted at the Somali community. The operation was mainly carried out at Eastleigh in Nairobi and in some parts of the coast region mostly in Mombasa County. The Government has vowed to enhance security in the country following the upsurge of insecurity which has negatively impacted the country's economy and citizens' well being.

In a bid to roll out major security programmes, the Government has set aside Sh78.5 billion for various programmes in the next financial year. The Government will in the 2014-2015 budget for instance use Sh6.7 billion for leasing motor vehicles and at least five helicopters in efforts to enhance security operations in the country. Last year, the government hired 1,200 police vehicles as a way of cutting high cost incurred through direct purchase and maintenance. The National Police Service will also have a medical insurance scheme which has been allotted Sh1.6 billion. To boost its surveillance, the Government has also awarded Safaricom a Sh15 billion tender to install surveillance equipment in Nairobi and Mombasa. On the calls for national dialogue, Odinga termed a decision for him and Wiper leader Kalonzo Musyoka "to go and have tea with President Uhuru Kenyatta at Statehouse" as an insult saying, "do you think I am the kind of person who can do that?" he posed. "My brother, the president had agreed at Nyayo Stadium but some people have gone to him saying he did wrong." "I want to tell my brother, Uhuru Kenyatta, I can see a storm... a huge storm which will hit all areas and sweep all the dirt to the ocean. The President should allow the talks instead of waiting for this." He said, if there will be no dialogue, "Saba Saba is coming, Kenyans shall meet and we shall talk. That day, God will hear our talks." Odinga was accompanied by Suna Member of Parliament Mohammed Junet and Homabay senator Gladys Wanga who equally said the Government had failed its citizens.

East African nations on high alert for Ebola’

Ethiopian Airlines continues to fly to Ebola striken west African countries.

East Africa News (August 11, 2014) - The east African region has been set on its toes following the revelation of an outbreak of Ebola infections in west Africa this March. This disease, which was first identified in the Democratic Republic of Congo and Sudan in the 70s, has been a recurring scourge in the region. However, the lastest outbreak in west Africa, where it has never been recorded, is regarded as the worst in history. Over 1,000 people have been reported infected and nearly 700 dead from the virus in Liberia, Sierra Leone and Nigeria. This has forced the World Health Organization (WHO) to designate Ebola an international public health emergency.

According to local sources, the relative inexperience of the local population with this disease and the unpreparedness of health facilities for such an infection has exacerbated its wide diffusion and fatality. Many west African nations have expressed concerns about a possible spread of this infection into their borders and have set up preventive measure to curb this possibility. In east Africa, where the population and health experts are well acquainted with the disease, the scene is quite similar. Meanwhile, health experts have raised concerns about the disease resurfacing in the region – particularly in countries like Uganda, DRC and Sudan, where it has a history.

Ebola surveillance and preventive measures

Last week, the Rwandan Health Ministry announced that mobile health centers have been created at all entry points into the country (including the country's main airport) to screen people. Rwandair employees are also set to be trained on how to deal with infected passengers. Local sources say health facilities across the country are on high alert for the virus and have expressed confidence in their ability to contain an infection.

In Kenya, officials have also been screening passengers at the Jomo Kenyatta International Airport. The Director of Medical Services, Dr. Nicholas Muraguri, told the VOA recently that the country has "a contingency plan that's been coordinated by an Ebola outbreak response team which has a number of sub-committees looking at various aspects." He also hailed the preparedness of Kenya Medical Research Foundation (KEMRI) to guide the collection and testing of samples from patients.

The Ethiopian Federal Ministry of Health has also set up its defenses against this scourge. Last week, a workshop was organized by the Ministry in Addis Ababa to educate health workers on the Ebola virus. Reports indicate that more than 200 participants attended the event.

Meanwhile, the Ministry has reportedly also formulated a preparedness plan and equipped a unit of front line health workers with the necessary equipments to respond to an outbreak.

Patients with Ebola symptoms placed in quarantine

At least three people, suspected of being infected with Ebola, have been isolated from the public in three countries in the region in the past few days. On Sunday, the Rwandan Ministry of Health revealed that a German medical student, who recently returned from Liberia, had been quarantined after reporting symptoms consistent with the deadly disease. Reports indicate that samples have been collected from the patient and transferred to an international laboratory for testing. The results are expected to be released in about 48 hours.

Meanwhile, in a press release on Monday, the Ministry allayed growing concerns after disclosing that the unidentified German national is recovering. "his temperature has significantly gone down and he is recovering well from malaria and other symptoms," the press release noted.

The Ministry further announced that other people, who had come in contact with the patient and were resultantly also quarantined, have shown no symptoms of infection. In Kenya, a Congolese traveler was detained last Friday at the Jomo Kenyatta International Airport after showing signs of Ebola. However, over the weekend, the Health Ministry announced that tests results have revealed that the 43 year old was only suffering from food poisoning and has been responding well to treatment.

In Uganda, another patient quarantined under the suspicion of being infected with Ebola has been set free after test results revealed that he did not have the disease. Reports indicate that the passenger, who was held up at the Entebbe airport, had been travelling from South Sudan.

This is the second false Ebola infection scare in Uganda since the virus resurfaced in west Africa earlier in the year.

Regional Airlines defy health scare

As fears over the inability of local authorities to contain the virus continues to grow, airline operators have displayed some apprehension about visiting countries that have recorded cases of Ebola.

At least two international airline operators have temporarily stopped flights to some west African destinations recently. The International Air Transport Association (IATA) has however failed to impose any travel restrictions on flights to/from countries affected by the virus.

According to reports, this is partly due to the fact that the disease isn't airborne. Although the possibility of an infected patient travelling by plane and spreading the virus is credited, authorities say it does not warrant a total travel ban. Meanwhile, the World Health Organization (WHO) has published guidelines for airlines to deal with suspected cases of Ebola infection. The International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) has reportedly also been collaborating with the IATA to control the spread of the virus.

Kenya Airways has announced that flights to west African destinations will not be stopped due to the outbreak of Ebola. The company's CEO, Titus Naikuni, has however revealed that the airline is working closely with the country's health authorities to monitor the spread of the virus. Ethiopian Airlines has instituted surveillance and preventive measures against Ebola. In a recent statement, the company noted that "The safety and well-being of our customers and staff always come first…Ethiopian has taken the lead in taking extraordinary precautions in connection with the outbreak of the disease in some parts of West Africa."

Rwandair has also revealed that flights to affected countries will not be stopped. The company has further disclosed that measures have been put in place to ensure the safety of its passengers and staff. Reports indicate that the governments of Uganda and Kenya are set to dispatch health experts to assist west African nations contain the widespread Ebola infection. (Text ends)

August 17, 2014: HEALTH: Kenya bans contact with Ebola-affected countries.

The WHO has already said that the risk of Ebola transmission from air travel is low, but the level of fear is so high that several airlines have disregarded the UN agency's advice. The disease has already killed at least 1,145 people across west Africa this year. "The scale of the outbreak is much larger than anything ever seen before," said Gregory Hartl, a WHO spokesman. "It is an obvious source of concern and it is not to be underestimated, but we must take measures commensurate with the risk. What you don't want to do is to take blanket measures to cut off travel and trade."

Despite such advice, Kenya is the latest country to jump on the bandwagon by declaring a travel ban on Saturday. From midnight on Tuesday, people travelling from or through Sierra Leone, Guinea and Liberia will not be allowed to enter the east African country, said Kenya's health ministry. Nigeria, which allows entry to health professionals and Kenyans returning from those countries, was not included in the ban. The outbreak began in the forested zone on the borders of Guinea, Sierra Leone and Liberia earlier this year, and spread to Nigeria last month.

The World Health Organisation has urged governments not to impose blanket bans on trade and travel on Ebola-affected countries after Kenya joined a growing number of countries and airlines severing links to three west African states. Ebola outbreak in West Africa, affecting Sierra Leone, Liberia and Guinea in particular. It's the worst outbreak ever recorded - more than 1,000 people have died. These countries have some of the weakest health systems in the world. Not enough trained doctors and nurses. Clinics without enough supplies to diagnose and treat patients. Villages without running water or reliable electricity, compounding the crisis. Just days ago, the World Health Organization declared the outbreak a global health emergency. This crisis is showing just how important it is to have strong health systems in place. In this case, governments and institutions around the world are beginning to step up, pledging resources in response to the World Health Organization's emergency appeal. (Text ends)

KENYA Legalizes Polygamy

Kenya's parliament has passed a bill allowing men to marry as many women as they want, prompting a furious backlash from female lawmakers who stormed out, media reports revealed. The bill, which amended existing marriage legislation, was passed late on Thursday to formalize customary law about marrying more than one person. The proposed bill had initially given a wife the right to veto the husband's choice, but male members of parliament overcame party divisions to push through a text that dropped this clause. As in many parts of Africa, polygamy is common among traditional communities in Kenya, as well as among the country's Muslim community, which accounts for up to a fifth of the population.

August 25, 2014: Kenyan police discovered regime agents behind the killing of Ethiopians in Kenya. Kenyan police have discovered that the Ethiopian secret police headed by the state security is behind the recent serial killings of Ethiopians in Kenya, according to the report by Standard Digital.

KENYA: Raila Wants Kenya Withdrawn From Somalia'

Nairobi (CapitalFM) - Coalition for Reforms and Democracy leader Raila Odinga says it is time for Kenya to withdraw its troops from neighbouring Somalia. The former Prime Minister who addressed members of the Somali community in Eastleigh said the continued stay of Kenya Defence Forces soldiers in Somalia is hurting Kenyans. "It is high time the Government should evaluate whether there is any reason to still have our soldiers at Somalia. Does their continued stay in Somali bring peace to our country?" he posed. "We went there because there were many attacks then by the thugs." President Uhuru Kenyatta has insisted that he has no intention of withdrawing the troops from the war torn country until they accomplish their mission. Kenyan forces that are now fighting under the AMISOM command moved into Somalia in 2011 and have continued to boast of major success in neutralising the Al Shabaab militia. Odinga also challenged the Government to enhance security instead of launching ad-hoc operations that are allegedly targeted at one community. "The kind of operation we saw here was discriminatory; this should not happen," he argued. The Usalama Watch operation has seen over 2,000 people arrested and screened with more than 200 being deported to their countries for lack of legal documents. Explosive materials and illegal fire arms were recovered but critics of the operation argue it was targeted at the Somali community. The operation was mainly carried out at Eastleigh in Nairobi and in some parts of the coast region mostly in Mombasa County. The Government has vowed to enhance security in the country following the upsurge of insecurity which has negatively impacted the country's economy and citizens' well being.

In a bid to roll out major security programmes, the Government has set aside Sh78.5 billion for various programmes in the next financial year. The Government will in the 2014-2015 budget for instance use Sh6.7 billion for leasing motor vehicles and at least five helicopters in efforts to enhance security operations in the country. Last year, the government hired 1,200 police vehicles as a way of cutting high cost incurred through direct purchase and maintenance. The National Police Service will also have a medical insurance scheme which has been allotted Sh1.6 billion. To boost its surveillance, the Government has also awarded Safaricom a Sh15 billion tender to install surveillance equipment in Nairobi and Mombasa. On the calls for national dialogue, Odinga termed a decision for him and Wiper leader Kalonzo Musyoka "to go and have tea with President Uhuru Kenyatta at Statehouse" as an insult saying, "do you think I am the kind of person who can do that?" he posed. "My brother, the president had agreed at Nyayo Stadium but some people have gone to him saying he did wrong." "I want to tell my brother, Uhuru Kenyatta, I can see a storm... a huge storm which will hit all areas and sweep all the dirt to the ocean. The President should allow the talks instead of waiting for this." He said, if there will be no dialogue, "Saba Saba is coming, Kenyans shall meet and we shall talk. That day, God will hear our talks." Odinga was accompanied by Suna Member of Parliament Mohammed Junet and Homabay senator Gladys Wanga who equally said the Government had failed its citizens.

KENYA - Fourth most corrupt country in the world’

Wednesday, September 3, 2014

(The Star) Kenya is the fourth most corrupt country in the world according to a 2013 survey released by anti-graft body, Transparency International. The report showed that seven out of 10 people paid bribes to a public officer in a public institution last year. The survey, which was carried out in 95 countries worldwide indicated that Sierra Leone is the most corrupt country in the world with corruption levels standing at 84 per cent. Liberia comes second at 75 per cent, followed by Yemen at 74 and Kenya completes the list of the top four most corrupt nations at 70 per cent. The poll showed that corruption levels posted by the top four most corrupt nation, make 27 per cent of the world's corruption level on average. It showed that African nations have the highest number of people admitting to having paid a bribe in 2013. It further indicates that seven out of nine of the countries with the highest reported bribery rate are in sub-Saharan Africa. Ethiopia is the least corrupt nation in Africa at six per cent followed by Rwanda at 13 per cent.

In East Africa, Uganda is the second most corrupt with 61 per cent of the people having said they bribed public officials to access services in 2013. Tanzania is at 56 per cent and Sudan stands at 17 per cent. South Africa is at 47, Nigeria 61, Libya 62, Senegal 57, Mozambique 62, Morroco 49, Zimbabwe 62 Ghana 54 and Madagascar 28 per cent. In the world, the countries with the lowest reported bribery rate are Denmark, Finland, Japan and Australia, they all have a bribery rate of one per cent. Only 16 out of the 95 countries posted corruption levels of less than five per cent. Transparency International's Global Corruption Barometer gathered data from 95 countries on bribery. 1000 people were sampled in each country .The margin of error for each country was three per cent. Source: TI

Somalia's Al-Shabab Says It Killed 28 In Kenya

By Tom Odula (November 22, 2014)

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) — One gunman shot from the right, one from the left, each killing the non-Muslims lying in a line on the ground, growing closer and closer to Douglas Ochwodho, who was in the middle. And then the shooting stopped. Apparently each gunman thought the other shot Ochwodho. He lay perfectly still until the 20 Islamic extremists left, and he appears to be the only survivor of those who had been selected for death.

Somalia's Islamic extremist rebels, Al-Shabab, attacked a bus in northern Kenya at dawn Saturday, singling out and killing 28 passengers who could not recite an Islamic creed and were assumed to be non-Muslims, Kenyan police said. Those who could not say the Shahada, a tenet of the Muslim faith, were shot at close range, Ochwodho told The Associated Press. Nineteen men and nine women were killed in the bus attack, said Kenyan police chief David Kimaiyo.

Al-Shabab claimed responsibility for the killings through its radio station in Somalia saying it was in retaliation for raids by Kenyan security forces carried out earlier this week on four mosques at the Kenyan coast. Kenya's military said it responded to the killings with airstrikes later Saturday that destroyed the attackers' camp in Somalia and killed 45 rebels.

The bus traveling to the capital Nairobi with 60 passengers was hijacked about 50 kilometers (31 miles) from the town of Mandera near Kenya's border with Somalia, said two police officers who insisted on anonymity because they were ordered not to speak to the press. The attackers first tried to wave the bus down but it didn't stop so the gunmen sprayed it with bullets, said the police. When that didn't work they shot a rocket propelled grenade at it, the officers said.

The gunmen took control of the vehicle and forced it off the road where they ordered all the passengers out of the vehicle and separated those who appeared to be non-Muslims— mostly non-Somalis— from the rest. The survivor, Douglas Ochwodho, a non-Muslim head teacher of a private primary school in Mandera, said was travelling home for the Christmas vacation since school had closed.

Ochwodho told AP that the passengers who did not look Somali were separated from the others. The non-Somali passengers were then asked to recite the Shahada, an Islamic creed declaring oneness with God. Those who couldn't recite the creed were ordered to lie down. Ochwodho was among those who had to lie on the ground. Two gunmen started shooting those on the ground; one gunman started from the left and other from the right, Ochwodho said. When they reached him they were confused on whether either had shot him, he said. Ochwodho lay still until the gunmen left, he said. He then ran back to the road and got a lift from a pick-up truck back to Mandera. He spoke from a hospital bed where he was being treated for shock. Seventeen of the 28 dead were teachers, according to the police commander in Mandera County. A shortage of personnel and lack of equipment led to a slow response by police when the information was received, said two police officers who insisted on anonymity because they were ordered not to speak to the press. They said the attackers have more sophisticated weaponry than the police who waited for military reinforcements before responding.

Kenya has been hit by a series of gun and bomb attacks blamed on al-Shabab, who are linked to al-Qaida, since it sent troops into Somalia in October 2011. Authorities say there have been at least 135 attacks by al-Shabab since then, including the assault on Nairobi's upscale Westgate Mall in September 2013 in which 67 people were killed. Al-Shabab said it was responsible for other attacks on Kenya's coast earlier this year which killed at least 90 people. Al-Shabab is becoming "more entrenched and a graver threat to Kenya," warned the International Crisis Group in a September report to mark the first anniversary of the Westgate attack. The report said that the Islamic extremists are taking advantage of longstanding grievances of Kenya's Muslim community, such as official discrimination and marginalization.

Kenya has been struggling to contain growing extremism in the country. Earlier this week the authorities shut down four mosques at the Kenyan coast after police alleged they found explosives and a gun when they raided the places of worship. Some Muslims believe the police planted the weapons to justify closing the mosques, Kheled Khalifa, a human rights official said Friday warning that methods being used to tackle extremism by government will increase support for radicals. One person was killed during the raid on two of the mosques on Monday. Police said they shot dead a young man trying to hurl a grenade at them. The government had previously said the four mosques were recruitment centers for al-Shabab. (Text ends)

Al Shabab massacres 36 in northeast Kenya’

AFP (December 2, 2014)

Nairobi (AFP) - Gunmen have massacred 36 people in northeast Kenya in the latest attack by suspected militants from Somalia's Al-Qaeda-affiliated Shebab rebels in the troubled region, officials said Tuesday.

A group of gunmen attacked a quarry near the town of Mandera in the early hours of Tuesday morning. After spraying tents where the quarry workers slept with gunfire, the militants then weeded out non-Muslims and shot them in the head. Some of the victims were also beheaded, police sources and reports said. The attack comes just over a week after the Shebab claimed responsibility for the execution of 28 people who were grabbed from a bus travelling from Mandera, a border town located on the frontier between Kenya, Somalia and Ethiopia.

In a separate attack late Monday in the town of Wajir, also in the northeast and close to the dangerous border with war-torn Somalia, one person was killed and 12 wounded when gunmen hurled grenades and fired into a bar. "We have lost 36 people, but there are others missing," said a local police official Mandera, who asked not to be named. "We don't know whether they were taken by the attackers." Police spokesman Zipporah Mboroki confirmed the attacks but said the force would provide an exact toll of those killed later. Media reports said most of the victims were laid out on the ground and shot in the head, a style of killing used in the recent attack on bus passengers. Kenya has suffered a series of attacks since invading Somalia in 2011 to attack the Shebab, and its troops are still in Somalia as part of an African Union force battling the Islamists. Media reports from Somalia said the Shebab's radio station has hailed the killing of "crusaders", although there has not yet been formal claim of responsibility from the militants. The group said it carried out the recent attack against the bus passengers in retaliation for Kenyan police raids against suspected radical mosques in Kenya's port city of Mombasa, the scene of mounting religious tensions.

National security worries Kenyans: Professionals working in the largely Muslim and ethnic Somali northeastern regions often come from further south in Kenya, where Christians make up about 80 percent of the population. Those working in the quarry attacked on Tuesday were also reported to have been from outside the region. Several key unions including for civil servants have warned their members to leave the restive northeast until the government can ensure their safety. On Sunday the Nation newspaper reported that Kenya's embattled interior minister and police chief may soon be sacked over "repeated lapses" in security. The newspaper said key advisors to President Uhuru Kenyatta were pushing for Interior Cabinet Secretary Joseph Ole Lenku and Inspector-General of Police David Kimaiyo to go, due to dwindling public confidence in the country's security apparatus.

It said intelligence officials had alerted police to the presence of a group of Shebab attackers in the northeast before the bus attack, and added that survivors had said that police "took two hours to respond to distress calls" after the murders had taken place -- leaving the attackers plenty of time to escape. Both officials have been under fire since last year's attack by the Shebab against the Westgate shopping mall in Nairobi, in which at least 67 people were killed in a siege involving just four gunmen and which lasted four days. Worries over internal security mounted when Shebab rebels massacred 100 people in a string of Shebab raids against villages in the Lamu region on the Kenyan coast in June and July.Shebab leader Ahmed Abdi Godane was killed in a US air strike in September. The group has since named Ahmad Umar, also known as Abu Ubaidah, as its new head. (Text ends)

Kenya arrests 77 Chinese in connection with Internet hacking case' By

Tom Odula NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) (December 5, 2014)

Police in Kenya are consulting technical experts to determine if 77 Chinese nationals arrested with advanced communications equipment in several houses in an upscale Nairobi neighborhood were committing espionage, an official said Thursday.

The Chinese were arrested since the weekend with equipment that Kenya's Daily Nation newspaper said was capable of hacking into government servers. "We have roped in experts to tell us if they were committing crimes of espionage," said Ndegwa Muhoro, the head of criminal investigations for Kenya's police. "These people seem to have been brought here specifically for a mission which we are investigating."

The arrests began on Sunday, when computer equipment in one of the upscale houses the Chinese nationals had rented near the U.S. Embassy and U.N. headquarters caught fire, killing one person. Police said it appeared the group was manufacturing ATM cards, and that the suspects may have been involved in money laundering and Internet fraud. The case has caught the attention of the highest levels of Kenya's government as authorities investigate whether the group was also engaging in espionage. The minister of foreign affairs and the minister of information communications and technology both were on hand Wednesday as police arrested 40 people. The Chinese ambassador was summoned to the foreign affairs ministry over the arrests.

The 37 suspects arrested Sunday were charged with operating an illegal radio station. Many of those arrested cannot speak English and some don't have identification such as a passport, police detective Nicholas Kisavi said. A woman at China's embassy in Kenya told The Associated Press on Thursday to call back on Friday to speak with an embassy spokesman.

Fred Matiang'l, an official in Kenya's ministry of information, communications and technology, told the Daily Nation that China has promised to send investigators to Kenya to work on the case. (Text ends)

KENYA: December 5, 2014: ICC Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda withdraws case against Uhuru Kenyatta.

The Hague, The Netherlands: Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda has withdrawn the charges against Kenya's President Uhuru Kenyatta at the International Criminal Court. "In light of the Trial Chamber's 3 December 2014 "Decision on Prosecution's application for a further adjournment", the Prosecution withdraws the charges against Mr Kenyatta," the prosecutor said in her application to the court on Friday. She said the evidence had not improved to a point where President Kenyatta's alleged criminal responsibility could be proven beyond reasonable doubt.

Ms Bensouda, however, noted that the notice for withdrawal was subject to the possibility of bringing new charges at a later date in case the prosecution obtained sufficient evidence.

"This withdrawal is without prejudice to the possibility of bringing new charges against Mr Kenyatta at a later date, based on the same or similar factual circumstances, should [the Prosecution] obtain sufficient evidence to support such a course of action".

'VERY EXCITED'

President Kenyatta said he was "excited" over the Prosecution's decision to withdraw the charges. "I am excited by this news, which I have awaited ever since the day my name was announced to the world in connection with the case. I am also deeply relieved by this decision, which is overdue by 6 years," the President said in a statement.

President Kenyatta faced charges at the ICC as an indirect co-perpetrator, with five counts of crimes against humanity consisting of murder, deportation or forcible transfer, rape, persecution and other inhumane acts allegedly committed during the post-election violence in Kenya in 2007-2008. The charges were confirmed on January 23, 2012, and the case was committed to trial before Trial Chamber V(B). (Text ends)

Nairobi Security Police admit to "eliminating" suspected Muslim radicals'

Nairobi (HAN) December 8, 2014 – Public safety and Regional Security news. For the first time members of Kenya's counter-terrorism police admit to "eliminating" suspected Muslim radicals. They have received training and intelligence from Britain's military and other officials as part of their counter-terrorism efforts to eliminate Muslims and Muslim leaders in Kenya.

INSIDE KENYA'S DEATH SQUADS: Britain is facing fresh allegations of complicity in the killings of terrorism suspects by Kenyan death squads. The Inside news report claims come from members of Kenyan intelligence and special police units who say they carry out extrajudicial killings. They also say they have received training and intelligence from Britain's military and other officials as part of their counter-terrorism efforts. Speaking exclusively to Al Jazeera's Investigative Unit, officers from four units of Kenya's counter-terrorism apparatus admitted the police A Kenyan intelligence officer claimed Britain knows of the elimination programme: "Yes. When these people come for their training, I believe that all this information is being passed to them." (Text ends)

KENYA: ICC Chief Prosecutor has withdrawn the case against the Kenyan President.

BBC news (December 16, 2014)

The Kenyan President wrote recently at social media that "I am excited by this news, which I have awaited ever since the day my name was announced to the world in connection with the case. I am also deeply relieved by this decision, which is overdue by 6 years. I have repeatedly declared my innocence to the people of Kenya and the whole world. I repeat this even now: as relates the incidents comprising the Kenyan cases at the ICC, my conscience is absolutely clear.

It has always been my position that the Kenyan cases at the ICC were rushed there without proper investigation or preparation, and sustained by a strong interest to stigmatise accused persons. As an institution of the international community, victims of serious crimes and people around the world had a right to expect the Court to dispense justice with integrity and without undue considerations. For the Prosecutor to sustain an obviously deficient case for so long demonstrates beyond doubt the intensity of pressure exerted by improper interests to pollute and undermine the philosophy of international justice. There is no justice when human rights clubs and an international tribunal conspire to betray victims of human rights abuses and persecute the innocent. The tragedy of this travesty is beyond words.

The victims in this case will get no satisfaction from the ICC, owing to the Prosecutor's decision to compromise a quest for justice in favour of political considerations. This is an incomparable tragedy. Just as the ICC failed me, it has also failed the victims of the 2007-2008 post-election violence. They were killed, maimed, displaced, dispossessed and utterly traumatized. I have been victimized, libeled and senselessly profiled by the same defective process. The Government of Kenya has sustained its efforts to restitute and reintegrate the victims of the PEV as best as it can. Our justice system continues to process the cases which have been instituted. I have supported these efforts because ultimately, the victims must get justice. The world may have failed them, but they will not be let down at home.

The Prosecutor opted to selectively pursue cases in a blatantly biased manner that served vested interests and undermined justice. As a result, the Court has had to pay a steep reputational price, which it will continue to face unless a serious and systemic rethinking of the International Justice framework is undertaken.

My brother and deputy, Hon. William Ruto, as well as Mr Joshua Sang continue to face their accusers at the ICC with a clear conscience. With me, they have been steadfast in declaring their innocence. I am confident that they will be vindicated in due course. I stand with them, and will support them and pray with them until that time. As my deputy and principal assistant, William Ruto is an indispensable asset in my Government. I look forward to the day when we shall not have the distraction of the trials, so that we can continue delivering our transformational agenda to the people of Kenya.

I thank the people of Africa and all their leaders who, through the African Union, demonstrated robust and unflinching support by word and deed, in the true spirit of African brotherhood. Your solidarity has deeply touched and inspired me. I urge you to continue supporting us as we give my Brother William Ruto and his co-accused, Joshua Sang support and solidarity to confront the last outstanding case. Fellow Kenyans, I thank each and everyone of you for your support, prayers, words of encouragement and best wishes. God has not let us down. God will never let us down. As we promised, we have not, and shall never let the cases sully our sovereignty, or get in the way of managing the affairs of our nation." (Text ends)

KENYA: ICC charges against Uhuru Kenyatta defended by Ocampo

BBC News (December 16, 2014) The ex-chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) has defended his decision to charge Kenya's president, despite the case collapsing. Luis Moreno Ocampo said the charges against Uhuru Kenyatta prevented violence in the 2013 elections. Mr Kenyatta won the poll after campaigning on a nationalist ticket, accusing the ICC of meddling in Kenya's affairs. He had been charged with fuelling violence in the 2007 election. Last week, Mr Ocampo's successor, Fatou Bensouda, dropped the charges against Mr Kenyatta, saying there was a lack of evidence as the Kenyan government had refused to hand over documents vital to the case. Mr Kenyatta denied the charge of crimes against humanity. He was the first head of state to appear before judges at the ICC. Some 1,200 people died and 600,000 fled homes in the conflict - the worst in Kenya since independence.

'UN powerless'

Mr Ocampo told BBC Newsday that Mr Kenyatta's indictment had created a "deterrence", ensuring that the violence of the 2007 election was not repeated in the 2013 election. "ICC changed the game," he said. Last week, Uganda's President Yoweri reiterated calls on African states to pull out of the ICC, saying the continent was unfairly targeted by the court. Rejecting the criticism, Mr Ocampo said the ICC was a "problem" for about 10 African leaders who relied on violence to remain in power. He also defended the ICC's decision to charge Sudan's President Omar al-Bashir with genocide over the conflict in Darfur.

Ms Bensouda ended that investigation last week blaming lack of action by the UN. Mr Bashir was charged after the UN Security Council referred the conflict to the ICC for investigation, following allegations by UN and US officials that Sudanese government forces were committing "genocide" in Darfur.

Mr Ocampo said the ICC did not have the power to arrest Mr Bashir and put him on trial. The UN Security Council had to "act" against the Sudanese leader, but the problem was that it no longer had the "power" to do so, Mr Ocampo said. China is an ally of Sudan in the UN Security Council, and is bound to veto any action against him, correspondents say.

The African Union also called on its members not to arrest Mr Bashir, saying he enjoyed presidential immunity - a view the ICC rejects. Sudan does not recognise the ICC's jurisdiction, unlike Kenya. Kenya's government has denied that it has failed to co-operate with the ICC prosecutor. The trial of Mr Kenyatta's deputy, William Ruto, is ongoing at The Hague. They were on opposing sides during the 2007 election but subsequently formed an alliance to win elections last year. (Text ends)

KENYA: The President signed into law the Security Laws (Amendment) Bill 2014,

In his televised address to the public, the Kenyan President affirmed that “Today I signed into law the Security Laws (Amendment) Bill 2014, which provides a firm framework for the fight against terrorism. I call on all Kenyans to read the new law for yourselves instead of depending on interpretations that mislead. I am confident that you will find that there is nothing in this law that goes against the Bill of Rights or any provision of the constitution. Its intent is one; to protect the lives and property of all citizens. I was appalled by the dep...lorable behavior of Members of Parliament yesterday who as a result denied Kenyans the opportunity to follow the proceedings of Parliament. Those who disrupted the smooth operation of Parliament yesterday are oblivious to the threat that is upon the country. For the first time, we now have a law that focuses on prevention and disruption of threats. Further, the law allows for the use of technology in processing and advancing the ability for successful prosecution of suspects. This new law establishes an institutional framework for the counter-terrorism war and will create synergy between the different security agencies by creating clear command structures. This synergy is cascaded from the highest level to the lowest level through the national Government security structures. The law also raises the threshold for public and state officers who are charged with the responsibility of protecting Kenya and its people. The raised threshold is necessary because of lack of integrity and its role in compromising national security. It provides for heavy penalties for any transgression. My Government has also commenced wide-scale administrative and operational reforms that align command and control, improve doctrine and modalities of work and improve operational effectiveness on the ground. We must remember that we are still at war and still vulnerable to terror attacks. I therefore call upon each one of us to remain vigilant and share any information that would aid in securing our country with relevant authorities. I wish you all peace and prosperity during the festive season. (Text ends)

Kenya security law: President Uhuru Kenyatta signs bill’

BBC News (December 19, 2014)

Kenya's President Uhuru Kenyatta has signed into law a controversial security bill which saw MPs trade blows in parliament.

It was passed on Thursday during a chaotic parliamentary session, with opposition MPs warning that Kenya was becoming a "police state".

The government has said it needs more powers to fight militant Islamists threatening Kenya's security.

Somalia's al-Qaeda-linked al-Shabab group has stepped up attacks in Kenya.

The new anti-terror legislation gives the security and intelligence agencies the right to detain terror suspects for up to one year and requires journalists to obtain police permission before investigating or publishing stories on domestic terrorism and security issues.

It also stipulates that police must approve publication or broadcasting of information relating to investigations on terrorism.

"We must all remember that we are still at war and still vulnerable to terror attacks," Mr Kenyatta said in a televised address, defending the law. He denied that it infringed on civil liberties.

Stripping punishments

The BBC's Dennis Okari in the capital, Nairobi, says the security bill has gone through various amendments. The provision giving the security and intelligence agencies power to intercept phone conversations without a court order was dropped, he says.

A court order must be sought to hold terror suspects within 24 hours, after which they can be held for 360 days, up from the previous period of 90 days.

Anti-terror measures:

Bans publishing or broadcasting of "insulting, threatening, or inciting material", images of dead or injured people "likely to cause fear" and information that undermines security operations (this covers social media). Punishable by a fine of $55,000, a three-year jail term or both.

Terror suspects can be held for questioning for 360 days

Limits number of refugees and asylum seekers to 150,000 - those applying for refugee status not allowed to leave camps

Sets up National Counter-Terrorism Centre to co-ordinate security agencies' efforts

Public officials found guilty issuing irregular IDs or allowing irregular entry into the country liable to a minimum of 15 years in jail

Person in charge of a premises where weapons recovered may face up to 30 years in prison

Person promoting ideology based on violence to advance political, religious or social change may face up to 14 years in jail

Anti-stripping measure:

Person who forcibly strips someone is liable to a minimum of 10 years in prison.

The opposition, civil society groups and the media have all said they will go to court to challenge the legislation.

The legislation also included a clause providing for a minimum of 10 years in prison to anyone convicted of forcibly undressing someone..

This follows several incidents of women have their clothes ripped off and being sexually abused by a group of men in public. Thursday's special parliamentary sitting, which turned into mayhem live on television, shocked many Kenyans, our correspondent says.

Opposition MPs tore up papers and chanted anti-government slogans - there was a fist-fight and the deputy speaker had water poured over her. Mr Kenyatta condemned their behaviour as "deplorable" and said the law was only meant to "protect the lives and property of all Kenyans and disrupt any threats to our national security". "May peace dwell within our borders during this festive season," he said at the end of his address.

Since last month, al-Shabab has killed 64 people in two attacks in the north-eastern region of Mandera, which borders Somalia. Last year it was also responsible for the Westgate shopping centre siege in Nairobi in which 67 people died.

Kenya sent troops into Somalia three years ago, and they now make up part of the African Union force helping to fight the militant group. (Text ends)

President Uhuru Kenyatta faces rebellion in North Rift over David Kimaiyo seat’

STANDARD DIGITAL By Faith Rono (December 27, 2014)

The appointment of the next Inspector General of Police is expected to rekindle bad blood between the governing Jubilee partners after MPs from Rift Valley warned they would walk out of the coalition should the region be overlooked.

The disgruntlement over Kimaiyo has echoes of the row generated by Standard Gauge Railway tendering bids and the tiff over sacking of former National Youth Service director Kiplimo Rugut.

Immediately, Kimaiyo announced his retirement, there was talk that he had been compelled to step down. The retirement was triggered by a spate of terror attacks, which in turn piled pressure on him to resign or President Uhuru Kenyatta shows him the door. However, the Constitution mechanism for his impeachment is long and tedious compared to the shorter option of retiring.

In a recent thanksgiving in Turbo, Uasin Gishu County, MPs from Elgeyo Marakwet, where Kimaiyo comes from, were conspicuously missing as other URP and TNA legislators turned up to show support for Deputy President William Ruto who is still facing charges at the ICC.

Apart from Senator Kipchumba Murkomen and Jackson Kiptanui (Keiyo South), other legislators including Elgeyo Marakwet County Governor Alex Tolgos skipped the function.

One MP from the region who spoke to us, but declined to be identified, said the leaders snubbed the meeting because of their disappointment following Kimaiyo’s ouster. (Text ends)

Kenya flagged off the first batch of 170 Kenyan health volunteers to help contain the deadly Ebola in Sierra Leone and Liberia’ The volunteer nurses, doctors and laboratory technicians, trained on detecting and management of Ebola will form part of the African Union Support to Ebola Outbreak in West Africa. Kenya is committed to Africa's resolve to provide solutions to the continent's challenges. Kenya fulfilled of it's pledge of USD 1,000,000 financial support to Sierra Leone, Liberia and Guinea to fight Ebola. Kenya will also fulfill commitment to contribute 319 health workers to join the Ebola response in West Africa as pledged during the 10th Ordinary meeting of the East African Community Sectoral Council of Ministers in October last year. "Kenya has a proud and exemplary name in peacekeeping, diplomacy and voluntary international service in times of crisis. This is a time of great pride for all Kenyans. I thanked our courageous and selfless volunteers who have taken a bold stand to bring the spirit of African solidarity into life and action. They join a roll of distinguished Kenyans who have served their African kin selflessly under daunting circumstances. The greatest resource we discovered as a continent is confidence: the confidence in our own ideas, solutions and capacities. It is humbling and inspiring to know that the country boasts of innumerable committed, compassionate and courageous professionals whose love and empathy literally knows no boundaries." Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta quoted as saying at social media fb.

KENYA: What Fidel Odinga's exit means for the Jaramogi dynasty

By Oscar Kwena Obonyo

Had he completed building his house in Bondo, and had he officially "entered" the house after partaking in the mandatory traditional rituals, Fidel Castro Odinga would have been laid to rest in his own compound, next to his father's farm in Opoda, Siaya County. But as fate would have it and despite his financial muscle, Fidel, who was a wealthy businessman in the petroleum industry, just never managed to complete erecting his rural home by the time of his death. This is precisely why he was laid to rest next to his grandfather, Kenya's first Vice President Jaramogi Adonija Oginga Odinga, in accordance with dictates of Luo traditions.

That the body of Fidel, whom family members confess was regarded by Jaramogi as a favourite grandchild, now lies next to that of the famous political leader, is a curious coincidence. An apparent political heir to his father — Coalition for Reforms and Democracy (CORD) leader and former Prime Minister Raila Odinga — Fidel was third in the lineage of the Jaramogi dynasty.

Political asset

Roundly hailed by many, including President Uhuru Kenyatta and Deputy President William Ruto as a sociable individual whose relationships cut across the political and ethnic divide, Fidel was a crucial political asset and linkman of the Odingas. In fact to many, Fidel was perhaps an easier political candidate to sell to the rest of Kenyans as compared to his grandfather and father.

His re-union, in death, with his grandfather now poses a major political challenge to the Odingas. With the exit of Fidel, who will be the third generation bearer of the mantle of one of Kenya's most political families?

With regard to the male gender, only Raila Odinga Jnr remains in the former Premier's political stable. And although he was named after his father, the younger Raila has very little in common with the Orange party leader in terms of political interest. Family members describe Junior as reclusive but a perfect gentleman who shies away from controversy. He is totally disinterested in politics.

Within the family of Raila's elder brother, Dr Oburu Oginga, there are three male children. There is Dick, a Kisumu-based businessman who deals in the transport and farming sectors, as well as Elija, who is also embedded in business. The two are believably contented with business and have little interest in politics.

There is a third one, though, Jack Oburu, who was briefly involved in his uncle's presidential campaign in 2013. Popularly known among friends as Jaoko, he played a key role in Raila's campaigns where he served as one of the leaders of the Friends of Raila (Fora) lobby group.

Jaoko disappeared from the political radar soon after Jubilee's candidate, Uhuru Kenyatta, was declared President. The Standard On Sunday has, however, traced Raila's nephew to the Siaya County Government where he works as an investment advisor.

In the absence of Fidel, pundits opine that Jaoko stands out as the sole politically-minded grandson in the wider Jaramogi family. But if the net is cast wider to include granddaughters, family members point to Raila's last born daughter, Winnie, as an emerging political force. (Text ends)

KENYA: protection needs increase with refugee influx'

Kakuma, (January 14, 2015) – Without the opportunity to integrate into Kenyan society due to a strict encampment policy and with low chances of resettlement, most refugees in Kenya spend years living in refugee camps. While they are provided a physical space free from war, camps are not necessarily free from human rights abuses, particularly sexual and gender-based violence (SGBV).

Kakuma refugee camp is ripe with cultural diversity that enriches camp life, but unfortunately "some of the cultural practices and beliefs degrade women. Among the South Sudanese, especially Dinka and Nuer, women are seen as valuable assets who are traded for expensive dowries of herds of cattle, which many families depend on for survival," said Jeremiah

Orongo Otieno, Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS) Safe Haven Assistant Coordinator in Kakuma. This creates circumstances where women and children are not granted the agency they deserve.

Two JRS Safe Havens – one for adolescent boys and another for girls, single women and mothers with their children –provide physical and emotional protection, safe spaces within the camp for those caught in a cycle of violence. Adolescent boys residing in the Safe Haven attend a nearby camp school, receive food and other basic necessities, and are offered access to a child therapist and mentorship programmes.

Girls, women and their children engage in literacy and tailoring classes and also receive counselling, food and other basic necessities. Children under 10 years of age attend nursery school within the shelter. The facility also offers numerous workshops for women and girls on reproductive, maternal and child health, including HIV/AIDS awareness.

"Equipping the safe haven participants with these skills improves their healing process and enables them to feel safe, secure and at ease with themselves."

New phenomenon of trafficking.

According to UNFPA, in 2014 alone, more than 43,000 South Sudanese refugees have arrived into the already overcrowded Kakuma camp. Seventy percent of these new arrivals are women and children. Given the severity of the conflict in South Sudan, it is inevitable that many of the children who flee lose their parents or guardians along the way, leaving them vulnerable to trafficking, abductions and SGBV.

"Trafficking of South Sudanese children as young as ten is a growing phenomenon. Traffickers find those separated from their families on route to or inside the camp and take them the southern Africa, often to Malawi, where they use or sell them as slaves (both for forced labour and sexual exploitation)." Camp officials work vigilantly to identify trafficking victims and refer them to the JRS shelter. "A group of about 50 children were rescued in August in Kakuma before they were taken by traffickers."

Coordinated response

In addition to camp officials, organisations such as Lutheran World Federation, responsible for school management, as well as the Refugee Consortium of Kenya and the International Rescue Committee, responsible for healthcare, identify women and children in need of protection and refer them to the JRS

Safe Haven. These organisations then try to find a durable solution for their protection, ideally within six months, which could include reintegration in their community, relocation to Dadaab refugee camp or another community in Kakuma, or, in very rare circumstances, resettlement abroad.

However, meeting a six-month time limit is often not possible. Just as the camp is overcrowded, so too are the safe havens. The women's shelter should house 40 refugees but currently hosts 72 with some beneficiaries sleeping on the floor. The waiting list for referrals continues to grow. Fortunately, JRS is not alone in addressing SGBV. Many organisations work to raise awareness among communities and prevent future incidents. FilmAid, for example, raises awareness about identifying and reporting incidences of SGBV with community leaders, zone leaders and community groups. Other organisations do the same in schools with trainings designed for children. UNFPA Kenya also leads initiatives in community outreach, psychosocial support and protective spaces. Angela Wells, JRS Eastern Africa Communications Officer International Criminal Court terminates proceeding against President Uhuru Kenyatta'

By Standard Digital reporter (March 13, 2015)

Kenya: The International Criminal Court (ICC) has terminated the proceedings against President Uhuru Kenyatta following prosecution's move to withdraw charges facing him last year.

ICC Prosecutor Fatou Bensouda dropped the charges in December last year saying she did not have enough evidence against him. "Noting the Prosecution's withdrawal of charges against Mr Kenyatta, the Chamber decided to terminate the proceedings in this case and to vacate the summons to appear against him", reads part of ICC statement sent to newsrooms Friday.

The Chamber stressed also that, although the proceedings shall be terminated, the court retains jurisdiction over any interference with a witness or with the collection of evidence and that the protective measures ordered for witnesses and/or victims shall continue, subject to the review by the Court.

President Uhuru faced charges at the ICC as an indirect co-perpetrator, with five counts of crimes against humanity consisting of murder, deportation or forcible transfer, rape, persecution and other inhumane acts allegedly committed during the post-election violence in Kenya in the dispouted 2007-2008 poll.

The charges were confirmed on January 23, 2012 and the case was committed to trial before Trial Chamber V(B). (Text ends)

It's Ethiopia! State now breaks silence over aborted Uhuru trip

By Geoffrey Mosoku and Cyrus Ombati (May 11th 2015)

It was revealed Sunday that the President's jet turned back after Ethiopian authorities advised the pilot to change the flight course in a bid to avoid the Yemen airspace.

It also emerged that President Uhuru Kenyatta's jet turned back to Nairobi in Somalia, after Ethiopian air controllers advised them to reroute.

Officials at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs said the protest note was handed to Ethiopian Ambassador to Kenya Dina Mufti, who was reportedly summoned to the ministry last Monday over the matter.

"We sent a strong protest note to Ethiopia for embarrassing us. What they did was wrong," said a highly placed source who requested anonymity.

Foreign Affairs PS Karanja Kibicho confirmed that Kenya had sent a note to Ethiopia but denied the envoy had been summoned.

"It's wrong to say that we summoned the ambassador. He came to pick the note from the ministry just like all ambassadors do," Dr Kibicho said.

The PS told The Standard that the issue had been resolved amicably and it was now time to "let the country move forward".

"It was an unfortunate incident and all the countries involved have held discussions and resolved it. We will ensure this does not happen again," he said.

Until Sunday, government officials have been unwilling to give information about what exactly led to the cancellation of the trip, fueling all manner of speculation among Kenyans. Ethiopia and Eritrea have previously been separately blamed over the aborted journey. Mechanical problem has also been cited as a possible reason why the aircraft jetted back.

The presidential jet flew back to Jomo Kenyatta International Airport four hours after it had taken off headed for Dubai.

Although initial reports had indicated that it had crossed the Kenyan-Ethiopia border almost 40 minutes later headed for Eritrea, which was the safe route given the turmoil in Yemeni, the PS clarified that Uhuru's jet actually returned from Somalia.

"The plane returned from Somalia and not Ethiopia after it become untenable to reroute the presidential jet. There was a misdirection which has since been regretted," Kibicho added.

According to the PS, the President's pilot had two options; to return or land for refueling. The pilot chose to fly back since landing a presidential jet in a foreign country requires a lot of protocol arrangements.

"This is a decision you have to make within a short time given you are cruising at 800 kilometres per hour and you are 3,000 metres above sea level. You can't just land in any country with a head of state on board."

Dr Kibicho says the new route could have seen the President's plane entering Saudi Arabia airspace on its way to Dubai through Somalia and Djibouti. (Text ends)

Ethiopian forces ‘cross into Kenya’, risk diplomatic fallout with key regional ally'

Mail and Guardian Africa (May 19, 2015)

ETHIOPIA has risked diplomatically antagonising a major ally after local media reported that its forces had crossed into Kenyan territory.

Kenya’s largest-circulating newspaper the Daily Nation Tuesday reported that about 50 armed Ethiopian soldiers and policemen had briefly taken over a Kenyan police station to the country’s remote north.

Kenyan police told the publication that Ethiopian forces armed with AK47 rifles arrived and took strategic positions around the Illeret police station in the North Horr region.

The Ethiopians are said to have assessed and photographed the area, which is estimated to be be less than 20 kilometres inside Kenya. They allegedly admitted that the Kenyan government was not aware of their presence, but said they would return.

Surveyors have in recent weeks reportedly been demarcating the Kenya-Ethiopia border, but this is unclear why given their joint border was agreed by treaty in 1970, having been mapped out 20 years before.

According to a police officer quoted by the paper, this is the third time Ethiopian forces have crossed into Kenya during the year, and called for reinforcements for the station.

A Kenya army spokesman said the military was not aware of the incident, terming Ethiopia a “traditional” friend and that he did not think they would “do anything bad.” Kenya has a defence pact with Ethiopia, dating back to the days of Emperor Haile Selassie and Kenya’s independence leader Jomo Kenyatta.

The two countries were so closely allied strategically, Kenyatta gave Selassie a generous piece of land close to State House Nairobi for Ethiopia to build its mission.

Kenyans have however reacted strongly, largely viewing the incident as a show of foreign policy weakness. The country has in the past also been involved in a border dispute with Uganda over the small but resource-rich island of Migingo.

Kenya is perceived to have come out with the more bloodied nose from that encounter, with Uganda forces still sighted on the island.

The country regained some national pride with the 2011 invasion of Somalia to flush out Al-Shabaab militants, but it has in turn had to endure deadly retaliatory attacks on home soil, piling more pressure on its security architecture.

The latest incursion by Ethiopia would thus present an unwanted headache for a country that already has its hands full of diplomatic headaches including Burundi and the threat of the Somalia militant group Al-Shabab, and which is struggling to project its influence regionally, despite being the biggest economy in East Africa.

Scholars of geopolitics have argued that the lack of a credible committed defence more often than not invites other nations to test borders and diplomatic boundaries.

In April, Kenyan president Uhuru Kenyatta's jet was embarrassingly turned back while reportedly in Ethiopian airspace in a diplomatic riddle that is yet to be solved publicly.

The plane was initially thought to have been pushed back while over Eritrean territory, but Asmara denied the aircraft had even reached its territory.

Eritrea and Ethiopia have deeply strained relations and have had no diplomatic ties since 1998, but Nairobi and Addis Ababa have solid ties, with moves underway to strengthen economic relations.

Ethiopia has an active border dispute with Eritrea, with which it fought in 1998-2000, leaving tens of thousands dead.

That war was over the disputed territory of Badme, which the UN has ruled belongs to Eritrea. Asmara sought to retake it by force, but because the territory lay in the homeland of the ruling Ethiopian class, ran into major conflict with Ethiopia.

Ethiopia still controls Badme, leading to a tense northern frontier and a closed border.

But with Ethiopia set to vote next week, nationalistic sentiment may again be running high among its elite, leading to a flexing of strength in a bid to rally the frontier communities.

The UK has an active travel alert against all travel to Ethiopian borders with Eritrea, Sudan, Kenya and Somalia, and which was updated last week with a focus on the elections.

Ethiopia has also had a troublesome border with Somalia, into which it has crossed a number of times, for decades, including a simmering separatist movement.

The country could thus be looking to batten down the hatches ahead of an election where, though the ruling party faces no real threat, Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn who took over the job after the larger-than-life Meles Zenawi died in 2012, needs to project strength in a country where it plays well to its history of not having been definitely conquered by a European colonizer. But given its robust ties with Nairobi, it would be against its interests to antagonise its southern neighbor. (Text ends)

GOVERNANCE: Kenya court urges change to law that penalises women who pass HIV to baby. Katy Migiro for Thomson Reuters Foundation, part of the Guardian development network (Wednesday April 1, 2015

Human rights groups welcome Kenya high court ruling that section of law to curb spread of HIV and Aids is unconstitutional . Human rights groups have welcomed moves to change Kenya's 2006 HIV and Aids Prevention Act which at present effectively criminalises pregnant women who pass HIV to their babies. The law says that a person knowing they are HIV positive must tell "any sexual contact" of their status in advance and could be jailed for seven years if they "knowingly and recklessly" placed another person at risk of being infected.

Kenya's high court ruled this section of the law unconstitutional on 18 March as "it could be interpreted to apply to women who expose or transmit HIV to a child during pregnancy, delivery or breastfeeding". The law was introduced to curb the spread of HIV and Aids in Kenya, which has the fourth largest HIV-positive population in the world – 1.6 million people. Rights groups argue that it discriminates against women, who are often the first members of a family to find out their HIV status as they are usually tested when pregnant. "This law has inflicted fear, shame and punishment on countless Kenyans, especially pregnant women," Evelyne Opondo, Africa director of the New-York based Center for Reproductive Rights (CRR), said in a statement on 30 March.

"Now is the time for the Kenya government to immediately amend this legislation and ensure people living with HIV can get the care they need without fear of discrimination or criminalisation." CRR submitted an amicus brief in a case brought against the government by the Aids Law Project, a charity providing legal services and counselling to people living with HIV.

The charity argued that the law discourages people from finding out their status and could even prevent those with HIV giving first aid or playing sports for fear of being prosecuted.

The law also puts women at risk of violence or rejection by their husbands because it allows doctors to disclose the status of patients to their next of kin, it said.

“If we want to reduce the spread of HIV and Aids and put an end to the stigma, violence and discrimination surrounding the disease, our public policies must be based on medical evidence and grounded in human rights,” Jacinta Nyachae, executive director of the Aids Law Project, said in the statement. The high court advised the government to review the law to avoid further litigation. (Text ends)

Ethiopia soldiers invade Kenyan village, rough up locals

BY LIBAN GOLICHA Updated Wednesday, May 27th 2015 at 00:00 GMT +3

More than 30 heavily armed Ethiopian soldiers invaded Lataka village in Sololo on Tuesday morning and allegedly roughed up locals. The soldiers also allegedly disarmed a Kenya Police Reservist (KPR) officer and arrested some residents of the village.

Locals claimed the foreign soldiers demanded they produce and disclose whereabouts of Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) rebels, which is an outlawed militia in Ethiopia. The incident happened two days after Ethiopia held its national elections and at a time when the Sololo border remained closed due to the polls. Speaking to The Standard, they said soldiers were armed with hundreds of bullets, AK47 rifles, hand grenade and other sophisticated weapons.

INVADED VILLAGE

"They roughed up several people in the village and my elder brother suffered head and leg injuries during the 6am incident," a resident, Halkano Huka, said. Locals said the troops crossed into Kenya on Monday evening, through the Godi-loni border point, and invaded Lataka village on Tuesday morning which is some 20 kilometres from the border.

Moyale border re - opened after Ethiopia general polls

During the invasion they arrested two people from the village and released them after three hours. The residents said soldiers went towards Qicha village some 10 kilometres towards the border and by the time we went to press, the fate of the village remained unknown. The villagers said Kenyan police arrived at the village at 9am and went to Sololo Police Station where they interrogated the two abducted villagers, Gimbe Jarso and Rob Jarso. Sololo Deputy County Commissioner Raphael Muiruri confirmed the incident and said a KPR officer was disarmed.

"Police are on the ground but we have scant information at the moment," he said adding they will release official information later in the day. The disarming of the KPR official brings to two the number of Kenya Government guns currently in the hand of Ethiopia authorities.

Mr Muiruri said the gun that was taken away by force on March 11 at Elle-bor is yet to be recovered adding that tension remains high at the border. The disarming of the KPR official brings to two the number of Kenya Government guns currently in the hand of Ethiopia authorities. Mr Muiruri said the gun that was taken away by force on March 11 at Elle-bor is yet to be recovered adding that tension remains high at the border. (Text ends)

Kenya deploys military along border after Ethiopian soldiers' invasion BY

LIBAN GOLICHA Updated Thursday, May 28th 2015 at 22:00 GMT +3

MARSABIT: Kenya has deployed military troops along Sololo border following Tuesday's invasion of Ethiopian soldiers into three villages in Uran Ward within the county. The military arrived in Sololo District on Tuesday, hours after the Ethiopian soldiers had left after invading villages and have been patrolling the border since then. Uran Ward Rep Qalicha Huka confirmed Kenya Defence Forces (KDF) officers have been deployed along the border and the situation is under control. "We thank security personnel for acting swiftly after we reported the incident," he said, adding that combined police forces and military visited the invaded villages.

Locals harassed

On Wednesday, calm had returned to the border villages of Lataka, Qicha and Kiltipe where foreign forces' invasion had been reported and several locals harassed on Tuesday. The foreign soldiers have reportedly retreated to their country since Tuesday evening through Kiltipe border point.

During the invasion, they also allegedly disarmed a Kenya Police Reservist (KPR) officer identified as Guyo Galgallo. The villagers claimed the foreign force demanded them to disclose the whereabouts of Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) rebels, which is an outlawed militia in Ethiopia.

Sololo District peace chairman Galm Dabasso said four people were injured during the incident and KDF officers have kept vigil following the incident. He said foreign forces have reportedly crossed over to their country and tension has diffused in the region. Area Deputy County Commissioner

Raphael Muiruri said Wednesday the situation is calm but the Government guns taken away by the foreign force are yet to be recovered. (Text ends)

Kenya Military fortifies border security after a second invasion by Ethiopian troops (STANDARD DIGITAL May 28, 2015) - Kenya has deployed military troops along Sololo border following Tuesday's invasion of Ethiopian government soldiers into three villages in Uran Ward within the county.

The military arrived in Sololo District on Tuesday, hours after the Ethiopian soldiers had left after invading villages and have been patrolling the border since then. Uran Ward Rep Qalicha Huka confirmed Kenya Defence Forces (KDF) officers have been deployed along the border and the situation is under control. “We thank security personnel for acting swiftly after we reported the incident,” he said, adding that combined police forces and military visited the invaded villages.

On Wednesday, calm had returned to the border villages of Lataka, Qicha and Kiltipe where foreign forces' invasion had been reported and several locals harassed on Tuesday.

During the invasion, they also allegedly disarmed a Kenya Police Reservist (KPR) officer identified as Guyo Galgallo. The villagers claimed the foreign force demanded them to disclose the whereabouts of Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) rebels.

Sololo District peace chairman Galm Dabasso said four people were injured during the incident and KDF officers have kept vigil following the incident.

Area Deputy County Commissioner Raphael Muiruri said Wednesday the situation is calm but the Kenyan weapons that were taken away by the Ethiopian government troops are yet to be recovered. (Text ends)

KENYA: Ethiopia Spymaster infiltrates Kenyan police

By Kasembeli Albert Anxiety has gripped the Kenyan corridors of power and the National Police Service Commission (NPSC) after it emerged that Ethiopian National Intelligence and Security Service (NISS) has infiltrated the Kenya police service and established a unit within, which pays allegiance to NISS and executes orders from Addis Ababa.

Security pundits consider this an act of treason on the part of Kenya police officers involved.

Despite notification from the Kenya spy-master – National Security Intelligence Services (NSIS), sources intimated to The Sunday Express that nothing had been done to avert the lurking threat to the national security by such infiltration by a foreign agency. “This guys are operating with impunity as though they are no longer officers of the National police Service," said a senior police officer at Vigilance House.

When contacted the Inspector General, David Kimaiyo denied knowledge of such a unit operating under his arm bit. “Am not aware of that. In fact am hearing it from you,” said Kimaiyo.

Though officials at the Ethiopian Embassy in Nairobi declined to comment on the matter only referring as to Addis Abba, our sources within the embassy divulged that 50 polices officers are on the pay roll of the Ethiopia Government.

The officers under the command of senior police officer based in Nairobi received a total monthly payment of 900,000 Ethiopia Birr (KSh4.5 million) monthly minus the allowances and money meant to facilitate specific operations. The officers are said to live a lavish life and are accessible to top of the range cars.

Even as Ethiopia appears to be using the old spying system. Questions are emerging as to why the government has never taken stern measures against officers involved including charging them with treason because it is clear espionage.

Security analyst Simiyu Werunga attributes this to poor pay and deplorable working conditions, leaving the officers more vulnerable to corruption and bribery. “The government should take a stern action against the suspects for having taken part in criminal activities against their country even after taking an oath,” he said.

It is worth noting that NISS is a very powerful and dreaded organ of Ethiopia’s totalitarian government. It is to protect national security by providing quality intelligence and reliable security services. Under the plans presented, it is accountable to the Prime Minister. The agency has a wide permit to lead intelligence and security work both inside and outside Ethiopia.

“The unit specifically compiles intelligence reports as to specifics missions as requests made by Addis,” said a source privy to operations of the unit. The unit too specifically monitors the operations of Ethiopian dissidents and refugees living in Kenya.

The unit is also said to be responsible for kidnappings of Ethiopian refuges and dissidents and their subsequent repatriation to Addis Ababa where they face death, brutality and long prison sentences. The unit has specific detail to trail their eyes on Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) and the Oganden National Liberation Front (ONLF).

Last week, two police officers appeared in court charged with alleged abduction of two ONLF leaders in Nairobi. On January 26, two top officials of ONLF were abducted from outside a popular restaurant in Upper Hill, Nairobi. The two who were identified as Mr Sulub Ahmed and Ali Hussein were members of the ONLF negotiation team that was in Nairobi for a proposed third round of talks.

It is claimed security agencies from Ethiopia and Kenya were involved in the kidnapping. They were abducted by men who were in three waiting cars. One of the cars, a black Toyota Prado was seized and detained at the Turbi police station on Monday but the two were missing amid speculation they had been taken across to Ethiopia. The ONLF officials were invited by the Kenyan government for peace negotiations.

The two officers charged, a Chief Inspector Painito Bera Ng'ang'ai and Constable James Ngaparini are attached to Nairobi Area CID. He added the officers had been identified by witnesses as having participated in the abduction of Mr Sulub Ahmed and Ali Hussein who were members of the ONLF negotiation team that was in Nairobi for a proposed third round of talks.

Last week, the Human Rights League of the Horn of Africa (HRLHA) wrote to President Uhuru Kenyatta expressing its deep concern regarding the safety of four Oromo refugees from Ethiopia who were arbitrarily arrested by Kenyan anti-terrorist squad from Isili area in Nairobi on different dates of operations and taken to unknown destinations.

According documents in our possession, Mr. Tumsa Roba Katiso, (UNHCR attestation File#: NETH033036/1) was arrested by people claiming to by a team of Kenyan police, who arrived at the scene in two vehicles, on February 1, 2014 at around 10:00 AM from 2nd Avenue Eastleigh Nairobi on his way home from shopping. The other three refugees, Mr. Chala Abdalla, Mr. Namme Abdalla, and the third person whose name is not known yet were picked up from their home which is located in the same vicinity.

They are alleged to have been picked by the special police squad on the payroll of Addis Ababa. The whereabouts of those Ethiopian-Oromo refugees is unknown until the time of going to press.

The HRLHA is highly suspicious that those Ethiopian-Oromo refugees might have been deported to Ethiopia. And, in case those Ethiopian-Oromo refugees have been deported, the Ethiopian Government has a well-documented record of gross and flagrant violations of human rights, including the torturing of its own citizens who were involuntarily returned to the country.

The government of Ethiopia routinely imprisons such persons and sentences them to up to life in prison, and often impose death penalty. There have been credible reports of physical and psychological abuses committed against individuals in Ethiopian official prisons and other unofficial or secret detention centres.

Under Article 33 (1) of the Convention relating to the Status of Refugees (189 U.N.T.S. 150), to which Kenya is a party, "[n]o contracting state shall expel or forcibly return a refugee in any manner whatsoever to the frontiers of territories where his life or freedom would be threatened on account of his . . . political opinion."

This obligation, which is also a principle of customary international law, applies to both asylum seekers and refugees, as affirmed by UNHCR's Executive Committee and the United Nations General Assembly. By deporting the four refugees and others, the Kenyan Government will be breaching its obligations under international treaties as well as customary law.

Though some government officials denied it is official government policy, the Kenyan Government is well known for handing over refugees to the Ethiopian Government by violating the above mentioned international obligations. Engineer Tesfahun Chemeda, who died on August 24, 2013 in Ethiopia's grand jail of Kaliti due1 to torture that was inflicted on him in that jail, was handed over to the Ethiopian government security agents in 2007 by the Kenyan police.

Tesfahun Chemeda was arrested by the Kenyan police, along with his close friend called Mesfin Abebe, in 2007 in Nairobi, Kenya, where both were living as refugees since 2005; and later deported to Ethiopia. The Ethiopian government detained them in an underground jail in a military camp for over one year, during which time they were subjected to severe torture and other types of inhuman treatments until when they were taken to court and changed with terrorism offences in December 2008. They were eventually sentenced to life imprisonment in March 2010.

"The Human Rights League of the Horn of Africa (HRLHA) is highly concerned about the safety and security of the above listed refugees who were recently arrested by the Kenyan anti-terrorist forces; and for those who are still living in Kenya," said a communiqué petitioning President Kenyatta to intervene.

It urges the government of Kenya to respect the international treaties and obligations, and unconditionally release the arrested refugees, and refrain from handing over to the government of Ethiopia where they would definitely face torture and maximum punishments. It also urges all human rights agencies (local, regional and international) to join the HRLHA and condemn these illegal and inhuman acts of the Kenyan Government against defenseless refugees.

HRLHA requests western countries as well as international organizations to interfere in this matter so that the safety and security of the arrested refugees and those refugees currently staying in Kenya could be ensured.

In the recent past, the rendition of Oromo refugees has been in the news. Kenyan authorities have been accused of illegal rendition of Oromo refugees to Ethiopia under the pretext of cracking down on the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF) militias. While in Ethiopia, the individuals are allegedly arraigned before special courts where they are handed heavy jail sentences ranging from death to life in prison.

The fundamental objective of the Oromo liberation movement is to exercise the Oromo peoples' right to national self-determination and end centuries of oppression and exploitation. The OLF believes the Oromo people are still being denied their fundamental rights by Ethiopian colonialism. According to Terfa Dibaba, head of the Oromo Relief Association (ORA) based in Germany, 21 Oromo refugees have been adducted in Nairobi and Moyale and illegally shipped to Addis Ababa where they have been locked in custody.

Some of the people abducted in Nairobi and Moyale and clandestinely whisked to Ethiopia and languishing in jail include: Jatani Kuuno, Liban Wario and Milki Doyo. These, ORA alleges, were abducted in a friend's house in Moyale by Kenyans enlisted by the Ethiopia authorities and ferried in two Kenya government's Land Rovers to Ethiopia.

Others are Dabaso Kutu, Libani Jatani and Deban Wario. They are currently on trial in Ethiopia. Impeccable source have confided that a Kenyan, Abrhim Dambi, the head of the head of Ethiopian Spy network detailed to track down political dissidents has now fled to Addis Ababa where he is hosted by the government after he was exposed. Kasembeli Albert is a PR & Communications Consultant.

Kenya to build wall on border with Somalia

Kennedy Kepalat, KBC June 18, 2015

NAIROBI, Kenya - After suffering incessant terrorist attacks, Kenya is determined to build a wall on its border with Somalia, Kennedy Kepalat of Kenya Broadcasting Corp (KBC) reports:

The proposed security wall separating Kenya and Somalia is on course, north-eastern regional coordinator Mohamud Saleh has said. He said the Kenya government has begun constructing the security wall along its border with Somalia to curb cross-border incursions by Somalia based Al-Shabaab militants. The wall will run from Mandera in the north to Kiunga in the east coast, covering Mandera, Wajir, Garissa and Lamu counties.

Speaking during the tour of the project, Saleh said clearing and surveying along the border where the security line will pass through is ongoing but the actual construction is set to begin from next month. He said that the project is part of government policy in regard to war on terror and nothing will stop it.

Somalia parliamentarians have voiced their discontent over the security wall Kenya seeks to erect along its border with their country following frequent attacks launched on Kenyan soil by Al Shabab militant group.

Meanwhile, leaders and residents of Northern Kenya have been challenged to address the root courses of the current insecurity attributed to Al shabaab militants who have crippled virtually all sectors in the region. Area Regional coordinator Mohamud Saleh wondered why Al shabaab militants have not been able to penetrate in countries like Uganda, Burundi and neighboring Ethiopia but instead find it easy to enter and attack areas in Kenya almost at will.

Addressing chiefs and their assistants while on a tour of the county, Saleh cautioned the administrators against recommending issuance of National Identification cards to aliens saying it was the genesis of the rising insecurity. Saleh acknowledged the lack of resources and equipment among the local administrators pledging government support.

He further reiterated that the government will employ 300 National Police Reservists in each of the three counties of Garissa, Wajir and Mandera to boost the war on terrorism. (Text ends)

Kenya wages war on smugglers who fund Somali militants By

Drazen Jorgic, Reuters (June 23, 2015)

KENYA: DADAAB, Kenya (Reuters) - When Kenyan police arrested six men in the vast Dadaab refugee camp near the Somali border last April, their ultimate aim was to dismantle a decades-old sugar smuggling trade that is funding Somali militants waging war on Kenya.

The arrests, coming weeks after four al Shabaab gunmen massacred 148 people at nearby Garissa university, were part of Nairobi's new strategy to choke off the flow of money to Islamists whose cross-border raids have hammered Kenya and its tourism industry.

While cash from sugar smuggling may amount to only a few million dollars, experts say such sums are enough for attacks that need just a few assault rifles, transport and loyalists ready to die - such as the Garissa raid or the 2013 assault on Nairobi's Westgate shopping mall that killed 67 people.

"It’s like the government is awakening," said a senior Kenyan security source from Garissa region, adding the authorities had previously often "turned a blind eye to all these things because a lot of people were benefiting - but at a cost of security."

However if a lasting impact is to be secured more must be done, say security and diplomatic sources. That includes rooting out corruption in the police force and going after smuggling cartel bosses as well as the middle men detained so far.

The move to tackle the cross-border trade may prove as vital as the military offensive against al Shabaab inside Somalia by African Union peacekeepers and Somali soldiers that has pushed the group into smaller pockets of territory.

"Unless al Shabaab sources of revenue are chopped off, we are not going to see the end of instability in south Somalia and the region," said Rashid Abdi, a Somalia expert based in Nairobi.

President Uhuru Kenyatta's government has taken steps to halt the trafficking of sugar from the southern Somali port of Kismayu to Kenya's frontier and has set up a special unit in the National Intelligence Service (NIS) to dismantle smuggling cartels, the security source said.

"SECRET" DOCUMENT

Days after the Garissa attack, Kenya published a list of 85 entities and individuals with links to al Shabaab. That list did not elaborate on the links, but a government document marked "secret" and reviewed by Reuters detailed how 30 listed people were involved in smuggling. The six men arrested in Dadaab on April 18 were on both lists.

"The sugar barons pay illegal levies - or protection fees - to the al Shabaab who in turn uses the proceeds to fund terrorist activities/operations," says the "secret" document, drawn up by the government on April 25.

Sugar smuggling is lucrative in Kenya, where the local industry is protected from imports as part of an agreement with Kenya's African trading partners. So the commodity in Kenya is sold at an inflated price compared to global markets. Diplomats acknowledge progress against smugglers has been made, but worry the authorities will not keep up the crackdown.

"Those sugar folks are connected (to the authorities), so the question is what happens going forward," said one Western diplomat. Adding to scepticism, only mid-level dealers have been arrested and no cartel bosses have even been named.

How the smuggling trade works and how cash is paid to two al Shabaab was explained to Reuters by two ethnic-Somali sugar smugglers from the Dadaab camp - Hussein, a trader, and Farah, a broker linking smugglers and police.

Both men joined the flood of refugees who crossed into Kenya after conflict erupted in Somalia in 1991. They agreed to meet in a secluded area in a Dadaab hotel on condition only their first names were used.

According to their accounts - corroborated by Kenyan and regional security sources - smuggled goods arrive in Kismayu port where Kenyan-owned trucks are loaded with 50-kg bags of Brazilian sugar imported from the Middle East.

CORRUPTION

From there, the trucks drive through al Shabaab-controlled territory to Kenya's border. At one of two al Shabaab checkpoints, drivers pay $1,025 per truck to pass. "Al Shabaab sometimes move the checkpoint," said Hussein. "But you receive a slip from them, so you can show that if you run into them again."

Once at Kenya's frontier, officially shut to any traffic whether carrying goods or passengers, trucks pay 60,000 shillings ($600) each to Kenyan police to cross. Somali authorities take a separate cut along the way.

Deputy County Commissioner Albert Kimathi acknowledged some police were involved but said this was being tackled by steps such as moving officers who had been in post for three years. Those in smuggling "hot spots" could be moved after six months.

"It's the only way not to institutionalise the corruption issue," he said. "If someone overstays, they become so well known to the locals that they become part of the racket." Hussein and Farah said that, until the crackdown began in April, about 35 trucks carrying sugar, rice and other contraband arrived each week at Dadaab, home to about 350,000 refugee Somalis. They said others unloaded in Garissa and Wajir, further north, but they were not sure how many.

Based on the Dadaab business alone, and the figures for the amount earned with each truckload, al Shabaab earns about $1.9 million a year, according to a Reuters calculation.

A senior police officer in Dadaab said Kenyan smugglers "look at the money they make and don't think about the money they give to al Shabaab, and the kind of damage that will do."

In Dadaab, the April 18 arrests had an immediate effect, at least for a short while, by driving sugar prices higher as shops started sourcing more expensive Kenyan sugar from Nairobi. "The fear is that if you are found with sugar you will be associated with al Shabaab," said one local Dadaab politician, who also wanted to remain anonymous. "No one wants that." (Text ends)

KENYA: Chaos disrupt Parliament special sitting on Security Bill'

REUTERS/STANDARD (December 18, 2014) Fight broke out in Kenyan Parliament over proposed anti-terrorism law. The proposed amendments to Kenya's existing security law, which include extending the time suspects can be held without charge to 360 days from 90 days, follows a spate of attacks by militants on Kenya's border region with Somalia that has killed dozens of people. The amendments would also fine media organisations up to Sh5 million for printing material that is "likely to cause fear or alarm". The proposal does not define such material.

Uhuru Kenyatta has faced mounting pressure to boost the country's security since an attack in September 2013 on Nairobi's WestgatE mall that left 67 people dead. Early Thursday morning, Anti-riot police patrolled Nairobi streets and dispersed any group of up to four people. Witnesses say they saw police arrest three men near the Tom Mboya statue along Moi Avenue. “Security is tight and we discourage those planning chaos against doing so. We have enough personnel,” said a senior police officer. Opposition leaders and civil rights activists had said they would hold street protests to oppose the debate and passage of the proposed law. (Text ends)

How much it costs to host the world's most powerful man

STANDARD DIGITAL By Oscar Obonyo Updated Sunday, July 12, 2015

When he first travelled to Kenya in 1986, he did so unnoticed, like any other ordinary American tourist. Twenty years later, as Senator of the State of Illinois, Barack Obama returned to a more respectable reception by the Mwai Kibaki Administration. But the quality of his reception this time around is expected to hit a crescendo when, as leader of the world's most powerful country, Obama jets into Kenya in a fortnight.

Already, several equipment, including more than 50 special cars that will be at the disposal of America's 44th President while on his three-day visit, have arrived. And contrary to previous visits when he flew in on a commercial flight and private jet as senator, Obama will fly in on the US presidential Air Force One. When he last visited in August 2006, Moses Wetang'ula, then the assistant minister for Foreign Affairs, was the most senior government official present to receive him. Except for uncoordinated chants and ululations from excited crowds, there was no official choir to welcome him to Kenya, nor a guard of honour mounted for him to inspect.

His quiet reception at the vice-presidential pavilion upon arrival at 6pm on Thursday, August 24, barely lasted 30 minutes. He then drove off in a fleet of US embassy vehicles accompanied by Ambassador Michael Ranneberger. But an elaborate and colourful reception led by none other than President Uhuru Kenyatta awaits Obama when he arrives on the evening of Friday 24 for the Global Entrepreneurship Summit in Nairobi.

President Kenyatta's spokesman Manoah Esipisu has already hinted at a huge reception for the US President, whose father was Kenyan. Addressing the press recently, Esipisu told Kenyans to brace themselves for inconveniences during the high-profile visit. Similar alerts have been issued by Inspector General of Police Joseph Boinett and other security agencies. Ordinarily, when a US President visits, transport and communication systems grind to a halt. This is because such trips require extraordinary security measures.

While in Kenya, Obama will be chauffeured in a luxury customised presidential Cadillac limousine code-named "the beast".

According to online details titled "Inside the President's armored limo", there are 12 "beasts" currently in service, with an estimated cost of $1.5 million (about Sh147 million) per car. The bulletproof "beast", which is 18 feet long, has doors that are eight inches thick while its windows are five inches thick. It is also installed with several luxury and essential features, including a direct phone line to the US Vice President. The contrast between the "beast" and the matatu (the type where travellers sat in two rows facing each other with knees touching or legs interlocked), which Obama boarded in 1991 to his father's home in Kogelo, Siaya County, is beyond comparison.

Then, he squeezed himself into the matatu, which he describes in his famous autobiography Dreams From My Father, as "a sad-looking vehicle with balding, cracked tyres." On that occasion, Obama ended up carrying his half-sister Auma on his lap together with a basket of yams while supporting a crying baby! This time around, Obama will also not have to worry about traffic jams, similar to those he frequently experienced while in Auma's Volkswagen beetle, along Uhuru Highway and near the University of Nairobi, where his sister worked as a lecturer.

Nonetheless, foreign travel by US Presidents is a costly affair, much as it is difficult to ascertain exact figures since such data is considered confidential. But journalists David Nakamur and Carol Leonnig divulge that a Secret Service internal memo leaked to The Washington Post ahead of Obama's three-nation Africa tour in 2013 demonstrated just how costly long foreign trips can be.

In one of the online issues of The Washington Post, David, who is a White House correspondent and Carol, who covers federal agencies with a focus on government accountability, report that the trip entailed hundreds of Secret Service agents to secure facilities in Senegal, South Africa and Tanzania. There was also a Navy aircraft carrier with a fully staffed medical trauma centre stationed offshore in case of an emergency and military cargo planes to bring in 56 support vehicles, "including 14 limousines and three trucks loaded with sheets of bullet-proof glass to cover the windows of the hotels where the first family stayed."

Fighter jets were also expected to fly in shifts, giving 24-hour coverage over the president's airspace. It is estimated that costs of the eight-day African trip ranged between $60 million (Sh5.7 billion) and $100 million (Sh9.7 billion). Air Force One reportedly costs over $228,000 (Sh23.2 million) per hour to fly. Obama's presence in Kenya could equally be costly this time around — due to the heightened security owing to the threat from Al-Shabaab.

In the meantime, it remains unclear whether the US leader will visit kinsmen and women in his father's ancestral home. In 2006, Obama toured Kogelo via the lakeside city of Kisumu in the East Africa Safari Express commercial flight. Then, he squeezed himself into the matatu, which he describes in his famous autobiography Dreams From My Father, as "a sad-looking vehicle with balding, cracked tyres."

On that occasion, Obama ended up carrying his half-sister Auma on his lap together with a basket of yams while supporting a crying baby! This time around, Obama will also not have to worry about traffic jams, similar to those he frequently experienced while in Auma's Volkswagen beetle, along Uhuru Highway and near the University of Nairobi, where his sister worked as a lecturer.

Nonetheless, foreign travel by US Presidents is a costly affair, much as it is difficult to ascertain exact figures since such data is considered confidential, but journalists David Nakamur and Carol Leonnig divulge that a Secret Service internal memo leaked to The Washington Post ahead of Obama's three-nation Africa tour in 2013 demonstrated just how costly long foreign trips can be.

In one of the online issues of The Washington Post, David, who is a White House correspondent and Carol, who covers federal agencies with a focus on government accountability, report that the trip entailed hundreds of Secret Service agents to secure facilities in Senegal, South Africa and Tanzania.

There was also a Navy aircraft carrier with a fully staffed medical trauma centre stationed offshore in case of an emergency and military cargo planes to bring in 56 support vehicles, "including 14 limousines and three trucks loaded with sheets of bullet-proof glass to cover the windows of the hotels where the first family stayed."

Fighter jets were also expected to fly in shifts, giving 24-hour coverage over the president's airspace. It is estimated that costs of the eight-day

African trip ranged between $60 million (Sh5.7 billion) and $100 million (Sh9.7 billion). Air Force One reportedly costs over $228,000 (Sh23.2 million) per hour to fly. Obama's presence in Kenya could equally be costly this time around — due to the heightened security owing to the threat from Al-Shabaab.

In the meantime, it remains unclear whether the US leader will visit kinsmen and women in his father's ancestral home. In 2006, Obama toured Kogelo via the lakeside city of Kisumu in the East Africa Safari Express commercial flight. (Text ends)

KENYA: Why Government of Kenya is feverish ahead of US President Barack Obama's visit

STANDARD DIGITAL By Kipchumba Some July 12, 2015

With less than two weeks to US President Barack Obama's historic visit to Kenya, the Government and the Opposition are sparring to control his agenda. The ruling Jubilee coalition is accusing the Coalition for Reforms and Democracy (CORD) leaders of trying to take advantage of Obama's visit to project the government in bad light. Corruption in Government and the management of the next general election in August 2017, are some of the top issues the two sides differ sharply about.

In addition, the place of homosexuality in Kenya seems to be driving a wedge between State House and Deputy President William Ruto. The itinerary of President Obama's visit for the Global Entrepreneurship Summit has so far remained a tightly guarded secret. Although it is known that he will arrive in the country on the evening of July 24, it is not yet clear how many days he will be staying before flying to Ethiopia. When asked about it, Foreign Affairs Cabinet Secretary Amina Mohammed said President Obama's itinerary will be communicated next Friday.

"Who said US President Barack Obama's visit will be for eight hours? It could be for a longer period or even shorter. Until we receive full itinerary and programme from the US Government, whatever is circulating in the media is hearsay and speculation," she said. Nonetheless, the Government has launched an early offensive on the Opposition, which it accuses of trying to capitalise on Obama's visit to portray the Government in bad light.

"CORD is trying to set an agenda for Obama so that he can lose focus on what he is supposed to do here," said the Leader of Majority in the National Assembly, Aden Duale. "They want him to talk about IEBC, corruption and such things yet these are things that are handled by independent institutions," he said.

In recent times, the Government and the Opposition have differed sharply over the faltering fight on corruption and over the planned reforms at IEBC. CORD accuses the Government of being insincere in fighting corruption and has accused IEBC of being partial and acting as an extension of the Jubilee government. Naturally, the Opposition would call on President Obama to press President Kenyatta to do more to address these issues when they meet.

This week, CORD threatened to boycott the next General Election, saying it was sidelined by IEBC when it launched its 2015-2017 strategic plan on Thursday. “There are problems in Burundi, South Sudan, Uganda, Somalia and so on. By threatening to boycott the next elections, they are trying to scare Obama into fearing a repeat of the 2007 clashes,” said Mr Duale.

However, CORD leader Raila Odinga said he had no secret agenda to share with Obama, though he could not comment on whether he was scheduled to meet the US President. “We have no secret agenda. I am not a mad man. I cannot create disorder. On NYS (National Youth Service), we are not opposed to the projects that uplift the youth. However, we are concerned that the youth projects are being used as a conduit for corruption,” he said yesterday in Kisumu. Mr Odinga has accused President Kenyatta of not doing enough to fight corruption at NYS, which he has labeled as a massive scam to siphon public money.

Furthermore CORD has claimed that Devolution Cabinet Secretary Anne Wiguru, in whose docket NYS falls, is favoured since she has not been suspended like her colleagues who were forced to step aside over corruption allegations.

Raila added that the Opposition’s aim with IEBC is to see the institution “reformed to seal all loopholes so that we confidently go to the next elections”. Given the prominent role that the US played in resolving the 2007 post-election violence, electoral reform is conceivably one area President Obama would be interested in talking about with Kenyan leaders from both sides. Besides the Opposition, President Kenyatta has to contend with his deputy Ruto, who is diametrically opposed to President Obama’s position on the rights of homosexuals.

On Sunday last week, while attending a church service in Nairobi, Mr Ruto launched what was widely seen as a broadside against President Obama. “The Republic of Kenya is a republic that worships God. We have no room for gays and those others,” Ruto told a Nairobi church congregation in Swahili. “God did not create man and woman for a man to come and marry another man. We believe in God. This is a God-fearing nation and we will be firm on what is right,” he added. Gay rights is one of the key achievements of the Obama presidency and by taking such a diametrically opposing view, Ruto's sentiments ran the risk of embarrassing both President Kenyatta and his high-profile guest.

Soon after the DP spoke, State House spokesman Manoah Esipisu quickly released a press statement that largely contradicted Mr Ruto's position. "The Government believes in freedom of expression as enshrined in the Constitution and respects the position taken by the US Government on gays following a ruling by the country's Supreme Court that same-sex unions will be recognised. As Kenyans we believe in freedom of speech. We cannot tell Obama what he can or cannot say during his visit to Kenya," read Mr Esipisu's statement.

It is instructive that Mr Ruto's denunciation of President Obama was followed by anti-gay demonstrations in Nairobi, led by Kiharu MP Irungu Kangata and Kikuyu MP Kimani Ichung'wa. Both had attended the DP's church service and on Monday they led demonstrations in which some of the participants displayed placards that read "No Obama Obama, No Michelle Michelle!"

The White House also followed with a comment saying that as the leader of the free world, President Obama is free to talk about anything that is in the interest of the US wherever he travels to. "I'm confident the President will not hesitate to make it clear that protection of fundamental human rights is also a priority for Kenya, something we hold dear here in the United States of America," said Joshua Earnest, White House Press Secretary. "We have been clear that as the President travels around the world, he does not hesitate to raise concerns about human rights," he added.

In light of Ruto's views, it is not yet clear whether he will meet President Obama, although if the past is anything to go by, it is highly unlikely. When the US Secretary of State John Kerry visited the country in May, the DP was conspicuously absent from his meetings and generally kept a low profile. Complicating matters further is the fact that Mr Ruto is still facing criminal charges at the International Criminal Court, which makes it difficult for him to meet a leader of a country that styles itself as a beacon of democracy and rule of law.

Generally, Ruto has had an uneasy relationship with US officials. A US State Department memo that was released by the anti-secrecy website Wikileaks in 2011 lays bare this difficult relationship. During a meeting on May 2, 2009 between Mr Ruto, then the Agriculture minister in the Grand Coalition government and US Undersecretary for African Affairs, Johny Carson, and US ambassador to Kenya, Michael Ranneberger, the US officials came out less than impressed on Ruto's reform credentials.

“Ruto was unable to offer significant steps on reform that could be accomplished in the next three months. What he did expose again was his extreme sensitivity to the establishment of any kind of tribunal and his willingness to protect his own community regardless of the cost to the country as a whole. We do not expect Ruto to serve as a positive agent of change in the coming months,” concluded the two high ranking US government officials.

In the run up to the last general elections, the US and the West seem to have thrown their lot with the Opposition. At the time, they seemed spooked at the prospect of two men facing serious criminal charges at the ICC being elected to lead one of the strategic countries in Africa. Mr Carson went as far as cautioning Kenyans that “choices have consequences,” which was widely interpreted to mean that Kenya would be punished for electing the two ICC suspects. By the end of the polls, their worst fears were confirmed but in the realpolitik that govern international relations, the West moved fast to embrace the new government.

Therefore, Obama will be walking a tightrope in Kenya, trying to balance his role as the leader of the most powerful and democratic country in the world and the ethnic politics of his father’s land. Should Obama berate the government on issues such as corruption, his position is likely to be interpreted by a section of Kenyans to mean that he is pandering to one side of the political divide. And if this happens, he will, unwittingly, be inserting himself in to the morass of Kenya’s tribal politics. If he doesn’t, another section of Kenyans would see his visit as a mere face-saving tour to mend relations with the government following his initial position on the UhuRuto presidential ticket. (Text ends)

KENYA: Billionaires meet President Uhuru Kenyatta, seek to invest in energy sector

STANDARD DIGITAL News: By PSCU

A group of investors for talks with President Uhuru Kenyatta at Harambee House office yesterday. Together, they explored how to make the most of Kenya‘s abundant potential for green energy. Other investors in the delegation included Jacqueline Novogratz (founder and CEO, Acumen), Chris Anderson (curator, TED Conference) Dipender Saluja (Capricorn Investments), Steve Jurvetson (Draper Fisher Jurvetson), Strive Masiyiwa (founder and chair, Econet Wireless), Jean Oelwang (CEO, Virgin Unite) and Zia Khan of the Rockefeller Foundation. Sir Richard said the proposed renewables project would benefit the 50 per cent of Kenyans yet to access electricity. “Investors in this initiative have chosen Kenya because the Government is ready to listen to ideas and help implement them,“ he said. He pointed out that the project would cover Kenya and Rwanda, before being rolled out to other parts of Africa. Both countries would serve as models. The initiative comes in the wake of recent reports identifying a significant role for green mini-grids in rural electrification. (Text ends)

KENYA/ETHIOPIA:Fourteen NGOs & Experts called on Obama to help protect human rights'

WASHINGTON (Sputnik) — President Barack Obama should call for much needed human rights reforms in Kenya and Ethiopia in discussions with officials of the two countries during his trip there this week, fourteen nongovernmental organizations (NGO) and individual experts said in a letter to the President on Wednesday. "We urge you to clearly articulate that the United States expects its partners to support an environment where independent organizations and media outlets can thrive, and security forces undertake operations that protect — rather than abuse-their citizens," the letter read. The NGOs stated that Kenya and Ethiopia are key US partners and expressed hope human rights concerns will be addressed during Obama's discussions with officials of the two countries. Obama will be the first US head of state and government to visit Ethiopia where he will hold meetings with government representatives as well as with leaders of the African Union.

The President's trip to Ethiopia will follow a visit to Kenya, where Obama will attend the 2015 Global Entrepreneurship Summit, according to the White House. The trip to Kenya will be Obama's fourth visit to sub-Saharan Africa during his presidency. (Text ends)

LGBT News: Despite Agreements, Obama, Kenyan President Differ on Gay Rights'

NAIROBI, Kenya — Jul 25, 2015, By ARLETTE SAENZ Digital Journalist

President Obama publicly disagreed with his Kenyan counterpart over gay rights today as he urged African nations not to discriminate against individuals based on sexual orientation. The president made the remarks at a news conference he held with Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta, who called gay rights in his country a "non-issue." Obama discussed the subject on his first full day in Kenya while drawing on his own background as an African-American in the U.S.

"If somebody is a law-abiding citizen who is going about their business and working in a job and obeying the traffic signs and doing all the other things that good citizens are supposed to do and not harming anybody, the idea that they are going to be treated differently or abused because of who they love is wrong," Obama said. Shortly after, Kenyatta said while the U.S. and Kenya share many values, gay rights is an issue on which the two countries disagree.

"There are some things that we must agree we don't share," he said. "Our culture, our societies don't accept [homosexuality]."

Kenyatta added it was difficult to impose beliefs on the Kenyan people that they "do not accept." "This issue is not really an issue that is on the foremost mind of Kenyans and that is a fact," he said. While the U.S. has made strides on gay rights issues, most recently with the Supreme Court's decision on same-sex marriage, many countries in Africa, including Kenya, hold more conservative views. Same sex relations are still illegal in Kenya and Ethiopia, where the president will travel on Sunday. Ahead of the trip, several Kenyan political and religious leaders had warned President Obama not to discuss gay rights while in the country.

Fighting al-Shabab

The two presidents also discussed the counter-terror efforts their countries have employed against al-Shabaab. Obama said strides have been made against the terror group in certain regions, but he also acknowledged they still pose a serious threat. “We have systematically reduced the territory that al-Shabab controls. We have been able to decrease their effective control within Somalia and have weakened those networks operating here in East Africa," he said. “That doesn't mean the problem's solved. As is true around the world, what we find is that we can degrade significantly the capacities of these terrorist organizations but they can still do damage.”

Cracking Down on Ivory Sales and Establishing Direct US-Kenya Flights

Obama also announced his administration is proposing a rule to crack down on illegal ivory sales by banning the sale of ivory across state lines. Poachers killed approximately 100,000 elephants for their ivory between 2010 and 2012, according to a study released last year by the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences. The president also announced his intention to establish direct flights between the U.S. and Kenya, though he would not offer a timeline, saying there are protocols that must be cleared first. (Text ends)

Letter from Kenya: Dreaming of Obama

POLITICO: By EDWARD - ISAAC DOVERE

“Coming as a source of pressure to create more space for civil society and journalists is part of the reason we’re here,” the senior administration official added. Hailemariam seemed only mildly moved by Obama’s prodding. “Something has to be understood is that this is a fragile democracy, and we are coming out of centuries of undemocratic culture in this country, and it’s not easy that in two decades we can come out of all this," Hailemariam said. "But we feel we are on the right track."

He said Ethiopians feel obligated to follow the constitution, and pay attention to how other governments have opened up. “We have to learn the best practices of the United States and age-old democracies, because this is a process of learning and doing, and I think we understand that,” he said. This is hardly an open country. Hailemariam’s party controls all government functions. Human rights abuses are commonplace. Most outside Internet and phone service does not work. And in an area where Ethiopia infamously leads the way, the jailing of journalists, Hailemariam seemed unwilling to budge beyond a little lip service. Ethiopia wants more journalists, he insisted, since there are so many good stories about the country to tell. “We need you, this is very important, but we need ethical journalism to function in this country,” he said, leaving the definition of “ethical” fully up to him.

Obama, Kenyatta clash on gay rights in Kenya’

POLITICO: By EDWARD - ISAAC DOVERE

But Hailemariam said, maybe the journalists he’s putting in prison are working with the same opponents of the government that he claims are terrorist groups — though Obama noted specifically at the press conference that the American government doesn’t agree that they are terrorists. “Journalism has to be respected when it doesn’t pass the line that is working with violent terrorist groups,” Hailemariam said. “My government is committed to this issue.”

Obama seemed suspicious, even as he urged observers to put the same standards of how America relates internationally on smaller countries like Ethiopia as it does on bigger ones that Washington is forced to deal with, such as Russia or China. Obama and aides say that they are expecting the trip to help prompt more changes in Ethiopia by highlighting these issues by making the trip, comparing what might be ahead here to the progress they claim credit for in Burma. As for legitimizing Hailemariam, the administration official said, “it’s not a worry because we are making very public our concerns.” “The Ethiopian government,” the official added, “is now on the hook.” (Text ends)

KENYA/ETHIOPIA EVENTS: theguardian: Obama criticised for calling Ethiopia's government 'democratically elected'

While the US president calls for end of crackdown on political and press freedom, his comments on Hailemariam administration are widely condemned

By David Smith in Addis Ababa Monday 27 July 2015 17.44 BS

Last modified on Tuesday 28 July 2015 01.05 BST

Barack Obama has been criticised by opposition groups and journalists in Ethiopia after referring to the country's government as "democratically elected", with one human rights watchdog describing the statement as "shocking".

The US president was speaking at a joint press conference with Hailemariam Desalegn, the Ethiopian prime minister, after the two leaders held talks in the capital, Addis Ababa.

Although Obama said he had raised issues of good governance – "I don't bite my tongue too much when it comes to these issues" – he also insisted: "We are opposed to any group that is promoting the violent overthrow of a government, including the government of Ethiopia, that has been democratically elected."

Answering questions from journalists later, Obama repeated the phrase: "We are very mindful of Ethiopia's history – the hardships that this country has gone through. It has been relatively recently in which the constitution that was formed and the elections put forward a democratically elected government."

Barack Obama In Kenya: makes first visit to Ethiopia by serving US president;

US president's meeting with prime minister of Ethiopia set to focus on security and threat of Somalia-based terrorist group al-Shabaab

Hailemariam's party and its allies won 100% of seats in parliament two months ago. The opposition alleged the government had used authoritarian tactics to secure victory, including intimidation, arrests and violently breaking up rallies. At the time, the US said it remained "deeply concerned" by restrictions on civil society, media, opposition parties and independent voices and views.

But Ethiopia remains a key security ally for the US in the fight against the Islamist militant group al-Shabaab. It has also become an economic battleground with China, which has delivered huge infrastructure projects in Africa's second most populous nation.

Critics accused Obama of granting legitimacy to the regime. Reeyot Alemu, a columnist released earlier this month after four years in jail on terrorism charges, said: "It's not 'democratically elected' because there was only government media and people did not get enough information.

"They also arrested many opposition leaders and journalists. They won the election by using human rights violations. How can it be democratically elected? It is completely false. I wish Barack Obama had sent a strong message.”

Bekele Nega, general secretary of the Oromo Federalist Congress, representing Ethiopia's biggest ethnic group, said: "I don't know if democracy means robbing people's vote and robbing their election result? They have killed people and they have taken the ballot box with them in organised fraud."

Nega claimed his party found some of its votes thrown down a toilet, while at one polling station its victory by 800 votes to 40 was reversed to a 40-800 defeat. "I wonder if people could tolerate this in America or Britain or wherever? Is this the meaning of democracy in America? We are very sorry that Mr Obama's comment on our election is really supporting dictators. We know the US is always looking after its own interests and will take over on the military side, sending our people to Somalia."

Barack Obama In Kenya: 'no excuse' for treating women as second-class citizens

'Just because something is part of your past doesn't make it right', Obama says in rousing Nairobi address that also offers insight into his African heritage. Obama had let down opposition groups in Ethiopia, Nega added. "We gave support for an African-American to be elected as president of the United States. We hoped Africa and Ethiopia would benefit from Obama, but we found it to be just a mockery of democracy. We expected a lot and we lost everything."

Obama's statement appeared to be the closest thing to a "gaffe" he has made so far on his east African tour. He earned widespread praise in Kenya for championing both gay rights and women ' s rights, challenging Africans to reconsider traditional practices including female genital mutilation. But Ethiopia's more restrictive approach to civil liberties was always going to pose a tougher diplomatic balancing act.

Felix Horne, Ethiopia and Eritrea researcher at Human Rights Watch, said: "For president Obama to suggest there is anything democratic about Ethiopia is a shocking statement. I wonder what the jailed journalists, bloggers and political prisoners think of his comments? Or the thousands of Ethiopians who have fled their country because they did not support the government? Or the 18 Muslim activists who were recently convicted under the anti-terrorism law? A truly disappointing statement from the US president."

Rachel Nicholson, Horn of Africa campaigner at Amnesty International, added: "While President Obama described the Ethiopian government as democratically elected, the leadup to the elections saw a serious onslaught on the rights to freedom of expression, association and assembly, undermining citizens' right to participate in public affairs freely and without fear. Opposition political parties have continued to face harassment since the elections, including reports of the deaths of at least three opposition political figures in suspicious circumstances."

Many journalists, bloggers and political activists remain behind bars in Ethiopia. Maya Foa, of the UK-based pressure group Reprieve, said: "It's encouraging to hear President Obama telling Ethiopia to 'open up space' for opposition voices. But his praise for Ethiopia's elections as 'democratic' was woefully misplaced, at a time when the government is systematically detaining and torturing leading activists such as Andy Tsege – a father of three who faces a death sentence for the mere 'crime' of holding democratic beliefs."

Obama and African leaders to consider sanctions in South Sudan's civil war;

US president and top officials from Uganda, Kenya, Ethiopia, and Sudan to consider 'plan B' to address conflict, including possible arms embargo

Obama is the first sitting US president to visit Ethiopia. He praised the country's progress in development that has lifted millions of people out of poverty, as well as its regional role in fighting al-Shabaab militants and helping peace efforts in wartorn South Sudan, the subject of talks with regional leaders later on Monday.

Speaking at the national palace originally built for emperor Haile Selassie, Hailemariam rejected criticism that his government had crushed opposition and press freedom. "Our commitment to democracy is real and not skin-deep," he said, adding that Ethiopia is a "fledgling democracy, we are coming out of centuries of undemocratic practices".

The country needed "ethical journalism", he added. "For us it's very important to be criticised, because we also get feedback to correct our mistakes. Media is one of the institutions that have to be nurtured for democracy."

Obama's visit to Ethiopia is rigidly organised and, although pictures of his face and US flags adorn much of Addis Ababa, there is little opportunity for interaction with the public. On Tuesday, he will also become the first US president to address the African Union, the 54-member continental bloc, at its Chinese-built headquarters. (Text ends)

KENYA: Giants Club: President lights the fire that puts Kenya at forefront of Africa's battle against ivory poachers.

THE INDEPENDENT (August 6, 2015)

Ensuring the survival of elephants is a pan-African problem, and Uhuru Kenyatta's Giants Club commitment is a huge step towards beating the illegal trade in ivory.

No visitor to Nairobi's State House, a sprawling Palladian mansion designed by the Kent-born architect Herbert Baker more than a century ago, could be in any doubt about the symbolic power of ivory in this, the powerhouse of East Africa.

As I walked into the seat of authority of the Kenyan presidency – and the country's most important building – two curling tusks, both 100lb at least, framed the entrance way through which all visitors, whether presidents or royalty, pass into its ceremonial rooms.

Ivory has a resonance in Kenya that goes beyond the merely symbolic, however. It illustrates the country's precious natural inheritance, which includes some of the greatest wildlife on Earth. It is also the currency of an illegal and rampant industry worth billions: elephant poaching.

Africa's elephants could be extinct before our grandchildren see them in the wild. This has created strong links with another eastern powerhouse, China. Surging demand for illegal ivory from that country's growing middle class has plunged Kenya, and China, into the dark side of the world economy in a way that could hardly be foreseen two decades ago.

This is what ivory is now for many Kenyans: a choice between keeping a resource they inherited alive on the land, and helping to make their country great, or a way to get rich quick. That is a false choice. Kenya's prosperity, and its connections to global markets, need never involve selling industrial quantities of ivory, with all the slaughter of elephants that entails. One man who also believes this, I was delighted to discover, is the State House's current occupant: President Uhuru Kenyatta.

President Uhuru Kenyatta signs the Giants Club declaration for Kenya, with (left) Evgeny Lebedev AFP Forty years ago there were 160,000 elephants in Kenya. Now the number has plunged by more than 75 per cent, and the country's park rangers face a daily struggle to protect those that remain from the increasingly well-armed poacher gangs.

It is why I was delighted to find the President so committed to safeguarding those that remain. "It is our duty to preserve our remaining elephants, not only for future Kenyan generations but for the world," he told me. "We have a duty to do so. This is a heritage not just for Africans but for everyone.

"I do not see why we cannot reach a place where [elephant populations] are sustainable. We can encourage a younger generation to see a future for themselves in conservation and demonstrate to local communities how they can benefit. As a country, but also as a continent, we can do a great deal in a very short space of time.”

I was at State House because Mr Kenyatta has become a founding member of the Giants Club, the new Africa-wide elephant-protection initiative launched by the conservation charity Space for Giants, of which I am patron. It recognises that no one country acting in isolation can save the continent's elephants. This challenge is too big for that. So we want to bring wildlife agencies and governments together to take it up.

Kenya was always going to be at the forefront of this fight. The country has a long history of leading the way on conservation, whether in creating national parks or encouraging local communities to form their own wildlife conservancies. What I had not been prepared for was just how committed the President would be to our pan-African initiative. Not for him the kind of talking shop that plagues what we still call the developing world. He wants action rather than words.

For every country that joins the Giants Club, the commitments they sign are tailored to their wildlife agencies' priorities. As part of Kenya's Giants Club declaration, Mr Kenyatta pledged to bolster the frontline rangers who, night after night, go out on patrol to protect Kenya's elephants. This will be a task in which Space for Giants will be assisting by helping provide training, equipment and resources, at the Kenya Wildlife Service's request.

Orphaned elephant calves at the Nairobi National Park AFP But he then went much further. On joining the Giants Club, Kenya also committed to the Elephant Protection Initiative (EPI), the conservation programme that was launched during the London Conference on Illegal Wildlife Trade of February 2014. This means that, as a Giants Club and EPI member, Kenya will now close any remaining domestic ivory markets, refuse to trade in ivory for at least 10 years, and work to put its ivory stockpile beyond economic use. This is a remarkable development to be celebrated.

Following the signing ceremony, I went to the Kenya Wildlife Service's offices to see exactly what this meant in practice. Normally the site's Rangers Restaurant is filled with staff grabbing lunch or a coffee. Today, however, almost every spare piece of floor was covered with piles of tusks as the gathered Kenyan media excitedly snapped photographs.

Many African nations have ivory stocks, much of it seized from poachers. These reserves are not only expensive to police but also at risk from corruption, resulting in pieces going missing and entering the black market. Kenya, assisted by the Giants Club partner charity Stop Ivory, is now going to conduct an inventory to determine exactly how big its ivory stocks are, before burning them to ensure that no more tusks can be stolen or officials tempted by the bribes on offer. Given the price the tusks could fetch on the black market, the Kenyan government could not have ordered a more powerful demonstration of its commitment to the conservation cause.

Mr Kenyatta, however, had one word of caution. Because so much of the ivory poached is smuggled to Asia, and to China in particular, some observers have blamed the present crisis on the Chinese government. In fact, Mr Kenyatta argues, it is the ruthless poaching gangs – a number of whom are also engaged in drugs and people trafficking and even have links to terrorist groups – who should be the focus of disdain as they are the people who actually carry out the killings.

He fears that unfairly stigmatising the Chinese could dissuade them from engaging with the international community in stamping down on the illegal trade in ivory. “The attitude towards China is that it is the great evil but we are starting to see initiatives coming from China,” he pointed out. “I have talked with the Chinese government and if you engage with them then they engage back. They kicked off a huge campaign through CCTV [the state television network] about the importance of conservation.”

He is right. In recent months Chinese officials have imposed a temporary ban on the importation of any ivory carvings and promised to strictly control the local ivory trade until it is finally halted. China deserves praise for what it is doing – but has too often been met with suspicion by some in the West about the genuineness of its commitment.

We have started planning with the Kenyan government for a wildlife summit next year for Giants Club members, to be hosted in Kenya by President Kenyatta. This will provide a forum for Africa’s leaders to meet with key figures from the worlds of politics, business and conservation to chart a common plan for the survival of Africa’s elephants and all the species that share the giant landscapes they inhabit. I hope the Chinese premier will be there. It would be an honour to have him sign up to the Giants Club and join our fight.

In the meantime, the pledges made by Mr Kenyatta show how the slaughter of elephants is not a price that need be paid for Kenya’s march to prosperity. Africa’s development, which will no doubt be one of the great stories of the 21st century, can make a friend of conservation, rather than an enemy. Evgeny Lebedev is the owner of the ‘Independent’ titles and the ‘London Evening Standard’. Follow him on Twitter: @mrevgenylebedev

What beaches stand out because they are extremely dangerous?

Thomas Cayne

Traveled around the world since I was a kid.Jul 4

I once visited Kenya with my girlfriend who was a deep sea diver at the time.

Our hotel was marvellous, and the food was great.

We also went on several trips to see wildlife, and I must admit that the experience was fantastic — just like in Attenborough's documentaries.

We saw lions, elephants, zebras, hippos and even one jaguar.

Truly amazing.

But what I had not realized before our trip, was the fact that outside the luxurious hotels — where virtually only non-African guests stayed, I think — the place was really devastatingly poor.

Families lived in very small houses which looked more like boxes, made of rusty corrugated roofing sheets.

Young children and women walking along the side of the dangerous roads with barrels filled with water on their heads, in extreme temperatures.

But what was almost as shocking and confronting were the prostitutes.

As soon as you set a foot on the beaches behind the hotels, you were immediately approached by local prostitutes — some looking pretty good, but also looking sick.

I later was told that half of them were HIV positive or had AIDS, and that none of them cared for protection.

The situation was utterly depressing, and there was not much we could do.

None of the fellow divers made a fuss about all of this (I even suspected some of them to have taken some “walks on the beach”), but for us it was shocking.

Since there was no question of good and specialized medical care for the women who were selling their bodies for a couple of dollars to survive, half of them were literally dying.

And every single customer was playing with his or her life.

When we were back home, I had to undergo a Mantoux test which then turned out to be positive.

Built on the work of Koch and Clemens von Pirquet to create his test in 1907. However, the test was unreliable due to impurities in tuberculin which tended to cause false results. [2] Esmond R. Long and Florence B. Seibert identified the active agent in tuberculin as a protein. Seibert then spent a number of years developing methods for separating and purifying the protein from Mycobacterium tuberculosis , obtaining purified protein derivative (PPD) and enabling the creation of a reliable test for tuberculosis. [2] Her first publication on the purification of tuberculin appeared in 1934. [3] By the 1940s, Seibert's PPD was the international standard for tuberculin tests. [4] In 1939, M. A. Linnikova in the USSR created a modified version of PPD. In 1954, the Soviet Union started mass production of PPD-L, named after Linnikova. [5] [6] Procedure [edit] In the Mantoux test, a standard dose of 5 tuberculin units (TU - 0.1 ml), according to the CDC , [7] or 2 TU of Statens Serum Institute (SSI) tuberculin RT23 in 0.1 ml solution, according to the NHS , [8] is injected intradermally (between the layers of dermis) on the flexor surface of the left forearm, mid-way between elbow and wrist. The injection should be made with a tuberculin syringe, with the needle bevel facing upward. Alternatively, the probe can be a

It means that I either had TB (tuberculosis), or at least had been in contact with someone who had it.

Again it showed the seriousness of the whole situation.

It turned out to be the second possibility by the way.

Follow my travels on Quora, at Thomas Cayne !

REFERENCES: Google images and Wikipedia.

Related Links

What are the most dangerous beaches in the world? Why?
What are the most dangerous beaches in the world ?
What would you wear to stand out at the beach?
Which is the most dangerous beach in the world with sharks?
What is the most dangerous neighborhood in Long Beach?
What is the most beautiful and safe beach in the world?

Why do the Maasai tribe wear red?

Kevin Richardson

Former Academic Researcher.

Maasai wear the color red because it symbolizes their culture and they believe it scares away lions. Lions represent a threat to Maasai livelihoods by preying on livestock where they come in contact. This is nothing new; lions and Maasai and their cattle have been living together for hundreds of years in eastern Africa, and Maasai have kept lion populations in check by traditionally hunting them.

This hunting is undertaken by young Maasai men, the ilmurran, in a highly culturally important practice called the Olamayio. The ilmurran actually have a more comprehensive task than hunting lions — they are the warriors generationally charged with protecting the community in general, dealing with cattle raiders (and doing a bit of the same), and attempting to ensure minimal consequences of drought.

Also, most of the men wear a shuka, which is a red robe. The women wear clothes that are colorful and decorated with beads. ... Warriors wear their hair in braids that are dyed red…

But as their duty as lion hunters, using only spears and shields, they are culturally rewarded for strength and bravery. The Olamayio is illegal in Kenya and only tolerated in Tanzania after lions have killed livestock..

The Maasai have undergone many social changes in recent years, including western education, Christianity, land privatization (mostly to their disadvantage), changing livestock breeds, wage labour, and tourism income. Yet their traditions and culture continue to be a source of pride and identity.

Related Links

Why do many Maasai have aquiline features? Do they have ancient Roman blood?

What is special about the Maasai people?

Are lions afraid of Maasai warriors?

How much evidence is there that Africa's Maasai people did indeed hunt lions as a rite of passage pre-European contact? What success does a lone warrior with a simple wooden spear have against a male lion?

Can you leave the Maasai tribe and live a "normal" life?

What vivid color do the prominent people in the Maasai tribe of Kenya always wear?

What native societies made it through the "Scramble for Africa" (was an invasion, occupation, division, and colonization of Africa in 1885) without much traumatic change? Why?

Kevin Richardson
PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Oct 5

The "Scramble for Africa" was devastating to Maasai, who the Germans and British alike had feared provoking.

A group of Masai warriors in full battle panoply, 1922. Artist: SJ Hopper Rinderpest, which came via cattle shipped in from India [to Eritrea for the Italians], killed almost all of their precious cattle at the crucial moment of colonial imposition. So disease did the job for them—it wiped out their self-sufficiency and their social currency. That was an enormously traumatic development. Struggles over grazing lands and British efforts to settle Whites on the grasslands to take up farming [in Kenya/East Africa Protectorate before and after WWI, and in ex-German Tanganyika after the war]—added to the issue—there was in fact a quite famous land case where Maasai claimants tried in 1911-12 to invalidate British evictions. The public image of being "truly unchanged" is very useful and profitable to Maasai communities (certainly relative to tourism), so it persists. But besides the events of the colonial era, Maasai themselves were colonial invaders from the north, just a few centuries before. As for people along the desert edge, they may have enjoyed a little more protection, but the French treated them brutally in the early 20th century when requisitioning time came.

I agree that no society (not "tribe"—"tribalization" and its legacy, "tribalism," were in fact among the greatest of damaging traumas) got through the five centuries between the start of European voyaging and colonization without dramatic change. But then, every society changes; "precolonial" society was not static either. In the case of colonial imposition, African agency in that one very brief moment of European military supremacy could determine the form and nature of that imposition. Examples: in Buganda, the nobility managed to leverage even more power than they started with; for the Bamum kingdom in Kamerun, they adapted to Europeanized forms and obtained German approbation (and later French annoyance); in parts of southern Nigeria and the Gold Coast, market producers initially exploited protected British outlets to attain greater profits than they had before the extension of colonial rule. Even "resistance victor" Ethiopia, by itself, colonizing neighbors and consolidating a modernizing state, changed radically from what Menelik II had inherited. Just as no European society was spared from major change in the 19th and 20th centuries, neither were African ones—and the ways the two interacted were, at times, themselves really freakin' amazing.

(Re: tribalization, see T. O. Ranger's essays "The Invention of Tribalism" and "The Invention of Tribalism, Revisited," Leroy Vail's edited collection The Invention of Tribalism in Southern Africa; and for more nuance, Tom Spear's "Neo-traditionalism and the limits of invention" from the Journal of African History in 2004. I'm not in my office, but I can dig up the Maasai land case material later; the remainder is covered in some excruciating detail in Vansina, Curtin, Feierman, and Thompson, African History from Earliest Times to Independence (latest ed., 2000).

Related Links

Why was Liberia, which wasn't organised by the government, the only American colony in Africa? Why did the USA stay out of the scramble for Africa when they were already an established power at the time colonizing in the Pacific?
Why was Africa undeveloped before colonization?
Was colonization on the whole good for Africa?
Is Africa poor because of colonization? If colonization never happened, how would Africa have been?
During the "Scramble for Africa", why wasn't the US involved?
Why did the Netherlands not participate in the scramble for Africa?

Kenya-Somalia Maritime Verdict: Uhuru Says Kenya Ready to Engage in Diplomatic Talks to End Row

Dennis Lubanga Billie Eilish talks about meeting 'very normal' royals

Fire-ravaged Greek island of Evia hit by floods and mudslides

Kenya-Somalia Maritime Verdict: Uhuru Says Kenya Ready to Engage in Diplomatic Talks to End Row© Provided by Tuko Kenya-Somalia Maritime Verdict: Uhuru Says Kenya Ready to Engage in Diplomatic Talks to End

Row Since 2014, the two neighbouring countries have contested over which direction their border extends into the Indian Ocean

In a ruling made on Tuesday, October 12, the Hague-based court dismissed Kenya's claim to Somalia's similar latitude (horizontal) boundary

The ICJ ruled that there is no de facto maritime border between the two countries, setting a new border that cuts through the disputed area

President Uhuru Kenyatta has vowed to defend Kenya's territory following the ruling on the Kenya-Somalia maritime case by the International Court of Justice (ICJ).

President Uhuru Kenyatta (pictured) said Kenya is ready to engage in diplomatic talks to end the maritime row with Somalia. Photo: State House, Kenya. Source: Facebook© Provided by Tuko President Uhuru Kenyatta (pictured) said Kenya is ready to engage in diplomatic talks to end the maritime row with Somalia. Photo: State House, Kenya. Source: Facebook.

Uhuru said when he became president on April 9, 2013, he took an oath to protect the territorial integrity of the Republic of Kenya.

Protecting the nation against foreign aggression

He also urged other nations to respect Kenya's efforts aimed at protecting its territories from foreign aggression.

"I will do everything possible as President and Commander-in-Chief, to preserve the territory of this our great Republic. We beseech the rest of the family of Nations to appreciate and respect our inherent right to protect, by all means, our territory," Uhuru said.

According to a statement from State House, Kenya seen by TUKO.co.ke, the head of state, observed that Kenya is not surprised at the decision of the court involving the Maritime Delimitation in the Indian Ocean Case (Somalia Kenya).

"However, Kenya is profoundly concerned by the import of the decision and its implications for the Horn of Africa region, and international law generally. At the outset, Kenya wishes to indicate that it rejects in totality and does not recognize the findings in the decision," Uhuru explained.

International judicial processes

Uhuru indicated that the court's decision on the matter embodies its perpetuation of jurisdictional overreach and raises a fundamental question on the respect of the sovereignty and consent of States to international judicial processes.

"International tribunals have jurisdiction ONLY to the extent of CONSENT by a State. Kenya, as an avid supporter of the rule of law, accepted the Court's jurisdiction through a declaration in 1965, with an objectively clear outline of certain excluded matters. At the time, Kenya never imagined that the ICJ would violate the declaration to the extent of," he said.

The head of state called on the international community to create an enabling environment to pursue a negotiated settlement.

"Kenya and Somalia are neighboring States, with a common border, and communities with shared social, cultural, and religious practices. This decision is, in the circumstances, a zero-sum game, which will strain the relations between the two countries," he said.

The maritime row

As earlier reported by TUKO.co.ke, Since 2014, the two neighboring countries have contested over which direction their border extends into the Indian Ocean.

In a ruling made on Tuesday, October 12, the Hague-based court dismissed Kenya's claim to Somalia's similar latitude (horizontal) boundary.

As a result, the ICJ ruled that there is no de facto maritime border between the two countries, setting a new border that cuts through the disputed area (100,000 square kilometres).

However, Uhuru said that Kenya is committed to a diplomatic solution to the current impasse.

He reiterated that his administration would resolve the matter through the institutions of the African Union, such as the African Union Border Programme and its Peace and Security architecture, in addition to other bilateral arrangements.

How do Ethiopians view Kenyans?

Salam nah! or Salam nesh!

I'm a Kenyan and have visited and spent some time in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia.

To start with, the Ethiopian driver who picked me at the Bole International Airport was very friendly. Sadly a language barrier existed as I do not understand Amharic (his language), and he too didn't grasp English, which I am fluent in. To say the least, he was the best. We tried to have a chat, travelling through traffic, a few English words here and there, and finally we got to the hotel.

The hotel was very welcoming and the people manning it gave the best welcome and I felt great away from home, the language barrier notwithstanding.

In a few days I had managed to learn a few basic Amharic words. I'm glad that lots of friendly people would help teach.

The waiters at restaurants in Addis were patient as I took forever to understand the dishes before settling on what to order.

The people in the streets would definitely notice a foreigner especially since there is a bit of a difference on the skin. While walking in the streets, a stranger would randomly ask,

Stranger to me; 'Nigerian?'

Me; No, Kenya- Nairobi

Stranger; Oh, Mambasa (Mombasa) , Jomo Kenyatta ..

Me; Yes

..and everyone would just smile back as we went our ways.

On the train, no incidents. Sandwiched between the locals especially during rush hour. It felt good.

Went shopping at some area called Shiro Meda market and some traders there excitedly talked of Mombasa (Kenyan coastal city). That was awesome.

A public service vehicle driver was very kind in getting me where I wanted to be in the city, despite the huge language barrier.

I could write a lot more, but that's it for now. I haven't traveled much, but all the Ethiopians I have had the chance to interact with, were good people towards me, a kenyan.

Back to the history of the two nations, there was a super cordial relation between Ethiopia's Haile Selassie and Kenya's first president Jomo Kenyatta.

Jomo Kenyatta (Left), and Emperor Haile Selassie (Right)

The first ever foreign ruler to visit Independent Kenya was Ethiopia's Haile Selassie. Jomo Kenyatta only visited two foreign countries in his 15 year rule. One was Ethiopia and the other was Britain. This says a lot.

This is Haile Selassie Avenue in Nairobi Kenya, in honor of the Ethiopian Emperor;

I'd love to be back in Ethiopia and visit Shashamane someday and see a lot more of the lovely people outside the capital.

And by the way, Ethiopian ladies are super beautiful!

Why do Tanzanians dislike Kenyans?
I have never understood the bad blood when we should be brothers and sisters keepers.

Layton Benjamin Otuma lives in Kenya Answered October 29, 2020

It is true some Tanzanians do not like Kenyans in general and I have always asked them why?

- Kenyans are generally more educated and easily take over jobs and businesses.
- Alot of major robberies in Dar have been carried out by armed Kenyans.

At the border, Kenyans are also known to smuggle contraband and drugs through bus services.

That said the police pretty much harass everyone, one of the worst. Having a Kenyan plate means they can catch you off guard with specific rules.

That said Tanzania is an amazing place and majority of the people are extremely welcoming.

Thing is they can easily identify us by our mainland Kenyan dialect.

Well, Nyerere wanted to form an East African Federation, Kenyatta said fuck no and so Nyerere chose to bad mouth Kenyans as a whole calling us untrustworthy i.e. nyangaus.

35000ksh is enough to survive in Nairobi, Kenya for two people?

Atika Nyamoti Lived in Ruiru from 2013-2018
Updated August 20, 2020 · Upvoted by Gitau Ndungu lives in Nairobi, Kenya (1981-present)

If I have 35000/= for 2 people in Nairobi, I can try to live a satisfying life in the following ways.

Assumption

1) Assuming I am working in town
2) Assuming I am not working during weekends
3) Assuming I don't often like hanging around with street gangs, ladies, parties, drugs users or spenders in short
4) Assuming I will not take lunch during weekdays at home but the other guy does
5) Assuming the other person does not earn
6) Assuming I had already purchased/acquired other house items such as furniture, tv/radio, curtains and other necessities not mentioned below. Assuming there are no other projects in the vicinity.

This is what I will do:

I will seek a cheap House in Githurai Why Githurai?
Transportation from town is cheap. There are cheap agricultural produce from Thika, Gatundu, Murang'a and other surrounding areas. House rent is also cheap. There are also no tempting picnics to indulge you in impulse spending. You can easily start hustling business here.

Example:
Rent – Kesh 8000/
Power and water bills – Kesh 1500/
Transport for 20 working days - Kesh 120 to and from x 20 days = Kesh 2400/ (sometimes if you leave work earlier, you can pay up to Kesh 20/= off peak)

Other Household accessories - 2500
Food - 5500/Fuel - Kesh 2000/ on the upper side
Clothes for 2 people - each Kesh 1000/= x 2 = Kesh 2000/
Emergency cash – Kesh 2000/
Miscellaneous cash/ Adjustment fee – Kesh 3000/
Sadaka/ Michango hapa na pale – Kesh 2000/=
Other guy pocket money – Kesh 1000/=
Save – Kesh 3100/
Total – Kesh 35000/
After you have saved for almost 8 months, start a hustling business and let the other guy run it. You can help in weekends and during holidays:

Suggestions on business you can do:

Get milk from Gatundu and sell it in Githurai, Roysambu and Mwiki.

Start a Kebab Business

Sell strong tea and eggs at Guthurai stage especially at night

Get Mitumba from Gikomba and sell in Githurai

Distribute Miraa in all Kasarani estates plus Ruiru

Establish a mobile hotel and target construction workers

Buy entertainment equipment, tents and chairs for lease

Buy chicken from Gatundu, Murang’a and sell them along Mombasa road estates

Order sugarcane from Kisii and distribute to sellers along Thika road.

Buy tools such as wheelbarrows, spades, compressors, hoes, mixers and rent them with a fee of course.
Start a house girls and real estate bureau.

Get a car wash machine.

Tailoring shop or shoe shop is also awesome
Start selling ‘mulika mwizi’ phones before you graduate to smart phones.
Carpet washing business is also good.

Paparazzi Cyber café: Make and sell stickers, calendars, Posters, nice pictures and art. Rent a space and start making blocks for sale. Buy sand in bulky and start selling in small portions Think of wines and spirits (there are so many drunkards in Githurai)

Start a Gas distribution company. Not as expensive as you think it is. Talk to gas companies and start a franchise
Mpesa/ KCB Mtaani and Equity though you need higher capital
Distribute cigarettes, scratch cards and soaps
Salon/manicure/baby-cure and such stuff.
Small Bakery …… and so much more. 35000/ is therefore more than enough and you can even save some amount.

How do Kenyans and Tanzanians perceive people from north Africa? (Egypt, Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco, Libya)?

Updated December 6, 2020

As an Algerian living in Kenya, most Kenyans I have met thought I'm from Europe because of my skin.

In the beginning, it was hard for me to adapt, but after a few months, everything has become normal. Otherwise, the same thing can happen to Kenyans in Algeria, they may feel very stranger at the beginning, but by time they will adapt.

You know, we human beings still have complications on looking at someone with a different skin color though it's so normal. But that's life, we all need to be patient in order to achieve our goals, so if you hear that someone can't live with other people because of having a different color or because of racism, it only means this person is weak and nothing more.

Edit in 06th Dec 2020: There was a debate that happened within the comments about the race of Algerians and I have to respond to that.

Algerians are a mixture of many races: there are people who are white and they don’t look less than a white European, there are Algerians who are black and they don't look less than a black sub-Saharan African, there are people who look brown like Arabs of the middle east, there are people who look yellow, they came from specific Turkish tribes, There are tribes that came from Al-Andalus which was a Spanish place that was run by Muslims at the old-time, there are Berbers who are the first people to live in North Africa and their skin is white, and there are much more other races.

Essentially, as an Algerian Muslim, I believe that we human beings all came from Adam and Eve peace be upon them, so apparently, it doesn’t matter what color of skin you have because we simply came from the same father and mother. With that being said, I want to mention this important saying of the Prophet Muhammed peace and blessings be upon him: "There is no superiority for an Arab over a non-Arab, nor for a non-Arab over an Arab. Neither is the white superior over the black, nor is the black superior over the white -- except by piety."

Consequently, your color of skin and mine doesn’t make any difference between us.

Omondi Ouma Senior Lead Strategist at Higani Creative (2014-present)
Answered August 8, 2018

Am Kenyan, and over the years, I have come accross several reports from North Africa.

In 2014, in Morocco, the national campaign "my name is not a negro" (ma smitish 'azzi) gave public visibility to the issue of racism in Moroccan society.

Recently, news of the Libyan slave trade sparked outrage - and infact, racism against black Africans in North Africa is nothing new.

In Egypt, the black community constitutes a substantial proportion of the population, yet many Egyptians seem to consider them an inferior minority, subjecting them to varying degrees of racial discrimination and degrading treatment. I hear Egyptians even get offended if you refer to them as African.

In Tunisia, discrimination is a shockingly everyday occurrence for black Tunisians. Although around 15% of the country's population is black, the majority of the remainder regard themselves as "white".

In 2017, Amnesty International reported that the Algerian authorities launched a discriminatory crackdown against foreign nationals, rounding up and forcibly expelling more than 2,000 sub-Saharan African migrants from a range of countries to neighbouring Niger and Mali .

This is how I perceive North Africans. It may not be accurate, since individuals have different traits, but thats the first thing that comes to mind.

On the good side, I think their countries are better developed and living standards are better, on average, than our side of the continent.…and before I forget,

North African Football teams have this habit of time wasting, especially when they are away or leading in the match. Be it USM Algier, Al Ahly, Raja Casablanca, Esperance Tunis, The National Teams…they behave the same.

The teams from North Africa are good, I just wish they dropped this behaviour from their football philosophy.

FUEL PRICE CRISIS IN KENYA!

LET'S TALK AFRICA :)! Posted by Nasubo Sikey September 17

Over the past year, Kenya has faced a significant jump in its fuel prices from as low as Ksh 83 per litre of Petrol in June 2020 to highs of Ksh 134 - 135 as of September 2021. The Energy and Petroleum Regulatory Authority (EPRA) has raised the prices of super petrol by 6% to Ksh.7.58 per litre now retailing at 134.7 in Nairobi (This is crazy!!) Not to mention that the inflation rate of August 2021 was announced at a high of 5.71% -6% and is predicted to hit 7.5% by end of September.

Riots due to increase of fuel prices in ,Kenya

Also, the cost of diesel and kerosene shot by Ksh.7.94 and Ksh.12.97 per litre respectively from midnight on 15th September 2021. The authority emphasises that prices are inclusive of the 8 per cent Value Added Tax (VAT) in line with the provisions of the Finance Act 2018, the Tax Laws (Amendment) Act 2020, and the revised rates for excise duty adjusted for inflation as per Legal Notice No. 194 of 2020.

This marks as the highest increase in price in a decade, as the stabilzation fund that was created to keep oil prices stable is said to not have been effected in the pricing of this cycle. The used the fund to compensate oil marketers for cutting their margins and quoting lower prices. Critics mentioned that the method of the Stabilisation fund is not sustainable and there needs to be a better way forward to deal with the pricing of fuel.

I have designed a graph below from data that I collected) and it shows how the fuel prices have increased from April 2020-September 2021, reaching a whole time high:

Graph illustrating price fluctuation from 2020–2021

LET'S TALK AFRICA

PRICE FLUCTUATION OF PETROL AND DIESEL PER LITER IN NAIROBI 2020-2021

	Petrol(Ksh)	Diesel(Ksh)
April 2020	110.87	101.65
June 2020	83.33	78.37
July 2020	89.10	74.57
August 2020	100.48	91.87
September 2020	103.95	94.63
October 2020	105.43	95.41
November 2020	107.27	90.53
December 2020	105.85	90.70
January 2021	106.82	91.82
February 2021	106.99	96.40
March 2021	115.18	101.90
April 2021	122.81	107.66
May 2021	126.37	107.66
June 2021	127.14	107.66
September 2021	134.72	115.60

Source: https://beemashine.com/new-fuel-prices-in-kenya-2020/2021

Actual figures per month.

Higher fuel prices affect more than just the cost to fill up at the gas station, there are much more dire consequences that are felt by especially the middle and lower class of an economy. Generally, higher fuel prices is like a dark cloud hovering over any country's economy. Not only does the inflation rate shoot up but there also other socio-economic issues that may arise from increase of fuel prices.

Lets have a look at some of the issues that may crop up:

1. Public Transportation will face difficulty as now the owners of the vehicles will need to charge the consumer higher as a way to set off the extra expenses that they are facing. Kenyans use mainly "Matatus", Motorbikes (Boda) and Buses as their form of transportation This includes also airlines that operate in the country, Air tickets will eventually have to rise as well.(they might hedge their position) but still likely hood of increase is high

2. Retailers will be forced to pass down higher operation costs due to shipping and transpiration to plus other costs incurred due to this increase in prices.

3. Higher fuel prices means also higher prices for any fuel related raw materials or by products -

4.Decreased Spending Power : There is less to spend on other items when Fuel prices increases because there is need to increase expenditure for gas and other fuel related items, Individuals will need to pay more as they fuel and this generally will interfere with the budgets of many owners of personal vehicles. Also the consumables will face a price fluctuation hence leaving consumers with less than what they used to have as " cash in hand"

5. Restaurants and Other Eateries may need to review the prices of their meals and also delivery costs as it will mean higher gas prices for cooking and also more fuel to be purchased for the purpose of delivery.

6. Higher inflation rates-currently Kenya is already facing a very dangerous high inflation rate of 6% ++ this will overall will increase cost of living and make Iftars quite difficult to sustain a rather comfortable lifestyle especially the lower end of the economic scale.

7. Higher Bills of Electricity or generator bills plus other types of bills as well, KPLC(Kenya Power and Lighting Company) uses a lot fuel in many of its processes of producing and distribution of the electricity hence the consumers must feel the pinch.

8. It may ultimately lead to uncontrollable unrestful and dissatisfied citizens who lose hope in the economy and have a generally pessimistic view and loss of confidence

9. Reduction of Foreign Investors- Increase in prices will discourage a lot of foreign investors because they will need to incur tremendous operation costs just to sustain the business

10. We haven't even recovered from the Corona Virus effects on the economy and individuals !

What is the way forward?

CHINESE INVESTMENT HAS HELPED KENYA REBUILD: UHURU KENYATTA

Jamie Wang Born and raised in China, had lived in Swiss and Germany
Answered October 31, 2018

I just saw an interview between a CNN journalist Richard Quest and the president or Kenya. As you can see, Richard's trying his best to lead the president into speaking out against China.

While the president is answering the question, Richard's body language shows that he's anxious, and the words from the president are not what he expected.

I am not qualified to speak for Africans. But this president of Kenya has some concrete and trust worthy opinions about this topic.

I suppose the next move from the western media and government should be accusing the president of Kenya of being a dictator who is damaging his country. At least to condemn him as an incompetent who cannot see through China's conspiracy. We shall wait and see.

Related Links

Why is it that Western Nations are always so concerned about China in Africa than Africans themselves?

In spite of China doing a lot to develop Africa, do you think what China is doing in Africa is actually more dangerous than Europe during the Colonial era?

Is Chinese debt trap diplomacy with Africa real? If so, why are some African countries signing up for more?

What do Africans think of Chinese investment in Africa?

Why doesn't America invest in Africa like China?

What happens to African countries when they can't repay their debt to China?

Why is it that Western Nations are always so concerned about China in Africa than Africans themselves?

In spite of China doing a lot to develop Africa, do you think what China is doing in Africa is actually more dangerous than Europe during the Colonial era?

Is Chinese debt trap diplomacy with Africa real? If so, why are some African countries signing up for more?

Which country is better to live in, Kenya or Nigeria?

Jeff October 25, 2020 Originally Answered: Between Nigeria and Kenya, which is the best to reside in?

It depends why you came. I've spent time in both nations, and lived in Abuja for much of the last decade. Abuja is definitely easier to get around in than Nairobi, and the security situation within the ring roads is fine.

Armed robbers had recently taken to haunting the roundabouts in Nairobi when I first visited in 2015, waiting for traffic jams to slow vehicles enough for pointed guns to result in cash forked through barely opened windows.

That never happened when I lived in Abuja, in part because traffic is light most of the time and passerbys don't tolerate thieves. I have heard of such robberies in Lagos and kidnapping seems to be more prevalent in Naija as well, so one picks one's poison. Security needs are part of the package in both countries, frankly. Still, I rarely had issues and I went to spots few foreigners go.

If you're into the high life Lagos is the place. Nowhere in Africa touches it for population or the vibrancy of its residents: they're up and about every hour of the day and night. Abuja and Nairobi are staid by comparison.

It's far easier to travel around the countryside as a mzungu: rural security is much better in Kenya due to the robust safari tourism industry there. It's more cumbersome to travel far in Nigeria, due to sketchy security and oyibos like myself do stand out in a crowd. There are more white people in Nairobi, as well as Indians and Arabs, so it's not so glaringly obvious one is not local there by glance alone.

On the other hand I did travel around rural Naija and even went on safari at Yankari Game Reserve, West Africa's largest and oldest park. That's not necessarily common though, while every ex-pat in Kenya has taken a safari or two, if only to check it off the obvious lists of things to do in country.

Nigeria is first and foremost about people, while Kenya offers the chance to see wide open spaces and natural parks where one is only surrounded by those one brought. There's a sense of the frontier there, that Hemingway's short stories are still not outdated, although the colonial era is thankfully in the past.

That doesn't happen in Nigeria: life there is about conversations with strangers: I never once hung out at a bush bar and didn't end up talking politics, football, or just current events, unless I made a point of sitting by myself in a far off corner with a book. Achebe's third novel, No Longer At Ease, still seems relevant, dealing as it does with political corruption and revolution, but the nation of Things Fall Apart is long gone: the Igbos don't worship pythons anymore, more's the pity.

I'd say Kenya is best for those who like to travel, even after getting to a country, and Nigeria is best for those who like people and spicy food. I'm committed to Naija due to family, and hence a bit biased. The two nations are certainly not all that similar, but I'm not sure I'd argue either is inherently best.

What we experience where we go when we travel depends on what we bring with us.

My daughter and I on the backside of Zuma Rock. It used to be a weekend getaway years ago. She was fun to bring along, and still is, although these days I'm back in the American southwest, missing Africa.

In 2021 is most of Africa still largely unaffected by the Covid pandemic?

Dar Milli, philosopher, June12

I can speak specifically for my country Tanzania COVID-19 isn't a thing here. The only worriers and complainers or claimants that "I got COVID-19" are people leading sheltered lives. A very small minority.

Sheltered life means moving from building to building in a private air-conditioned car. Working in an air-conditioned office and having an air-conditioned house would be a bonus to make someone hardcore sheltered.

But life goes on with zero regard to COVID-19. COVID-19 has become this alien problem we read now and then from other countries' media.

As for other African countries

All I can say is people who lead sheltered lives in other African countries tend to be the ones with voices, and as such their concerns can get extremely amplified.

Here's our neighbour (Kenya). This was during their official lockdown. The people listening to the politician (a presidential aspirant) on the stage are the normal citizens, who do not have a sheltered life. They are the majority, but their voices and experience about COVID-19 would probably never be heard as the ruling class is more interested in sucking up to the West.

If COVID-19 were a problem in African countries, it would not be possible to hide it (as many critics keep saying). Hospitals would have been flooded with the sick, and burials would be too many to go unnoticed.

There are no lock downs in Africa. African countries that claim they have lock-downs are speaking of small geographical areas in cities. Not countrywide lockdowns. Plus even those city lockdowns were partial at best (or comical, with some cities having night lockdowns and open during the day).

Related Links

Why is Sub-Saharan Africa relatively out of the grip of the COVID-19 pandemic?

Why is the African continent largely unaffected by this covid pandemic? Or is it not being disclosed?

How can Africa stand together to end the COVID-19 pandemic?

How was Africa spared/saved from the COVID-19 pandemic? What's in their country or people that made them resist the virus? What can we learn from them?

Why is HIV-2 largely confined to West Africa?

With no organization to rigorously count the casualties of the massive COVID-19 pandemic in Africa, is there a risk that the actual number

In 2021 is most of Africa still largely unaffected by the Covid pandemic?

Dar Milli, philosopher, June12
I can speak specifically for my country Tanzania COVID-19 isn't a thing here. The only worriers and complainers or claimants that "I got COVID-19" are people leading sheltered lives. A very small minority.

Sheltered life means moving from building to building in a private air-conditioned car. Working in an air-conditioned office and having an air-conditioned house would be a bonus to make someone hardcore sheltered.

But life goes on with zero regard to COVID-19. COVID-19 has become this alien problem we read now and then from other countries' media.

As for other African countries

All I can say is people who lead sheltered lives in other African countries tend to be the ones with voices, and as such their concerns can get extremely amplified.

Here's our neighbour (Kenya). This was during their official lockdown. The people listening to the politician (a presidential aspirant) on the stage are the normal citizens, who do not have a sheltered life. They are the majority, but their voices and experience about COVID-19 would probably never be heard as the ruling class is more interested in sucking up to the West.

If COVID-19 were a problem in African countries, it would not be possible to hide it (as many critics keep saying). Hospitals would have been flooded with the sick, and burials would be too many to go unnoticed.

There are no lock downs in Africa. African countries that claim they have lock-downs are speaking of small geographical areas in cities. Not countrywide lockdowns. Plus even those city lockdowns were partial at best (or comical, with some cities having night lockdowns and open during the day).

Related Links

Why is Sub-Saharan Africa relatively out of the grip of the COVID-19 pandemic?

Why is the African continent largely unaffected by this covid pandemic? Or is it not being disclosed?

How can Africa stand together to end the COVID-19 pandemic?

How was Africa spared/saved from the COVID-19 pandemic? What's in their country or people that made them resist the virus? What can we learn from them?

Why is HIV-2 largely confined to West Africa?

With no organization to rigorously count the casualties of the massive COVID-19 pandemic in Africa, is there a risk that the actual num

KENYA Politics: Bid To Amend Kenya Constitution Seen As Key To Succession Battle

By David Herbling
July 1, 2021, 4:20 PM GMT+3

Overhaul of the political system has limited support, survey shows.
Ruto, Odinga among frontrunners to succeed Kenyatta next year

Many Kenyans view proposed constitutional amendments that are being driven by President Uhuru Kenyatta and opposition leader Raila Odinga as an attempt to influence who'll become the nation's next leader, a survey found.

The so-called Building Bridges Initiative, or BBI, envisions reintroducing the role of prime minister and two deputies, creating an official post for the main opposition leader and increasing the 47 counties' share of the budget. Plans to hold a referendum that would smooth the way for its adoption were dealt a setback in May, when the High Court ruled that Kenyatta acted illegally in initiating the sweeping reforms -- a ruling the government is appealing.

Of 1,500 people interviewed June 24 to June 28 by TIFA Research, 43% perceived the push for the BBI "as related to efforts to influence the outcome of the next election," Maggie Ireri, the Nairobi-based company's chief executive officer, said Thursday in an emailed statement.

Kenyatta is due to step down next year after serving two terms, with his deputy William Ruto and Odinga among the frontrunners to succeed him. Ruto's supporters allege that the BBI constitutes an attempt to derail his efforts to secure the top job.

Read: Court Sinks Bid for Biggest Kenyan Politics Overhaul in a Decade

Kenyatta and Odinga, who reconciled after a bitterly contested presidential vote in 2017, say the BBI will help curb ethnic tensions and election-related violence. But the plan's critics say it will undermine the judiciary's independence, sideline sparsely populated areas and increase the size of the government at a time when the treasury is struggling to reduce costs and narrow the budget deficit.

Just 19% of respondents in the TIFA survey said they would vote in favor of the proposed amendments, down from 29% in December, while 31% said they would oppose them, down from 32%. A quarter of those surveyed were undecided as to if or how they would vote and 18% stated they wouldn't participate in a referendum. Almost half the respondents said they knew "nothing" about the proposed reforms.

An appellate court may conclude hearing a petition on Friday challenging the High Court judgment that Kenyatta acted illegally in promoting the BBI. Its decision could in turn be challenged in the Supreme Court.

Politics: Court Sinks Bid For Biggest Kenyan Politics Overhaul In A Decade

By David Herbling and Michael Cohen

May 14, 2021, 3:13 PM GMT+3

Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta's ambitions of reshaping the nation's political system as his final term draws to a close were dealt a body blow by a court ruling that he acted illegally in initiating the reforms.

The High Court's declaration on Thursday may derail a planned referendum on sweeping proposals championed by Kenyatta and one-time foe and opposition leader Raila Odinga -- despite parliament overwhelmingly giving them the go-ahead. It could also undermine Kenyatta's ability to influence who succeeds him after next year's elections and raise the odds of the post going to Deputy President William Ruto, who fell out with his boss for criticizing the reforms.

Uhuru Kenyatta Photographer: Drew Angerer/Getty Images

Kenyatta “is now seen as a president who has failed,” Lempaa Suyianka, a lawyer at the Katiba Institute, a Nairobi-based thinktank, said by phone. “I don’t see any light at the end of the tunnel for the referendum.”

A regional hub for global brands including Alphabet Inc. and Coca-Cola Co., Kenya has struggled to contain political and ethnic violence. A disputed result in 2007 triggered clashes that left more than 1,100 people dead. Kenyatta and Ruto were indicted by the International Criminal Court for their alleged roles in the bloodshed, but the cases were eventually dropped due to a lack of evidence.

Building Bridges

Kenyatta and Odinga said proposed constitution changes, the first in a decade, will end winner-takes-all elections and reduce political risk for investors in East Africa’s largest economy. In 2010, the nation amended its constitution and among the changes, introduced county governments and a second house of parliament.

Their so-called Building Bridges Initiative, or BBI, envisioned reintroducing the role of prime minister and two deputies, creating an official post for the main opposition leader and increasing the 47 counties’ share of the budget. Some of the plan’s critics warned it would result in a bloated government and add to a budget deficit that’s projected at 8.7% of gross domestic product in the year through June.

Ruto, who complained of being sidelined by the ruling Jubilee Party and hinted he may break away to run for the top job, argued that the reforms wouldn’t necessarily make the government more inclusive and a proposed ombudsman for the judiciary would infringe on its independence. Some of his allies were more forthright, alleging that the main aim of the BBI was to diminish his odds of winning and set up Odinga for the role.

The High Court’s ruling mostly focused on the legality of the process followed in drafting the proposed constitutional amendments, and the nation’s solicitor-general said the government plans to appeal.

The ruling “confirms that the Kenyan judiciary has capacity to check on presidential and government excesses,” said Dismas Mokua, a Nairobi-based independent political analyst. “Kenyatta’s only saving grace is an upper court setting aside the High Court’s decision.”

“Wounded Lion”

The latest in global politics
Get insight from reporters around the world in the Balance of Power newsletter.

Kenyatta has had several previous run-ins with the judiciary. In 2017, the Supreme Court ordered a rerun of presidential elections, upholding Odinga's complaint that Kenyatta's victory was tainted by rigging. And last year, the chief justice urged him to dissolve parliament because legislated gender quotas hadn't been met -- advice he eschewed. The president has also stalled on filling dozens of vacant judicial posts, leading to backlogs in the legal system, and been criticized for cutting the judiciary's funding.

Read more: Kenyan Court Scuppers President's Plan to Reshape Government

Even if the legal and procedural hurdles can be overcome, support for the BBI is far from guaranteed. Just 29% of 1,550 respondents canvassed by Nairobi-based Tifa Research said they'd back the changes, a third said they'd oppose them and the balance were undecided or said they wouldn't vote, a poll published in January showed.

The president will nonetheless want to ensure he is spared from legal repercussions after he retires, according to Mokua.

"Kenyatta's political capital has suffered immensely, yet he is now a wounded lion,' he said. "Kenyatta will go an extra mile to determine who becomes the next president as an insurance policy."

Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta's ambitions of reshaping the nation's political system as his final term draws to a close were dealt a body blow by a court ruling that he acted illegally in initiating the reforms.

The High Court's declaration on Thursday may derail a planned referendum on sweeping proposals championed by Kenyatta and one-time foe and opposition leader Raila Odinga -- despite parliament overwhelmingly giving them the go-ahead. It could also undermine Kenyatta's ability to influence who succeeds him after next year's elections and raise the odds of the post going to Deputy President William Ruto, who fell out with his boss for criticizing the reforms.

Building Bridges

Kenyatta and Odinga said proposed constitution changes, the first in a decade, will end winner-takes-all elections and reduce political risk for investors in East Africa's largest economy. In 2010, the nation amended its constitution and among the changes, introduced county governments and a second house of parliament.

Their so-called Building Bridges Initiative, or BBI, envisioned reintroducing the role of prime minister and two deputies, creating an official post for the main opposition leader and increasing the 47 counties' share of the budget. Some of the plan's critics warned it would result in a bloated government and add to a budget deficit that's projected at 8.7% of gross domestic product in the year through June.

William Ruto Photographer: Yasuyoshi Chiba/AFP/Getty Images

Ruto, who complained of being sidelined by the ruling Jubilee Party and hinted he may break away to run for the top job, argued that the reforms wouldn't necessarily make the government more inclusive and a proposed ombudsman for the judiciary would infringe on its independence. Some of his allies were more forthright, alleging that the main aim of the BBI was to diminish his odds of winning and set up Odinga for the role.

The High Court's ruling mostly focused on the legality of the process followed in drafting the proposed constitutional amendments, and the nation's solicitor-general said the government plans to appeal.

The ruling "confirms that the Kenyan judiciary has capacity to check on presidential and government excesses," said Dismas Mokua, a Nairobi-based independent political analyst. "Kenyatta's only saving grace is an upper court setting aside the High Court's decision."

"Wounded Lion"

The latest in global politics
Get insight from reporters around the world in the Balance of Power newsletter.

Kenyatta has had several previous run-ins with the judiciary. In 2017, the Supreme Court ordered a rerun of presidential elections, upholding Odinga's complaint that Kenyatta's victory was tainted by rigging. And last year, the chief justice urged him to dissolve parliament because legislated gender quotas hadn't been met -- advice he eschewed. The president has also stalled on filling dozens of vacant judicial posts, leading to backlogs in the legal system, and been criticized for cutting the judiciary's funding.

Even if the legal and procedural hurdles can be overcome, support for the BBI is far from guaranteed. Just 29% of 1,550 respondents canvassed by Nairobi-based Tifa Research said they'd back the changes, a third said they'd oppose them and the balance were undecided or said they wouldn't vote, a poll published in January showed.

The president will nonetheless want to ensure he is spared from legal repercussions after he retires, according to Mokua.

"Kenyatta's political capital has suffered immensely, yet he is now a wounded lion,' he said. "Kenyatta will go an extra mile to determine who becomes the next president as an insurance policy."

One World I One Life
Answered by George Orido MSc in Agricultural Engineering, Egerton University, Njoro Campus (Graduated 2018) June 24 Updated June 26

What does Kajabi cost?
I felt so compelled to answer this question that I had to create time to type this answer - what is 'kajaba'? - on the perspective of a Kenyan.

Kajaba is also called 'muguka' - leafy parts of the khat plant - which are chewed for pleasure. By pleasure here I mean 'ndio zako zishike' - translated as getting high.

One may opt to sweeten the flavour with chewing gum - Big G - or any other gum in the market for that effect. Apart from the flavour, chewing gum also helps to put the chewed substance together in the mouth thus allowing one to spit the excess juice in the form of saliva.

Salted groundnuts are chewed together with kajaba to soften it and give it the salty taste as more and more leaves of kajaba are chewed.

A greater percentage of the youths in Kenya like kajaba - especially those who reside within the poor suburbs (ghettos) surrounding Nairobi city.

Smoking while chewing kajaba has become a trend among these youths and a majority of them agree to the fact that this helps them pass time as they ponder on unemployment and joblessness which has heavily affected them.

The dangers of chewing kajaba are quite noticeable. It is known that those who chew it lose appetite for food. Erectile disfunction is yet to be scientifically studied and published as one of the dangers. However, complaints of men being unable to rise to the occasion have been noted.

So, back to the question: what does kajaba cost? or do I rephrase it to: how much does kajaba cost? Answering the second rephrased question, kajaba will cost as low as KES 50/=. If you intergrate the cost of a cigarette or 'shash' and groundnuts to kajaba of KES 100/= a user will need about KES 150/= to get high — 'ndio zake zishike' — and it will help him/her to pass time (about the whole day) while pondering on unemployment and joblessness.

When I look at: what does kajaba cost? then I'll need to think scientifically and prove issues like erectile disfunction.

EDITS

I have done research and found out that SPECIAL GOMBA BUBBLE GUM is a favourite of Kajaba users in Githurai — a populous ghetto in Nairobi city, Kenya. Most of the youths interviewed in the survey Strongly Agreed that the gum is pocket friendly as compared to Big G. More findings as regards erectile disfunction will be published soon once the research is concluded.

Thank you for all those views and upvotes. Quora still remains the best forum to share more knowledge with like minded fellows.

How do Ethiopians view Kenyans?

Frank Mwenda Updated August 31, 2020 Lives in Kenya

I was in Ethiopia last week, and it was a fun experience. They treated me like their brother. Said we have the same roots. Others swore that I had Ethiopian looks so I should find out from my parents, if, you know... :) Professionally, they trust us Kenyans more than they trust their countrymen. For example, we visited a client with an Ethiopian colleague and he explicitly said,

“I trust you (pointing at me), more than I trust her (pointing at my colleague). I have worked with Kenyans before and you people are smart, well read and civilized than us.” That's not my sentiment, though. I believe Ethiopians are really smart people. Yet another prospect signed up to our services because of my presence. He said Kenyans know more ICT stuff and would be better placed to market their hotel online.

My company has incredibly made over 1,200 websites in Ethiopia and I suspect it's because of its presence in Kenya, which many Ethiopians view in high regard. We love Ethiopians and they love us back. And that's partly why you don't need a visa (or any documents really) to go to Ethiopia from Kenya.

Quelles sont les coïncidences folles de l'histoire ?

Céphas Sokegbe Passionné d'histoire 9 nov.

Il y en a une que j'aime bien. J'en ai fait la découverte pendant une promenade habituelle sur mon téléphone bien sûr. Est-ce que les quatre personnes sur cette photo vous disent quelque chose ? [1]Pourtant, vous avez en face de vous sur une même photo les quatre présidents élus démocratiquement depuis l'indépendance du Kenya. Ils se transmis le pouvoir le plus petit devienne aujourd'hui président. De la gauche vers la droite, vous avez : Jomo Kenyatta, né le 20 octobre 1894 à Gatundu (en) et mort le 22 août 1978 à Mombasa, est un homme d'État kényan d’origine kikuyu. Militant indépendantiste, il est emprisonné de 1952 à 1961 et devient Premier ministre de 1963 à 1964 puis président de la République de 1964 à 1978. [2]Uhuru Kenyatta, né le 26 octobre 1961 à Nairobi, est un homme d'État kényan, président de la République depuis le 9 avril 2013. Il est le fils de Jomo Kenyatta. Il avait 16 ans quand son père est décédé. C'est le petit assis à côté de son père sur la photo. [3]Mwai Kibaki, né le 15 novembre 1931 à Gatuyaini, est un homme d'État kenyan. Il est président de la République entre le 30 décembre 2002 et le 9 avril 2013, succédant à Daniel arap Moi. [4]Daniel Toroitich Arap Moi, né le 2 septembre 19242 à Sacho et mort le 4 février 2020 à Nairobi (Kenya), est un homme d'État kényan, président de la République du 22 août 1978 au 30 décembre 2002, succédant à Jomo Kenyatta. [5]Je n'ai aucune idée de ce qui les avait rassemblés dans cette salle. Mais c'est le genre de coïncidence qui arrive rarement dans l'histoire ou presque jamais.

Notes de bas de page
[1] Image on twimg.com
[2] Image on britannica.com
[3] Image on wikimedia.org
[4] Image on wikimedia.org
[5] Image on wikimedia.org

Questions similaires

Quelle est la chose la plus incroyable qui soit arrivée dans l'histoire, au point qu'il soit difficile de croire que c'est vraiment arrivé ?

Quelles sont les coïncidences historiques les plus effrayantes ?

Quel sont les événements historiques sans réponses les plus étranges de l'Histoire ?

Y a-t-il des exemples de coïncidences si étonnantes qu'il faut les voir pour les croire ?

Quels sont les coïncidences les plus suspectes de l'Histoire ?
Quelles sont les plus mystérieuses photos de l'histoire ?

What colour were the ancient Egyptians?

Françoise Marie

Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University2y
Kenneth Pleasant's answer to What colour were the ancient Egyptians?
For anyone who said that the ancient Egyptians were so-called Middle Easterner and not brown(black) skinned African, it appears to be a case of cognitive dissonance.

Eurocentrists will never ever admit that ancient Egyptians (Kemites) and ancient Berbers a.k.a Moors were black skinned Africans, despite the written word of the time, historical documentation (Diodorus, Strabo, Procopius, Herodotus etc), eyewitness accounts (Aristotle, Jean Mandeville etc.), biblical accounts and oral traditions (the descendants of Ham, the epitomy of blackness) or entries in old dictionaries.

You can post anything and everything that support the blackness of original Egyptians and Berbers, to no avail.

Eurocentrists will come back and say that regardless of their skin tone, ancient Egyptians and Berbers were NOT sub-Saharan Negroes.

Being black then does not equal being black today.

Only sub-Saharan Negroes (and their lookalikes such as the Papuans or Kanak) are classified and categorized as black people. Only “Negroid” people are black people.

It is crystal clear that the original skin tone of ancient North Africans is a sensitive issue among Eurocentrists.

North Africa is considered a border zone where white skinned migrants free (invaders, conquerors etc.) or forced (slaves, expelled Muslims, refugees etc.) and Blacks, the original inhabitants, have mixed but fought over land and power position for thousands of years.

Unmixed Blacks were pushed down, south or in the Sahara Desert.

"Ham, having become black because of a curse pronounced against him by his father, fled to the Maghreb to hide in shame....

Berber, son of kesloudjim [casluhim], one of his descendants, left numerous posterity in the maghrib."56* [56* - “Ibn Khaldun, [i]histoire i, 177–178

1939 – “The extreme long-heads, concentrated in the Hoggar and in parts of the Algerian plateau are the Tuareg and the purest families of ancestral nomadic Berbers, preserving the head form which they brought from east Africa, their Hamitic homeland.” Carleton Coon The Races of Europe, p. 257 1979 reprint

Origins of the Picts and Scots

Nevertheless, in the early-600s, the Spanish bishop and encyclopaedist, Isidore of Seville wrote:

The Moors have bodies black as night, while the skin of the Gauls is white.

In Isidore’s day, Moors were black by definition…” (Staying Roman: Conquest and identity in Africa and the Mediterranean, 439-700. Jonathan Conant, 2012 Cambridge University Press

Sir Jean Mandeville, wrote that: "and men of Nubia be Christian, but they be black as the Moors for great heat of the sun"

Are the Copts named after the Coptic Church or vice versa?

Dimitris Almyrantis Lover of stories the world has forgotten (2016-Present)
Nov 2

Vise-versa. “Copt” is just the Arabic form of “E-g-y-p-t-(i-a-n)”, as Arabic does not have vowels—so g-p-t, in Arabic q-(u)-p-t, the English c-o-p-t. It comes from the Greek word “Egypt”, originally derived from the Coptic name of the temple-city of Memphis; the Arabs heard it from the old Greek rulers in the 7th century, not the Copts themselves.
The actual Coptic word for themselves is remənkhēmi (□ □ □ ̀□ □ □ □), from the traditional name of the Egyptians for Egypt, kh-m-t or “Kemet”, meaning the “black (land)”, referring to the fertile soil of the Nile, as opposed to the “red (land)” of the desert—although modern Copts will use Arabic in everyday life.

The “Coptic” Church (which uses primarily Coptic in its liturgy) is referred to as the Egyptian (□ □ □ ̀□ □ □ □) Church in Coptic. This being said, the ethnic names for Churches (“Coptic”, “Armenian”, “Russian”, &c.) while very popular in English, are not actually part of those churches’ historical usage. The fact that different local bishoprics use Coptic or Ge’ez or Arabic in their liturgy has not meant that the locals divide themselves into “Coptic Christians” as opposed to “Syriac Christians”, the way Anglicans and German Lutherans are divided, for instance.

The actual division(s) between Eastern Churches—between Eastern (Byzantine) and Oriental (Monophysite) Christians, and more recently Uniate Catholic groups that kept their eastern liturgies—ignore ethnic lines.

Related Links

Are the Copts today related to ancient Egyptians?

In 23andMe, there is "Egyptian" and "Coptic Egyptian". What is the difference between these two? Aren't the Indeginous Egyptians Coptic Egyptians?

How helpful was the modern Coptic language in deciphering the ancient Egyptian language? Are there any similar words in the two languages?

What do Egyptians think of the revitalization of the Coptic language?

Are Coptic Christians persecuted in Egypt?

Are Copts the direct descendants of ancient Egyptians?

What is the difference between the Coptic Catholic Church and the Coptics Orthodox Church?

How different do Copts look from other Egyptians? Can you spot a Copt when you are in public?

Can Egyptians reuse the Coptic language, and can it be the modern standard Egyptian?

Can Copts in Egypt be identified by their name? Are there names that are Coptic rather than non-Coptic?

Are Egyptian Muslims Islamized Copts?

Fifteen percent of Egyptians are Coptic Christians. Who introduced this religion to Egyptians?

I just found out Coptic Egyptians do not view themselves as Arabs, but rather Copts. Who are Copts and where/what are their origins?

When did the Coptic Church break from the Roman Catholic Church?

Are the Copts native Egyptians?

Why is the Suez Canal now owned by Egyptians, as they didn't build it?

Eman N. Lives in Egypt (2010–present) May 5

Didn’t build what?!!! Egyptians died during building it. History says how Egyptian men were forced, abducted, taken from their homes to work under bad conditions to dig the canal. Many never came back.

Egyptians still remember this incident till now. Suez Canal costed many Egyptian lives.

Historically first idea is credited to ancient Egyptians who tried to connect the canal to Nile and so to Mediterranean sea. Engineers just came up with old idea.

Check history of Suez canal

- Egypt was the first country to dig a man-made canal across its lands to connect the Mediterranean Sea to the Red Sea via the branches of the River Nile. The first who dug it was Senausert III, Pharaoh of Egypt (1874 B.C.). This canal was abandoned to silting and reopened several times as follows:

Canal of Sity I	1310 B.C.
Canal of Nkhaw	610 B.C.
Canal of Darius I	510 B.C.
Canal of Ptolemy II	285 B.C.
Canal of The Romans	117 A.C.
Canal of Amir El-Moemeneen	640A.D.

Most important it is in Egyptian land so yes Egyptians definitely own it. Its name is Egyptian itself.

Commentary

Matthew L , former Infantry Officer at British Army Answered Sep 4

The Suez Canal was built by Ferdinand de Lesseps, the former french consul to Egypt, in 1854.

Construction began in April 1859, and at first digging was done by hand with picks and shovels wielded by forced laborers. Later, European workers with dredgers and steam shovels arrived. Labor disputes and a cholera epidemic slowed construction, and the Suez Canal was not completed until 1869–four years behind schedule. On November 17, 1869, the Suez Canal was opened to navigation. Ferdinand de Lesseps would later attempt, unsuccessfully, to build a canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

COMMENTARY By Ahmed Helmi , Adjunct Professor, Engineering, at Pharos University In Alexandria (2010-present) Answered May 12

Certainly the Suez Canal wasn't built by Moses and his Slave Labor to the Pharaohs of Egypt. We, the Egyptians, are the Builders of our Suez Canal, as we built before our Great Pyramids of Giza. Tens of thousands of Egyptian farmers lost their lives during digging the Canal with primitive tools and very harsh accommodation conditions.

Quote:

"Unfortunately for de Lesseps' later reputation in Egypt, the Suez Canal was dug almost entirely by conscripted Egyptian laborers, by hand, with the French providing no digging machinery (second image). The workers had to dig a trench 100 feet wide, 50 feet deep, and 100 miles long, for which they received only enough food and water to survive and no pay. Working conditions were horrible, and disease rampant. At least 100,000 Egyptians died over the course of the project."

Will prayers solve Africa's problem, or are we over depending on God?

Danny Dev · Follow

The reverse is true

Africa's problems started with Prayers

I'll let a pic sum it up for you

Do you think Kenya is indeed Africa's 🌍 position 6 in wealth when her citizens hardly put food on the table? Remember 1us dollar is 112.67 Kenya shillings

Africa in Real Time Answered by They Lied, They Lie Tue

You are right Kenyan citizens are no where near the 6th richest in Africa - No way near !

Kenya has 55million people

There is a difference between how much money a country has (GDP) and how much an average citizen can earn (GDP per capita)

Rough GDP Calculations

So on paper Kenya is only beat by 5 other countries but the average Kenya sits in 18th so they should make $5274 (594k Shillings) per year - at least 400k per year in shillings

The Kenyan government know this that is why the minimum wage is set to 156k per year (not 400 or 500k) but as we both know there are Kenyans accepting less .So for every person getting less than 500k per year the rest of that money goes to the wealthy who get richer and send their kids to London for University (I've met alot of them and they don't always look traditional Kikuyu ort Luo)

List of African countries by GDP (PPP) per capita - Wikipedia

Wikipedia list article African countries by GDP (PPP) per capita in 2017 This is a list of African countries by Gross Domestic Product (GDP) per capita based on purchasing power parity (PPP). GDP (PPP) per capita is given in international dollars . Updated as of July 21, 2021, 8:38 AM MST. List of African countries by GDP per capita [edit] Country GDP per capita (Int$) [1] Algeria 11,829 Angola 6,878 Benin 2,552 Botswana 18,113 Burkina Faso 2,207 Burundi 727 Cabo Verde 7,728 Cameroon 3,745 Central African Republic 823 Chad 2,428 Comoros 2,799 Ivory Coast 5,360 Democratic Republic of the Congo 843 Djibouti 3,788 Egypt 14,023 Equatorial Guinea 21,442 Eritrea 1,820 Eswatini 9,186 Ethiopia 2,772 Gabon 18,647 The Gambia 2,278 Ghana 8,343 Guinea 2,390 Guinea-Bissau 1,951 Kenya 5,274 Lesotho 3,868 Liberia 1,413 Libya 4,746 Madagascar 1,697 Malawi 1,234 Mali 2,271 Mauritania 4,563 Mauritius 25,029 Morocco 9,339 Mozambique 1,331 Namibia 9,542 Niger 1,213 Nigeria 5,280 Republic of Congo 7,119 Rwanda 2,641 São Tomé and Príncipe 3,220 Senegal 3,675 Seychelles 30,486 Sierra Leone 1,608 Somalia 888 South Africa 14,239 South Sudan 1,420 Sudan 4,232 Tanzania 3,574 Togo 1,821 Tunisia 13,417 Uganda 2,566 Zambia 4,148 Zimbabwe 2,621 See also [edit] References [edit] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_African_countries_by_GDP_(PPP)_per_capita

Inequality

The problem is that Kenya is a very unequal society from the olden days, through colonialism until now

Less than 0.1% of the population own more wealth than the bottom 99.9% - so no wonder there millionaires galore in Kenya but the rest of the population isn't

Kenya: extreme inequality in numbers | Oxfam International

Extreme inequality is out of control in Kenya. Despite an impressive economic growth since 2005, poverty still affects millions of people’s lives. It appears that a minority of wealthy individuals and investors are creaming off the yields of the country’s economic performance. While this minority of super-rich Kenyans are accumulating wealth and income, the fruits of economic growth are failing to trickle down to the poorest. The rich are capturing the lion’s share of the benefits, while millions of people at the bottom are being left behind. If inequality remained at the same level for the following five years, 2.9 million more people could be living in extreme poverty. Let's look at the numbers 8.300 The gap between the richest and poorest has reached extreme levels in Kenya. Less than 0.1% of the population (8,300 people) own more wealth than the bottom 99.9% (more than 44 million people). The richest 10% of people in Kenya earned on average 23 times more than the poorest 10%. 80% The number of super-rich in Kenya is one of the fastest growing in the world. It is predicted that the number of millionaires will grow by 80% over the next 10 years, with

7,500 new millionaires set to be created. 1.1 bn Corporate tax dodging is undermining Kenya’s tax base. Kenya is losing $1.1bn a year to tax exemptions and incentives – almost twice what the government spends on its entire health budget in 2015/16, in a country where mothers face a 1 in 40 chance of dying in childbirth. Nearly one million primary school-aged children are still out-of-school – the ninth highest number of any country in the world. Photo: Allan Gichigi/Oxfam 1 M Unequal access to opportunities, such as healthcare and education, is rife. Nearly one million primary school-aged children are still out-of-school – the ninth highest number of any country in the world. Kenya's level of spending for education has gradually fallen each year since the early 2000s. 2.6 M Despite some improvements in health status over the last decade, the government spends only 6% of its budget on health. A quarter of the Kenyan population regularly lack access to healthcare. A recent study estimated that nearly 2.6 million people fall into poverty or remain poor due to ill health each year. 6% Gender inequality is prevalent in Kenya. Economic policy is not only creating extreme inequality, but also holding back women's economic empowerment. For example, despite 96% of Kenya’s rural women population working on farms, only 6% of the women in Kenya hold a title to land. Time for reform Extreme inequality is not inevitable, it is a matter of political choice. To reduce it to sustainable levels, the Kenyan government should implement economic policies and legislation to reform the fiscal system, raise sufficient financing for free, quality public education and healthcare, and close the economic inequality gap for women. By doing so, it could help to lift millions out of poverty and ensure a more equal and prosperous https://www.oxfam.org/en/kenya-extreme-inequality-numbers#:~:text=8.300%20The%20gap%20between%20the,more%20than%20the%20poorest%2010%25.

Cheer up

On a lighter note things will get better and everyone loves Kenyans (maybe not Somalia) also Kenya is in a far better position than my own folk in Malawi.

Last Point

Keep an eye on that 53 million people number - however fast your economy and jobs are growing if you have to split the Ugali between that many people then things never improve that fast

[1] Kenya Inequality

[2] GDP per capita - Kenya 18th

[3] GDP nominal - Kenya 6th

[4] Kenya Minimum wage http://kenyalaw.org/kl/fileadmin/pdfdownloads/LegalNotices/2019/LN2_2019.pdf

Footnotes

[1] Kenya: extreme inequality in numbers | Oxfam International
[2] List of African countries by GDP (PPP) per capita - Wikipedia
[3] List of African countries by GDP (nominal) - Wikipedia

Related Links

What do you think of the constant and pressing Chinese presence in African geopolitics? Do you think it is comparable to that of Europe in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries? Or is it totally different?

What is really responsible for the poverty in African countries?

In what ways are people's rights being violated across Nigeria? What are your suggestions to curtail these absurdities?

Why is Uganda so poor to seek help from other countries?

Should the pastoral communities consider putting part of their land to crop farming and irrigation to substitute the large loss of their herds due to little rainfall?

Has there been any earthquakes in West Africa?

How can you describe Nigeria's present condition in 2 sentences?

Why is Reuben Abati the numero Uno essayist/journalist in Nigeria?

How will the military coup in Sudan affect South Sudan?

Besides food and medicine donations, why don't billionaires do more to combat extreme poverty? Why don't they create more jobs and found more companies in the countries that suffer the most with poverty?

Considering the lack of economic development in most developing countries, should international bodies like IMF, World Bank, and developed countries keep giving out loans to them?

How many South Africans have been hospitalized and died from the omicron variant?

Which one is the cheapest brand new car in Africa?

Why is the Nigerian Nollywood industry still acting movies that encourage banishment and outcast? Does it mean that civilization in terms of rule of law is yet to occur?

What do you think people mean when they say white people do not have a culture?

Jean-Marie Valheur political aficionado & former journalist May 18

Originally Answered: Why do some people say "white people don't have a culture"

Because there is no unifying culture that unites all white people. Just like how not all black people fall under the same umbrella, either. Culture depends far more on the nation or region in which you live. A black man born in raised in America, for instance, likely has more in common with a white man from America than he has with a black man from Burundi or Senegal.

A black person can visit Africa, thinking he is visiting “the continent of his roots”. But he would quickly find that… this is a very, very different culture from the one which he hails. Likewise, a white person from Russia can’t very well go to Australia or the Netherlands and expect everything to be culturally the same as it was back home in ‘the old country’…

White people have a LOT of culture. So do black people, and asian people. But it’s not tied to race as much as it is tied to the nation and culture in which they grew up. Globally speaking, no such thing as “white culture” or “black culture” exists.

Related Links

What is the culture of white people?

How can people be so arrogant to say that white people have no culture?

If someone tells you that, "White people have no culture," how can you effectively counter that statement?

What's white culture about?

What do people mean when they say racism against white people doesn't exist?

Why do people say white people can't dance?

Aren't people who say all white people are racist, racist themselves for stigmatizing whites?

Do you think white people should be able to say the "N" word? Why or why not?

When people say "white people have no culture", is that racist?

Why do many people think that white people are evil and hope to eliminate white people?

Pourquoi n'y a-t-il pas de tigres en Afrique ? Il y a des lions, des léopards, des guépards, etc.

Serge Elia Amoureux d'animaux 26 juil.

Cette question est l’un des plus grands mystères de la nature.

En effet, on ne sait toujours pas pourquoi on ne trouve guère de tigres dans la nature africaine, alors que lions, léopards et guépards y abondent (bien qu'ils se fassent malheureusement de plus en plus rares de nos jours, à cause des activités humaines). Ainsi, on n'a que des spéculations à ce sujet.

Toutefois, les scientifiques ont révélé que le tigre et ses cousins félidés (y compris le chat domestique) ont leurs origines en Afrique – à ce propos, on a bel et bien découvert des fossiles de jaguars en Afrique orientale, ce qui indique sans doute que la région abritait sa propre sous-espèce de jaguar pendant la Préhistoire.

À un moment donné, il y a environ 2 millions d'années, une branche de félidés migra en Asie, et évolua pour ensuite devenir les fauves oranges à rayures noires – sans doute les plus grands, les plus puissants et les plus dangereux de tous. Lors de leur installation dans le continent asiatique, ces tigres ne revinrent plus jamais en Afrique – allez savoir pourquoi…

Beaucoup de zoologistes estiment que l'espèce habitait historiquement une majeure partie de l'Asie, et que moult sous-espèces de tigres migrèrent naturellement et se propagèrent au fil du temps. Pourtant, il est probable que les fluctuations glaciaires et les frontières géographiques à l'époque du Pléistocène rendirent tout à fait difficile le retour de ces animaux dans leur continent d'origine (à savoir, l'Afrique) – en fait, d'aucuns pensent que le tigre ne se dispersa vers l'est, en Inde, qu'il y a environ 16 000 ans.

Mais encore là, ce ne sont que des théories qui ne bénéficient pas suffisamment de preuves à l'appui. Compte tenu de cela, demeure inconnue la véritable raison pour laquelle les tigres ne vivent pas aujourd'hui dans « le Continent Noir » (ainsi qu'on appelle des fois l'Afrique), que ce soit dans les vastes savanes ou les forêts tropicales – même les sources fiables d'Internet ne donnent pas la réponse définitive.

Il convient de mentionner ceci : il y a quelques années, le cinéaste animalier John Varty, dans son but d'établir une population de tigres sauvages en dehors de l'Asie, a introduit une poignée d'individus captifs dans la nature africaine – et pour être plus précis, dans une région assez reculée d'Afrique du Sud, appelée à juste titre Tiger Canyon Private Game Reserve (ce que l'on peut traduire par « La Réserve animalière privée du Canyon au Tigre »), où les tigres auparavant captifs se sont parfaitement adaptés pour survivre (et prospérer) dans les prairies ouvertes, les savanes et les canyons, faisant grand usage de leur instinct prédateur pour chasser les proies locales et battre les rivaux.

Jusqu'à présent, on ne connaît pas d'autres projets concernant l'introduction de tigres en Afrique, d'autant plus que celui-ci implique la savane africaine, ce qui n'est pas un environnement habituel pour un habitant des forêts. Mais puisque ce projet a connu un succès, il n'est pas impossible d'en avoir un autre consistant à introduire des tigres dans la jungle africaine – un habitat bien plus approprié pour un prédateur qui a tendance à passer toute sa vie inaperçu (tel un fantôme), et dispose donc d'une cape d'invisibilité pour se fondre (voire disparaître) dans l'épais sous-bois – ; quoique cela ne se réalisera pas sans difficultés ni oppositions, car il faudra l'accomplir avec soin et sans nuire à la faune locale (principalement les gorilles et les léopards).

What seemingly insignificant historical fact or tidbit is not well-known enough in your opinion?

Richmond Apore B.S in Biological Science & History, The University of Connecticut (Graduated 2020) Updated Sep 11

We all know who these people below are…Barack Obama Snr and Ann Dunham. Parents of 44th President of the US, Barack Hussein Obama II.

Yet not many (well, except of course the African history aficionados) know who this smiling gentleman below is. This is Tom Mboya, an independence leader of the East African nation of Kenya, who along with soon-to-be President John F. Kennedy, are the reason why President Obama was born in the first place.

As the story goes, Obama II's parents met as students at the University of Hawaii, later got married and Barack Hussein Obama II, the future 44th president of the US was born there in Hawaii by 1961.

But it's more consequential than that, and in my opinion, the full story needs to be talked about more often because it shows and embodies what America is at it's best. What makes America truly great!

You see, President Obama's father, Barack Obama Snr, was a bright but poor man in Kenya, then still a British colony. Born into a polygamous Luo family, Obama Snr was a very astute student but the financial difficulties of his family threatened to squander that promise. But as fate would have it, just around the time he completed his secondary school education/high school and was dabbling in experimental farming. Across the world, another Luo man, Tom Mboya was laying the groundworks to change not only the former's life, but unawares to him, US history as well.

Tom Mboya, the Ruskin College, Oxford graduate who as well as being the leading African trade unionist of his time, was also a devoted Pan Africanist knees deep in the Kenyan independence struggle to kick out the British from East Africa. By 1959, even a stray bulldog on the streets of London, knew it was not a question of IF but WHEN the British left Kenya. In 1957, the British captured the elusive leader of the Mau Mau, Dedan Kimathi but even that didn't quell the unrest and agitation for independence by Kenyans. Mboya being the forward thinking politician he is, realized that once the British left, there wouldn't be a well educated civil service and educated brass (doctors, lawyers, professors etc.) to ran the government and society effectively.

As such, through-out 1959, Mboya made several travels to various states and provinces in the US and Canada to advocate for funds to "airlift" bright African students to the North America for a world-class Western education for them to then return home and serve their respective governments and people. At the close of the year, Mboya succeeded in acquiring enough scholarships for 81 Kenyans to be airlifted to the US for university and post-doc studies, the financial support came mainly from wealthy Black American business men and icons like Jackie Robinson, Sidney Poiter, Harry Belafonte and also well meaning White Americans especially William Scheinman, who gave his personal jet to facilitate Mboya's movements across the country.

(Eighty-one students arrive in New York in 1959, after the first flight to bring East Africans to study in the United States)

By the start of 1960, it became clear to Mboya that despite the great contributions received the year before, more financial assistance would be needed not only to continue the “airlift” program but to send over more brilliant yet needy students from other East African countries. So just as he did a year before, Mboya spent 1960 touring and pitching his idea for support but this time with the US government as his top target. Mboya initially approached (via Jackie Robinson) then Vice President Richard Nixon who more or less, rebuffed his request, leaving it to rot in the bureaucracy of the State Department. But in one of these travels across the US, he met a certain John F. Kennedy, then Junior Senator from Massachusetts, who also happened to be actively campaigning for the office of President of the US. Kennedy not yet in office, couldn’t do much to help speed the request through the State Department but personally donated $5000 to the airlift program under the condition his donation be made secret. Kennedy then had the Kennedy Family Foundation donate the entire $100,000 needed to get the airlift program off the ground for the 1960 school year as well as an additional $100,000 to have the living expenses of the African students in the US catered for. Again, the only condition being that all of this not being made public.

(Democratic presidential candidate John F. Kennedy meets with Tom Mboya, right, at Hyannisport in July 1960)

Eventually word did leak of Kennedy's contribution to the airlift program. Public support soared for Kennedy when the news broke, causing Nixon, who was running against Kennedy in that year's election- to switch course and have the State Department quickly process Mboya's request for $100,000 grant to the airlift program. On the senate floor, Kennedy was attacked by his Republican colleagues for using the airlift program for political expediency, a criticism Kennedy vehemently denied, one which even Nixon chose not to pounce on. The story of Kennedy's involvement with Mboya's airlift greatly boasted his stock among the Black community, leading to him wining 68% of the Black vote in the very narrow 1960 election against Nixon.

With funds guaranteed for the 1960 school year, back home in Kenya, Mboya chanced upon on a great article on irrigation farming by a young man by name of Barack Obama Snr. Mboya had Obama Snr, added to the 1960 cohort of financial beneficiaries of the airlift program- funds that made it possible for Obama Snr to attend the University of Hawaii to study economics, even topping his graduating class as the top student. And of course meeting Ann Dunham in an introduction to Russian language class, leading later to the birth of Barack Obama II, future 44th President of the US.

Simply put, this one program- the African Student's Airlift helped JFK albeit modestly with his victory in the 1960 election and also paved the road for the birth of another future president, Barack Obama II.

Without John F. Kennedy and Tom Mboya there would be no Barack Obama. And the relationship between Tom Mboya and JFK might have even helped the latter win the presidency in 1960 over Nixon. What strikes me most about this story is not the series of kismet-like serendipity which led to the birth of Obama, with him then later becoming US President. But rather the tireless altruistic work of men like Tom Mboya, JFK, Jackie Robinson and William Scheinman working together regardless of race, class, nationality or personal interests but for the greater good. Together these men (and no doubt, the nameless women who worked behind the shadows) did more to prepare Kenya for self governance than the British did in their near 50 year direct rule and exploitation of the land and peoples there.

(Obama Snr and Obama II in 1970, the first time both saw each in almost a decade, and also the last time they will see each other).

Update/Edit 1- 1K upvotes...Wow! I am truly blown away! Of all my answers here on Quora this was the one I particularly enjoyed writing so it makes it mean that much more. A very heartfelt thank you to you all!

Update 2- Since a couple of folks were asking- Tom Mboya was unfortunately assassinated in June 1969, while chatting with a friend in front of a Nairobi Pharmacy. Which friend? None other than Barack Obama Snr. As for Obama Snr, after his divorce from Ann Durham, he moved to Boston to complete a PhD at Harvard. But was forced to leave the US after two years (with an MA). The reason behind his expulsion was always wrapped in mystery. Until, per recently declassified memos from the Department of Homeland Security, Harvard was pressured to release Obama Snr from his program due to personal reasons (his relationship with various white women and complaints by their parents).

Related Links

What are some disturbing ancient historical facts?

What is a historical fact that confuses your perception of time?

What are the most fascinating "weird but true" historical facts you know about?

What is a 100% historical fact that will leave you baffled?

What weird historical fact has always baffled and amazed you?

What is the coolest obscure historical fact you know?

What historical facts sound fake but aren't?

What historical fact blows your mind?

What is the most memorable or chilling historical fact for you?

What are some generally accepted historical "facts" that aren't true?

What's the weirdest or most obscure historical fact you know?

What is a surprising historical fact that you recently learned?

What's a historical or political fact that would surprise a lot of people?

What are some very interesting historical facts that many people might not know about?

What are some fun and totally useless historical facts?

Wake Up Africa!
Meet Kenyan born Professor Patricia Kingori....the first black woman ever to become a full professor in Oxford's 925 years of history.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong We celebrate #BlackExcellence

AFRO-CHINA
Do Chinese people like black people?
Kexin Su Follow I teach Chinese to foreigners (汉语老师). Tue

We, in general, welcome foreigners. We welcome all types of foreigners who come to China legally.

During my university times, I had many friends of color. We had a good time learning from each other. Some of them are still in China for full time jobs.

I have had the opportunity to teach Chinese language to quite a few friends of color. They were just like any other students. Pretty normal.

The fact is, there are thousands of foreigners who come to China for work, study, and travel.

The Chinese immigration system doesn’t give any special preference based on race. As long as you satisfy the visa requirements, you will be given a visa to come China for short/long term.

Chinese people are warm-hearted.

You might find some exceptions, but then exceptions are virtually everywhere.

Additional readings in the comments/profile. Follow Kexin Su

Related Links

Why is open racism against blacks so acceptable in China?

Should a black person travel to China? The 'Atlanta Black Star' describes China as one of the eight worst countries for black people to visit. Is this true, or is the 'Atlanta Black Star' biased?

I noticed a very racist Chinese TV ad where a pretty Chinese woman "washes" a black man to make him acceptable. Should black visitors avoid China?

I've been studying Chinese for the last several years. It's become very apparent that the Chinese are legitimately scared of Black people. I've heard theories to explain this phenomenon, but I'm wondering, are there are real reasons as to why?

Do Black people get discriminated in China? Is it worse than that in the US?

What is it like to be Black in China?

Were Chinese people originally black?

What do you think of Chinese people?

What picture represents the Chinese people?

What do Africans think of the Chinese?

During the 15th Century "Age of Discovery," how did indigenous African bread-making differ from European bread-making?

Kevin Richardson Follow PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Mon

I remember Thao Dao asked this gripping question about bread two years ago. I found the question impressive enough to do some research but never wrote anything up.

So, here goes! The question is how did African bread-making differ from European bread-making during the 15th century "Age of Discovery".

As best as I can tell, there actually wasn't a bread-making tradition on the continent, aside from North Africa and Ethiopia.

Rather, it seems that societies along the West African coast and Atlantic Central Africa (that is, the coastal societies that Portuguese explorers would have encountered) relied on cereal porridge as a staple meal. That is, staple cereals like rice, millet, sorghum, or fonio would be boiled into a thick, oatmeal-like porridge:

Both Randi Haaland[1] and James D. La Fleur[2] note that these porridges existed alongside and were connected with beer. James D. La Fleur explicitly mentions that these porridges could ferment and turn into a sour bread-like dough. It's not too much of a stretch to see where slight variation in this fermenting process could produce a simple beer.

Now, there's something that can be said about bread-making in Africa during the Age of Discovery. James D. La Fleur's book Fusion Foodways of Africa's Gold Coast in the Atlantic Era examines records of Portuguese fortresses along the Gold Coast in the 16th century. He notes that West African cereals like millet or fonio don't produce enough gluten to yield soft, chewy bread.

So, he finds that the Portuguese imported European wheat to their Gold Coast fortresses, and baked wheat bread on-site. James D. La Fleur finds evidence that less-desirable bread would have been made by mixing wheat with local cereals. He speculates that the all-wheat bread would have been earmarked for important officers in the fort. In contrast, the lower-quality mixed bread would have gone to lower-status Portuguese or Eurafrican individuals in the fort.

This likely gets into more biology or cooking-related history, but do you have any idea why bread wouldn't have been a big thing? Is it because the cereals are just a different kind that's not as effective, or perhaps just 'better' for porridge?

All I know is the explanation given by James D. La Fleur, which is that Sorghum, Millet, fonio don't have gluten in the same amount as wheat does. Gluten is an important protein in that it holds the air bubbles produced by fermenting yeast, allowing bread to rise.

Certain grains, such as wheat and rye, contain gluten.

The implication is that those grains would only really be able to produce unleavened bread.

There is some circumstantial evidence for this, because Tadeusz Lewicki mentions an observation of the German explorer Gustav Nachtigal.

In another place, Nachtigal describes the sour pancakes which the people of Bornu ate, made of the flour of the dukhn millet (Pennisetum typhoideum), with a herb sauce and garnished with beef or lamb. Were these not exactly the pancakes that al- Omari mentions when he speaks of dough made of "washed" fonio? But this may also be dough of the tuwo type which Barth tasted at Tessawa, which is made of flour mixed with hot water, honey and milk, as seen also by Nachtigal in Bornu, where this sort of dough was called tigra.

We are serendipitous that Lewicki mentions al-Omari, an Egyptian author writing in the 1300s. His mention of pancakes would indicate that this food technique existed in the region before European contact.

However, the location is challenging, because Kanem–Bornu Empire is along the shore of Lake Chad in what is now northern Nigeria. So, while there were “pancakes” during the Age of Discovery, I can’t attest to them existing on the coast in areas with contact with Europeans. Also, Lewicki mentions these pancakes in the same breath as porridge, so it appears that porridge was a widespread staple, and pancakes were an addition, not a replacement. Finally, for anyone reading this, Fufu is a starchy ball.

IMO, it looks similar too, and has a texture kind of like a pork bun without the filling.

So yea, Fufu could be considered another bread-like dish that was part of the culinary tradition of 15th century West Africa, Central Africa, Southern Africa and East Africa.

Sources: "Porridge and Pot, Bread and Oven" by Randi Haaland. Cambridge Archaeological Journal/Volume 17/Issue 02/June 2007, pp 165-182

Fusion Foodways of Africa's Gold Coast in the Atlantic Era by J.D. LaFleur. 2012, Brill.

See also: West African Food in the Middle Ages: According to Arabic Sources by Tadeusz Lewicki. 1974 (2008) Cambridge University Press.

Footnotes

[1] https://www.researchgate.net/publication/231871700_Porridge_and_Pot_Bread_and_Oven_Food_Ways_and_Symbolism_in_Africa_and_the_Near_East_from_the_Neolithic_to_the_Present
[2] Fusion Foodways of Africa's Gold Coast in the Atlantic Era

Related Links

Why have humans been making bread for thousands of years if it isn't healthy?

How were foods like bread, meat, etc., stored in the Middle Ages?

History of Food: Who invented bread? What conditions surrounded the tribe of people who first invented bread?

How did people get bread to rise earlier in history, when all they had was whole grain flour?

What are the differences between French bread and Italian bread?

When making bread what difference does using all purpose, bread flour or artisan flour make on the bread?

Did bread used to mean meat?

Why are most Western cuisines (Europeans and Americans) made from flour unlike Africans that have diverse cuisine? Don't they get fed up of eating flour made meals often?

What were the ingredients to make a bread in the Middle Ages and how was bread made in the Middle Ages?

Why was bread a staple, historically?

How did the world end up having breads in different shapes and textures, from the European bread rolls and baguette, to the Jewish bagel, to various flatbreads across the Eurasian continent, to the Chinese mantou?

Why is brown bread considered healthier than white bread?

When did primitive people learn how to make bread? Do we have evidence of that?

Is it cheaper to make bread at home rather than buy?

Why did Europe use bread as their main food source while China used rice?

TOP-10 Alcohol-drinking Countries in Africa

Aniekpeno Ekong Follow News Nigeria for all the latest news in Nigeria 45m

Alcohol consumption in Africa is high, but among the 54 nations; here are the 10 biggest alcohol-drinking countries per person aged 15 and above per annum.

10. Tanzania — 7,7 liters per year (population is 52 millions)

In Tanzania, 11% of alcohol consumption comes from beer, and only 0.2% comes from wine. Spirits accounts for 1.8% and 87% of alcohol consumption is from other types of alcohol. Tanzanians are known to make moonshine — and very traditional type of alcoholic drink. Virtually half the population live below US$1 (about N$15) per day and and the homebrews are much cheaper than formal alcohol

9. Botswana — 7,96 liters per year (population is just over 2 millions)

Among the alcohol consumption in Botswana, 42% is from the 'other' category. But its beer consumption is even higher, making up 57% of the total. This may be due to the high consumption of Botswana’s national beer, St Louis. Many opt for beer imports from nearby South Africa or Namibia instead.

8. Gabon — 9,32 liters per year (population is estimated at 1.5 millions people)

The favored alcoholic drink of choice for Gabonians is clear. While 10% and 22% of alcohol consumption in Gabon comes from wine and spirits respectively, 68% comes from beer. The cheapest and most popular beer in Gabon is Regab, costing from US$0.70 to US$2 (between N$10,62 and N$30,33), and the lack of tax on any alcoholic beverages makes it easy to import from abroad. In-fact Gabon is a dream nation for all alcohol aficionados, because it has the cheapest priced alcoholic beverages in Africa and only second to the Russian Federation in the world

7. South Africa — 9,46 liters per year (population is 56 millions)

Alcohol is a lot more expensive than in Gabon, In such a big country, it’s no surprise there’s a wider break-up of preferred beverage choice: 56% of consumption comes from beer, which is no surprise because people are little more economically sound, while 17%, 16% and 11% come from wine, spirits, and 'other' respectively. The most popular beer brands are Castle and Black Label, but the country’s extensive wine vineyards, particularly in Stellenbosch and the Western Cape, produce some of the world’s most popular wines as well.

6. Burundi — 9,47 liters per year (population is 12 millions)

Narrowly beating out South Africa, drinkers in Burundi overwhelmingly prefer 'other' drinks, which make up 81% of consumption. Beer, by comparison, makes up 19% of alcohol consumption and wine and spirits barely make a showing. The most famous drink in the Burundi is urwarwa or banana wine, produced in the traditional method and consumed most often during festivals and special occasions. Alcohol drinking in Burundi is almost like a tradition.

5. Namibia — 9,62 litres per year (population is around 2 millions)

Like its South African neighbour, Namibia has a wide breakdown of favourite drinks, but beer carries the most weight with 67% of alcohol consumption. Spirits make up 20%, wine makes up 7% and 'other' chips in at 6%. The country’s flagship beer, Windhoek Lager, is popular across the country and surrounding region.

4. Rwanda — 9,10 litres per year (population is 12 millions)

Just 8% of alcohol consumption comes from beer in Rwanda, despite the popular Turbo King, Primus and Amstel brands being widely available. The other 92% is largely from homemade drinks such as the banana beer, urgwagwa, and the fermented honey drink, ubuki. Ikigage, made from dry sorghum, is also common in Rwanda.

3. Kenya — 9,72 liters per year (population is around 50 millions)

While just 43% of Kenya's alcohol consumption comes from beer, some of the popular beer brands in Kenya includes Tusker Lager and Tusker Premium Lager. Alcohol consumption in Kenya became so rampant that the government took steps to cub the rate. Also, in Kenyan women are not left out in alcohol consumption unlike in most countries on this list, especially Nigeria. Kenyan women drink as much alcohol as men.

2. Uganda — 11,93 liters per year (population is 38 millions)

Ahead of the pack by a long shot is Uganda with 11,93 litres of alcohol consumed each year. Just 4% of consumption comes from beer and 2% from wine, with the 'other' category a resounding winner at 94% of consumption. The generic term for domestically distilled beverages in Uganda is the famous Ugandan Waragi, which contains around 42% of alcohol making it one of the most alcoholic spirits in the world. This can cover a wide variety of drinks: pombe and lubisi, or locally made banana or millet beer, tonto, a traditionally fermented drink made from bananas, banana wine, and many more.

1. Nigeria — 12,28 liters per year (200 millions)

Number one in Africa for alcohol consumption by the virtue of population which technically results in higher volume and liters consumed per year. Beer makes up just 16% of alcohol consumption in Nigeria, while 'other' drinks make up 84% due to the high popularity of home-brewed beverages. Religious lawmakers are making it more difficult and expensive to produce and sell alcohol in the country. Known as Nigeria's home brew, ogogoro is an extremely alcoholic drink. It has 30 to 60% ethyl alcohol content, depending on how it's made, and is produced from the juice of raffia palm trees. Some Nigerians also enjoy the famous palm wine, especially in the east of the country.

AG

Is Nairobi, Kenya a very safe city or is it full of crimes and not secure at all?

Jon Bohmer Lived in Nairobi, Kenya (2008–2015) 6y

Originally Answered: Is Nairobi Kenya a very safe city or its full of crimes & not secure at all?

I have been in and out of Nairobi for 20 years and living here for the last 8. I have never been subject to any crime or seen anything serious. Kenya is a peace-loving country - particularly when you compare to what has happened in our neighbours Somalia, South Sudan, Uganda, Rwanda and Congo it is a beacon of peace. Of course, you need to avoid certain areas where you are sticking out like a sore thumb - but that is quite obvious.

Kenya is certainly notorious when it comes to corruption, and you will be targeted by road police for any minor issue since they have their weekly quotas to meet. This is called "chai" (tea) which is smaller amounts you'll have to pay in the $5-20 range. That's just a cost of doing business in Kenya. I can wholeheartedly recommend Nairobi as a bustling center of commerce for East Africa, a region with almost 200 million people. Kenya has some of the nicest people in the world. Compare violent crimes with countries like South Africa and you'll see what I mean.

Related Links
What are some disadvantages of living in Kenya (Nairobi)?
Is it fairly safe to travel around Nairobi, Kenya? Are there any precautions I should take?
Is it safe to work and stay with family in Nairobi, Kenya?
What is the average living cost in Nairobi, Kenya?
What is it like to live in Nairobi, Kenya?
What are the good and bad neighborhoods of Nairobi, Kenya?
What is the most dangerous neighborhood in Nairobi, Kenya?
What is in Nairobi that’s not in any other city in Africa?
Where is the safest place to stay in Nairobi?
Why is Nairobi always ranked among the best, most developed cities in Africa?
How is life in Nairobi?
What is the worst thing about the city of Nairobi Kenya?
Why is Nairobi the capital of Kenya?
Where's the place with the best view in the city of Nairobi, Kenya?
Is Lower Kabete a good neighbourhood to stay in Nairobi?

Meet Sabina Chebichi. Born on 13/5/1959, she won her first marathon in 1973 while barefoot and wearing nothing but a petticoat. Sabina went on to become the first Kenyan female athlete to win a medal at the Commonwealth Games in 1974.

Aniekpeno Ekong Follow News Nigeria for all the latest news in Nigeria 6h

Quelle est l'origine de votre nom de famille ?

Paulo Stage Suivre Anciennement Retraité 20 déc.

Portant le même nom qu'un village du Kenya peuplé par des Kikuyus, j'en déduis, même si c'est improbable, que l'un de mes ancêtres fut un Kikuyu qui provenait de ce village. Suivre Paulo Stage

Questions similaires

Quand ont été créés les noms de familles ?
D'où viennent nos noms de famille ?
Quel nom de famille crie "je suis français" ?
À quel point votre nom de famille est-il répandu ?
Pourquoi les gens peuvent-ils avoir le même nom de famille sans être apparentés ?
Quelle est la signification de votre nom de famille, et quelles sont ses origines ?
Quel est le nom de famille le moins commun en France ?
À quelle langue appartient votre nom de famille ?
Quels sont les noms de famille les plus courantes en France ?

Quelle est l'origine de votre nom de famille ?

Paulo Stage Suivre Paulo Stage Anciennement Retraité 20 déc.

Portant le même nom qu'un village du Kenya peuplé par des Kikuyus, j'en déduis, même si c'est improbable, que l'un de mes ancêtres fut un Kikuyu qui provenait de ce village.

Questions similaires

Quand ont été créés les noms de familles ?
D'où viennent nos noms de famille ?
Quel nom de famille crie "je suis français" ?
À quel point votre nom de famille est-il répandu ?
Pourquoi les gens peuvent-ils avoir le même nom de famille sans être apparentés ?
Quelle est la signification de votre nom de famille, et quelles sont ses origines ?
Quel est le nom de famille le moins commun en France ?
À quelle langue appartient votre nom de famille ?
Quels sont les noms de famille les plus courantes en France ?
D'où viennent ces noms de familles durs à porter, tel que 'Lamouille, Vachier ou Boudin'

News Nigeria
NIGERIAN PRESIDENT HAILS UN DEPUTY SECRETARY GENERAL, AMINA MOHAMMED ON REAPPOINTMENT

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 15h

President Muhammadu Buhari warmly felicitates with UN Deputy Secretary General, Amina Mohammed, on her re-appointment for a second term, assuring of the prayers and support of Nigerians, especially the Federal Executive Council, where she served for some years.
The President sends deepest appreciation to the UN Secretary-General, Antonio Guterres, for the confidence reposed on the former Minister of the Environment, giving her another opportunity to serve the global body and humanity, which further enhances the voice and presence of Nigeria.

President Buhari notes that Mohammed's dedication to duty has always been exceptional, and her interest in improving the livelihood of people, through personal and institutional efforts, continues to stand her out, affirming that the UN Deputy Secretary General remains an inspiration to many women in Nigeria, Africa and the global community.

The President joins family, friends and associates of the renowned technocrat and diplomat in celebrating the well-deserved re-appointment, wishing her all the best on the next rung of the leadership ladder.

Femi Adesina, Special Adviser to the President
(Media & Publicity) January 11, 2022

What do regular Kenyans think about White Kenyans?

Charles Muthama Lives in Nairobi, Kenya (2003–present) 8mo

They have money, that more money than average Kenyans, this is supported by the fact that they live in affluent neighborhoods like Karen, Kileleshwa and Nanyuki. They are also never seen in public transport..matatus, rather they are always seen driving.
They are favored in jobs as most are employed in big companies at managerial level or work in family businesses.

They privileged in most things like schools, job opportunities due to family ties and influence.

They live a higher standard of life unlike most Kenyans.

They are viewed to have alternative citizenship in UK or their Country of origin mani lay because they don't participate with other Kenyans in things like protests, politics etc.

Some people will view them as racists mainly due to the fact that they don't mix much with ordinarily Kenyans and that they are almost always bosses to Kenyans working under them. But this is not a view that encompasses all. Some white Kenyans mix very well with local Kenyans.

Related Links

What do Kenyans think about Indians?
How do Ethiopians view Kenyans?
What screams "I'm Kenyan"?
How do Tanzanians view Kenyans?
Are there still white people in Kenya?
What do you hate about Kenyans?
What do Kenyan/Tanzanians think of Nigerians?
Why are most Kenyans and Tanzanians lightskin?
Why are you proud to be a kenyan?

Why are there so many rifts between the Kenyans and Indians of many generations there?

Why is Kenya more famous than most other African countries?

William Chesoni Lives in Kenya 5y

This is an interesting question, I've also found myself wondering why Kenya is so well known compared to most other African countries, so I did a bit of digging, and here's what I found:

History

It is considered the cradle of mankind:

Kenya has the largest number of fossil human remains appr. 1000 individuals than any other country in Africa.

Kenya has the oldest human remains going back to 7 million year old from Turgen Hills, Baringo (oldest in Ethiopia = 4.5 million years ; S.Africa ca 3 million years, Tanzania = 2 million years.

Kenya has some of the most complete skeletons e.g Turkana Boy (1.6 Million years), which provided a great wealth of information regarding early human physiology than anywhere in the world.

Kenya is endowed with many prehistory sites scattered all along the Rift Valley (north to south) and western Kenya.

Kenya has the longest and most complete record of human evolution (and possibly the link between humans and apes).

In addition to the fossil record, there is a long record of technological evolution (with tools as old as 2.3 million years).

There is a wide genetic representation among some of its people (Turkana) pointing to the fact that humans have been here for a very long time.

Read more Facts about Kenya as the cradle of mankind at: CRADLE OF MANKIND

Nature.

2. We have amazing wildlife. Kenya is home to the Big 5; Lions, Elephants, Buffalo, Rhinos and Leopards. There is an abundance of diverse wildlife in Kenya. We have Oryx, Antelopes, Giraffes, Impalas, Hippo, White Rhinos, Zebras, Crocodiles, Cheetahs, and many others.

3. The great wildebeest migration takes place in Kenya – Tanzania. Considered as one of the most breathtaking natural events in the world, the concentration of wildebeest is spectacular; sometime the herd is comprised of over a million at the height of the migration. The migration is between, the Serengeti in Tanzania and the Maasai Mara National Reserve in Kenya

4. The rift valley (which is the longest -6,300 km- and deepest geographical fault of its kind on earth) cuts across 11 countries, one of which -you guessed it- is Kenya. According to astronauts who have observed the earth from space, the rift valley is the most visible geographical fault on the face of the planet.

5. Kenya is a great tourist destination, thanks to the weather. Kenya is located in the tropics so it’s mostly sunny (at times uncomfortably so for us locals). Some come to see the wildlife, see the sights and experience the culture.

People

6. Kenya is also renowned for our great runners. Some of the world's greatest marathoners are Kenyans. Just look at this:

7. Our people. Kenyans on Twitter - KOT, some corrupt officials*, and our celebrities (Lupita Ny'ongo, footballer Victor Wanyama *Tottenham Hotspurs, Eddie Gathegi *from the Blacklist) put Kenya on the map.

8. The US. President Barrack Obama can trace his roots back to Kenya. His father, Barack Hussein Obama Sr. was a Kenyan.

Other

9. Queen Elizabeth ascended to the throne while in Kenya. On 6th February 1952 King George VI died while Princess Elizabeth and Prince Philip were in Kenya at the Treetops hotel. Upon the death of King George, Princess Elizabeth became the queen and leader of the commonwealth.

10. Kenya is among the top 10 richest countries in Africa.

11. Despite this, Kenya is also home to the largest urban slum in Africa, Kibera. Because of this, foreign organizations and famous people want to help as it is good PR for them and when ever they do help out, they let as many people know about their good work.

12. Terror attacks. Kenya has in recent times been plagued by a string of terrorist attacks; most infamously the Westgate Terrorist attack and the Garrissa University attack which have caught the attention of the world.

13. It is the brith place of the BRCK. You can read more on this here.

14. And last but certainly not least, M-Pesa. M-Pesa is a mobile money transfer system developed in Kenya. The system has revolutionized the Kenyan economy, people's lives, businesses and most recently attracted the attention of Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg. Here is a link: Mark Zuckerberg

I'm sure there are many more reasons I haven't mentioned, but as you can see/read Kenya ain't half bad and should do yourself a favour and pay us a visit (that is, if you aren't here already :)

Ziaddinè Chahoudi studied at Shia Islam Answered Aug 30, 2018 · Upvoted by Dennis Bett lives in Kenya (1997-present)

Wrong. Kenya isn't more famous than any other African countries.
It is surely more popular than many African nations, but its popularity has not matched with:

Egypt
South Africa
Morocco

All these countries are surely more popular than Kenya.

But, okay, why Kenya is one of Africa's most popular countries?

It is resembling to East African countries, and the land where Zheng He, Chinese naval traveler, brought goods from there to China. It has historical root.

It is extremely wild and wonderful. Kenya is wild nature's wonder of Africa.

It is one of the most stable African countries, with longer history of development and it helps the country to avoid being unstable. For sure, Somalia is very poor, but Kenya is okay.

It is more innovative and technologically advanced than other African countries. This gives them chance to develop and to move towards.

Beautiful landscapes and attractive for tourism.
Saying Kenya is the more famous is wrong. But Kenya is very popular and this is due to these reasons.

Related Links

Which city is more developed, Nairobi or Lagos?

What do other African countries think of Kenya?

Why is Nairobi always ranked among the best, most developed cities in Africa?

Are East African countries more developed than West African countries?

Why is it that Kenya and Uganda can get along easily, but they both can't get along well with Tanzania?

Which country is the most developed, Rwanda, Kenya, Nigeria, or Angola?

Why do East African countries' citizens: Tanzania, Uganda Somalia & Rwanda hate on Kenyans?

What do people in the US think about Kenya?
How is Kenya perceived internationally?
What's the most westernised African country?
Which city is better, Nairobi or Dar es Salaam?
What African country is the most successful today?

Is it true that there are cities in Africa that are just as modern and developed as any American city?

Is Kenya a good country?
What makes Kenya's success so unique among African countries?

Travel the World!
What are the most surreal places to visit?

· Follow Answered by Lisa Vlad Sun

Migingo is a 2,000-square-metre (0.49-acre; 0.20-hectare) island in Kenya on Lake Victoria. With a population of about 131 (according to the 2009 census), it has a density of more than 65,500 people per square kilometer which makes it one of the most densely populated islands in Africa and the world.

Related Links

What cities are the most bike-friendly?
When planning a vacation, how do you plan out itineraries?

Which airlines offer the best overall comfort, and which ones offer the least comfort as well?

How can I stay updated on cheap flight fares?
What are the must-to-do things in Algeria?
What is your advice for starting a travel website/blog?
What is your experience as a student living and studying abroad?

What was the most enjoyable adventure you have ever had? What made it so unique and memorable?

What are some inexpensive but amazing hotels?

How is the standard of living in Greece? Is it an economic viable destination for foreigners?

Do you like to travel solo?
Which is the most awesome city you have visited and why?
What makes Buenos Aires a special place to live?
Have you ever moved to a different country to be able to afford a better lifestyle?

Travel the World!
What are the most surreal places to visit?

Lisa Vlad · Follow Answered by

Migingo is a 2,000-square-metre (0.49-acre; 0.20-hectare) island in Kenya on Lake Victoria. With a population of about 131 (according to the 2009 census), it has a density of more than 65,500 people per square kilometer which makes it one of the most densely populated islands in Africa and the world.

Related Links

What cities are the most bike-friendly?
When planning a vacation, how do you plan out itineraries?

Which airlines offer the best overall comfort, and which ones offer the least comfort as well?

How can I stay updated on cheap flight fares?
What are the must-to-do things in Algeria?
What is your advice for starting a travel website/blog?
What is your experience as a student living and studying abroad?

What was the most enjoyable adventure you have ever had? What made it so unique and memorable?

What are some inexpensive but amazing hotels?

How is the standard of living in Greece? Is it an economic viable destination for foreigners?

Do you like to travel solo?
Which is the most awesome city you have visited and why?
What makes Buenos Aires a special place to live?

Have you ever moved to a different country to be able to afford a better lifestyle?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD -Rare event as elephant begets twin calves.

Posted by Jo Mburu · Follow Jan 20 Am from Africa (Kenya) a christian, single and a child of God. Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

An elephant has given birth to twin calves (boy and girl) at the Samburu National Reserve, (Kenya) an occurrence that last happened in 2006 but the calves did not survive.

This Endangered Croc Is Piggybacking 100 Babies After Mating With '7 or 8 Females.

Jo Mburu Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. 15h

The croc holds up as more than 100 of his month-old kids scramble onto his back for safe section .

Photo by Dhritiman Mukherjee.

Jo Mburu Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. 15h

These guys have got the best manes in the Lion kingdom .
Bet they look this good every morning!

Now 12 years old.

Photo by giles.laurent

Jo Mburu Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. 15h

Do you think I'm cute. ? 😂😂

Photo by YS wildlife photography

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Kenya Is Having an Elephant Baby Boom With Its Population More Than Doubling

Posted by Kathy Pennell · Follow Sun

One National Park in Kenya is celebrating a recent elephant 'baby boom'. Nestled in the shadow of Mount Kilimanjaro, Amboseli National Park has seen an unusually high number of elephant calve births in the last few months. This is great news, as the country continues to strengthen its anti-poaching legislation and take care to ensure that its elephants are safe. Over the past 30 years, Kenya's elephant population has flourished.

In fact, it's more than doubled from 16,000 elephants in 1989 to 34,800 elephants in 2019. Those numbers will continue to rise thanks to an increase in births. The Amboseli Trust For Elephants, a non-profit which fights for the conservation and long-term welfare of elephants, states that over 170 calves have been birthed at the park this year. And there were even a set of twins, a rare occurrence. As elephants have a gestational period of two years, for growth comparison it's best to look back at 2018.

That year, 113 calves were born, making this year's numbers extraordinary. So what's the cause of this baby boom? The biggest factor is the environment. Over the past two years, record rains have put an end to the drought that had made life difficult for these incredible animals. Though these rains have also caused flooding and people have lost their lives, the much-needed water has regenerated vegetation.

This means that fewer elephants have perished due to starvation and dehydration. In 2019, adjustments were made to Kenya's wildlife laws that included stiffer fines and more prison time for poachers. As a result, the number of poached elephants has dropped from 80 in 2018 to 34 in 2019. And right now, in 2020, that number has dwindled to seven.

Kenya Is Having an Elephant Baby Boom With Its Population More Than Doubling

One National Park in Kenya is celebrating a recent elephant 'baby boom'. Nestled in the shadow of Mount Kilimanjaro, Amboseli National Park has seen an unusually high number of elephant calve births in the last few months.

We recently had some good news about tigers thriving in India and now we can look to Africa for another animal comeback. Reports out of Kenya's Amboseli National Park state that there's currently an elephant baby boom underway. This is great news, as the country continues to strengthen its anti-poaching legislation and take care to ensure that its elephants are safe.

Over the past 30 years, Kenya's elephant population has flourished. In fact, it's more than doubled from 16,000 elephants in 1989 to 34,800 elephants in 2019. Those numbers will continue to rise thanks to an increase in births. The Amboseli Trust For Elephants, a non-profit which fights for the conservation and long-term welfare of elephants, states that over 170 calves have been birthed at the park this year. And there were even a set of twins, a rare occurrence.

As elephants have a gestational period of two years, for growth comparison it's best to look back at 2018. That year, 113 calves were born, making this year's numbers extraordinary. So what's the cause of this baby boom? The biggest factor is the environment. Over the past two years, record rains have put an end to the drought that had made life difficult for these incredible animals. Though these rains have also caused flooding and people have lost their lives, the much-needed water has regenerated vegetation. This means that fewer elephants have perished due to starvation and dehydration.

But it's not just the weather that's creating a better environment for the elephants. The Kenyan government has also made a concerted effort to crack down on poaching. "In the last couple of years we have managed to tame poaching in this country," Cabinet Secretary for Tourism and Wildlife Najib Balala told reporters during a World Elephant Day event at the park.

But it's not just the weather that's creating a better environment for the elephants. The Kenyan government has also made a concerted effort to crack down on poaching. "In the last couple of years we have managed to tame poaching in this country," Cabinet Secretary for Tourism and Wildlife Najib Balala told reporters during a World Elephant Day event at the park

---

But it's not just the weather that's creating a better environment for the elephants. The Kenyan government has also made a concerted effort to crack down on poaching. "In the last couple of years we have managed to tame poaching in this country," Cabinet Secretary for Tourism and Wildlife Najib Balala told reporters during a World Elephant Day event at the park.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Lions kill and eat suspected poacher leave only his head .

Jo Mburu · Follow Posted Jan 15

The incident took place at a private game park in South Africa, a man believed to be a poacher was mauled to death by the pride of lions . Only his head was left behind .

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD ·
Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Feb 4

Kiko's Story

On 19th September 2015, KWS Officer Bernard Rono, who heads the SWT-funded Meru Mobile Veterinary Unit, reported having received a baby male reticulated (also known as Somali giraffe) giraffe estimated to be just one week old.

Kiko had been rescued by KWS rangers on the Meru National Park boundary. The fate of his mother remains a mystery, but the location where he was found happens to be an area bedeviled by human wildlife conflict.

It is especially lovely to see Kiko forge this meaningful friendship considering he was seemingly terrified of his own species as an infant. Little by little, he has grown up and blossomed into a social butterfly who is very comfortable around his own kind.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. Welcome to Preserving our animals in the wild. -Jo Mburu it's founder 7mo

This space is about learning of the animals, in the wild and what they need in their habitat to survive. From someone that has lived their whole life with these animals all around .And is passionate about protecting them. Join me, together we can move the world to preserve animals.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. -Jo Mburu it's founder

Valerie Reid 44, who couldn't handle the thought of old dogs dying alone turns her house into a pet hospice.

Jenna H October 6

Jo, A wonderful intention and mission statement for all! Thank you!

After a successful rehab and forested release, Jumbo was free. I interpreted his unexpected return to sing and raise his future family as a true gift. I share this experience as a thank you to all who support the preservation of our wildlife. We do indeed share the world with sentient, evolved beings. Blessings, J

Whispering Willows Senior Dog Sanctuary in Missouri now cares for 80 pooches at once. What a wonderful woman! Well done Valerie

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Posted by Jo Mburu · Follow Dec 2

The wild African elephant is extremely long-lived, sometimes surviving to 65 to 70 years. They can often die of starvation at this age because by this time all their teeth have worn out. Elephants naturally wear through six sets of teeth in their lifetime.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD -Elephant uses car as a scratching post .

Posted by Jo Mburu · Follow Feb 11 This bull elephant decided to use vehicle`s roof and bonnet to relieve an itch .

The elephant was presumably on musth , which is a time when an elephant male has an excess amount of testosterone turning even the calmest Dumbo into a raging bull .

Luckily in this case , despite the bull being in a bit of a frisky mood , it showed no signs of aggression and seemed to just be using the car as a convenient scratching post .

The two passengers in the car , male and female , both in their late 20 `s were not harmed . The vehicle was a little less lucky , the windows were smashed and the roof was very badly dented , all four tyres were destroyed and the chassis broken .

Images : Greatstock/ Armand Grobler

If antelopes or zebras could coordinate their efforts, could a large group of them take down an adult lion?

Nick Nicholas · Follow Studied Big Cats for 40+ yearsTue

Yes, easily. The problem is that they dont work together. They panic and run. I did see a video of two wildebeest who worked together to see off a group of lions by protecting each others rear. It turned into a stalemate and the lions moved on. Some antelope have fearsome horns and if they did work as a team then they could quite easily kill a lion but they do not. If you are fit and strong you have a good chance of survival and a weaker member of the herd will get eaten. Why take the risk of fighting ?

Related Links

Why don't herds of Wildebeest, Zebra and Impala team up against Lions?
I always see videos of a huge herd running from a few lions. Even if only a few decided to fight, wouldn't the Lions instantly be overwhelmed?

Can a zebra kill a lion if it gets really angry?
When a predator (e.g., a lion) kills a prey (e.g., an antelope), what parts do they eat first?

If zebras are aggressive animals, then why do they sometimes not fend off lion attacks, or are these zebras just juveniles?

How painful is it for an antelope to be killed by a lion, or a pig killed by a tiger?
Can a single lion/lioness take down a healthy adult zebra or buffalo on their own?

If a zebra manages to kick a lion in its face when he was being chased, what is the possibility the zebra's life would be saved that day?

Is it true that a zebra kicks so hard that if it kicks a lion then it could rupture the pancreas and colon of the lion?

Could a very large adult male leopard kill a very small adult female lion?
Which animals would a lion avoid to fight with?
Do zebras and antelopes suffer when they are caught by a lion?

If a lion kills only 20 animals a year, how does the wildlife balance happen?
Who eats all those zebras and wild buffaloes?

How long can 40 Zebras survive with a lion? Will the lion exterminate them or will it help keep the number of zebras down so that they do not reproduce unrestrained?

Why is it okay for a lion to eat a zebra for survival? Does the zebra not get a life?
Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?

Les crocodiles tuent-ils les lions sur terre ?
Do crocodiles kill lions on land?

Les crocodiles du Nil et les lions d'Afrique sont des ennemis jurés en raison de leur régime alimentaire commun, qui entraîne sans aucun doute une concurrence intense entre les deux animaux. Ainsi, lorsqu'ils se rencontrent autour d'une carcasse d'animal le long de la rivière, c'est la guerre totale.

Sur terre, les crocodiles sont moins habiles et léthargiques en raison de leur masse (alors qu'ils sont très rapides dans l'eau), ce qui les rend très vulnérables aux attaques des lions - certains individus, comme ce mâle, ont même été aperçus en train de tuer des crocodiles.

Cependant, à de nombreuses reprises, les dents et les griffes acérées du lion ne parviennent pas à porter un coup fatal à l'épaisse armure du crocodile, ce qui fait que les deux concurrents sont à égalité : le reptile ne peut pas tuer le lion, soit parce qu'il est trop rapide et furtif, soit parce qu'il est supérieur en nombre, et le félin ne peut pas tuer le crocodile car ce dernier est protégé par son exosquelette impénétrable.

Dans l'eau, en revanche, c'est une évidence : adapté à la vie aquatique, le crocodile peut tuer rapidement un lion qui nage.

Related Links

Quels sont les principaux prédateurs du gorille et comment le tuent-ils ?

Si un ligre a été élevé par des lions dans la nature, pourrait-il être un membre prospère d'une troupe de lions ?

Pourquoi les lions tuent-ils les hyènes sans les manger ?
Qui est le plus puissant, un lion ou une lionne ?

Avec qui préféreriez-vous être enfermé dans une pièce pendant 1 heure : un tigre ou un crocodile ?

Les crocodiles sont-ils biologiquement immortels ?
Quel est l'animal le plus dangereux sur Terre ?

Est il vrai que les crocodiles ne sont pas soumis à une sénescence/dégénérescence physique progressive, comme le sont d'autres êtres vivants ?

Un lion nous attaquerait-il si nous ne faisons que passer à côté de lui tranquillement, sans vouloir le tuer ?

Quels sont les animaux les plus inoffensifs et les plus amicaux de la planète ?
Quels sont les faits étonnants sur les lions ?
Un alligator peut-il se reproduire avec un crocodile ?
Quel est l’animal le plus intelligent de notre planète ?

Pourquoi les crocodiles et les alligators ne sont pas considérés comme des lézards ? Ce sont des reptiles et ils se ressemblent, alors quelle est la ou les caractéristiques distinctives ?

Les poulets tuent-ils les serpents ? J'ai entendu dire qu'ils sont excellents pour tenir les serpents à distance?

Quel animal représente le leadership ? What animal represents leadership?

Aurélien Breton MaraîcherTraducteur · 8 mo

Il y en a plusieurs, je n'en citerai que quelques-uns.
Le fier leader.

Le chef de la meute de loups

Le Gorille à dos argenté

L'étalon

Questions similaires

Quel est l'animal le plus impressionnant ?
Quel est l'animal le plus méchant ?
Comment savoir si j'ai les qualités d'un leader ?
Quelle est la qualité de leadership la plus importante ?
Pourquoi le véritable leadership est-il une compétence si rare ?
Comment distinguer l'homme de l'animal ?
Comment puis-je être un bon leader sans être détesté ?
Quels sont les principaux styles de leadership ?
Quel animal est le plus rare au monde ?
Quels sont les éléments principaux du leadership ?
Quel est le dirigeant actuel qui incarne le mieux le leadership selon vous ?
Quel animal détestez-vous le plus ?
Que se passe-t-il sans un bon leadership ?
Quelles sont les qualités d'un bon leader ?
Quel animal vous semble le mieux représenter votre pays ?

News Nigeria
On this day DEDAN KIMATHI, was hanged at dawn at Kamiti , just over 48 hours after his leave of appeal had been rejected by the Privy Council.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Fri

He was executed on a charge of carrying a revolver, which, under the Emergency Regulations, was punishable by death.

The basis of Kimathi's request for leave of appeal at the Privy Council was that he was on his way to surrender, and was not in fact "captured."

He also revealed that he was taking in his arms as was required of those who surrendered. The judges, however, rejected this without hearing his lawyer, describing them as "lies".

Kimathi went calmly to his death and was described by a senior prison official who was present at the execution as a model prisoner. "To the last he was composed and quiet," he said.

At his own request, a Roman Catholic priest spent the whole night with him in his cell.

Although many African leaders were hesistant to condemn the execution out of fear of being labelled Mau Mau sympathisers, anti colonial activists from different parts of the world were quite forthright in their criticism.

"This is a completely barbarous act, of which we should all be deeply ashamed," declared Doris Lessing, the well-known novelist."The procedure leading to the execution," she stated, "shows complete contempt for all forms of British law as we know them here in Britain.

"It shows a complete lack of under standing of the bitterness felt by the African people, who regarded this as a test case as to whether, now the Emergency is at an end, some better mode of government could not be found."

Mr. D. N. Pritt, Queen's Counsel, commenting on the news, said: "The Colonial Government seems determined to believe that it cannot govern except by not giving way on anything, and never showing any humanity at all.

"It is the same Colonial Government, with powers enabling it to condemn men to death on hundreds of different charges, which keeps thousands of Africans interned without trial and on the flimsiest of information."

Mr. Solly Sachs, the prominent South African trade union leader, who was forced to leave South Africa because of his opposition to the racial policy of the Government, declared:

"The execution of Dedan Kimathi will send a wave of horror and indignation throughout the peoples of Africa and Asia, of Europe and America, who are bitterly opposed to the policy of terror and oppression in Kenya and other parts of Africa."

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Mon

There’s a group of elephants in Africa that visits the same series of caves in an extinct volcano rich in salt

Over time they've deepened the caves by continuously chiseling off salt deposits with their tusks. Mining elephants

Source JustinBoldaji بلداجي

Lion Duo Captured On Camera Giggling at Masai Mara National Park, Kenya

Kathy Pennell Author, 12 Young Adult Mysteries, 1 Adult Mystery at Lancaster County, PA (2000–present)13h

What are the first things to come out your mind when thinking of lions? Majestic manes and terrifying roar, for sure. These tawny huge animals are even strict to their cubs. They do not often playfully fight with their offsprings. But everything has exceptions. A dad lion crouches down to meet his baby cub for the first time. A male lion steps back and bends his head as his mate scolds him. These are so strange but real. Luckily, these once-in-a-lifetime scenes are captured and went viral when shared on social media.

The photo below is also a precious moment of these kings of the jungle. The extra is it can spread thousands of hilarious and positive vibes. A pair of male lions strolling at Masai Mara hotographer Rose Fleming took this picture while she was on a game watcher safari in the Olare Motorigi Conservancy, Kenya. The "unusual" behavior of the pair got her astonished for seconds. But she then took out her camera and captured their expressions. It is a freaking awesome experience!

National Park was giggling at a private joke that they shared each other. There is something so funny, and they can't stop bursting out laugh.

When Rose shared this unique photo on her social accounts, it immediately became an Internet sensation. Many people said that they have never seen such behavior from lions before.

As it turns out, majestic animals may have a sense of humor. These giggling lions are an example. If you love the picture, just share this post with your family and friends. Wildlife is amazing!

H/T: Kingdomstv

RECENT POSTS

Do You Know 9 Big Changes In Walt Disney World In February 2022?
Disney World Multi-Day Ticket Prices Have Been Increased Stunning Captain America Cosplays Prove Anyone Can Carry The Shield If They Are Worthy

Majestic manes and terrifying roar come to mind when we think of lions. These tawny huge animals are even strict to their cubs. But everything has exceptions. The photo above is also a precious moment of these kings of the jungle. A pair of male lions strolling at Masai Mara National Park was giggling at a private joke that they shared each other.

They can’t stop bursting out laughing.

A dad lion crouches down to meet his baby cub for the first time. These are so strange but real. They do not often playfully fight with their offsprings. Luckily, these once-in-a-lifetime scenes are captured and went viral when shared on social media.

How long has Kenya been a country?
Morris Kiruga Lives in Kenya 7y

It depends on which date you use as a reference. As Derek Larkin points out in his answer, using 1963 as a reference would suggest 51 years as a country in 2014. There are other factors to consider, such as the demarcation in the 1890s that played around with the borders, and the designation in 1920 as a colony and a protectorate. The latter was the 10-mile coastal strip while the former was the inland Kenya part. Just before 1963, these joined to form the modern republic known as Kenya.

Is Kenya a forgotten country?

I don’t think so;

Kenya is a tourism paradise with white sandy beaches and with wildlife that are an envy to many Countries. She is visited by tourists from all over the World … from the US to Russia and from North Pole to South and with the number of Nations trading with her, your question cud be misplaced.

How could a forgotten Country be leading the World in Athletics? Kenya is widely known for Perishable Exports and we are leading in Tea and Coffe exports Lake Victoria is one of the largest Fresh Water Lakes in the World and you dare ask if Kenya is a forgotten Country?

In the early years, there were visitors from Europe and the East who toured our beautiful Coast for ‘trade’ hides,shells,produce etc if Kenya was a forgotten Country, she wouldn’t be mentioned in history.

If you look at our history, you’ll find people from different lands ‘discovering’ Mountains, rivers, lakes etc and yet these places had indigenous names. I hopes this helps.

Why and how did the British colonize Kenya?

Lord Calmarr, studied Literature , & History Answered Dec 2, 2019

Why? The imperialistic race in Europe to see which nation would amass not only the largest area but also profit from their dominion. In the case of Kenya, half of it (The east) is a plain arid, with little value and the west was a rich and diverse place with pits of gold and in someplace; very much like Britain. However, they took control of Kenya so that they could control the Omani's blooming trade with Persia and India at the coast and from there, exploit the rich interior by constructing a railway that went up to Lake Victoria.
How? Divide and rule; befriending common allied communities and helping them make war on their enemies. Their enemies, who were reasonably stronger would be crushed by the Brits and another reason for divide and rule was to prevent a united front of African nationalists. Kenya fell under British control in 1895 but the wars that would make it a true colony of Great Britain would go all the way to 1920. It took them nearly half a century and an experience in both World Wars for them to take up arms against the invasive government but independence was achieved diplomatically.

What eats a hyena?

Colin Stewart

Hyenas are an apex predator, meaning they are not preyed upon by any other animal. They are ferocious and highly skilled hunters.

Occasionally, another apex predator—such as a lion—will kill them while battling for food.

Once a hyena dies, such as through natural causes, vultures will feed on them—so technically, vultures eat hyenas.

Also note that hyenas are occasionally shot and killed by humans, but of course, don't eat them.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

KENYA-In the past 12 months, Rama has overcome a remarkable set of circumstances.

Kathy Pennell · Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Feb 17

This bow-legged elephant was orphaned in late 2020 and spent weeks alone, fending for himself in the wild. When it became clear no passing herds would take him in, a rescue was organized in January 2021 to bring him to our Nursery where he could find a new family.

From a once terrified, starved young bull hiding among the bush, he is now a plump picture of health who has adjusted well to his new home – and we couldn’t be happier with his progress. Though his back legs remained bowed, Rama enjoys a fantastic quality of life. He can partake in all Nursery activities at his own style and pace and loves to rough-house and wrestle with his friends.

Activities boisterous Rama has been enjoying much more of now that he is one of the bigger Nursery bulls since Mukkoka graduated.

Though Rama's story is far from over, and he has many years ahead in our care.

Source: Wildlife Rescue Africa

Qui a déjà entendu parler de la tribu Massaï en Afrique de l'Est ?

Sylvia · Suivre Créatrice de bijoux-ex comptable14 oct.

Oui ! rencontrés lors d'un fabuleux voyage au Kenya, les "Masai" sont un peuple de guerriers de chasseurs et d'éleveurs semi-nomades, de tailles impressionnantes, on les rencontre également en Tanzanie. C'est un peuple chaleureux, accueillants qui en échange de quelques piécettes vous propose de découvrir leur culture, mais vous permet aussi d'assister à un spectacle de chant et de danse typiques.

Questions similaires

Qui étaient les Berbères, qui vivaient dans le Nord de l'Afrique, bien avant que les arabes arrivent ?

L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait l'Afrique ?

Pourquoi ceux qu’on appelle des Maghrébins s'appellent ainsi tout en sachant qu'ils sont sur le continent africain ?

Pourquoi les Africains subsahariens traitent-ils les Nord-africains comme s'ils n'étaient pas africains ?

Le Franc CFA utilisé en Afrique de l'Ouest et en Afrique centrale est-il une monnaie d’assujettissement des anciennes colonies de la France ?

Pourquoi ne parlons-nous de l’histoire de l’Afrique que rarement ?

Les gens des pays africains qui parlent français détestent-ils la France et la langue française ?

Le découpage arbitraire de l'Afrique en 1885 par les Européens n'est-il pas la cause principale des conflits ethniques en Afrique ?

Pourquoi parle-t-on arabe en Afrique du nord ?

Quels sont les pays d'Afrique les plus riches, et quelle est la source principale de leur fortune ?

Est-il incorrect que les Américains appellent les Noirs des Afro-Américains ? Devraient-ils plutôt dire noir ou "Black" ?

Que peut faire la France pour contrer la montée en puissance de la Chine en Afrique ?
Qui a découvert l'Afrique, et quelle est la signification du mot Afrique ?

Savez-vous que les peuples d'origine sémites ce sont les peuples d'Afrique du Nord, du Moyen-Orient et de la corne d'Afrique ? Et non pas seulement les tribus d'Israël comment en le sous-entend matin, midi et soir du berceau à tombe.

Pourquoi les Nord-Africains et les Africains de la Corne de l'Afrique (Éthiopie, Somalie, Érythrée) sont-ils une course de demi-fond si forte?

Est-ce que les animaux en général coexistent pacifiquement dans la nature ? Do animals in general coexist peacefully in the wild?

Jerome Cohen · Suivre Ami des animaux depuis plus d' 1/2 siècle.Traducteur · jeu.
Jamil Mahmood I love all animals Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de dans Quora en anglais :

Ça dépend de la façon dont on voit les choses.

(Le frangin ne doit pas avoir très faim)

Les animaux doivent manger, et de nombreux animaux doivent manger d'autres animaux pour survivre. Si cela est un fait, alors la définition de la paix, telle qu'elle s'applique aux animaux, décrirait précisément la façon dont ils coexistent, à mon avis. En d'autres termes, la plupart du temps (pas à 100 %, mais presque), les animaux ne tuent pas inutilement d'autres animaux.

Et oui, je comprends que parfois un lion en tue un autre pour son territoire, mais je pourrais dire que c'est quand même nécessaire pour l'espèce, car seuls les spécimens les plus forts survivront et auront une progéniture forte. De même, je suis conscient que certains orques jouent à des jeux avec leur nourriture, et c'est bizarre, mais cette action est une aberration, et probablement l'une des actions les plus inexplicables que l'on puisse observer chez d'autres animaux.

(On a vu des orques jouer à attraper des phoques et, dans certains cas, ne pas les manger).

Mais encore une fois, pour la plupart, ils coexistent avec un écosystème délicat et aussi paisible que possible quand on sait que des carnivores vivent parmi des herbivores.

Les humains sont peut-être la seule espèce qui tue avec de mauvaises intentions. C'est la malédiction d'être hyper évolués par rapport au reste de la vie sur terre. Nous sommes responsables de tellement d'extinctions et de quasi-extinctions que c'est assez fou de voir à quel point nous sommes détachés de toutes les autres formes de vie de la planète. Donc si vous nous incluez dans l'équation : alors non. Si vous n'incluez pas les humains : alors oui.

Questions similaires

Y a-t-il des animaux qui nous trouvent nous les humains mignons ?
Si l'humain ne voit pas l'air, est-ce que le poisson voit l'eau ?
Quels sont les animaux les plus inoffensifs et les plus amicaux de la planète ?

Quels sont les exemples d'animaux qui sauvent délibérément d'autres animaux et/ou des personnes dans la nature ?

Pourquoi ne voit-on presque jamais de squelette d'animaux dans la forêt et plus généralement la nature lorsque l'on s'y promène ?

Un animal peut-il tomber «amoureux» d'un être humain ?
Pourquoi l'être humain est-il si belliqueux et pourquoi les animaux sont-ils si pacifiques ?
Est-ce vrai que les animaux rient ?
Les animaux peuvent-ils apprécier la musique de la même manière que les humains ?
Est-ce que les animaux sont racistes ?
Existe-t-il des animaux sauvages élevant d'autres animaux pour leur propre bénéfice ?

Quel animal existant pourrait-il être considéré comme une véritable anomalie de la nature ?

Quel est l'animal le plus paisible ?
Est-ce que les animaux ont conscience de la mort ?

Comment expliquer que certains êtres humains soient acceptés, soient aimés et puissent avoir autant de complicité avec des animaux sauvages ?

What is the most horrific crime you've ever heard of someone doing? What was the most gruesome crime you have ever learned of?

Hervée Tia · Follow A Most Viewed Writer in the topic of Crime1y Originally Answered:

Trigger warning
The man in the picture is Dan Shisia Matakhaya, a 31 year-old Kenyan police officer.

He was not born with this frightening appearance. What you see is the result of a normal argument he had with his wife.

One day, Matakhaya and his wife disagreed about a house issue. He considered it as a normal argument and later on that day, he left for work. He had a night shift so he came back home the day after, at 05:30 am.

As he had been working all the night, he went straight to the bed to sleep.

This is the moment his wife chose to come and pour acid solution on his face. Then she ran away. But it was not enough for her to spoil his face, she also acted so that he couldn't escape the bedroom. She had poured water on the floor and connected it to electricity. As soon as Matakhaya stepped on the floor, he felt the electric shock.

As he was screaming, his neighbouring workmates came and found him in his despair. They took him to hospital. His life was saved, but unfortunately not his eyes. Now he is permanently blind.

His wife was firstly arrested, then they released her later on bail. Matakhaya forgave her for what happened but he said he is not going to abandon charge against her. He only met her at the court and all she said was that she doesn't know why she did so. So silly!

Matakhaya learnt Braille and passed a bachelor’s degree in criminology. He struggles day after day to get along with his new life. And he wants to be a figure and a leader in the fight against domestic violence.

This is how a random conversation with a slight disagreement can lead to tragedy. Now a young man's future becomes a permanent struggle because someone could not manage her temper. Sad.

My Wife Poured Acid on my Face and Tried to Electrocute Me

Related Links

What is the most horrifying death ever caught on camera?
What are some of the most horrifying pictures in history?
What are some of the most horrifying crime scenes photos from around the world and what was the crime?

What was the most horrifying phone call you've ever received? How did you handle it?
What’s the worst crime you have ever seen?
What is the most horrifying thing you have seen on CCTV footage?
What has been the most gruesome real footage you've ever seen?

People who knew murderers before they committed their crimes, what were they like? What was your experience with them?

Which are the most brutal murderers and murders of all time?
What are some photos that at first looked innocent but are actually very disturbing?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
I remember when there was a lot of poaching.

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Feb 26

I was very young, and at night I would see the poachers with their lights, following giraffes and zebras. In the morning, when I went to herd my family's cattle, I found dead animals. Sometimes body parts were missing, sometimes I'd just find a blood stain on the ground.

One day, I even saw them out in the bush, the poachers… There were six, carrying bags and arrows. My dog started following them, but I had to stop him. I was afraid of what they would do to me.

But then I saw people in uniform who were patrolling, and I learned that these people were protecting the animals; the wild animals that I love and are so important to me. I had found my passion. It became my dream to protect wildlife.

I am Daniel Kutata, and I am a Big Life Ranger

Source: Big Life Foundation

Est-ce vrai que les éléphants nous trouvent mignon ?

Hamid Sam Aime découvrir et faire découvrir 6 mo

Ça m'fait marrer cette question mais la réponse est bien Oui et cela a été démontré par une étude scientifique.

En tant qu'humain, on a souvent tendance à être assez impressionné devant les éléphants. Il faut dire que cette grosse bête peut être assez terrifiante. En tout cas, on trouve rarement cet animal joli. Et pourtant, il semblerait que les pachydermes soient bien plus gentils à notre égard ! Ils auraient même craqué pour le genre humain.

Oui, vous avez bien lu ! Encore plus étonnant, en fait, les éléphants ont devant nous la même réaction que nous avons devant un petit chiot. Vous savez, vos grands yeux écarquillés devant une boule de poils si mignonne. Et bien c'est apparemment ce qu'il se passe dans la tête d'un éléphant quand il se retrouve devant vous. Même si, on l'avoue, on ne croise pas des éléphants à tous les coins de rue. Alors on se demande bien quand est-ce qu'ils ont pu craquer pour nous à ce point.

A peine la nouvelle tombée, elle a été partagée des milliers de fois, notamment par les fans du pachyderme. Oui, il y en a beaucoup. En fait, tout cela a une explication scientifique. L'éléphant est un animal très sociable de nature. Et la structure de son cerveau est presque la même que celle de l'humain. Ainsi, certaines émotions existent aussi bien chez l'humain que chez l'éléphant. C'est notamment le cas des montées de stress. Ainsi, grâce à ces similitudes, la connexion entre l'animal et l'humain peut se faire plus facilement qu'avec une autre espèce qui n'aurait pas de connexion avec l'Homme.

Alors avec cette bonne nouvelle, on pourrait peut-être espérer que le conflit humain et éléphant se règle vite. Même si on l'admet, on ne saurait pas vraiment quoi faire devant une si grosse bête.

Sources : Sciences : les éléphants trouvent les humains très mignons !

Questions similaires

À quel point les éléphants sont-ils intelligents ?
D'où vient donc cette idée que les éléphants aiment les cacahuètes ?

Quelle est la chose qui se rapproche le plus de la trompe d'un éléphant dans le règne animal ?

Est-ce que l'éléphant est le plus grand animal terrestre ?
Pourquoi un éléphant ne peut-il pas sauter ?
Pourquoi l'éléphant est-il le seul animal qui ne peut pas sauter ?
Est-ce que les éléphants sont agressifs ?
Pourquoi certains éléphants en captivité se balancent-ils sur place ?
Est-ce que les hippopotames, les éléphants et les rhinocéros sont apparentés ?
Pourquoi les éléphants meurent-ils après que leurs défenses aient été enlevées ?
Est-ce que les éléphants savent sauter ?
Pourquoi les éléphants n'ont-ils pas de testicules ?
Pourquoi les éléphants n'ont-ils pas de fourrure ?
Pourquoi un éléphant peut-il être dressé pour devenir chevauchable mais pas une girafe?

Les éléphants ne peuvent pas sauter. Y a-t-il d'autres animaux qui ne le peuvent pas non plus ?

Est-ce que c'est vrai que les crocodiles ne deviennent jamais trop grands pour leur enclos?
/Is it true that crocodiles never outgrown their enclosure?

Une question très importante.
Les humains mettent les crocodiles dans des enclos qui sont trop petits pour eux.

Cela ne devrait jamais arriver, sauf dans des circonstances exceptionnelles, par exemple en cas de déménagement.

Dans d'autres enclos, les crocodiles vont certainement dépasser l'espace qui leur est alloué.

Dans la nature, ils grandissent et continuent de grandir car ils ont beaucoup de place.

La plus petite espèce de crocodile est le crocodile nain d'Afrique de l'Ouest, qui peut mesurer jusqu'à deux mètres de long. Les plus grands crocodiles sont les crocodiles marins (Crocodylus porosus, communément appelés salties) que l'on trouve dans le nord de l'Australie, en Asie du Sud-Est et sur la côte orientale de l'Inde. Certains de ces monstres ont été mesurés à plus de 6 mètres et 1200kg. On estime qu'il existe aujourd'hui de nombreux crocodiles marins de 7 mètres de long.

Donc.

5.1.6 Les crocodiles ne grandissent-ils que jusqu'à la taille de leur enclos ?

Non, il s'agit d'un mythe. Il a peut-être été créé par des marchands peu scrupuleux qui cherchaient à convaincre des propriétaires potentiels de se séparer de leur argent, mais quelle que soit son origine, ce n'est pas vrai. Tous les crocodiliens deviennent de très grands animaux par rapport à de nombreuses autres espèces de reptiles. Même les caïmans nains, qui mesurent 1 mètre de long, sont des animaux de taille conséquente pour être hébergés correctement. L'idée qu'un caïman peut être gardé petit si la cage (l'enclos) est également petite est une idée sérieusement erronée. Même dans une petite cage (enclos), un caïman continuera à grandir jusqu'à ce que ses mouvements soient finalement entravés. La croissance continue se traduira par des déformations des membres, du museau et de la queue, car le corps tente d'augmenter sa taille naturellement.

C'est extrêmement cruel et cela donne un caïman rabougri et en mauvaise santé dont la durée de vie est sérieusement compromise. Le caïman doit disposer de suffisamment d'espace pour se déplacer confortablement sur terre et dans l'eau, ou vous devriez peut-être envisager un jouet crocodile en peluche à la place.

FAQ sur les soins aux crocodiliens en captivité (caïman, alligator, crocodile)

Il s'agit d'un guide de soins détaillé destiné aux détenteurs sérieux de caïmans, d'alligators et de crocodiles. Si vous recherchez un animal de compagnie amical, affectueux et facile à soigner, ce guide n'est certainement pas pour vous !

Crocodilian Captive Care FAQ (Caiman, Alligator, Crocodile)

This is a detailed care guide for serious keepers of caimans, alligators and crocodiles. If you're looking for a friendly, loving and easy to care for pet, this guide is definitely not for you!

https://crocodilian.com/crocfaq/faq-4.html#5.1.6

Dans les enclos, ils essaient parfois de s'échapper.

© Rian Van Schalkwyk / Barcroft Media

FOUR FRIENDS
ONE WORLD

Est-ce qu'il faut essayer de distancer un serpent avant qu'il ne vous attaque ?/Should you try to outrun a snake before it attacks you?

Un humain peut dépasser un serpent. Même les serpents rapides ne se déplacent pas plus vite qu'environ 30 km à l'heure, et une personne moyenne peut les dépasser en courant. Certains serpents sont plus rapides que d'autres et leur longueur peut affecter leur vitesse. Un humain peut dépasser un serpent mais ne peut pas éviter sa frappe.

Que faire si un serpent vous poursuit ?

Si vous rencontrez un serpent, suivez les étapes suivantes.

Restez calme. Il y a de fortes chances que le serpent vous ait vu avant que vous ne le voyiez - et il ne veut rien avoir à faire avec vous. S'il n'a pas battu en retraite, il restera immobile ou émettra un son d'avertissement.

Éloignez-vous du serpent. Nous répétons : éloignez-vous du serpent.
Faut-il essayer de distancer un serpent ?

Règle numéro 1 : n'essayez pas d'échapper à un serpent en courant.

À de très rares exceptions près (je te regarde, crotale d'Amérique centrale), les serpents ne poursuivent pas les gens, donc si votre enfant en rencontre un, il doit faire la même chose que lorsqu'il surprend maman et papa pendant leur "câlin spécial" : reculez, lentement et calmement.

Un humain peut-il dépasser un anaconda en courant?

Un anaconda adulte n'est pas un simple serpent. 1 : Si vous êtes attaqué par un Anaconda, ne courez pas. Le serpent est plus rapide que vous. N'essayez pas de le distancer.

Les serpents vous poursuivent-ils si vous courez ?

Les serpents ne poursuivent pas les humains puisqu'ils en ont peur, tout comme les humains ont peur des serpents. Les humains sont plus grands que les serpents et les serpents les voient comme des prédateurs potentiels dangereux. Certains serpents savent comment éviter le conflit en s'enfuyant ou en se camouflant.

Question similaires

Un alligator peut-il se reproduire avec un crocodile ?

Comment une lionne qui a d'énormes crocs peut-elle porter ses petits en les prenant par le cou et en ne leur faisant pas mal ?

Si un alligator décide de me poursuivre, à quelle vitesse peut-il le faire ?
Un crocodile peut-il être apprivoisé ?
Un tigre est-il plus fort qu'un crocodile ?
Si les crocodiles ne cessent de grandir, pourquoi n'en avons-nous jamais vu de géants ?

Quel est le prédateur du crocodile ?
Est-ce que les crocodiles vont s'attaquer à tous les animaux à leur portée?

Est-ce qu'une créature peut vivre parmi les crocodiles/alligators sans craindre d'être attaquée et mangée ?

Est-ce qu un crocodile peut tuer un éléphant ?
Qu'est-ce que les crocodiles ne peuvent pas manger ?

Qu'est-ce qui est le plus vicieux et/ou intimidant, les alligators ou les crocodiles ?

Les crocodiles, sont-il invaincus dans leur territoire (par exemple, dans les rivières)?

Pourquoi les crocodiles et les alligators ne sont-ils pas le même animal ? Qu'est-ce qui les distingue biologiquement ?

Est-ce que les crocodiles mangent les zèbres ?

What is the most unusual thing you've learned about any wild animal?

Serge Elia Nature lover Feb 28

Until recently, I didn't know at all that female bears will sometimes adopt stray or orphaned bear cubs, and thus raise them as their own.

While this is definitely not an isolated case in the animal kingdom – given that there have been countless times in which mother animals, whether in the wild or in captivity, cared for stray or orphaned young –, I still find it unusual in bears, as we're talking here about a solitary prowler that naturally prefers to spend its entire life alone, without ever seeking the company of its congeners whomever they are (except during the mating season or if it's a female with her biological offspring).

Not to mention that male bears take absolutely no part in rearing the young, and won't hesitate to attack any unrelated cub they find – if anything, they may even kill the ones they fathered during the previous years! See Serge Elia's answer to Male polar bears live solitary lives, but what happens if a male polar bear encounters a previous mate nursing his offspring? Will he try and kill the cubs, or does his recognition prevent it?.

As it turns out, this is not the case with mother bears. Sure, “Mama Bear” is often stereotyped as this ferocious beast that will tear to shreds anyone who dares to threaten her young. But when it comes to nurturing bear cubs, she is rather sweet, loving, and even playful (see above); to the extent of willingly caring for cubs that have been orphaned or abandoned, nursing them, feeding them and protecting them with her life, even though these cubs are not of her own offspring.

In light of this, it’s crystal clear that bears are actually social animals despite their status as solitary animals – as a matter of fact, in some very rare instances, female grizzlies (called sows) have been seen joining forces with other females to raise cubs together!

In Virginia (southeastern USA), ecologists have put up to 20 orphaned black bear cubs under the care of foster mothers in the wild, and this initiative has proven to be a true success in reassuring the orphans' survival (and by extension, the species' own survival). In the process, the ecologists in question often rub Vaseline on the cubs' heads so as to get rid of any human scent, wrap them in a blanket and tuck them in the bib pocket of the females' overalls, before quietly putting the youngsters near the den – once these cubs start crying for help, the mothers will reach out and pull them into the den, while the conservationists back out and leave them alone[1].

And you know what? Cases of mother bears raising orphan or stray cubs have become more and more of a common occurrence throughout most bear ranges in North America, with many scientists noting that it likely happens more than people think[2]. For instance: one particular sow in Katmai National Park (southern Alaska) was spotted adopting a cub that was abandoned by its own mother, as she gave it more room in her den to sleep in and fed it alongside her biological cub.

So far, the case of adopting orphans has only been documented in brown and black bears, but it’s been seen in polar bears too, where the females are indeed known to adopt and raise cubs from non-related litters (including orphaned or abandoned youngsters), a natural phenomenon known as alloparenting or cooperative breeding[3].

This phenomenon, strange but beautiful, reminds me of how untrue the common misconceptions we usually spread about animals – particularly the unloved ones like bears – are. Indeed, bears and all other creatures are not always the savage beasts we often misjudge them to be, for they can become very compassionate and develop a peculiar sense of empathy that lets them willingly take orphans or abandoned youngsters under their care. For what reason, you may ask? That, we may never know; for it's extremely difficult for us humans (even expert zoologists) to determine exactly what goes on in an animal's mind and/or heart…

It also shows that, just when we think we know it all so well, the natural world is unpredictable and so good at divulging little secrets that lie far beyond our mortal knowledge.

Footnotes

[1] Orphaned black bears get placed with new foster mama bears in Virginia
[2] Mother bears adopting orphan cubs becoming more common
[3] Are Polar Bears Altruistic or Just Bad At Math? - JSTOR Daily

Wake Up Africa

If all are descendants of Adam and Eve, how was the first skinned man evolved? Whose gene did he take? Or rather whose descendants are the black? Created that way like Adam and Eve? Please elaborate your answers

Tommy Mogaka Software Engineer, Adventist Christian & Afrocentrist. I❤ Feb 23

We are all of one blood and one family even though of different blood types and races. That said, Black genes are dominant, whilst white genes are recessive hence why I believe Adam and Eve must have been dark-skinned or at least brown or ruddy in colour. Therefore, Adam and Eve couldn't have been white as this means they would have lost the gene to produce darker skins races but were darker-skinned as depicted in the cover of this issue of Newsweek magazine.

Or maybe perhaps Adam and Eve were like Kenyan mid-fielder Titus Mulama who had a reddish tinge to his complexion. As far as I know, he isn't albino.

Adam and Eve must have carried all the genes of modern man and more considering only 3 races of mankind survived Noah's flood. So perhaps there existed different shades of combinations of men hence why we have bones in the earth that evolutionists consider to be different human beings than ourselves.

As of today, only black people have the genes to produce black, Chinese and even white people as has been repeatedly demonstrated by numerous pure black couples who give rise to pure white babies who aren't albinos. An example is shown in the link below and the opening photo above and below.

Related Links

I don't recall a Lilith from any of the Christian stories. I only know this because I've read The Mortal Instruments series. Why is Lilith, the first wife of Adam, not mentioned in the Bible?

If we were to assume that the Adam and Eve story were true, how long would it take for two people to grow to a population of 7 billion? Include any assumptions in your answer.

If Adam and Eve were the first people on Earth (assuming they were Arabs or Caucasians), how come there are Africans, Chinese, Indians, Malays, etc.?

If the Biblical Adam and Eve were the first people and their offspring were born, then how could they have avoided interbreeding in the family?

Did God create other men and women beside Adam and Eve on the days of creation?
If God created Adam & Eve and humans are their descendants, are we all inbred?

Where there really any other people besides Adam and Eve? Which suggests that Adam and Eve were not the first human beings on Earth?

Were Adam and Eve black?

What race/ethnicity were Adam and Eve? How do you explain all the black, white, Asian, and Indian babies?

Were Adam and Eve the first humans on this planet?

Is Adam and Eve a Christian or a Muslim since both religions see them as the first humans?

Who was the first woman on earth? Eve or Lilith? I have heard both the stories but which one has more weight?

If Adam and Eve did exist what colour were they?

After Adam was created, did he ask for Eve to be created or was she created without his request?

On what day did God create Eve? Was it on the sixth day? If no, how long was it from the day Adam was created?

Are Kenya safaris safe?

Sergio Diniz Animals researcher on spare hours1y

I will not talk about Kenya specifically, but on safaris. I will reproduce here some clues I believe can be useful, from Sergio Diniz's answer to When using safari vehicles or any vehicle where people are taking pictures of animals in Africa, what keeps predators from attacking the people in the vehicles?

I’ve been to Safaris in Africa and heard a lot from professionals, as well as what I saw in person and also read about. The best explanation I heard is that animals, and more specifically the predators, have their view much more focused to movement tracking (which is a scientific fact), than details on its preys.

Thus, when they see an open safari vehicle, full of people, all they see is one single thing: a large beast with some appendages on top (heads). As a large, and potentially powerful beast does not interest them, as well as other large animals as adult rhinos and elephants: they know the hunting effort is not worthy. Not because they fear humans.

However, all attention is necessary, as apex predator as lions or even leopards are relatively intelligent and curious animals. If somebody stands up and detaches himself from the rest of the “beast mass”, the predator may be curious and while in doubt if that is a part of the large beast or is something else separate it may then investigate or attack. In case of an attack, we all can imagine what happens. If it starts to investigate too close, many tourists may lose their nerves, stand up and even run… which will be the worst mistake, as the predator will then be sure that it is a prey and will start chasing (hunting reflex), and they run much faster than any of us.

Considering that, the local guides normally orient passengers to stay seated, quiet, only observing when close to animals. They teach you to never stand up, shake arms or worst, get out of the safari vehicle. In this last case, the animal will be sure you are not part of the large beast and will notice you are actually the perfect size for a prey…

However, some private game reserves do not disclose the fact that, in order to maintain the “savage aspect” of the tour, specially those where and open safari vehicle is used, they “prepare” the animals to get used to human presence. Before opening a new game reserve or when new animals are brought (yes, they do buy animals from other places to populate or replace losses, so there is plenty to be seen by tourists), they get the animals used to the safari vehicle and people, by running close to them on a frequent basis, until the animal is used to the vehicle and people and do not show aggressiveness anymore. They do it until the “large beast” is already a part of the landscape. That is why they really do not attack.

Nevertheless, if a pack of lions insist on being aggressive to humans, which makes the reserve lose money, they resell or even shoot down the rebels. Sad, not? No publicity on this, bad for business.

I remembered something. I myself “almost” suffered an accident. A male elephant from outside the game reserve invaded the reserve in the previous night, breaking its fences, and “dethroned” the resident pack’s male, breaking one of his tusks and was furiously wandering the reserve, chasing the running females. Male elephants are very dangerous during the mating season. During the afternoon safari our open vehicle directly faced this male, but thanks to the driver's expertise, who immediately identified the threat and abruptly moved backwards at all speed possible, a breathtaking experience.

This is so true that in wild reserves the thing changes completely: no more open safari vehicles and guards always carrying rifles. From time to time, unfortunately, fatalities do happen (see [10 safari horror stories that will chill you to the bone]) and is not uncommon the business and even governments to avoid disclosure as much as possible. Bad for business.

I remembered something. I myself “almost” suffered an accident. A male elephant from outside the game reserve invaded the reserve in the previous night, breaking its fences, and “dethroned” the resident pack’s male, breaking one of his tusks and was furiously wandering the reserve, chasing the running females. Male elephants are very dangerous during the mating season. During the afternoon safari our open vehicle directly faced this male, but thanks to the driver’s expertise, who immediately identified the threat and abruptly moved backwards at all speed possible, a breathtaking experience.

It was pretty much like the photo above, but luckily a little more distant, but not much. My nerves and beating heart did not allow me to take a photo.

The driver, a black man, went pale, but did not pronounce a single word then to not make other tourists afraid. In reality, as everybody else was talking or taking photos, probably only I myself (sitting together with the driver) noticed what was happening, but I saw the driver’s hands and legs shaking. For most people it was just a “nice and beautiful elephant”. Some complained about the blunt maneuver. Taking aside the scary situation and a rip in my jacket and hole in my cap (during the maneuver we went too close to a tree with thorns like steel), happily nobody got hurt.

In these cases, against elephants, it really does not matter if your vehicle is open or closed…

Despite it all, it is a unique experience, especially if the tourists are adequately warned about the true risks. I recommend it. Follow Sergio Diniz

Related questions

Where are good places to do a safari in Africa? What animals can I expect to see in each place? I have looked into Kenya, wondering which other countries might be good for a safari.

Is it safe to go on a safari in South Africa?
What is Safari Tours in Kenya?
Between Kenya and Tanzania, which is your ideal safari destination and why?
Where are the best places to go on safari in Kenya?
What are the best safaris in Africa?
How safe is a night safari?
What is the best African country to go to a safari?
Are wildlife dangerous when you are on safari?
Where and when should a person go for the best African safari experience?

Que trouvez-vous étrange en Afrique ?/What is something you find odd about Africa?

Pierre Damez Random Quoran (2016–aujourd'hui)Traducteur. Mis à jour le 1 an

Sean Kernan

Les Kalendjins représentent 0.06% de la population mondiale mais sont une tribu unique.

Ils font parties des plus grands athlètes au monde.

Quelques exemples en statistiques:

5 lycéens américains ont réussi à parcourir un mile (1.609 km) en moins de 4 minutes (de tous les temps).
Un lycée à Betin, au Kenya, a 4 lycéens qui ont réussi à le faire la même année.

Seuls 17 hommes ont couru un marathon en moins de 2h10 dans l'histoire de l'Amérique.

32 Kalendjins l'ont fait en un an.

Alors pourquoi ce groupe de Kenyan est si performant en course de fond ?

Pour plusieurs raisons.

Certains spéculent que c'est lié à l'altitude. Mais de nombreuses tribus, peuples et nations vivent à la même altitude. Cette théorie est largement ignorée.

Une raison serait le type de corps qu'ils ont.

La tribu des Kalendjins vit pile sur l'Équateur. Un climat extrêmement chaud qui force le corps humain à former des membres plus minces.

De longs membres entraînent une plus grande surface pour se rafraîchir, ce qui est décisif dans des courses aussi épuisantes.

Avec des jambes minces, en plus de leur corps plus léger, ils peuvent utiliser moins d'énergie dans leurs foulées. Ce fait a été testé et prouvé en laboratoire.

Enfin, il y a l'aspect sociologique.

Dans la culture Kalendjin, la tolérance à la douleur, la difficulté, les épreuves, sont une vertu, et un signe de virilité. Ce trait est incroyablement important pour l'entraînement à la course de durée.

Et après beaucoup, beaucoup de générations, cette caractéristique a évolué et s'est transmise.

Le résultat:

Un groupe d'athlètes qui ont allié une éthique de travail, un mental d'acier, et un avantage physiologique pour devenir les maîtres incontestés de la course de fond.

Source: Epstein, David. The Sports Gene, 2013.

Je tire mon chapeau à la tribu des Kalendjins. Respect.
Suivre Pierre Damez

Questions similaires

Si vous avez déjà visité plusieurs pays d'Afrique, quel est le pays qui vous a le plus marqué. Sinon, si vous comptez revenir en Afrique, quel pays irez-vous en premier ?

Aimeriez-vous vivre en Afrique ?
Y a-t-il des endroits en Afrique qui ressemblent à l'Europe ?
Que trouvez-vous différent en Afrique ?
Pourquoi ne dois-je jamais aller en Afrique ?

Si vous deviez vivre dans un pays d'Afrique, lequel choisiriez vous et pourquoi ?

Quel est votre endroit préféré en Afrique ?

Quel pays aimeriez-vous visiter en Afrique ? Pourquoi ?

Quels pays africains recommanderiez-vous à quelqu'un qui n'est jamais allé en Afrique ?

Quel pays africain donnerais-tu tout pour habiter ? Pourquoi ?

Dans quel pays d'Afrique fait-il bon vivre ? Où me recommanderiez-vous de m'installer ?

Quelle est la ville la plus propre d'Afrique ?

Si vous deviez lancer un business rentable en Afrique, lequel choisiriez-vous ?

Quel est, à votre avis, le pays le plus intéressant de l'Afrique ?
Comment puis-je trouver en Afrique ?

Pourquoi les humains ont-ils développé des capacités de combat/défense et une vitesse aussi médiocres par rapport aux animaux sauvages ? Nous ne vivrions pas un jour dans la nature sans une arme. / Why did humans evolve such lousy fighting/defence abilities and speed compared to other wild animals? We wouldn't last a day in the wild without a weapon.

Sami Moudakkir · Suivre ...Traducteur · 1 an Parce que les humains ont évolué pour utiliser des armes.

Ce garçon doit tuer un lion seul pour devenir un homme

Privez un serpent de son venin et il mourra de faim. Cassez les ailes d'un aigle et il ne sera plus un grand prédateur. Retirez la trompe d'un éléphant et il ne tiendra pas une semaine.

Mais quand les humains évoluent autour d'une compétence particulière, alors on dit que c'est de la "triche" ?

Le genre homo utilisait habilement le feu et les outils bien avant qu'il n'y ait un "homo sapiens". Nous avons évolué en même temps que nos outils, parce que c'était la meilleure manière d'exploiter nos gros cerveaux. Si le lion est autorisé à utiliser ses griffes et ses dents, alors l'homme devrait être autorisé à utiliser des outils et tout le reste.

Suivre Sami Moudakkir

Questions similaires

Quel animal serait le plus difficile à affronter pour les humains s'il décidait de nous combattre ?

Les humains sont pratiquement sans défense. Pourquoi les animaux sauvages ne nous attaquent-ils pas davantage ?

Pourquoi les animaux prédateurs tels que les ours et les couguars évitent-ils en général les humains, alors que nous sommes une proie plutôt "facile" et sans défense ?

Existe-t-il des animaux sauvages élevant d'autres animaux pour leur propre bénéfice ?

Pourquoi la plupart des animaux prédateurs choisissent-ils de ne pas manger les humains ?

Quel est l’animal le plus fort qu’un humain puisse battre ?

Pourquoi les êtres humains n'ont-ils pas une saison des amours comme les autres animaux ?

Pourquoi certains animaux sauvages, des prédateurs féroces tels qu’un ours ou un cougar ont-ils peur des humains alors que nous semblons si faibles?

Comment/pourquoi les chats domestiques sont-ils devenus domestiqués ? Contrairement aux chiens, ils n'ont pas besoin des humains, et les humains n'en ont pas besoin.

Comment réagirait un animal sauvage face à un bébé humain ?

What are the predators of an Ostrich?

Serge Elia Animal lover Updated 4y

Despite its size, strength and astonishing speed, the ostrich does have predators in its home range in the African savanna (and I don’t mean predators that just eat the eggs or kill the chicks, I mean predators that are capable of bringing down a fully grown adult!). And other than humans, they are the following:

1- The cheetah.

Sure enough, cheetahs are THE fastest land animals on earth, capable of hitting speed as much as 100 km/h or more, in contrast with the maximum of 60 km/h for the ostrich. In fact, the cheetah is the most prolific predator of adult ostriches due to its great running speed, whilst other predators, like the lion and the leopard, will have to rely on ambush so as to avoid being outrun by the much faster birds.

Of course, one cheetah is bad enough, but that’s hardly compared to a group of cheetah brothers.

Animal lover Updated 4y

2- The lion.

Lions are not picky eaters; to satisfy their hunger, they will gladly hunt and eat anything unfortunate enough to come across their path. An ostrich would be a snack craved for!

3- The spotted hyena.

Being equipped with the most powerful jaws and the strongest bite-force of all predators around the world, while also capable of eating its victims alive, the spotted hyena is one predator no African species, including ostriches, would ever want to fall prey to.

4- The leopard.

Leopards will readily eat anything they come across, and hence they have an extensive diet that is the primal key to their expanding range (leopards have indeed the widest range of any big cat). Thus said, why would an ostrich be of any difference?

Réponse similaire
Est-ce que les hippopotames sont omnivores?

Jerome Cohen, Un ami des animaux depuis toujours, de toutes espèces.
Traducteur · Traduit le 26 août 2020

Matt Zietsman Grew up in South Africa surrounded by animals

Are hippos omnivorous?

Officiellement, les hippopotames sont considérés comme des herbivores[1]

MAIS l'hippopotame de 4 tonnes, excessivement agressif et socialement déficient, ne s'en tient souvent pas à la catégorie de régime que les scientifiques lui ont attribuée.

Et pourquoi pas.

Contrairement à la plupart des herbivores, avec une bouche mesurant jusqu'à 1,2 mètre et des canines pouvant atteindre 50 cm, les hippopotames sont plus qu'équipés pour jouer le rôle de prédateur de temps en temps.

En fait, dans un article récent publié par le biologiste Joseph Doudley, ses chercheurs et lui ont observé un comportement carnivore dans les populations d'hippopotames [2] [3].

Doudley énumère des cas où des hippopotames sauvages ont tué et se sont nourris de certains des plus grands animaux d'Afrique, notamment :

- Des éléphants,
- Des gnous,
- Des kudus

et parfois même d'autres hippopotames alors que dans les zoos, on a signalé que des hippopotames tuaient et mangeaient leurs voisins.

Quant à savoir pourquoi les hippopotames ont parfois envie d'augmenter leur régime alimentaire et sont d'humeur à manger de la viande dans leur menu habituel d'herbe, on ne sait pas trop pourquoi.

Des cas d'hippopotames devenant carnivores ont été observés :

pendant les périodes de sécheresse, lorsque la nourriture est rare (les besoins doivent être satisfaits) ; pendant les périodes d'abondance, en particulier lorsque la viande se présente littéralement aux hippopotames (comme lors des noyades lorsque des masses de gnous traversent les rivières) ou parfois en volant des produits tués par d'autres prédateurs dont les hippopotames pensent pouvoir se débarrasser (ce qui inclut probablement presque tous les prédateurs, étant donné que l'hippopotame est le troisième plus grand mammifère du monde).

Voilà, c'est fait.

Les hippos sont des herbivores et non des omnivores... mais essayez de leur dire cela.

Merci également à Claire Freund de m'avoir fait examiner ce sujet et de m'avoir fourni le lien vers l'un des articles sources.

Sources pour les photos :

Regardez ce qui se passe quand un crocodile entre dans un troupeau d'hippopotames. Watch What Happens When a Crocodile Walks Into a Herd of Hippos

Pourquoi faut-il se méfier d'un hippopotame qui rit ou qui bâille. Why you should beware a laughing or yawning hippo

Notes de bas de page [1] Hippopotamus | National Geographic

[2] Hippos Eat Way More Meat than We Thought, and It Can Make Them Sick

[3] Carnivory in the common hippopotamus Hippopotamus amphibius: implications for the ecology and epidemiology of anthrax in African landscapes

Qu’est-ce que les crocodiles ne peuvent pas manger?

Pierre Rossetti Ingénieur (nuclear advices). 2 années Biochimie ; Théologie14 nov.

Il n’est pas rare de croiser des lions, que ce soit à l’état sauvage ou en captivité, en train de grogner bruyamment lors de l’accouplement, jusqu’au point de se battre l’un contre l’autre violemment (ce qui se déroule, heureusement, sans aucune blessure ou autre dégât) ! Qui plus est, ceci se produit régulièrement avec les accouplements intraspécifiques des autres félidés, y compris l'accouplement des tigres et celui des chats domestiques entre autres.

Contrairement à ce que l'on pense, tous ces grognements ne se produisent pas parce que le mâle mord la peau du cou ou les oreilles de la lionne (d'ailleurs, lorsqu'il mord, il fait de son mieux pour ne pas lui arracher la peau, car il a besoin d'elle en vie et en bonne santé afin d'enfanter ses descendants) ; au lieu de cela, son pénis est épineux – oui, il est plein d'épines !

Certes, cela nous semble dégoûtant ou douloureux ; néanmoins, ces épines péniennes sont utiles pour racler les parois du vagin de la lionne, ce qui peut servir d'instigateur à l'ovulation, et engendrer par la suite une naissance potentielle de lionceaux. Mais cela a un prix : le lion et la lionne devront s'accoupler jusqu'à 50 à 100 fois au cours des quatre prochains jours !

En fin de compte, c'est ce qui explique tous les grognements incessants émis durant l'accouplement des lions (tel est le cas chez n'importe quel autre grand félin) – on est presque tentés de dire : le lion et la lionne grognent de plaisir ;)

Une fois qu'une hyène meurt, par exemple de cause naturelle, les vautours s'en nourrissent - donc techniquement, les vautours mangent les hyènes.

Réponse similaire
Quel est l'animal carnivore le plus intelligent ?

Sawssen Bri, lieu : Grasse, France Répondu 16 juin 2020

Chien et chat ont des densités corticales assez proches. Mais le chien supplante largement le chat en nombre total de neurones.

Alors que le cerveau humain comprend environ 120 000 neurones par mg de cortex, cette densité est presque divisée par dix chez les carnivores les plus intelligents. Et ce ne sont pas les plus imposants qui font preuve de plus d'intelligence !

Selon la densité de neurones du cortex, c'est le raton laveur : 18 510 neurones par mg de cortex ! Toutefois, en nombre de neurones, autre indicateur d'intelligence, c'est le chien : un Golden Retriever, avec 627 millions de neurones, contre 438 millions pour le raton laveur.

SUR LE MÊME SUJET

Fin 2017, des biologistes ont évalué la densité du cortex de huit carnivores de gabarits très variés. Le but ? Savoir comment cette zone du cerveau, liée à la planification et aux comportements les plus complexes, a évolué selon les espèces.

LES PLUS GRANDS NON FAVORISÉS

Les chercheurs ont ainsi découvert que chez les carnivores, la relation habituelle entre corps plus grand, masse corticale plus grande et plus grand nombre de neurones corticaux ne s'applique qu'aux espèces de petite et moyenne tailles.

Ainsi, l'ours brun possède le même nombre de neurones que le chat, 10 fois plus petit, alors qu'il possède le nombre attendu de 10 fois plus de cellules non neuronales.

D'après Science & Vie Questions-Réponses n°34

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les singes ne deviennent-ils plus des humains ?
Le singe est-il réellement l'animal le plus proche de l'Homme ?

Si on regarde bien, on ne mange que de la viande d'herbivore mais pas de viande de carnivore, pourquoi ?

Les humains sont-ils censés être végétariens ? Un ami m'a dit que les humains ne sont pas censés manger de la viande, étant donné que nos dents sont plates comme des vaches mangeuses d'herbe, et non en crocs pointus comme des tigres, est-ce vrai ?

Pourquoi les carnivores ont-ils plus de jambes musclées que les herbivores ?
Que se passera-t-il si je donne de la viande à un animal herbivore ?
Pourquoi les herbivores ont-ils des cornes mais pas les carnivores ?
Est-ce que certains animaux herbivores deviennent carnivores à cause de la sécheresse ?
Quel est l'animal carnivore le plus intelligent ?
Est-il possible qu'une espèce animale herbivore évolue en une espèce carnivore ?
Pourquoi la plupart de nos animaux de compagnie sont-ils carnivores ?
A-t-on déjà fait l'expérience d'élever un animal carnivore comme herbivore et vice-versa?

Les animaux carnivores préfèrent-ils manger certains herbivores, ou n'ont-ils pas de préférences ?

Quels animaux ne sont pas, étonnamment, strictement herbivores ?
Est-ce que les animaux herbivores sont les plus puissants ? Si oui pourquoi ?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Over 100 wildlife rangers died on duty in past year: WWF

Posted by Kathy Pennell Kathy Pennell

A ranger of Kenya Wildlife Services tries to calm down a female Southern white rhino after she was shot.

More than 100 wildlife rangers died on the job in Asia and central Africa over the last year, nearly half killed by poachers, the WWF reported Tuesday.

Illegal hunters are decimating endangered wildlife to gather rhino horns and big cat body parts to sell in East Asia, as well as bush meat—including gorillas, monkeys, lions and pangolins—to eat.

One-in-seven park rangers across the two regions—home to many of the planet's richest biodiversity hotspots—were seriously injured over the same period, either in accidents or in clashes with illegal hunters.

The death toll was slightly higher that the previous July-to-July reporting period, bringing to 871 the total number of wildlife guardians who have lost their lives in the line of duty since 2009, according to the International Ranger Federation (IRF) and the Thin Green Line Foundation, which compile the grim tally.

"Forty-eight rangers of the 107 lost this year were murdered at their place of work," said Sean Willmore, president of the IRF. "Another 50 died in workplace accidents."

"We have to do better in training and equipping of rangers so that they have a greater chance of returning home to their families after patrol," he said.

The World Wildlife Fund will publish a report detailing the findings later this year, and is conducting a similar survey for East Africa, the organisation said in a statement.

"Rangers are the frontline of protecting much of this iconic wildlife," said Rohit Singh, WWF's Zero Poaching Lead, and president of the Ranger Federation of Asia.

"What is shocking is that—despite their willingness to bear these grave risks to save shared wildlife—few are receiving fair pay, insurance and adequate training."

In Asia, rangers earn the equivalent of $292 (250 euros) per month, on average, and in Central Africa the monthly pay check is typically $150.

This year saw the murder of Rachel Katumwa, the first female ranger known to be killed while on duty in the Virunga National Park in the Democratic Republic of Congo.

The month before, suspected members of an armed militia group involved in poaching gunned down five other wildlife rangers and their driver.

WWF has called on governments to urgently review and improve the shortcomings that are endangering park rangers.

What stops animals from inbreeding in the wild?

Serge Elia · Follow Animal lover6mo

The best example to give is definitely the lion: when male lions reach full maturity at around 2–3 years of age – during which their manes and hormones begin to develop –, they become ousted from their maternal prides. However cruel, it's a precaution that consists of not letting the sexually aroused sub-adults mate with their own mothers and aunts, in order to avoid inbreeding, incest and genetic pollution.

Unfortunately, with more and more fully-grown male lions (particularly the dark-maned individuals) getting hunted everyday by humans, as well as the ever-increasing habitat fragmentation from which lions and other endangered species suffer a lot, sub-adult males are staying in their maternal prides, which contributes to inbreeding and the negative impact that comes along, including a severe lack of genetic diversity in some areas.

In the world of tigers, when the cubs become of age at around 2 years old, they part ways with their mothers. If it happens that they refuse to leave despite their maturity, the tigress can quickly turn aggressive and fight them viciously, so as to force them to get out of the territory at once – in this case, it's also a precaution to prevent inbreeding (particularly when the sexually aroused sub-adults begin to lust for their own mothers!), as well as potentially lethal rivalry with the mother's next litter.

In banded mongoose societies, there are times in which the females in charge start kicking out some of their comrades (mainly their closest relatives), out of which can ensue a shockingly violent confrontation – zoologists speculate that this behavior, despite its brutality, is actually very useful, in the sense that it hinders inbreeding caused by mating within the same family, especially when too many breeding adults form the pack.

In many species – such as lemurs, house mice, elephants and black-legged kittiwakes (see above) –, inbreeding is averted when some females manage to select unrelated mates, whilst others will recognize relatives by the sound of their calls[1] or even the smell of their urine[2]!

Footnotes

[1] How Animal Daughters Avoid Mating With Dad

[2] How do wild animals prevent inbreeding?

Are leopards stronger than chimpanzees?

Erwin · Follow Former Compulsive Writer Updated 1y

Leopards are stronger than chimps, I don't get this fascination with chimps that people seem to have. Chimps are stronger than humans, but leopards are stronger than chimps.

Much of the mystique surrounding the prowess of the chimpanzee comes from the (shoddy) work of John Bauman. In 1923, Bauman used a dynamometer - a deviced used to measure pull strength - to check the pull strength of chimpanzees in the Bronx Zoo. After much prodding and cajoling he was able to get the unwitting chimps to participate in his experiment, and found a former circus ape named Suzette who was capable of pulling 1,260lbs of weight. Another chimp, Boma, was able to pull 847lbs one-handed.

He then went around testing football athletes from various colleges around America and found that they could only pull 500lbs at best, with a one-handed pull only going as far as 200lbs.

Thus was born the myth that chimps are 5 times stronger than humans.

Unfortunately, in 1943 Glen Finch of Yale University primate labs put these findings to the test and found that the actual strength of chimps were nothing close to 5 times the strength. On average, a chimp only had an arm strength about equal to that of a human. When correcting for size (as chimps are significantly smaller than humans) then it is indeed true that chimps are stronger, but it’s not anywhere near being 5 times as strong as a human.

Further testing in the 60’s confirmed this same: chimps have about twice as much strength as a human pound for pound, and this is true even for leg strength. But chimps are not quite the super athletes people give them credit for, sadly Bauman's work is the more attractive and bombastic of all these studies and it is the one people still like to quote.

Consider this:

A 2006 study found that chimps can jump 0.7m high. But a leopard can jump 3m high. That's more than three times the jump strength.

A leopard can also carry prey up to two times its body weight up a tree. This zebra foal as you can see is being brought up a tree using nothing but the leopard's jaws and neck. A full grown zebra is around 1,000lbs, but this foal is smaller and is probably only around 200lbs or so. A 100lb leopard can effortlessly hoist it up a tree and keep it there for later consumption. Chimpanzees don't have feats of strength that are equal to this.

Leopards and chimps — in the end it will depend on the specific specimen. Apparently there are super chimps in the Bili Forest in the Republic of Congo which are some kind of mystery hybrid of a gorilla and chimpanzee, which eats lions for breakfast. Scientists haven't actually confirmed whether they can eat lions, but there are chimps that have been known to attack leopards.

On the other hand, leopards are also known to eat chimps, and this has been confirmed by leopard poo studies wherein the poo had remnants of chimpanzee body parts. The thing is, chimps hunt in groups and will organize raiding parties to harry a leopard, but a leopard will just strike swiftly in the night to carry off an unwitting chimpanzee for dinner. But chimps attacking leopards is a very rare occurrence, and they can only do it because they are working as a group against the solitary leopard. By and large, it is far more common for a leopard to ambush a stray chimp and bring it home for dinner.

Nick Nicholas

Aside from geographical distribution, what makes a Jaguar different from a Leopard?

Studied Big Cats for 40+ years Updated 1y

They will actually interbreed with each other but the main differences are as follows:

Jaguar is much stockier and stronger than a leopard

Jaguar is a superb swimmer and catches much of its prey in the water

Leopards are much better climbers

Jaguars have a much stronger bite

Coats are different. Jaguars have much larger rosettes.

jaguar:

leopard

Related Answer
Do crocodiles and alligators ever meet?

Samuel Perloff Around 20 years experience as a bird and nature watcher Mar 16

Yes, but only in one area. American alligators and American crocodiles meet from time to time and overlap in range in Florida. The two crocodilians prefer slightly different habitats, the alligator staying mainly in freshwater marshes and other wetlands, while the crocodile dwell in coastal estuarian waters with a liking for slightly brackish water. Crocodiles can distribute across oceanic saltwater while alligators lack salt glands and so avoid extensive times out at sea. Florida is the heart of the alligator's range, while it is the outer northern limits basically of the American croc. Therefore, along with extensive favorable habitat, nesting sites and foods, alligators outnumber the far more locally range-restricted crocs in Florida about a thousand to one.

A crocodile attacking and injuring (possibly fatally) an alligator.

There are recorded confrontations between the two big reptiles. The two are close in size. While the American crocodile gets a little bigger than the alligator in length, the alligator tends to be a bit more robust bodied at similar size and have a more formidable looking thick snout against the crocs long, narrow snout (American crocodiles get the biggest from Costa Rica down to northern Southern America at up to over 16 feet, possibly to 20 feet). However, crocs tend to be rather more aggressive and are likely the most dangerous of American crocodilians. Fights can go either way, but I would bet on croc over gator more times than not.

An alligator attacking a crocodile in a dry pool.

A quel point serait-il difficile de tuer un éléphant avec un AK-47 ? How hard would it be to kill an elephant with an AK-47?

Jerome Cohen Un ami des animaux depuis toujours, de toutes espèces.Traducteur · 1 an

Gareth Roriston

NdT: certaines images sont de nature à choquer.

A quel point serait-il difficile de tuer un éléphant avec un AK-47 ?

En tant qu'ancien directeur de la Kenyan Wildlife Conservancy et maintenant opérateur de safari, je me sens qualifié pour répondre à cette question.

Je réponds à cette question non pas pour la fascination morbide, mais pour informer du risque que l'espèce court aux mains des braconniers avec cette arme de marché noir très répandue et facilement disponible.

Cela dépend vraiment de qui est le tireur. Généralement, les chasseurs, pour des raisons d'éthique, de sécurité et pour ne pas endommager leur trophée ou leur viande, utilisent des fusils de gros calibre pour tuer les éléphants d'un seul coup. Le calibre minimum recommandé est le .375HH Magnum avec un .416 Rigby et jusqu'au .500 Nitro Express, ce qui est courant. Cela dit, les plus petits calibres permettent d'abattre tout gros animal s'ils ont une pénétration suffisante et suffisamment de coups tirés juste par le poids du plomb. Dans d'autres exemples, les petits calibres avec une pénétration suffisante, un placement de tir expert et un bon tir au but accompliront la tâche aussi efficacement que les gros calibres énumérés ci-dessus.

Voici un petit extrait d'un rapport plus important concernant un incident de braconnage que j'ai eu à traiter, qui répondra à la question de manière assez complète et quelques images (pas pour les faibles de cœur) pour illustrer le point.

"Le braconnage

Un rapport de Galana Wildlife Conservancy par Gareth Roriston

À l'approche du crépuscule, dans la soirée pluvieuse du jeudi 11 octobre 2012, une volée de coups de feu a retenti près d'une petite station d'élevage où travaillent des employés de l'Agricultural Development Corporation vers 18h30.

Les employés de la station, connus sous le nom de Mali Saba, craignant pour leur vie, se sont mis sur la pointe des pieds et ont fui les lieux, conscients qu'une équipe de criminels aussi agressifs pourrait bien avoir aussi peu de considération pour la vie humaine qu'ils en avaient clairement pour les sept éléphants qu'ils étaient en train d'abattre.

Les hommes se sont cachés dans un boma à bétail détrempé et l'un d'entre eux a déclaré avoir compté quatorze coups de feu. Quatorze coups de feu et sept éléphants abattus. Si les chiffres sont exacts, il s'agit d'un exploit remarquable réalisé par des tireurs d'élite très expérimentés. Même si d'autres coups de feu ont été tirés, l'abattage de ces éléphants par ce que nous pensons être quatre hommes (d'après les empreintes qu'ils ont laissées derrière eux) armés uniquement de AK47 (d'après les cartouches trouvées sur les lieux selon une source du KWS) a des relents de professionnalisme criminel et d'efficacité impitoyable.

Les sept éléphants sont morts à trois endroits différents ; un seul éléphant, puis un groupe de deux et enfin quatre. On pense que le troupeau ciblé était plus important que les sept morts et il est possible que d'autres aient été blessés, bien qu'il s'agisse d'une simple spéculation. “

Des caisses de 7,62x39 mm ont été retrouvées sur les lieux. C'est le calibre des AK47 du bloc Est.

Edit 04/04/19 : Deux photos des douilles récupérées.

Questions similaires

Que se passerait-il si je me faisais tirer dessus avec un AK-47 alors que je porte un gilet pare-balles ?

Le AK-47 est-il réellement une bonne arme ?
Quel est le coût d'un AK-47 en Russie ?

Est-il possible de créer un lien avec un lion ou un tigre, et de le domestiquer jusqu'à un certain point ?

Quelle est la portée réelle d'un AK-47?
Un humain pourrait-il vaincre un Tyrannosaurus Rex avec un AK-47 à pleine charge ?

Un éléphant vous charge, mais vous avez un lance-roquette (RPG-29) chargé dans les mains. Arriverez-vous à survivre ?

Pourquoi les Kalachnikov AK-47 ne s'enrayent jamais ?

Que se passerait-il si, après une bataille sanglante, un soldat américain revenait à la base avec un AK-47 et sans que son M4 ou M16 ne soit retrouvé ?

Pourquoi l'AK-74 n'est-il pas aussi populaire que l'AK-47 ?

Hypothétiquement, si vous aviez un AK-47 avec munitions illimitées, sans surchauffe ni blocage, et que vous pouviez viser parfaitement jusqu'à sa portée maximale, quelle est la chose la plus puissante que vous pourriez abattre ? Un hélico ? Un tank ?

Quel serait l'effet d'un pistolet électrique Taser sur un éléphant en train de charger ?

A quel point serait-il difficile de descendre un B-52 Stratofortress avec un missile ou de l'artillerie ? Qu'est-ce qui rend la chose difficile ? Cela a-t-il déjà été fait ?

Est-ce que Rambo tirant d'une main à la mitrailleuse M60 est une situation crédible en combat ?

Un T-Rex serait-il capable de tuer un éléphant adulte ?

Do lions have any natural predators?

Boris Sanochkin · Follow Former (Ret.) Lt. Colonel 8mo
Samuel Hillington, Cashier (2019-present) Answered Jun 28, 2021

The answer might sound shocking, but not counting humans, baboons are routinely targeting lions for extermination.

The lions are dangerous predators of primates, to counter the problem baboons adopted a tactic of snatching and killing their cubs to control the population of lions. The behavior is highly social, with groups of baboons assembled to distract their parents, to find and kill numerous cubs simultaneously.

Not usually. A full grown healthy adult would not have many predators, but not every lion is a full grown healthy adult. So let’s start at the beginning.

Cub:

younglings are the most vulnerable to predation of all animals on this planet, lions are no exception.

They’re vulnerable to

Spotted Hyenas:

African leopards:

African Rock pythons:

Wild dogs:

Nile crocodiles:

Due to an abundance of predators in the lion’s natural range, their mortality rate is very high at around 67%. Healthy Adult lions only have two predators in all of Africa. Which is pretty impressive considering Africa is the most competitive continent on the planet.

Those aforementioned predators are

Spotted hyenas:

And Nile crocodiles:

But other than that, lions seem to be pretty dominant in their natural range.

Hope this helps.

Related Links

If humans lived in the wild what would their predators be?
How can a giraffe protect itself from a lion or other predators?
What animals are enemies to lions?
Is it true that tigers won't attack a human who is looking at them?
Do lions attack humans on sight?
Do giraffes have any natural predators?

I read somewhere that the MGM lions roar is actually a tiger. They did this apparently because the lions roar wasn't loud enough. Is this true?

Amongst a lion and a tiger, who is the apex predator?
Why is the African lion the apex land predator and not the tiger?
Are lions afraid of people?

Related Answer
Do lions gang up against a single lion in the wild? Why?

Serge Elia, Animal lover Answered Oct 17, 2018

Yes, they do.

When male lion cubs reach full maturity at around two to three years of age, they become ousted from their maternal prides, and left to embrace the life of nomads, during which they prowl the savanna like hyenas, in search of a new pride and territory to rule over.

In the process, the lions – usually brothers, half-brothers or cousins – form groups called coalitions. The size of these coalitions usually varies between two and seven individuals, probably more. But whatever the number, these lions form altogether the most powerful force in the land, ready to launch a deadly assault i Do honey badgers have any natural predators?

Clayton Postier , Greatly interested in ancient cats and canines Updated Apr 23, 2019

Despite their famous toughness, honey badgers are, in fact, not made of Kevlar.

Leopards, lions, hyenas, convincingly even jackals if in pairs; all are perfectly capable of killing an overgrown weasel.

Honey badgers rely on shock and awe. Predators run because it seems like something so small should be afraid of them.

Let’s put it this way: you can beat a rabbit in a fight, right? But if a rabbit charged at you like it’s trying to murder you, YOU WOULD RUN.

Plus, they taste as rank as they smell.

Related Answer
Can a zebra kill a lion if it gets really angry?

Jay Williams, Businessman (2004-present) Answered Jun 8, 2021

Warning - this doesn't answer your question but there is a point to it.
I live on a little 10 acre property next to massive forest. Deer and elk (elk only during rut) stroll across and eat up all my goodies in the fields and destroy my flowers, etc.

My dog is a very athletic mastiff cross…about 100 lbs but lean amd muscular. He will chase deer off on command and they are very afraid of him.

Well about a month ago, I was walking with him down from my office and he saw a big doe beside the fenced flower garden about 100m away. The doe didn't move when she saw us.

I gave the command “go get'em" and Reggie bolted full speed to chase off the doe. She didn't run. My sight line was blocked a bit and saw grass flying in the air and could see a chase going on but couldn't make it out because of the obstruction. Then I heard Reggie yelp, and I suddenly saw Reggie in a full sprint RUNNING AWAY FROM THE DOE! She was hoofing his ass while he was running and couldn't get away from her…so he ran towards me with the doe basically on top of him. I yelled and raised both my arms and charged towards the doe who then turned away and ran.

She ran right back to the area where she was beside the flower garden.

Then I saw it. There was a little brown fuzzy little movement beside the doe. It was a days old fawn. Barely could stand. May have even been a day old.

The doe was protecting her little fawn and had not a single thought of risking her life to fight a dog that could kill her, or of the 6′2″ 260lb yelling human. She was fearless and had hoofed a cut right beside Reggie's butthole. Like literally tore him a new asshole. Now if she didn't have her fawn, she would have ran and Reggie, if he caught her may have ended her. But the tables were turned.

Moral of the story - never mess with a mama and her young. No matter what species.

A mama zebra protecting her baby would kick the lion's skull in and wouldn't think twice about charging a lion if they were cornered. I put my money on mamazebra.

Here is a pic of an embarrassed doggo

Related Answer
Do giraffes have any natural predators?

Serge Elia , Animal lover Updated Dec 5, 2018

Due to their length and size, as well as their deadly kick that can kill in one hit, adult giraffes have virtually no predators to fear from. On the other hand, juveniles are vulnerable to attacks from hyenas, crocodiles, leopards and African wild dogs.

But still, very few predators are able to bring down fully grown giraffes, other than lions, the only African carnivores capable of doing so, all thanks to their size (lions are Africa's largest cats), agility, strength, powerful jaws and claws, and especially sheer strength in numbers.

The other predator capable of killing an adult giraffe is Man. And sadly, human activities, especially habitat fragmentation, poaching and trophy hunting, have led to a heavy decline in giraffe population.

For example: this woman has been slammed on social media because of what she has done to this rare black giraffe.

At the same time, the giraffes' greatest enemy has also become their only hope in order to stop illegal environmental acts. Indeed, lots of conservation efforts are constantly under way to save these magnificent ungulates as well as to save all of Africa's wildlife. And it's now more imperative than ever to encourage these efforts, for the purpose of providing giraffes a better future.

Related Answer

Is it true that cheetahs are the weakest big cat from all the big cats?

Robin Shepard, Volunteer - Wildlife ACT, Cheetah Conservation Fund
Updated Jul 27, 2020

The term “Big Cats” is actually a bit debatable, but according to most experts, cheetahs do not fit into this category. “Big Cats” are most commonly defined as the five living members of the genus Panthera, namely the tiger, lion, jaguar, leopard, and snow leopard.

Cheetahs are in a genus all their own, Acinonyx, due to their very unique and singular attributes. Unlike those in the Panthera genus, cheetahs do not roar, and they do not have retractable claws and articulating wrists. This and many other speed-related adaptations, makes them a highly specialized predator which can outrun all other animals on land. They are the sprinters of the animal world.

Does this mean they are “weak?” Ask anyone who has been attacked by a cheetah and I doubt they would call this predator weak.

Is our fastest known human, Usain Bolt, weak? Are sprinters in the Olympics weak? I would argue they are not. But compared to a heavyweight boxer, then maybe the case could be made. I would use other terms though, such as lean, agile, svelte, athletic, or just simply fast.

But as you have asked for them to be compared to the other "big cats," perhaps one could make the claim that they are weaker. Most big cats are not nearly as functionally designed as the cheetah and also do not have the unique ability to remove themselves from threats at lightning speed. This means that most big cats must fight other predators and also fight within their own species, much more than a cheetah does.

So we can see that, while big cats are more muscled, they are also much less specialized, requiring them to deal with more physical threats. That said, cheetahs can deal with significant threats, including other predators, and taking down prey much bigger than themselves.

Would a cheetah win in a one-on-one fight with a tiger, jaguar or lion? Nope. With a leopard or snow leopard? Cheetahs have a shot, depending on circumstances, though they are much more likely to use their skills for a fast evacuation, instead of risking it. But I would submit that cheetahs are very strong, capable, and exceptionally finely tuned for their unique role in their ecosystems, as the "King of Speed."

[Image Credits: Deon Hoon, Nate Skate, Africa Geographic, DLILLC, World Wild.]

Related Links

If humans lived in the wild what would their predators be?
How can a giraffe protect itself from a lion or other predators?
What animals are enemies to lions?
Is it true that tigers won't attack a human who is looking at them?
Do lions attack humans on sight?
Do giraffes have any natural predators?

I read somewhere that the MGM lions roar is actually a tiger. They did this apparently because the lions roar wasn't loud enough. Is this true?

Amongst a lion and a tiger, who is the apex predator?
Why is the African lion the apex land predator and not the tiger?
Are lions afraid of people?
Why do male lions back off when the lionesses try to attack them?
Why is it that most predators normally don't attack humans?
What are the moose's natural predators?
Do cheetahs have any natural predators in the wild?
What animals can kill a giraffe in one to one confrontation?

Related Links

Do lions have any natural predators?
What are the cheetah's biggest enemies?

Do lions know that leopards and cheetahs are their feline family? If so, why do lions still attack or kill them?

Which animal preys on cheetahs?
Why are wild cheetahs (generally) so friendly to humans?
What are the natural predators of wild horses?
Is it true that cheetahs are the weakest big cat from all the big cats?
Could a human ever defeat a leopard, cheetah, jaguar, or tiger (with no weapons)?
Are there any proved cases of dhole packs killing adult tigers or leopards?
Is it true that cheetahs do not attack or eat humans? If that is true, then why not?
What are the natural predators of wild boars?
Do tigers ever interact with cheetahs?
If humans lived in the wild what would their predators be?
Do Lions have any easy prey to eat?

Why did evolution make cheetahs and leopards solitary but not lions? Wouldn't all of them benefit from being in a group just like lions?

Related Answer
What are the biggest misconceptions that foreigners have about Kenya?

Morris Gad, ICT Support Engineer (2003-present) Answered Dec 2, 2019

The biggest misconception about Kenya is I mainly from the western world who believe Africa is a country whose president was Mandela and Kenya is a Jungle where wild animals interact freely with the masses and that every Kenyan can run a marathon.
Kenya is a fast-developing country whose capital city Nairobi hosts a UN headquarter and it is a vibrant and cosmopolitan city.

Some of the Kenyan diversity is illustrated in the pictures attached.

alamy stock photo
PW0WMH
www.alamy.com

In what circumstances, if any, can a ranger in Kenya (masai mara) intervene in what animals are doing? Ie can they intervene if they see a lion attacking an endangered cheetah cub?

Nick Nicholas · Follow

Rangers should never interfere with the course of nature except in very extreme cases. Everything witnessed on the savannah between the animals is part of the lottery game of life and death that animals play on a daily basis.

It is not particularly pleasant to see male lions killing lion cubs when they take over a pride or the killing of competitor's cubs but it is all part of the survival game.

There was a show recently where some penguins managed to trap themselves in a hole and could not get out. The BBC crew dug them a passage out so they would survive.

This came under some criticism, notably by Sir David Attenborough, who said that nature should always be allowed to take its course.

I do remember reading a story about a lion cub with a broken pelvis who was euthanized by rangers but other than that there has to be a very good reason to interfere. It generally only happens when Rangers are going after poachers but that is not interfering with nature as humans are involved.

I certainly would not interfere in the below !!!

Seconds out ….. Round 1 Ding Ding Ding

Related Answer
Why is Maasai Mara so much cheaper than Serengeti?

Ankit Ranjan, Google Guide at Google Maps Answered Jun 22, 2019

Comparing the area Serengeti National park is 4 times that of Masai Mara. So Masai Mara can be covered in lesser time and all kinds of animals can be seen. But, The endangered black Rhino can be seen more in Serengeti National Park. You're likely to see the Big 5(They were the Elephant, Rhino, Lion, Leopard and Buffalo) if you have a good guide and you explore well. Here are some pictures from my game drive:

And the Hot air balloon is a must try to witness one of the best sunrises.

Related Answer

Why are cheetahs easily attacked by lions and tigers while cheetahs are the fastest runners?

Robin Shepard , Projects, Volunteer at Cheetah Conservation Fund
Updated Sep 24, 2019

Originally Answered: Why are cheetahs easily attacked by lions and tigers while cheetahs is the fastest runner than lions and tigers?

Q: Why are cheetahs easily attacked by lions and tigers while cheetahs are the fastest runners?

Everyone's got their own strengths… and weaknesses.

The Cheetah is the fastest land animal - this is a known fact. But in order to be the fastest animal on four legs, evolution had to sacrifice some other things. They are lean, light and aerodynamic. Much like a human sprinter, they can only sustain those lightning fast speeds in relatively short bursts, but those bursts are usually enough to save them from danger from other, larger cats like the lions you mention. But sometimes the tables are turned.

Now, we must remember that the wild is just that - WILD. Variables abound out there, and any wild animal must be ready for almost anything. Each species has their own special traits that make them excel above others in some way. While lions are not nearly as fast as cheetahs, they have some other things on their side: Size, strength, numbers and time.

Lions are about 3 to 4 times larger than cheetahs making them much stronger by default, and they live and hunt in groups called “prides” which makes them an even greater force. Hunting in groups has another advantage: it saves time. Time which you can use for other ventures, such as the lions favorite pastime: napping.

But it also gives lions the luxury of a much more relaxed life and less need to be on constant alert, using up precious energy looking for the next prey item, since the group keeps each other fed much more efficiently than a lone predator. This also gives them more time to seek out rivals like cheetahs, African Wild Dogs, leopards, and others in order to exterminate the competition.

On top of this, all predators, and prey alike, has some sort of camouflage and a great deal of stealth tech. Everyone from lizards, to antelope, to the big cats are highly trained in hiding and/or sneaking up on others. This increases the chance that a tawny-grass-colored lion (or other predator) could catch a cheetah off guard and attack them when they're resting, feeding or tending to their young.

Speaking of young, another thing that gets cheetahs into conflict with lions is the adorable balls of fluff themselves, cheetah cubs.

A mother cheetah will put herself in between a powerful lion and her cubs, even though she knows she could not will an all-out fight, in order to give her babies the best chance at survival. This means that cheetahs will sometimes willingly choose to stand up to a lion or other large predator like a leopard, knowing full well they have just walked into a fight they are not likely to win.

Cheetahs could also be caught off guard by lions after a tiring chase, or while feeding. Usually the cheetah will use its amazing speed to retreat before the lion gets close enough, but sometimes other circumstances come into play, forcing a conflict. Cheetahs in a coalition (small group of males) may feel more brave and try to defend their kill. Or a group of lions could surround a cheetah, making a running escape more difficult.

Sometimes the cheetah will come out on top in these situations, using a combination of bluffing, their racer's teeth and claws - which are serious weapons in their own right, and their speed to divert, tire out, or lure the attacker away.

And just as a side note, cheetahs and tigers will not come into conflict in the wild today. They live too far apart and in very different habitats, the cheetah being the speed king of the open plains, and the tiger being the true "King of the Jungle" in forested and jungle areas. Cheetahs are visual hunters who need wide open spaces for their speed to really shine, which is why they have a much harder time hunting and surviving in areas which are forested or have lots of brush.

This is one reason cheetahs in some areas are suffering grave eye injuries, and losing territory to thornbush encroachment. This has come about in the last few decades as local farmers and ranchers are overgrazing their domestic livestock in ecologically sensitive wild areas, which then creates a harsh and degraded environment where only thornbush can thrive, where a grass savanna once was.

Left to its natural balance in the ecosystem, conflict between cheetahs and lions would be pretty rare, as each animal has its own strength and its own weakness, and they have evolved to use those in a beautiful dance for survival in their respective ways. But the artificial pressures of human encroachment and human-made conflicts have pressed wildlife into ever-shrinking and sub-optimal areas, making predator conflict much more frequent.

If you're interested in the work being done in Namibia to mitigate the thornbush encroachment problem, or the urgent situation around the cheetah's "Race for Survival" in a land that's been changed dramatically by human use and conflict, please visit the world renowned Cheetah Conservation Fund for more information.

Image Credit [Google and other listed sources]

Related Answer
Is it true that there used to be giant cheetahs?

Francesco Brosolo , I am an animal lover, student and observer since childhood
Updated Mar 27, 2018

Yep. They are literally called that and they were much larger than present-day cheetahs.

The Giant Cheetah was as large as a lioness albeit lighter. It was roughly twice the size of today's cheetahs, putting it at around 100 kilograms, and about 200 centimetres from head to rump, not including a 140-centimetre tail. Its reconstructed shoulder height was at 90 centimetres.

It was a specialized sprinter with long limbs just like the modern cheetah and a back that is slightly longer. This back is highly flexible and allowed great propulsion during a sprint. Giant Cheetahs were present in Europe during the Early and Middle Pleistocene. The Giant Cheetah was found in Germany, France, and also in China and India. European cheetahs occurred alongside jaguars and leopards at some Middle Pleistocene localities, and it is possible that competition among the three contributed to the cheetah's decline. Its large mass and more worn claws (when compared to modern cheetahs) suggest it was less adapted to climbing, an ability which would continue to evolve until modern-day cheetahs appeared.

Related Links

Is it true that the reason why lionesses do not kill hyenas it's because they're more successful hunters than them and whenever there's no kill for the day because they failed, they can scavenge on hyenas' kill just to survive?

Why do lions not attack when you are in a safari vehicle?
Why are there no tigers in Africa? There are lions, leopards, cheetahs, etc.

Who would win in a fight between different species of cats: lion, tiger, leopard, jaguar, snow leopard, cheetah, and puma?

Why do people feel more sad when a lion or lioness kills a cheetah or its cubs compared to when a lions kill other predators like leopards, wild dogs, and hyenas?

Why don't cheetahs and jaguars hunt in packs, considering how often their kills are stolen by hyenas?

Which big cats in Africa have the most successful hunting rate among lions, cheetahs and leopards?

Has Kevin Richardson ever been attacked by a lion?
Why do male lions kill the cubs?
Can hyenas beat lions?

Who are better hunters between a pride of lions, a group of hyenas, group of African wild dogs, and a pack of wolves?

How hard is it for a cheetah to survive in Africa alongside predators like lions, leopards and hyenas?

How does one Maasai tribe warrior in Kenya kill a lion?

Why don't herds of Wildebeest, Zebra and Impala team up against Lions? I always see videos of a huge herd running from a few lions. Even if only a few decided to fight, wouldn't the Lions instantly be overwhelmed?

If I'm attacked by a big cat (tiger, leopard, Jaguar, lion, cougar, etc.), would poking the beast in its eyes force it to release me?

How rare is the King Cheetah?

Serge Elia · Follow Animal lover3y

In the exact same way black panthers and white tigers are rare.

Once thought to be a separate subspecies, the king cheetah is actually a variety of the common cheetah, just like the white tiger is a variety of tiger, and the black panther a variety of leopard and jaguar.

How do king cheetahs get their distinctive striped coat and large, blotchy spots? Simply because of a rare genetic mutation due to a recessive gene, an event known as lack of genetic diversity, resulting in the cats being a rare sight in the wild. Such is the same case for black panthers and white tigers, as well as white lions.

Related Answer
Is a cheetah weak compared to other big cats?

Serge Elia , Animal lover Answered Feb 12, 2018

Unfortunately, yes.

Being the fastest land animal on earth – it runs at more than 110 km/h, so fast it almost never touches the ground –, the cheetah has evolved over the years to have long, thin legs and non-retractile claws as well as a slender body, as opposed to the robust build of its bigger and sturdier cousins, especially the lion and the tiger.

Thus said, cheetahs have traded brute strength with speed. Speed is of course necessary for hunting and self-defense – thanks to its astonishing speed, the cheetah's success rate in making kills is the highest of all big cats (40–50%), and it can easily outrun any chasing lion –, but so is brute strength; and sadly, cheetahs are not blessed with brute strength. Sure enough, if a lion does succeed in catching a cheetah despite the latter's speed, it's a no-brainer: should it try to defend itself by fighting, the cheetah is as good as dead, defenseless against the lion's sheer robustness and far more powerful bite-force.

Once a cheetah makes a kill, it is highly exhausted by then, panting heavily and seeking to rest under the blazing sun before even thinking of eating. Not exactly a wise decision, for that's the right time for scavengers to come by – vultures, jackals, and especially hyenas –, eager for a free meal. The spotted cat might try to fend them off by hissing loudly, hitting the ground with its claws and glaring with its pale yellow eyes, but because of exhaustion, it is all bark and no bite – the much better built hyenas won't think twice before chasing the cheetah away and deliberately stealing its kill.

Sadly yes, cheetahs are built for speed and not for fighting; they heavily rely on their speed for the hunt, and so they will not risk to fight other, much better built predators, preferring to lose a kill rather than their life.

Such is the case when being confronted not only by lions and hyenas, but also baboons and leopards.

The matter only gets worse: as stated, the cheetah is heavily dependent upon its extraordinary speed; thus, one misplaced kick from an ungulate it hunts (whether wildebeest, gazelle, zebra, antelope…) can quickly knock it out of action, therefore condemning it to never run again, and to die from starvation.

So, yes, the cheetah is indeed weak compared to other big cats, probably the weakest of them all.

However, male cheetahs seem to pass over their species' usual weakness – sure enough, upon reaching adulthood, cheetah brothers remain together for life, living the life of pack hunters until death, hunting together and protecting each other until the moment they die. They even seem to tolerate outsiders and welcome them among their group.

Related Answer
Who will win a fight between Dwayne Johnson and a cheetah?

Brian Birdsall , Worked With Adirondack Bear & Cat Rescue at Volunteer Work With Animals (2018-present) Updated Jul 26, 2020

The Rock fought off a large male cheetah while filming Jumanji!
Yes, it's true, Dwayne Johnson would exemplify a human specimen capable of defeating a Cheeteh in unarmed combat.

Dwayne: 6'5" 272lbs. 46 years old

Cheetah: 135lbs. Large male in prime condition

Naturally the Cheetah would simply run off when confronted by a large beastly man….but this awfully confused cheetah thinks he's a leopard:

As the cheetah sprints to around 60 mph towards the big man, the Rock stands his ground. The cat leaps towards Dwayne, who greets the charging cat with a boot to it's head. Dwayne wrestles the dazed feline to the grass…he's able to overpower the weak beast and choke it with both hands by the throat, and repeatedly slam its head onto the hard earth…(BIG hands brother!).

The cheetah rakes his legs violently in desperation, to escape the Rock….who graciously lets go and watches the cat jet away into the tall grass. The blunted claws of the cheetah prevent anything worse than superficial scratches…as the Rock nervously laughs while applying some bandages.

What saved the rock from a grizzly battle or death?

His size and strength are far above the average man….simply too much muscle for the slim cheetah to overpower, and land a suffocating bite. Had the cheetah possessed razor sharp, long, retractable claws… it would probably rip Dwayne's guts out…but it's claws are simply too dull. The cat's dewclaw….rather sharp for grappling purposes, is certainly not enough to disembowel.

An Average man compared to Dwayne….a cheetah would not fuck around with Johnson

Update 10/2019:

This isn't really debatable, sorry guys. Enough with the obnoxious comments about how the cat will torpedo at the Rock using kinetic energy and bust Dwayne's legs. If such a collision did oddly occur, the lightweight cheetah would be hurt badly from the impact. No retractable claws means no deep lacerations. The Rock would be up against an adult greyhound with a stronger bite…easily overpowered by an extremely powerful and coordinated/athletic man.

Related Answer
Can a cheetah kill a buffalo?

Serge Elia, Animal lover

The cheetah has evolved over the years to possess long, thin legs and non-retractile claws as well as a slender body, as opposed to the robust build of its bigger and sturdier cousins, especially the lion and the tiger.

This equipment is what allows the cheetah to reach the lightning speed of 110 km/h, and to outrun most fast-running ungulates like gazelles when on the hunt. For that matter, the 72-kg cheetah, with its non-retractile claws and rather weak jaws, can only hunt gazelles, wildebeests, small antelope and other appropriately sized prey species.

The African buffalo, weighing at around 500–1000 kg, is just too big and sturdy for the relatively small cheetah to take on – the ability of killing a fully-grown buffalo belongs solely to the much more powerful lions. But still, this bad-tempered bovine is one of Africa’s most feared giants, equipped with its bulk, high aggression, lethal horns and hooves, and stampeding strength in numbers.

In fact, buffaloes have been known to fend off hunting lions and hyenas – it goes further, the ill-tempered buffaloes are known to charge at anything that gets in their way, so why would cheetahs, the smallest and weakest of Africa's big cats, be any different?

To sum it up, a cheetah cannot kill a buffalo, since it's far too small and weak to take on the large bovine.

Related Links

Who would win in a fight, a cheetah or a big strong man?
Can a cheetah easily kill a tall muscular adult male human?

What happens when a serval and a cheetah cross paths in the wild? Will the cheetahs most likely attack it?

Can an average human kill a cheetah in a fight?
Is it true that cheetahs do not attack or eat humans? If that is true, then why not?
Who would win in a death match, a human or a cheetah?
Is it true that there used to be giant cheetahs?
Can a strong human beat a leopard?
How do jaguars attack humans?
What are some interesting facts about cheetahs?
Is it true a gorilla would win a fight against a lion?
How many humans does it take to kill a lion barehanded?
Do coyotes eat cheetahs?
Can a cheetah climb up the trees?
What is the best way to survive when we are being chased by a cheetah?

How big is a bull walrus in comparison to an African elephant?

Sergio Diniz Animals researcher on spare hours Updated Dec 6

A bull walrus can be very big, let's see it.
Compared to a human:

Image: Pin on creation

An walrus can even dwarf a big polar bear:

Image: FISHY BUSINESS

But, how big are them?

Male Pacific walruses can reach 3.6 m long and weigh over 1,500kg (that's 1.5 tonnes!). [1]
Pretty big right? Pacific walruses are bigger than their Atlantic cousins.

But stil not even half most African elephants… Let's see it.

A bull African elephant can be much bigger:

The average African elephant will grow to between 8.2 to 13 feet (2.5 to 4 meters) from shoulder to toe and weigh between 5,000 to 14,000 lbs. (2,268 to 6,350 kilograms), according to the National Geographic.[2]

We can just compare it with a vehicle in the photo above…

I know this by myself, because once our jeep had to run from a bull male African elephant, very aggressive during the mating season… Scary (see more at Sergio Diniz's answer to When using safari vehicles or any vehicle where people are taking pictures of animals in Africa, what keeps predators from attacking the people in the vehicles?)

Footnotes
[1] Top 10 facts about Walrus
[2] African Elephant Facts - Elephants For Africa

Related Answer
Are there any major differences between African elephants and Indian elephants, aside for the size of their ears?

Amanda Huntington
Updated Mar 20, 2020

African elephants are noticeably bigger than Indian elephants. Indian elephants typically weigh 2.5–5 tons with a known maximum weight of 7.7 tons. The African elephant is 4–8 tons with a known maximum of 12 tons.

While smaller than the African bush elephant, the Indian elephant is bigger than the African forest elephant. The African forest elephant is about 2–4 tons on average and 6–9 feet tall, with a known maximum height of 10 feet.

African elephants are about 9–11 feet tall, with a known maximum height of 13.8 feet tall while Indian elephants are 7–10 feet tall, with a known maximum height of 11.3 feet tall.

Indian elephants have dome-shaped, bumpy heads while African elephants have flatter, smoother heads.

African elephants have slumped backs while Indian elephants have an arched back.

African elephants have two “fingers” on the tip of their proboscis while Indian elephants have one finger on the tip of their proboscis.

Only Indian elephant bulls develop fully grown tusks while cows develop “tushes” or are completely tusk-less. African elephant bulls and cows both sport fully-grown tusks when they became adults.

Aside from physical differences, Indian elephants belong to the genus Elephas while African elephants belong to the genus Loxodonta. Indian elephants are more closely related to the long-extinct Mammuthus (mammoth) genus than they are to the Loxodonta (African elephant) genus. Meanwhile, African forest elephants are more closely related to the also-extinct Paeleoloxodon (straight-tusked elephant) genus.

Elephas, Paeleoloxodon, Loxodonta, and Mammuthus share a very close common ancestor known as Primelephas and belong to Elephantidae (the elephant family). They all belong to the larger order of Proboscidea. Later Proboscideans are characterized by large tusks, a muscular proboscis, columnar legs, a massive body, and a multi-ton weight.

Also, Indian elephants are reportedly less aggressive and more trainable than African elephants are. I don’t know true that is, though.

Written by Santhosh, who suggested an edit to this answer:

"It is not entirely true, but in the South of India, precisely Kerala, we have centuries of practice in taming the elephants and using tamed elephants to tame the wild ones.

The picture above is of one of the tallest and calmest elephants we ever had the honor to be our friend - his name is Thechikottukavu Ramachandran".

(Indian elephants are less aggressive and more trainable. Several people have confirmed this now).

EDIT: It seems that Asian elephants can grow more hair on their heads than African elephants can.

According to the same person who suggested the edits, however, Asian elephants lose their hair as they age (kinda like humans, right?).

In contrast, African elephants are generally bald.

EDIT 2: Okay, I may have gotten that wrong. African elephants aren’t entirely bald, either. They have sparse hair on their heads.

Figure 1 - Example

Asian elephant head (right). African elephant head (left).

Related Answer

How heavy is an African elephant?

Shivani Shekhavat , M.Sc Zoology, School Of Science ,Gujarat University (2020)

Updated Dec 1, 2019 Originally Answered: What is the weight of an African elephant?

There are two spices of African elephants.

African savannah, Loxodonta africana

SIZE: Height at the shoulder, 2.49 to 3.96 m

WEIGHT: 2267 to 6350 kg

African forest, Loxodonta cyclotis

SIZE: shoulder height of 2.4 m

Weight: 2,700 - 6,000 kg

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Sat

Baby elephant drinking. When they are this young, they don’t yet know how to use their trunks to drink water.

Elephants moms teach calves how to stand up , swim and so much more .

Related Links

Are there any major differences between African elephants and Indian elephants, aside for the size of their ears?

What would happen if an Asian elephant meets an African elephant?
Who would win in a fight between a bear and an elephant?
How big was the largest dinosaur compared to an African bull elephant?
Who will win a fight between African and Asian Elephants?
Can African and Asian elephants mate?

Why was the Asian elephant domesticated for transport and labor, but the African elephant was not?

How heavy is an African elephant?
Who would win between a fully grown African elephant and a fully grown triceratops?
Which is bigger, a sea lion or a walrus?
What is the smallest animal that could kill a bull African elephant?
What's bigger, a walrus or an elephant seal?
Why are there no tamed African elephants nowadays like their Asian cousins?

Why do Asian elephants have a domed back, while African elephants have a dipping back? Also, why do Asian elephants have the double-hump on their heads?

How would I differentiate between an Asian and an African elephant?

Related Answer
What would happen if an Asian elephant meets an African elephant?

Stefan Pociask , Tracking Instructor. Field researcher. Wildlife Rehabilitation
Updated Jun 28, 2020 Featured on HuffPost, Forbes and Apple News

First off, it's not recommended, although not for the reasons you might suspect. But I'll get to that.

Generally speaking… the same thing that would happen as when any two elephants meet, that had never met before. It would depend on the situation. If one or the other felt threatened, the dominant one… normally the larger one (which likely means the African)… would establish its dominance, and the other one would accept that. This is what likely would happen in the wild, where there was a matriarch in charge, or a big bull with some authority. The herd or family structure would need to be maintained. But this would never happen naturally, of course, since they are from different continents.

If it were in a zoo, where the "herd" structure would not be as strong, there would probably be no perceived threat (after careful introduction), and they would mingle and get to know each other. Perhaps even bond; particularly if they were both being mistreated in captivity, lonely, or suffering from any kind of PTSD. They may end up comforting each other. All elephants are very intelligent and have a wide range of genuine emotions. Empathy is something that all elephants openly possess. Here is an Asian Elephant meeting an African Elephant for the first time. [1]

Having said all that… elephants have strong individual personalities. So it's impossible to predict exactly what any of them would do, with 100% accuracy. They didn't read the human-written book "Elephant Behavior". But overall, there seems to be no inherent prejudice or bigotry between elephants of different species or sub-species; they aren't humans, after all.

Here is the reason mixing them is not recommended. When elephant captivity was in its infancy, it was thought to be perfectly acceptable to mix Asians with Africans. Aside from the two species having a different "language" (which eventually they seem to overcome), and the fact that Africans tend to be a bit rougher in their interaction with each other… socially, there isn't much problem. The well-known problem comes with the fact that there is a virus called EEHV; in fact there are two types of EEHV. One is found in Africans in a latent form, which means they are carriers and it doesn't affect them. But it can easily be transferred to Asian Elephants, which causes deaths of baby Asian calves by causing internal bleeding. EEHV is the number 1 killer of baby captive elephants. Just like in humans, losing a newborn can cause deep depression in a mother elephant, particularly considering the extremely long gestation period that elephants go through. The other form of EEHV can devastate African herds when transferred from Asian Elephants. Very few zoos and parks in the US will mix herds of Africans with Asians these days, because of EEHV risks. The exception is when all the members of a herd are beyond breeding age, as babies are the only ones at risk. So, if you ever happen to go to a park where the two species are intermingling, you can be fairly certain that all of the elephants are relatively mature; say… 40–50 years old, or older.

Elephants, regardless of species, are much better at getting along with each other's differences than humans are. At risk of being cliché… we could learn a thing or two, from our pachyderm friends.

IMAGE CITATION:

[1] Photo from San Diego Zoo website "ZOONOOZ" Elephants: A Zoo Family

What animal has the lowest preference for mercy?

Xanthi Francis · Follow Former Journalist Updated 1y

Are you familiar with the reptilian brain?
No? Well let me aquaint you. The reptilian brain understands only four commands: Fight, Flight, Feed and Fu… make love.

The observant person will notice that mercy did not figure in the reptilian brain.

Does that crocodile care that it is killing a small impala? Does it care a mother could be grieving or a baby is snatched to death before its time?

No. Reptiles don't care for niceties like that.

They have no mercy. They're not built for mercy. They're unable to conceive of mercy and you know what? They have lived for hundreds of millions of years longer than primates. Go figure.

Related Links

How do animals feel when we kill their kind in front of them?

What animal has the lowest IQ?
Can animals show mercy?

Why is it that humans must cook meat before consumption to avoid illness and animals don't need to?

Which animal would deliver the worst death?
Which animal encounter would give humans the lowest chance of survival?
Which animal's meat has the lowest fat content?
Do animals (especially dogs) prefer to die alone?
What are some examples of animals behaving like humans?

Scientifically speaking, is it possible for a person to live inside a whale's belly for days and survive after the whale vomits?

Pourquoi les lions n'attaquent-ils pas lorsque vous êtes dans un véhicule de safari ?/Why do lions not attack when you are in a safari vehicle?

Vincent Person Master en Droit, Universités (Diplôme obtenu en 2015)
Traducteur · 1 an

Sergio Diniz Animals researcher on spare hours

J'ai participé à des safaris en Afrique et j'ai entendu beaucoup de professionnels, lu à ce sujet et j'ai également vu de moi même. La meilleure explication que j'ai entendue est que les animaux, et plus particulièrement les prédateurs, ont leur point de vue beaucoup plus axé sur le suivi des mouvements (ce qui est un fait scientifique), que sur les détails de leurs proies.

Ainsi, lorsqu'ils voient un véhicule de safari ouvert, rempli de personnes, tout ce qu'ils voient est une seule chose : une grosse bête avec quelques appendices sur le dessus (têtes). En tant que grande bête, et potentiellement puissante, elle ne les intéresse pas, tout comme d'autres grands animaux tels que les rhinocéros et les éléphants adultes : ils savent que l'effort de chasse n'en vaut pas la peine. Pas parce qu'ils craignent les humains.

Cependant, toute l'attention est nécessaire, car les prédateurs de pointe tels que les lions ou même les léopards sont des animaux relativement intelligents et curieux. Si quelqu'un se lève et se détache du reste de la "bête imposante", le prédateur peut être curieux et douter que cela fasse partie de la grande bête ou qu'il s'agisse d'autre chose de distinct : il peut alors enquêter ou attaquer. En cas d'attaque, nous pouvons tous imaginer ce qui se passe. S'il commence à enquêter de trop près, de nombreux touristes peuvent perdre leur sang-froid, se lever et même courir... ce qui sera la pire erreur, car le prédateur sera alors sûr qu'il est une proie et se mettra à chasser (réflexe de chasse), et il court beaucoup plus vite que n'importe lequel d'entre nous.

Compte tenu de cela, les guides locaux orientent normalement les passagers pour qu'ils restent assis, tranquilles, n'observant que lorsqu'ils sont près des animaux. Ils vous apprennent à ne jamais vous lever, d'agiter les bras ou, pire encore, à ne pas sortir du véhicule de safari. Dans ce dernier cas, l'animal sera sûr que vous ne faites pas partie de la grande bête et remarquera que vous avez en fait la taille idéale pour une proie...

Cependant, certaines réserves privées ne divulguent pas le fait que, afin de maintenir l'"aspect sauvage" du circuit, en particulier celles où un véhicule de safari ouvert est utilisé, elles "préparent" les animaux à s'habituer à la présence humaine. Avant d'ouvrir une nouvelle réserve de chasse ou lorsque de nouveaux animaux sont achetés (oui, ils achètent des animaux d'autres endroits pour les peupler ou remplacer les pertes, de sorte qu'il y a beaucoup à voir pour les touristes), ils habituent les animaux au véhicule de safari et aux personnes, en se déplaçant près d'eux fréquemment, jusqu'à ce que l'animal soit habitué au véhicule et aux personnes et ne montre plus d'agressivité. Ils le font jusqu'à ce que la "grande bête" fasse déjà partie du paysage. C'est pourquoi ils n'attaquent pas vraiment.

Néanmoins, si une meute de lions insiste pour être agressive envers les humains, ce qui fait perdre de l'argent à la réserve, ils revendent ou même abattent les animaux rebelles. C'est triste, non ? Pas de publicité à ce sujet, c'est mauvais pour les affaires.

C'est tellement vrai que dans les réserves sauvages, les choses changent complètement : plus de véhicules de safari ouverts et des gardes toujours armés de fusils. De temps en temps, malheureusement, il arrive que des décès surviennent (voir https://www.insider.com/safari-h...) et il n'est pas rare que les entreprises et même les gouvernements évitent autant que possible de divulguer des informations. C'est mauvais pour les affaires.

Malgré tout, c'est une expérience unique, surtout si le touriste est correctement averti des véritables risques. Je le recommande.

Voir aussi ma propre vidéo. Si vous suivez les protocoles, vous pouvez être proche et quand même éviter les accidents.

NOTE SUPPLÉMENTAIRE :

Juste un rappel que même les professionnels sont attaqués par la faune de temps en temps, voir Sergio Diniz's answer to Have any National Geographic reporters been attacked by an animal?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Lion falls In love with white tigress they escape Zoo together .

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Jan 17

Meet the white tiger Zaba and lion Cameron who are madly in love with each other .

They were both raised in a zoo in New England in not very good conditions and with only one goal to make ligers . Zabu tigress had genetic defects and Cameroon lion weighed as much as 200 pounds .

Over time , Cameron became very possessive of Zabu , which meant he become dangerous to zookeepers . And that meant that a decision had to be made on their behalf ; sterilization or forever separation from Zabu . This not at all easy decision had to be made , so they decided .

He lost his stunning mane, but it is a small price to pay to stay with his true love

What is humankind's single greatest achievement?

John Smith · Follow

Former Unemployable at Job Centre (2022–2022) Mar 23

Masai Mara tribesmen who want to total up the profits they've made on their way home from the market simply reach for their mobile phone and check their online account balance.

In East Africa, mobile banking has leap-frogged conventional banking and its online reincarnation for everyone — from the rich to the very poor — at an astonishing pace.

Related Links

What have been the greatest achievements of humanity? Does it make a lasting improvement in the quality of human life? How and why does it overshadow all other achievements?

What is the single greatest achievement in human history that had an impact on humans?

What can be regarded as the single greatest achievement by an individual person in the history of mankind?

What was mankind's greatest achievement in the last 100 years?

What is the most outrageously overlooked achievement of humankind in the last century?

What are some of the greatest achievements of mankind in the last decade?

What were the greatest achievements of the Roman Empire?
What do you consider humankind's three greatest achievements, inventions, ideas, etc.?

What are some of the greatest things humans have achieved that most people don't know about?

What will be the greatest human achievement in the next 50 years?

What do you think represents the culmination of humankind's greatest achievements?

What are some of the greatest achievements ever accomplished?
What are the failed achievements of mankind?

What was humankind's most amazing achievement given the context of technology and knowledge available at the time?

What are some of the greatest achievements humans have ever achieved, both known and unknown?

Quels sont les animaux qui travaillent ensemble dans la nature?/What animals work together in the wild?

Jerome Cohen Un ami des animaux depuis toujours, de toutes espèces.Traducteur 1 an

Sergio Diniz Animals researcher on spare hours

Je reproduis ici la réponse de Sergio Diniz à la question "Quel est l'exemple de la collaboration entre deux espèces animales lors d'une chasse ? Sergio Diniz's answer to What is an example of when two species of animal work together when hunting?

Je vais exclure les animaux domestiques et les humains, car c'est trop évident, mais je vais extraire ici une partie de ma réponse antérieure, la réponse de Sergio Diniz à la question "Existe-t-il des cas de coopération entre deux espèces animales pour battre un autre animal ? qui décrit un cas très intéressant :

Les hyènes et les lycaons. Bien qu'ils soient concurrents et même ennemis la plupart du temps [2], il existe des cas de coopération constatés pendant la chasse et même le cas emblématique d'un lycaon isolé qui est devenu un véritable ami des hyènes : Vidéo : L'étonnante histoire de Solo, le lycaon qui a perdu sa meute. Pour en savoir plus, consultez la page Les hyènes ont-elles des amis animaux ? de ma collègue Rebecca Sealfon.

Bien qu'elles puissent se ressembler un peu à première vue, comme le montrent les photos ci-dessous, elles appartiennent à des familles de carnivores complètement différentes : les hyènes sont plus proches des chats (féliformes), tandis que les lycaons sont plus proches des ... chiens, bien sûr (caniformes).

Image : Hyena vs Wild Dog: How Different Are They Really? | Rhino Africa Blog

Les humains et les dauphins coopèrent également pour la chasse dans certaines parties du globe :

a) La pêche. Je reproduis partiellement ici la réponse de Holly Root-Gutteridge à la question suivante : "En dehors de l'homme et du chien, quels couples d'animaux engagés dans une relation mutualiste représentent la plus grande intelligence du règne animal ? Holly Root-Gutteridge's answer to Besides human and dogs, which pairs of animals involved in a mutualist relationship add up to the greatest amount of intelligence in the animal kingdom?

Les dauphins ne sont certainement pas domestiqués. Pourtant, les pêcheurs travaillent avec les dauphins pour attraper des poissons et les dauphins ont des comportements complexes pour déplacer les poissons et identifier les pêcheurs préférés avec lesquels travailler :

Dolphins, honey guides and golden eagles are man's best friends

Il y a ici un bel article sur la coopération entre les pêcheurs et les dauphins depuis plus d'un siècle : Les dauphins et les humains coopèrent pour attraper du poisson: Dolphins and Humans Cooperate To Catch Fish

En fait, j'ai moi-même vu ce groupe de dauphins au Brésil :

Image/source : Des dauphins et des pêcheurs travaillent ensemble à Laguna, au Brésil, pour pêcher le mulet. Avec l'aimable autorisation de Fábio Daura-Jorge [1].

Même les "grands" dauphins ont été trouvés pour aider à cela :

Les orques ont également aidé les humains à chasser. En Amérique du Nord et en Australie, on raconte que les orques, et même d'autres baleines, gardent des poissons pour faciliter leur capture par les pêcheurs. [2]

b) La chasse à la baleine. [2][3] Autre cas étonnant, celui des "grands" dauphins, appelés orques, qui ont fait preuve de coopération pour un bénéfice mutuel. Comme nous l'avons dit plus haut, ils aident même les humains à rassembler des troupeaux de baleines jusqu'à la mort :

À la fin du XIXe et au début du XXe siècle, les orques près d'Eden, en Australie, chassaient les baleines à bosse dans une zone connue sous le nom de Twofold Bay en échange de leurs morceaux de viande préférés, la langue et les lèvres. Cette relation de travail où les orques ont travaillé comme tueurs de baleines pendant plus de cent ans a été appelée par les pêcheurs locaux "la loi de la langue". [2][3]

Je n'ai pas pu la retrouver, mais j'ai préparé une réponse à Quora en disant que cette pratique existe encore aujourd'hui, "la loi de la langue" chez les chasseurs de baleines nordiques.

Image : Un orque conduisant le bateau des Davidson à une baleine. [3]

c) Sauver leurs partenaires de chasse des requins. Le "Old Tom" était un orque mâle alpha, chef des groupes utilisés pour aider les humains à pêcher les baleines :

On raconte aussi que des pêcheurs sont tombés dans les eaux infestées de requins lorsque leurs bateaux ont été submergés par une baleine à bosse et que Tom et d'autres orques ont protégé les requins et sauvé la vie de leurs partenaires. [2]

Image : Le squelette du vieux Tom montrant ses dents usées par le remorquage des baleines. [3]

d) "Ce n'est pas juste pour le plaisir, pour payer ma part, ou je ne travaillerai plus avec vous : il n'y a pas de déjeuner gratuit ! Il semble que cela s'applique également à la nature :

En 1923, lorsqu'un baleinier local a refusé de partager sa prise et a blessé Tom lors d'un tir à la corde qui lui a abîmé les dents, la plupart des baleines ont cessé de garder les baleines à bosse, ce qui prouve que ce n'était pas un comportement naturel. C'était un travail, et si les orques n'étaient pas récompensés, ils ne se présentaient pas au travail. [2]

Image : Les orques peuvent être identifiés par leurs nageoires dorsales uniques. | Avec l'aimable autorisation du Dr. Brandon Southall, NMFS/OPR [2]

SOURCES :
[1] Dolphins and Humans Cooperate To Catch Fish

[2] How the Killer Whale Avoids Eating People, Helped 19th-Century Whalers, and Became Public Enemy Number One | Blog | Nature | PBS.

[3] Man and orca combined to hunt for whales

Réponse similaire
A quoi cela sert-il d'avoir un animal domestique ? Ne serait-il pas mieux dans la nature ?

Alraune Tenbrinken , 5 chats 1 chien 3 poules Répondu 25 janv. 2020

Ces animaux ont été domestiqués depuis trop longtemps pour être autonomes, ou en sécurité dans la "nature", laquelle en fait n'existe pratiquement plus.

Espérance de vie d'un chat qui va dehors : moins de 7 ans. Écrasé par un véhicule, empoisonné par le revêtement des routes ou des plantes, maladies comme la leucose, le coryza, le typhus, les parasites internes et externes, les piqure de guêpes ou d'abeilles qui peuvent être mortelles, bagarres, infections des plaies, chutes qui même non mortelles peuvent l'empêcher de se déplacer, se retrouver coincé dans une cave, écrasé par une porte de garage…

Je crois que le truc qui vous échappe, c'est la coévolution et le bénéfice mutuel.

Quand un loup ne parvient pas à faire quelque chose, il abandonne. Quand un chien n'arrive pas à faire quelque chose, il demande de l'aide à son humain.

Les humains ont sélectionné, transformé les espèces, et certaines ne sauraient même pas où trouver à manger ni ce qui peut ou ne doit pas se manger.

After I have changed my habits, I found the true meaning and happiness

Hwal Jeong , former working in a NGO Answered Sep 24, 2021

It seems that I had such a bad habit when I look back on myself. It says that all human sins started to be built with the mind of possession to have. People do not live with gratitude for the world as it is. And humans continue to possess something out of feelings of lacking. Humans take pictures and eat illusory images inside their minds by the habit of possession. The more things we want to possess in our mind, the more we take pictures of and eat them in our minds. With the greedy mind, humans dream false dreams and do things in vain.

For example, when looking back on myself, I was obsessed with the urge to have a good car. I spent time searching for information regarding automobiles even though I didn't have enough money to buy them.

Also, I was once addicted to shopping. Even though I already had enough clothes, I kept wandering online and offline shopping malls to search for better and different types of clothes. I wasted a lot of time and energy.

In addition to it, I wanted to have a good cell phone and was often obsessed with the urge to have a new phone. So, I often watched YouTube videos or went around online shopping malls to search for information.

But the funny thing was that I kept shopping even though I didn't have enough money to buy them anyway. Isn't it unrealistic and ridiculous to feel frustrated and unhappy by being obsessed with something when you don't have money to buy? But at that time, I thought I would be happy If I only had them. How silly I was!

These were just some of my experiences of living as a slave to the mind of possession in the past. And as time went by, I just became greedier. There is a saying, "Sins Committed In The Mind Are Sins." Now that I think about it, It just made my sins bigger. As a result, I suffered and felt miserable because of this kind of mindset and lifestyle. I wanted to change myself. So, I deeply pondered what truly makes me happy and how to make my life meaningful through meditation practice.

Now, I afford to buy things I wanted to have in the past. However, when I knew how to spend money meaningfully and what actions truly bring me true happiness, I don't spend money in vain for such a purpose. Now when I look back on my life, I realize how much I was interested in useless things in the past and lived wasting time and money. It was harmful to have feelings of lack, unhappiness, and stress because of futile desires and actions.

I feel that how much more meaningfully I could have lived my life if I had learned what brings me true happiness a little earlier.

Therefore, wise people say that we can live a more blissful and abundant life if we focus on the happiness and joy of what exists and are grateful for what we have already rather than finding meaning in our possession. A well-known Buddhist monk, 'Beopjeong,' talked about the life of nonpossession. And Erich Fromm said that we could find true happiness when we change from a possession-oriented life to an existence-oriented life. In Christianity, they say that 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself.' Even though the expressions are different, in my opinion, they tried to say the same concept.

We need to know what 'to be' is, in other words, what 'existence' is. We may think that what is visible and touchable exists, but it is the fact that what we believe exists in this world doesn't exist. It is our hallucination that our individuals' mind is making within our minds. In Quantum Mechanics, even scientists talk about these things.

To know what exists, we must become the mind of Truth that exists. Then we can realize that what exists is only the Truth and the land of Truth that we have within our mind. We need to see from an elevated dimension after throwing away our false minds. Only after we have the Truth beyond our human conception about what exists and what doesn't exist, we can live in the land of Truth with satisfaction and abundance without lacking inside. The problems such as poverty and hardships will be resolved in the long run when humans find the Truth and the land of Truth within themselves. We have tried to solve the problem from outside so far. However, nowadays already people started to know the principles of the world. They are already trying to look for ways to make revolutionary changes within themselves.

I was able to get rid of the false habits through meditation. A lot of habits disappeared. And people around me say that even my physical appearance changed.

We need to change our habits from living with the false mind to living with the true mind. So, then our false habits are gradually eliminated. If we use our body honestly with a righteous mind, Our false habits disappear tremendously. And our minds will brighten up. So then you can know the ways of the world through wisdom.

Now I am so happy because I can control my mind. I have become liberated from my false mind. I wish you all could live a happy life after eliminating your false minds and habits.

This video will help you discard your bad habits and find your true happiness. Thanks.

Related Answer
What is the way to make life happy?

Mason Kim, studied Psychology (2012) Answered Feb 21, 2021

Everyone in this world wants to live a happy life. But it is not easy. Why?

When people's goals are achieved, people usually think they are happy, but at the end of this happiness, there is inevitable loss.✔✔✔

From when I was young, I had wondered about the true meaning of happiness. I tried to learn how to be happy from the people around me but it seemed there was nobody being truly happy. My parents, sisters, friends, teachers, (you name it!), everyone had their own issues. I concluded at the end, maybe I could make my life happy by trying what others are doing for their happiness. I studied hard, worked hard and tried to achieve many things. It was not easy for me to achieve everything that I wanted. For my perfect happiness, there were too many things to achieve.□□□ Comparing my ability to what I wanted in my life, there was too much gap. But my pride did not allow for me to accept it.

There were achievement in my life that people envy a lot, but they were nothing for me. Devoid of fulfillment.....… For All the things I had, I took it as granted. What I did not have, no matter what that is, made me to feel great anger and jealousy.

I eventually got depression. I heard about meditation when I got through a lot.

There was actually a method to throw way all the root causes make me not to be happy. There was fake mind which is Karma habit and body in my mind. I threw all of them away through meditation. I realized that it was impossible to be happy with this fake mind. Because this fake & false mind is mind of hunger and greed, there was no happiness. From my mind, I threw away even my false self who has all the fake mind.

After that, I found my real mind, my original mind, which is Truth. This Truth is everlasting, never changing, and living existence. This is the mind of universe. I had enlightenment that I don't need to pursue happiness anymore! Since I have Truth within me, I find my complete & true self. I am just always happy! I have been searching for my happiness all the time from outside, but It is within me now!□□□ For my life, I had been on tenterhooks for my happiness. Now I am free completely!!! There is so much room for me to build my life authentically. My career, relationship, financial status ; everything has completely changed.

I am so grateful about the change that meditation has brought to me.

Just like the name of the novel :

Spring came on forever□□□

That is why I am writing this to you as well. I truly hope many people to find the true self and live happy life.

Thank you for your reading!

Quora Sessions with Neil Pasricha

Neil Pasricha

NY Times Bestselling Author of "The Happiness Equation" & "The Book of Awesome"

Answered Apr 14, 2016 · Featured on HuffPost, Inc and Quora Sessions's Twitter

Originally Answered:What 5 things can someone do every day to be happy?

The good news is you only have to do one not all five.

My suggestion is to pick just one from the list below and set a 20-minute recurring reminder in your calendar for 20 days in a row. See if you can develop a new 'happiness habit' :

Brisk 20-minute walk. Studies show three 20-30 minute walks a week outperform, from a happiness perspective, test groups on anti-depressants and test groups doing both the walking and taking the anti-depressants. (Penn State / Babyak, American Psychosomatic Society)

The 20-Minute Replay. Journal for 20 minutes about a positive experience you had during the day. Your mind will re*live* the experience as you write and re*live* it again when you read your journal. A tripling effect. (University of Texas, "How Do I Love Thee, Let Me Count The Words")

Commit A Random Act of Kindness. Surprise someone a coffee, hold the door open for your coworkers, send a thank you note to an old teacher. (Lyubomirsky)

Meditate. Studies show meditation increases the activity in our pre-frontal cortext -- the part of the brain responsible for attention and focus. (Massachusetts General Hospital)

Write down 5 gratitudes. If you can be happy with simple things, it will be simple to be happy. The research here had students write down five gratitudes, events, or hassles. Those writing down gratitudes vastly outperformed the other two groups after ten weeks. (Emmons / McCullough)

Questions similaires

Est-ce que les animaux en général coexistent pacifiquement dans la nature ?

Quels sont les exemples d'animaux qui sauvent délibérément d'autres animaux et/ou des personnes dans la nature ?

Quels animaux sont considérés comme les éboueurs de la nature ?
Quels sont les animaux dans la nature qui sont les plus câlins entre eux ?
Parmi les animaux de la nature, lesquels vous semblent les plus malfaisants ?
Quel est l'animal le plus terrible que vous ayez jamais vu dans la nature ?
Quels animaux sont inutiles pour la nature ?
Quel est l'animal le plus attachant ?
Quel est l'animal le plus petit au monde ?
Existe-t-il des animaux dans la nature qui ne mangent qu'une partie de leurs proies ?

Est-ce qu’il existe un animal qui ressemble physiquement à un autre animal, sans pour autant être issu de la même espèce ?

Quel est l'animal le plus dangereux sur Terre ?
Quels sont les animaux les plus propres au monde ?
Les renards sont-ils les animaux les plus habiles de la nature ?
Qu'est-ce qui empêche la consanguinité des animaux dans la nature ?

Related Answer

Why are spotted hyenas and African wild dogs so similar? Why do they both make these type of laughing-like calls, why do they both look somewhat identical, why are they both similar in aggression, why do they have similar attack methods?

K. Fletcher · Follow Master's Degree in Psychology, Harvard University (Graduated 2011) Sat

They actually don't have many similarities whatsoever.
Their primary similarity is their color and living in groups. That's about all they have in common.

As for their appearance, color is really the only similarity, besides large erect ears. Hyenas are FAR larger, weighing in at 150lbs, wild dogs are only 60–80lbs, making hyenas TWICE as big. (As shown in the photo, the hyena dwarfs the dog) Hyenas also have sloping backs, taller front legs and shorter tails. Wild dogs coloration is "painted'', with black, browns, and whites in differing patterns on each dog. Hyenas are just a solid greyish/brown with black spots.

As for noises: Hyenas & wild dogs don't make any sounds that are remotely similar. Hyenas are they only animal that "laughs", wild dogs bark and twitter. (& sometimes make a haunting call) No other animal sounds like either. Hyenas have dozens of different calls and sounds, whereas their laughing is usually an anxiety release. Most of their sounds are a form of psychological warfare or contact call; whereas wild dogs twitter constantly to communicate location, affirm bonds, etc.

Hyenas and dogs attack alike, but don't hunt alike; & certainly don't dine alike! Their attack methods CAN be similar when they catch their prey because they are physically similar in terms of weapons: blunt claws, no arm dexterity and powerful jaws. Wild dogs use their stamina and speed to run down their prey into exhaustion over many miles. Hyenas, also capable of long chases, usually grab their prey in shorter distances by overwhelming them with their numbers. Neither predator uses claws/paws, so must use their teeth to grab and tear. Usually disemboweling or eating the animal alive bc it's their only choice bc they don't have forearms to wrestle them to the ground. Once down, hyenas grapple for the spoils, w/ rank determine who eats. Dogs all get access to the food, with no fighting. They even feed dogs who didn't go on the hunt, by regurgitating it back up.

As for similarity in aggression, that isn't remotely the case. Hyenas whole existence is about aggression. They're aggressive to eachother, to other animals, etc. Their aggression determines their rank in their clan, who eats when, etc.

Whereas, wild dogs aren't aggressive whatsoever to eachother. (unless defending the pack) Even Their alpha doesn't use dominance/aggression, infact he shows submission to packmates. They're all equals. They all hunt/eat cooperatively, with no pecking order. Wild dog, unlike hyenas, don't use their aggression to scavenge from other animals typically either. Whereas hyenas do it almost exclusively to all animals.

As you can see, these two species have very little in common besides some aspects of appearance/group living. (general shape, color/pattern, big ears)

One could ask why are lions and hyenas so similar? They live similarly in groups, hunt similarly together, both are aggressive, both scavenge, both have a larger "head" of their family that bullies others (altho hyenas its female, lions its male) and both have uniquely odd sounds. One "roars" and one "laughs." Not similarly sounding, but similar in uniqueness.

"This is Sainingo. He lives in the Chyulu Hills in southern Kenya."

Kathy Pennell Author, 12 Young Adult Mysteries, 1 Adult Mystery at Lancaster County, PA (2000–present) Mar 5

Elephants and giraffes, zebra and gazelle, eland and oryx, lions and leopards, also live here. Every day, Sainingo's father, one of the longest-serving Big Life Foundation rangers, goes to work to protect these very animals.

At least in one small corner of the continent, this is the Africa of today. If we are willing to make the effort, it can also be the Africa of not just Sainingo's tomorrow, but of all our tomorrows." - Nick Brandt

Nearly all of Big Life's community rangers are fathers. The sacrifice they make day-in and day-out protects nature for the benefit of us all, but especially for their own children.

These children understand that their fathers put themselves in harm's way to protect wildlife and wild lands. They witness their fathers bringing home a pay check as a ranger, because of conservation. Their fathers are able to afford to send them to school and care for their families, because of conservation.

Source: Big Life Foundation

Réponse similaire
Un tigre est-il plus fort qu'un crocodile ?

Serge Elia , Amoureux d'animaux Mis à jour le 26 août 2020

Dans le sous-continent indien, les tigres du Bengale interagissent souvent avec les crocodiles des marais, les crocodiliens les plus répandus de la région.

Le crocodile des marais est un reptile à taille moyenne qui peut atteindre les 4 à 5 mètres de long, et peser entre 40 et 200 kg. En tant que crocodile, c'est un tueur né, équipé de mâchoires puissantes capables de saisir des proies aussi grosses qu'un cerf. En outre, c'est un chasseur en embuscade, comme tous les crocodiliens, puisqu'il traque sa proie à l'affût, attendant que le gibier vienne à lui – en effet, dans cette position, le croco guette, camouflé dans l'eau trouble, avant d'attaquer au moment opportun.

Mais malgré sa force, le crocodile des marais ne fait pas le poids face au tigre. Il y a même eu des nombreux témoignages de tigres attaquant et tuant d'énormes crocodiles (voir ci-dessus), ce qui arrive généralement lorsque ces reptiles s'aventurent sur terre ferme, hors de l'eau – donc, en dehors de leur élément naturel – ; au fait, même submergés dans l'eau, les crocos sont vulnérables, puisque les tigres font partie des rares félins à être des nageurs adeptes.

À 220 kg (voire 310 kg !), le tigre est beaucoup plus lourd, plus fort, plus agile, plus rapide et plus intelligent que son adversaire, puisqu'il est armé des plus grands crocs de tous les félidés, ainsi que de l'une des forces de morsure les plus puissantes des carnivores. Ainsi, le fauve, qui mérite son titre de roi suprême des jungles de l'Inde, peut faire une bouchée du plus gros crocodile jamais enregistré.

Toutefois, il faut garder à l’esprit que c’est le cas du crocodile des marais. D’autre part, le crocodile marin, que l’on trouve aussi en Inde, est le plus lourd reptile vivant, atteignant environ 6 mètres ou plus, et pesant entre 400 et 1 000 kg. Ainsi, on a recensé, en août 2011, un individu de 4 mètres de long, qui a tué un tigre dans les marécages du Bengale occidental.

Pour résumer, l’issue d’un combat entre un tigre et un crocodile dépend de la force et du courage de nos concurrents, ainsi que de l’espèce de crocodile impliquée dans cet affrontement.

Réponse similaire

Comment un éléphant peut-il se libérer de la gueule d'un crocodile?/How could the elephant free himself from the mouth of the crocodile?

Gérard Briais , Flâneur Parisien Traducteur · Traduit le 4 sept. 2020

Bill Sneddon Anciennement Commercial Diving Instructor/Supervisor à CDA Technical Institute (2017–2018)

:

Les éléphants adultes sont beaucoup plus grands et plus forts que tous les crocodiles dans leur environnement naturel. Ainsi, un éléphant adulte va simplement tirer le crocodile hors de l'eau et le faire tournoyer, puis le piétiner jusqu'à le transformer en flaque boueuse et sanglante.

Les bébés éléphants sont beaucoup plus vulnérables et sont des proies beaucoup plus faciles. Ceci dit, il y a toujours un éléphant adulte à proximité. Et le crocodile risque de se faire attaquer par la maman éléphant. Mais si la maman est trop éloignée, le crocodile, s'il est assez fort, a plus de chances de tuer le bébé éléphant.

Réponse similaire
Comment un éléphant peut-il se libérer de la gueule d'un crocodile ?

Les éléphants adultes sont beaucoup plus grands et plus forts que tous les crocodiles dans leur environnement naturel. Ainsi, un éléphant adulte va simplement tirer le crocodile hors de l'eau et le faire tournoyer, puis le piétiner jusqu'à le transformer en flaque boueuse et sanglante.

Les bébés éléphants sont beaucoup plus vulnérables et sont des proies beaucoup plus faciles. Ceci dit, il y a toujours un éléphant adulte à proximité. Et le crocodile risque de se faire attaquer par la maman éléphant. Mais si la maman est trop éloignée, le crocodile, s'il est assez fort, a plus de chances de tuer le bébé éléphant.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

The difference between an alligator (left) and a crocodile (right).

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Mon

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Lioness Adopts An Injured baby Fox saved him from being eaten by hungry lion .

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Jan 16

A lioness leads the way to an injured young fox lying unprotected on the road in her herd`s territory .

This particular breed of the fox is often hunted by larger predators , so one can easily imagine how afraid this little animal would have been during the time she was facing the grand lioness .

One more member of the bunch came in front of this little baby fox along with some cubs .
He saw that the fox was unable to stand on its hind legs and its spine was probably injured .Generally male lions don`t participate in lions hunt but this male decided to hunt and take a chance at the fox .

At that very moment , the lioness`s maternal instinct hits back with full force and she was found protecting the baby fox .

Despite the Male`s persistence and threatening demeanor towards the fox , the lioness refused to leave the fox`s side .

All her approach that she was so serious about saving this little baby fox . Male decided to left that fox alone .

The lioness was pretty determined in her approach to saving this baby fox

The brave lioness returned to her cubs and the fox , away from the road to safety. The story is one of the best example that a motherly instinct is very strong when it comes to justice .

Photos by Graham Dyer ,
Source Science world .

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Baby elephant can’t stop following her rescuer after being saved from death

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Jan 16

This elephant got stuck at the moment of crossing the river and was completely helpless. When the hyenas around Moyo appeared, she was already alone by then because her pack had left her. Fortunately, Moyo was rescued by rangers when a group of hyenas formed around her.

Thanks to rangers who responded in time, Moyo ended up in a shelter with her new mom Roxy. Roxy Danckwerts is the owner of the "Wild Is Life" shelter where Moyo was brought after the rescue. This cute elephant is now a year and two months old and is always following her new mom.

Roxy said Moyo recognizes her scent and voice and always finds her that way. It is not easy to live with Moyo while she is growing up, because her incidents around the house are very common.

Although Danckwerts has befriended Moyo and created that amazing bond between them, he wants to let her into his world again because it's best for her.

When she wants to get to Danckwerts, nothing can stop her.

She also has a power she is not even aware of. She wants to see and touch everything, so he often makes a mess in the house.

You can find more interesting content on the website of the “Wild is Life” sanctuary.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Dogs trained to protect wildlife have saved 45 rhinos from poachers in: South Africa

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Mar 21

A pack of dogs have been trained to protect South Africa's wildlife, and have already saved 45 rhinos from: being poached.

Many breeds of dog from beagles to bloodhounds have – been used to protect the endangered species from poachers. The dogs begin training from birth and learn how to handle all – the pressures of real operations before beginning to work at 18 months old.

Sean Viljoen, 29, based in Cape Town, South Africa, has shared photographs of the dogs in action at the: Southern African Wildlife College in Greater Kruger National Park. He is the owner of a production company called Conservation Film Company and aims to use tell the stories of those on the frontline of conservation, sharing their stories of hope.

Johan van Straaten, who is a K9 Master at the college, said: ‘The data we collect for this applied learning project aimed at informing best practice, shows we have prevented approximately 45 rhino being killed since the free tracking dogs became operational in February 2018.

‘In the areas where the Southern African Wildlife College patrol, the success rate of the dogs is around 68 per cent using both on and off leash free tracking dogs, compared to between three to five per cent with no canine capacity.

Related Answers

Dogs trained to protect wildlife have saved 45 rhinos from poachers in: South Africa

Nick Thansy March 7, 2022

A pack of dogs have been trained to protect South Africa's wildlife, and have already saved 45 rhinos from: being poached.

Many breeds of dog from beagles to bloodhounds have – been used to protect the endangered species from poachers. The dogs begin training from birth and learn how to handle all – the pressures of real operations before beginning to work at 18 months old.

Sean Viljoen, 29, based in Cape Town, South Africa, has shared photographs of the dogs in action at the: Southern African Wildlife College in Greater Kruger National Park. He is the owner of a production company called Conservation Film Company and aims to use tell the stories of those on the frontline of conservation, sharing their stories of hope.

Johan van Straaten, who is a K9 Master at the college, said: 'The data we collect for this applied learning project aimed at informing best practice, shows we have prevented approximately 45 rhino being killed since the free tracking dogs became operational in February 2018.

'In the areas where the Southern African Wildlife College patrol, the success rate of the dogs is around 68 per cent using both on and off leash free tracking dogs, compared to between three to five per cent with no canine capacity.

'The game changer has been the free tracking dog's who are able to track at speeds much faster than a human can in terrain where the best human trackers would lose spoor.

As such, the project is helping ensure the survival of southern Africa's rich biodiversity and its wildlife including its rhino which have been severely impacted by wildlife crime – South Africa holds nearly 80 per cent of the world's rhino.

'Over the past decade over 8,000 rhino have been lost to poaching making it the country hardest hit by this poaching onslaught.'

The dogs which include a Texan Black-and-Tan Coonhounds, Belgian Malinois, Foxhounds and Blue Ticks are trained to 'benefit required counter poaching initiatives' which includes free tracking, incursion, detection, patrol and apprehension dogs. Dog handlers Precious Malapane and Robynne Wasas are both part of the 'K9 unit fast response' team and help to train the anti-poaching dogs.) Johan van Straaten added: "They begin training from birth and are socialised from a very young age.

‘They learn how to track, bay at a person in a tree and follow basic obedience.

‘At six months we put all that training together more formally – they do have the necessary skill set to do the work at a younger age but are not mature enough to handle all the pressures of real operations.

‘Depending on a number of factors dogs become operational at around 18 months old.”

On February 3, Department of Environment, Forestry and Fisheries reported that a total of 594 rhinos were poached in the country throughout 2019 – Save The Rhino reported.

Poaching numbers peaked at 1,215 in 2014 but this is the fifth year in a row poaching rates have declined.

HOME DOGS

Y a-t-il une créature sur terre qui manque de prédateurs ?/ Is there any creature on land that lacks predators?

Vincent Person

Sergio Diniz Fan of evolutionary biology

Le dragon de Komodo (Varanus komodoensis), n'a pas d'autres prédateurs naturels que lui-même, par cannibalisme [1]. Mesurant jusqu'à 3 mètres de long et pesant plus de 136 kilos, les dragons de Komodo sont les lézards les plus lourds sur Terre. [2] Il est le prédateur par excellence dans son environnement, chassant et se nourrissant d'animaux beaucoup plus grands qu'eux : cochons, chèvres, cerfs et même chevaux et buffles d'eau (les deux derniers introduits dans leur habitat par l'homme).

La seule créature qu'un petit dragon de Komodo craindra est un autre dragon de Komodo, plus gros.

Mais les humains ont détruit leur habitat et chassé leurs proies, ce qui constitue une grave menace.

SOURCES :

[1] Komodo Dragon (Varanus komodoensis) | Incredible Facts | A-Z Animals

[2] Komodo dragon

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Eland Breaks Free of the Snare But is Injured in the Process

Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Mar 4

Elands are the largest of all antelopes and are extremely strong. So it's no surprise that this one managed to break free of the snare he got caught in. The effort it took to free himself left him with a wire digging deeply into his neck, and the tree limb the snare was tied to dragging behind him. An informer spotted him and notified the Big Life rangers on the Enduimet Wildlife Management Area in Tanzania, who immediately rushed to the scene. They were able to remove the snare from the eland and after carefully combing the area, found no other snares that needed to be destroyed.

Big Life has 20 Maasai rangers in Enduimet with two mobile units. Having rangers on both sides of the Kenya-Tanzania border is critical to stopping illegal activity and keeping the Greater Amboseli ecosystem safe.

Source: Big LIfe Foundation

Related Answer

Baby elephant who was trapped in Poacher's trap for 4 days made an incredible recovery.

Kathy Pennell Author, 12 Young Adult Mysteries, 1 Adult Mystery at Lancaster County, PA (2000–present) Tue

How adorable and innocent baby elephants are. They are giant puppies who are very friendly to humans. They have big bright eyes and those eyes are filled with innocence. But some people are after these cute creatures and wanted to hunt them down. Some babies could stay and wait for some help but others are not that lucky.

Here, the hero of the story is a young brave baby Albino elephant. She was found in a trap of a poacher at a private reserve close to the border of Kruger National Park in South Africa.

The innocent soul was spotted and rescued by the volunteers at Hoedspruit Elephant Rehabilitation and Development(HERD). She was immediately shifted to the sanctuary and was treated for her injuries.The weak and fragile baby elephant was tangled in the trap for 4 days. The snare was wrapped around her face which caused deep wounds all over her mouth, face, and ears.

The more serious thing was the maggots that had started eating the open flesh. The poor baby suffered a lot but she kept going. According to Sue Howells, the elephant looked very innocent, fragile, and pure, yet it looked very brave.-

Fortunately, the baby elephant made a great recovery and she is in a good condition. She is very happy and healthy now. According to Sue Howells, the baby elephant is very strong. Her sweet, fragile personality shines through her toughness.

This baby elephant was different from others as she was albino and blessed with pink skin. We are happy that the baby elephant was saved and we wish her all the happiness for the future life.

Source: We Care About Animals Beautiful Gifts From the Earth

Jo Mburu Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. Tue
An orangutan from a zoo reintroduced to the wild in Borneo tried to spear fish after watching local fisherman.

Jo Mburu Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. 21h

A lion's tongue is rougher than coarse sandpaper. Its tongue is covered in spines (papillae) so rough that if a lion licked the back of your hand only a few times, you would be left without any skin. These spines are sharp and face backward, nearly like a barb . Photo source Woodland park Zoo….

Jo Mburu Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. 21h

These spines are sharp and face backward, nearly like a barb .

A lion's tongue is rougher than coarse sandpaper. Its tongue is covered in spines (papillae) so rough that if a lion licked the back of your hand only a few times, you would be left without any skin.

Jo Mburu Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. Sun

A family of cheetah brothers attempting to cross a flooded river full of crocodiles in the Maasai Mara Nature Reserve in Kenya. They all made it across without being eaten.

Photo by : Buddhilini De Soyza .

Photo source Woodland park Zoo.

Question similaire
Pour les lions, quelle proie est la plus difficile à abattre, un éléphant ou une girafe?/ For lions, which prey is harder to take down, an elephant or a giraffe?

Aurélien Breton · Suivre MaraîcherTraducteur · 5 oct.

Ansh Badal Seen leopards, tigers and dholes(and now lions!) in the wild Tuer un éléphant est beaucoup plus difficile. Les girafes peuvent donner des coups de pied, mais elles peuvent être renversées par les lions, même les adultes. Les éléphants sont beaucoup plus stables, même un jeune affaibli demande beaucoup plus d'efforts qu'une girafe adulte.

Les girafes sont à la fois trop grandes et instables, et ont un long cou. Les éléphants n'ont littéralement pas de cou du tout ! Les lions doivent redoubler d'efforts pour le renverser et encore plus pour l'étouffer.

C'est pourquoi les éléphants adultes, sans parler des défenses, sont toujours exclus de leur régime alimentaire, alors que les girafes, même adultes, sont chassées par les lions.

Related Answer

How would a silverback gorilla actually hurt you? How could they kill you?

Samuel Perloff , Nature Teacher (2021-present) Answered Mar 24

There’s only one recorded human fatality I know of by a gorilla in the wild. It was I believe around the turn of the 20th century when a hunter injured a silverback gorilla with a shot but did not kill him, after the silverback retaliated, the hunter was recovered later with both arms ripped off and IIRC his head bitten off. A single well placed blow might be potentially enough from an adult gorilla, especially from a silverback, to shatter a bone or create massive internal bleeding. I gather they are not beyond using their extremely strong jaws in an attack either (usually using this for biting tough fibrous plants). Mercifully, gorillas are of course predominantly herbivorous and tend to have no hunting culture like chimps do and try to avoid forcefully conflict with other species unless pushed to the absolute brink or put in confinement in a zoo (even then they they seem to have no intent to hurt us).

A gorilla punches a photographer (but in what I assume was a rather half hearted punch) after apparently getting drunk from bamboo stems fermenting in his stomach.

A silverback in Cincinnati Zoo appeared to want to protect and was gentle when a toddler fell into its enclosure.

Source on wild gorilla attack in this book:

More answers from Samuel Perloff

Do crocodiles and alligators ever meet?
Which owl is the tallest?
Is an owl a hawk?
Are there bison in New York?
Do Cooper's hawks eat rabbits?

In other languages

In French
Comment un gorille à dos argenté pourrait-il vous tuer, spécifiquement ?

NOAH'S ARK
www.noahs-ark.org

Why hasn’t prey evolved to the point where it can defend itself against any predator?

evolvopedia · Follow Answered by VC Enzo Nov 12

I will leave a picture as answer, predators have a dangerous life! one injury could mean their death. Its only human who think that animals like lions are totally feared in their environment. The truth is that they must be extremely carful while hunting. Have you ever face a pissed off buffalo or even zebra ?

What do people underestimate often?

Jamari · Follow Updated 1y

This is Africa:

And this is also Africa:

This is Africa:

And this is also Africa:

People underestimate Africa. In the western media, it’s shown as a continent with only thirsty and starving children and wild animals.

When really, some African nations are just as developed and metropolitan as America.

Nairobi, Kenya

Casablanca, Morocco

Accra, Ghana

Cairo, Egypt

Lagos, Nigeria

Dar es Salaam, Tanzania

Abidjan, Ivory Coast

Luanda, Angola

Cape Town, South Africa

Not all countries are as developed as the United States, Britain etc. But it doesn't mean that they are necessarily extremely poor.

There's poverty everywhere, some places more than others. But if that's the only thing shown, it will be believed that it's the only thing that exists.

I think it’s about time we end the misconceptions and stereotypes about this beautiful continent.

Don’t underestimate Africa!

Peace, -Jamari Chin

Nous sommes une partie d'eux, ils sont une partie de nous.

NOAH'S ARK
www.noahs-ark.org

Related Answer
What type of tiger is the most dangerous?
Nick Nicholas

Studied Big Cats for 40+ years 2y

The tigers of the Mangrove Swamps of the Sunderbans are regarded as the most dangerous and also have the highest proportion of maneaters.

These tigers were never systematically hunted and killed like most of the other tigers owing to the environment they were in and as such had no natural fear of man. All the animals there have evolved to live on salt water.

As has happened so often in the past Man has invaded the tiger's space with illegal fishing and honey collection so the future is not actually that hopeful though I will save that for another answer.

These tigers (of the Bengal race) are a beautiful shade of orange with large eyes shown below:

Related Answer
How powerful is a tiger?

Joshua Walters, Referee (2017-present) Updated Aug 27, 2018

So you want to know just how powerful the largest and strongest feline truly is…

"I have power…unlimited power!!!"-Emperor of the tigers

The tiger is an apex predator and is armed with a very powerful bite force of around 1,000 psi (4,450 newtons) that allows it to take down prey with a fatal bite to the neck.

"Just a little disclaimer to all lion tamers out there. If you stick your head in my mouth, it may never come out…."

Tigers are so powerful they have been know to take on extremely dangerous prey such as the Indian gaur, Ussuri brown bears and even rhinos and young elephants on occasion. Of

What are the types of tiger?

Joshua James, Bachelor in Wildlife and Conservation Updated Nov 16, 2017

Originally Answered: What are the types of tigers?

There are 12 known subspecies of tiger.

Sumatran Tiger

Size: 100–140 kilograms for males, and 75 to 110 kilograms for females

Habitat: The forests of Indonesia

Conservation Status: Critically Endangered

Siberian Tiger

Size: 180–310 kilograms for males, and 100–167 kilograms for females

Habitat: The snowy areas of Russia

Conservation Status: Endangered

Bengal Tiger

Size: 180–258 kilograms for males, and 100–160 kilograms for females

Habitat: The forests of India

Conservation Status: Endangered

Indochinese Tiger

Size: 150–195 kilograms for males, and 100 to 130 kilograms for females

Habitat: The forested region

Related Answer
How powerful is a tiger?

Joshua Walters, Referee (2017-present)

Updated Aug 27, 2018

So you want to know just how powerful the largest and strongest feline truly is…

"I have power…unlimited power!!!"-Emperor of the tigers

The tiger is an apex predator and is armed with a very powerful bite force of around 1,000 psi (4,450 newtons) that allows it to take down prey with a fatal bite to the neck.

"Just a little disclaimer to all lion tamers out there. If you stick your head in my mouth, it may never come out…."

Tigers are so powerful they have been know to take on extremely dangerous prey such as the Indian gaur, Ussuri brown bears and even rhinos and young elephants on occasion. Of

Related Answer
What are the types of tiger?

Joshua James, Bachelor in Wildlife and Conservation

Updated Nov 16, 2017

Originally Answered: What are the types of tigers?

There are 12 known subspecies of tiger.

Sumatran Tiger

Size: 100–140 kilograms for males, and 75 to 110 kilograms for females

Habitat: The forests of Indonesia

Conservation Status: Critically Endangered

Siberian Tiger

Size: 180–310 kilograms for males, and 100–167 kilograms for females

Habitat: The snowy areas of Russia

Conservation Status: Endangered

Bengal Tiger

Size: 180–258 kilograms for males, and 100–160 kilograms for females

Habitat: The forests of India

Conservation Status: Endangered

Indochinese Tiger

Size: 150–195 kilograms for males, and 100 to 130 kilograms for females

Habitat: The forested regio

Related Answer

If there was a house cat as big as a tiger, would it be just as dangerous as a tiger?

Billy Gladman, lives in London (1998-present) Updated Jan 31, 2019

Originally Answered: Is there was a house cat as big as a tiger, would it be just as dangerous as a tiger?

It would, but maybe not in the same way.

A tiger would be dangerous because it’s a wild animal, much heavier than you and is a natural killer. Cats don’t really have the natural ‘killer instinct’ wild animals have. Same goes with dogs. We’ve pretty much bred the survival instinct out of domesticated animals, making them shadows of their former selves. Cats may share a lot of DNA with some wild cats, but they're far from wild, no matter what anyone thinks. They may not love the same way as dogs, but you can bond with a house cat more than you can bond with any wild cat.

If a cat was the size of a

Related Answer

If there was a house cat as big as a tiger, would it be just as dangerous as a tiger?

Billy Gladman, lives in London (1998-present) Updated Jan 31, 2019

Originally Answered: Is there was a house cat as big as a tiger, would it be just as dangerous as a tiger?

It would, but maybe not in the same way.

A tiger would be dangerous because it's a wild animal, much heavier than you and is a natural killer. Cats don't really have the natural 'killer instinct' wild animals have. Same goes with dogs. We've pretty much bred the survival instinct out of domesticated animals, making them shadows of their former selves. Cats may share a lot of DNA with some wild cats, but they're far from wild, no matter what anyone thinks. They may not love the same way as dogs, but you can bond with a house cat more than you can bond with any wild cat.

If a cat was the size of a

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Mar 28

This wolf and bear pair were documented travelling, hunting and sharing food together for 10 days.

Image Credit: Lassi Rautiainen / HotSpot Media.

More information. Photographer Captures Something So Extremely Rare, No One Will Probably Ever See It Again

The Love of Wildlife

· Follow Posted by Richard Strachan Wed

The owner of the cow decided to install a CCTV camera after hearing the barking of dogs every day So he got to see this amazing scene. Every day a Leopard comes and the cow loves him, licks him. When he found out from the old owner of the cow, he said that this leopard was only twenty days old when the mother of the leopard died. Since then the cow has fed him her milk and the leopard thinks that the cow is his mother, so the leopard comes to visit the cow every day in love with his mother.

Related Answer
What animal is stronger than it looks?

Ilya Taytslin Software engineer, marine scientist, scuba nerd Updated 1y

Someone already mentioned leopard, and it is true — a leopard can climb a tree while holding in its jaws a prey heavier than it is. But most people expect such strength from big cats. Here is a more surprising answer:
An elephant.

What, you say? Of course elephants are strong! They are huge, and just looking at one makes it obvious how strong they are!

But looks are deceiving. An elephant is much stronger than it looks.

Here is a cow elephant tossing a 500 kg buffalo into air. With her neck muscles.

This elephant looks like she is about 4 tons. So this is an equivalent of a 200 lb human picking up a 25 lb weight with his teeth, then tossing it several feet upward with nothing but a neck flick.

I don't recommend that you try.

Edited: Initially I thought the elephant was male

Related Links

Which animal is more dangerous: a lion or a tiger?
Would a Siberian tiger fight and kill a Barbary lion 1 on 1 & head on?
Can tigers and lions coexist in the same area?

Why does it seem like lions are more loved than tigers, and lions get more credit and recognition than tigers do when they're equally beasts?

Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
Can 2 lions kill a tiger, or can a male lion kill a female tiger?
Why do tigers and lions never fight each other?

What made Clyde Beatty think that the African lion would defeat a tiger in a fight when tigers clearly have more strength, agility and intelligence?

Can 7 lionesses kill a full-grown male tiger?
At which age are tigers dangerous to humans?

Related Answer
Why are there no tigers in the jungles of Africa, considering leopards thrive there?

Theodore Talbot · Follow BS Computer Science, minor in Anthropology University of MDThu

Tigers evolved in a different climate to be well blended with a different background. Tigers have no problem with water having evolved in monsoon jungles and flooded coastal areas. African big cats saw that kind of habitat dwindle to very little a long, long time ago. The big cats evolved more to savannah brush country than wet jungles. So tigers look different and have different habits because it fits to where they live. The adaptations would be a hindrance in most of Africa's big cat habitat.

Jaguar:

Tiger:

NATIONAL GEOGRAPHIC Photograph by Steve Winter
WHAT THE DEER SEES
WHAT WE SEE

Lion:

Snow Leopard:

Can You Spot the Snow Leopard Camouflaging in this Viral Photo?

Can You Spot the Snow Leopard Camouflaging in this Viral Photo?

If social media posts featuring puzzles and optical illusions are your thing, then you surely need to see this recent viral image of a snow leopard camouflaging in the background of mountain terrain.

https://www.news18.com/news/buzz/can-you-spot-the-snow-leopard-camouflaging-in-this-viral-photo-3965732.html

Look to the right of the rocks next to the cave.

Leopard:

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Beautiful Relationship Between A Baby Gorilla And Chimp

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Wed

Interspecies animal relationships aren't uncommon, we see them time and time again and it still has the power to melt our hearts.

This story is no exception.

A photographer caught the gentle and heartfelt relationship between a baby gorilla and a baby chimpanzee.

A lot of baby animals don’t discriminate in any way, we’ve seen baby monkeys and tigers, puppy’s and tigers and even a dog and an owl.

They have a love that is pure, and unrivaled. It is difficult to say whether the two will remain friends throughout adulthood. Gorillas can be very territorial and aggressive when they are older and as they grow large.

They are used to roughhousing each other so for a smaller animal like a chimp, it may be dangerous.

Source: Beautiful Gifts to the Earth

Why do Ostriches bury their heads under the sand?

Serge Elia · Follow Animal lover 3y

The most common myth concerning ostriches is that these birds bury their heads under the sand whenever danger is on the prowl. In reality, this isn’t true, because ostriches do not bury their heads underground when threatened; instead, they will readily defend themselves and protect their chicks.

Sure enough, the world's biggest and fastest bird can become aggressive if threatened. For that matter, it has long, dagger-like claws at the end of its long feet – as such, one kick can inflict a serious amount of damage. Which is why it's always advisable never to try provoking an ostrich.

However, the myth does come from a true fact: when nesting, a female ostrich will dig shallow holes in the ground, so as to use them as nests for her eggs. In the process, she uses her beak to turn her eggs several times each day.

In fact, from a distance, an ostrich leaning into a hole could easily look like it's burying its head in the sand! And that is what probably led to the common myth.

But still, despite their comical appearance, ostriches are not cowards; they are dangerous birds that will never relent towards anything that threatens their lives or that of their young. It's always wise never to mess with ostriches.

How come elephants confront safari vehicles, but lions do not?

Patrick Colligan · Follow Former Elephant Trainer at San Diego Zoo Safari Park (1987–1998) Feb 12

Elephants perceive Safari Vehicles as another Large Animal challenging their territory. So, they may at times, feel the need to stand up to, or challenge them. Lions, on the other hand, do not feel threatened by Safari Vehicles. To a Lion, a Safari Vehicle does not seem to be suitable prey.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Grizzly Bear 'Super Mom' Gives Birth To Her 17th Cub Despite Her Old Age

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Feb 28

A grizzly bear super mom who found fame for showing off her cubs to tourists at the roadside has given birth to her 17th baby.

The wild grizzly who lives in the Grand Teton National Park, Wyoming is still producing cubs, even at her grand age of 24 years old. In the wild, grizzlies only live long past 26 years, but that hasn't stopped this super mom from birthing a litter of four cubs.

In itself, four cubs in a single litter for a grizzly bear is pretty rare, before even considering the grizzly's age.

Known as Grizzly 399, she became famous for being often visible at roadsides with her family which led to social media accounts being created in her name.It is believed that the ‘super-mom’ learned to use the busy roads to avoid males who have been known to kill young bear cubs.

This technique clearly paid off for Grizzly 399 who has officially become the most successful documented grizzly mother of all time.

Photo Credit: Kate and Adam Rice

https://nawalpurdainik.com/02/grizzly-bear-super-mom-gives-birth-to-her-17th-cub-despite-her-old-age/?fbclid=IwAR32_HQEQn2-HyR6Z45Ifp-Vhf3p4je0aBSPky4UF_wifjh8L_7T4nRKL_0

Quelles sont les "stars" du monde animal sauvage ?
/What are some "stars" of the wild animal world?

Vincent Person Master in Droit, Universités (Graduated 2015) Translator · 8mo

Alice G. Interested in animal behaviours

This answer may not be an exact translation of Alice G.

Scarface.

Scarface était un lion mâle légendaire qui est devenu célèbre pour sa cicatrice, qui lui a valu son nom et a fait de lui le félin africain le plus photographié de tous les temps.

Né et élevé dans le parc Masai Mara au Kenya, Scarface a grandi avec ses frères Sikio, Morani et Hunter, avec lesquels il a formé un fort lien de complicité qui a fait du groupe une sorte de gang de la savane.

De nombreuses légendes tournent autour de l'origine de la cicatrice de Scarface ; l'une d'elles prétend qu'un berger masaï l'a frappé avec une lance pour défendre son bétail.

Après avoir régné pendant 11 ans sur la savane, Scarface s'est éteint à l'âge de 15 ans (un objectif de vie remarquable pour un lion) le 11 juin de cette année, terminant ses derniers instants de vie dans une paix totale mais laissant un grand vide dans le Masai Mara, l'endroit qui pendant une décennie a été son domaine et celui de ses frères.

Première photo par Y. Schmidt : Scarface durant ses derniers jours de vie.

Deuxième et dernière photo, Scarface par Christopher Walti.

Related Answer
Quelles sont les différences entre les lions et les tigres en termes de style de combat / What are the fighting style differences between lions and tigers?

Claire Heinrich · Suivre Traductrice éphémèreTraducteur · 2 ans

Raffaele Ronga Animal enthusiast

Les lions se battent en infligeant des dégâts avec l'une de leurs pattes antérieures (droite ou gauche), chacune équipée de griffes rétractables de 5 cm, ce qui représente un armement sérieux pour un animal.

"Dégage de mon terrain, p'tit con !"

Les tigres, quant à eux, se battent en se tenant sur leurs pattes postérieures (comme les ours) et en infligeant des dégâts en utilisant leurs deux pattes antérieures à la fois, qui sont également équipées de griffes de 5 cm de long.

"Tu ferais mieux de t'enfuir, mon pote !".

En plus de leur style de combat, il existe une différence de comportement (ce qui n’a bien sûr rien à voir avec leur style de chasse, c’est une autre histoire) :

Etant donné que les lions vivent en groupe, ils sont génétiquement câblés pour lutter, en particulier les mâles qui sont très territoriaux à l'égard des autres lions et des animaux en général, et ils sont particulièrement enclins à tout faire pour devenir le mâle alpha de leur groupe et cela signifie donc qu'ils ne reculeront jamais et se battront jusqu'à la mort; les tigres se battent rarement, car ce sont des animaux solitaires qui voyagent sur de longues distances, ce qui signifie qu'ils se rencontrent rarement sur le même territoire ou se disputent la même proie, mais s'ils se rencontrent, ils se méfient l'un de l'autre et s'ils devaient se battent, ce ne serait pas un combat à mort, car ils savent évaluer les risques d'un combat sérieux, donc la plupart du temps, le combat se terminera par l'un d'entre eux qui s'enfuit.

Les deux sont néanmoins impressionnants.

Questions similaires

Quel est l'animal sauvage le moins intelligent de l'histoire ?
Quel animal est le plus rare au monde ?
Quel animal sauvage a la vie la plus facile ?
Est-ce que les paons sont des animaux sauvages ?
Quel animal à l'état sauvage ressemble presque à un jouet ?
Quel est l'animal sauvage le plus intéressant que vous ayez vu ?
Quel est le plus bel animal sauvage ?
Quel animal sauvage, aimeriez-vous approcher, toucher et caresser ?
La vie animale sauvage peut-elle cohabiter avec les humains ?
Est-ce que les animaux sont rancuniers ?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: The Topi pride.

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Mar 16

Look at the happy faces, all smiles

Photo by Dickson Lenkoko.
Source Lion lovers.

Arkaneh Urairat

How can you survive if you are being chased by a herd of mad elephants?

Updated 1y

No one would have done better than this Thai man in Thailand… He humbly apologized with a wai (traditional gesture) when he found out that his bike angered this herd of Jumbos in Khao Yai National Park, Thailand.

… and he survived!

He was among the fortunate few who came face-to-face with the jumbos and escaped unscathed, while many cars have been damaged and some curious ones who came out of the vehicles to snap the photos- killed.

Do not get out of the car!

Please learn the gesture of ‘Thai wai’ when visiting Thailand…

Mindset.Des.Milliardaires

Suivre Publication par David-GDK 27 mars LEÇON DE VIE !

Un homme Massaï entra dans une banque à NAIROBI et demanda un crédit. Il dit à l'agent de crédit qu'il allait à DUBAI pour affaires pendant quatre semaines et qu'il avait besoin d'emprunter 45 dollars (environ 27000 FCFA).

L'agent de crédit lui dit que la banque aura besoin d'une garantie pour le prêt. Alors le Massaï lui remit les clés d'une Mercedes Benz S 500 toute neuve, garée dans la rue devant la banque.

Le Massaï montra les papiers du véhicule et tout était correct. L'agent de crédit s'est engagé à accepter la voiture en garantie du prêt.

Le Directeur de la banque et ses collaborateurs se sont tous moqués du Massaï pour avoir utilisé une Mercedes Benz de 133 mille dollars (environ 80 millions de FCFA) comme garantie contre un prêt de 45 dollars.

Un employé de la banque gara alors la Mercedes Benz dans le parking souterrain de la banque. Quatre semaines plus tard, le Massaï était revenu, avait remboursé les 45 dollars et les intérêts, qui s'élèvaient à 1,5 dollars.

L'agent déclara alors : "Monsieur, nous avons été très heureux d'avoir traité avec vous. Cette transaction s'est très bien déroulée mais nous sommes un peu perplexes. Pendant votre absence, nous avons examiné votre dossier et avons découvert que vous êtes multimillionnaire. Ce qui nous intrigue, c'est pourquoi vous donneriez-vous la peine d'emprunter 45 dollars ?

Le Masai répondit : « Où d'autre à NAIROBI pouvais-je garer ma voiture pendant quatre semaines pour seulement 46,5 dollars et m'attendre à ce qu'elle soit là à mon retour ?

CELUI QUE VOUS PRENEZ POUR UN IGNORANT PEUT ÊTRE PARFOIS PLUS INTELLIGENT QUE VOUS. EN TOUT TEMPS, CULTIVONS LA MODESTIE ET L'HUMILITÉ.

David-GDK Connaissances : Anglais 23 mars Parce qu'il était là en premier...
Connaissances : Anglais 23 mars

Ce garçon petit ISAAC 9ans et son petit frère âgé de 11mois orphelins de père et mère.. Ont été chassé par leurs TANTE en les traitant des sorciers.

Cela fait déjà 2mois qu'ils vivent dans la rue et ils se nourrit à l'aide des personnes généreux qu'il trouve dans la rue. Mais ils n'ont pas de toit fixe pour dormir c'est sur la table du marche que ils dort avec son frère (bébé). Ce sachet qu'il détiennent aux mains c'est leurs valise où ils mettent les vêtements.

" ISAAC m'a dit: QUE son père fût un chauffeur de taxi il est mort par manque de soins et l'argent. sa mère est morte par sesarienne pendant l'accouchement de son petit frère ".

Alors que la majorité de sa famille se retrouve à Goma l'unique tante se trouve ici à Kinshasa malheureusement elle a finit par nous chassé sans cause en nous accusant des sorcièrs , soit disant c'est nous qui bloquent sa maison et les affaires de son mari " sans relâché son petit frère malgré la souffrance ISAAC dit:" s'il s'agit de mourir ensemble de faim avec mon petit frère oui je le ferai , mais l'abandonner sa jamais" C'EST CE MOT QUI M'AVAIT TELLEMENT TOUCHÉ

Cœur planète

David-GDK Connaissances : Anglais7 mars

Un petit garçon demanda à sa mère :

- Pourquoi pleures-tu ?

- Parce que je suis une femme, lui a répondu-elle.

- Je ne compend pas, dit-il.

Sa mère le prit dans ses bras et lui dit :

- Et jamais tu ne comprendras.

Plus tard le petit garçon demanda à son père :

- Pourquoi maman pleure-t-elle ? Je ne compend pas !

- Toutes les femmes pleurent sans raison, fut tout ce que son père put lui dire.

Devenu adulte, il demanda à Dieu :

- Seigneur, pourquoi les femmes pleurent-elles aussi facilement ?

Et Dieu répond :

- Quand j'ai fait la femme, elle devait être spéciale.

J'ai fait ses épaules assez fortes pour porter le poids du monde ; et assez douces pour être confortables.

Je lui ai donné la force de donner la vie, et celle d'accepter le rejet qui vient souvent de ses enfants.

« Je lui ai donné la force pour lui permettre de continuer quand tout le monde abandonne, et celle de prendre soin de sa famille en dépit de la maladie et de la fatigue.

Je lui ai donne la sensibilité pour aimer ses enfants d'un amour inconditionnel, même quand ces derniers l'ont blessée durement.

« Je lui ai donné la force de supporter son mari dans ses défauts et de Demeurer à ses cotés sans faiblir.

Et finalement je lui ai donné des larmes à verser quand elle en ressent le besoin.

« Tu vois mon fils, la beauté d'une femme n'est pas dans les vêtements qu'elle porte, ni dans son visage, ou dans la façon de se coiffer les cheveux.

La beauté d'une femme réside dans ses yeux.

car c'est la porte d'entrée de son coeur - le lieu où réside l'amour.

Et c'est souvent par ses larmes que tu vois passer son coeur.

« Toutes les femmes sont belles, et nous devons les encourager à s'aimer telles qu'elles sont et à avoir une juste estime d'elles même

s. »

À la course pendant des kilomètres sans interruption, quel animal a le plus d'endurance parmi tout le règne animal ?/ In terms of running for miles without stopping, which animal has the best endurance in the animal kingdom?

Claire Delavallée · Suivre Elle tape sur des bouts de mots et c'est numéro unTraducteur · 1 an

Jared Cooke Studies Biology (2023)

Pourquoi ?? C'est en fait beaucoup plus intéressant qu'il n'y paraît.
Pour comprendre ce qui fait que les seuls à posséder cette intéressante capacité sont nos amis équidés et nous, il nous faut d'abord observer rapidement quelques autres champions d'endurance.

Les lycaons

Ces prédateurs sont célèbres pour leur incroyable talent à la course : leur principale technique de chasse est la chasse à l'épuisement, c'est-à-dire qu'ils se contentent de poursuivre leur proie sur de longues distances jusqu'à ce que la victime renonce et s'effondre d'épuisement. Vous avez peut-être entendu dire que c'est la même tactique qu'utilisaient nos ancêtres, mais vous auriez tort de croire que ça s'est arrêté là : la chasse à l'épuisement survit aujourd'hui chez le peuple San dans le sud du Kalahari et chez les Tarahumaras dans le nord-ouest du Mexique.[1]

Toutefois, malgré les talents impressionnants des lycaons, les humains ont l'avantage pour la course sur de longues distances. La raison est tout simplement liée à notre façon de rester frais et dispos.

Les canidés, tels que le lycaon, de même que leurs proies les ongulés (animaux à sabots), doivent haleter pour se rafraîchir. Mais pour pouvoir haleter, un animal doit soit se déplacer lentement, soit rester tout à fait immobile. Pas très pratique au milieu de la chasse. Si beaucoup d'animaux transpirent, deux seulement ont suffisamment développé cette caractéristique pour l'utiliser comme manière de se rafraîchir, et ces deux-là sont les humains et les chevaux.

Bien évidemment, ce système a toutefois ses limites. Une fois qu'un certain seuil d'épuisement et de chaleur est dépassé, l'homéostasie est rompue chez l'humain comme chez le cheval, ce qui se manifeste par un arrêt cardiaque brutal et mortel. C'est ça, se tuer à la course.

Chez les animaux qui recourent au halètement pour se rafraîchir, cette restriction signifie que leur corps les empêche littéralement de courir jusqu'à ce qu'ils soient remis : ils s'effondrent d'épuisement (sans que ce soit mortel) avant qu'il y ait des risques d'effets négatifs extrêmes tels que la mort.

Notes de bas de page

[1] Chasse à l'épuisement — Wikipédia

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu

Honey badger attacking a jackal. An easy victory . It is not for nothing that the honey badger has earned the most fearless animal in the world . Known for its strength , ferocity and toughness .

Photo by Dirk Theron.

ANIMALS

Stunning video shows huge giraffe being rescued from island surrounded by crocodiles.

A daring rescue operation is underway in Kenya to save eight rare giraffes trapped on an island by rising crocodile-ridden floodwaters.

An international team of conservationists, wildlife experts and local community members has already managed to float one of the 16-foot-tall giraffes to safety using a specially designed, handmade steel barge. However, it is now a race against time to save the other seven in what Texas-based conservation non-profit Save Giraffes Now described as a “life or death” situation.

The animals belong to an endangered subspecies of the Northern giraffe known as Rothschild’s (Nubian) giraffes, which number fewer than 800 in Kenya, and 2,000 on the continent as a whole. The giraffes were introduced to an area around Lake Baringo, western Kenya, in 2011, with conservationists hoping that the isolated location would offer them protection from poaching and allow their numbers to grow.

Recently, heavy rains have caused the waters of the lake to rise steadily up to six inches a day, cutting off a piece of land where the giraffes are now trapped. In response, a collaboration between the Kenya Wildlife Service, Save Giraffes Now, Kenyan non-profit Northern Rangelands Trust and local members of the Ruko community have mounted a rescue effort to save the animals and transfer them to a 4,400-acre fenced sanctuary around four miles away.

Since the newly-formed island was cut off from the surrounding land, conservationists have been keeping the giraffes alive by providing them with food, while also conducting routine health checks. In the meantime, members of the Ruko community built a special barge to rescue the animals. The barge consists of a rectangular steel structure floating atop a series of empty drums with reinforced sides to keep the giraffes from jumping out.

On Wednesday, the rescue team used this special barge to save one of the giraffes, named Asiwa, who was stranded by herself on a separate part of the newly-formed.

ANIMALS

Stunning video shows huge giraffe being rescued from island surrounded by crocodiles.

Kathy Pennell Author, 12 Young Adult Mysteries, 1 Adult Mystery at Lancaster County, PA (2000–present) Mar 19

A daring rescue operation is underway in Kenya to save eight rare giraffes trapped on an island by rising crocodile-ridden floodwaters.
An international team of conservationists, wildlife experts and local community members has already managed to float one of the 16-foot-tall giraffes to safety using a specially designed, handmade steel barge. However, it is now a race against time to save the other seven in what Texas-based conservation non-profit Save Giraffes Now described as a “life or death” situation.

The animals belong to an endangered subspecies of the Northern giraffe known as Rothschild’s (Nubian) giraffes, which number fewer than 800 in Kenya, and 2,000 on the continent as a whole. The giraffes were introduced to an area around Lake Baringo, western Kenya, in 2011, with conservationists hoping that the isolated location would offer them protection from poaching and allow their numbers to grow.

Recently, heavy rains have caused the waters of the lake to rise steadily up to six inches a day, cutting off a piece of land where the giraffes are now trapped. In response, a collaboration between the Kenya Wildlife Service, Save Giraffes Now, Kenyan non-profit Northern Rangelands Trust and local members of the Ruko community have mounted a rescue effort to save the animals and transfer them to a 4,400-acre fenced sanctuary around four miles away.

Since the newly-formed island was cut off from the surrounding land, conservationists have been keeping the giraffes alive by providing them with food, while also conducting routine health checks. In the meantime, members of the Ruko community built a special barge to rescue the animals. The barge consists of a rectangular steel structure floating atop a series of empty drums with reinforced sides to keep the giraffes from jumping out.

On Wednesday, the rescue team used this special barge to save one of the giraffes, named Asiwa, who was stranded by herself on a separate part of the newly-formed island.

“Thankfully the rescue is off to a fantastic start, as Asiwa was the most imperiled giraffe isolated on an island that has flooded so she had less than an acre left. The Ruko community is so happy she is now safe. Here’s hoping the coming days go as well,” David O’Connor, president of Save Giraffes Now, told Newsweek.

Two more giraffes will be moved tomorrow and the team plans to rescue the rest in the coming weeks.

“There is great urgency to execute this rescue,” O’Connor said in a statement. “We couldn’t have asked for a better result, and we’re eager to move the others soon. With giraffe undergoing a silent extinction, every one we can protect matters.”

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: Python Swallows Crocodile Whole .

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Jan 23

A terrible arrangement of photographs shows an olive python , gulping down an Australian freshwater crocodile

The pictures were captured by photographer Martin Muller who was kayaking around Mount Isa, Queenland which were then published on the GG Wildlife Rescue Inc Facebook page .

Pythons are known for their dietary desire. The huge snakes have been found with the remaining parts of everything , from deer bigger than themselves and impalas to thorny porcupines have been found in their stomachs .

These huge snakes joyfully eat each other and on uncommon events, some python species will even assault and eat people

These images were captured by Martin Muller in 2019 .

ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Mother Protects Her Baby Even While She sleeps.

Kathy Pennell Author, 12 Young Adult Mysteries,

Mar 30

Cheetah family assemble for the annual photo.

African Wildlife Animals: "CONVICTED!! JUSTICE IS SERVED!!"

By Kathy Pennell

Author, 12 Young Adult Mysteries, 1 Adult Mystery at Lancaster County, PA (2000–present) Fri

"Thank you to the Makhanda High Court judiciary and all involved in the prosecution of the notorious Ndlovu rhino poaching gang. Each of the group where given a 25 year sentence for 55 charges linked to deaths of at least 13 rhino (brutally poached with immobilizing drugs)

The sentencing was appealed - and the appeal dismissed this morning - the sentence stands. One for the good guys!"

Source: African Wildlife Animals

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Asiatic Lion (Panthera leo persica), one of the most endangered species in the world.

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Mar 28

India is the eighth most biodiverse region in the world. The Himalayas, the Western Ghats, the Indo-Burma region and Sundaland are the four key biodiverse hotspots

The Asiatic Lion (Panthera leo persica), one of the most endangered species in the world and listed as "on the brink of extinction", can only be spotted in the Gir-Sasangir National Park and Wildlife Sanctuary in India's western state of Gujarat. Once found in many parts of the country, there are only 674 of them left as of December 2021

This big cat's biometrics include an approximate height of 110 cm (3.7 feet) and a length ranging between 200-280 cm (7-9 feet).

Asiatic lions are slightly smaller than African lions. Adult males weigh between 160 to 190 kg (352.7-419 lbs), while females weigh between 110 to 120 kg (242.5-264.5 lbs) on (Panthera leo persica), one of the most endangered species in the world.

Source: Big Cats Wildlife

Related Links

What are the oldest cities in sub-Sahara Africa?
What were the most important African cities 1000 years ago?
What is the oldest tribe in Africa?

It is well known that Sumer is considered the oldest civilization (around 4000 BCE), yet Byblos is the oldest continuously populated city in the world (built around 7000 to 8000 years ago). Why isn't Byblos considered the 1st civilization in history?

What city in your country has the oldest history?
Why was there no writing system in most parts of ancient Africa?
Did the Egyptian or Roman Empire last longer?
What civilization is older than Egypt?

If the human race started in Africa, civilization as well is from Africa. Why would other cultures then believe they are more superior than African culture?

What are the oldest countries in Africa?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Snares are Such a Big Problem for African wildlife.

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Fri

The DSWT-funded Mount Kenya Veterinary Unit was quick to spring into action following reports of a snared giraffe that was struggling to keep up with its herd on Mpala Conservancy. Arriving to the scene, KWS Vet Dr. Mijele darted the adult male from the veterinary vehicle and, within 10 minutes, the team were removing the wire snare and assessing the septic wound around the front-left foot.

The wound was cleaned and treated with iodine and antibiotic spray, before penicillin and anti-inflammatory drugs were administered intramuscularly to enhance the healing process. Minutes later and this beautiful male was back with his herd, which had stayed closed by throughout his treatment, and able to slowly (for now) trot off into the distance.

Working in partnership with the KWS, our five fully mobile Veterinary Units are active countrywide to help alleviate the suffering of wild animals, all too attending to the innocent victims of these man-made traps.

Source: African wildlife Animals

Can hyenas beat lions?

Jacques Malan · Follow Once read a book about something 2y

Originally Answered: Can a hyena kill a lion by itself?

Hyenas' biggest strength is in numbers. By themselves, they are much less formidable. Also important, the hyena has the one deadly weapon - their bite - but lions have a vicious bite too as well as four paws armed with steak knives. At around 180–200lbs, a fully grown hyena won't even have a chance against the superior weaponry of a subadult lion; a fully grown female weighing 270lbs would make quick work of one. As far as male lions go, the hyena has a chance of somewhere between zilch and nothing.

“I'm sorry, what was the question? I was too busy tearing this thing's throat out”

Hyenas, however, are like shots of tequila; it never is just one. Soon there will be more and more and just like tequila, they will ruin your life.

And the lion

This fight has happened before, and everytime a one on one fight happens, it ends up like this.

The lion

Kicks

The living

Shit out of the hyena

The lion is much bigger and stronger than any hyena out there. So assuming that the lion is in a very bad mood, the fight ends in a few minutes… at most.

Can they?

The prowress of a hyena clan is nothing to scoff at. Well-coordinated large clans can effectively displace smaller lion prides, often claiming their kills and harassing them. Lionesses often submit to hyenas when outnumbered and even abandon their kills.

Even lions, supposedly the 'kings of the jungle', have problems, and although the mere sight or scent of a lion is usually enough to scare the daylights out of any other predator, there are exceptions. I know of a recent case in the Sabi Sands when a leopard killed a juvenile lion, took it up a tree and partly consumed it. Spotted hyaenas in numbers also periodically kill lions they manage to corner – and not necessarily old, sick animals either. The leopard, as far as I am concerned, is the enigma.

Young male lion standing over the carcass of a pregnant cheetah he has killed and eaten. Lions killing and eating other predators, or even resorting to cannibalism, may be more common than previously believed.

However, hyenas do tend to avoid mature male lions at all costs. This is because dominant males absolutely do not tolerate hyenas and given the opportunity will charge head first and kill any hyena they can catch. Male lions can intimidate a whole hyena clan. In some instances, they have been observed singling out and killing the matriarch.

Pictured above: Lion tears apart a large 144lb female hyena.

However, on a very rare anecdotal account, in August 2009 a hyena clan of 50 picked a fight against a lion pride consisting 25 lions. Nine lions were killed, including the two dominant males, versus a loss of only six hyenas.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=az0Ee6NAuHY

It is quite prominent, hyenas aren't as outgunned as they seem. At least against lionesses.

Despite being less than half the size of lions, they often give them a run for their money. They are very intelligent, and fall back if they sense unfavourable odds. One on one hyenas don't stand a chance, and they know it. Hence are cautious around lions and only gang up on them when they visibly outnumber the bigcats.

Lions usually win, mind you usually is the word here, such a confrontation can go both ways, depending on circumstances. A four to one numerical advantage generally will drive off a pride of lionesses, but if male lions are present, these odds are generally not enough.

Again, generally but not always. Predicting exactly how things will turn out when wild animals are involved is almost impossible, and underestimating a hyena clan can prove to be a rather fatal mistake for any careless lion.

So can hyenas win against lions?

Depends on your definition of "winning" If it means capturing kills made by lionesses, then they sure do. A meal is a meal and getting the oppurtunity to benifit from a meal that did not require much energy expenditure for the animal that is consuming it (in our case the hyena) then that's definitely a massive win in the wild.

The only bottom line;

Steer clear of the dominant male, or said win may morph into a loss rather abruptly.

Aniruddh , works at Students Answered Dec 16, 2016

Originally Answered: Big Cats: Can hyenas beat lions?

We all know that hyna is far smaller and weaker than a lion.But the fact says that the hynas has the most powerful bite in all the animals followed by crocodile and sea tortoise and then come the lion or tiger ,approximately equal bite.

Also hynas used to attack on or fight with any animal in group. So keeping an eye on above facts if a single lion confronted a group of hynas, sure its check and mate from hyna's team but though being single lion will be tough to beat.

It's just a case described above, But in actual conditions hynas try to be away from big cats like lion or tigor and refuse the fight them untill it's so necessary (like if the are so hungry ot the opponent is wounded). Thanks for asking me question…

Related Links

How come lions don’t eat hyenas after killing them?

Why do full grown adult lionesses run away from a clan of hyenas whereas even young sub-adult male lions stand their ground against large hyena Clans most of the time?

Why do hyenas only fear lions, but are not intimidated with a group of lioness?
Who usually wins in fights between hyenas and lions?
How many hyenas does it take to kill a lion?
How much of a force multiplier is a male lion vs a female lion?

For example, there are reports that a single male lion can be enough to scare off hyenas whereas several female lions are unable to do so. Is a male lion "worth" 3 females in a fight?

Are hyenas just straight-up evil, or do they have any redeeming qualities? From what I've learned about them, they seem like the psychopaths of the animal kingdom.

Can you keep a hyena as a pet?
How long would it take a pack of hyenas to kill and eat an unarmed person?
Why do hyenas like to eat their prey alive? Why don't they kill before eating like lions

Related Answer
How do animals without hands deal with quills from a porcupine?

Collins A. Orlando · Follow Updated 4y

Not very well.

Certainly not in the case of this python.

The last supper: A snake lies dead in a South African game reserve after swallowing (Source: The Daily Mail)

Poor fellow chose the wrong day to switch meals from the diverse array of animals on its menu. It swallowed a sizeable, 30lbs porcupine whose quills ended up lacerating its insides.

Warning: Graphic Image

Bitten off more than it could chew: The 30lb porcupine after being cut out of the python. (Source: The Daily Mail)

Human presence might have contributed to this outcome as sources claim the python, on noticing tourists in the area, felt threatened and tried to escape. However, doing so, much like any serpent, involved a great deal of abdominal movements which resulted in the sharp spines puncturing its innards, thus killing the python.

The porcupine was already dead by then so I'd say this one ended in a 1 - 1 draw that day.

Or….

This poor kitty, which had a similar experience, but at least lived to fight another day (once again in South Africa).

Ouch: This leopard looked like it was ready to throw up (Source: The Daily Mail)

For anyone wondering, it suprisingly managed to pull out the spines on its own.

Back on track: The leopard lived to tell the tale after removing spines from its body (Source: The Daily Mail)

This one ended in a 0 - 0 draw.

In short, most animals' encounters with porcupines are often less than desirable. They are, for the most part, better off avoiding them altogether.

Nick Nicholas
Do lions and tigers mate with their siblings and offspring?

· Follow Studied Big Cats for 40+ years1y

Originally Answered: Do lions and tigers mate with their Sibblings and offsprings?

Nature has some safeguards in place to minimize this from happening.

Lions are social animals which live in prides. The structure is typically 2 males, 6 or more females and a number of adolescents and cubs. The male adolescents are kicked out of the pride by the 2 males before reaching sexual maturity which minimizes incest from occurring. Should the pride be taken over by other males then again they would be expelled or killed. The females stay with the pride.

Generally the males will only control the pride for 2 to 3 years so it is unlikely any female offspring will reach sexual maturity before their Fathers are ousted.

With tigers it is a bit different. They are solitary. A male tiger will have a territory which will overlap that of several females. He may well be top cat for a number of years but providing there is sufficient space for grown up cubs to establish a territory far away then incest will not be a problem. However, with shrinking space in wildlife reserves and the lack of ‘corridors’ between them incest is starting to become a problem in some places and it is becoming necessay to move tigers from overfull reserves into other reserves to keep the gene flow moving.

I feel bound to add that most incest which occurs is engineered by humans trying to breed genetic freaks like white tigers and white lions.

Related Links

Do lion cubs mate with their mothers?
Why do lions have sex for 10 seconds, and pigs for 30 minutes?
Does a male lion have sex with his child?
Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
Will a Lioness mate with the Lion who killed her cubs? Would she put up a fight?

Would she then be willing to mate with the cub-killer Lion, or, would she have to do it grudgingly?

Why do lions look so angry when mating?

Why don't lionesses stop a male lion from killing their cubs? There are surely enough females that would beat him, right?

Why do male lions back off when the lionesses try to attack them?
What happens to male lions and tigers that never get to mate?

What happens if there is another male lion other than the alpha lion, will he mate with the females or will the alpha lion…..?

What other animal species can crossbreed besides tigers and lions?

Joshua Walters · Follow Life long fan of wildlife. Updated 3y

1.You have heard of the Liger and the Tigon but have you heard of the Liliger?

"Now children always remember what you are, hybrids of hybrids."
Liligers are weird they are hybrids of a male lion and female liger. So I guess the liger isn't as sterile as we once thought!

Liliger - Wikipedia

2. Beefalo

"You may remember me from the mobile game "Don't Starve". Oh and by the way! I know where you're looking right now. Just please stop!"
Beefalo are a cross between domestic cattle and American bison. Beefalo milk is better than bison but provide the same meat that they are coveted for. They are also quite a bit more docile so farmers don't have to worry about unwanted aggression from their animals.

Beefalo - Wikipedia

3. Wholphin

"Screw orcas. I'm the true wolf of the sea!"
This hybrid is an extremely rare cross between a bottle nose dolphin and a false killer whale. The only one known to exist is currently held in captivity at Sea life park in Hawaii.

Wholphin - Wikipedia

4. Leopon

"I realized I was different when my spots never disappeared."

This rare hybrid is a cross between a male leopard and a lioness. Leopons are larger than leopards and combine features from the leopard and lion. They have brown, rather than black, spots and tufted tails.

They will climb like leopards and seem to enjoy water, also like the leopard. Male leopons may have sparse manes about 20 cm long.
Leopon - Wikipedia

5. Mule

“I like to duel with my fellow mules and always remember don’t break the rules!”

Mules are a cross between a male donkey and female horse. Mules are said to be more patient and long-lived than horses, and are less stubborn and more intelligent than donkeys.

Mule - Wikipedia

6. Cama

"I make up for my lack of a hump with my big rump!"

A cama is a hybrid between a male dromedary camel and a female llama. Like camels, camas can survive for very a very long time without water, creates the wool of a llama and has the size and strength of a camel.

Cama (animal) - Wikipedia

7. Pizzly

"My mother always scolds me for never taking a shower as my white fur always looks a bit dirty."

This hybrid is very rare and has occurred in both the wild and captivity.

Analysis of DNA has discovered that mixture between these two animals dates all the way back to the Pleistocene.

Grizzly–polar bear hybrid - Wikipedia

8. Zebroid

“I wish I didn’t have stripes so I could just be like everyone else.”

A zebroid (also zedonk, zenkey, zorse, zebra mule, zonkey, and zebmule) is the offspring of any cross between a zebra and any other equine.
Zebroid - Wikipedia

9. Savannah cat

“I’m just like your pet cat whiskers but I have a bit of a wild side.”

The Savannah cat is a hybrid between a serval and a domestic cat. In the 1990s it became popular with cat owners and pretty soon it became a recognized breed of cat.

Savannah cat - Wikipedia

10. Coywolf

"I was a little scrawny for a wolf a bit large for a coyote. No matter where I look, I can't fit in. I can't even call myself a lone wolf…"

This animal is a coyote and grey wolf hybrid. They are actually fairly numerous in the wild and fit in with the ecosystems of Canada and the United states.

Interestingly enough, studies indicate that nearly all North American gray wolf populations possess some of mixture with coyotes. So I guess all North American wolves are "hybrids".

Coywolf - Wikipedia

Hope you enjoyed these ten hybrid animals!

Edit 1: Added Coywolf

Nick Nicholas
If baby animals are evolutionarily adapted to look cute, why do predators not feel bad for eating them?

· Follow Studied Big Cats for 40+ years1y

How are big cats in zoos able to eat raw meat?

At the zoo I worked in we had contacts all over the meat industry so we got nearly all the meat we needed for the predators for next to nothing. Most of it was unsellable off cuts and internal organs. Wild cats have extremely robust stomach systems which can break down raw meat without being harmed by the bacteria which cooking removes.

I saw a documentary once which showed a group of lions consuming a warthog in an advanced state of putrefaction which they had fished out of a water hole in which it had drowned.

Edit - something I will add. It is important to feed the wild cats everything - meat, muscle, sinew, bone, gristle, the whole lot - all raw. You can't just give them the good stuff which humans eat.

Below - lion with a corpse which is well past its best before date:

Serge Elia · Follow Animal lover Updated 3y

Predatory animals worldwide have but a single goal in mind, which is to kill in order to survive – otherwise, they are condemned to be killed. Indeed, in nature, life is an endless battle for survival; and it's only the fittest that wins, never the weak, including the young that have yet to understand the dangers and to hone their survival skills.

Let's begin with the ongoing war between different species of predators themselves, such as those that live in Africa: lions, leopards, cheetahs and hyenas (among others) engage in dietary overlap that results in intense competition, a fact that makes all of them negatively impacted by each other's presence.

Consequently, lions not only kill adult leopards, hyenas and cheetahs whenever they stumble upon them, but they also kill the cubs; leopards do the same too (see above), and so do hyenas and cheetahs. The reason behind this is as follows: by killing a small cub that belongs to a different species – no matter how adorable or non-threatening it may appear –, the predators eliminate a future competitor over food and territory, as well as a potential threat to their own offspring.

Not only that, a lot of predators (like tigers, bears and lions) do not hesitate to kill any unrelated cub that is not of their own, even though that cub is of the same species. In that way, the males ensure that only their bloodline survives, not that of another male – that is, if they can afford to fight off protective mothers.

Additionally, all predators constantly seek the easiest way to make a kill that can satisfy their hunger. Because of this, they can't always afford to take risks when trying to tackle large, dangerous game, including animals that can and will fight back with their lethal horns and hooves (buffaloes, antelope, bisons, moose, etc.); and that's why they mostly resort to kill the vulnerable youngsters that are unlikely to put up a fight – most of the time; on the other hand, some can become feisty when defending themselves, thus forcing even the much bigger predators to flee and leave them alone.

For sensitive readers out there, all of this may seem utterly cruel, but still we cannot do anything to change it: it's the eternal rules of the wild – besides, nature never takes hostages, no matter how cute some may appear; in the wild, a small animal that finds itself unprotected, and makes the mistake of showing weakness, has but death to embrace.

Not to worry, though, because exceptions do occur in the wild: there have been numerous accounts of lionesses raising abandoned youngsters despite them being different species, including oryx calves (see above) and even leopard cubs (see below).

One particular leopard – a female from Botswana named Legadema – surprised filmmakers when she was spotted raising single-handedly an orphaned baby baboon (see below), despite having killed its mother. The story gets even more surprising: she even resorted to protect the baby against prowling hyenas by hiding it further up the trees, and then they both snuggled up against each other before sleeping.

Last but not least, tales of wolves raising abandoned human babies have been reported as well.

These accounts are proof that animals are not always the savage beasts we often misjudge them to be, because a lot of them can develop a strong maternal instinct that prevails over the aggressive instinct, and allows them to raise abandoned cubs, even if they were of a different species.

In the end, it all depends upon the individual predator and its behavior.

Are there species of crocodiles that are more dangerous than others?

Steven Caddens · Follow Former Supervisor at Red Cross Logistics
Updated 2y

This is the Nile crocodile

Crocodylus niloticus, the second largest reptile on Earth after this beast;

Crocodylus porosus. The Saltwater crocodile. The largest reptile on Earth. Lots of teeth, intelligent, and for its size very quick and agile. Not all crocs are angry though;

This croc is a juvenile Nile crocodile she had an itch that needed scratching.

EDIT: I am at awe with the number of views and upvotes, may i take this opportunity to thank you all, very kind regards.

Comment les lions du désert survivent-ils?/ How do desert lions survive?

Jerome Cohen Un ami des animaux depuis toujours, de toutes espèces.Traducteur · 1 an

Serge Elia Animal lover

:

Tout d’abord, les lions du désert accomplissent la même chose que tous les prédateurs désertiques du monde : puisqu’ils vivent généralement dans un paysage chaud et aride qui n’abrite que peu ou pas d’eau à disposition – tel que le désert du Namib en Afrique australe, considéré comme le plus vieux désert de la Terre –, ils s’hydratent principalement grâce aux proies qu’ils chassent (et pour être plus précis, au sang ou aux tissus corporels de ces proies), et n’ont donc pas besoin de rivière ou de point d’eau pour boire.

De plus, les lions du désert ont des pattes plus longues que leurs homologues des savanes (y compris ceux du Kenya et de Tanzanie) – ces pattes plus longues constituent l'équipement parfait pour marcher sur les sables chauds du désert, sans risque de surchauffe. Ils ont également tendance à chasser en pleine obscurité, à l'aube ou au crépuscule, périodes pendant lesquelles le désert se refroidit, et les proies ont moins de chances de repérer les félins qui les traquent – sauf que rien n'empêche certains lions de chasser en plein jour, même pendant journée torride, lorsque de nombreuses proies se trouvent à portée.

En outre, les lions du désert ont tendance à avoir un pelage plus court ou plus clair que leurs homologues du reste de l'Afrique. Ce pelage plus clair permet d'augmenter la perte de chaleur – en particulier dans les zones où la chaleur peut atteindre 40 degrés Celsius ou plus ! –, et permet ainsi aux fauves qui les portent de se rafraîchir pendant les jours les plus chauds.

Why don't animals that swallow their prey live get eaten from the inside?

Scott Goldman 1y

Often times they do. However, most observers of such phenomenon, such as photographers for National Geographic, have observed that prey usually stop struggling at a certain point and accept their fate, irrespective of how much energy they have left.

Also, the digestive tracts of predators have adapted to this scenario by being stronger than those who eat their prey after its death.

Often times they do. However, most observers of such phenomenon, such as photographers for National Geographic, have observed that prey usually stop struggling at a certain point and accept their fate, irrespective of how much energy they have left.

Also, the digestive tracts of predators have adapted to this scenario by being stronger than those who eat their prey after its death.

What is the official term for the animals' tendency to play with their prey?

David Wilson · Follow Lifelong interest in animals11mo

I suspect the term is ‘caution’. Predators want to kill without being injured. That’s why cats toy with their prey. Mice, rats and other rodents have sharp teeth and many of them will fight when their life is on the line. Cats kill with their bite so, before they put their eyes and nose near a desperate, struggling animal they want to make sure it has no fight left in it. This is quite easy with birds because their bones are fragile and they are fairly easily incapacitated. Small mammals are a tougher prospect so cats tend to bat them around a bit first.

Big cats do it too sometimes.

This didn’t end well for the impala. Photo credit: Reynard Moolman.

Les lions du désert parcourent de longues distances lors de leurs déplacements. Ils peuvent ainsi parcourir quotidiennement une énorme superficie de 31 079 kilomètres carrés, contrairement aux autres lions africains qui couvrent une zone d'environ 250 kilomètres carrés. Et en tant que mangeurs opportunistes, les lions du désert se nourriront de n'importe quelle proie qu'ils pourront attraper (oryx, girafes, gazelles, voire de petits animaux comme les souris), tant qu'un grand nombre de proies seront disponibles.

Enfin et surtout, comme tous les autres lions, les lions du désert vivent en troupes. Mais puisqu'ils habitent d'immenses zones désertiques dépourvues de gibier abondant, ces lions se répartissent généralement en petits groupes de chasse composés de 2 à 10 membres, car ils comptent davantage sur la furtivité et beaucoup moins sur la coopération pour chasser leurs proies et se nourrir.

Voilà comment que les lions du désert parviennent à survivre dans les environnements les plus chauds et rudes.

Quelle est la durée de vie d'un crocodile?

Hugo Rampelberg Précédent lieu : France (2002–0) Mis à jour le 1 an Les crocodiles peuvent vivre jusqu'à 100 ans, mais ne meurent pas de vieillesse ! À partir d'un certain âge, ils arrêtent simplement de d'alimenter, meurent de faim.

Quelles sont les différences entre les crocodiles, les alligators et les caïmans ?

Jean Claude, ancien(ne) éplucheur d'avocat californien Répondu 12 sept. 2020 hé oui pour les shows il y a des pros accros aux crocos, bien sur

il est assez énorme! La plus grande ferme aux crocodiles du monde est en Floride . Visiter la Floride sans voir l'un des 976.000 alligators recensés, c'est vraiment dommage …Alors pour les approcher il y a des solutions sportives(aller dans les marécages avec une armure de chevalier),et les solutions pratiques (les fermes aux crocodiles. Pour ceux qui préférent la seconde version à Saint-Augustine, L'Alligator Farm réunit dans un cadre paturel exceptionnel, les 23 espéces , de la grande famille crocodolienne et bien d'autres sympathiques serpents , tortues oiseaux tropicaux etc .Cette ferme rapporte de 40 à 80 millions de dollars Serpents , viande , cuir et autres , il y a l'élévage bien sur…à la fin de la journée les visiteurs peuvent manger des beignets au crocodile dans leur restaurant.

Gustave le Sympathique

aucun de ces crocodiles ne touchent aux oiseaux "des iris" ceux qui s'occupent du nettoyage de leurs dents.

il y a des superbes créatures , il semble content !

AN NOIR ; ses principales caractéristiques, il appartient à l'ordre des crocodiliens et présente des similitudes, avec les crocodiles et les Gavials voici cet Anaconda dans DISCOVERY CHANNEL LE 9CT 2014!!les deux autres photos sont au dessous Polémique un homme se fait avaler ,dans l'émission EATEN-ALIVE de la chaine DISCOVERY CHANNEL Paul Rosolie avait tout préparé revêtant plusieurs combinaisons l'on voit sur la photo tout les techniciens tenant l'animal!!!! LE CAÏMAN NOIR ;technique de chasse , la peau sombre lui permet de se camoufler lorsqu'il s'approche de ses proies . Sa mach oire lui permet d'attraper ses proies mais pas de les déchiqueter , il doit donc les avaler en une seule bouchée..PRÊDATEURS Le caîman noir adulte est considéré comme un super prédateur et n'a, à ce titre aucun prédateur naturel.

Reproduction LE CAÏMAN NOIR "la saison des amours a lieu durant la saison séche lieu de naissance nid sur la terre ferme , composé de branchages et de feuilles Durée d'incubation des oeufs ; 40 à 90 jours ,ponte 50à 60 oeufs :90°/°pour cent des petits caîmans noirs n'atteignent pas l'âge adulte, 1 seule portée tous les 2 ou 3 ans. SA DUREE DE VIE EST DE ANS à l'état sauvage, et, jusqu'à 80 ANS en élevage.

TI

voici ce type qui à dû se faire virer en 2014! aie-aie-aie

voici-donc si-dessus LE CROCODILE DU NIL, avec la 4éme dent de sa machôire supérieure plus large que sa machôire inférieure lui c'est le Gravial , reptile crocodile à museau allongé qui habite l'embouchure du Gange; se dit par opposition à l'alligator qu'on trouve en Amérique et au crocodile qui habite le Nil ou autres fleuves d'Afrique.

voici ci-dessus LE CAÏMAN NOIR avec sa large gueule en forme de U, il est le plus grand des crocodiles ,il se distingue du crocodile et de l'alligator par sa couleur sombre, presque noire. SA TAILLE 3 à 7 mè bébé albinos ci-dessous il adore traverser un golf voir d'y Jouer!

Aux états unis il existe plein de fermes d'alligators ou le public vient en nombre non négligeable

ILS SONT LÂ depuis 1886,

TEST D'un DRESSEUR PROFESSIONNEL

c'est incroyable mais bien vrai, à une époque 1900, ou celà à dut changer aujourd'hui

1. Crocodile marin
2. Alligator
3. Gavial
4. Caïman

De haut en bas, le Gavial avec sa mâchoire allongée, le Crocodile du Nil avec une mâchoire plus courte que celle du Gavial mais plus longue que l' Alligator avec sa tête te pelle, en fin Le Caîman avec une plus petite mâchoire se trouvent des vues aériennes des têtes à droite, des différents reptiles. RETENIR LES NOMS DES REPTILES CROCODILIENS : Le moyen mémotechnique pour mémoriser LES QUATRE REPTILES,CROCODILIENS EST ASSEZ FACILE Â RETENIR , La phrase suivante vous aidera: LE GARS VIAL DIT QU4IL CROQUE ODILE , CE DONT S'INDIGNE LA LIGUE Â TORT, CAR IL MENT !

un dresseur professionnel

Alligator Farm
ZOOLOGICAL • PARK

alligator se trouvant dans la seule ferme d'alligators dans l'ARIEGE tres ,parfois plus SON POIDS 900kg à 1200 kg CARACTERISTIQUES du corps, Pattes courtes crêt osseuse au dessus des yeux , museau étroit, peau écaillée et très épaisse. Machôires puissantes , BRUIT, il vocalise. HABITAT ET ALIMENTATION DU CAÏMAN NOIR AMÊRIQUE DU SUD (BOLIVIE,BRÊSIL,COLOMBIE, EQUATEUR, GUYANE, PÊROU, VÊNÊZUÊLA, PARAGUAY), son lieu de vie , dans les eaux douces (riviéres,fleuves, lacs). LES ZONES humides et les forêts tropicales . Carnivore il mange des poissons 'PIRANHAS,POISSON- CHAT,, des crustacés etc insectes les fermes d'alligators ont débuté vers 1887 aux états -unis pour sa chair le cuir, et pour l'élévage reproduction, la plus grande ferme se trouve En Floride 40 à 80 millions dollars/ ET MOINS LOIN EN FRANCE plus de 400 reptiles et autres , LA FERME de Pierrelatte Ariége contact@lafermedesreptiles.fr adresse LA FERME DES REPTILES lieu-dit Brouzenac 09240 la bastide de Serou////// quelques visiteurs contents. Ou est situé L'Everglades Alligator Farm?

ADRESSE 40351 SW Ave homestead, FL 33034 états-unis , SITE INTERNET https//everglades.com

Questions similaires

Quelle est la durée maximale de la digestion d'un repas ?
Quelle est la différence entre un alligator et un crocodile ?
Quelle est la durée du deuil ?
Quelle est la durée de vie d'un poisson rouge ?
Quelle est la durée de vie d'un baobab ?
Quel est la durée de vie moyenne d'un gecko ?
Quelle est la durée de vie d'un frigo américain ?
Pourquoi la durée de vie d'un être vivant est diminuée si il est cloné ?
Quelle est la durée de vie d'un poil ?
Serait-ce possible d'augmenter la durée de vie d'un élément instable ?
Quelle est la durée de vie normale d'un tigre en liberté ?

Connaissez-vous des gens qui ne font pas leur âge (bien plus vieux ou plus jeunes qu'ils ne paraissent)?

Quelle est la durée de vie d'une méduse immortelle ?
Quelles sont les différences entre les crocodiles, les alligators et les caïmans ?
Quelle est la durée de vie moyenne d'une république ?

Do lions eat grass or not?

Serge Elia Animal lover Dec 5

Despite the species' carnivorous diet, nevertheless some lions (whether in the wild or in captivity) are seen feeding every now and then on a bit of grass, fruit and various types of plant matter – of course, they don't do it for very long or on a regular basis due to their biology as obligate carnivores, as well as vegetation's lack of nutritional value and/or potential toxicity.

According to scientists, this act is generally done out of need for adequate fibers, minerals, vitamins and folic acid (not usually found in meat), as well as to regulate a lion's digestive system, prevent indigestion, allow easier defecation, expel indigestible items, and cure an upset stomach – as a matter of fact, grass is used as some sort of "primitive" stomach medicine in various situations, and so it basically supports their health[1]!

This behavior is also witnessed in all other felids, including tigers (see above) and house cats, for the same reason mentioned above. So it's not so unusual as one could think, even for a carnivore.

There was this famous case of a vegetarian lioness named Little Tyke, born in captivity during the 1940s. It may sound like a setup to a joke, but it's a true story: after her mother rejected her, that lioness became a rancher's house pet that enjoyed perfume, flowers, her own bed and a diet of milk, cereals and eggs; simultaneously, she actually rejected meat or anything with a single drop of blood in it[2] (see above)* – the result: the lioness settled down with the lamb and became friends…

WORLDLIFE ANIMALS

Baby elephant helped to wake his mom after she was reassured during a rescue

The moment a baby elephant helped wake up its mother after she was tranquilized during a rescue operation to save him has been captured on camera.

The little calf can be seen trying to help the vet inject the antidote and clinging to its mother's ear with his trunk as she comes around in these adorable photos.

The extraordinary moment came after a wild mother elephant became frantic as she tried to help her three-week-old cub out of a man-made pit near a village at the southern end of South Luangwa National Park in Zambia.

It is assumed that the couple stayed at the location all night, and both became very distressed.

The villagers heard her mother's cry, and teams from Conservation South Luangwa (CSL) and wildlife veterinarian, Dr. Sichande, were called in the next morning.

The adorable moment the little boy walked in and apparently tried to help the vet inject an antidote before patiently waiting for his mother to walk away was later captured on camera.

Rachel added: "She was a bit defensive for a minute when we put her down and then decided our vet would help and wouldn't leave him alone.

"The baby didn't mind Dr. Sichande administering the antidote in his presence and ended up getting in the way trying to help.

“We reversed the mom with an antidote, and as soon as she started to stand up, the baby suckled immediately. He must have been starving from all night in the pit.

The extraordinary moment came after a wild mother elephant became frantic as she tried to help her three-week-old cub out of a man-made pit near a village at the southern end of South Luangwa National Park in Zambia.

It is assumed that the couple stayed at the location all night, and both became very distressed.

The villagers heard her mother’s cry, and teams from Conservation South Luangwa (CSL) and wildlife veterinarian, Dr. Sichande, were called in the next morning.

The extraordinary moment came after a wild mother elephant became frantic as she tried to help her three-week-old cub out of a man-made pit near a village at the southern end of South Luangwa National Park in Zambia.

It is assumed that the couple stayed at the location all night, and both became very distressed.

The villagers heard her mother’s cry, and teams from Conservation South Luangwa (CSL) and wildlife veterinarian, Dr. Sichande, were called in the next morning.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
A King and his Queen.

Jo Mburu Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD.

King of Naboisho Lenkisiau with his with beautiful Queen.

Photo by Laura Dyer

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
LEGENDARY KENYAN LIONESS 'THE QUEEN OF MARA' IS DEAD

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell

A famed, much-loved lioness at Kenya's Maasai Mara game reserve, fondly nicknamed Queen of the Mara Triangle, has passed away.

The big cat was also dubbed Mama Kali – Swahili for "fierce mother".

During her death, she was believed to be about 10 years old and she spearheaded the Angama pride which lived in the larger Mara conservancy.

According to local media reports, lioness Mama Kali died last week in an alleged human-wildlife conflict.

Edit: The article didn't report what type of human-wildlife conflict caused the Queen of Mara's death and I didn't want to know.

Source: Masai Mara game Reserve

Footnotes
[1] Do Lions Eat Grass? [Yes! Here's Why] |
[2] Little Tyke, the vegetarian lion

Are dolphins born tail first?
Serge Elia · Follow Animal lover 6mo

Usually, at the moment of birthing, young mammals (including humans) emerge from their mothers' uterus head-first – and keep in mind that we're talking here about land mammals.

On the other hand, dolphins are aquatic mammals (a category that also includes whales, orcas, manatees and dugongs), so much of their entire lives are spent underwater, including the act of giving birth. In light of this, should the new-born baby emerge from its mother head first, it will surely be condemned to death via drowning.

For this reason, dolphin calves (as well as all other cetaceans) are born tail first to prevent the risk of drowning during the birthing process. In the process, the mothers will swiftly break the umbilical cord by swimming away fast, before doing a U-turn and rapidly escorting their newborns to the surface so they can take a breath[1].

Footnotes

[1] 20 Facts About Dolphins That Will Make You Love Them Even More | Best Life

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: TOLSTOY SPEARED AND TREATED!

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Tue

The elephant named #Tolstoy is a living natural wonder, carrying some of the largest tusks on the planet. So when Big Life's rangers don't see him for a while, they go looking.

They searched beyond their normal patrol areas and eventually found him resting under a tree. All appeared fine, until he took a step… something was badly wrong. Tolstoy could barely walk. Upon getting closer, the rangers could see the problem: a puncture wound in the joint on his front right leg.

A wound like this was no accident. Tolstoy frequently plays a high-stakes game called crop-raiding. When he wins, he comes away with a bellyful of highly nutritious crops. But when he loses, he gets speared.

Tolstoy, (one of the largest elephants in Africa) doesn't know it, but his crop raids can cost a farmer their entire season's income in one night, and these farmers (justifiably) care little that Tolstoy is one of Africa's dwindling number of 'super tuskers'. It's not the first time this has happened: in 2018 he was treated for three spear wounds, also a result of crop-raiding.

The Kenya Wildlife Service vet unit, funded by our partners at Sheldrick Wildlife Trust, was quick to respond, but the decision to treat him was not made immediately. Darting an animal of this size, particularly with a wound in a sensitive joint, is extremely risky because the elephant may not be able to stand after treatment. The decision was made to wait 24 hours and see if his condition improved.

Big Life's rangers stayed by his side, spending the entire night out with him, but the wound showed no signs of improvement. The decision was made to dart him, and it was done quickly and professionally. His wound was thoroughly cleaned and treated, and Tolstoy was given antibiotics and painkillers before a jab to wake him up.

With great effort, he finally stood and stared back at the treatment team, before retreating into the shade. For now, his prognosis looks good, but he's not out of the woods just yet as he continues to heal. Big Life rangers will continue to monitor him while he recovers. And they will continue to spend their nights out in the farms, keeping elephants safe and helping farmers to protect their crops, in order to prevent this from happening again.

Photos: Jeremy Goss

Source: Big Life Foundation

Related Answer
What dog breed can kill a tiger, lion, or a jaguar on a one-on-one fight?

Billy Gladman Lives in London (1998–present) Updated 1y

In a 1 on 1 fight, no dog on Earth comes close to defeating one of these big cats. Unfortunately for our canine friends, cats are just better built for a fight. They have incredibly strong front legs which they can use to wrestle their prey down to the floor, something dogs don't really have. They have sharper claws, bigger teeth.. They're just better fighters all round to be honest. But let's have a look at these fights anyway and see how they'd play out.

I'm going to pick a dog which in my personal opinion is the best 1 on 1 fighter out of any canine, including any wolf. (come at me.) The dog I'm choosing is this guy.

The Turkish Kangal.

I chose this dog for a few reasons.

These dogs were specifically bred to defend livestock from Wolves, giving the impression that they are superior 1 on 1 fighters to most other dogs.

Despite what google might tell you, these guys have the strongest bite force out of any canine, including Wolves. (once again, come at me.) These guys have a huge bite force of 743PSI, which is crazy powerful.

Adult males can weight upwards of 70kg, which is pretty large for a dog. Some mastiff breeds can weigh a fair bit more than this (English Mastiff dogs can exceed 100kg) but i just feel that raw power is more important than weight. Now, let’s look at his first opponent. We’ll start off with his toughest challenge.

Tigers (I'll be referring to Siberian Tigers) are the most powerful big cat currently roaming our Earth. On average, they weigh around 220kg, but have been known to surpass 300kg! So straight away, our Kangal is pretty screwed to be honest… Even the thing the Kangal is best at, biting (743PSI) he still doesn't come close to a Tigers bite force, who can chow down at around 1000PSI. I think it's pretty self explanatory as to why the Kangal would come up short against a Tiger. They're simply not heavy, powerful, quick or agile enough. The Tiger would easily get a hold of him, pin him down and finish the job. No contest. next up, we have the Lion. (Personally, my favourite animal:D)

Unfortunately, it’s a similar story for our Kangal. Lions are simply too powerful for any canine on earth. Weighting in at an impressive 190kg, they would overwhelm the Kangal pretty quickly. However, our dog does have one advantage he didn't have before. His bite force. Lions only have a bite force of around 650–700PSI, which is relatively weak for a big cat. As i said before, the Kangals is 743PSI. Unfortunately, the only place they could bite this big cat to get the kill is guarded by a helmet made out of fur. So if by some stroke of luck, the Lion… I dunno, slips over or something and the Kangal can get him from behind, he still wouldn't do much damage. Again, no contest.

Lastly, the Jaguar.

Yep, that’s a Jaguar hunting a Caiman. (a small Crocodile) Of the big cats you listed, Jaguar are the lightest, but are also pound for pound the strongest big cat of them all. Having a ridiculous bite force of 1300PSI, Jaguars are INSANELY powerful creatures. However, this might be our Kangals best bet for not getting beat. He definitely won’t win, but at least, he might not lose this one! Like the other big cats, jaguars have ridiculously powerful front legs which it will use to hold down the Kangal. And with a bite force powerful enough to bite through an elephant’s skull, he will definitely have the advantage over our canine. The only hope our doggy has is that he puts up enough of a fight to convince the Jaguar he's not worth the hassle.

To be honest, this may happen with any big cat. Lions, tigers and jaguars prefer an easy kill rather than a fight for their food, so there's a chance that when they see a Kangal who is willing to fight back, they might just move on to something else that is just going to run away.

But in short, no canine on earth stands a chance against any of these big cats.

Hope this helped.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: Tiny Elephant Rejected By Herd

Posted by Kathy Pennell Mar 11

At the water hole, a herd of elephants gathered for a drink. A tiny baby elephant attempted to join them, but was repeatedly pushed away. Eventually, the herd started to move on, and when the calf attempted to follow, he was rejected again, pushed back and abandoned, all alone.

At this point, the owners of the Amboseli Bush Camp, who had been observing the interaction, realized that something was very wrong and called Big Life for help. Nearby rangers were dispatched immediately on a motorbike to survey the area, and they confirmed that the baby elephant was lost, and that his family was nowhere to be found.

He was very thin and looked less than a couple of months old, still pink behind the ears. The Kenya Wildlife Service was alerted, and the Sheldrick Wildlife Trust was called in for assistance. Big Life's rangers and Head of Security Craig Millar stayed with the calf until their support helicopter arrived, keeping him calm and safe.

He was feisty and strong throughout the rescue process, refusing any of the water offered. But once in the care of the highly experienced keepers at the Sheldrick's Kaluku Field Headquarters, he took four bottles of milk. He's been named Sabuk, meaning big/large in Maa, as they believe that he's only 4-6 weeks old and quite big for his age.

Big Life rangers have since done a thorough search of the area and found a female elephant carcass not too far from where the baby was discovered, but it's impossible to say for sure if this was his mother. We're just glad he was discovered before lions found him, and hopefully he'll recover and eventually be rehabilitated back into the wild.

Source: Big Life Foundation

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: Can`t you kids leave me in peace ?

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Mar 6

These adorable photos will ring a bell with mums everywhere. Playful lion cubs clambering all over their tired mother as she tries to get some rest in the midday sun .

The cute cubs seem to have endless amounts of energy as they torment their mother.

At one point it looks as though the mother may have got her children under control as they play right in front of her .

But normal service was resumed when the cubs break loose and scramble over the exhausted lion`s back

At last the three cubs give their exhausted mother a break and head off to play on their own nearby.

Photos. Action press Rex Shutterstock.

Why are jaguars smaller than lions if they are solitary hunters like tigers? Wouldn't it benefit them to be larger to take down prey by themselves?

Amy Christa Ernano I love animals and enjoy reading and learning about them 6mo Pound for pound, the jaguar is the strongest of all the big cats, and has the most powerful bite, at 2,000 psi — strong enough to bite through a turtle's shell or a caiman's skull. They are perfectly adapted to their environment and to their available prey species, and are at the top of the food chain in their range.

In other words, they don't need to be any bigger — they can already easily take down tapir, capybaras, deer, caiman, and even domestic cattle, and the larger they are, the more food they need.

Jaguars are perfect killing machines, even if they are not so large as lions or tigers.

Related Links

Is it true that the lion preys on/hunts animals that are bigger, wilder, more aggressive, and more dangerous compared to what the tiger preys on?

Is it possible to breed aggression out of the behavior of large felines such as lions, tigers, leopards, jaguars, and cheetahs?

Are jaguars really the strongest among all the big cats? I heard and saw many people keep saying that jaguars are pound for pound the strongest big cats.

Why did evolution make cheetahs and leopards solitary but not lions? Wouldn't all of them benefit from being in a group just like lions?

Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
Which animal is more dangerous: a lion or a tiger?

Is it true that tigers, lions and jaguars are overrated? They can't even kill large preys in a face-to-face fight. They can only use ambush tactics to kill their preys.

Why are lions pack hunters?
Amongst a lion and a tiger, who is the apex predator?
If a jaguar was of the same size as a tiger, which would win in a fight?

Who would win in a fight between different species of cats: lion, tiger, leopard, jaguar, snow leopard, cheetah, and puma?

Can a tiger mate with a lion?
Why don't tigers, leopards, jaguars or cougars hunt in prides like lions?

What makes tigers, leopards, and most other big cats better hunters than lions although lions are otherwise the most formidable predators?

Why are tigers considered the largest of the big cats when tigers and lions are clearly the same size?

Related Answer
Why are predators larger than prey?

Jermaine M Answered Apr 23, 2020

They are not. not usually.

What's a lion's favorite meal? a cape buffalo, maybe? or a zebra? those are both bigger than the lion. buffalos, weighing 2,000 pounds (907 kg), zebras, weighing 750 pounds (340 kg). while a large male lion will weigh in at 500 pounds (227 kg) as you can see, the prey of this lion is considerably larger than he is.

a circumstantial exception would ironically be the worlds largest land predator, the polar bear. but notice how i said circumstancial. polar bears usually hunt ringed seals, which can weigh in at 150–200 pounds (68–91 kg) compared to the bear's weight of 770–1,500 pounds (350–700 kg) however, this is because they are bigger than all their available prey. when the opportunity arises, a polar bear will hunt a walrus, hundreds of pounds bigger than it is, however this is very difficult because the polar bear is a loner and the walrus is in a big group.

predators are opportunists, so they will eat whatever animal they can. they do not really discriminate on size, unless it's too small or too big. it is not uncommon to see a predator hunting prey smaller than itself, but they would always prefer something larger than themselves.

a large predator's preferred prey is usually hundreds of pounds heavier than itself, or if it's a lone predator, like a cougar, it's preferred prey is the same size, or a little bit larger than it is.

Who gets the upper hand more often in confrontations between leopards and African wild dogs?

Serge Elia Animal lover Nov 9

As fellow Quoran Ansh Badal pointed it out, all depends on the situation. For example: one on one, there's no contest, the leopard is big (with some individuals weighing around 60–91 kg), strong and agile enough to kill a single African wild dog (around 22–31 kg for the average adult) – not to mention the spotted cat gains the upper hand with its supreme flexibility, nimbleness and stealth, as well as its powerful claws and jaws that deliver the fatal throttling bite to the neck, and thus make short work in killing the opponent (see above).

Then again, the African wild dog is a pack hunter that seldom lives or hunts separated from its comrades, and that's where it can go downhill for the leopard. Sure enough, very much like wolves – there's a reason these canids are sometimes referred to as "painted wolves" –, African wild dogs show their full potential when working as a team and using coordinated strategy and incredible stamina (which leopards and other felines lack). In the process, they engage altogether in mobbing and harassing any threat they meet, to the extent of snapping at a leopard's feet and tail (see below), stealing its kill, or even viciously mauling it on some occasions.

In such instances, the spotted cats' only chance of survival lies in quickly scurrying to the nearest tree, given that African wild dogs and other canids have an anatomy ill-adapted for tree climbing.

But even then, the dogs won't give up, as they may jump and bounce repeatedly, so as to try reaching the targeted leopard and continue harassment (even if the cat has climbed too high, as seen in the picture above) – if need be, they may wait for their target to descend from the tree, prior to resuming their assault, only to abort completely once the leopard will clearly not be going down.

So, overall, there's no clear winner during confrontations between African wild dogs and leopards, because the battle's outcome heavily depends upon the situations in which individual contestants (both on the leopard side and the wild dog side) find themselves – so it's mainly 50–50 for both animals.

here is a jaguar who successfully hunted a black caiman. the jaguar weighs 160 pounds on average, while black caimans grow up to 800 pounds. this one is a juvenile one, though most likely still bigger than the jaguar, if not the same size.

in conclusion, no predators are not really larger than prey. the better question to ask is why is prey larger than predators? shortly, because they have much more available food, therefore more fuel to grow, unlike predators who eat a few times a month. over time it leads to larger prey size and population, and smaller predator size and population.

Related Links

Is it true that the lion preys on/hunts animals that are bigger, wilder, more aggressive, and more dangerous compared to what the tiger preys on?

Is it possible to breed aggression out of the behavior of large felines such as lions, tigers, leopards, jaguars, and cheetahs?

Are jaguars really the strongest among all the big cats? I heard and saw many people keep saying that jaguars are pound for pound the strongest big cats.

Why did evolution make cheetahs and leopards solitary but not lions? Wouldn't all of them benefit from being in a group just like lions?

Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
Which animal is more dangerous: a lion or a tiger?

Is it true that tigers, lions and jaguars are overrated? They can't even kill large preys in a face-to-face fight. They can only use ambush tactics to kill their preys.

Why are lions pack hunters?
Amongst a lion and a tiger, who is the apex predator?
If a jaguar was of the same size as a tiger, which would win in a fight?

Who would win in a fight between different species of cats: lion, tiger, leopard, jaguar, snow leopard, cheetah, and puma?

Can a tiger mate with a lion?
Why don't tigers, leopards, jaguars or cougars hunt in prides like lions?

What makes tigers, leopards, and most other big cats better hunters than lions although lions are otherwise the most formidable predators?

Why are tigers considered the largest of the big cats when tigers and lions are clearly the same size?

ANIMALS

Will crocodiles and alligators live together without trying to eat each other?

Serge Elia · Follow Animal lover1y

Today, the only place on Earth where crocodiles and alligators live together and congregate is the Everglades of Florida (southeastern USA) – one of the few places in North America that are both hot and humid enough to host a huge amount of reptiles, including an estimated 1.5 million American alligators (Alligator mississippiensis), as well as more than 1,000 American crocodiles (Crocodylus acutus).

And yet, you'll find to your surprise that – unlike many other predators worldwide, which regularly compete for food and territory – the gators and the crocs of the Everglades don't or rarely get into conflicts with each other! Instead, they actually engage in perfect harmony with one another, mainly due to habitat partitioning and separate distributions – sure enough, the gator's range can reach as far north as Virginia, whereas American crocodiles have their ranges limited to Florida and anywhere in the tropics of Central America further south, as they have zero tolerance of the cold.

But sometimes, the two carnivores can go head-to-head and engage in brutal fights (with devastating outcomes!) resulting from heavy competition due to dietary overlap. Oftentimes, the crocs are bigger, stronger and much more aggressive than their gator neighbors – though there has been only one confirmed case of a croc killing and eating a sub-adult gator in the wild –; and sometimes, the odds can be in the gator's favor, especially if it's a larger and much stronger individual.

Croc vs. gator: place your bets!

What happens more often in the wild, leopards killing hyenas or vice versa?

Samuel Perloff

Around 20 years experience as a bird and nature watcher Mon

It is true that both leopards and spotted hyenas, the largest and by far the most predatory living hyena, are recorded to have killed one another.

A leopard and hyena engage in a tug of war over a carcass.

Spotted hyenas are slightly larger on average than an African leopard, at about 40–70 kg on average against about 30–65 kg. Hyenas have a greater bite force which allows them to crush bone. Also hyenas often live in clans which gives them strength in numbers.

A spotted hyena with a reported leopard kill.

However, leopards are definitely the favored combatants here. Leopards are much more agile, with a far superior gift for grappling, allowing them to give an all-out offensive using both their powerful jaws and razor sharp, retractable claws with a speed and precision that can often overwhelm a competing predator. Also big male leopards are often quite at least as massive as a big hyena with a rather strong predilection for highly aggressive, domineering behaviors. Therefore especially adult male leopards have won escalated conflicts, especially with lone hyenas, that become fatal and may even kill hyenas to eat them. Usually if spotted hyenas are the aggressor in a conflict often when working in a clan, the leopards usually easily flee up a tree where they can often wait out the hyenas. If the hyenas surround a leopard on the ground and prevent its escape, the leopard may still be able to fight its way out but is more liable to meet its end surrounded by snapping hyena jaws than a much more massive (and social) lion.

A male leopard with a spotted hyena kill.

P.S. Other hyenas are less potentially dangerous and less actively predatory than spotteds but brown hyenas (which are nearly equal in weight to a mid sized leopard) are known to have treed and displaced leopards from their kill with a ferocious charge, in order to scavenge them. On the other hand, male leopards have been known to at least injure (and possibly kill) brown hyenas as well. Striped hyenas are slightly smaller and are probably less likely to take the risk of confronting a larger leopard (some of these avoidance encounters may occur anywhere from India to a select few conserved areas of Middle East to some of northeastern Africa). Leopards have been known to kill striped hyenas in India.

Further reading:

https://digital.csic.es/bitstream/10261/51387/1/Palomares%20&%20Caro_1999_Am%20Nat.pdf https://www.researchgate.net/publication/325931171_Behavioural_observations_on_interaction_of_leopard_and_striped_hyena_western_India

Why could direwolves not interbreed with gray wolves? Was this the reason for their disappearance?

Nathaniel Rice · Follow

Bi, animal researcher & amateur wildlife historian Tue

Dire wolves couldn’t interbreed with gray wolves because there was a roughly 5.7-million-year genetic gap between the two.

Credit: Mauricio Antón

Cladogram from Wikipedia

New genetic and fossil evidence suggests that the dire wolf (Aenocyon dirus) and the gray wolf (Canis lupus) were only distantly related, with A. dirus having evolved from a North American canid lineage completely independently from C. lupus. The study in question found no evidence of interbreeding with gray wolves or coyotes.

https://www.nature.com/articles/s41586-020-03082-x

That being said, that doesn't mean their inability to hybridize wiped them out. Dire wolves heavily relied on big, dangerous megafauna like camels, bison, and ground sloths (which gray wolves probably ignored), and the extinction of said megafauna is likely at least partially responsible for their disappearance.

Credit: Corbain Rainbolt

Other potential causes are climate change, habitat loss, and human intervention. But loss of megafaunal prey seems the most likely to me.

Related Links

Why did the gray wolf outlast the dire wolf?

Do the Starks have a special bond with wolves and direwolves like the Targaryens have with dragons? Or are the direwolves the Stark children have loyal because they were raised from pups?

Why does Arya's dire wolf just walk away from her when they finally run into each other?
What happened to Arya's, Rickon's and Bran's dire wolves?
Which of the Stark children is the one most connected to their direwolves?

If all the Stark children's wolves were to become a pack, which direwolf do you think would be the alpha and why? (Barring that Lady doesn't die)

What's the difference between a wolf, a dire wolf and a werewolf?
Which is the strongest dire wolf in Game of thrones?
Can wolves and foxes interbreed to produce fertile offspring?
What are the differences between wolves and direwolves?

Related Answer
Why is Kenya more famous than most other African countries?

William Chesoni, lives in Kenya Answered Oct 22, 2016 · Upvoted by Dennis Bett , lives in Kenya (1997-present)

This is an interesting question, I've also found myself wondering why Kenya is so well known compared to most other African countries, so I did a bit of digging, and here's what I found:
History

It is considered the cradle of mankind:

Kenya has the largest number of fossil human remains appr. 1000 individuals than any other country in Africa.

Kenya has the oldest human remains going back to 7 million year old from Turgen Hills, Baringo (oldest in Ethiopia = 4.5 million years ; S.Africa ca 3 million years, Tanzania = 2 million years.

Kenya has some of the most complete skeletons e.g Turkana Boy (1.6 Million years), which provided a great wealth of information regarding early human physiology than anywhere in the world.

Kenya is endowed with many prehistory sites scattered all along the Rift Valley (north to south) and western Kenya.

Kenya has the longest and most complete record of human evolution (and possibly the link between humans and apes).

In addition to the fossil record, there is a long record of technological evolution (with tools as old as 2.3 million years).

There is a wide genetic representation among some of its people (Turkana) pointing to the fact that humans have been here for a very long time.

Read more Facts about Kenya as the cradle of mankind at: CRADLE OF MANKIND

Nature.

2. We have amazing wildlife. Kenya is home to the Big 5; Lions, Elephants, Buffalo, Rhinos and Leopards. There is an abundance of diverse wildlife in Kenya. We have Oryx, Antelopes, Giraffes, Impalas, Hippo, White Rhinos, Zebras, Crocodiles, Cheetahs, and many others.

3. The great wildebeest migration takes place in Kenya – Tanzania. Considered as one of the most breathtaking natural events in the world, the concentration of wildebeest is spectacular; sometime the herd is comprised of over a million at the height of the migration. The migration is between, the Serengeti in Tanzania and the Maasai Mara National Reserve in Kenya

4. The rift valley (which is the longest -6,300 km- and deepest geographical fault of its kind on earth) cuts across 11 countries, one of which -you guessed it- is Kenya. According to astronauts who have observed the earth from space, the rift valley is the most visible geographical fault on the face of the planet.

5. Kenya is a great tourist destination, thanks to the weather. Kenya is located in the tropics so it's mostly sunny (at times uncomfortably so for us locals). Some come to see the wildlife, see the sights and experience the culture.

People

6. Kenya is also renowned for our great runners. Some of the world's greatest marathoners are Kenyans. Just look at this:

Related Links

Why do East African countries' citizens: Tanzania, Uganda Somalia & Rwanda hate on Kenyans?

What do other African countries think of Kenya?
Which country is richer, Ghana or Kenya?
Is Kenya a good country?
Are East African countries more developed than West African countries?
How do you compare Kenya to Tanzania?
How is Kenya perceived internationally?
What's the most westernised African country?
Which is the most developed African country?
Is Kenya better than Ghana?

Related Answer
Is Kenya a good country?

Christine Szuszkiewicz, works at Actors and Actresses Answered Dec 21, 2014 · Upvoted by Dennis Bett , lives in Kenya (1997-present)

Originally Answered: What is Kenya like?

I feel pitifully unqualified to answer, but I've been asked. Having grown up in beautiful, stunning California and having travelled and lived in various parts of the globe, words like wondrous, beautiful, peaceful, exciting, a natural haven, which can be used to describe my home state and other places...utterly fail to capture what is special about Kenya.

It's a feeling, not comparable to what we can understand in the "Live-to-Work" United States, at least. Perhaps Europeans would be less awed by the experience of living there. I've lived for a time in several part of Europe, but it's not the same feeling. But those I know who've spent any time there, we all agree that Kenya quickly gets under your skin and haunts you when you leave...for years! I don't know whether the surrounding countries evoke such subconscious passion, whether it is the land, the people, the culture, the melting pot of cultures, nature...It's a visceral feeling. I've never ever longed for a place before. It's been many, many years since I've been, and writing this has awakened a deep longing in me to return.

Obtuse examples are all I'm left to try and explain my meaning. I grew up playing the piano, but only ever could really play from sheet music. The first time I've ever felt free enough to actually try to create music myself, was on a friend's piano a couple of months after I arrived. I just started playing.

People there work, but at 5 they depart immediately, everyone does, and without a question or hesitation. No matter how low or lofty their position. Perhaps the day before or as soon as one left, one had made plans already with friends and family. Yes, in Washington, DC, I had 2 cocktail parties a night to attend, but it's not the same; those seemed almost an extension of work. After work in Kenya, one immediately gathered in a space with friends (or family, I would assume). We'd cook together, or take turns as we spent a different eve in a different home. Other days we'd go to a coffee house, or a bar, or a restaurant. It felt highly social and to be anything but part of this would have been odd. In the world I left, I don't know, maybe there were too many people, too many people to have as friends?

I needn't talk about the wonder of being out in nature, which I grew up having continual access to in California. It was a shock to move to Washington, DC, where I kept waiting for friends to pile in a car on the weekend to visit a natural site or other, which they rarely did. But this is only a part of what I mean; yes, nature was part of daily life. You can read about Kenya's wilds anywhere. I will only say how new the experience of being a possible victim of nature was. In most all places, if you exited your car you never knew what potential hazard might away. Cape buffalo are very dangerous, there are snakes, predators, and angry hippos of which to be aware. Downtown, one has to be careful of people, as theft is not uncommon. Still, one feels so alive there. So alive.

Related Answer
What is Kenya doing better than most African countries?

Boris Guiffot , A Cameroonian dude who likes technology and politics
Updated Sep 25, 2019

Under the British rule, Kenya has received a high influx of capital and settlers both from the British Empire. Historically, Kenya has a huge geographical advantage. Its coastal regions have long been seen as a valuable foothold in eastern trade routes. The economy of the British colony was made up of three populations:

The European settlers controlled a large segment of the fertile land and managed nascent industries

The African indigenous population mostly worked as laborers

The Indians formed a class between Europeans and Africans and were usually artisans, clerks, and merchants.

That laid the foundation of the post-independence Kenyan economy. Upon independence, the country never had a large-scale expulsion of the European and Indian settlers in opposition to neighboring Uganda and DRC. Many left but some stayed and were even granted citizenship.

As a consequence, Kenya never really stopped being a regional magnet for foreigners which helped to boost its status and to attract massive investments. The relative political stability and the descent quality of the infrastructure also helped. Being stable is a great asset when you are surrounded by historically turbulent neighbors: Ethiopia, Somalia, DRC, Sudan, Rwanda, etc. (Things are better for most of those countries nowadays though). A good illustration of that benefit is the fact that the United Nations Office in Nairobi (UNON) is one of the four major United Nations office sites worldwide.

Finally, the country has bet on technology which has paid off:

Innovative and entrepreneurial Kenyans as well as talented people like this Guyana-born British CEO of Safaricom highly contributed to creating that ecosystem:

Bob Collymore

That picture is not all rosy though. Kenya used to be richer (per capita) than both India and China:

Even though, economically most Western and Indian residents belong to the middle- and upper-middle-class, this is more a bubble than the most shared reality.

For a huge portion of the indigenous population, life is not a bed of roses. Countries like Ghana, Ivory Coast and Djibouti have a better position in the GDP per capita ranking.

17	129	5,927	Nigeria	21.6	18.3	60.1
18	137	4,605	Ghana	18.3	24.5	57.2
19	138	4,580	Sudan	39.6	2.6	57.8
20	139	4,474	Mauritania	22.5	37.8	39.7
21	142	3,997	Zambia	5.4	35.6	59
22	143	3,869	Lesotho	5.3	34.6	60.1
23	144	3,857	Ivory Coast	17.4	28.8	53.8
24	148	3,567	Djibouti	2.8	21	76.1
25	149	3,496	Kenya	35	17.6	47.7
26	152	3,359	Cameroon	23.1	28	48.9
27	153	3,283	Tanzania	23.4	28.6	47.6

Source. Kenya Overview of economy, Information about Overview of economy in Kenya

7. Our people. Kenyans on Twitter - KOT, some corrupt officials*, and our celebrities (Lupita Ny'ongo, footballer Victor Wanyama *Tottenham Hotspurs, Eddie Gathegi *from the Blacklist) put Kenya on the map.

8. The US. President Barrack Obama can trace his roots back to Kenya. His father, Barack Hussein Obama Sr. was a Kenyan.

Other

9. Queen Elizabeth ascended to the throne while in Kenya. On 6th February 1952 King George VI died while Princess Elizabeth and Prince Philip were in Kenya at the Treetops hotel. Upon the death of King George, Princess Elizabeth became the queen and leader of the commonwealth.

10. Kenya is among the top 10 richest countries in Africa.

11. Despite this, Kenya is also home to the largest urban slum in Africa, Kibera. Because of this, foreign organizations and famous people want to help as it is good PR for them and when ever they do help out, they let as many people know about their good work.

12. Terror attacks. Kenya has in recent times been plagued by a string of terrorist attacks; most infamously the Westgate Terrorist attack and the Garrissa University attack which have caught the attention of the world.

13. It is the brith place of the BRCK. You can read more on this here.

14. And last but certainly not least, M-Pesa. M-Pesa is a mobile money transfer system developed in Kenya. The system has revolutionized the Kenyan economy, people's lives, businesses and most recently attracted the attention of Facebook founder Mark Zuckerberg. Here is a link: Mark Zuckerberg

Mark enjoying a safari while on his trip to Kenya

I'm sure there are many more reasons I haven't mentioned, but as you can see/read Kenya ain't half bad and should do yourself a favour and pay us a visit (that is, if you aren't here already :)

Related Links

Which is the most developed African country?
What's the most westernised African country?
Why is Kenya more famous than most other African countries?

Is there racism in African countries towards Africans from other African countries?

Is Namibia the most stable African country?
Which is the most successful country in Africa?

Which African country is likely to become the first developed country on the continent?

Is there ever hope for African development?
How can Africa become more prosperous?

Is it true that there are cities in Africa that are just as modern and developed as any American city?

Is South Africa the most developed country in Africa?
Will Africa develop between now and the 2060s?
What is the most friendly country in Africa that is worth a long vacation?

How is South Africa really positioned? Is it the richest country on the African continent, but still considered a developing country when directly compared to Australia, NZ, UK, Canada, US, EU, UAE, Japan, Israel & Singapore? How far is the gap?

Why is Africa so poor?

Related Answer
Can we say Kenya is the most popular nation in Africa?

Salama Afro Answered Sep 12, 2018

It's strategic location on the equator, makes it a convenient hub for both maritime and airlines. The port specifically serves a great number of landlocked neighbours.

Being a former British colony is a blessing in that they left well established systems in education (80% literacy rates and English is the business language), environmental conservation (think beautiful game parks) and much more. Maintenance has been a challenge.

Free market economy, freedom of worship and association, free press, independent judiciary and much more.

Manpower - well educated and trained manpower has made many international companies pitch their African HQs in Nairobi or elsewhere within Kenya.

Diversity of it's people:

Every tone and hue - Africans, Kenyans of Indian/Pakistani ancestry, European, Arab..you name it. This may be seen in the Olympics, cricket teams and cuisine. Samosas, chapatis, parothas, pulao, bhajias and many more are daily foods (often with an African twist).

More about Kenya here:

Salama Afro's answer to What are some interesting facts about Kenya?

Related Answer
What do other African countries think of Kenya?

Desalegn Belay, lived in East Africa (1982-2005) Answered Jan 31, 2017

Well, I know little personally, even if we neighbors.

Many people talk about the corruption: that is very known and widely talked about. It is very hard to directly bribe an authority in Ethiopia. It could happen; but, very rare. Corruption looks very fragrant in Kenya. Many people mention that when visiting Kenya

The athletes are well know: Ethiopian athletes consider the Kenyan as major competitors. They look into them: and many of them are friends to each other.

Radio: Many people listen radio from Kenya specially in South Ethiopia

The Masai are quite popular

There are many Oromos in Kenya too: family connections between the two countries.

The GDP: the economy: there was a time when our government took the Kenyan progress as a model: they talked about some of the economic changes in the country.

The full image is hard to characterize : it depends on who you ask. I know little about Kenya, and I barely met anybody from Kenya…only one guy, if I remember correctly.

Related Answer
What makes Kenya's success so unique among African countries?

Hempstone Wanjala, African, Traveled to several of its countries Updated Feb 19

It has a lot to do with Kenyans' personal perception than most of the factors people think of such as donors, dorminant language among others. This perception is shaped up by the following Entrepreneurial culture. Kenya has a relatively stable but very corrupt government that routinely fails to deliver most of the jobs needed by the people. This forces people into entrepreneurship thus making the Kenyan corporate world quite successful. It's visible by the fact that many of the electronic consumer goods on the shelves of neighbouring countries done the 'Made in Kenya' tag.

Need to find a solution to common problems. Due to the seemingly unconcerned nature of the ruling elite towards finding solutions to persistent problems, necessity becomes the mother to innovation there hence very original but simple and applicable apps and products coming up.

Co-operative societies. In Kenya, a whooping 63% of the population derive their livelihoods from co-operatives. Approximately 250,000 Kenyans are employed or gain most of their income from co-operatives. Source: Co-operative facts & figures . This pools resources of most people enabling them achieve what they singly could not.

Relatively good political climate. The country's ruling elit would love to ensure the status quo that has kept them rich is not change. The government is thus hell bent at maintaining Kenya at the helm of the region's development for relevance reasons. It also provides for a means of generating more tax, which directly translates tomore government funds to be looted. Policies are thus pro-business with quite well run monetary policy environment. Start-ups are greatly encouraged, with the ease of doing business, quality of roads, etc being at par with significantly more developed nations.

Related Links

Which country is richer, Ghana or Kenya?
What do other African countries think of Kenya?

Why do East African countries' citizens: Tanzania, Uganda Somalia & Rwanda hate on Kenyans?

Is Kenya a good country?
How is Kenya perceived internationally?
How do you compare Kenya to Tanzania?

Which is the most developed African country?
Are East African countries more developed than West African countries?
What's the most westernised African country?
Why is Kenya the greatest country in the world?
What African country is the most successful today?
Is Nigeria better than Kenya?
Is Kenya better than Ghana?
Which country is better between Kenya and Ethiopia?
What makes Kenya's success so unique among African countries?

Who is more enduring, a lion or a tiger?

Kevin Wilfriet N.

Lives in Tema, Ghana Mar 27

This ultimate cat fight has happened more times than you might expect. The Romans pitted African lions against Asian tigers in the Coliseum, to the rip-roaring pleasure of the Plebeians. A few fights were also staged in the early decades of the 20th century, and on several modern occasions, accidental cross-species encounters at zoos have quickly developed into gruesome scenes guaranteed to scar any nearby schoolchildren for life.

But how do these lion versus tiger showdowns go down?

Offhand mentions in the historical record imply that tigers usually came out on top in ancient Rome, and modern fights in captivity typically go that way, too — but not every time. Lions and tigers each have their strengths, and "the outcome of a given fight completely depends on the individuals: their history, fighting style and physiology," said Craig Saffoe, a biologist and the curator of great cats at the Smithsonian Zoo in Washington, D.C.

"But if I had to put my money on it I would give the advantage to the tiger," Saffoe told Life's Little Mysteries.

First, although an especially large tiger will outweigh any lion, the two species usually have comparable sizes. Estimates vary, but Saffoe says an average adult male African lion and an average adult male Bengal tiger (the most common wild tiger subspecies) both weigh in the neighborhood of 400 to 420 pounds (180 to 190 kilograms).

Related Answer
What are some animals that can defeat a tiger or a lion?

Shannon Phelps, former Former Navy Seal Officer, Combat Veteran at Martial Arts and Fitness Instructor Answered May 12, 2018

If you have read my other responses, you know that I don't engage in sophomoric "who would win" animal fights. There are two reasons animals clash in nature. Rivalries over territory/ mating rights and one preying on another for food. They are not trying to impress humans over who is "bad ass". All animals practice conservation of energy as an instinctive behavior (except for the"kids" of course). So, "Defeating" must be placed in context… tigers and lions biggest problems come from other tigers and lions. Now, how does that translate into your question? It doesn't really. Next, very large prey animals that don't give in easily can "defeat" a big cat if the cat doesn't get more help or just tires out. It's all about energy expended and how desperate the cat is. Tigers don't care what you think as you take a video- they don't feel any shame because you watch him or her walk away from a gaur or spunky rino. (Sometimes chicken sometimes feathers). Lions and probably tigers as well, have died from venomous snake bites. I know of a green beret who sadly fell into a nest of cobras in Laos, a horrible death. We have no idea how often such things occur in the wild. Does that prove that a cobra can defeat a tiger or lion? See how little sense these questions make sometimes?? Can a polar bear defeat a Siberian tiger? The answer doesn't exist in the first place and hypothetically, the people on this forum would never agree . The two animals don't think or operate on these terms so, save your brain! The only animal on the planet that cares is humans and the lions and tigers don't really care what we think. They are either too busy scraping out a living or in the middle of a cat nap!

Related Links

Which animal is more dangerous: a lion or a tiger?
Which animal is bigger: a lion or a tiger?
Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
Which is the faster animal, lion or tiger?
Can 2 lions kill a tiger, or can a male lion kill a female tiger?
Are tigers and lions friendly towards humans?
Has there ever been an organized fight between a tiger and a lion? Which animal won?
Which animals eat a lion or tiger?
What are the biggest differences between lions and tigers?
Which animal eats more, a lion or a tiger?

Do lions know that leopards and cheetahs are their feline family? If so, why do lions still attack or kill them?

Serge Elia Animal lover 3y

Sorry to disappoint, but wild lions truly are jerks (dicks, really!) to their cheetah and leopard cousins. Sure enough, they don't see the two spotted cats as fellow felids and family, but see them as pure competition for food and territory, as well as potential threats to lion cubs. And these are the primary reasons why lions don’t hesitate to hunt down leopards and cheetahs whenever they stumble upon them, even if the individual leopard or cheetah was not being threatening.

It is generally believed that the main reason for all of this is that cheetahs and leopards are among the “mesopredators” of the African savanna – ie, the lesser predators in the food chain –, whereas lions, the titled “Kings of the beasts”, are the apex predators of the region. Consequently, top predators (like lions) keep mesopredators in line, with direct aggression being the most obvious method utilized.

The threat of such actions creates what scientists call a “landscape of fear”, since the fear is another way mesopredators are kept in check, as the smaller animals take action to avoid the top predator’s threatening advances.

However, you can’t deny the presence of exceptions: in captivity, some individual lions, cheetahs and leopards have been raised together, only to develop a beautiful, ever-lasting friendship.

In fact, exceptions have even occurred in the wild! In July 2017, National Geographic reported news of this lioness nursing a leopard cub in Tanzania. Proving that animals are not always the savage beasts we know them to be, for some can develop a strong maternal instinct prevailing over the aggressive instinct.

Related Answer

Do lions eat leopards, cheetahs, and wild dogs?

Serge Elia, Animal lover Updated Nov 28

No, they don't.

This begs the question: why do lions never eat hyenas, cheetahs, leopards or African wild dogs (whether adults or cubs) after killing them? The answer is: they simply won't feast on them.

A lion won't gain much from devouring another carnivore's flesh, given that cheetahs, leopards, hyenas and African wild dogs aren't really much of a well-earned meal or a snack craved for – what's more: their flesh aren't nutritious and don't provide the promise of food, no matter how starving the golden cat gets. And so it contents itself with killing that carnivore mercilessly and leaving its uneaten corpse to rot, satisfied that it has just removed another competitor over food and territory or another potential threat to its young.

Also, lions (like most carnivores) don't eat other carnivores in light of a rule called "The 10 Percent Energy Rule in the food chain", according to which the higher the trophic level, the lower the energy you get – thus, predators like lions derive more energy by eating herbivores rather than other carnivores; and in some extreme cases, breaking the skin, removing the flesh and digesting it are all energy-consuming, and the meat has to be nutritious enough.

Not to mention that other carnivores tend to have a higher parasite and disease load than herbivores (and I have Rebecca Sealfon to thank for providing this info). Fellow Quoran Steve Coleman adds further (and I quote):

[A]ny animal at the top of the food chain accumulates diseases from all those that they eat. Eating another predator has a much higher survival cost on the evolutionary scale than with eating herbivores whom likely have less disease in general. Those top predators with a propensity to eat other top predators not only take greater risk of physical harm as well as this disease accumulation. Those that don't eat them actually survive better and thus get the chance to create the next generation, passing on their genetics and general temperament to their offspring.

That's why lions never eat leopards, cheetahs, African wild dogs or hyenas after killing them.

Edit: there have been a few occasions in which lions devoured other large predators like hyenas, as seen in this video here (also provided by Rebecca):

Though I still say it’s an unusual case, as lions aren’t known to feed on hyenas after killing them (the males here must have been desperate).

Why do crocodiles not attack hippos?

Waqas Ahmed · Follow BS in Zoology (college major) & Science, Government Post Graduate College Mansehra Pakistan (Graduated 2020) Updated 1y

Well…
The reason crocs live together somewhat peaceably with hippos is because hippos don't eat meat* and crocs usually understand it's foolhardy to attempt to attack an adult hippo. So, they don't even try. No interest on the hippo side and nearly assured destruction on the croc's side.

Jahar Kurmi

Si une hyène peut briser la patte d'un lion en une seule morsure, pourquoi ne tuent-elles pas plus souvent les lions, d'autant qu'elles vivent en clans gigantesques ?/ If a hyena could break a lion's leg in a single bite, why don't they kill lions more often, especially since they live in humongous clans?

Serge Elia · Suivre Amoureux d'animaux Mis à jour le 8 mo

On ne peut nier que les hyènes tachetées disposent d’une force de morsure bien plus forte que celle des lions – c’est probablement la plus forte parmi les mammifères carnivores –, capable de broyer les os et de démembrer une malheureuse victime alors qu’elle est encore vivante, qu’il s’agisse d’une proie (antilope, zèbre, buffle ou autres) ou d'un ennemi (inclus un lion mal fortuné). Ce n'est pas seulement cela : elles ont aussi une endurance incroyable, une intelligence suprême et une force dans le nombre, avec leurs clans pouvant aller de 6 jusqu'à 100 individus qui travaillent à l'unisson pour vaincre n'importe quel gros gibier ou menace.

Toutefois, les hyènes restent intelligentes pour évaluer les risques, et elles savent qu'elles ne doivent pas pousser les caches plus loin – et donc courir le risque d'être gravement blessées, voire tuées –, même lorsqu'elles sont en clans gigantesques. Ainsi, bien qu'elles soient capables de défier et d'assaillir régulièrement les lions – à un tel point de les évincer comme superprédateurs d'Afrique –, néanmoins il y a des moments où certaines hyènes, malgré leurs nombres, battent en retraite rapidement dès lors qu'elles sont confrontées à des lions (surtout les grands mâles) faisant preuve d'un courage irrationnel mais sans précédent.

À la lumière de cela, les hyènes ne peuvent mutiler ou tuer les lions adultes que lorsqu'elles les surpassent en nombre ou détectent une faiblesse chez le(s) lion(s) ciblé(s). Dans les autres cas, si une hyène veut rester saine et sauve, il lui sera plus judicieux de battre en retraite.

Ne vous méprenez pas, je préfère toujours les hyènes aux lions. Mais il ne faut pas nier que les fauves dorés disposent d'une attitude et d'une agressivité véritables qui leur ont valu le titre de « Rois des animaux ». En effet, ils ne réfléchiront jamais avant d'attaquer toute hyène passant à leur portée – surtout les solitaires vulnérables, n'ayant pas de clan pour battre à leurs côtés –, jusqu'au point de la tuer brutalement et délaisser son cadavre non dévoré, le tout à cause du chevauchement alimentaire et de la concurrence autour des mêmes proies et terrains de chasse, ce qui donne lieu à des combats territoriaux récurrents.

Voilà pourquoi les hyènes tachetées ne tuent pas souvent les lions adultes, même si elles disposent de clans gigantesques et d'une force de morsure capable de briser la patte d'un lion à elle seule. Ceci se déroule chez tous les superprédateurs du monde : malgré toute leur force et puissance, ils savent instinctivement qu'ils doivent éviter à tout prix le risque de blessures graves et de mort, en particulier lorsqu'il s'agit d'affronter des animaux bien plus grands et plus dangereux – pour cette raison, un prédateur doit toujours évaluer le risque par rapport au bénéfice, sans jamais devenir trop confiant ; sinon, même une blessure minime peut nuire au prédateur et le mettre hors d'action.

En fin de compte, au sein de la guerre éternelle opposant lions et hyènes, l’issue de la bataille dépend grandement du courage des candidats impliqués, à la fois côté lion et hyène. Donc, le taux de réussite est à 50–50 pour les deux espèces.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les lions tuent-ils les hyènes sans les manger ?

Est-il possible de créer un lien avec un lion ou un tigre, et de le domestiquer jusqu’à un certain point ?

Un lion nous attaquerait-il si nous ne faisons que passer à côté de lui tranquillement, sans vouloir le tuer ?

Si un ligre a été élevé par des lions dans la nature, pourrait-il être un membre prospère d'une troupe de lions ?

Qui est le prédateur supérieur entre un lion et un tigre ?
Si un chat était aussi grand qu'un lion, serait-il plus féroce qu'un lion ?

Pourquoi les lions mâles ne chassent-ils pas étant donné qu'ils sont plus grands et plus forts que les lionnes ?

Si vous deviez être enfermé dans une pièce avec un ours, un alligator ou une hyène pendant une heure, lequel choisiriez-vous ?

Pourquoi les lions ont-ils l'air si fâchés lorsqu'ils s'accouplent ?
Pourquoi il n’y a pas de hyène dans les zoos ?

Est-ce que les crocodiles mangent les zèbres ?

Pierre Rossetti · Suivre Ingénieur (nuclear advices). 2 années Biochimie ; Théologie 8 mo

Ceux-là n'ont pas l'air mort avant…

Related Answer
Why don't most carnivores eat carnivores? For example, why don't lions eat wild dogs, jackals, or leopards?

Carnivores worldwide, including apex predators like lions and tigers, aren't really keen on eating other carnivores – particularly the lesser predators, or mesopredators, that are pushed to the very bottom of the food chain – as much as they are on eliminating competitors over food and territory, as well as potential threats to the young.

Sure enough, out in the wild, dietary overlap and overlapping ecological niches (in addition to the same survival instinct) result in intense competition over the same prey and hunting grounds, which thus gives way to recurrent territorial fights that make the contestants negatively impacted by each other's presence – as such, carnivores constantly look forward to hunt down trespassers of all kind (from jackals to hyenas, hawks, vultures and the like), for they're seen as competitors that can challenge the local carnivores' authority and kill the youngsters (even though these trespassers are sometimes just passing by, with no wicked intentions); and yet, they won't really eat the intruders.

Case in point: in Africa, lions frequently attack cheetahs, leopards, hyenas, jackals and wild dogs whenever they stumble upon them, but they won't devour these animals – besides, a lion wouldn't gain much from eating another carnivore's flesh (given that cheetahs, leopards, hyenas, jackals and wild dogs aren't really much of a well-earned meal or a snack craved for); and so, it contents itself with killing that carnivore mercilessly and leaving its uneaten corpse to rot, satisfied that it has just removed another competitor.

Of course, there are exceptions to this rule:

– Tiger predation on bears in Southern and Eastern Asia is not uncommon. Sure enough, despite their ferocity, larger size and status as predators, bears (both of the black and brown types) almost regularly fall prey to the striped cats, as they constitute up to 18% of a tiger's diet – not to mention that the tiger's powerful paw-swipes, strong jaws, sheer power and agility make short work in bringing down even an enormous bear; nevertheless, some bears are capable of standing their ground against attacking tigers.

– Being opportunistic feeders with an appetite to match their size, crocodiles and alligators will gladly feed on anything unfortunate enough to come across them, among which other carnivores, such as (to name a few) snakes, sharks (see above), raccoons, weasels, herons, or even big cats and canids on some occasions.

– Big constrictors like pythons also don’t mind feeding on other carnivores if given the opportunity.

– Orcas (aka killer whales) hunt various species throughout their oceanic range, including other carnivores like sharks and seals.

– Secretary birds, hawks, owls and numerous other raptors often hunt snakes when given the chance.

– Believe it or not, there are snake-eating serpents out there! The most famous of which is the king cobra (the world's longest venomous serpent), whose scientific name Ophiophagus hannah means "the snake eater", as it primarily feeds on other snakes, its favorite being the rat snake (see above).

– The jaguar is among the few felines to add reptiles in its everyday diet. In light of this, it regularly attacks and eats caimans (see above) and anacondas (see below), despite their status as carnivorous predators.

It's the circle of death*, and it* kills us all…

Do wolves have predators?

Holly Root-Gutteridge · Follow PhD in Animal Behavior & Wolf Howls, Nottingham Trent University (Graduated 2014)Updated 4y

Wolves aren't hunted as food by any animal. Other predators will still kill them given a reason.

The primary predators of wolves are humans. We use guns, traps, poison, snares, dogs, and eagles.

Yes, I just said eagles:

Google eagle hunting wolf at your own risk. The photos can be grisly.

The Kazakh people of Mongolia, amongst others in the region, have been hunting wolves with eagles for centuries:

Steve Bodoi wrote it up in his book, which Amazon suggests is excellent (Eagle Dreams: Searching for Legends in Wild Mongolia).

However, as you can imagine, most eagles aren't eager to take on a wolf and will choose to hunt easier prey, like deer. Therefore they have to be trained to it by the humans and a lot of eagles are lost before they become good at it (.. and Wolf Eagles).

Eagle hunting is a traditionally male pursuit, though some women have also trained in it, including one young girl who was filmed for a documentary (Is the Eagle Huntress really a documentary? - BBC News). The focus is usually not on wolves though.

Other predators that wolves avoid conflict with include cats like mountain lions, bears, particularly grizzlies:

(https://www.thesun.co.uk/news/2625442/dramatic-moment-600lb-grizzly-bear-takes-on-pack-of-wolves-over-a-deer-carcass-is-captured-by-british-tourist-in-the-rocky-mountains/)

However, it’s not just bears that wolves have to worry about. There are also tigers:

(Photo from John Irvine's fantastic sequence here: Tiger vs Wolf)

Wolves avoid tigers as a wolf pack is going to struggle in a fight against one. There's a number of Quora questions on who would win, but the answer is for most of them, they would avoid the fight in the first place.

My friend Dr Bilal Habib researches Indian wildlife and says that if there's a tiger around, that's the one place you won't find wolves.

These aren't exactly predators, as they aren't going looking for wolves to kill and eat, but wolves that encroach on their rights.

Wolves are apex predators. They don’t have another animal that kills them to eat them.

But they still have competitors. And their most formidable enemy is us: (Photo from westernwolves.org)

What do baby alligators eat after their mother brings them to the water?

Sergio Diniz · Follow Animals researcher on spare hours 1y

Image: Nest and young in Florida [1]

Mother will stay around for protection, but will not feed them, so they will help to do it by themselves from the beginning. In the first days, mostly insects, small fishes, crustaceans and amphibians, maybe mostLy tadpoles in their early days, evolving latter to include birds and small mammals according to their growth.

Image: Young American alligator swimming, showing the distinctive yellow striping found on juveniles [1]

This video can give us some idea on how the young ones hunt. Unfortunately, I could not find one for alligators, these are baby crocs, but in early days feeding they do not differ that much:

See video at Croc Babies Hunt Quickly

SOURCE:

[1] American alligator - Wikipedia

How do predators and prey recognize each other the first time, if they've never seen each other before?

Stefan Pociask Tracking Instructor. Field researcher. Wildlife Rehabilitation
Feb 6

In its simplest form… very broadly speaking, and taking into consideration all animals (let's stick to vertebrates)… this could be answered fairly quickly. That answer would be the well-known phrase "through nature & nurture". It is either instinctive, or it is taught. But, that would be a bit of a cop-out in its ambiguity, so let's go a little more specific and narrow it down to animals of a certain level of intelligence; let's say… "medium" intelligence. This would leave out reptiles and fish, as well as those on the highest end of the spectrum, like the orcas, the corvids, octopuses, and elephants, etc. That leaves us in the broad middle, which is composed of the group that could be described as "most mammals"; from aardvarks to zzebras ;)

Most mammals, go through two phases in regard to this question. When they are babies, or kits, or cubs… nothing is seen as a threat. A lion cub might boldly run right up to a male lion, whether he's their father or not, not realizing the life-threatening danger that it's in… if the mother isn't there to give the danger signal in time. But the first moment that any baby animal first leaves its den, its education begins. And the first lesson is that danger signal. A huff or a chuff, a growl or a woof… every species has its own way to give the signal, and it's pretty much a zero tolerance lesson. American Black Bear cubs are an interesting and well-known example, with their instantaneous skedaddling up a tree, when given the signal by their mothers. A first-time mother may not have the experience herself, to even teach that lesson properly, and it may take a loss or two before she even perfects the lesson giving. Effective motherhood is as dependent on skills as any other survival skill. So, once that is established, the mother has only a short amount of time to teach them everything they need to know, or as much as she can fit in before the biological clocks says it's time for everyone to go their own way, and even be chased off if necessary. It may be months… it may be years, depending on the species.

One unfortunate example of the inexperience of first-time motherhood involves a study that was being performed on African Painted Dogs. The researchers were trying to reestablish a population of these fascinating canids in an area where they have become extinct due to a long-waged human civil war that decimated many species. They collected individuals from the various clans across Africa and released them in this new area. It took some time for a matriarch to rise to the surface, to lead this new hodgepodge clan, but eventually one female took charge and was accepted as the leader. This young matriarch in time became pregnant and became an inexperienced first-time mother to a litter of half a dozen pups. Due to her inexperience, and the fact that this area was entirely new to all of them, she made an unfortunate choice when choosing a den location to birth the pups. Her location happened to be directly within the territory of a rather large python (or boa… I forget which), and the worst happened. The clan had no prior experience with this constrictor, and it wasn't long before all the pups were systematically consumed and/or killed right inside their den. Quite tragic! But a learning experience, nonetheless. A new den site was chosen the next time she became pregnant, quite obviously in a safer location.

So… upon any youngster's first step out of their den, they begin learning what is a threat and what is not. Unless the mother teaches otherwise, everything is fair game… literally. If the animal happens to be a predator, practicing hunting skills is vital, so some latitude of freedom to explore has to be allowed. A bug! Chase it! A songbird? Stalk it! A snake? Pounce on it!… oh no! Not THAT snake! Basically, they have no idea, and have to be taught everything at first.

After a time, after a certain amount of lessons, after enough cuffs upside the head, or scoldings, their sense of danger will eventually shift from nothing is dangerous… to everything is dangerous… until learned otherwise. And that pretty much stays with them the rest of their lives. In the case of felines, since all felines are stalkers to some extent, the hope would be that any large new animal could be studied from the safety of concealment before deciding on flight, fight, or ignoring it altogether. There is no scent that says DANGER! at least until after their first encounter. After the shift, it's all about learned experience. And discretion is the better part of valor. Learned experience about what to hunt and chase, and about what to put as much distance between as possible. There's a reason why dangerous animals will generally avoid encounters with man if at all possible. If they don't know… they steer clear, unless they have been taught otherwise, or have had some kind of experience. So that's the nurture part.

The nature part is the chase trigger. There's good reason you're told never to run when face to face with a large predator. When the trigger is tripped, all thought and consideration by that predator goes out the window! They chase you! Whether they were originally planning to or not. Other than that… it's all pretty much about experience and making on the spot decisions based on that experience.

Having said all of that, there are still many different kinds of scenarios. African lions that have never come across a Cape Buffalo, and perhaps were never taught about them by their mother will happily chase a buffalo calf because it is running. That is, until the adult buffalos begin to chase back!

From that point on, it's experience. A baby elephant? Looks fat & delicious! Easy enough to spy on for a while. They are easy enough to stalk up next to and grab by the tail… until the herd notices! Lesson learned!

For something seemingly innocuous, like a snake, porcupine, skunk, etc., unless they've been taught by a parent, the first time there will still be caution, and enough exploration to gain experience. No lion charges right in to kill a skunk, the first time they see one. Caution is the word for pretty much everything, once they are an adult; even for something as small as a scorpion. That's not to say that that caution will be enough to prevent injury. But unless that small critter scurries away and triggers the chase, some amount of caution and exploration will always come first when something new is encountered. And that's for small things. So it will certainly also be the case for larger animals.

As far as scent… no, not unless they have prior experience with that scent. The exception there would be territorial scent markers left by their own species. Recognizing that is instinctive.

As far as appearance… again, it will be based on previous experience with that appearance, or something similar to that appearance. Are they being growled at? Hissed at? Threatened?

When humans raise their hands and coats up above our heads, trying to look bigger… we are trying to appear similar to something that animal has experienced before, and has had a bad experience with. If that previous experience happens to have been a decent meal… you're facing a potential or even an experienced man-killer. Obviously, that's why predators that have killed man before… or even have been fed by man before… rarely escape euthanization if they are subsequently caught.

So… DON'T FEED THE ANIMALS!

If this question has anything to do with some people's ideas that if they simply don't move, remain calm and be friendly when being faced by a wild cat… and all will be well…

Well… no. Under most circumstances, that is the worst of the bad ideas. That will only give them more reason to explore you… get close to you… smell you… try to learn something and gain experience about this weak looking creature that seems to be no threat whatsoever. Being friendly without equal weaponry of claws and teeth, just means weak. Unless that cat is sniffing your butt, he is trying to determine if he would get hurt if he tries to clamp down on that spindly neck. Watching you from a distance in the bushes is one thing. Allowing actual contact, sniffing, and exploration of what you are and what should be done with you is quite another thing. You want to keep these types of animals either fearful of you, or… not knowing enough about you, to risk attacking you. This is the perfect time to use the term "Paper Tiger". You don't ever want them to find out that you are actually just made of paper. Either keep them fooled, or keep them guessing. And you DO want to be increasing the distance between the two of you, albeit slowly. There is nothing inherent that makes a wild animal… a feline in this case… afraid of humans the first time they see them, other than the mystery of not knowing; and therefore the ensuing caution. And that caution remains in place until some experience changes it to either outright fear… or changes it in the other direction, resulting in the cat seeing the human as prey.

One example of this dynamic would be the Arctic Wolves that have somewhat recently seen an increase in their study by researchers. It's been found that many of those populations in the far north have never experienced human contact, and when they've seen these researchers, have reacted first with caution, and then with exploration, showing neither fear, nor aggression. With no prior experience, this is a typical and expected reaction. Of course that may change, as they are increasingly intruded upon.

There is a wonderful TV show called Orangutan Jungle School.

It is all about the efforts of a group of people in Borneo who rescue young Orangutans from evil and ignorant people all over the world. All orphans, from the youngest infants barely born, to adolescents who have lived in palaces and never known the jungle. They must be taught every survival skill that their parents would normally have taught them over the years. It's amazing to watch the process, teaching them how to react to dangerous vipers and other snakes that they have absolutely no natural fear of. Through daily educational classes, they are taught to raise the alarm and either escape or even to beat a snake with a big stick if they ever see one. A rubber snake is used as the teaching tool. This lesson alone has undoubtedly saved many of them. It's a perfect example of what is, and what isn't, a natural instinct.

I've mostly covered predators… even apex predators… here, but much of this also applies to pure prey animals, such as the many hooved herd animals; which for the most part rely far more on flight rather than fight. Although, as is the case with animals such as Cape Buffalo, fight is also very much a part of their repertoire.

And it applies to mesopredators… that is, those predators that are also preyed upon by larger predators.

In the end, all these animals learn very much like we learn. They are thinking creatures, each of which will make decisions based on the life it's lived up to that point.

There is, of course, far more to this fascinating subject than just what I've written above. It gets quite complex with many species that are in that higher bracket of intelligence that I mentioned at the beginning. In fact, with some of those higher species, we can throw into the mix the entire subject of animal communication, and how it contrasts and differs from animal language. The language sub-set of communication adds an entirely new dimension to all I mentioned above. I did write about that difference, here:

As a post-script to that Orca Communication/Language article, let me add this:

Orcas are one of the most fascinating creatures on Earth. They rank among the highest of all in intelligence and are one of the very few who are self-aware. All animals communicate with each other, of course. Some have more elaborate and complex methods of communication than others. Language, on the other hand, is a different matter. Not all cetologists are on-board about them having a true language, but as far as I'm concerned, there is no doubt. This, in itself, is extraordinary and will be the subject of decades or even centuries of study, as it's such a rare occurrence. However, the limits of this language have to be realized. Despite intelligence, self-awareness, and language, there is still a tremendous chasm between humans and orcas. Language? Yes. Ability to tell stories? In my opinion, unlikely. In fact, almost certainly not; at least not in the way that most humans would define that concept.

So no… there is no telling of stories. What takes its place is the teaching method I mentioned above. Their language has sentences; not merely communication. As nice as it would be to imagine grandfather Orca surrounded by all the kids in the pod, listen to tales of fifty years ago, when he was caught in that net by the strange skinny two-leggers, and had to fight his way out. And that all humans should therefor be avoided at all costs—especially that one boat with the red nose… no. That's not what's going on. On the other hand… if they see that boat with the red nose, their mom can tell them that her mom told her to stay away from it, the last time they saw it. But they have to see it. And the sentence would simply be "Bad! Avoid! Let's go this other direction!". They would therefore learn and remember that it's to be avoided, without having to experience something bad first-hand. Someday, it may pass that same information down to its own kids or even pals, if they ever see it again.

It must be realized how very difficult it is to research the languages and various dialects of wild orcas. This research can't be done in captivity. Most all natural behavior goes out the window when dealing with imprisoned orcas. So it is going to take an awful long time, and very slow going, for our understanding to grow.

I also covered a bit about whether raptors fear man, here:

And even a little more about how, when, and why animals learn fear and caution, here:

Finally, I have to make the point that these are all things that relate to wild animals... in the wild. Semi-tamed or imprisoned animals… that's a whoooole different story.

Quels sont les animaux qui n'existent que dans les zoos ?

Samir سمير Farid فريد · Suivre A étudié à Mohamed V Rabat Mis à jour le 1 an Le majestueux lion de l'atlas ou lion de barbarie, le dernier spécimen vivant dans la nature a été tué en 1929 (merci aux vaillants colons), maintenant il existe quelques dizaines dans le zoo de Rabat, et quelques spécimens aux États Unis (descendants des lions offerts comme cadeau par les sultans marocains aux gouvernements d'Amérique.

Un programme de réinsértion dans leur milieu naturel dans la région d'Azilal a été pensé, mais fut vite abandonné car la présence humaine dans la région est bien trop importante.

Vous pouvez voir sa crinière qui se prolonge tout au long de son abdomen, c'est sa caractéristique qui le différencie des autres lions d'Afrique.

Do crocodiles share food with other crocodiles?

Shaun Mootoo · Follow Former Intelligence Officer Apr 8

Not generally, but I HAVE seen footage of Nile Crocs holding a dead hippo firmly, while others took turns death-rolling and tearing chunks off it, before making way for others. It suggested a level of cooperation I'd not have given them credit for.
The opposite, is also true, though:

If an anaconda wraps around you and immobilizes you, will it be wise to start biting and chewing off parts of the anaconda so it will release you?

Donna Fernstrom · Follow Professional ball python breeder from 2007 to 2014. 4y

By the time an anaconda has you immobilized, it's much too late for you to be trying to chew on it. You'll be unconscious in seconds, and you certainly won't be able to bend your neck enough to bite. Anacondas don't stop you from breathing — they stop your blood from circulating through your body.

Of course, the chances of you ever being attacked by an anaconda are much less than your chances of being eaten by caiman. I'm assuming you're wandering the water's edge in remote parts of South America, after all. Anacondas usually leave humans alone.

Un tigre est-il plus fort qu'un crocodile ?

Serge Elia · Suivre Amoureux d'animaux Mis à jour le 1 an

Dans le sous-continent indien, les tigres du Bengale interagissent souvent avec les crocodiles des marais, les crocodiliens les plus répandus de la région.

Le crocodile des marais est un reptile à taille moyenne qui peut atteindre les 4 à 5 mètres de long, et peser entre 40 et 200 kg. En tant que crocodile, c'est un tueur né, équipé de mâchoires puissantes capables de saisir des proies aussi grosses qu'un cerf. En outre, c'est un chasseur en embuscade, comme tous les crocodiliens, puisqu'il traque sa proie à l'affût, attendant que le gibier vienne à lui – en effet, dans cette position, le croco guette, camouflé dans l'eau trouble, avant d'attaquer au moment opportunity.

Mais malgré sa force, le crocodile des marais ne fait pas le poids face au tigre. Il y a même eu des nombreux témoignages de tigres attaquant et tuant d'énormes crocodiles (voir ci-dessus), ce qui arrive généralement lorsque ces reptiles s'aventurent sur terre ferme, hors de l'eau – donc, en dehors de leur élément naturel – ; au fait, même submergés dans l'eau, les crocos sont vulnérables, puisque les tigres font partie des rares félins à être des nageurs adeptes.

À 220 kg (voire 310 kg !), le tigre est beaucoup plus lourd, plus fort, plus agile, plus rapide et plus intelligent que son adversaire, puisqu'il est armé des plus grands crocs de tous les félidés, ainsi que de l'une des forces de morsure les plus puissantes des carnivores. Ainsi, le fauve, qui mérite son titre de roi suprême des jungles de l'Inde, peut faire une bouchée du plus gros crocodile jamais enregistré.

Toutefois, il faut garder à l'esprit que c'est le cas du crocodile des marais. D'autre part, le crocodile marin, que l'on trouve aussi en Inde, est le plus lourd reptile vivant, atteignant environ 6 mètres ou plus, et pesant entre 400 et 1 000 kg. Ainsi, on a recensé, en août 2011, un individu de 4 mètres de long, qui a tué un tigre dans les marécages du Bengale occidental.

Pour résumer, l'issue d'un combat entre un tigre et un crocodile dépend de la force et du courage de nos concurrents, ainsi que de l'espèce de crocodile impliquée dans cet affrontement.

Questions similaires

Un alligator peut-il se reproduire avec un crocodile ?
Un humain pourrait-il battre un tigre dans un combat ?

Lequel est le plus rapide et pourquoi : le tigre ou l'ours brun ?
Le venin de serpent affecte-t-il les animaux comme le tigre ou le lion ?
Est-ce qu'un crocodile peut tuer un éléphant ?
Quel est le niveau d'intelligence d'un tigre ?
Comment est la force du coup de patte d'un tigre ?
Qui est le prédateur supérieur entre un lion et un tigre ?
Un jaguar peut-il se défendre face à une attaque de tigre ?
Qui sortirait vainqueur d'un hypothétique combat entre un gorille adulte et un tigre

Réponse similaire
Un alligator peut-il se reproduire avec un crocodile ?

Serge Elia, Amoureux d'animaux Mis à jour le 16 août 2019

Comme l'autre réponse l'a très bien dit, un crocodile et un alligator ne peuvent pas s'accoupler pour avoir une progéniture, puisque cela leur est impossible biologiquement.

Le crocodile (à gauche) et l'alligator (à droite) peuvent sembler similaires, mais en réalité, ils ne sont pas étroitement liés – je dirais plutôt que les deux reptiles sont lointainement liés, voire distants l'un de l'autre.

En effet, les crocos (comme les géants d'Australie et d'Afrique) appartiennent à la famille des crocodilidés, tandis que les alligators (dont le plus gros et le plus connu habite les marécages de Floride, au sud-est des États-Unis) appartiennent à la famille des alligatoridés, une famille dont font partie, entre autres, les caïmans d'Amérique du Sud – ainsi, même s'ils forment tous les deux l'ordre des crocodiliens, néanmoins crocodiles et alligators ont un ADN très différent, et ne peuvent donc pas procréer ensemble.

Ce n’est pas comme chez les lions et les tigres, puisque nos deux fauves préférés font partie de la famille des panthérinés – c’est-à-dire les grands félins capables de rugir –, ce qui signifie qu’ils sont bel et bien étroitement liés, et qu’ils possèdent le même ADN, la même anatomie, les mêmes sens aigus requis pour survivre dans leurs environnements respectifs, aux côtés de similitudes dans la forme et la taille du crâne (voir ci-dessous).

Par conséquent, un tigre peut s’accoupler avec un lion pour ensuite avoir leur propre progéniture, à savoir des félins hybrides, qui sont :

– Le ligre si ses parents sont un lion mâle et une tigresse.

– Le tigron si ses parents sont un tigre mâle et une lionne.

Alors, pour résumer : contrairement au tigre et au lion, l’alligator et le crocodile sont très distants, ce qui leur rend par la suite impossible de procréer ensemble.

Réponse similaire

Est-ce qu'un lion est plus dangereux qu'un ours et un chien féroce ?

Pierre Rossetti Ingénieur (nuclear advices). 2 années Biochimie ; Théologie

Il y a cet animal tellement agressif qu'il fait fuir tous les autres…

Can a lion kill a hippo?

Joshua Walters

Life long fan of wildlife. 3y

In 2012 some amazing photos were captured showing a battle to the death between two male lions and a juvenile hippo.

First the lions waited for the hippo to leave the water. When it did they pounced upon it and it fought back chasing them away.

"I wanted to see what it was like to ride a river horse and its actually quite fun!"

The lions continually drove the hippo back into a shallow pool and the cycle repeated with the lions being chased off but not letting the hippo leave the pool

Eventually out of nowhere a third lion joined and helped in tackling the hippo. The poor omnivore was flipped and drowned in the water before being eaten.

"You monsters! Can't you leave a poor child alone?"

Source: Nature, red in tooth and claw: Stunning pictures show battle to the death between hippo and two lions

"You should have gone for the head!" (Hippo snaps fingers)

The next one actually happened this month actually and was recorded by some tourists. Notice how the lions always attack the hippos rear as it can't turn quickly enough to defend that area of its body. It was almost comical how the hippo took its frustration out on the car! Eventually, the lions pushed it into a ditch and continued to attack into it died later.

Source: WATCH: Hippo attacked by pride of lions panics and bites nearby Land Rover | Lowvelder

"Someone strayed a little too far from the water…Hahahha!"

In this fight a hippo left the safety of the water and the lions made it pay by brutally mauling the hippo to death. it was torture for the poor animal who had to put up with a lot of pain. Finally the overwhelmed beast was put out of its misery, collapsing from injuries.

Source: https://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/earth/earthpicturegalleries/6717983/Conflict-graphic-images-by-wildlife-photographer-Steve-Bloom-show-the-barbaric-realities-of-nature.html?image=2

Lions target sick, young and injured animals for a reason. While a lion can kill a weaker hippo in a group it would never be able to bring down a adult single handily.

“I will bring you murderers to justice if its the last thing I do!”

Hope this helped!

Can a crocodile eat a turtle?

Waqas Ahmed BS in Zoology (college major) & Science, Government Post Graduate College Mansehra Pakistan (Graduated 2020)1y

Well…
Crocs eat turtle:

The crocs may do this..It's not unusual for crocodiles and alligators to eat turtles. It's not their number one choice on the menu but when opportunity calls they will eat them. However, turtles are often able to escape, usually thanks to the shape of their shell.

What are some interesting facts you know about animals?

Joshua Walters · Follow Life long fan of wildlife. Updated 2y

Originally Answered: What are some amazing facts about animals?

After writing a few answers on specific animals I thought it would be fun to write an answer on the animal kingdom as a whole. Enjoy these facts and images and hopefully you will learn at least one new thing about wildlife.

(If the answer gets too long you can always bookmark to finish later :))

1. The tiger's roar has the powerful ability to momentarily paralyze humans. It is thought that the low frequencies of the sound are what cause this strange effect.

"Bro I swear I didn't call your mamma fat!" (Credit: Marion Voilborn)

2. Snow leopards are very timid when compared to other big cats to the point where they usually give up food to other predators without a fight. They also avoid humans at all costs even switching to hunting at night just to stay clear of people. As a result, attacks by snow leopards on humans are practically unheard of.

3. Over 96% of the animal kingdom is made up of invertebrates. The remaining 4% includes mammals, reptiles, birds, fish and amphibians.

4. Scientists have found certain groups of gorillas have developed localized communication similar to human slang.

“Yo dawg! What’s good?” (Credit: Source)

5. Only male peafowl are called peacocks. Females are called peahens.

6. Dragonflies and damselflies form a heart with their tails when they mate.

“It must be true love.” (Credit: Source)

7. Baby elephants have been known to suck their trunks for comfort.

8. Sea otters often hold hands while they sleep so they don’t drift apart in the current.

9. Surprisingly, elephant shrews are more closely related to elephants than shrews, despite their shrew like appearance.

10. Killer whales are smart predators and use a variety of strategies to hunt prey. If a seal is resting on an iceberg they will form waves with their tails to knock it off. If a sea lion pup is resting on the beach it will intentionally beach itself to catch one. These are just some of the strategies that make orcas the apex predators of the world’s oceans.

“Run guys! It’s a sea panda!” (Credit: The source of this one was a bit weird so I didn't post.)

11. Flamingos are naturally white. Their diet of shrimp and algae is what gives them a pink feather colouring.

12. Alberta, Canada (My native province) is the largest rat-free populated area in the world.

13. The eggs of a red-eyed tree frog can hatch early if they sense approaching danger.

14. Blue jays mimic the calls of hawks to scare away other rival birds.

15. What makes Yellowstone national park so special is the fact that it is the only place in the world where bison have continuously lived since prehistoric times. Sadly, bison are allowed to be killed if they wander outside the park while elk are still protected.

“Fun fact! Bison have been reintroduced to Banff national park after many years of their absence.” (Credit: Dan Ralla)

16. In the UK, the British monarchy legally owns all unmarked mute swans that are in open water. Why open water? I don't know.

17. All clown fish are born male but some turn female later in their lives to allow for mating.

18. Moray eels have a second set of jaws that extend from their throat. This second “mouth” is used to grab struggling prey and drag it further down the predator’s gullet.

“I have a second set of jaws. Eel with it!” (Credit: The source of this one was a bit weird so I didn't post.)

19. Anteaters don’t have teeth. Honestly, they don’t really need them considering they eat tiny insects.

20. Male ring-tailed lemurs will “stink” fight by wafting scent at each other. The fight begins when the two lemurs wave their tails at their opponent, spreading their scent. The first lemur to back down loses.

"My stench is enough to drop em dead!" (Credit: Source)

21. Lynx have large feet that allow them to run through deep snow with ease. This helps when chasing swift prey like the snowshoe hare.

22. In 1924 a Labrador retriever named "Pep" was sentenced to life without parole at eastern state penitentiary for killing the governor's cat.

23. In an aquatic traffic jam, alligators seem to give manatees the right of way. A manatee will nudge a gator and the reptile will move out of the way, letting the mammal pass.

“Or sometimes the gators just ride em!” (Credit: David Schrichte)

24. Nine-banded armadillos seem to almost always give birth to identical quadruplets.

25. Cats can’t usually taste sugar as their sweet taste buds aren’t very reactive.

26. Pronghorns are the second fastest animals on land and can sprint at a top speed of 85 km/h. In a long distance race this animal can run at 53 km/h for around 32 kilometers. In comparison the fastest land animal, the cheetah can only keep up its speed for a few hundred meters.

"That cheetah's a cheat. He can only run faster than me for a few seconds!!!" (Credit: Source)

27. African wild dogs are the most successful large predators, with them succeeding in around 60–90% of hunts. The most successful hunter is the dragonfly which completes 95% of hunts.

28. Birds are not irritated by the chemical in peppers that is "hot" to us humans. Birds will often eat more "hot" foods as it makes them less appealing to predators.

29. The tusks of narwhals are actually inside out teeth that are highly sensitive on the outside and very durable.

"Narwhals Narwhals swimming in the ocean, causing a commotion!"
(Credit: Source)

30. Caribbean sperm whales have their own regional accent when they communicate.

31. Bald eagles make such silly sounds that Hollywood dubs their voices. When eagles appear in media the sound of another bird (usually the red-tailed hawk) is often used to make them sound mightier.

32. The sand tiger shark may be equipped with one nasty looking pair of barbed jaws but they are designed so that this fish can't fatally injure a human.

"Well Sandro its Monday morning and you know what that means….off to the office…..aaggaaaiiinnn!!!!" (Credit: Source)

33. Female bats give birth while hanging upside down and as a result they catch the baby in their wings when it drops.

34. Toucan curl into small little balls when they sleep.

35. Horses are distantly related to tapirs and rhinoceros. Just look at this picture of an early rhino and you can see why.

"Hyrachyus also known as the primitive rhino." (Credit: Source)

36. Lions once lived across Europe before they were hunted to extinction in the region around 100 BCE.

37. Male platypus have venomous spurs. They definitely wouldn't make as good a pet as the show Phineas and Ferb would have you believe.

38. A snail can sleep for around 3 years if the weather conditions worsen to the point where they have to.

39. The woolly bear caterpillar hibernates through many winters in the cold arctic, eating every summer to prepare for metamorphosis. It can take up to 3 years but finally this caterpillar will transform into a moth and fly away.

(Credit: Source)

40. Elephants are the only mammals that can't jump. They also have the inability to trot or gallop.

"Well I can still catch you!!!" (Credit: Source)

41. Sloths are slow animals that use their lack of speed to camouflage in the jungle brush, but did you know it can take up to 2 weeks for one to digests its food.

"Just hangin around." (Credit: Source)

42. Around 3% of ice in Antarctic glaciers is penguin urine. Which makes sense considering how many of them hang around there.

43. Giraffes have no vocal cords but researchers suspect they could make sounds by vibrating vocal folds in their trachea. Many believe that the reason none have heard giraffe vocalization is due to the low frequency of their sounds.

44. Around 50% of the orangutan population has fractured bones from falling out of trees on a regular basis.

45. For unknown reasons, scorpions glow under ultraviolet light rays when in the dark. Decades ago only around 600 species of scorpion were known but by using ultraviolet lights scientists have now discovered over 2000 species.

"I just have that youthful glow!" (Credit: Source)

46. The Pyrenean ibex went extinct twice. Once from over hunting and habitat loss and second from when it was cloned to try and save the species.

47. Recently scientists have learned that Komodo dragons are indeed venomous. When scientist Brian Fry investigated this monitor lizard he found that their jaws contained relatively little bacteria. What he did find was a venom gland in the lower jaw.

"You goat to be kidding me! They have venom now too!" (Credit: Source)

48. Many of the world's kingfishers don't eat fish and rarely go near water.

49. The last living North American jaguar, El Jefe was once recorded killing an American black bear. Pretty impressive.

50. The hippopotamus is the world's deadliest large mammal and kills around 500 people per year.

51. When rutting the skull of a bighorn sheep can take a 800 pounds of force. Ironically, this animals hardheadedness is most likely due to its skull's flexibility not its solidity.

"Do you have any idea what you've done? Don't you understand the ramifications." (Credit: Source)

52. A super colony of army ants are among the world's most unstoppable predators, able to kill over 13,000 other organisms per night.

53. Coleoptera or beetles are the largest order in the animal kingdom with it composing of over 300,000 species.

54. All deer have antlers except the Chinese water deer.

55. The decapitated head of a snake can still bite even hours after the creature's death. These bites usually contain huge amounts of venom.

56. The Harris' hawk is the only bird of prey known to hunt in packs. These predators will chase prey through the cactus maze of the desert then once they have their quarry trapped they will pursue it on foot.

"Clever girls!" (See if you can figure out the reference ;) (Credit: Source)

57. The Hyacinth macaw is the biggest species of parrot in the world.

58. The cougar holds the Guinness world record for animal with the most names which include mountain lion, puma, mountain cat, catamount and panther. It has over 40 different names in English alone!

"I'm also known as the one animal that really scares Josh!" (Credit: Source)

59. Giraffes only need 5–30 minutes of sleep each day! I bet most of us wish we could run on that little rest.

60. Despite their reputation as solitary animals, both striped and brown hyenas live in clans of 2–8 members. Even so they are still primarily solitary when looking for food.

61. In the 1930s the USSR attempted to domesticate moose and these semi-domestic animals were used as pack animal in the deep snow.

"I am not very amoosed by your puns!!!" (Credit: Source)

62. Horses have the largest eyes of any land mammal.

63. The four subspecies of African buffalo are the most successful grazers in Africa and inhabit the swamps, floodplains, grasslands and forests of the continent.

"An African forest buffalo, a subspecies I find few people know about." (Credit: Source)

64. Despite, their reputation as fearsome predators, a grizzly bears diet consists of around 80% plant matter, and even when they do hunt they primarily eat insects, fish, carrion or young ungulates.

"Bear with me dear reader. Sorry this answer is long but I really like writing about animals" (Credit: The source for this one is a little weird so I didn't post.)

65. The cute koalas have quite small brains and survive on a diet of nutrient-poor eucalyptus leaves.

66. Male kangaroos flex their powerful arms to attract females. Sometimes I forget just how ripped they are!

"Do you even hop bro?" (Credit: William Thomson)

67. The Tasmanian devil is the largest surviving carnivorous marsupial.

68. Fossils place the earliest relative of penguins 60 million years ago. This means that these birds survived the extinction of the dinosaurs!

69. Leopard seals will often sing underwater during breeding season.

"Just let me sleep five more minute." (Credit: Couldn't find the source for this one.)

70. Bonobos were once thought to be the same as chimpanzees but were stated to be a unique species fairly recently, making them the last great ape to be discovered.

71. Despite their reputation, dietary analysis has shown that the Bili apes don't hunt leopards and lions…at least on a regular basis.

"Ya no…I would never pick a fight with a lion, especially since they don't even live in my habitat." (Credit: Source)

72. The wildebeest migration is the biggest migratory event in the world. Many other animals like zebra, gazelles, eland and other antelope also join in on the perilous journey which is plagued by predators.

73. Centipedes never have 100 legs. They can have more or less but they always have an odd amount of legs so therefore having 100 is impossible.

74. Wombats rely primarily on their tough butts to protect them from predators. They are made of mostly cartilage and can take a decent amount of damage from hunters.

"Random fact #658 Wombats poop cubes." (Credit: Couldn't find the source for this one.)

75. Antarctic krill are one of the most populous animal species on the planet with a population of around 500 million in the Southern ocean alone.

76. The Amazon rainforest is home to 3 apex predators that all prey on each other, the jaguar, anaconda and caiman.

77. The mantis shrimp can throw a punch at 50mph, accelerating quicker than a 22 caliber bullet!

78. Kung fu mantis use moves similar to martial arts to make themselves look bigger and scare off predators.

"Legend tells of a legendary mantis whose kung fu skills were the stuff of legend." (Credit: The team of BBC's Life Story.)

79. Meerkats are immune to the venom of snakes and scorpions. They are also highly territorial and rival mobs will engage in vicious gang fights.

80. Catfish usually eat small prey but those that live in urban areas have adapted to catch pigeons.

81. Dingos are descended from domestic dogs but don't bark like their ancestors. Instead, they howl like wolves.

“There was a farmer who had a dog and dingo was his name-o!”
(Credit: Source)

82. A groups of toads are often called a knot.

83. Burmese pythons are invasive species in Florida and are disrupting much of the ecosystem. It seems only the American alligator can defend itself from this snake.

84. Saltwater crocodiles often swim into the ocean and have even been seen feeding on dead whales with sharks!

“You can spot one croc near the whale’s flipper the other by the tail.” (Credit: Couldn’t find the source.)

85. Like a human finger print the tail of each humpback whale is unique.

86. Also known as sea canaries, belugas are the most vocal of all whales.

87. Some monkeys can understand basic arithmetic and even multiplication.

“Ya that was definitely all me.” (Credit: Couldn’t find the source.)

88. Peregrine falcons actually thrive more in cities than they do in the wild.

89. Despite being pretty dangerous wild cats, ocelots have been kept as pets in the past.

“I like you an ocelot!” (Credit: Couldn’t find the source)

90. Ostriches use their wing as rudders when running at high speeds to direct their movement.

91. Similarly to lions, male cheetahs will occasionally group up with each other in coalitions to hunt. Females on the other hand always remain alone, unless they have cubs.

92. Pelicans have the largest bill of any birds, measuring around 18 inches in length.

"Trump is a lot like a pelican he's white, has scraggly hair and if your not careful he'll stick you with a huge bill!" (Credit: Source)

93. People who study marmots are called "marmoteers" or "marmatologists".

94. The dhole or Asiatic wild dog lives in clans of around 7–12 dogs and can take down very large prey.

(Credit: Couldn't find source.)

95. Wolves have about 200 million scent cells, in comparison humans have only about 5 million. Wolves can smell other animals more than 1.6 kilometers away.

96. Portia spiders are intelligent predators that hunt other spiders. Their behavior suggests that they can learn basic problem solving skills.

97. Lions were once the second most widespread predator after humans covering Africa, Europe, Asia and North America.

98. Wolverines are so elusive that scientists aren't really sure if they are endangered or not!

"Well maybe I'm hard to find because I'm endangered!!!" (Credit: Couldn't find source)

99. Asiatic black bears often spend half their lives in trees.

100. A recently discovered species of extinct ichthyosaur may have been larger than the blue whale!

"Ichthyosaurs are actually reptiles despite their appearance."

If you stuck with me this far you've made it to the finish. I just hope you enjoyed these facts and learned at least one new thing about the animal kingdom!

Are any birds of prey more effective than mongoose when fighting against a snake?

Samuel Perloff · Follow Member of Ornithological Club Wed

Arguably yes. There's a whole subfamily of birds of prey, Circaetinae, where a majority of species are by and large specialized to hunt down snakes, hence the species are referred to as snake eagles etus (Circaetus genus) and serpent eagles (Spilornis genus).

Among the specializations these species show are thick, rough leg and foot skin that make it difficult for a snakes fangs to find purchase with quite long legs to keep the snakes away from their body. They also have large feet with relatively short talons, making their feet well suited to deliver a killing squeeze to a snake. Snake and serpent eagles often instantly and instinctively grasp their snake quarry by the neck, making it easier to control it and dispatch it.

Brown snake eagle with black mamba kill.

Cases where venomous and even constricting snakes have gotten the better of snake and serpent eagles are known but are exceedingly sparse given these eagles specialization. The mongoose best known for snake predation are the Asian ones now described as the genus Urva. However, these mongoose still have a generalist diet including many other diverse prey types such as mammals, birds and invertebrates. While mongoose of some species have a natural antivenom in their blood streams this has been found in different compositions in unrelated mammals which are far from major venomous snake predators, such as opossums and maybe skunks. While sometimes they take some numbers of lizards, true snake and serpent eagles (Spilornis may have a typically more generalized diet) are truly devoted snake killers for usually a rather considerable majority of their diet. Many of the world's deadliest snakes such as black mambas, puff adders, Russell's vipers, common kraits and cobras must live in fear of these formidable raptors.

Crested serpent eagle in combat with a juvenile python.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
African wild dog family portrait.

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu

African wild dogs are extremely successful hunters and are seen as a great threat by hyenas and lions. They also don't kill theirs prey before eating. They are very smart and use their fantastic endurance to wear their prey down to the point of exhaustion.

Everything Animals
KENYA SAYS NO TO POACHING! Protecting endangered giants

Posted by Jo Mburu

The bands around the ankles of these two white rhinos, strolling through South Africa's Amakhala Game Reserve, are used to track endangered animals and protect them from poaching. Both white and black rhinos live in open savanna but adult rhinos' only real predators are humans who hunt them for the illegal trade in their horns. Although they are large, tough animals, rhinos are an easy target for poachers during their daily visits to the watering hole.

Southern white rhinos now thrive in protected sanctuaries like the Amakhala Game Reserve. But the northern white rhino subspecies is believed to be extinct in the wild, with only a few left in captivity. Black rhinos have doubled from their low point over the past two decades, but still number only a fraction of their population in the early 20th Century – something to think about on Wildlife Conservation Day.

Kenya Wildlife Service states that no rhinos were killed by poachers in the country in 2020 for the first time in more than 20 years.

Who would win in a fight: Spinosaurus or T. rex?

Colton Taresh

Biology Major With an Emphasis in Natural History Updated 1y

Who would win in a fight: Spinosaurus or T. rex?

I'm in the camp that we should stop this ridiculous debate. These weren't prehistoric monsters, they were animals, so they'd spend more of their time being animals. Not only were they animals, but for the ecological niches that they occupied, they were highly effective animals.

The problem is that many "awesome-bros," keep looking at prehistoric animals as monsters of fiction, and only like the coolest looking ones. This leads to massive misconceptions about these animals, leading to fanboys on either side making up complete nonsense, with no science to be found in the arguments, other than the fact that these animals once existed.

To me, it's like arguing that a saltwater crocodile will easily kill a lion or a tiger. As with anything in nature, it largely depends on several factors.

With Spinosaurus and Tyrannosaurus rex, this argument is even more extreme, since the two animals lived at different times in history, and lived on completely opposite sides of the world. Spinosaurus comes from North Africa, and T. rex comes from Montana, USA.

But, for the sake of the question, I'll play ball and also dispel some misconceptions and myths about these animals, and of course, back up my assertions with scientific papers and fossils.

In one corner, we have Tyrannosaurus rex:

Look at those gnashers!

The things that the T. rex is known for.

Extremely robust build. It had large, thick bones, which means large, powerful muscles. I mean, just look at the fossil skeletons of Sue, Stan, and Scotty, and you get the picture.

I've seen Sue in person, and let me tell you, pictures don't convey how truly massive she was.

Stan's also quite massive as far as T. rexes go.

Then onto the big boy, the one who supplanted Sue as the biggest and baddest T. rex around. Meet Scotty!

Now imagine coming across that in the open plains of Montana. You have no chance of getting away. It may be hard to gather from the pictures, but in all three of these specimens, a single adult human can fit inside the mouth. Absolutely enormous animals to be sure.

Huge head. Although its head was a diapsid head, it's known for being extremely thick, almost solid bone with fused nasals. This means large and powerful jaw muscles. If you look closely at Sue, Scotty, and Stan, you can clearly see the fused nasal bones, a trait unique to Tyrannosaurs in general, and that serves to make the skull even stronger and sturdier overall.

For reference, let's actually compare the skeletons of these two animals.

As you can clearly see, T. rex's bone structure is much stockier and MUCH more robust than Spinosaurus, which means that T. rex would have weighed more, despite these two animals being roughly similar in size.

Big teeth. T. rex teeth are rather… large to say the least. They're also almost completely solid and thick, with long roots. This means that it had a colossal bite force. Many fossils of Edmontosaurus and Triceratops keep showing damage from T. rex teeth, and in many cases, have T. rex teeth embedded in the bones that then healed over.

This is part of a hadrosaur vertebra. What the pencil is pointing at is a T. rex tooth embedded right in the bone.

What you see here is the bottom of a Triceratops hip. Those arrows are pointing to bite marks that look incredibly suspicious. Suspicious as though five or six large bitey things have knocked a hole in it and tore it apart. No prizes for guessing what those were.

Because it's so large, that means it's rather massive overall. With those big bones, big muscles, and huge head, you're going to be a bit on the heavy side. Recent estimates from the RSM P2523.8 specimen, colloquially known as Scotty give it a weight of 8.7 tons, with the femur alone weighing 195 lbs. Scotty was quite the bruiser for a T. rex. So much so that paleontologists that studied the fossil called it, "The T. rex of T. rexes."

Surprisingly, despite its size, was rather fast for its size. Sure, it may not have been a speed runner, but was pretty agile for its size. Scientists suggest an upper limit of 20 mph, give or take. So, pretty fast for its size.

Here's a paper on the speed estimates of large carnivorous theropods, and a study on the relative agility of T. rex for reference.

A general scaling law reveals why the largest animals are not the fastest

Lower rotational inertia and larger leg muscles indicate more rapid turns in tyrannosaurids than in other large theropods

Not only that, but T. rex also had a visual acuity much higher than modern day hawks, as demonstrated by this paper:

Binocular vision in theropod dinosaurs

Not only THAT, but it also had a pretty good sense of smell. This paper demonstrates the olfactory acuity of large carnivorous theropods, which, of course, includes T. rex.

Olfactory acuity in theropods: palaeobiological and evolutionary implications

So, to sum up, we have an animal that:

- Is large and powerful
- Has remarkable vision
- Has a pretty damn good sense of smell
- Is a heavyweight bruiser for a dinosaur
- Has big ol' teeth that are very strong
- Took on game that were also large and powerful.

That adds up to an amazingly successful terrestrial carnivore.

In the other corner, we have Spinosaurus aegyptiacus:

If you think this picture of Spinosaurus looks goofy and ridiculous, well then, dear reader, your whole view of Spinosaurus is going to be shattered. Here's a picture of its skeleton.

As you can see, the picture I provided above was not that far off from the fossil specimen.

As of 2020, Ibrahim, et al. uncovered a new fossil specimen, and published their findings in the scientific journal Nature, and it's from this study that the above artistic reconstruction is based on.

Here's what they discovered:

Ibrahim, et al. and his team uncovered the most complete Spinosaurus tail ever, as well as a good portion of its hind-limbs, demonstrating that the short-legged version of Spinosaurus was correct all along.

You also might notice the tail is a bit more bulky than what's known in other theropods, and just a cursory glance here, I see a powerful, muscular tail perfectly suited to propulsion.

Indeed, in their paper, Ibrahim et al, came to a much similar conclusion, though, they were being more cautious than I, because they found it's not as efficient as a crocodile's tail.

Here's the paper in question, cited on Nature's website.

Tail-propelled aquatic locomotion in a theropod dinosaur

The more and more we learn about nature, the weirder nature is.

So, I'm sure you can understand now, Spinosaurus DID NOT LOOK LIKE THIS:

In fact, the "Spinosaurus" you see in Jurassic Park III is actually much closer to another spinosaurid, Baryonyx walkeri.

Yes, you heard me correctly, we actually had a wealth of Spinosaurus research relatively recently, that we now know that this was a whole group of megalosaurids showing more of a trend of adapting to semi-aquatic lifestyles.

Indeed, Jurassic Park III's "Spinosaurus" just looks like a Baryonyx with a dinky spine.

Also, since I am calling Jurassic Park III's "Spinosaurus" a Baryonyx, then I have to say it's massively oversized in the movie.

In reality, Baryonyx was around 7.5–10 meters long, and weighed between 1.2–1.7 tons, standing at a height of 3 meters or so.

Of course, Spinosaurus was much larger, being 15–16 meters in length, weighing at a far more considerable 6.4–7.5 tons, and standing at a height of around 4–6 meters or so.

However, many fanboys confuse the length and height for overall size. If you look at the Spinosaurus fossil I provided above, and the new 2020 specimen uncovered by Ibrahim and his team, you'll see its bones are more gracile than you might have previously thought.

ESPECIALLY compared to a Tyrannosaurus. Larger and stockier bones in general means bigger and more powerful muscles can be attached to them. So that means T. rex was much heavier than Spinosaurus.

Second thing its known for is its sail. As it stands, scientists are unsure what purpose the sail might have had, and the most prevailing idea, the one I think makes the most sense, is that it was used for display.

But let's go onto things that many people who are unfamiliar with the body of research on Spinosaurus aren't aware of.

First of all its diet.

It primarily ate large fish. This paper discusses the diet of Spinosaurus. This holds especially true when you consider where this dinosaur is found. It's found in the Kem Kem and Baharaya Formations 112 to 93.5 million years ago. During its time, it lived along the North African cost, and along rivers near the coast.

(PDF) Semiaquatic adaptations in a giant predatory dinosaur

Recent analysis of oxygen isotopes indicate that this animal either spent a large amount of its time near water, or was semi-aquatic. Either or is perfectly legitimate, as the oxygen isotope ratios in its fossils speak for themselves.

Oxygen isotope evidence for semi-aquatic habits among spinosaurid theropods

This also could hold true for Spinosaurus's closely related kin like Baryonyx.

Not only do the isotopes speak for themselves, but the nostrils on Spinosaurus are rather suspiciously high up on the skull, and not out in front of the snout like in T. rex.

Here's another fossil Spinosaurus. Look at the nostrils.

The nostrils are rather high up on the snout. If this was an obligate terrestrial carnivore, why then, pray tell, are the nostrils that high up along the snout? Wouldn't it make more sense for the nostrils to be on the end of the snout, like in T. rex?

But wait, it gets even weirder. If Spinosaurus was an obligate terrestrial carnivore, why then does it have weird holes along the end of the snout like a crocodile?

https://web.archive.org/web/20110721013005/http://www2.mnhn.fr/hdt203/info/media/navep1/abstracts.pdf

Here's the part of the skull of a Spinosaurus that they CT scanned.

The paleontologists that conducted the study stated that these were homologous to the pressure sensors that crocodilians have.

Why would Spinosaurus have such a feature if it hunted on land? That's an adaptation that would make no sense. If, however, it was around water, poking its maw into a river, then it'd make perfect sense.

And it gets even weirder. If it was rasslin' down large game, why does it have conical teeth like a crocodile?

Here's a Spinosaurus tooth.

And here's a T. rex tooth.

The tooth of the Spinosaurus is not one that looks like it was well suited for chomping down and overpowering large game. It is, however, perfectly suited for catching large fish like Oncopristis

Here’s this sawfish next to a human.

And to put the whole picture together, here's a recreation of two Spinosaurus buddies catching these fish.

This is the animal doing what it did best. Chillin' in the water and catching fish.

And many would cry foul that we're now depicting the animal as aquatic, and this is based on scientific research. The paper this is derived from I linked to, so you can come to your own conclusions.

Because of this new discovery, many other scientists, especially theropod experts, are now no longer debating its semi-aquatic lifestyle. Now the debate lingers on to what degree.

Personally, Ibrahim's 2020 paper makes the strongest case, as they have found that the tail is quite well suited for swimming, though we shouldn't expect it to be as efficient as a crocodile.

Thus Spinosaurus ecology is now much more clear. We now know it was a piscivore, now we have to determine how it caught its prey.

The other facts about Spinosaurus that I've cited could give us a clue.

I personally think that maybe it could have acted much like a crocodile, as it seems particularly well suited to that.

So to sum up. We have an animal that:

Was quite big. I won't deny it, Spinosaurus was large, it needed to be to eat the big ass fish it hunted.

Is a rather awesome looking animal. That's undeniable.

Ate fish. Fish is a good source of protein, as many health nuts will tell you.

More gracile than T. rex. Its bones just weren't as stocky as T. rex. Sorry guys.

Was a highly effective animal.

Occupied a different ecological niche.

Thus, we can come to the complete scientific conclusion. First of all, these animals weren't contemporaneous with each other. They lived at different times and on completely opposite sides of the world.

Not to mention that the two animals occupied different ecological niches. Tyrannosaurus rex was a powerhouse land based hunter that took out large and powerful game, while Spinosaurus was a killer of giant fish, par excellance.

If they did come to a fight, sorry to say, but T. rex still wins this duel. Why? Because several T. rex specimens show evidence of face-biting and struggling with other T. rexes. Thus, these animals fought their own kind on a regular basis, and when you're as large and powerful as a T. rex, you've got to be large and powerful yourself to dish out some damage.

In fact, a T. rex skeleton I showed earlier actually is known to have damage around its face and skull, Stan.

Paleontologist Mark Witton describes the damage on Stan's skull:

Stan's skeleton is particularly damaged around the posterior head and neck region, with a probable tooth wound penetrating its braincase, a smashed postorbital bar (a dorsal projection of tyrannosaur skulls which anchored neck muscles) and broken neck vertebrae.

Mark Witton. What neck-biting Tyrannosaurus sex tells us about speculation in palaeoart

This means that Spinosaurus would lose against T. rex, no question. It doesn't have the power, and because it occupies a different niche, likely didn't spend much time fighting off other large theropods for meals. However, T. rex did that on the daily, as the fossils demonstrate.

So the winner is Tyrannosaurus rex. However, for those wanting to learn more about Spinosaurus, I strongly advise you read the scientific papers I referenced on this animal. It's now a much more interesting animal than it was before, much more awesome than the Spinosaurus fan club makes it out to be.

P.S.: As of a few days ago, there's been more research conducted on Spinosaurus aegypticus, specifically, the tail as depicted in the previous paleo-art that I posted was a bit outdated. I edited my answer to reflect this, while still using the 2014 specimen for the rest of the creature.

So use your imagination, and imagine the new tail on the 2014 specimen, and you're in the ball park.

P.P.S.: I did try to find an open source version of Ibrahim's 2020 paper, but it seems it's only available on Nature as of now.

However, in one of the few times I can actually praise popular press for scientific accuracy, National Geographic, a pop-science publication, not a legitimate peer-reviewed journal like Nature, did a fantastic article summarizing Ibrahim's research.

You can find that article here:

Bizarre Spinosaurus makes history as first known swimming dinosaur

P.P.P.S: Updated the answer to compare a T. rex skeleton to a S. aegypticus specimen directly, as the comparison is much more pronounced, and makes things a bit more clear.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
This lion has another chance...

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Tue

This lion lost one of his nine lives, but with a little help from us, he's alive to tell the tale

Lions don't have easy lives, facing constant threats to their survival from humans and each other! So when the call came in from Segera Wildlife Conservancy about a maned male lion who had come out of a recent fracas with his fellow big cats looking worse for wear, our SWT/KWS Mt Kenya Vet Unit sprung into action and mobilised to the scene.

They found the patient suffering from multiple debilitating bite wounds, appearing dehydrated and lethargic. Fortunately the operation to treat him was straightforward: first the KWS Vet set to work darting him with anaesthetic which took around five minutes to take effect.

Then, his ragged wounds were cleaned and drugs were administered to aid his healing, before he was revived. All to give this ‘King of the Jungle’ a better chance of survival to roar the plains once again.

Over the years, the SWT/KWS Veterinary Teams have responded to over 500 lion cases to date, treating individuals for fight injuries, snare wounds and more.

That amounts to many lions who are alive today because of emergency interventions.

Source: Friends Who Like the Sheldrick Trust

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Wild Bison to Roam Britain for the First Time in Thousands of Years

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Tue

About 10,000 years after the Steppe Bison went extinct, UK's most important wildlife species are now also racing toward extinction.

Ancient Steppe bison once roamed the land which would later become England. Their presence significantly provided other animals and plants the healthy ecosystem they needed to thrive.

Now, the UK is looking to the Steppe bison's closest relative to bring back the area's ancient woodlands -- the European bison.

The $1.4 million "Wilder Blean" project, funded by the People's Postcode Lottery Dream fund, aims to release a small herd of European bison into the West Blean woods, near Canterbury in East Kent, during the spring of 2022.

The bison will come from the Netherlands or Poland, where previous releases have proved successful, and the initial release will include one male and three females, according to the Guardian. Natural breeding is expected to increase the size of the herd.

Describing European bison as "ecosystem engineers," the Kent Wildlife Trust, one of the conservation organizations leading the project, said the species can "change woodlands in a way that no other animal can."

"They eat bark and create dust baths which each have benefits for many plants and animals," the trust added. "These are functions that have been missing from our UK woodlands for thousands of years and bringing them back can help restore an abundance of wildlife."

The UK is one of the most nature-depleted countries in the world, according to the World Wildlife Fund. More than one in seven native species face extinction and more than half are in decline.

"The Wilder Blean project will prove that a wilder, nature-based solution is the right one to tackling the climate and nature crisis we now face," Paul Hadaway, director of conservation at Kent Wildlife Trust said in a statement. "Using missing keystone species like bison to restore natural processes to habitats is the key to creating bio-abundance in our landscape."

Once the bison are settled into their fenced area, the public will be able to visit and watch the animals.

Are hippos herbivores?

Alex Cooper · Follow 2y

Hippos are mostly herbivorous, but that’s not much consolation to the animals they occasionally eat. (If they’re already dead and being scavenged, they probably don’t care too much either way.)

"It's OK, I'm an organ donor. At least I'm not going to waste." - John Zebra (possibly)

They'll also eat…each other.

Dr Dudley made the first ever record of hippos eating meat at Hwange National Park, Zimbabwe in 1995. Since then he has been collecting evidence of hippos eating impala, baby elephants and even their own kind. While the cannibalistic incidents still number fewer than a dozen, they have occurred across the animals' range, from South Africa to Uganda.[1]

Baby elephants? You monster.

They don't just scavenge, though—they'll also kill their dinner. And the list of victims goes on:

Dudley lists instances where wild hippos have fed on impalas, elephants, kudus, wildebeest, zebras, and other hippos that they either killed themselves or were killed by other predators. Events like these have been seen both during times when carnivory may be a last resort (e.g. droughts when food is scarce), and when it was merely a convenient opportunity, like a mass drowning of wildebeest crossing a river. There are also reports of captive hippos in zoos killing and eating their neighbors, including tapirs, wallabies, flamingoes and pygmy hippos.[2]

Scientists believe that it's not a recent phenomenon; we just haven't been paying that much attention. (Plus they do most of these dirty deeds at night, like any self-respecting killer.)

Footnotes
[1] The truth about hippos: herbivore or cannibal?
[2] Hippos Eat Way More Meat than We Thought, and It Can Make Them Sick

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu 22h

A lion dad was trying to take care of his cubs while their mom was recovering. Safe to say they really missed their mom!

Source .

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
THE TIGER QUEEN: THE STORY OF THE CHAMPAWAT TIGER.

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Feb 20

The Champawat tiger was a female Bengal tiger that killed an estimated 436 people throughout Nepal and India which is the most fatalities from a tiger in history.

Most of the kills were women and children gathering supplies in the woods. This was in 1907 when deforestation caused animals to hunt humans for food more regularly as their typical prey was disappearing. The man who finally killed her was being charged at by the tiger who dropped dead after 3 rifle shots just 20 feet away from him.

Tigers are one of the most endangered species to walk the planet. We need to all work together to protect the life and legacy of these precious beasts.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Injured zebra gets taken down by leopard, leopard then confronts massive crocodile.

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Feb 16

Attempted to cross a River and got grabbed by the croc, managed to break away and make it to shore but was crippled. Leopard arrived soon after and finished it off

Réponse similaire
Pourquoi les lions ont-ils une crinière?/ Why do lions have manes while other big cats are maneless?

Gérard Briais, Flâneur Parisien Traducteur · Traduit le 4 août 2020

Jon Whitlow M.Sc. en Parasitology et Physiology Biochemistry, Ecology, Behaviour, and Classics, UCNW Bangor (Diplôme obtenu en 1987)

Réponse originale : Pourquoi les lions ont-ils une crinière alors que d'autres grands félins sont sans crinière ?

Le lion est le seul félin social. Le mâle surveille un territoire occupé par des femelles. Le territoire est généralement une savane ouverte où les grands félins sont plus facilement visibles.

La croissance des crinières indique la maturité sexuelle.

La taille et la densité de la crinière peuvent aider un lion à paraître plus grand, et donc plus menaçant, et à éloigner d'éventuels adversaires.

Cette apparence intimidante est liée à la deuxième fonction de la crinière : un symbole de santé et de puissance. Un lion serait sage de garder ses distances avec un autre lion à la crinière particulièrement épaisse et luxuriante, sa présence indiquant la puissance.

Une crinière plus sombre et plus fournie indique un lion en bonne santé avec beaucoup de testostérone. Cela indique aux rivaux potentiels de se méfier ; il ne reculera pas devant un combat.

La crinière noire est peut-être le symbole de statut le plus révélateur ; les crinières s'assombrissent avec l'âge, et des poils foncés et épais indiquent un lion bien nourri. Cela signifie qu'un lion à crinière noire est probablement dans la fleur de l'âge, qu'il mange bien, qu'il est en forme et fort.

Celui-ci ne semble pas aussi intimidant que celui-là :

Mais qui reste moins intimidant que ce dernier :

Ainsi, le fait d'être des félins sociaux, dans un habitat ouvert, et le besoin d'éviter les conflits par l'exposition, tout cela apporte un avantage aux lions à crinière noire

Réponse similaire

Pourquoi les lions n'attaquent-ils pas lorsque vous êtes dans un véhicule de safari?

Espace de Gio · Suivre Publication par MGS Ross Wind

Dupon Davignon Mis à jour le 3 déc. 2020

Les lions sont-ils les animaux sauvages les moins peureux ?

IL N’Y A PAS DE VIE PLUS VIOLENTE ET PLUS BRUTALE QUE CELLE DU LION. IL DOIT SA SURVIT À SA FORCE ET À SA BRAVOURE LÉGENDAIRE.

LE LION EST DANS UNE CLASSE À PART. IL Y A LE LION PUIS LES AUTRES GRANDS PRÉDATEURS.

Mis à jour le 3 déc. 2020

Ce lion était seul et a tué ce buffle.

Les civilisations antiques étaient beaucoup plus près de la nature que nous. Au cours de l'histoire, aucun autre prédateur n'a été plus adulé que le lion. Cela fait des millénaires que le lion est un symbole de force, de guerre, de victoire et de bravoure ainsi que du pouvoir royal, « être courageux comme un lion ou se battre comme un lion, » sont des expressions qui viennent de l'antiquité. Le lion était le modèle suprême de tout guerrier, car il se devait d'être brave, fort et habile au combat.

LE LION EST LE PRÉDATEUR SUPRÊME SUR TERRE, LE ROI DES ANIMAUX

À titre individuel, le lion possède le plus important rapport de poids entre prédateur et proie sur terre. Pour accomplir cet exploit, forcément il doit avoir des caractéristiques exceptionnelles, force physique et force de caractère, l'un ne vient pas sans l'autre. Cela fait de lui le plus grand des prédateurs terrestres.

LE LION PEUT ATTAQUER DE TOUT LES ANGLES SI CELA EST NÉCESSAIRE.

Alors que les autres félins les évitent, lions et lionnes font des attaques frontales sur des animaux beaucoup plus grands et plus lourds qu'eux.

CHEZ LES GRANDS MAMMIFÈRES TERRESTRES, LE LION EST SANS DOUTE LE PLUS TERRITORIAL.

Les autres grands prédateurs (tigre, jaguar, léopard, cougar ou ours) sont solitaires et généralement affrontent un adversaire à la foi. Comparés au lion, ils se battent rarement. Le lion patrouille dans son territoire régulièrement et n'hésitera pas à affronter plus d'un adversaire à la fois. Il est le seul à faire cela et même régulièrement s'il le faut. Pour la survie de cette espèce, il se doit d'être doté d'une force et d'un courage exceptionnel. Notons que la lionne est aussi très territoriale.

Comme vous êtes en mesure de le constater les lions sont très coriaces. Les mâles des autres espèces se battent à la période du rut. Quant aux lions, c'est 12 mois de rut par année!

TROUVEZ-MOI UN PRÉDATEUR QUI PEUT ÉGALER CELA !

Le buffle le plus agressif au monde est celui d'Afrique. Ils coopèrent non seulement pour se protéger, mais quand l'occasion se présente, ils chercheront à tuer des lions.

Trois exemples de courage exceptionnel: Un lion mâle, un jeune lion mâle et une lionne refusent d'abandonner leur proie.

PLUS EXTRAORDINAIRE ENCORE EST L'EXEMPLE SUIVANT.

Une nuit, un lion mâle est entré dans l'eau pour se nourrir d'une carcasse d'éléphant. L'étang en question contenait plusieurs hippopotames et crocodiles!

C’est tellement naturel pour les lions de démontrer du courage, cette qualité se manifeste déjà à un très jeune âge.

E0034 LION CUBS LEARNING TO BE TOUGH.

Young lions attacking a buffalo. One fearless young male lion was impaled. The horn seems to penetrate mainly under the skin. The young lion survived.

This female lion cub when hunting alone and made a kill.

These lion cubs learning to hunt prey bigger than themselves.

VOICI LE CONTEXTE. Les lions sont très puissants, mais comme tous les félins ont peu d'endurance. Aussi ils doivent ménager leur force. Le documentaire nous dit que ce jeune lion mâle nomade pas encore adulte s'appelle Red. Il faisait face à un grand surnombre, encerclé par une vingtaine ou plus de hyènes, il ne s'est pas enfui, et a survécu. Tatu son jeune compagnon est venu lui porté secours. C'en était trop pour les hyènes, elles ont déguerpi

Il est facile de sélectionner une image hors contexte. Voici la vidéo en question.

LES LIONS SONT DES FÉLINS TRÈS COMPLEXES ET LEURS RELATIONS AVEC LES PETITS ANIMAUX SONT PROBABLEMENT UNIQUES.

Les lions vont tuer les petits de leurs ennemis qui s'attaquent aux lionceaux (léopards, hyènes, guépards, etc.). Ils aiment la chair de certains petits animaux, comme celle du phacochère (114 kg). À l'occasion, les lions apprécient la chair du porc-épic et de la tortue.

En général, les lions adultes bien nourris ignorent les petits animaux. Ils peuvent toutefois s'en servir comme jouet. Une lionne peut amener aux lionceaux un petit animal pour qu'ils apprennent à chasser. En d'autres circonstances, ce même animal sera protégé.

Les agissements des lions envers les petits animaux qui ne représentent pas un danger pour les lionceaux dépendent des circonstances. Il y a beaucoup d'exceptions. Le plus souvent, ils sont très tolérants envers eux.

Il est donc facile d'en arriver à des conclusions erronées

Dans ce premier exemple, un ratel a survécu à une rencontre avec des lionceaux curieux. Beaucoup de petits animaux survivent quand ils rencontrent des lions enjoués. Bien sûr en de telles circonstances, un petit animal peut être blessé ou tué.

Ici le lionceau mâle a tué le ratel

Ce jeune lion mâle blessa involontairement la mangouste

Cette troupe a découvert un petit animal blessé sur leur chemin. Ils ont fait une pause près de lui puis sont repartis. Aucun mal ne lui a été fait.

Le ratel, la mangouste et le caracal n'ont pas été blessés.

Les lions sont souvent tolérants envers les petits animaux. Quand des chacals les héritent trop, ils se contentent de les chasser sans faire une grande dépense énergique inutile sur un petit animal qui ne fait pas partie de leurs menus. Quelque chose a suffisamment motivé cette lionne pour en poursuivre un, l'attraper, le tuer, mais ne l'a pas mangé.

LES LIONS SONT TRÈS COMPLEXES. Il est vrai que certains félins semblent adopter un jeune animal, mais finissent par le manger. Il y a des exemples de lionnes qui ont adopté de jeunes antilopes, des babouins mêmes de jeunes léopards. Comme explication, on dit que c'est l'instinct maternel. Certes, ceci peut être une explication logique. Mais les lions sont des félins sociaux et déjà manifestent une tolérance envers les petits animaux. Mettre tout sur l'instinct maternel n'est peut-être pas la seule explication. Comment expliquer que des lions mâles ont aussi adoptés et protégé des petits animaux?

Pour ceux qui veulent vraiment s'en donner la peine, il est facile de trouver des exemples de lions qui chassent seules sur internet.

LES LIONS CHASSENT : SEUL, EN DUO ET EN GROUPE.

E0072 FEARLESS LIONS HUNTING. Except in open areas with short grass making ambush practically impossible, all lions learn to hunt inside a pride, in duo and as single hunters.

SOLO HUNT

DUO HUNT

GROUP HUNT

Même quand il y en a plus qu'un, il arrive que seulement un fasse le travail et la minime contribution des autres s'il y en avait n'était pas nécessaire. Il faut dire que les lions amènent aussi les jeunes à la chasse. Il peut y avoir plusieurs lions, mais combien d'adultes?

Sur les sept lions sur cette photo, 4 ou 5 sont des jeunes.

Quand on veut bien se donner la peine de regarder la vie des lions dans son ensemble, il se trouve au sommet de la chaine alimentaire. C'est un puissant chasseur et un guerrier exceptionnel. Il est très difficile de trouver plus courageux.

La raison est très probablement variable.

D'une part, comme remarqué par ailleurs, il y a la possible accoutumance, voire "demi-domestication".

Mais aussi et surtout, le lion étant une créature intelligente, il a conscience de celle des êtres humains. Et même s'il est conscient de ses faiblesses physiques face au lion, il sait qu'un humain non craintif/sûr de lui/ne fuyant pas a ses raisons d'agir ainsi. Il sait qu'il doit posséder une arme, ou au moins un moyen de lutter efficacement contre le lion. C'est plus l 'intelligence perçue de l'homme qui impose le respect au lion, plus que ses capacités physiques que le lion sait être très inférieures.

Cela concerne le lion, mais également toute créature intelligente ; et plus la créature le sera, plus elle considérera l'homme avec respect (que ce soit craintif ou non, voire respect amical pour les plus intelligents tels que cétacés), car sachant ce que cette intelligence implique : des moyens de rétorsion radicaux.

Quant à l'idée d'une bestiole à multiples têtes ou appendices, je considère cela ridicule. Cela part d'une idée ancestrale que l'animal ne posséderait pas d'âme, donc ne pourrait pas penser et analyser de manière évolutive, et qu'il ne serait animé que par l'instinct. C'est de l'anthropocentrisme (seul l'homme pourrait penser réellement car il serait quelque chose de proche du miraculeux, et en tous cas unique), le pendant réactionnaire à l'anthropomorphisme ; deux interprétations extrêmes dont il vaut mieux se méfier.

Turki Safoue

Lieu : TunisieMis à jour le 2 ans

Le pays qui est considéré LE SEUL pays libre du monde arabe et la SEULE démocratie dans le monde arabe et d'afrique, c'est la Tunisie.

Le pays qui a annulé l'esclavage dès 1846 avant la France c'est encore la Tunisie.

Les femmes tunisienne sont les seules femme arabes et muslumanes qui sont considéré LIBRES et ÉGALES.

La Tunisie est le seul pays arabe qui protége la liberté d'expression.

Savez vous que le classement en terme de liberté d'expression et de démocratie de la Tunisie dépasse certains pays européens ?

Je crois que la réponse est bien claire, de vos réponses à cette question je conclu que la plupart des français ont des informations bien limitées sur la Tunisie.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Henry World`s oldest known Nile crocodile , Age 121

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Apr 13

Henry was born in 1900, he killed several men and children before being captured in 2003 .

Henry is the oldest known Nile crocodile in captivity , weighing in at 500 kilograms (1,100 pounds) and 5 metres in length .

He lives in his enclosure with six females and has fathered over 10 000 offspring in the last 32 years .

Lions kill hyenas from time to time when the latter try to steal meals, and yet it doesn't serve as a deterrence, as they will try again and again. What gives hyenas the guts to challenge lions?

Photo by Joan Stewart

Serge Elia Animal lover Updated 1y

It’s simple: spotted hyenas are among the few carnivores in the African savanna that will not hesitate to boldly outmaneuver lions, whatever the situation. Sure enough, they’re far braver than many other African predators (ie, the “mesopredators” that are pushed to the very bottom of the food chain), as they have comrades working as a team and viciously fighting at each other’s side, and thus they will never bow to the so-called “king of the beasts”.

Indeed, a clan of spotted hyenas banding together forms an unstoppable killing machine that will gladly take down any prey or threat, no matter how large or dangerous – and lions (even the normally intimidating males) are no exceptions. As a matter of fact, hyena clans can range from 6 to well over 100 members – with a pack of that size (that alone explains why unity creates strength in the animal kingdom), as well as each individual’s bone-crushing jaws (resulting in the most powerful bite-force among carnivorous mammals, which can dismember an unlucky lion), incredible stamina and intelligence, they can make out of the mightiest of lions a “scaredy-cat”!

In fact, hyenas are such smart animals (far smarter than any lion) when it comes to cooperative problem-solving tests, particularly thanks to their great amount of frontal cortex – the part of the brain that is involved in social behavior –, as they regularly engage in cooperation when hunting or defending themselves, adapt themselves to new situations, or even innovate…

Consequently, armed with their weaponry and fearsome intelligence, hyenas frequently challenge and mob lions, and they easily win in fights against their eternal enemies, to the extend that they have ousted the golden cats as Africa’s apex predators. Though in reality, the battle’s outcome heavily depends upon the courage of individual contestants, both on the lion side and the hyena side (so it’s mainly 50–50 for both animals).

Besides, lions are actually unworthy of their reputation as “noble hunters”, for it has been established that they scavenge more often than true scavengers, and that they steal kills from hyenas more often than the opposite! Not to mention that lions never think twice before assaulting any hyena they meet – especially the vulnerable loners that don’t have a pack fighting at their side –, at a point of killing it mercilessly and leaving its uneaten corpse to rot, all because of dietary overlap and competition over the same prey and hunting grounds, the both of which give way to recurrent territorial fights.

Either way, this definitely means that it's the lion – an animal we usually admire as the "almighty king" – the real bully of the wild, and not the hyena that is undeserving of its supposedly bad reputation…

So, to sum it all up: even though lions kill hyenas from time to time, nevertheless even that's not enough to deter hyenas and dissuade them from stealing the big cats' meals. Indeed, spotted hyenas are probably the boldest and bravest predators alive; they do possess sheer strength, both in jaw power and numbers, at their disposal, in order to challenge and outwit lions, before eventually overpowering them and fending them off…

Remember, Simba and Nala: lions may be strong kings, but never underestimate the unparalleled brawn of the bone-crusher queens…

Related Links

If a hyena could break a lion's leg in a single bite, why don't they kill lions more often, especially since they live in humongous clans?

My friend insists he could kill a hyena if one attacked him. How likely is he to survive a wild hyena attack (unarmed), assuming it is a single hyena set on killing him?

Why do hyenas like to eat their prey alive? Why don't they kill before eating like lions do?
Are you more likely to survive an encounter with a hyena or a lion?

How much of a force multiplier is a male lion vs a female lion? For example, there are reports that a single male lion can be enough to scare off hyenas whereas several female lions are unable to do so. Is a male lion "worth" 3 females in a fight?

Are hyenas just straight-up evil, or do they have any redeeming qualities? From what I've learned about them, they seem like the psychopaths of the animal kingdom.

How come lions don’t eat hyenas after killing them?

Why do full grown adult lionesses run away from a clan of hyenas whereas even young sub-adult male lions stand their ground against large hyena Clans most of the time?

Why are people scared of hyenas but not lions when lions are more dangerous?

Why do people enjoy a lion killing a hyena, but get upset when a lion is getting attacked by hyenas?

Qu'est-ce que les crocodiles ne peuvent pas manger? / What can crocodiles not eat?

Le système digestif des crocodiles est conçu pour faire face à tout ce qui lui est jeté dedans.

Ce reptile avale des roches (gastrolithes) qui l'aident à écraser les aliments qu'il avale. Rien que pour ça, vous pouvez comprendre que tout ce qui a des sabots, des os et des écailles fait déjà partie de son repas.

Vous constaterez également qu'il possède 10 fois plus d'acide gastrique que les autres animaux. Si une chose échappe aux rochers de la première chambre de son estomac, elle rencontrera l'acide de la chambre suivante. Ainsi, tout ce que nous considérons comme potentielle "nourriture" l'est aussi pour ce reptile !

Can a Nile crocodile rival a saltwater crocodile in terms of size?

Michalis P. · Follow fascinated by animals 8mo

Generally, Nile crocodiles are considered the second largest crocodilian (and reptile) in terms of average body mass after the saltwater crocodile. However, because both crocodile species are widespread in their continents, size and weight can vary from region to region and among sexes.

Length

On average, adult Nile crocodiles reach sizes of 3 – 4.5 meters but some individuals can reach a maximum size of around 4.5 – 5.5 meters. Since crocodiles are sexually dimorphic, males tend to be on the bigger end of the size estimates while females sit at the lower end.

The average size for saltwater crocodiles ranges from 3 to 6 meters long. Males tend to reach 4.3 - 4.9 meters while females 2.7 - 3.4 meters.

The largest Nile crocodile was measured at 6.45 meters while the largest saltwater crocodiles can exceed 6.5 meters and even reach 7 meters.

(a Nile crocodile[1])

Quelles sont les différences entre un guépard, un léopard et un jaguar ?

Éric Orthwein · Suivre Formateur/Pédagogue 23 h

De gauche à droite : guépard, jaguar, léopard

Habitat

Le guépard vit en Afrique dans les steppes, savane et bois clairs ; le léopard, en Afrique dans la savane et les forêts, et en Asie Centrale dans les montagnes concernant le léopard des neiges ; le jaguar en Amérique du Sud et en Amérique Centrale dans les forêts tropicales, les forêts denses et humides.

Caractéristiques diverses

S'ils font partie des grands félins, le plus mal loti des trois est le guépard.

Le guépard

S'il ressemble morphologiquement au lévrier, c'est que le guépard est taillé pour le sprint, mais pas pour l'endurance. Avec des pointes à plus de 100 km/h (jusqu'à 115), il chasse surtout du petit gibier : gazelles, antilopes, springboks, impalas, lièvres, pintades, parfois des gnous mais c'est rare, et sa vitesse ne lui garantit pas obligatoirement de fréquentes réussites. Au demeurant, il se fait souvent chiper ses proies par d'autres prédateurs (hyènes, lions, groupe de lycaons).

Le mâle atteint au garrot 80 à 95 cm pour une taille de 1,30 à 1,50m ; sa queue, véritable balancier, mesure jusqu'à 90 cm ; son poids varie entre 35 et 75 kg.

Malgré sa sveltesse féline, il ne peut grimper aux arbres : le guépard n'a pas les griffes rétractiles, de sorte qu'il s'en sert comme d'un avantage pour gripper le sol à la manière des sprinters et leurs chaussures à crampons. Inconvénient : ses griffes, émoussées, ne sont pas aussi acérées ni aussi longues que celles du léopard et du jaguar aux griffes rétractiles (ni même du lion ou du tigre). Sa mâchoire, comparés aux léopard et jaguar, présente un angle d'ouverture assez restreint, ce qui le pénalise pour attaquer les grosses proies par morsure fatale au cou. On peut ainsi dire qu'il est mal armé, quand le léopard et le jaguar disposent de 20 griffes affûtées comme des couteaux et d'une morsure plus puissante.

C'est le parent pauvre des grands félins : même une hyène peut lui disputer sa proie, auquel le cas le guépard déguerpit car toute blessure en savane est mortelle, et le guépard est fragile, surtout des pattes, fines et longues. S'il venait à se faire blesser sur cet atout (le sprint), il mettrait sa vie en danger, ne pouvant plus chasser. Ainsi évite-t-il toute confrontation. Quant à la femelle, plus petite et moins lourde, elle perd souvent ses portées, tant les lions et les hyènes les tuent à la première occasion, notamment quand elle part à la chasse, laissant ses petits seuls. (Bien que solitaire, le guépard peut s'associer avec un ou deux mâles, sans vivre véritablement en harde, mais cette association multiplie les réussites des chasses).

Même un homme de bonne corpulence ou bien entraîné peut battre un guépard. Mais pas un léopard ou un jaguar…

Le guépard ne peut pas rugir comme les autres félins car il possède une ossification complète de l’os hyoïde (c'est aussi le cas pour le puma) :

Longévité du guépard : 10 à 15 ans (20 ans en captivité)

Le léopard (je vais me restreindre au léopard d'Afrique)

Comme on le voit sur la photo, la robe du léopard est très différente de celle du guépard, mais les différences ne s'arrêtent pas là.

Le léopard d'Afrique est aussi appelé panthère ; il vit surtout dans les arbres, à l'abri du danger. Sa hauteur au garrot varie de 50 à 70 cm, sa taille de 1m à 1,90m, son poids de 60 à 90 kg pour le mâle, et peut courir jusqu'à 65 km/h. La force de sa mâchoire et ses 20 griffes mortelles en font un redoutable prédateur. Il peut grimper aux arbres avec une antilope dans la gueule ou des proies plus lourdes que lui grâces à ses griffes et sa musculature pectorale puissante. Au combat, c'est un teigneux et il est si rapide et leste qu'il peut tenir tête à plus fort que lui, même un lion s'en méfiera.

Ici, nous avons un léopard qui grimpe avec un zèbre dans la gueule (plus lourd que lui) ; autant dire qu'il peut grimper aussi avec un être humain dans sa gueule…

Les petits gibiers mais aussi les gnous et les zèbres sont à son menu, et il se dépêche vite de camoufler ses proies dans les arbres pour éviter de se les faire dérober. Un homme à mains nues n'a aucune chance contre lui : d'un coup de griffe, il l'éventre. Même un hyène ne l'impressionne pas.

Longévité : 12 à 15 ans, (20 à 25 ans en captivité) et il existe aussi des léopards noirs (ou panthère noire) par mélanisme.

La mâchoire du léopard ; l'angle d'ouverture est beaucoup importante que celle du guépard

Le jaguar

Tout comme le guépard et le léopard, le jaguar est un solitaire. D'ailleurs, chez les félins, seuls les lions vivent en harde.

Le jaguar est le félin qui possède la mâchoire la plus puissante et l'angle d'ouverture le plus grand. Si sa robe ressemble fort à celle du léopard, il est néanmoins plus grand et plus puissant. Avec une hauteur au garrot de 68 à 76 cm pour une taille de 1,40 à 1,85m pour le mâle, avec un poids allant de 60 à 100 kg, il peut sprinter jusqu'à 80 km/h.

En forêt, on ne le voit pas, c'est le roi du camouflage, mais lui voit tout. Il n'a aucun prédateur en Amérique du Sud et Centrale. Le jaguar peut aussi être de robe noire (par mélanisme) et son régime alimentaire comporte de grandes comme de petites proies : cervidés, serpents (anacondas), caïmans, singes, poissons (le jaguar aime l'eau, comme le tigre), tapirs, etc., rien ne lui résiste, même la carapace d'une tortue. Là aussi, un homme à mains nues n'a aucune chance contre sa mâchoire et ses 20 griffes. Comme le léopard, c'est un teigneux rapide et leste, pouvant faire des bonds de 6 mètres sans élan et jusqu'à 11 mètres en pleine course.

Le nom "jaguar" vient du mot indien "yaguara," qui signifie "la bête sauvage qui tue sa proie d'un bond."

Longévité : de 12 à 15 ans.

Un jaguar noir

Jaguar brisant le crâne d'un crocodile

Avec un poisson énorme (sorte de poisson-chat)

La mâchoire du jaguar, avec de gros muscles au sommet de sa tête et le long de ses mâchoires, assure une grande efficacité à sa morsure. La force de sa morsure correspond à 7 fois son poids (500kg/cm²).

Mâchoire du jaguar

Grand angle d'ouverture pour le jaguar

En comparaison, la mâchoire du guépard : la différence est nette

Ci-dessous, mâchoire du guépard

Les griffes :

Jaguar

Guépard

Léopard

(Ceci dit, de tous les félins, c'est le tigre qui possède les griffes les plus meurtrières, mesurant jusqu'à 10 cm chacune)

Oui, même le tigre peut grimper aux arbres

Couteau Karambit imitant les griffes du tigre

Le guépard, le léopard et le jaguar ne se frottent aux femelles qu'en période des amours (ou rut). Les femelles donnent des portées de 3 à 5 petits pour le guépard, 1 à 6 pour le léopard et 2 à 4 pour le jaguar.

Bébé guépard

Bébé léopard

Bébé jaguar

Éric O.

Guépard : Fiche descriptive du félin + photos - Instinct animal

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
A very sad day -yesterday!!! (I wonder why this happened)

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Fri

One of the famous cheetah coalitions in Maasai Mara known as Tano Bora or the 'five musketeers' had expelled one member last year. Olpadan or Orpadan, as he was known was living alone and doing well as a lone male.

This morning he met up with the four remaining coalition members now known as Nne Bora, a fight ensued and Olpadan was sadly killed.

A sad end to his story!

The one on the top second left is Olpadan.

Source: Masaai Mara National Reserve

THE LAW OF THE WILD SAYS KILL ONLY WHEN YOU ARE HUNGRY..

Kathy Pennell Author, 12 Young Adult Mysteries, 1 Adult Mystery at Lancaster County, PA (2000–present) 9h

Photographer Michel Denis captured these amazing pictures on safari in Kenya.

He was astounded by what he saw: "These brothers have been living together since they left their mother at about 18 months old, On the morning he saw them, they seemed not to be hungry, walking quickly but stopping sometimes to play together. 'At one point, they met a group of impala who ran away.. But one youngster was not quick enough and the brothers caught it easily'."

Then extraordinary scenes followed; they just walked away without hurting him.

Source: Weird and Wonderful Things

Jo Mburu Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. Sat

A male lion standing with his cub on an elevated rock at Simba Kopjes in the Serengeti. Simba is the Swahili word for lion. Simba Kopjes means "Lion hill". These rock hills were an inspiration for scenes in The Lion King.

Jo Mburu Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. 17h

6.9 meters long MONSTER python found in Indonesia, these snakes have been reported to swallow unlucky children and in 2017 an Indonesian woman age 54 years old was found in the belly of giant python after the swollen snake was captured near where she vanished while tending her vegetable .

The cub looks like he just wants to go back to bed and is still half asleep. □

A Mother's love is the most Unconditional and Purest form of Love.

Kathy Pennell Author, 12 Young Adult Mysteries, 1 Adult Mystery at Lancaster County, PA (2000–present) Sat

Source: Amazing world

Pourquoi les hyènes ne peuvent-elles pas chasser comme les grands félins?/ Why hyenas can't hunt like big cats?

Jerome Cohen, Ami des animaux depuis plus d' 1/2 siècle.Traducteur · 14 févr.
Houlio studying zoology since the age of 6

Les hyènes ne sont pas des grands félins. Par conséquent, leur technique de chasse est différente en raison de leur différence d'anatomie et de morphologie.

Les grands félins, et les chats en général, utilisent leurs pattes et leurs griffes pour attraper leurs proies, ce qui leur permet de les égorger rapidement et de les tuer en quelques minutes.

Un lion solitaire chassant un gnou. Au moins, la fin sera rapide pour l'antilope malchanceuse.

Les hyènes, d'un autre côté, n'ont pas ce luxe. Leurs seules armes pratiques lorsqu'elles chassent de grosses proies sont leurs dents, il leur est donc difficile de saisir la gorge d'un animal en fuite. En conséquence, leur seul choix est de mordre toutes les parties de l'animal possibles, causant des dommages avec leurs puissantes mâchoires, jusqu'à ce que l'animal s'effondre. Cependant, cette technique peut souvent aboutir à ce que l'animal soit dévoré vivant, car les hyènes peuvent dévorer des parties du pauvre animal alors qu'il lutte encore pour survivre.

hyène solitaire chassant un pauvre et malheureux gnou. Malheureusement, il risque de souffrir beaucoup jusqu'à sa mort.

*Notez que ceci concerne principalement les hyènes tachetées, car leurs cousines brunes et rayées s'attaquent rarement aux grandes proies. En général, une seule morsure suffit à tuer les petits animaux.

Questions similaires

Si une hyène peut briser la patte d'un lion en une seule morsure, pourquoi ne tuent-elles pas plus souvent les lions, d'autant qu'elles vivent en clans gigantesques ?

Pourquoi les lions tuent-ils les hyènes sans les manger ?

Si vous deviez être enfermé dans une pièce avec un ours, un alligator ou une hyène pendant une heure, lequel choisiriez-vous ?

Si un ligre a été élevé par des lions dans la nature, pourrait-il être un membre prospère d'une troupe de lions ?

Pourquoi les lions mâles ne chassent-ils pas étant donné qu'ils sont plus grands et plus forts que les lionnes ?

Qui est le prédateur supérieur entre un lion et un tigre ?
Peut-on avoir une hyène comme animal de compagnie ?

Est-il possible de créer un lien avec un lion ou un tigre, et de le domestiquer jusqu’à un certain point ?

Pourquoi trouve-t-on des tigres dans les forêts mais pas des lions ? Quelle est la source de l'aversion du lion pour les zones fortement boisées et de sa préférence pour les zones ouvertes ?

Pourquoi les orques (appelées aussi épaulards) ne confondent-elles pas les humains avec les phoques ? Et pourquoi ne nous attaquent-elles pas comme le font les requins ?

Quels sont les prédateurs des hyènes ?

Quels sont les exemples d'animaux qui sauvent délibérément d'autres animaux et/ou des personnes dans la nature ?

Est-ce qu'une lionne peut développer une crinière ?
Les tigres peuvent-ils être domestiqués au point de ne pas s'attaquer aux humains ?
Qui est le prédateur du lion ?

Would you rather be chased by a hippo, a lion, or a tiger? With which among these would you have the highest survival chance?

Alex Cooper · Follow 1y

Originally Answered: Would you be rather chased by hippo, lion, or tiger? Which among these has the highest survival chance?

Well it’s an easy choice, although still not a particularly pleasant one, because highest survival chance doesn’t mean good survival chance.

It wouldn’t even be worth attempting to run away from either of the big cats.

Lions can apparently run at speeds of up to 50mph (80 km/h), and tigers are slightly below that, but still in a completely different league to any human.

This is about 95% more exertion than necessary.

Running away would be the last thing you'd want to do, anyway, because it would mark you out as prey. Your best bet* would be bluffing and trying to look threatening, while standing your ground and hoping the cat doesn't realise you're made of delicious meat.

Well, your best bet would be not being alone, unarmed (I assume) and on foot in the presence of a large feline.*

Easier said than done…

So I guess I'm taking my chances with the hippo:

Wait, I just want to tell you about my multi-level marketing strategy.

Great.

I think most of us have seen this meme-worthy picture, and it's actually real. Luckily the guy, who was a game warden I believe, managed to outrun the hippo.

Their top speed is around 19 mph (30 km/h), so slower than the fastest humans, but, err, comfortably quicker than me. Watch the video halfway down this page if you want to see one in action. It's got a pretty good head of steam for such a big unit… How Fast Can a Hippo Run? Probably Faster Than You!

I'd just have to hope I ran into a slightly unmotivated and sluggish hippo. In other words, my rotund, marginally grumpier spirit animal.

Because this would not be an enjoyable way to go:

Related Links

Which animal would win in a fight between a rhino and a hippo?

Is a full grown hippo so big and bad that it can casually walk up to a group of lions or tigers, look at each one and just sit right in the middle of them without them even attempting to attack it?

If you put a gorilla, tiger, bear, lion, and a hippo in a room, who would win?
A polar bear, a rhino, and a hippo all walk into a room together. Who walks out alive?

I'm drunk and I've jumped into a pond with a male hippopotamus with the intentions of killing it with my bare hands. How do I do it?

Why do crocodiles not attack hippos?

Who would win if a bear, an elephant, a gorilla, a hippo, a lion, a rhino, and a tiger fought each other in a round-robin tournament?

Which animal is more dangerous: a lion or a tiger?
Can a man be friendly with a wild hippo?
Who would win in a fight, a grizzly bear or a hippo?

How do goats climb sheer cliffs?

Vasily Najdenko · Follow Apr 13

Mountain goats are without a doubt the best climbers in the world. They are not afraid of steep slopes, colossal heights. These animals in a few jumps overcome tens of meters of vertical arrays, while feeling absolutely safe. And it's safe here because most predators don't get here.

Of course, goats climbing to a height of 1-2 km also have enemies. Goats are dragged by eagles, kites and vultures every now and then. But to repeat such tricks is beyond the power of other terrestrial predators.

Thus, nature took care of the horned inhabitants of the mountains of Asia, Europe and Africa. But to jump on centimeter ledges, you need to have a special body structure. Therefore, mountain goats have a completely unusual hoof arrangement.

They are forked. Each "finger" is a narrow independent part of the hoof. The top of the sole is solid, and the bottom looks like a flexible pad. It takes the form of stones, other surfaces, as if sticking to them. The pads never get rough, because they are renewed throughout life.

The animals have a special method of movement. If it is not possible to gain a foothold on the rock, the goats continue to jump until they take a stable position. Of course, such dexterity comes with months of training. The first ascents of the goats begin to make in infancy. Gradually their muscles get stronger, and in adulthood they can run away from predators right down the slopes at a decent speed.

Mountain goats feed on grass growing right in the clefts of rocks. At this time, they steadily rest their 4 feet on the ledges, even if it seems that they are not there.

The horned also rest right on the tops of the mountains, with their legs tucked under them. The goats simply need rest, as they move considerable distances during the day to eat properly. After all, there is very sparse vegetation in the rocks, and descending to the ground is fraught with a meeting with a wolf or a snow leopard.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
The Harpy Eagle .

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Apr 13

The harpy eagle is most commonly found in Brazil , but can also be found throughout Central America and various parts of South America . They have a 7-foot wingspan and speed up to 50 miles an hour , the harpy eagle is an apex predator in the wild.

The majestic Harpy Eagle and her chick .

They have the ability to see 220 meters away and can chase their food at 50 miles per hour when attacked . They mainly keep a diet of monkeys such as howler monkeys , spider monkeys and other tree dwellers .

Photo source. Wendy Windus , Pinterest .

Dima Ma BS Engineering, University of Maryland, College Park (1997)
Answered Feb 12
Tiger is out. Tiger is a solitary hunter that doesn't rely on buddies. He is used to taking down prey 1 on 1 and would probably ambush me on top. Tigers are also bigger and stronger than lions. There are different tigers but we will assume big and bad Siberian Tiger.

So it's hippo vs lion for me. I am assuming wide open spaces otherwise I can just climb something. I am no climber but better than a hippo.

I want to pick hippo with my heart because it's not a predator and maybe doesn't have that killer instinct but with my brain I am picking a lion.

Hippo will catch up to me eventually. The only chance if hippo gives up the chase. I am in decent shape and not the slowest but hippo is faster.

Hippos can maintain top speed for under a minute. If there some hills I might do better. But I will be scared shitless and probably will not be well composed. If hippo catches me he will kill me 100%.

shutterstock.com · 543519421

Unlike hippos and tigers most lions are afraid of humans and rarely hunt solitary.

The key is not to run. It will be very hard. But lion will most likely give up if I stand firm. They don’t generally see is as food and rarely hunt alone as I mentioned. Throwing anything, yelling and even charging might deter it enough. 90% chance that it will a mock charge or no charge at all. If lion still attacks, yes it sucks but most encounters humans did fight off the lion and only in a very few cases lions actually killed someone.

Related Answer

Would you be rather chased by hippo, lion, or tiger? Which among these has the highest survival chance?

Phil Lang, Software Engineer (2006-present) Answered Jul 25, 2020

Originally Answered: Would you be rather chased by hippo, lion, or tiger? Which among these has the highest survival chance?

The hippo, for several reasons.

The hippo is the slowest of the three. They're still pretty fast mind you, but of the three they're the only one that it is humanly possible to outrun. Hippos gallop at about 30 kph where as tigers go comfortably 50+ and lions have been clocked around 80 on occasion. To put those numbers in perspective, usain bolt runs just shy of 45 kph. Now, do I think I can run at 2/3 speed of one of the best sprinters in human history? Probably not! But the chances are higher than running almost twice as fast as him. Maybe its a particularly slow hippo, who knows, not all animals of a species are made the same. A 'bad runner' hippo increases your chances, a 'bad runner' big cat is still way faster than you because very slow cats starve.

In case of terrain features like steep climbs, rock faces, trees etc your chances against the hippo increase tremendously. conversely, these terrain features decrease your changes against the cats even more (which is an academic distinction because they catch you either way but you know, worse is technically still worse).

The hippo doesn't see you as prey. If you can evade it until it no longer thinks you are a threat, it will let you go. The big cats will have their instincts triggered and they won't stop until they have you, even if they were acting in defense instead of hunger to begin with.

So, while I recognise that I'm most likely screwed either way, my chances would be objectively better against the hippo.

Related Links

Which animal would win in a fight between a rhino and a hippo?

Is a full grown hippo so big and bad that it can casually walk up to a group of lions or tigers, look at each one and just sit right in the middle of them without them even attempting to attack it?

If you put a gorilla, tiger, bear, lion, and a hippo in a room, who would win?
A polar bear, a rhino, and a hippo all walk into a room together. Who walks out alive?

I'm drunk and I've jumped into a pond with a male hippopotamus with the intentions of killing it with my bare hands. How do I do it?

Why do crocodiles not attack hippos?

Who would win if a bear, an elephant, a gorilla, a hippo, a lion, a rhino, and a tiger fought each other in a round-robin tournament?

Which animal is more dangerous: a lion or a tiger?
Can a man be friendly with a wild hippo?
Who would win in a fight, a grizzly bear or a hippo?

What will happen if we introduce tigers in Africa?

Robin Shepard Horse Trainer for 20+ years1y

Originally Answered: What would happen if you put a tiger in Africa?

It would thrive.

Africa’s a big place. With many different biomes and habitat types. Tigers already survive in places like snowy mountains, desert plateaus, dense forests, humid jungles, open grasslands and quite a lot in between.

Despite the fact that the tiger's striped camouflage performs best in jungles and forests, the woodlands and savannas of much of Africa would not stop this adept apex predator from hunting successfully.

Since most prey species do not see a full range of colors, but more silhouettes and movement, the tiger's hunting strategy actually works reasonably well in a surprisingly wide range of habitats.

Chasing prey out in open grasslands, though, could pose a problem for this cat that is more bulk muscle than lean speed. With most hunts never reaching 'cheetah speeds,' many African predators never need to run faster than around 30 mph. Leopards in fact, do quite well in all of Africa, with a similar strategy of stalking and pouncing, using smarts and power, instead of sheer speed. A game plan that Panthera tigris can definitely "get it's teeth around."

In fact, the whole experiment has already been done.

Two projects, both challenged by ethical and/or financial issues, have released a number of tigers into protected reserves in South Africa.

The Laohu Valley Reserve project was created in 2002 by a conservation group called Save China's Tigers (SCT). The intent was to nurture and re-wild captive-born South China tigers (Panthera tigris amoyensis)[1] in South Africa and eventually release them into protected natural habitat in China. This tiger subspecies is listed as Critically Endangered and effectively extinct in the wild. Only about 100 individuals are left in the world, all living in zoos or small protected reserves, and all descended from just 6 wild-caught individuals.[2][3]

The SCT project has proven that captive-born tigers can easily learn to survive and hunt wild African prey species, and a number of purebred South China tiger cubs have been born to this successful group. A third generation of cubs is now underway. The Laohu Reserve is now home to almost a full 20% of surviving South China tigers.

Creating this ex-situ conservation breeding group of tigers outside China, has added to the security of the species in the wild, while at the same time, has helped to restore a natural biome to a section of South Africa that had been decimated by intensive sheep farming years earlier.

Tiger Canyon, also in South Africa, is another fenced reserve, and home to a group of hunting and breeding tigers. However, because these tigers are un-endangered hybrids, including inbred white tigers, it has no true species conservation value.

Acquired through dubious financial means, the projects' ethics are further controversial, since the reserve was created solely for the purpose of making the film "Living with Tigers," on the Discovery Channel. Though the founder of the reserve was almost killed by one of these tigers in 2012,[4] the reserve is now run as a privately-owned, for-profit safari lodge.

Despite the controversial conservation value of Tiger Canyon, it has helped the Laohu Valley Reserve to prove tigers can easily survive in Africa.

Conflict with native African wildlife and predators could potentially pose problems for any tigers allowed outside these protected reserves, but tigers in places like India and Siberia have proven they are adept at dealing with other large carnivores just fine. It might take a bit of adaptation, but tigers are no slouches when it comes to asserting themselves and thriving, whenever given the space and protection to do so.

[Image Credits: Nitish Madan, BY-SA, Tiger Canyon]

Footnotes

[1] South China tiger - Wikipedia
[2] South China Tiger
[3] https://blog.theaga.org/tigers/#:~:text=Now%2C%20the%20144%20living%20South,diversity%20and%20decrease%20inbreeding%20depression.
[4] John Varty - Wikipedia

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

The King cheetah, One of the Rarest Animals in the World

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Mar 12

Due to its uncommon markings, the King cheetah was once considered a different species, but it is actually the exact same as the African cheetah, except for its mutated fur pattern which is caused by a recessive gene. King cheetahs are identified by their distinctive blotchy spots and stripes that look a bit messier than “traditional” cheetahs, and the thick dark bands around the tail and mane. Compared to a normal African cheetah, they have much thicker fur, closer to that of a snow leopard.

It is estimated that the number of King cheetahs in the wild is less than 10, and 60 in total, including those in captivity and wildlife reserves. As the gene is recessive, it is tough for King cheetahs to reproduce more of their own. Both parents must be carriers of the recessive allele for a King cheetah cub to be born - hence their rarity.

(In bottom pic: Right-side is a King cheetah)

Source: Earth Unreal

ANIMAL KINGDOM

Do green anacondas eat alligators?

Samuel Perloff Around 20 years experience as a bird and nature watcher Updated Apr 10

Green anacondas don't live in the wild with alligators but do coexist with caimans, which are also alligatorids. As for caimans, yes several species are viable prey for green anacondas. Anacondas after all are likely the heaviest snake alive today with weighs of up to 150–360 lb and lengths of up to 17–20 ft, with prey solid evidence but scientifically unverified of anacondas of up to around 25 feet and possible weights of up to 400–500 lb (claims of anacondas well over 30 feet are the snake version of dubious big fish stories). Therefore anacondas can get much bigger than most species of caiman. Small anacondas can still fall prey to modest sized caiman species on occasion though.

One species of caiman likely too large and formidable to fall prey to green anacondas is the black caiman, likely the largest of all living alligatorids, just besting the American alligator. These caimans can get certainly over 15 feet and possibly up to 20 feet with corresponding estimated weights of around 1300 and 2400 lb, respectively, Black caimans are the largest predators to exist in the Amazon Basin. In fact, green anacondas may be one of the many prey species for black caimans, along with jaguars, giant otters and many more.

A black caiman seen with its anaconda prey.

Thomas Dal-Molin

Modèle photo (2010–aujourd'hui)Traducteur · Mis à jour le 2 ans

P. Phan
J.D. de University of California, Hastings College of the Law (Diplôme obtenu en 2001)
Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de P. Phan dans Quora en anglais :
Can an alligator mate with a crocodile?

Un alligator peut-il se reproduire avec un crocodile ?

Réponse originale : Un crocodile et un alligator peuvent-ils procréer ensemble ?
Trop distant. Les crocodiles et les alligators ne sont même pas de la même famille. Ces deux-là ne feraient pas un bon couple dans Game of Thrones.

Hiérarchie de classification (Source)

Dans le tableau ci-dessus, il est préférable que le couple reproducteur soit plus proche de la même espèce.

Le ligre (Source)

Les lions et les tigres peuvent se reproduire (Oh mon Dieu !). Ces deux espèces parents partagent le même genre. Le résultat est un ligre, qui est une progéniture viable et aimée par beaucoup. On ne peut pas voir quelque chose comme ça entre crocodiles et alligators.

Ces animaux sont du même Ordre, mais de Familles différentes. La plupart des crocodiles sont des reptiles d'eau salée, tandis que les alligators sont des reptiles d'eau douce. Nous pouvons avoir des hybrides au sein de chaque famille, mais pas entre les familles. Par conséquent, combiner un crocodile américain avec un crocodile cubain :

C'est l'égal de ça :

En d’autres termes, nous pouvons hybrider différents types de crocodiles. [1] Il s’agit alors d’un hybride cubano-américain (Source).

Gardez-le dans la famille

Qu’est-ce qui est le plus important pour Tywin Lannister dans Game of Thrones ? La famille. Quand il s’agit de relations reptiliennes illicites, rien de mieux que de les garder dans la famille.

Footnotes :

[1] Hybrid Cuban-American Crocodiles on the Rise.

Un alligator peut-il se reproduire avec un crocodile?/ Can an alligator mate with a crocodile?

Thomas Dal-Molin Modèle photo (2010–aujourd'hui) Traducteur · Mis à jour le 2 ans

P. Phan J.D. de University of California, Hastings College of the Law (Diplôme obtenu en 2001)

Réponse originale : Un crocodile et un alligator peuvent-ils procréer ensemble?

Trop distant. Les crocodiles et les alligators ne sont même pas de la même famille. Ces deux-là ne feraient pas un bon couple dans Game of Thrones.

Hiérarchie de classification (Source)

Dans le tableau ci-dessus, il est préférable que le couple reproducteur soit plus proche de la même espèce.

Le ligre (Source)

Les lions et les tigres peuvent se reproduire (Oh mon Dieu !). Ces deux espèces parents partagent le même genre. Le résultat est un ligre, qui est une progéniture viable et aimée par beaucoup. On ne peut pas voir quelque chose comme ça entre crocodiles et alligators.

Ces animaux sont du même Ordre, mais de Familles différentes. La plupart des crocodiles sont des reptiles d'eau salée, tandis que les alligators sont des reptiles d'eau douce. Nous pouvons avoir des hybrides au sein de chaque famille, mais pas entre les familles. Par conséquent, combiner un crocodile américain avec un crocodile cubain :

C'est l'égal de ça :

En d’autres termes, nous pouvons hybrider différents types de crocodiles. [1] Il s’agit alors d’un hybride cubano-américain (Source).

Gardez-le dans la famille

Qu’est-ce qui est le plus important pour Tywin Lannister dans Game of Thrones ? La famille. Quand il s’agit de relations reptiliennes illicites, rien de mieux que de les garder dans la famille.

Comme tous les félins (y compris le chat domestique), la langue du tigre est recouverte de nombreuses petites excroissances en forme de crochet appelées papilles, qui pointent vers l'arrière de la bouche, et forment une surface rugueuse remplie de milliers de petites dents qui ont la sensation d'une brosse à cheveux – elles ressemblent en quelque sorte à des poils, car elles sont faites de kératine, la même protéine que l'on trouve dans les ongles humains.

Dotée de ces papilles, la langue sert de brosse pour séparer la chair de la fourrure et des os (au point de l'arracher d'un animal mort !), en particulier lorsque le tigre est en train de dévorer une énorme proie (cerf, buffle, sanglier, etc.). Ce faisant, le fauve consomme entièrement la peau de son repas, et s'assure qu'il n'avale jamais (même accidentellement !) de petits os pointus qui pourraient lui trancher la gorge, et que la viande est attendrie, ce qui la rend plus efficacement digestible.

Et ce n’est pas tout : régulièrement, le tigre se sert des papilles de sa langue comme brosse pour enlever la saleté et le sang de son pelage – notamment lorsqu’il se lèche les pattes (voir ci-dessus), la poitrine et autres parties du corps –, qu’il s’agisse du propre pelage d’un individu ou de celui de ses petits (voir ci-dessous).

Footnotes :
[1] Hybrid Cuban-American Crocodiles on the Rise.

Réponse similaire
Pourquoi un alligator ne peut-il pas mordre et couper en deux un gros python?/ Why can't an alligator bite a large python in half?

Jerome Cohen, Un ami des animaux depuis toujours, de toutes espèces.
Traducteur · Traduit le 21 déc. 2019

Scott Rivers Wildlife Relocator; lived in South Florida 50 years.

Vous avez dû voir cette photo ou une autre qui lui ressemble :

Les dents d'un alligator sont faites pour saisir, pas pour couper. Elles n'ont pas de bords tranchants comme ceux d'un requin, elles sont plutôt comme des clous, faites pour perforer et tenir. L'alligator ne mâche pas sa nourriture, il l'avale entière, si elle est assez petite, ou la déchire en morceaux en secouant la tête et les avale. Si elle capture un gros animal, elle le submerge et le cache jusqu'à ce qu'il pourrisse suffisamment pour le déchirer en morceaux en secouant la tête.

David Scott

Pocho. Le crocodile du Costa Rica

Réponse similaire
Qui est le prédateur supérieur entre un lion et un tigre ?

Ross Wind Répondu 5 mars 2020

LE LION EST LE PRÉDATEUR DOMINANT SUR TERRE.

À titre individuel, le lion possède le plus important rapport de poids entre prédateur et proie sur terre. Le national Geographic du 15 mars 2011 disait que le lion mâle est un chasseur de gros gibiers et que seuls les lions sont assez puissants pour tuer des éléphants. En 2012, cette même revue disait "aucun animal n'est à l'abri du lion". De plus, les lions font beaucoup plus usage de force musculaire à la chasse et de courage que les autres félins.

Les lions sont instinctivement attirés par le gros gibier et prennent de plus grands risques. Le lion est l'unique prédateur de l'éléphant, de l'hippopotame, du rhinocéros et de la girafe. Il chasse le terrible buffle du cap le bovin le plus agressif de la planet, l'éland de Derby qui peut atteindre 1000 kg et d'autres animaux de moyenne taille. Pour un lion ou une lionne, un animal de taille moyenne adulte est plus pesant que lui. Il lui arrive de tuer d'animaux aux poids moins importants si l'occasion se présente.

C'est en anglais, mais les images parlent d'elles-mêmes. Eh oui, les lions mâles chassent aussi.

Seuls les lions font volontairement des attaques frontales sur de grands et dangereux animaux. Vous ne verrez jamais un tigre faire cela volontairement.

Aussi incroyable que cela puisse l'être, on voit des traces d'attaque frontale de lions sur ces deux rhinocéros.

Comme si ce n'était pas assez, encore plus extraordinaires, c'est de voir un lion faire face vaillamment à un troupeau de buffles qui plus est, sont les plus agressifs bovins sur terre! Ci-dessus, nous voyons un lion mâle adulte, un jeune lion mâle et une lionne refusant d'abandonner leur proie fraichement abattue. Aucun autre prédateur sur terre ne fait cela, seulement le roi des animaux, le lion.

E0064 FEARLESS LIONS. Lions are by far the highest risk takers. No tiger, bear or other predator would do this, only lions.

A fearless male lion doesn't want to let go its kill.

A fearless young male lion doesn't want to leave freshly killed buffalo.

This fearless lioness killed alone a big buffalo. But now, as to face the herd. For lions facing danger is simply a routine…

L'étude du parc Kruger de 2013 a démontré que la lionne qui chasse seule dans son environnement et le mâle qui chasse seul dans son environnement ont le même taux de succès. Oui, vous avez bien lu, ils chassent seuls, car l'étude démontre que les lions chassent en groupe que 48% du temps. Le reste du temps, ils chassent en duo ou seuls. L'étude indique que les mâles dominants sont avec leur groupe que 13% du temps!

Une Étude de la BBC EARTH sur le taux de succès de chasse des prédateurs indique que, le lion mâle individuel et la lionne individuelle chacun dans leurs environnements de chasse est supérieur au tigre.

Donc, d'après cette étude, un lion seul et une lionne seule, non seulement possède le plus important rapport de poids entre prédateur et proie sur terre, mais également un meilleur taux de succès de chasse que celui du tigre.

Apex predators in the wild: which mammals are the most dangerous?

AU COMBAT, LE LION EST ÉGALEMENT SUPÉRIEUR AU TIGRE

C'est dans la nature du lion de se battre. Au cours de leurs vies jeunes et adultes, lions mâles et lionnes auront beaucoup plus de combats que les tigres qui eux cherchent à les éviter le plus possible. Aussi, tous les lions sauvages dès leurs jeunes âges accumuleront une multitude de traces de combats entre félins, avec les hyènes et avec les buffles. Aucun autre prédateur n'est plus souvent blessé que les lions. Les lions, surtout les mâles sont faits pour combattre.

La majorité des dresseurs de fauves qui ont travaillé avec ces deux grands félins ensemble dans une cage vous diront que le lion est plus fort et bien meilleur batailleur que le tigre. À titre d'exemple, dans des interviews, le dresseur Dave Hoover qui préférait travailler avec les tigres moins problématiques que le lion mâle une brute têtue avoua que ces derniers ont cassé le cou à plusieurs de ces tigres et il ajouta dans un combat loyal : « Le lion l'emportera sur le tigre à 99% ». Même déclaration de Clyde Beatty qui a dressé plus de 2000 lions et tigres dans sa longue carrière de 40 ans : « Grâce à sa force supérieure et de meilleures habilitées au combat, 9 fois sur 10 le lion sera le vainqueur. Il ajouta : « le lion frappe plus fort que le tigre. » Il n'a donc pas besoin de donner un plus grand nombre de coups.

Dans une bataille d'un lion avec un tigre, l'article du journal dit que 99 fois sur 100 le lion sera victorieux.

Ici 9 fois sur 10 le lion sera victorieux

Une photo montre le début d'un combat face à face entre un lion et un tigre. Deux minutes après, le lion tua le tigre.

En 2008, un lion mâle de seulement 20 kg plus lourds tua une tigresse de Sibérie. Une mort par morsure à la gorge est très visible.

En fin 2018 ou début 2019, la television sud-coréenne annonça qu'un jeune lion tua un tigre de Sibérie adulte. Pas de trace de sang, ce lion vraisemblablement cassa le cou de ce tigre.

Dans des interviews, les ex-employés du parc Everland de la Corée du Sud ont déclaré que les lions sont plus musclés, frappent plus fort et dominaient les tigres. Pendant plus de 30 ans, lions et tigres vivaient ensemble dans ce parc et en Chine, le zoo Xi'an faisait de même. Fatigué de voir le tigre qui traditionnellement est leur animal emblématique, se faire constamment malmener par les lions. Ces deux parcs zoologiques ont décidé de séparer les deux espèces.

Il était de pratique courante dans ces deux parcs zoologiques, de voir des tigres en position de soumission devant à un lion mâle et même parfois à l'endroit d'une lionne. Le premier exemple vient du parc Everland l'autre de Xi'an.

Si vous lisez l'anglais, les témoignages d'experts sont plus que concluants.

https://www.quora.com/Who-will-win-a-fight-between-a-tiger-and-a-lion/answers/151700865

Il n'est donc pas étonnant qu'il existe de nombreux artefacts de combat lion/tigre qui montrent le lion vainqueur.

La supériorité du lion est encore plus manifeste lorsqu'on le représente combattant deux tigres à la fois.

Everland. Un lion contre 3 tigres
Everland. Un vieux lion contre 2 tigres.
Xi'an. Un seul coup de patte du lion et le tigre se retrouve à terre.
Quelle est la chose qui ressemble à un tigre ?

Quelle est la chose qui ressemble à un tigre?/ What is a thing that looks like a tiger?

Jerome Cohen, Un ami des animaux depuis toujours, de toutes espèces.
Traducteur · Traduit le 24 oct. 2020

Celui-ci ressemble un peu à un tigre.

Ceux-ci ressemblent encore plus à des tigres grâce à leurs taches.

Quant à un animal qui ressemble un peu à un tigre, mais qui n'est pas un félin :

Questions similaires

Pourquoi un léopard et un lion ne peuvent-ils pas se reproduire puisqu'ils appartiennent au même genre ?

Si un alligator décide de me poursuivre, à quelle vitesse peut-il le faire ?
Quelle est la différence entre un alligator et un crocodile ?

Pourquoi les éléphants ne sont-ils pas mangés par les lions et les crocodiles ?
Un tigre est-il plus fort qu'un crocodile ?

Qu'est-ce que les crocodiles ne peuvent pas manger ?
Quels sont les animaux qu’un crocodile ne peut se permettre d’attaquer ?

Quel est le prédateur du crocodile ?
Comment savoir si un crocodile est sans danger ?

Un chien peut-il se battre à arme égal avec un lion, un tigre ou un jaguar dans un combat e

Les Maghrébins sont-ils des Arabes ?
Sylvain Victor Nahum · Follow Former Actuellement::Président du Grand OPÉRA de la PAIX 5h

Les maghrébins ne sont pas tous des Arabes! Avant l'invasion Arabes, de toute l'Afrique du Nord y compris l'Espagne et une partie du Sud dr la France en Tunisie, existait, des phéniciens, des Autres civilisations propre à la Tunisie , comme en Algérie les Kabyles, idem au Maroc Hamadi Africain 11 avr.

Je suis né en Tunisie, donc maghrébin. Si je contemple mon arbre généalogique, je suis probablement un peu arabe. Par contre ce que je sais c'est que je suis certainement berbère, piémontais, provençal, catalan, andalous, turc et… bornéen.
Je suis citoyen tunisien et néerlandais, mais j'ai choisi de vivre en France. J'ai de la famille en Tunisie, en France, en Suède, en Allemagne, aux USA. Mes enfants sont américains. Mes amis de jeunesse sont marocains, mauritaniens, sénégalais, algériens. Je parle 7 langues dont 4 que j'utilise professionnellement.

Beaucoup de tunisiens se disent arabes. Moi non, car "arabe" est tellement réducteur, quand on naît dans un pays qui a été au carrefour des civilisation pendant des milliers d'années.

La civilisation arabe a été une des plus brillantes dans l'histoire. Mais ça, c'est de l'histoire. Aujourd'hui la liberté, la démocratie, l'art, l'épanouissement, la solidarité … ne sont pas arabes. Je préfère regarder vers l'Europe. Car même quand les actes des dirigeants européens sont condamnables, ce que représente l'Europe sur le plan civilisationnel reste.

Quelles sont les plus mystérieuses photos de l'histoire? What are the most mysterious photos in history?

Guillaume Bonnet

Toushif Rahman · Follow Une passion artistiqueTranslator 3y Marketing director at Freedom Strike (2019–present) This answer may not be an exact translation of Toushif Rahman

Voici quelques photos que j'ai trouvées mystérieuses, suscepibles de vous choquer.

Cette photo a été prise en 1941 lors de la réouverture du pont de South Forks au Canada. A première vue, elle ressemble à n'importe quelle autre image de cette période. Mais si vous vérifiez les détails, quelque chose ne va pas. Il semble y avoir un homme vêtu de vêtements modernes parmi les chapeaux et les vestes de costume des années 1940. Il semble aussi tenir un appareil photo moderne, porter des lunettes bizarres et arborer un logo qui ne correspond pas tout à fait à l'époque.

En 1964, le photographe français Robert Serrec a repéré et pris une photo rapide de ce qui ressemble à une créature géante ressemblant à un serpent qui repose sur le fond marin au large des côtes du Queensland, en Australie. Bien que certains aient avancé l'idée qu'il s'agit d'une bâche géante, aucune explication crédible n'a jamais été trouvée pour cette photo bizarre.

Depuis les années 1940, un étrange phénomène lumineux a été observé dans la vallée de Hessdalen, en Norvège. Le spectacle a une forme de lumière blanche ou jaune d'origine inconnue se tenant ou flottant au niveau du sol. Entre 1981 et 1984, les lumières ont été observées jusqu'à 20 fois par semaine, mais leur fréquence a considérablement diminué depuis, n'apparaissant qu'environ 10 à 20 fois par an. Malgré les recherches en cours et de nombreuses hypothèses, il n'y a pas encore d'explication convaincante.

En 2000, deux photographies d'un " singe skonke " ont été prises par une femme anonyme et envoyées par la poste au bureau du shérif du Comté de Sarasota, en Floride. Les photos étaient accompagnées d'une lettre de la femme dans laquelle elle affirme avoir photographié un singe dans son arrière-cour. Les gens prétendent que c'est un ours noir, mais il n'a pas la même allure.

Comme la plupart des familles, les Cooper ont emménagé dans leur nouvelle maison au Texas et voulaient prendre une photo de la famille assise, ensemble. Cependant, lorsque la photo a été prise, un corps semble tomber du plafond. Comme aucune explication plausible n'a été apportée par la suite, il y a beaucoup de spéculations sur ce qui c’est passé.

C'est l'une des images inexpliquées les plus célèbres de tous les temps. Alors que l'image est centrée sur Marie, quelque chose d'effrayant plane au-dessus de son épaule gauche. Il y a un objet qui semble être une sorte d'OVNI planant au-dessus des falaises. Juste en dessous, on peut voir un homme et son chien qui regardent la soucoupe.

Le 13 mars 1997, une série de lumières brillantes et non identifiées sont apparues au-dessus de la ville de Phoenix, en Arizona. Elles sont restées complètement stationnaires pendant des heures. L'armée de l'air a dit que les lumières étaient des fusées éclairantes lâchées pour un exercice d'entraînement. Cependant, les lumières sont réapparues sur Phoenix en 2007 et 2008. Elles n'ont toujours pas été expliquées.

Il y aurait un objet ancien et sombre qui orbite autour de la Terre depuis 13 000 ans et qui s'appelle le "Satellite du Chevalier Noir". Personne ne sait comment il est arrivé là, son but, ni même qui a commencé à l'appeler le "Chevalier Noir". La photo ci-dessus a été prise lors d'une mission de la navette spatiale américaine vers la Station spatiale internationale en 1998.

Quelles sont vos photos préférées de la reine Elizabeth II avec le prince Philip ?

Philippe Jaran · Follow Lives in France 1y

Ma préférée n'est pas avec la Reine Elizabeth II, mais avec celle qui est encore la Princesse Elizabeth… charmant son prince :

Deux autres photos de la même époque :

Le mariage arrive.

La famille s'agrandit avec Charles puis Anne (puis viendront Andrew et Edward).

Ils suivent un match de cricket.

Partenaires de danse pour la vie, à Balmoral en 1972.

Les nombreux sourires et rires complices au fil des années.

La reine Elizabeth II et le prince Philip fêtent leur 73e anniversaire de mariage le 20 novembre 2020 devant une carte faite par leurs arrière-petits-enfants de sept, cinq et deux ans.

Quelle complicité !

Questions similaires

Quelles sont les photos non-retouchées les plus terrifiantes de tous les temps ?
Quelles sont les photos les plus terrifiantes réalisées sans trucage ?
Quelles sont les photos les plus chaudes de Virginie Efira ?
Quelles sont les photos historiques méconnues ?
Quels sont les plus gros canulars de l'histoire ?
Quelles sont les photos les plus effrayantes ?
Quelles sont les photos les plus touchantes jamais prises ?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Birthday kisses for Mbegu!

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Apr 9

This once tiny elephant is celebrating her eighth birthday today. Here is a throwback picture of her in her infancy. This big-eared beauty has grown so much since then and now sports growing tusks and leads the dependent herd at our Voi Reintegration Unit! Take a look at our stories to see her incredible transformation or visit: https://www.sheldrickwildlifetrust.org/orphans/mbegu

We rescued Mbegu as a tragic victim of human-wildlife conflict back in 2014. She was just a terrified baby, covered in bruises and injuries. But despite the violence meted out by humans, she was immediately trusting of her rescuers and our Keepers, like Hassan here, who now helps care for her at Voi. It was a portent to her incredibly loving and nurturing personality, which has bloomed in the years since. Of chief importance to Mbegu, always, is the safety and happiness of her family: When she saw Tamiyoi and Tagwa lying down one day, she immediately went over to check they were all okay and patted them with her trunk. Once she was satisfied that all was well, she let her friends enjoy their nap in peace.

Are birds of prey afraid to hunt cobras?

Sergio Diniz Animals researcher on spare hours 2y

First, let's analyze this:

Photo: venomous cobra is made in pieces and devoured by eagle (Cobra venenosa é despedaçada ao meio e devorada por águia)

Or this:

Photo: Image result for images of eagle vs cobra fight | Eagle, Birds, Bald eagle

And then this:

Photo: tawny eagles fight over cape cobra Editorial Stock Photo - Stock Image | Shutterstock

So… What was the question? Oh, birds of prey being afraid… I do not think so.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Apr 6

Ecuador has made history by becoming the first country to recognize the legal rights of individual wild animals. The 7-2 ruling is believed to be the first time a court has applied the rights of nature.

Source Global Elephants.

How intelligent are hyenas?

Serge Elia · Follow Animal lover 2y

Contrary to what popular movies like The Lion King may tell you, hyenas are not the mindless eating machines we often misjudge them to be; rather, they are far more intelligent than we think – in fact, when it comes to cooperative problem-solving tests, they're even smarter than chimpanzees!

Sure enough, studies have shown that spotted hyenas (the most famous species) have a complex social behavior, particularly due to their great amount of frontal cortex (the part of the brain that is involved in social behavior). As such, they can lead complex social lives, engage in cooperation when hunting or defending themselves, recognize rank relationships of others, distinguish between every individual's distinctive vocalizations, adapt themselves to new situations, and even innovate…

This easily explains why these magnificent but misunderstood creatures have one of the most successful hunting rates among Africa's predators (up to 74%), and why they can easily outwit neighboring carnivores, including lions!

Journey into the Wild
Is there a village that treats every wild animal like a friend?

Answered by Sascha L · Follow Nov 12

There is this village in India named ‘Bera’ in which humans and leopards have been peacefully coexisting for more than a century. What is deemed impossible by most people is something that these villagers accomplished.
Maybe what is going on in Bera is a needed truth if we want change our ways to live in harmony with the animal world.

A priest in Bera being together with a Leopard

Frequently referred to as "leopard country", Bera contains the highest concentration of the animal on the planet. About 90 of the big cats live here amid the thorny desert scrub, coexisting peacefully with the native Rabaris, a shepherding community who migrated to Rajasthan from Iran through Afghanistan a thousand years ago.

The Rabaris faith is deeply connected to the Leopard

The community's remarkable coexistence with leopards is down to a deep spiritual connection, the locals believe. "The Rabaris treat the beasts as their guardian angels and worship them," says Dilip Singh Deora, who runs Jawai Wild Camp, a safari company in Bera. "When leopards kill the Rabaris' livestock, the community doesn't hold it against the predator. They believe Shiva will increase their cattle manifold and treat the killed livestock as an offering to the lord himself."

News Nigeria

In African culture, the "self" is not separate from the world, it is united and intermingled with the natural and social environment.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Tue

Search Quora
Try Quora+

14
Add question
Create Space

Let’s Discuss Ancient and Medieval Africa

Economics

Wake Up Africa!

Life in Africa

News Nigeria

Mozambique

Scam Safe Haven

Africa in Real Time

NIGERIA.

Mathematics

Writing

Design

Discover Spaces

AboutCareersTermsPrivacyAcceptable UseBusinessesPressYour Ad Choices
From your Digest

Brian van der Spuy

Artist and WriterNov 16

Are there any green snakes in Southern Africa?

Are there any green snakes in Southern Africa?

There are six common species of green snake in southern Africa, plus two more that are not so common. Of these, only two are dangerous: the green mamba and the boomslang.

I found this chart online:

It is from this page:

The Green Snakes of South Africa

An indepth look at the various green snakes found in South Africa. An attempt to dismiss the confusion between the many harmless green snakes and the venomous green snakes found in South Africa.

https://www.tyroneping.co.za/green-snakes-south-africa/where there is plenty of information about the various species.

9.3K views

View 15 upvotes
View 2 shares
15
2

Add Comment

More from your Digest

Study in India
Sponsored
Attain academic success & excellence with Study in India.
Experience holistic education, cultural experiences and opportunities when you say yes to Study in India.
Apply Now

Franklyn Williamson

.
Follow
Read many books about history and anthropologyApr 13

Why is Afro hair so different?

Originally Answered: Why is African hair so different?
The is actually a good question.

Why is African hair so different?

Black Hair

What many people dont know including many African people themselves is that African hair is the original hair of Homo Sapiens. Having African hair is evident that you have a pure African lineage with no admixture from non Homo Sapiens species.

Back in the day White supremacists would say African hair is a sign of being less evolved or having primitive dna in actually facts it the other way around. Science can also prove it. Now I dont know why some multiracial schools have a problem with African hair.

In South Africa there is a hair fashion among some Black youth to not cut or comb their hair. They let it grow naturally and be free.

South African MP of EFF

Some Rastafarians also dont cut their African hair because it makes them more spiritual and be able connect with themselves. African Hair is Beautiful and Spiritual. Hair also carries past memories, memories of our ancestors and ancient past.

White Hair

Neanderthal hair

European hair
751 views
View 3 upvotes
3
13
13 comments from Abdullahi Abdi and more

DigitalOcean
Sponsored
Sysadmin eBook: Making servers work.
Has sysadmin become part of your day to day? This eBook can help you manage all your systems seamlessly.
Learn More

News Nigeria
Posted by

Aniekpeno Ekong

19m

President Buhari attends APC National Executive Committee (NEC) Meeting in State House on 20th April 2022

ALL PROGRESSIVES CONGRESS
11TH MEETING OF THE NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE
DATE: WEDNESDAY 20TH APRIL, 2022
VENUE: CONGRESS HALL, TRANSCORP HILTON, ABUJA, NIGERIA
TIME: 10:00AM

VE COMMITTEE
officialapcng
officialapc.ng

APC NWC 1: President Buhari with L-R: Speaker Femi Gbajabiamila, Senate President Ahmed Lawan, VP Yemi Osinbajo, APC Chairman Senator Abdullahi Adamu, APC Secretary Iyinola Omisore, and others during the APC National Executive Committee (NEC) Meeting in State House on 20th April 2022

1 view

Add Comment

ASPOSE

Aspose
Sponsored
Java OneNote manipulation APIs.
Create, read, edit, convert and manipulate Microsoft OneNote files.
Learn More

Ray Johnson

.
Follow
Studied Geology at The Ohio State University1y

If crocodiles never stop growing, why have we never seen any giant ones?

Well “giant” is kind of relative term, and we have observed some that would fit that definition for many people, such as this guy: Yeah, he’s pretty impressive. But why can’t we have monsters like this?: Actually, we might be better off that those are limited to the Sci Fi Channel. But why? They don’…
(more)
8.1K
47
77

Nadhiya Athaide

.
Follow
Iranian Historian & CuratorMon

What are some common historical misconceptions?

Many have traditionally believed that Iran's clerics were always opposed to the monarchy. Which actually couldn't be farther from the truth. In fact, in the early years of his reign, the Shah was quite friendly with the clerics and vice versa. The Shah relied on the clerics to maintain order, and th…
(more)
447
3
24

Devon Miller

.
Follow
Service Worker at McDonald's (fast food chain)Mar 17

What are the most ferocious animals in relation to size disadvantage?

For me, Guinea hens are absolute monsters that barely reach my knees. Related to chickens but even meaner. They have no problem pecking, kicking, beating with their wings and even flying into your face for a headbutt with that crest. And when something seems wrong, doesn't matter what, they scream l…
(more)
37
3
1

Aspose
Sponsored
Java OneNote manipulation APIs.
Create, read, edit, convert and manipulate Microsoft OneNote files.
Learn More

Black History & Politics
·
Follow
Posted by

Cheryl Brown

Apr 12
Alton Augustus Adams, Sr. (November 4, 1889 – November 23, 1987) is remembered primarily as the first black bandmaster in the United States Navy (beginning 1917). His music was performed by the bands of John Philip Sousa and Edwin Franko Goldman and his march "The Governor's Own" (1921) appears as t…
(more)
335
16
7

Serge Elia

·

Follow
Animal lover6mo

Why can't the antelopes defend themselves against lions?

When faced with attacking predators like lions, the antelopes' first line of defense is to run away. By so doing, their chances of survival are better increased, since they're way faster than their adversaries, with some species capable of running as much as 90 km/h or more (whereas lions do not usu…
(more)
190
11
8

Antonio Salviano

.
Follow
Brazilian-American, knows a bit about politics Sat

Why are Arabs considered "brown people"? I am an Indian living in the United States and Arabs look like normal white Americans next to me.

Because when people think of "white" people, they think of europeans. For some reason as soon as you pass through Greece into Turkey, it's common to think people just get a shade darker. That's far from the truth. There are many light skinned middle easterners, and plenty of swarthy europeans. Sicili…
(more)
18
8

Nadhiya Athaide

.

Follow
Iranian Historian & CuratorApr 3

Why didn’t Iran keep the more appropriate historical name Persia?

Because Persia is actually not our historical name. The last 2 Shahs of Iran were cultural nationalists who wanted to restore our ancient heritage. The word Persia comes from “Persis” or “Parsa”, A Greek word meaning “land of the Persians”. Persis was also the name of an ancient province. Iran is our…
(more)
875
10
60

DeleteMe
Sponsored
Keep your personal information to yourself with DeleteMe.
Whether it’s your ex or your next, we’ll keep them from finding your personal info online.
Sign Up

Gabi Roz

.
Follow
Lives in Mexico (2003–present)Updated 19h

What countries other than China are strong enough to help Russia during this war?

No one is helping Russia in Ukraine, though in the situation of a global war, the strongest members in the “chinese faction” excluding Russia woud likely be:
Iran: Doesn’t have the latest equipment, but the iranian army is fierce and knows how to project influence regionally. Has fought several regio…
(more)

17
6

Alex Cooper

.
Follow
1y

What is the most impressive winged animal?

This talonted specimen is a solid contender. (Edit — looks like Cesar Alcaraz beat me to it, but check out his answer.) Oh hi Mark. The Harpy Eagle looks like an ancient guardian of the forest who'll dive bomb you with bone-crushing intent (and capability…) should you enter her domain without a suitab…
(more)
1.1K
25
32

Firew Afera

.
Follow
Read a lot about ancient Egyptian history Apr 13

Why is it hard for people to believe the engineering genius of ancient Egyptians in constructing the Great Pyramids instead of trying to weave conspiracy theories?

I do not really care about the engineering brilliance of ancient Egyptians, or any of their achievements. This it because if it is indisputably proven that ancient Egyptains were Black, I do not think you would glorify them like you did in your question. Therefore, what I care about, my friend, is th…

(more)
5

Matt Riggsby

.
Follow
MA Archaeology, Boston University1y

Why don't they dig and research around in Nubia like they do in Egypt?

They do. Indeed, one of the professors in my department when I was in grad school was nominally an Egyptologist but actually did a lot of work to the south, in Nubia and as far away as Axum, and she's certainly far from the only archaeologist to work there. That said, Sudan is not Egypt. It doesn't a…
(more)
85
1

BLOGS BUNNY

BlogsBunny
Sponsored
BlogsBunny - a content sharing platform with a difference.
Find the best content from blogs around the world in your chosen niche!
Sign Up

Serge Elia

.

Follow
Animal lover2y

How intelligent are hyenas?

Contrary to what popular movies like The Lion King may tell you, hyenas are not the mindless eating machines we often misjudge them to be; rather, they are far more intelligent than we think – in fact, when it comes to cooperative problem-solving tests, they're even smarter than chimpanzees!

Sure enough, studies have shown that spotted hyenas (the most famous species) have a complex social behavior, particularly due to their great amount of frontal cortex (the part of the brain that is involved in social behavior). As such, they can lead complex social lives, engage in cooperation when hunting or defending themselves, recognize rank relationships of others, distinguish between every individual's distinctive vocalizations, adapt themselves to new situations, and even innovate…

This easily explains why these magnificent but misunderstood creatures have one of the most successful hunting rates among Africa's predators (up to 74%), and why they can easily outwit neighboring carnivores, including lions!

Is there a village that treats every wild animal like a friend?

There is this village in India named ‘Bera’ in which humans and leopards have been peacefully coexisting for more than a century. What is deemed impossible by most people is something that these villagers accomplished.

Maybe what is going on in Bera is a needed truth if we want change our ways to live in harmony with the animal world.

A priest in Bera being together with a Leopard

Frequently referred to as "leopard country", Bera contains the highest concentration of the animal on the planet. About 90 of the big cats live here amid the thorny desert scrub, coexisting peacefully with the native Rabaris, a shepherding community who migrated to Rajasthan from Iran through Afghanistan a thousand years ago.

The Rabaris faith is deeply connected to the Leopard

The community's remarkable coexistence with leopards is down to a deep spiritual connection, the locals believe. "The Rabaris treat the beasts as their guardian angels and worship them," says Dilip Singh Deora, who runs Jawai Wild Camp, a safari company in Bera. "When leopards kill the Rabaris' livestock, the community doesn't hold it against the predator. They believe Shiva will increase their cattle manifold and treat the killed livestock as an offering to the lord himself."

News Nigeria

In African culture, the "self" is not separate from the world, it is united and intermingled with the natural and social environment.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Tue

It is through relations with one's community and surroundings that an individual becomes a person of volition, whose actions and decisions affect the entire group rather than just oneself.

There is a Xhosa proverb that is common to all African cultures and languages, "Umuntu ngumuntu ngabantu," ("A person is a person through persons").

The rich and diverse African culture varies not only from one country to another, but within each country as well. The culture of each ethnic group centres on family and can be found in each group's art, music and oral literature.

Throughout Africa, the people speak a variety of languages, practice numerous religions and reside in various types of dwellings.

The vast majority of people living in Africa are indigenous; however, people from all over the world have migrated to Africa for hundreds of years. Arabs began crossing into North Africa from the Middle East in the 7th century, A.D., bringing with them the religion of Islam. Europeans began settling in the southern portion of the continent in the mid-17th century, as did South Asians, who settled in the areas of Uganda, Kenya, Tanzania and South Africa. Over the centuries, African culture has medged with cultures from around the world, although much of traditional African customs have remained throughout.

Ethnic groups and African tribes have customs that are unique to their culture. The customs and traditions of each group have been woven into a tapestry as colourful and diverse as the people of Africa themselves.

Do crocodiles eat everything?

Peter Kaye · Follow Former Ex Crocodile Hunter, Deep Sea Diver, Oilfield Work at Ocean Systems (1966–1996) Mar 9

No, only animals or meat, they do eat vegetable, but only from the stomachs of the animals they swallow. Their stomach acid is extremely strong and will dissolve everything down to the skin and bones, the skin and bones being the last to devolve, or digest. I once opened up a 14 feet croc and it had a full bovine skin in it , no head but all 4 hooves were still attached to the skin, and judging by the size of the hooves I would say the cow/ steer would have been 3/4 grown. All meat had already been digested and only skin and bones were left, and all bones were completely crushed, and none bigger than my hand. Actually the four hooves were the largest bones left.

Qui est le plus fort des felins ?

Gon Freecss · Suivre

Étudie à Polytech Annecy (2027 (attendu)) 9 mo

Le félin le plus puissant est le smilodon, une sous-espèce éteinte du genre Smilodon, qui était un très grand membre de la famille des tigres à dents de sabre. Il était également plus puissant que le lion et le tigre actuels. L'analyse de sa morsure, de son squelette et de ses dents a montré qu'il était non seulement capable de tuer des animaux relativement grands, mais aussi de déchirer leur chair après les avoir saisis et mordus.

La façon dont les animaux carnivores traitent leurs proies est très différente de celle du commun des mortels. Les chasseurs, y compris les animaux carnivores, ne choisissent pas les animaux les plus faciles à chasser mais leurs proies elles-mêmes. Les animaux carnivores sont en fait très intelligents, mais le commun des mortels ne peut pas vraiment le comprendre.

Les lions sont les félins les plus forts, et non les tigres comme la plupart le croient. Il y a de nombreuses années, les tigres se vantaient d'être les félins les plus forts.

Comment cela ? Par rapport aux lions, les tigres sont plus petits, ont un crâne et une bouche plus petits, et ont donc une capacité de morsure plus faible. Comparez maintenant la capacité de force de morsure au poids du chat. Puisqu'il prend en compte les deux premiers facteurs (la force en livres que la mâchoire du chat peut produire, ainsi que la taille de la mâchoire du chat), nous pouvons faire une estimation plus rigoureuse.

Le félin le plus fort du monde est le lion. C'est le troisième plus gros félin, environ le double d'un tigre du Bengale.

Response similare
Pourquoi les animaux préhistoriques ont-ils l'air vieux par rapport aux animaux modernes qui ont l'air plus moderne ?

Serge B. M'BRA · Suivre

Expert Systèmes d'Information et Projets Web 9 mo

Je crois que c'est une perception dictée par notre éducation. Très petits nous voyons les animaux contemporains dans des livres, à la télévision ou ou zoo. Ils nous sont familiers comme un visage.

Déjà on sait que les animaux préhistoriques sont anciens. Donc notre cerveau sait associer une image à ce terme. Si on vous montrait un cafard en vous disant que c'est un animal préhistorique alors que vous n'avez jamais vu de cafards, vous le trouveriez certainement "vieux".

De plus, le monde préhistorique n'était pas aussi "aseptisé" que le nôtre. Les animaux et nous-mêmes (nos ancêtres) étaient tenus d'adopter une apparence "dissuasive" très souvent. Ce qui éloigne de la perception du beau, jeune et rassurant. Pas le luxe d'être jeune et beau quand il faut survivre chaque jour.

Certains peuples ont d'ailleurs conservé ce type d'apparence surtout pour les cérémonies : peintures, habillement, attitudes gestuelles. Toute cette apparence renforce notre perception "d'ancien" ou "vieux".

 Je trouve ce Smilodon très jeune et beau © Google

Let us walk together
What is the toughest baby animals in the wild day 213?

· Follow Answered by Victoria Ng Tue

The baby sea tortoises are born by themselves without their parents under the soil. Once born they innately travel into the water and many risk getting swooped up by predatory birds. While inside the water, it is not safe zone either. They get carried away by other sea mammals and even though hundreds of eggs can be hatched, only a small percentage will survive to their final destination. They migrate to their home where their parents are without the parents instruction! Aren't they amazing?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
An Update on Tolstoy's Recovery

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell

Tue

The other day we shared the story of Tolstoy's treatment from a recent spear-wound, likely caused by conflict with a local farmer. He's a magnificent Savannah elephant, 50 million years in the making. His kind have roamed the African plains for at least 3 million years, and probably much longer. Out of 160 related species that came before his, only three have survived evolution's gauntlet, and all three are currently endangered, or in the case of the African forest elephant, critically endangered.

This is a photo of Tolstoy being treated.

Tolstoy is a rather special and unique individual as one of the last remaining "Super Tuskers" that roam the planet, of which only about 20 remain. The ecosystem he navigates has changed dramatically in the 5+ decades he's been alive. With human populations on the rise, and the development that comes with it, Tolstoy and his kind encounter people more and more regularly. Between our ranger units, strategic fencing, and community outreach, we can mitigate the consequences as best we can for everyone involved, elephants and humans alike, but it requires constant attention.

Big Life rangers saw him this morning, and while his wound is healing, they will continue to keep a very close eye on him in case further treatment or intervention is necessary.

Source: Big Life Foundation

Are hippos, elephants and rhinos related?

Serge Elia Animal lover 3y

Even though they're all commonly referred to as pachyderms, hippos, rhinos and elephants aren't really related to each other, and they're not even part of the same taxonomy. Instead, despite the fact that they're mammals, the three animals are very distant one from the other, just like felines are distant from canids. Let me explain:

– Science has revealed that hippos are the closest relatives of whales and dolphins, from which they diverged about 55 million years ago. Sure enough, recent fossil studies suggest that hippos are practically cousins to cetaceans (whales and dolphins), and that they shared a common semi-aquatic ancestor that branched off from other artiodactyls (the scientific term for even-toed ungulates) around 60 million years ago. Eventually, as time went by, this ancestral group split into two branches: one became the whales and dolphins we know, and the other became modern-day hippos.

– The elephant’s closest relatives are manatees, dugongs and the rock hyrax, despite the latter’s rodent-like appearance. Apart from the fact that they’re all herbivores, they share common ancestry – for they originate from the same order called Tethytheria, a group of animals referred to as “sub-ungulates”, and had an ancestor called Prorastomus, an animal that ate underwater plants (like the dugong), and simultaneously lived on rocky terrains (like the rock hyrax) –, and possess fingernail-like structures on the tips of their feet, as well as tusks that grow from their incisor teeth.

– Last but not least, rhinos, as perissodactyls (odd-toed ungulates), are more closely related to horses. While no fossils of the two animals’ common ancestors have been uncovered, nevertheless a closer look at their recent ancestors can help make the connection. For example: there used to be a time in which horses had three toes with large nails on them, just like rhinos; but eventually, the horses’ middle toe grew so large that their other toes have shrunk.

Pretty unbelievable, huh?

Related Links

Which animal would win in a fight between a rhino and a hippo?
Are elephants related to rhinoceros?
Who would win in a fight, a grizzly bear or a hippo?
If you put a gorilla, tiger, bear, lion, and a hippo in a room, who would win?
Is the hippopotamus dangerous to humans?
Why do crocodiles not attack hippos?
Which animal is stronger: the elephant or the hippopotamus?
Who would win in a fight between hippos and lions?

I'm drunk and I've jumped into a pond with a male hippopotamus with the intentions of killing it with my bare hands. How do I do it?

How similar are hippos and rhinos?

Why would a squirrel attack a snake?

Nathaniel Rice · Follow Bi, animal researcher & amateur wildlife historian 9mo

A variety of reasons.

For one, squirrels (being rodents) are technically omnivores. They can and do consume animal matter.

Most rodents (except for capybaras and a few others) are omnivores.

For another, some squirrels are pretty aggressive. Even if they don't eat the snake, they know that snakes (usually) eat them, so they take the proactive route - scaring off (and potentially killing) the snake before it can eat them.

How true is the story that pretending to be dead can save you from wild animals like lions, as they do not eat dead meat?

Alex Cooper · Follow Animal enthusiast Updated Oct 30

Lions are some of the biggest scavengers on the savanna, and they steal more kills from hyenas than vice versa.

They also kill their own prey, of course. Once they've killed it, by definition they are eating 'dead meat'.

Here is a lion feeding on something. I think it's safe to say it's dead. (Image from Canva)

Like most predators, lions love an easy meal without expending effort. So, if you're dealing with a hungry lion, playing dead just makes its job easier.

I'm sure lions prefer reasonably fresh meat, and might leave severely spoiled carrion to the vultures. But, unless you've been seriously neglecting your shower, I don't think you could 'play rotten'.

From what I've read, it's better to make the lion think you're too formidable to risk fighting. Standing tall, spreading your arms to appear larger, walking slowly and calmly—all preferable to acting like prey.

There's a famous video of Kenyan men 'stealing' a lion kill. They simply walk up to a group of lions in daylight, projecting confidence, and the lions run off. The men then carve off a hunk of meat and get out of there before the big cats can reconsider the bluff.

I know playing dead is sometimes advised as a strategy for grizzlies, but, while lions are also territorial, they're well-known for killing fellow predators if they get the chance, and not eating them. So, I can't see that strategy working even if it isn't a predatory attack.

Whether the lion is predatory or territorial, I think your best bet is to make it think you're not worth the trouble.

Related Links

How do wild animals know to stay away from rotten meat?
Do wild animals actually ignore you when you play dead?
What is it like to be eaten alive by a wild animal?

Are you okay with eating meat, knowing that the animal was bred to be eaten and would probably die a far crueler death in the wild?

Will a carnivorous wild animal eat cooked meat if served and will a herbivorous animal eat cooked vegetables if served?

Do cats eat their dead owners?
Are wild boars dangerous?
When should you fake death to survive a wild animal attack?
Why don't wild animals get food poisoning from eating raw meat?
Why do vegetarians refuse to eat meat even when the animals are already dead?

Un crocodile peut-il être apprivoisé ?

Iris Manusco Lieu : Lot-et-Garonne30 oct.

Je ne sais pas si on peu apprivoiser un crocodile mais un homme chito à eu une amitié improbable avec un crocodile pocho Chito et son ami, Pocho le crocodile sont des amis inséparables, ils sont devenus célèbres par leur insolite amitié qui dure depuis 20 ans.

Chito est un pêcheur du Costa-Rica, un jour il aperçoit ce crocodile au bord de la rivière de Parismina.

Au premier abord, il comprend très vite que quelque chose ne va pas.

En effet la pauvre bête est blessé à l'oeil gauche, il est très mal en point.

L'homme décide alors de ramener le gros crocodile de 450 kilogrammes chez lui afin de le soigner, aidé par ses amis.

Au fur et à mesure que les jours passent, le crocodile surnommé Pocho, reprend des forces.

Gilberto Shedden dit Chito n'en revient pas de le voir ainsi hors de danger

Au fil du temps, le crocodile Pocho et Chito se lient d'une amitié invraisemblable.

Pourtant Pocho est redevenu le prédateur qu'il était avant sa blessure.

Mais avec l'homme qui l'a soigné, c'est autre chose, ils jouent, nagent ensemble à la grande stupéfaction des étrangers. Les habitants du village ont pris l'habitude de voir les deux amis ensemble.

Selon Vladimir Dinets, zoologiste à l'Université du Tennessee, les reptiles savent s'amuser et jouer.

Ce ne sont pas que des prédateurs avides de sang.

Une belle histoire pour décrire cette belle amitié entre Pocho le crocodile et Chito le pêcheur.

Leur amitié a duré une bonne vingtaine d'années, Pocho le crocodile est finalement mort de mort naturelle.

Il a eu des funérailles digne d'un grand ami.

Il passera du temps avant d'entendre parler encore une fois d'une pareille amitié.

Response similaire

Un crocodile peut-il être apprivoisé ?

Aubin Sontia · A étudié à Univercité de Dschang 17 h

L'afrique en deuil. L'ex president Kényan Mwai Kibaki est mort l'as annoncé ce vendredi a Nairobi le precident actuel Yuhuro Kenyatta. Mwai Kibaki était le troixième president du pays de 2003 a 2013.

"C'est un triste jour pour nous en tant que pays nois avons perdue un vrand leadeur…" La cause de la mort de l:ancien president Mwai Kibaki reste non dite.

Quel animal s'est vengé de l'humanité ?

Gisele Histoires vraies et de la fantasie cuite. sam.

Guépards

Questions similaires

Quel est l'animal le plus cruel du monde et pourquoi ?
Pourquoi tant d'humains avec peu d'humanité ?

Quel est l'animal qui, s'il disparaissait totalement, causerait de gros problèmes à l'humanité ?

Quel est l’animal le plus intelligent de notre planète ?
Quel est l'animal le plus dangereux sur Terre ?
Quel est l’animal qui a sauvé le plus de vies humaines ?
L'être humain est-il le plus cruel des animaux ?
Quels sont les meilleurs moments de l'humanité ?
Quel est l’animal qui tue le plus d’êtres humains au monde ?
De quel animal, l'humain est-il biologiquement le plus proche ?

They are so muscular in part because they are NOT simply herbivores. The assumption that they were herbivores is outdated bad science. Why are gorillas so muscular even though they are herbivorous?

Jan Soloven Lived in Pennsylvania Updated 5y

All of the great apes were assumed to be vegetarian back in the days of deep ignorance. But one by one we’ve found that they are in fact very happy to eat meat and do so when they have the chance.

Chimps were incorrectly believed to be vegetarian, and that was what all of the textbooks said, until Dr. Jane Goodall observed them killing and eating animals.

Orangutans were also incorrectly believed to be vegetarian, but thanks to the work of Madeleine Hardus of the University of Amsterdam and others, there are now over 9 reported and published observations and photos of them happily eating animals such as the Slow Loris.

Gorillas are the last of the dominos to fall. Also incorrectly classified as vegetarians, recent collections of their scat (poop) has found that they've apparently been eating monkeys and antelope (Max Planck Institute/National Geographic reference below), and while old (and bad) science writing refers to them as "herbivores," more recent writing corrects this for example in Live Science: "Gorillas are generally herbivores. They usually eat vegetation such as wild celery, shoots, roots, fruit, tree bark and tree pulp, but they have been known to eat small animals and insects." Why aren't there more observations of gorillas eating meat? It would be ridiculously easy to observe in a zoo, if zookeepers would just place a monkey in the gorilla cage and record the gorilla killing and eating it, but partly on the assumption that they prefer bananas, they haven't. In the wild, there are only 600 mountain gorillas left in the world. That makes it rather difficult to observe. It's not like you can set up a camera in McDonalds and wait to see what they order.

First Proof Gorillas Eat Monkeys?

Gorilla Facts

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Fri

Born in 1832, Jonathan the Turtle is expected to turn 190 in 2022. This makes him the oldest known land animal alive today.

Do animals in general coexist peacefully in the wild?

Jamil Mahmood I love all animals Feb 24

Depends on how you look at it. (Homeboy must not be very hungry)

Animals have to eat, and many animals have to eat other animals to survive. If this is a given, then the definition of peaceful as it pertains to animals - would accurately describe how they coexist in my opinion. In other words, for the most part (not 100% of the time, but close to it) animals don't kill other animals unnecessarily.

And yes, I understand that sometimes a lion will kill another lion for territory, but I could argue that it's still necessary for the species that only the strongest specimens will survive and have strong offspring. Also, I'm aware that some Orca's will play games with their food, and it is bizarre, but this action is an outlier, and possibly one of the most inexplainable actions we can observe in other animals.

(Orcas has been observed playing catch with seals and in some instances not even eventually eating them)

But again for the most part, they coexist with an ecosystem that is delicate, and about as peaceful as it possibly can be when you consider we have carnivores living amongst herbivores.

Humans might be the only species that kill with bad intentions. It’s the curse of being hyper evolved when compared to the rest of life on earth. We are responsible for so many different extinctions and near extinctions that it’s actually kinda crazy how detached we are from all of the planet’s other life forms. So if you include us in the equation: then no. If you don’t include humans: then yes.

Related Links

Humans are practically defenseless. Why don't wild animals attack us more?
Do wild animals, once captive, retain their wild habits?
Can domesticated animals survive in the wild if we put them there?
What wild animal is most friendly to humans?
Do any wild animals have an easy life?
Are there as many wild animals in Australia as is said?
Why do most animals in the wild feed only at night?
How is it possible to tame wild animals?
Which animal species has killed the most humans?
How are wild animals able to be tamed so easily?

Big Cat News

How often do leopards interbreed with tigers and lions in the wild?

Answered by Nick Nicholas

Never.

A tiger will kill any leopard it finds in its territory particularly if it is a female tiger with cubs. Lions will also kill any leopards they come across.

The only time they will mate is if it is engineered by man in captivity. Below is lion leopard hybrid:

I have not heard of a tiger leopard hybrid but logic says that it is possible. This practice should be outlawed in my view. It contributes nothing towards conservation and just produces freaks.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

· Follow Posted by Judy Hulen Apr 21

THE WHOLE FAMILY!

What are the natural predators of leopards?

Nick Nicholas Studied Big Cats for 40+ years 2y

They are not really common prey for any animal but that is not to say that they do not ever get killed. Cub mortality is extremely high, as it is for many predators and solitary predators like leopards or tigers lose a great many cubs.

Lions have been known to kill leopards and a Mother Tiger will not tolerate a leopard in her territory when she has cubs and will actively seek out and kill any leopard she finds.

Below is a tiger with a dead leopard:

Below - lion with dead leopard

It should be noted though that no animal actively hunts a leopard as a food source. It is either for cub protection or elimination of competition.

Related Links

Are there any proved cases of dhole packs killing adult tigers or leopards?

Do lions know that leopards and cheetahs are their feline family? If so, why do lions still attack or kill them?

Who are leopards' predators?
What are the snow leopard's predators?
What are the natural predators of the Amur leopards?
What animals prey on leopards?
Would a lion be able to defeat a sloth?
Do Amur leopards kill wolves?
What are all of the leopard’s enemies?
What are the enemies or predators of jaguars?

Quelle est la créature la plus dangereuse au monde ?

Royce Nestand Lieu : Terre 8 févr.

La créature terrestre la plus dangereuse au monde (individuellement) pour l'homme est:

En terme de force pure, l'éléphant de savane

En terme d'agressivité, l'hippopotame

En terme de toxicité, le dendrobate doré

gnu : www.aquaportail.com

reptiland.net

Mais en groupe, la créature la plus dangereuse, non seulement pour l'homme mais aussi pour les autres éspèces, c'est l'homme.

AfriStar
Kenya : l'ancien président Mwai Kibaki est décédé

Publication par David-GDK 22 avr.

L'ancien président kényan Mwai Kibaki est décédé à l'âge de 90 ans ce vendredi. Impliqué dans la politique depuis l'indépendance en 1963, l'ancien professeur d'économie formé en Ouganda et à Londres, avait été élu en 2002. Après son départ du pouvoir en 2013, Mwai Kibaki s'était retranché dans son fief de Nyeri, à une centaine de kilomètres au nord de Nairobi En tant que figure de proue de l'histoire post-indépendance du Kenya, Mwai Kibaki a gagné le respect et l'affection constants du peuple de cette nation et d'autres nations à travers le monde. Le président Kibaki restera à jamais dans les mémoires comme du gentlemen de la politique kényane, d'un débatteur brillant, dont l'éloquence, l'esprit et le charme l'emportaient, encore et encore a souligné le président Uhuru Kenyatta.

Sous sa présidence de 2002 à 2013, le Kenya a confirmé son rôle de moteur économique en Afrique de l'Est et diversifié ses partenariats extérieurs. Parmi son héritage, figure également une meilleure éducation et de meilleurs soins de santé pour les Kényans.

Parlementaire pendant quelque cinq décennies - Mwai Kibaki a été élu député pour la première fois en 1963, il restera comme l'un des membres de l'équipe rédactionnelle de l'actuelle Constitution kényane.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Elephants know how to make a friend feel welcome.

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Sat

When tiny orphaned baby elephant Kerrio (she is on the left) was rescued, we vowed to ensure she would know nothing but comfort and love. She arrived in our care in August 2021 on a stretcher and clad in a blanket, and was immediately comforted and fed milk by our Keepers. As soon as they possibly could, the other orphans rushed to see who the newcomer was. Even Olorien, who can blow hot and cold when it comes to new arrivals, showered her with cuddles! Today, that love hasn't let up and she is accompanied from sun up to sun down by devoted Keepers and a steady stream of loving nannies who make sure she never feels alone.

Having lost her mother at such a young age, forming these new bonds has played a significant role in Kerrio's remarkable recovery (at rescue, she was semi-paralyzed and barely able to stand and walk). She continues to go from strength to strength knowing her new surrogate family always has her back.

Source: Friends Who Like the Sheldrick Wildlife Trust

Quel animal peut terrasser un humain le plus rapidement ?

Royce Nestand · Suivre Lieu : Terre jeu.

Un grand félin.

Ce sont des prédateurs rapides et puissants avec une taille et des muscles impressionnants, sans compter qu'ils sont dangereusement armés {une mâchoire puissante(avec une pression capable de briser les os), crocs et griffes acérés}. Mais ce ne sont pas uniquement ces caractéristiques qui font qu'ils peuvent terrasser un humain le plus rapidement, c'est plutôt à cause de leur façon de passer à l'offensive qui s'ajoute à leurs aptitudes physiques redoutables.

Ce sont des prédateurs qui utilisent souvent des techniques de chasse furtives et sautent littéralement à la gorge de leur cible à la première occasion. La gorge fragile de l'humain à la peau délicate ne tiendra donc pas cinq secondes sous l'assaut terrible d'un de ces animaux.

Response similaire
Quel animal peut terrasser un humain le plus rapidement ?

Fennec , Animal Geek Mis à jour le ven.

Un grand nombre d'animaux peuvent terrasser un humain très rapidement.

Un éléphant d'Afrique par exemple peut nous transformer en viande hachée en une fraction de seconde s'il se laissait tomber sur nous. Imaginez un poids de 6 tonnes vous tomber dessus.

Il peut meme no

Royce Nestand, lieu : Terre Répondu jeu.

Un grand félin.

Ce sont des prédateurs rapides et puissants avec une taille et des muscles impressionnants, sans compter qu'ils sont dangereusement armés {une mâchoire puissante(avec une pression capable de briser les os), crocs et griffes acérés}. Mais ce ne sont pas uniquement ces caractéristiques qui font qu'ils peuvent terrasser un humain le plus rapidement, c'est plutôt à cause de leur façon de passer à l'offensive qui s'ajoute à leurs aptitudes physiques redoutables.

Ce sont des prédateurs qui utilisent souvent des techniques de chasse furtives et sautent littéralement à la gorge de leur cible à la première occasion. La gorge fragile de l'humain à la peau délicate ne tiendra donc pas cinq secondes sous l'assaut terrible d'un de ces animaux.

Un grand felin

Ce sont des prédateurs rapides et puissants avec une taille et des muscles impressionnants, sans compter qu'ils sont dangereusement armés {une mâchoire puissante(avec une pression capable de briser les os), crocs et griffes acérés}. Mais ce ne sont pas uniquement ces caractéristiques qui font qu'ils peuvent terrasser un humain le plus rapidement, c'est plutôt à cause de leur façon de passer à l'offensive qui s'ajoute à leurs aptitudes physiques redoutables.

Ce sont des prédateurs qui utilisent souvent des techniques de chasse furtives et sautent littéralement à la gorge de leur cible à la première occasion. La gorge fragile de l'humain à la peau délicate ne tiendra donc pas cinq secondes sous l'assaut terrible d'un de ces animaux.

Related Links

What exactly makes the lion the king of the jungle? I’m not even sure lions are the strongest animals.

Who is the ideal king of the jungle, the lion or the tiger? And why?

Why is a lion considered the king of the jungle, when an elephant is the only animal without a predator?

Why is the lion the king of the jungle if he doesn't live in the jungle?

Is the lion the wildest animal in the world? Are there no animals that can face a lion one on one?

Why is the lion considered as being a powerful animal?
Which animal is stronger, a tiger or a lion? Why is the lion called the king of the jungle?
Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?

Why are there so many references to lions being in the jungle but lions don't live in jungles?

Is homosexuality observed in animals? Is it steady orientation or occasional behavior, and which is more common?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD-The perfect family photo.

Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Apr 17

Fig Tree boy Osupaat with Enkoyonai female and cubs.

Photo by Charlotte Rhodes

Is it just me or is there anyone else who thinks that lion is not the strongest animal in the jungle? I think it's just his pride and confidence that places him on that level.

Mathew Ali Updated Mar 15

Look at this guy.

This is a full grown lion at somewhat peak conditional health. Now this is a siberian and Bengal tiger.

Here’s the Siberian and here’s the bengal bottom

Just by looking at them you can see that either one of them is going to win.The bengal and the siberian are FAR stronger but each usually don’t meet with a tiger. Plus elephants can beat all of them.

THANKS FOR ALL THE UPVOTES EVERYONE

Related Links

What exactly makes the lion the king of the jungle? I’m not even sure lions are the strongest animals.

Who is the ideal king of the jungle, the lion or the tiger? And why?

Why is a lion considered the king of the jungle, when an elephant is the only animal without a predator?

Why is the lion the king of the jungle if he doesn't live in the jungle?

Is the lion the wildest animal in the world? Are there no animals that can face a lion one on one?

Why is the lion considered as being a powerful animal?

Which animal is stronger, a tiger or a lion? Why is the lion called the king of the jungle?
Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?

Why are there so many references to lions being in the jungle but lions don't live in jungles?

Is homosexuality observed in animals? Is it steady orientation or occasional behavior, and which is more common?

us marcher dessus ce qui causerait une mort quasi-instantanée.

Mais il existe d'autres animaux prédateurs qui nous tuerons intentionnellement et très rapidement comme le jaguar.

Le jaguar a la morsure la plus puissante parmi les félins. Il est capable de transpercer les os de sa victime en un seul coup de croc.

Et pour ne laisser aucune chance à sa victime, le jaguar cible son attaque au niveau du cerveau ou de la colonne vertébrale de sa prise, dans le but de la paralyser.

Il peut fracturer le crâne d'un caiman le tuant en quelques secondes puis le transporter vers un endroit sûr juste avec la force de sa mâchoire. Je vous laisse imaginer ce qu'il ferait à un humain.

Source: africanews

Questions similaires

Quel est l'animal le plus petit au monde ?
Quel est l'animal qui dort le plus au monde ?
Quel est l'animal le plus intelligent de notre planète ?
Un animal peut-il tomber «amoureux» d'un être humain ?
L'être humain est-il le plus cruel des animaux ?
Quel est l'animal le plus étrange au monde ?
Un hybride humain-animal peut-il exister ?
Quel est l'animal terrestre le plus rapide au monde ?
Quels animaux seraient les plus susceptibles de s'occuper d'un bébé humain ?
Quel est l'animal le plus méchant ?

How are animals better than humans?

Reese Mac , lives in Australia (1971-present)

Updated Oct 1, 2021 · Upvoted by Chris Regman , M. Div. Philosophy & Electronics, Pennsylvania State University (1996) and Janet R Fradera, BS Psychology & Biology, State University of New York (1999)

This week CNN released a photo taken by photographer Anil Prabhakar taken in the forest in Indonesia.

The image shows an orangutan, currently under threat of extinction, while stretching out his hand to help a geologist who fell into a mud pool during his search.

When the photographer uploaded the photo, he wrote this caption:
“In a time when the concept of humanity dies, animals can lead us back to those very principles.” 9/20/21

Sourced from Leslie's Photo Gallery, Facebook. (Apologies, the actual link keeps reverting to Facebook Login)

Related Links

What are some examples of animals helping each other?
What animals help us humans?
Why are animals kind to humans?
What are some examples of helpful animals?
What is it called when animals help humans?
In what ways do animals help humans?
What are some examples of animals behaving like humans?
What are some ways animals help human beings?
What are some examples of animals knowing you are trying to help them?

How are humans helping animals?

Quels sont les comportements étranges d'animaux que peu de personnes connaissent ?

Voici ce qui s'est passé l'autre jour en Afrique.

Une lionne doit chasser pour survivre et c'est exactement ce qui s'est passé ici. Une lionne a tué une antilope.

Mais très vite, cette lionne a compris qu'elle avait tué une antilope enceinte. Elle était si triste qu'elle n'a même pas mangé son repas.

Elle a essayé de porter le fœtus comme si c'était son petit et a essayé de le réanimer.

Le photographe a dit : "Elle a commencé à secouer le fœtus avec son nez, en le retournant doucement, avant de le ramasser par le cou comme si c'était un de ses propres petits".

Elle a fini par abandonner. Elle a compris qu'elle ne pouvait pas ramener à la vie l'antilope et elle a soigneusement placé le fœtus près de l'herbe.

Après ça, la lionne s'est allongée simplement, déprimée, près de sa proie sans la manger.

Qu'est-ce qui a bien pu traverser l'esprit de la lionne à ce moment ? Qu'est-ce qu'elle essayait de faire exactement ? Est-ce que son "Instinct maternel" a soudain repris le dessus ? Le bébé antilope lui a-t-il rappelé ses propres petits ?

C'est quelque chose que beaucoup d'entre nous n'auraient pas imaginé qu'un animal carnivore comme le lion puisse faire.

Sources : L'histoire d'une lionne, Les remords d'un lion, Google images.

Questions similaires

Quel est l'animal le plus petit au monde ?
Quel est l'animal qui dort le plus au monde ?
Quel est l'animal le plus intelligent de notre planète ?
Un animal peut-il tomber «amoureux» d'un être humain ?
L'être humain est-il le plus cruel des animaux ?
Quel est l'animal le plus étrange au monde ?

Un hybride humain-animal peut-il exister ?
Quel est l'animal terrestre le plus rapide au monde ?
Quels animaux seraient les plus susceptibles de s'occuper d'un bébé humain ?
Quel est l'animal le plus méchant ?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Stunning portrait of a Secretary bird photographed in Masai Mara National Park, Kenya.

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell

The Secretary bird (Sagittarius serpentarius) is a large bird of prey endemic to Africa where it is found in the savannas, grasslands, and shrub lands. Its robust body is covered in whitish-gray feathers, with two long, black-tipped tail feathers and it has a dramatic black crest of feathers on the back of its head. It has a red-orange and yellow patch of skin around its eyes.
It has the longest legs of any bird of prey, standing at a height of up to 1.3 m (4 ft 3 in), requiring the bird to bend in a crouch to feed or drink. These birds mainly move around on foot, although they can fly, but they only do so when necessary, such as to reach their nest in the trees and for courtship displays. It is estimated that Secretary birds walk anywhere from 12 to 18 miles (20-30 km) a day!

They also have lovely long eyelashes…

Source: Earth Unreal

Why aren't dingos just called dogs?

Erika Slover · Follow English Instructor / Writer Updated 11mo

The simple answer: Because it's the type of dog / canine they are.

Above: Australian Dingoes.

The dingo is not originally native to Australia, but were introduced over 3500 years ago, believed by some to be domesticated dogs brought by Asian seafarers. Some of the dogs got out someway or another and over the thousands of years have reverted back to a wild state.

That being said, there are plenty of wild dogs in the world that aren't considered "wolves," to include the African Wild Dog, the Carolina Yellow Dog, dholes, and more. However, in the same way these wild dogs are typically referred to by their name to differentiate what animal a person is talking about.

Above: Carolina Yellow Dog / American Dingo. Many people believed them to be just stray mutts (and because of this, some have even adopted them), but turns out after further study, they're actually a breed of wild dogs.

Above: African Wild Dog. These dogs have a very unique way of communicating. Not only do they have bat-like ears, but bat-like clicks to help them communicate.

Above: The Dhole. It's also called the Asiatic Wild Dog, the red dog, or the whistling dog. Though more shy of humans, it hunts in a pack targeting boar and even tigers. They kill by disembowling their prey. Yikes…

So think of it this way: It's just like someone saying "I saw a bobcat yesterday" instead of saying "I saw a big cat with a short tail" yesterday. Bobcats are still considered cats if even a wild one (just like sand cats in Morocco or Rusty-Spotted Cats in the Amazon), but obviously you're going to want to differentiate what type of cat you're talking about.

Same thing with the canines.

Above: This house cat is not too thrilled with this bobcat. Good thing there's glass between them. Bobcats have no problem with eating smaller cats if they can get them. You could say it's a cat-eat-cat world out there.

Related Links

What makes dingoes more dangerous than dogs?
What are the differences between a dingo and a dog?
What's the deal with dingoes? Are they just an ancient feral dog population? Some other wolf subspecies? Or a species a distinct non-wolf (Canis lupus) Canis species?
Are Dingoes kept as pets in Australia?
What is the main difference between a dingo and a desi dog?
Can dogs tell when people don't like dogs and "aren't dog people"?

If dingoes are descended from domestic dogs, how did they become un-domesticated when Aborigines still use them?

How dog-like is a dingo raised by humans? Would he like pets? Will he seek human company like a dog?

My mother feeds her dog ANYTHING that she is eating, (she just gave it whipped cream on plate!). Are there any real health or other consequences for the dog?

Why do we call a dog a dog?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Maasai Herders Receive Compensation For Their Loss

.

Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Apr 7

It's the tail end of the dry season in East Africa, and we anxiously await the rain. The rains will bring plentiful food for grazers, which in turn provides access to prey for the predators. The dry season can be a challenging time for Maasai herders protecting their livestock, as they can be a much easier target for hungry lions.

That’s where our Predator Compensation Fund comes in. When livestock are killed by predators, the owner will receive payment for the loss, so long as the predator responsible is not harmed or killed in retaliation. In the 4th quarter of 2021, Big Life issued compensation for the loss of 856 livestock animals for a total compensation value of $41,343 USD. But the number zero is of greater importance here, as there were zero lion mortalities and zero retaliatory lion hunts over this same period. We thank all our supporters who support our efforts and believe as we do, that if conservation supports the community, the community will support conservation.

Source: Big Life Foundation

Why do hyenas like to eat their prey alive? Why don't they kill before eating like lions do?

Alex Cooper · Follow Feb 15

Predators have evolved many different hunting styles, and what works for one animal won’t necessarily work for another.

Lions aren’t endurance hunters. They get close enough for a short chase and one of them (if the prey is too large to be killed by a single animal) goes for the throat and attempts to strangle the prey.

If this is a large, strong animal like a zebra or buffalo, it will still have energy and its legs and/or horns are still an issue, so eating it alive is not an option. It’s safer to make sure it’s dead before tucking in.

Spotted hyenas (the other hyena species do prefer to scavenge) have a different hunting method with larger prey. They chase it over longer distances and wear it down. By the time they overhwhelm their prey, it’s exhausted and less capable of fighting back and injuring them.

This zebra poses little threat. (Image from Pixabay)

Spotted hyenas' jaws are powerful and great for crunching bone and disemboweling their prey, but they haven't evolved to go for the windpipe like lions and don't have the long, sharp canines to deliver the coup de grace.

Besides, those lions are probably not far away and—despite stereotypes to the contrary—lions scavenge a large portion of their diet from hyena kills.

So, it's best for the hyenas to just eat straight away before they lose their hard-earned meal, rather than wasting time making sure their prey is dead. They're not trying to keep it alive, though, and prey dies pretty swiftly anyway.

Although somewhat distasteful from the human perspective, the speedy disembowelment of the prey means that death often comes sooner than with the methods employed by other predators (for example, suffocation) and is an efficient means of eating which lessens the probability of the kill being lost to another predator.[1]

This is more the case for large prey, as I mentioned. Spotted hyenas are also capable of catching and killing smaller prey on their own.

Footnotes

[1] Hyena

News Nigeria

This woman was caught stealing bananas in Kenya □□. She admitted to the act and claimed her kids were hungry, which gave her the motive to do so.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Apr 27

This is what the mob did to her after the arrest, they tied the banana to her neck and severely beat her up in the presence of her hungry looking children. Unfortunately, the mob did not give consideration to her hungry kids, her situation as a single mother raising kids into our society or any other sort.

Why are we so inhuman? Not even a shred of tenderness.This is absurd.Mothers go through a lot to raise a child(children).

As people, let us learn to be kind and considerate, and above all, love ourselves.

Let us learn to positively change your actions against your fellow black African.

To build a new Africa, we need to remake a new African, polluted minds cannot build a clean society. Join and support the African Continental Unity Party-ACUP let us to our energy together to build this new Africa of our dreams.

The Maasai's future is going up in flames.

Millions of us are reading this email. If enough chip in just a small amount, we could supercharge a game-changing court case to defend the Maasai. We'd fund the best lawyers, get massive media coverage, support local resistance, and create a global fund to empower other Indigenous communities threatened around the world.

Our movement helped stop huge Maasai evictions in 2014 -- now let's do it again!

The Maasai are fighting for their survival -- let's give them massive global support as they courageously defend their land and its wildlife against the trophy hunters. Donate what you can now: Evicting the Maasai would push thousands of families into severe poverty while hunting explodes on the very lands they've rotected for centuries. Already over 70% of their land has already been taken!

We helped the Maasai fight the last round of mass evictions -- and they won. But now the government is back again, employing vicious, life-threatening tactics to force them out.

The Maasai can't afford to lose. But it's not just them -- 80% of the planet's remaining biodiversity is safeguarded by Indigenous Peoples and Local Communities. But almost everywhere we look, these communities are under attack from loggers, miners, and tourism -- and too often, they're fighting for their survival with almost no resources.

We can help change that. If enough of us chip in, we could:

Fund the best lawyers to help the Maasai challenge evictions and land-grabbing in courts;

Give media and advocacy support to shine a spotlight on their courageous campaign;

Create an Indigenous protection fund to provide rapid-fire support to Indigenous activists defending their communities;

Pay for Indigenous delegations to attend global biodiversity and climate summits and support them to make their voices heard, and;

Power urgent campaigns to stand with Indigenous communities, protect their homelands from loggers, miners and other destruction, and save life on Earth.

Indigenous people have protected the Earth's rivers, forests, and grasslands for thousands of years. Today they're fighting for their own survival, and even a small donation will make a massive difference in this most unequal battle -- chip in what you can now:

We know we can help the Maasai win. Three years ago, we supported the Waorani people of Ecuador to sue their government -- and they won! And then in 2014, we helped the Maasai stop another huge round of evictions. Everything Avaaz does is thanks to millions of people around the world; beautiful things happen when we come together. And right now, for the Maasai in Northern Tanzania, it could mean the world.

In solidarity,

Kaitlin, Marigona, Mike, Adela, Camille, Alis, Sofia, Nell, and the whole team at Avaaz

PS. This might be your first donation to our movement ever. But what a first donation! Did you know that Avaaz relies entirely on small donations from members like you? That's why we're fully independent, nimble and effective. Join the over 1 million people who've donated to make Avaaz a real force for good in the world.

Why do lions attack from behind?

Nick Nicholas Studied Big Cats for 40+ years 6mo

There are several reasons for this.

The prey animal is normally trying to run away from the lion:

2 Very few animals will try and face a lion head on. A cape buffalo or rhino might but medium sized prey will not.

3 It makes sense to attack from the rear. The lion by attacking from the rear is out of the way of teeth and horns. Once the animal is down it can go for the throat.

Will crocodiles attack all animals?

Peter Kaye Former Ex Crocodile Hunter, Deep Sea Diver, Oilfield Work at Ocean Systems (1966–1996) Updated Mar 26

Any and all animals that they think they can handle, we once went up the bains river in the Northern Territory of Australia to see what's up there, on the way back we saw a horse floating in the water that wasn't there on the way up, I lifted its head to have a look at it and you could clearly see the teeth marks on the head where the crock had grabbed it and dragged it into the water and drowned it, this was a full grown horse and fairly big. I suspect it would have had to have been a fourteen or fifteen footer to have done that to a big horse like that. Something like this one.

found it, that's the photo of the horse below.

Related Links

What would it feel like to get attacked by a crocodile?
Why do crocodiles not attack hippos?

Can crocodiles be tamed?
Could a crocodile kill a hippopotamus?
What does it feel like when a horse bites the back of your skull off?
Which animals are more dangerous: sharks or crocodiles?
Do crocodiles eat rocks? If they do, why?
How do crocodiles kill you?
Will wild animals avoid attacking a sick animal?
Why do crocodiles sometimes attack humans?

Do you think your dog would protect you or do you think it would run if you were being attacked?

Humans are practically defenseless. Why don't wild animals attack us more?
What should I do if a crocodile attacks me?
Do crocodiles realize how badly they treat small animals?
Why don't crocodiles kill outside of water?

Why do Hippos attack humans but not crocodiles or other large animals?

Waqas Ahmed, BS Zoology & Science, Government Post Graduate College Mansehra Pakistan (2020) Answered Mar 31, 2021

Well…

Hippos are known also big animals size wise after to the elephants on earth dry area.

As Hippos generally not attack crocs or other large animals.but we cannot say totally hippos to not attack crocs and other large animals and also may attack humans.

BillsChannel

Related Links

What would it feel like to get attacked by a crocodile?
Why do crocodiles not attack hippos?
Can crocodiles be tamed?
Could a crocodile kill a hippopotamus?
What does it feel like when a horse bites the back of your skull off?
Which animals are more dangerous: sharks or crocodiles?
Do crocodiles eat rocks? If they do, why?
How do crocodiles kill you?
Will wild animals avoid attacking a sick animal?

Why do crocodiles sometimes attack humans?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

OUR SISTER PROPERTY, INVERDOORN, CELEBRATED A MIRACULOUS NEW LIFE FOLLOWING THEIR HORRIFIC POACHING INCIDENT

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Tue

Following the tragic poaching incident at Inverdoorn Private Game Reserve in December 2021, a crime that left 4 rhinos dead and a fifth pregnant cow badly injured, Aquila Collection owner, Searl Derman, was excited to make an announcement on 02 May.

“I am elated to announce that, not only have arrests been made within days of the incident back in December, but the Inverdoorn poaching surviving rhino gave birth to a healthy baby rhino boy on 30 April.”

The Inverdoorn Anti-poaching team came across the horrific scene of rhino poaching on their 10000-hectare Western Cape private game reserve on 8 December 2021. The four dead rhinos had their horns brutally removed while an injured female rhino was missing and had to be tracked. A specialist team was immediately assembled to firstly find her, and then look after her safety while guiding her through recovery.

“Under the guidance and supervision of specialist and renowned veterinarian Douw Grobler, the injured female was constantly monitored, and finally stabilized enough to perform a series of reconstructive procedures to reassemble parts of her face that had been badly injured by a close-range high calibre rifle shot,” explained Derman.

He added: “During those first few days following the despicable crime, several ARRESTS were also MADE by the SAPS (South African Police Service) supported by Cape Nature, and the private investigative teams that were deployed minutes after confirmation of the incident.”

out on an early morning game drive, spotted a new-born white Rhinoceros struggling in an aardvark hole.

In a miraculous turnaround of events, on Saturday 30 April, one of the Inverdoorn rangers,

The anti-poaching team and management were immediately notified and the Aquila 24 Hour Rapid Rhino Response Team (a privately funded and managed unit that was established to locate, rescue and rehabilitate any orphaned rhinos from private game reserves throughout South Africa) was activated.

“The onsite team managed to pull the baby rhino free from the hole without any injury, and identified it as a baby male rhino calling for his mother,” said Derman.

Tears of joy from the management and reserve teams followed as they managed to reunite him with his mother who was then identified as the surviving rhino from the horrendous poaching incident that took place at Inverdoorn in December 2021.

“The judicial system is currently in control of the process to bring justice to the lost rhino lives, and we once again thank all the role-players and stakeholders that supported my teams and myself back in December 2021. The miraculous birth of this little boy is a joyous moment and celebrated throughout wildlife circles and the global rhino conservation community. Just a few short months ago, we were under immense pressure to save the mother’s life, now we see the miracle of an added life,” said Derman.

For the safety of the rhino, and the survival of the calf, the baby and mother will be monitored over the upcoming days by the 24-hour Rapid Rhino Response Team to ensure the baby and mother bond. Thereafter, guests visiting Inverdoorn Private Game Reserve just outside of Cape Town, might just have the bucket-list privilege to spot the mother and baby on a magnificent game drive experience.

It is estimated that approximately 10 000 African rhinos have been lost due to poaching over the last decade. “This is a moment of hope in the preservation of these endangered species, and we are humbled and grateful for all the incredible support we have received since the news broke back in December 2021”, concluded Derman.

No expense was spared in the investigative processes as well as the survival of the rhino. All funds received by the generous donors to the multi-award winning and internationally recognised Saving Private Rhino organization is spent solely on the ongoing investigative costs and medical bills of the December 2021 incident, and the public may still pledge their support via SavingPrivateRhino.org or its Facebook page.

The rangers that captured the first images of the new baby at Inverdoorn said: “It is a momentous occasion and honour to have taken these images of new life after the tragedy on our private game reserve, and the occasion inspires us to continue our commitment to fight for the survival of Rhinos and all other endangered wildlife!”

Source: African Wildlife Rangers

ANIMAL KINGDOM

Is the lion the wildest animal in the world? Are there no animals that can face a lion one on one?

David M. Prus

Lifelong interest in animal behavior, ecology, and evolution Mar 13

It’s no more wild than a koala or a seal or a panda or a zebra.
Lions can and do lose one on one fights; solo lions tend to avoid

Buffalo

Giraffes

Rhinos

Hippos

Crocodiles

Armed humans

And of course elephants

And that's not going into animals they don't share ranges with like bears, tigers, bison, gaur, etc.

Related Links

What exactly makes the lion the king of the jungle? I'm not even sure lions are the strongest animals.

Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
Is a pet tiger or lion safe if raised with the owner at a very early age?
What other animal species can crossbreed besides tigers and lions?

Even though the lion is not an animal native to England, it's seen as a national animal of England. Who decided that this strange beast from a far off land should represent England?

Which animal is more dangerous: a lion or a tiger?
What are some mind blowing facts about lions?
What animals can kill a lion in one to one confrontation?

If a lion spotted a lone domesticated cat in the wild, would it recognise it as its own species and leave it alone or rip it to shreds?

How does a lion react on seeing a tiger for the first time in his lifetime or vice?

What is the largest prey of the clouded leopard?

Nick Nicholas

Studied Big Cats for 40+ years Jan 21

The clouded leopard is a beautiful animal living in the trees of the jungles of SE Asia. Having relative short legs, they are excellent climbers and catch birds with great agility.

They have exceptionally large canine teeth for their size and the largest prey they will take is probably the Indian Hog Deer though normally go for smaller prey.

This cat is just gorgeous and deserves to be protected. Far too many have been turned into tasteless fur coats.

I feel I have to add a photo of a horrible fur coat. It took up to 11 clouded leopards to make this obscenity. May whoever wears it rot in hell.

I weep when I see pics like this.

Related Links

What is the largest prey taken down by a leopard?
Who would win, a wolf or a clouded leopard?

Which is the largest animal that a leopard can hunt?
What prey animals are more hardcore than the predators that hunt them?
How rare are clouded leopards?

Who would win in a fight between different species of cats: lion, tiger, leopard, jaguar, snow leopard, cheetah, and puma?

Do large predators bother going after very small prey?
What are the natural predators of clouded leopards?
What animals prey on leopards?
What is the size of a clouded leopard?

Can a lioness successfully raise a leopard cub?

Q.E.F.R Lives in Milan, Italy Updated 1y

It can, and it has also happened!

This lioness adopted an abandoned leopard cub and raised it with her other lion cubs. First time ever!

Sadly the little leopard died in young age so we won't be able to see a lion pride with an adult leopard being part of it and maybe mating with lions.

That could have been the first time for a hybrid between these two majestic big cats to exist in nature and not just in captivity!

By the way, this would never happen, a lion pride would never accept a leopard in their pack, and a lioness would never adopt a leopard cub in the wild.

This was an exceptional case that happens probably 2 times in 1000 years since lions and leopards are natural enemies and will kill each other to eliminate competition given the opportunity

HARD LAW OF SURVIVAL

Related Links

Do leopard cubs remember their mother when they grow up?
Is a lioness fierce enough to kill a lion if she's protecting her cubs?
Why do lionesses allow new male lions to kill their cubs?

Why do big cats (tigers, lions, etc.) express so much emotion when seeing their former owners after 10 years or so of no contact, unlike house cats who don't seem to share those same revered feelings?

If you raise a lion as a cub, will it kill you when it grows up?
Could an adult domestic cat and a cub lion coexist?
Are lion cubs dangerous?
Does a lioness grieve when her cub or her mate is killed by another lion?
Can a male leopard join a lion pride?
Will a big cat (ex. Cheetahs, Lions, etc.) eat a smaller cat (a house cat)?

Can a leopard kill a lion?

Cesar Alcaraz, Animal lover Updated Nov 18

It depends.

This lion?

Then easily, a full grown leopard won’t even need much effort, it’s much larger, stronger, and deadlier than a lion club, a lion baby would have no chance.

This lion?

Well, I guess the leopard still might have a fair shot, an adolescent lion is more inexperienced and smaller than an adult, I think if a leopard got lucky, it might kill it.

This lion?

Then unless this individual is sick or seriously injured, you can say night night to the poor leopard. -Cesar Alcaraz

Related Links

Do leopard cubs remember their mother when they grow up?
Is a lioness fierce enough to kill a lion if she's protecting her cubs?
Why do lionesses allow new male lions to kill their cubs?

Why do big cats (tigers, lions, etc.) express so much emotion when seeing their former owners after 10 years or so of no contact, unlike house cats who don't seem to share those same revered feelings?

If you raise a lion as a cub, will it kill you when it grows up?
Could an adult domestic cat and a cub lion coexist?
Are lion cubs dangerous?
Does a lioness grieve when her cub or her mate is killed by another lion?
Can a male leopard join a lion pride?
Will a big cat (ex. Cheetahs, Lions, etc.) eat a smaller cat (a house cat)?

Which animals scare you more, lions or crocodiles?

Andre Frank Ortiz Adams · Follow I have seen a tiger at the Bronx Zoo.Thu

Both of them can be scary,especially for impalas.Those two animals attack them constantly.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
How Long Can An Alligator Go Without Eating?

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Apr 2

Alligators are cold-blooded animals that have a really slow metabolism that allows them to survive and go without eating for months and in extreme situations, even 2-3 years. In fact, fasting is something they do every winter. During chilly weathers gators enter a hibernation-like state called brumation that basically shuts down their entire body and keeps them alive without requiring or wasting energy.

Even if alligators have an open-menu diet, it mainly consists on prey that it is easy to catch such as fish, birds, turtles, snakes and other mammals, along with fruits, dead animals and other reptiles. Gators eat extensive amounts of food, but because of their biological composition, they do not need to eat constantly. In fact, they can easily survive with little or no food at all.

So Can An Alligator Live 2 Years Without Food?

Ideally, alligators can go one whole year without food, but yes, in extreme situations they can starve for up to 2 to 3 years.

Alligators are ectothermic; they have a slow metabolism and can control their heart rate to survive long periods of starvation, freezing and dark conditions. Actually, some scientists believe these superpowers kept these prehistoric reptiles alive during mass extinction at the end of the Cenozoic Era, which most animals, such as dinosaurs, did not survive.

To do so, alligators will reduce their heartbeat to two or three beats per minute, cutting down oxygen supply and therefore slowing their metabolism rates. This will completely reduce energy-waste, keeping them alive even without food. Gators will lose body mass and become extremely skinny, and enter a dormant state, but they are still active and awake.

How Long can an Alligator Go Without Eating?
https://www.totalreptile.com/how-long-can-an-alligator-go-without-eating/

What is Kenya not known for but is actually good at?

Ronnie Otieno I have been living in Kenya for the last 22 years 3y

Kenya is known mostly for its wildlife and nature. Many tourists come for Safaris, Mount Kenya, Great Rift Valley and some for the beautiful beaches, but do you know that Kenya has some hidden gem?. Kenya has some old towns which are also worth the attention but many people never really think of them.

The Swahili trade left behind some beautiful culture and cities. The Swahili cities and settlements are dotted along Indian Ocean from Southern Somalia to Northern Mozambique with their main city Zanzibar just off the coast of Tanzania.

The following pictures are of old town Mombasa, a town in Coastal Kenya and one of the main cities known for its Swahili culture. Recently Mombasa governer initiated the process of beautification of the old town and in the process the buildings were painted the same color.

KCH
975R

50
TREASURES OF KENYA

KBA 798W

The following is the street in late 1800s.

Ndiakuu Street, Mombasa, B. E. A.

27 Aug 07 M Delahay

PIERRES VIVES

D. V. Figueira, Mombasa, B. E. A.

Mombasa from above. Mombasa used to be the Island only but it has expanded. Before Portuguese it was known as Kisiwa cha mvita meaning ‘the Island of war’.

Mombasa has been a settlement for over a millenia. Started as Swahili settlement then it reached its glorious days during Swahili Arab trade. The Portuguese controlled Mombasa a bit in the Middle ages but were driven away.

They left behind a Fort. The Fort Jesus is still standing and is used as museum.

Fort Jesus now.

Fort Jesus in 1895.

Mombasa is only but one of these old towns. There is even older one called Lamu Town which is a Unesco World heritage site.

Someone said that old town Mombasa look like old towns along Mediterranean I couldn't agree more.

Visit Mombasa not only for the beaches and buildings also for the culture, food and people. Kenyans joke that Swahili people are so slow and its true the slow accent will make you fall in love. See you in Mombasa.

All pictures are from Twitter.

Related Links

How is Kenya perceived internationally?
What is wrong with Kenya?
Is there any good advice for traveling to Kenya?
Why is Kenya more famous than most other African countries?
What are some interesting facts about Kenya?
What is it like to live in Kenya?
What do people in the US think about Kenya?
Why did you leave Kenya?
What do you know about Kenya?
What makes Kenya Special?

Joshua James

.
Follow
Animal-loving dorkMay 1

Who is the most underrated predator in the animal kingdom?

There is one predator that comes to mind - the Komodo dragon, also known as the ora.

For those who don't know, the ora is the world's largest living monitor lizard. It is a full-time carnivore that is capable of taking on big game like buffalo and wild boar.

In my opinion, the ora is underrated because they are not recognised for their abilities. They are misrepresented by documentaries and the like.

The ora is said to approach prey from behind, land one bite and allow the animal to escape. After several hours or days, the animal succumbs to infection or envenomation.

This is a common misconception (1).

Komodo dragons make no attempt to deliberately allow the prey to escape with fatal injuries but try to kill prey outright using a combination of lacerating damage and blood loss. They have been recorded as killing wild pigs within seconds, and observations of Komodo dragons tracking prey for long distances are likely misinterpreted cases of prey escaping an attack before succumbing to infection.
As it turns out, the chemical warfare (e.g. venom, bacteria) of the ora is “surprisingly ordinary” compared to other carnivores (2). The venom is not particularly deadly and they can’t always rely on it to kill their prey.

Instead the ora typically kills its prey by lacerating it with sharp teeth, causing death through blood loss and shock.

Walter Auffenberg watched an ora gut a large wild boar with one deep bite (3).

The Komodo actually allowed the pig to pass, but when the boar was about a meter away, the lizard attacked from the rear, grabbing the boar's hind leg with his sharp, serrated teeth, quickly severing tendons. The hamstrung boar squealed and turned, trying to defend itself, but the lizard hung on and pulled back hard on his bite, tearing at the pig's flesh and arteries. The boar began bleeding profusely and fell over on its side. Immediately the Komodo monitor released the pig's leg and bit into the soft flesh of its belly. Blood was gushing from both wounds and the boar's intestines were falling out. The entire attack was over. Yet people still claim that ora can only rely on venom to kill their prey, that their bite strength is equivalent to that of house cats, and other nonsense.

The ora is not given credit for its ability to kill animals many times its size with one bite, which is why the ora is an underrated predator.

Sources:

Unique Facts and Information - Komodo Dragon
ANAEROBIC AND AEROBIC BACTERIOLOGY OF THE SALIVA AND GINGIVA FROM 16 CAPTIVE KOMODO DRAGONS (VARANUS KOMODOENSIS): NEW IMPLICATIONS FOR THE "BACTERIA AS VENOM" MODEL
Lizards: Windows to the Evolution of Diversity - Eric P. Pianka, Laurie J. Vitt

Related Links

Which animal is the most overrated apex predator?
What is the most underappreciated bird of prey?
Which is the most feared predator in the animal kingdom?
Which animals are the most intelligent predators in the animal kingdom?
Are felines the most perfect predators in the animal kingdom?
Which predator is the best solitary hunter in the animal kingdom?
What animals have underrated intelligence?
What animal is the best predator?
Do predators with hooves exist? Why do predators normally not have hooves?
What is the most cruel animal in the history of the animal kingdom?

Why won't Kenya and Ethiopia give back the ethnic Somali regions back to Somalia?

Noel Ellis , B.A., p.g diploma from University of Otago (1983) Answered Nov 29, 2020

The Somali flag has a star with five points for the five parts of Somalia. Two of these were Italian Somali and British Somaliland which united at independence in 1960. The others are the Ogaden region of Ethiopia, the Northeastern region of Kenya and Djibouti (French Somaliland).

One problem is that even the two parts that united have broken apart. Here was one country in Africa where they all spoke the same language, followed the same religi and were all the same ethnicity. Yet in the end in broke down on tribal (clan) divisions. They are all related but the civil war came down to who was your closest relation versus those more distant.

So with regard to the other territories it would have made no difference if they were included in Somalia or not. You call it giving them back, but that is aluding to some mythical time in the past when all Somalis were united under Mohamed Al Granye (the left handed).

One problem if all five parts of Somalia east of the Somali line were united, is there is no way you could keep them all living there. Somalis are traditionally nomadic and would just drive their taxis all over Africa. In fact quite a few have even found their way to New Zealand. Noel Ellis

What is a crocodile's "death roll"? Why do they do it?

Truman Sharp avid fan of the Crocodile Hunter 6y

To witness the death roll of a crocodile is to witness sheer power and force. Crocodiles will "build up" before the roll; almost like the way sprinters tense up before bounding off into the race. You can actually feel the crocodile as it tenses up. And when it explodes, you either want to be very far away from it or on top of it, preferably with other people piled up on it. Steve Irwin used this technique quite often to subdue and control crocodiles he trapped.

Using their hind legs, they start rolling, back to belly, over and over until they get tired. Then they start building up again. Here's how they look in action:

Now, if you are on top of the crocodile, you can stop it from death-rolling you into the dirt with 1 easy step: lift its hind legs off the ground. You do this, and the only thing the croc can do is thrash and struggle, which I admit is pretty powerful and deadly in itself. One hit from the tail can break ribs and fingers, as Steve learned first-hand.
So that's how a croc death rolls. But why do they do it? It serves useful during four activities:

1. Subduing prey.
2. Eating prey.
3. Fighting with other crocs and humans.
4. Making a get-away.

We all know that crocs can't chew, so they're just like "the hell with this" and then start ripping it to shreds, eating bone and all. Other times, they're fighting with another croc over territory and they try to rip each other's limbs off. Yeah, you read that right. Mean ole' crocs have been found with stubs for legs and a bitten-off tail from fights:

Maybe you can catch a glimpse of the stub of a front leg. Steve's trying to avoid a big hit from the tail. Anyways, I think that covers a lot. I hope this answers your question. Crocs Rule!

Picture Sources:
International Crocodile Rescue - The Crocodile Hunter - Australia Zoo
Death Roll: Not Just for the Crocs...

Related Links

Can crocodiles be tamed?

If I raise a crocodile from a hatchling to an adult, will it be friendly like tigers and wolves which are raised by people?

Reptiles: If an alligator fought a crocodile, which animal would win?
What's more dangerous, alligators or crocodiles?
How dangerous are alligators? Can you swim in water where alligators can be found?

I've seen crocodiles or alligators swim up to people and they are able to just push on their nose to keep them away. How are they able to do that and why do the crocs/alligators let them do this?

If attacked by an alligator/crocodile, how does one defeat the "death roll" and keep all of one's limbs?

Has there ever been a friendly crocodile?
Are crocodiles biologically immortal?
Do crocodiles and alligators ever meet?

ANIMAL KINGDOM
Is the lion the wildest animal in the world? Are there no animals that can face a lion one on one?

David M. Prus Lifelong interest in animal behavior, ecology, and evolution
Mar 13

It’s no more wild than a koala or a seal or a panda or a zebra.

Lions can and do lose one on one fights; solo lions tend to avoid

Buffalo

Giraffes

Rhinos

Hippos

Crocodiles

Armed humans

And of course elephants

And that’s not going into animals they don’t share ranges with like bears, tigers, bison, gaur, etc.

Related Links

What exactly makes the lion the king of the jungle? I’m not even sure lions are the strongest animals.

Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
Is a pet tiger or lion safe if raised with the owner at a very early age?
What other animal species can crossbreed besides tigers and lions?

Even though the lion is not an animal native to England, it’s seen as a national animal of England. Who decided that this strange beast from a far off land should represent England?

Which animal is more dangerous: a lion or a tiger?
What are some mind blowing facts about lions?
What animals can kill a lion in one to one confrontation?

If a lion spotted a lone domesticated cat in the wild, would it recognise it as its own species and leave it alone or rip it to shreds?

How does a lion react on seeing a tiger for the first time in his lifetime or vice versa?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Apr 25

Leopards keep their cubs in dens, also known as lairs, which serve as a hiding place for the cubs while mom is away. they change these lairs every few days to avoid accidental discovery by predators that pose a threat to their babies like lions or hyenas.

Source Reddit / pet dog

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Jo MBRU Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. Sat

Very sad news □

An anti-poaching unit was engaged in an activity in the Sabi Sands when they were ambushed by an adult male leopard. The unit responded in self-defence killing the leopard in the process who has been identified as the HOSANA male. RIP Hosana.

Photo by Rodney Xolile Nombekana

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Wed

When there is a threat nearby, baby gharials crawl onto the back of a large parent that's designated as the " guardian ." These crocodiles nest in communities and the guardians are like babysitters, overseeing dozens of hatchlings. Gharials are one of the most critically threatened crocodilians . There are now fewer than 250 adult individuals remaining in the wild. Gharials are in India and Nepal .

Photo by Dhiritiman Mukherjee.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Tue

Hyenas 🔥 .

Hyenas are wonderful hunters relying on teamwork to catch their prey . They have amazing patience as they can quietly sit below a tree for about 2 to 3 days while a leopard feeds above , waiting for the smallest piece of meat to fall . The planet Earth crew said the scariest moment of filming the show was when they were on the outskirts of some African town at night and they could hear hyenas surrounding them and making their eerie whoop noises . Hyenas often eat their prey still alive , starting from the soft tissues in the stomach , while it`s prey dies a slow and agonizing death . Between 27,000 and 47,000 live in sub Saharan Africa .

Photo source Reddit / me32015 .

What are some life lessons?

Stephen Sibbald · Follow Christian, geek, veteran, grandfather. Apr 4

I found this gem this morning, posted at Publication de David-GDK dans Mindset.Des.Milliardaires. Enjoy!

A Masai man walked into a bank in Nairobi and asked for credit. He told the loan officer that he was going to Dubai on business for four weeks and needed to borrow $45.

The loan officer tells him that the bank will need collateral for the loan. So the Masai gave him the keys to a brand new Mercedes Benz S500, parked in the street in front of the bank. The Masai showed the vehicle papers and everything was correct. The loan officer agreed to accept the car as collateral for the loan.

After he left, the bank manager and his associates all mocked the Masai for using a Mercedes worth $130,000 as collateral against a loan of $45. A bank employee then parked the Mercedes in the bank's underground car park.

Four weeks later, the Masai returned, repaid the $45 and $1.50 interest. The agent asked him, "Sir, we were very happy to have dealt with you. This transaction went very well but we are a little puzzled. While you were away, we reviewed your file and discovered that you are a multi-millionaire. What intrigues us is, why would you bother to borrow $45?

The Masai replied, "Where else in Nairobi could I park my car for four weeks for just $1.50, and expect it to be there when I get back?

Related Links

What are the lessons people most often learn too late in life?
What is the most important life lesson you've learned from someone else?
What is the main lesson you have learned in life?
What are some of the dark lessons that life showed you?
What is the most important lesson of life you have learned today?
What are the important lessons you learnt in life?

What are the most important lessons you have learned in your life and when did you learn them?

What are the 3 hardest lessons you learned in your thirties?
What are some lessons that life teaches you?
What did you learn too late in life?

Between the spotted hyena and the African wild dog: which one has better teamwork and organization?

Nancy Amburgey · Follow Have raise, trained and showed dogs 30+ years Tue Interesting question. I would probably go with the African wild dogs. Hyenas do make kills but thrive on carcasses, either animals that have died of old age or leftover kills from big cats. They will drive off a single lion or 2 but that would be about the extent of it. African wild dogs however do make kills. They run in pretty big packs.

This is a more rare sight. I took this picture in 2016 in South Africa. This was about 1/2 the pack.

Same trip, different place.

Related Links

Why do jackals seem to be ignored/tolerated by lions, hyenas, wild dogs, etc.?

Zoology: Do hyenas and canines hunt in packs because of their size, the size of their prey and terrain limitations? Also, how different are the hunting strategies/group behaviors of hyenas and wild dogs?

Is there any dog breed that can kill a hyena in a fight?

Who would win between a Kodiak bear and a pack of Hyenas? What if there was a pack of wild dogs in the place of the pack of Hyenas?

How do you train a Hyena to be your pet?
Who will win in a one on one, a wild dog or a hyena?
Who has more endurance between hyena, wolf, and African wild dogs?
Which one is stronger, hyena or wild dog?

Do wolf, African wild dog, and hyena belong to the same family? Do they have any similarities?

Why weren't African wild dogs ever domesticated in prehistoric Africa?

How do jaguars attack humans?

Rogerio Rufino Studied Electrical Engineering at UFU - Universidade Federal de Uberlândia (Graduated 1983) Updated 1y

The jaguar, despite being smaller than its relatives, tigers and lions, has the strongest bite among all felines, being able to kill its prey almost instantly, by destroying its skulls, preferably at the base of the skull, between the ears. They also destroy tortoiseshell and black caiman giants, from the alligatoridae family, one of their favorite prey.

They have extraordinary strength, being able to climb steep elevations carrying animals much heavier than themselves. In addition, they are excellent swimmers and usually dive to kill the poor caiman, specialized crocodilians in the water.

The introduction of cattle and buffalo in their habitat allowed the addition of a generous menu, but also created a risk of facing the most deadly enemy of all: man.

Despite being one of the most powerful cats, jaguars avoid man. With the abundance of animals to kill, they are not interested in our disgusting meat at all but, sometimes could happen and when a jaguar attacks people, the main injuries (possibly causing instantaneous death) are the bite on the cervical spine, the breakdown of nerves, muscles and skin tissue, as well as fractures of the cervical vertebrae caused by the force of the bite and the rapid rotation of the animal releasing the kinetic energy of the movement, to cause all the damage. The skull is usually fractured, which is surprising for a feline that weighs as much as a lioness. Perforations caused by the claws are the least damage.

Any animal has in its DNA reminiscences of memories that show the danger that represents a human being. Coppola showed this, masterfully, in the movie Apocalypse Now. An American soldier was patrolling the jungle in Vietnam when he came face to face with a tiger and it was the animal that ran away in fright.

Somehow, the animals seem to know that the human being kills for no reason, for fun, for pleasure, for the vanity of looking powerful, hidden behind a gun.

Some men kill to survive in ininhospitable regions or even to defend themselves from an animal attack. The others are murderers of species, they kill without reason. To paraphrase the bard, animals are for some men, like insects for wanton children, they kill them for fun.

My first encounter with a jaguar happened at night and the darkness, we know, is the mother of all fears. I confess that I was apprehensive, exhaling fear in the air, which can be fatal, because I learned from dealing with bulls that when we show our fear, animals can easily understand and that gives them the courage to charge us. Fear looks like a star shining in the darkness, and when animals attack, they are deadly, no matter how strong we are.

Another meeting happened in the afternoon and I was able to contemplate all the beauty of the animal, until it disappeared as if by magic. Although the man is not on his menu, a jaguar will kill him with just one bite if he feels cornered. In fact, any cornered animal can kill. It is the time of greatest danger, because adrenaline leads to panic and the jaguar will attack with all fury and then it will run away without looking back.

Jaguars are solitary cats, almost mystical and hardly approach men. You may not see it, but maybe, if you look up, in some tree it is stalking you. Maybe, better not even to look up but, definitely, they aren't man eaters yet. There are still many types of animals for them to kill.

Photos: Hebert Van Der Beek/Mercury Press

Photo: “Photographer captures incredibly rare moment jaguar dives to catch food - Caters News Agency"

Related Links

What should you do when you encounter a jaguar face-to-face?
Is it true that cheetahs do not attack or eat humans? If that is true, then why not?
Are there any examples of jaguars attacking people?
What is it like to have a Jaguar as a pet?
Can an average human kill a cheetah in a fight?
Which one of the “big cats” is the most friendly with humans?

How do you survive being attacked by a jaguar?
Do jaguars want to eat humans, or do they just attack?
Why are cheetahs friendly to humans?
Can a strong human beat a leopard?

What should you do if you see a tiger in the wild?

Mahmud Rookie Developer at Smartupworld (2017–present) 7mo

There is not much you can do. You are most likely to get killed and eaten. So what you really should do is, say your goodbyes and grab a stick or anything you can use as a weapon. And try to hit the tiger with it knowing you are most likely not going to succeed. It's a beast much faster and stronger than you are with super sense. You are just a dumb human or a deer on it's path. It's a predator, you are just another weak prey. Usually a human have even less defense than a antelope. Antelope can run much faster than you, go reverse without losing speed, you are just two legged human, who ended up in the wild out of sheer stupidity or just plain bad luck.

This is a incident on India, a guy fell on Tiger's Cage. He was killed before anybody could do anything. Tiger is much bigger, it's attacks are way more fatal. You will be torn into shred before help arrive. And it knows where your jugular vein is. It's like a killer doctor, who knows exactly where to bite to put you down nice and quiet.

Look at the canine they uses to sleep big animals, they will not stab you or pierce you, they will just separate the head from the body.

In the wild, tigers mostly feed on large and medium-sized animals, preferring native ungulates (horses, cattle, pigs, giraffes,camels, deer, and hippopotamuses) weighing at least 90 kg (200 lb). They also prey on other predators, including dogs, leopards, pythons, sloth bears, and crocodiles. Sambar deer, chital, barasingha, wild boar, gaur, nilgai and both water buffalo and domestic buffalo, in descending order of preference, are the tiger's favoured prey in India.[1]
It is a Alpha Predator. It hunts other predators. It is even stronger and bigger than Lions. And also more hostile.

The conservation charity Save China's Tigers stated "Recent research indicates that the tiger is indeed stronger than the lion in terms of physical strength. ... A tiger is generally physically larger than a lion. Most experts would favor a Siberian and Bengal tiger over an African lion."[2]

It will take about a second for A Tiger to end your little life. One bite on the neck and you are of to next adventure.

Footnotes
[1] Hunting & Diet
[2] Tiger versus lion - Wikipedia

Related Links

What could the man who fell into the tiger pit in India have done to prevent being dragged off by the tiger? Is there any way to deter a wild animal like that from attacking if someone is ever in that situation?

Is it true that tigers won't attack a human who is looking at them?
Do tigers attack humans? What would make them do so?

Why are tigers afraid to attack a person if they are facing them despite a person being much weaker than a tiger?

Why are tigers so dangerous?
Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
What would you do if you were face-to-face with a tiger?
Why do lions not attack when you are in a safari vehicle?
How do I survive a tiger attack?

Is it true that if a tiger eats human flesh once, it won't ever hesitate again to kill humans just

How do jaguars attack humans?

Rogerio Rufino Studied Electrical Engineering at UFU - Universidade Federal de Uberlândia (Graduated 1983) Updated 1y

The jaguar, despite being smaller than its relatives, tigers and lions, has the strongest bite among all felines, being able to kill its prey almost instantly, by destroying its skulls, preferably at the base of the skull, between the ears. They also destroy tortoiseshell and black caiman giants, from the alligatoridae family, one of their favorite prey.

They have extraordinary strength, being able to climb steep elevations carrying animals much heavier than themselves. In addition, they are excellent swimmers and usually dive to kill the poor caiman, specialized crocodilians in the water.

The introduction of cattle and buffalo in their habitat allowed the addition of a generous menu, but also created a risk of facing the most deadly enemy of all: man.

Despite being one of the most powerful cats, jaguars avoid man. With the abundance of animals to kill, they are not interested in our disgusting meat at all but, sometimes could happen and when a jaguar attacks people, the main injuries (possibly causing instantaneous death) are the bite on the cervical spine, the breakdown of nerves, muscles and skin tissue, as well as fractures of the cervical vertebrae caused by the force of the bite and the rapid rotation of the animal releasing the kinetic energy of the movement, to cause all the damage. The skull is usually fractured, which is surprising for a feline that weighs as much as a lioness. Perforations caused by the claws are the least damage.

Any animal has in its DNA reminiscences of memories that show the danger that represents a human being. Coppola showed this, masterfully, in the movie Apocalypse Now. An American soldier was patrolling the jungle in Vietnam when he came face to face with a tiger and it was the animal that ran away in fright.

Somehow, the animals seem to know that the human being kills for no reason, for fun, for pleasure, for the vanity of looking powerful, hidden behind a gun.

Some men kill to survive in ininhospitable regions or even to defend themselves from an animal attack. The others are murderers of species, they kill without reason. To paraphrase the bard, animals are for some men, like insects for wanton children, they kill them for fun.

My first encounter with a jaguar happened at night and the darkness, we know, is the mother of all fears. I confess that I was apprehensive, exhaling fear in the air, which can be fatal, because I learned from dealing with bulls that when we show our fear, animals can easily understand and that gives them the courage to charge us. Fear looks like a star shining in the darkness, and when animals attack, they are deadly, no matter how strong we are.

Another meeting happened in the afternoon and I was able to contemplate all the beauty of the animal, until it disappeared as if by magic. Although the man is not on his menu, a jaguar will kill him with just one bite if he feels cornered. In fact, any cornered animal can kill. It is the time of greatest danger, because adrenaline leads to panic and the jaguar will attack with all fury and then it will run away without looking back.

Jaguars are solitary cats, almost mystical and hardly approach men. You may not see it, but maybe, if you look up, in some tree it is stalking you. Maybe, better not even to look up but, definitely, they aren't man eaters yet. There are still many types of animals for them to kill.

Photos: Hebert Van Der Beek/Mercury Press

What should you do if you see a tiger in the wild?

Mahmud Rookie Developer at Smartupworld (2017–present) 7mo

There is not much you can do. You are most likely to get killed and eaten. So what you really should do is, say your goodbyes and grab a stick or anything you can use as a weapon. And try to hit the tiger with it knowing you are most likely not going to succeed. It’s a beast much faster and stronger than you are with super sense. You are just a dumb human or a deer on it’s path. It’s a predator, you are just another weak prey. Usually a human have even less defense than a antelope. Antelope can run much faster than you, go reverse without losing speed, you are just two legged human, who ended up in the wild out of sheer stupidity or just plain bad luck.

This is a incident on India, a guy fell on Tiger’s Cage. He was killed before anybody could do anything. Tiger is much bigger, it’s attacks are way more fatal. You will be torn into shred before help arrive. And it knows where your jugular vein is. It’s like a killer doctor, who knows exactly where to bite to put you down nice and quiet.

Look at the canine they uses to sleep big animals, they will not stab you or pierce you, they will just separate the head from the body.

In the wild, tigers mostly feed on large and medium-sized animals, preferring native ungulates (horses, cattle, pigs, giraffes,camels, deer, and hippopotamuses) weighing at least 90 kg (200 lb). They also prey on other predators, including dogs, leopards, pythons, sloth bears, and crocodiles. Sambar deer, chital, barasingha, wild boar, gaur, nilgai and both water buffalo and domestic buffalo, in descending order of preference, are the tiger's favoured prey in India.[1]

It is a Alpha Predator. It hunts other predators. It is even stronger and bigger than Lions. And also more hostile.

The conservation charity Save China's Tigers stated "Recent research indicates that the tiger is indeed stronger than the lion in terms of physical strength. ... A tiger is generally physically larger than a lion. Most experts would favor a Siberian and Bengal tiger over an African lion."[2]

It will take about a second for A Tiger to end your little life. One bite on the neck and you are of to next adventure.

Footnotes

[1] Hunting & Diet
[2] Tiger versus lion - Wikipedia

Related Links

What could the man who fell into the tiger pit in India have done to prevent being dragged off by the tiger? Is there any way to deter a wild animal like that from attacking if someone is ever in that situation?

Is it true that tigers won't attack a human who is looking at them?
Do tigers attack humans? What would make them do so?

Why are tigers afraid to attack a person if they are facing them despite a person being much weaker than a tiger?

Why are tigers so dangerous?
Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
What would you do if you were face-to-face with a tiger?
Why do lions not attack when you are in a safari vehicle?
How do I survive a tiger attack?

Is it true that if a tiger eats human flesh once, it won't ever hesitate again to kill humans just

Photo: “Photographer captures incredibly rare moment jaguar dives to catch food - Caters News Agency"

Related Links

What should you do when you encounter a jaguar face-to-face?
Is it true that cheetahs do not attack or eat humans? If that is true, then why not?

Are there any examples of jaguars attacking people?
What is it like to have a Jaguar as a pet?
Can an average human kill a cheetah in a fight?
Which one of the “big cats” is the most friendly with humans?
How do you survive being attacked by a jaguar?
Do jaguars want to eat humans, or do they just attack?
Why are cheetahs friendly to humans?
Can a strong human beat a leopard?

Are humans the only species to wipe out prey animals?

Peter Kaye · Follow Former Ex Crocodile Hunter, Deep Sea Diver, Oilfield Work at Ocean Systems (1966–1996) Fri

Nope, would you believe that every fish that eats another fish is wiping out another prey animal? Also would you consider a shark a prey animal? Well here’s another one being eaten, then there’s also a crocodile being eaten by a snake.

A strong human can beat a leopard. A bit of an issue is that the felines have been historically well known to be man eaters.

A man eating leopard was attacking its last victim before it was shot and killed in that image.

Every inch of a leopard is designed to kill a human being.

Leopards are very muscular, they're born with a killer instinct, a human generally is not.

A leopard’s claws are designed to hold unto prey and tear chunks of flesh.

Those claws can tear through strong skin and thick hide. Leopards have been known to take down animals such as honey badgers, giant elands, baboons, gorillas, sloth bears, and even asiatic black bears.

Leopards in certain countries occasionally prey on gorillas, and some sites claim that gorillas are a whooping 8% of their entire diet in the jungle.

Can a strong human beat a leopard?

Polaris ·Follow Programmer Updated 17h

Now let’s see what strongmen can do.

He’s pulling a plane? That’s insane, it requires a massive amount of power to do so.

Ivan Savkin can pull a 296 tonne train.

He’s been known to pull ships and he even pulled a crane.

Hafþór Björnsson has been known for his wsm records. He’s even known for doing car walks!

Eddie Hall has been known for winning the title “world’s strongest man”, and as you can see he’s pulling a massive truck, with somebody sitting inside as well.

Brian Shaw in that image is pulling a 770 horsepower Shelby F-150. He is a force to be reckoned with. There’s one slight problem.

Why are lions scared of elephants?

Andre Frank Ortiz Adams · Follow I have seen a tiger at the Bronx Zoo. Mon Lions are fearful of elephants because they are bigger than them,unless it is a baby elephant,but still,elephants are not as easy to catch compared to impalas or gazelles.

Related Links

What exactly makes the lion the king of the jungle? I'm not even sure lions are the strongest animals.

Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
What causes elephants to lose to lions with all the advantages they have?
What is the difference between lions and elephants?
Who would win a fight between a lion and an elephant?
Why are elephants not eaten by lions and crocodiles?
How many male lions does it take to kill an adult elephant?

Can an elephant kill a lion? I know adult elephants are too large for lions to tackle, but I have seen plenty of YouTube videos and read about lions killing younger elephants still much larger then themselves. Are elephants too slow to kill lions?

Why do lions eat meat and elephants eat grass?
Why are people scared of hyenas but not lions when lions are more dangerous?
How do smaller animals attack and kill elephants who are so much bigger?
Why are elephants bigger than lions, and still aren't called the kings of the jungle?
Why are elephants scared of bees?
Why don't people eat elephants, tigers or lion meat?
Wildlife: Can an average lion kill an average elephant?

Why is the lion the king of the jungle when there are other animals bigger than the lion, for example, an elephant?

THE LION IS THE KING OF THE BEASTS. POUND PER POUND THE LION DOMINATES AS THE EARTH TOP PREDATOR

The title king of the jungle comes from 19th century India his real title king of the beasts.

IN PROPORTION TO HIS SIZE THERE IS NO OTHER ANIMAL THAT APPROACHES THE LION'S MUSCULAR POWER.

"The lion, equipped with the most powerful killing arm in the animal kingdom." - Field and Stream, Vol. 49, 1944 - Empire Digest, Vol. 3, Issues 7-12, 1946, p. 89.

The muscles of the Lion's fore-legs are unusually firm. No other provision would at once produce that pliancy and firmness which particularly characterize the limbs of the Lion in action. The weight of the Lion's body compared to his size is very remarkable; and this is produced by the extraordinary density of his muscles and the compactness of his principal bones.

The Edinburgh Review: Or Critical Journal, Volume 49 by Sydney Smith, Lord Francis Jeffrey, Macvey Napier, Sir George Cornewall Lewis, William Empson, Henry Reeve, Arthur Ralph Douglas Elliot (Hon.), Harold Cox, 1829, p.155 - The Edinburgh Review, Vol. XLIX, 1829, p.15).

The zoologist Francis Trevelyan Buckland (1826-1880): A pat with this formidable weapon is positively a fearful blow; the Nasmyth's steam-hammer, working with elegant ease, will strike a blow which the spectator would hardly expect without seeing its effects. The lion's paw is the Nasmyh's hammer in nature – Curiosities of Natural History: Third series, Vol. 1, by Francis Trevelyan Buckland, 1868, p.229.

The remarkable hardness of the bone of the fore-leg. The texture of this bone is so compact, for the purpose of resisting the powerful contraction of the muscles, that the substance will strike fire with steel. The hardness of the lion's bone forms a powerful instrument of destruction.

The Menageries: Quadrupeds, Described and Drawn from Living Subjects, Vol. 1, by James Rennie, 1829, p. 175.

Pound per pound the lion is the strongest mammalian on land.

Despite is size, the lion is the only predator of the African elephant. The lion has the greatest predator-prey weight ratio among the large land predators.

E0106 MIND-BLOWING MALE LION POWER

This elephant kill is a big animal.

But comparing the feet size of this elephant carcass to the one below, the other seems to be even bigger.

Lion kills elephant on its own. - Predator: Life and Death in the African Bush, by Mark C. Ross, David Reesor, 2007, p. 145.

E0015 MIND-BLOWING MALE LION POWER.

THE LIONS ARE THE ONLY PREDATORS POWERFUL ENOUGH TO KILL AN ELEPHANT. (National Geographic, March 15, 2011.)

AS HUNTERS MALE LIONS ARE EFFECTIVE KILLERS OF LARGE PREY

In natural history films, lionesses are usually portrayed as the hunters of the pride, while male lions mope around under shady trees. But males are no layabouts – they're effective killers in their own right, particularly when they target larger prey like elephants and buffalo. Aside from humans, lions are the only predators powerful enough to kill an elephant. The males, being 50%

He regularly takes down animals way bigger

Lions are incomparable risktakers. Because of their boldness and will power they do things that no other predator would dare to do.

E0064 FEARLESS LIONS. Lions are by far the highest risk takers. No tiger, bear or other predator would do this, only lions.

A fearless male lion doesn't want to let go its kill.

A fearless young male lion doesn't want to leave freshly killed buffalo.

This fearless lioness killed alone a big buffalo. But now, as to face the herd. For lions facing danger is simply a routine…

When a lion is highly motivated.

The lion has been proclaim king of the beasts thousands of years ago in antique Mesopotamia a land that had many powerful animals (elephants, Caspian tigers, brown bears, hippos, leopards, hyenas). He was considered king of the beasts by many civilizations as well. In fact history shows that the lion is the universal symbol of power.

Related Links

Why is a lion considered the king of the jungle, when an elephant is the only animal without a predator?

Who would win a fight between a lion and an elephant?

Why is a Lion the king of the jungle? Elephants are bigger and more intelligent, tigers are bigger and stronger, cheetahs are faster, giraffes are taller, and foxes are wiser.

What exactly makes the lion the king of the jungle? I'm not even sure lions are the strongest animals.

Why are lions called the "King of the Jungle" when they live in the desert?
Which animal is the king of animal?

Why was the lion given the title of the king of the jungle and not an elephant or any other animal?

Why are lions not found in Nigeria?
Why is the lion the king of the jungle if he doesn't live in the jungle?
Why are lions called King of the Jungle? Why are tigers called Lord of the Forest?

I'm watching a documentary about animals in Africa. How can the people get so close to the animals without them running away?

Henri Burger · Follow Medical Practitioner, Nature Lover, South African Updated 4y

Not sure what exactly you're watching, but let me introduce you to Dereck and Beverly Joubert, renowned wildlife photographers.
Mostly they do it like this.

Sometimes like this.

Or even like this.

So how do they do it? With patience and dedication. They follow the same animals for days on end until some of them get accustomed to them and their vehicle.

You know what lions do with their cubs when they go hunting? They hide them in a safe place or leave them with one or more females that don’t participate in the hunt. One particular pride that the Jouberts followed got so used to having them around that they once left their cubs in the shadow of their vehicle!

They are National Geographic Explorers-in-Residence and you can read more about this remarkable couple here Dereck & Beverly.

How do zoos bring in animals?

Gray Wilton · Follow Seeker of Lesser Known Facts (1970–present) Fri

They bring the animals in in cages:

Oops! You get the idea though.

Science, rockets and interesting ideas

Aditya Simha · Follow Posted by Carlos Gutierrez Mon I love animals May 4

I appreciate the efforts to mythicize honey badgers, but this is a serious mismatch in reality. It's possibly a bigger mismatch than me wrestling a no holds barred Hell-in-a-Cell match with Brock Lesnar. Unless the world has gone topsy turvy, Adult Crocodiles greatly outweigh and dwarf any Honey Badgers out there.

All the momma croc has to do is grab the raiding honey badger, and crunch him/her up as a light afternoon snack. There is no chance in hell of the honey badger surviving a stand-off with an adult Nile crocodile. Momma croc wins, each and every time!

Is the anaconda a prey?

Nathaniel Rice Bi, animal researcher & amateur wildlife historian1y
Originally Answered: Is anaconda a prey?

Definitely. Anacondas are apex predators, and at their maximum size they have few, if any, predators. At their much more common sizes, they are preyed on by other apex predators.

Jaguars will prey on anacondas.

So do caimans.

So do river otters.

I've heard of other animals preying on anacondas of varying ages and sizes. Turtles like the huge Arrau turtle will feed on young snakes, as will piraiba and other large fish.

Piranhas and river dolphins have been recorded attacking younger individuals and scavenging larger ones.

Are there any instances in the wild where an adult spotted hyena is being killed by a leopard?

Serge Elia Animal lover 1y

Oh yes, there have been, albeit very rare.

Even though they are the smallest of the Panthera genus (ie, the big cats that roar), nevertheless leopards remain bigger, stronger, much better built and braver than their lightweight cousins (the cheetahs), which easily allows them to put stand against spotted hyenas, to the extent of killing (and eating!) one if given the chance, whether the individual hyena is a youngster or a fully grown adult.

However, those instances rarely occur, because, when confronted by hyenas, a leopard would usually have no choice but to climb up the nearest tree (as hyenas are ill-adapted in tree climbing), or at least snarl and lash off at its attackers without killing them – if it happens that an individual leopard attacks and kills an adult hyena, it generally means that that cat exhibits an unusual amount of strength and size, as seen in the video below:

Related Answer
Can a male African leopard kill a female spotted hyena in the wild if he comes upon a lone female hyena?

Leopard wins.

Leopard and Hyena

Date: Monday, October 08, 2007

Producer: Ronnie Watt
E-mail: veldfocus@iafrica.com

It was at Londolozi where John Hillidge of Dainfern watched a leopard feeding on its kill in the branches of a tree. A hyena was anxiously pacing below, waiting for scraps to fall to the ground. The leopard then finished feeding, andjumps to the ground and finds a comfortable spot in the middle of a dry river bed. The young hyena loiters about, but then boldly comes right up to the leopard! With its belly full the leopard relaxes and nods off. It appeared oblivious to the hyena but then rears its head and snarls at the intruder, warning it off.

Such a peaceful scene between two otherwise bitter enemies is out of the ordinary! If more hyenas were present it could have been quite a different scenario as there is no love lost between these two rival species.

Previously we showed a hyena pirating prey from a leopard. Though the leopard tried to stand its ground, the hyena boldly rushed in to grab the prey. Twice the leopard tried to fend off the thief but in the end the hyena triumphed and carried off the remains of the carcass.

But hyenas do not always walk away unscathed from interactions with leopards. There is one record of a leopard which not only knew the trick of keeping a hyena at bay, but also killed it and it did so not only once, but three times!

But here there's no call for aggression from either side here. The leopard has nothing, except for its peace and quiet, to defend. The hyena won't attack because there is nothing to scavenge. For now the two adversaries will tolerate one another - next time 'round, it might be an altogether different case.

http://www.5050.co.za/inserts.asp?ID=7998

"It was first light as we left Mombo camp, within five minitues we saw Hyenas running from all directions. Our guide Simon shouted 'Leopard in a tree' but as we approached he jumped down. Who knows why? maybe he thought there was only one Hyena, BIG mistake! before long he was surrounded by 5 blocking his escape to a nearby tree. They attacked him from all sides (note the one on the right has a firm hold)he was rolling on his back slashing with all feet. The sounds were horrific and there were tears from the ladies in our vehicle,clouds of dust everywhere.They dragged him into a bush and before long all went quiet, we feared the worst,reminding me of thugs beating up a helpless guy in a back alley. After a while the Leopard appeared slowly edging away from the bush again followed but the Hyenas, but this time they were submissive and keeping a safe distance. Later we managed to locate them licking their wounds, the old man had inflicted some nasty gashes and bites.

Not the best of images, it happened so quickly and didn't have much of a view, or the opportunity to change my settings."

http://www.outdoorphoto.co.za/forum/photopost/showphoto.php?photo=236038

Bite Force
Panthera pardus
Bite Force Canines - 621.1 N
Bite Force Carnissials - 964.4 N
BFQ Canines - 119,8
BFQ Carnissials - 123.4

Crocuta crocuta
Bite Force Canines - 565.7 N
Bite Force Carnissials - 985.5 N
BFQ Canines - 99.6
BFQ Carnissials - 115.3

The article is entitled The Quintessential Cat by Luke Hunter.

The leopard's remarkably diverse diet is one reason for its exceptional success. Whereas lion prides require high densities of large herbivores to subsist, and cheetahs are most successful where antelopes such as gazelles and impalas are abundant, the leopard can survive on fish, rodents and birds. Ted Bailey, a scientist who studied leopards in the Kruger National Park, tallied prey records from around the continent and discovered that at least 92 different species have been documented in the leopard's diet, among them dung beetles, grasshoppers and even scorpions. However, leopards generally invest the most energy in hunting prey where the pay-off is greatest, and in the majority of African ecosystems they concentrate on the most abundant medium-sized ungulates present. In the southern Kruger Park where impala density is among the highest in Africa, Bailey's study showed that impalas constituted almost 88 per cent of leopard kills. In Tanzania's Serengeti National Park, the plentiful Thomson's gazelle is the most frequently killed prey, whereas in Kafue National Park in Zambia it is reedbuck, waterbuck and puku.

Where such species are absent or occur in low numbers, the leopard is able to switch to other, less 'profitable' prey. In the Kalahari Desert, most kills weigh less than 20 kilograms, and porcupines, steenbok and small carnivores feature prominently in the leopard's diet. In Israel's Judean desert, Zimbabwe's Matobo Hills and the Cedarberg range in the south-western Cape, rock hyraxes (dassies) are the most common prey item, whereas West African rainforest leopards have a diet dominated by duikers and small primates such as colobus and mangabey monkeys.

Even our closest relatives are not invulnerable. In the Tai' Forest of the Cote d'lvoire, leopard predation is the main cause of chimpanzee mortality. Indeed, the leopard is one of the few carnivores able to overcome the extraordinary intelligence, vigilance and strength of adult chimps. During a 12-year study, chimp researchers documented at least 17 of their study animals lost to attacks by leopards. A further six severe maulings were observed: one of the chimps injured was a prime adult male - a formidable opponent for any predator. Despite these interactions, primates do not feature as prey as often as people suspect. One of the great myths about leopards is that baboons are an especially favoured prey item. Yet in the western Cape mountains where baboons are one of the most abundant of the larger mammals, only two per cent of leopard scats in one study contained baboon hairs. While baboons are definitely taken wherever the two species co-occur, there are numerous records of leopards being severely injured or even killed by baboon troops. Leopards treat baboons with due caution; they often avoid them during the day and concentrate on attacking stragglers or juveniles, sometimes even taking them from their night-time roosts in trees and rock outcrops.

Other carnivores are also fair game to leopards. While lions may invest a great deal of energy in killing fellow predators, their motivation seems more to eliminate competition than to acquire food, and they frequently leave such kills untouched. Leopards, however, have been recorded killing and eating everything from dwarf mongooses to adult spotted hyaenas. One well-observed Ngorongoro Crater leopard killed and ate 11 jackals in less than a month, which suggests that small canids may be preferred prey when abundant, and there is considerable truth in the belief that leopards are partial to dogs. Such unusual preferences may vary from region to region. In arid north-eastern Namibia, researcher Flip Stander discovered adult cheetahs were sometimes killed as prey by leopards, a remarkable occurrence also recently observed by tourists in the Kalahari Gemsbok National Park in South Africa. Yet in the comparitively lush bushveld of northern KwaZulu-Natal, I saw three cases of leopards killing cheetahs and leaving the carcasses untouched. Perhaps where the density of more 'typical' prey species is low - such as in desert regions - leopards cannot afford to be choosy and are more likely to eat the meat of other predators.

Also, I want to see evidence of hyenas taking down warthogs. You can say they have the power to do so. But there is no case. Leopards are better built for fighting dangerous opponents than leopards.

From Beat about the Bush: Mammals
By Trevor Carnaby

My most eye-opening experience of leopard power was, however, a scene in which a large male had killed a full-grown boar warthog, and had it stolen by three spotted hyaenas. For ten minutes the big cat lay ten metres away and watched the three consume his prize. The hyaenas then made a fatal mistake – they broke ranks, with two individuals stepping a few yards back to investigate a noise behind them. In a blur of motion the leopard charged, leaping over the carcass and hitting the remaining hyaena in the chest, bowling it over. He then grabbed the carcass (still weighing about 30 kg) and streaked off, hyaenas in tow, to a marula tree ten metres away. Leaping up, prey suspended like a rag-doll, he hit the tree two metres above the ground, and without stopping took it up to a horizontal branch approximately five metres up. The badly-mangled carcass was difficult to balance on the branch, and it fell to the ground and was immediately seized by the hyaenas. Had I not witnessed what happened next I would not have believed it – the leopard dropped onto the hyaenas from the branch, and with a flurry of paws and flying hyaena fur grabbed hold of the pelvic region of the carcass and engaged in a tug-of-war with the hyaenas at the head region. Within seconds the carcass broke in two and, the dispute now settled, both species settled down to eat their spoils a mere five metres apart. An occasional deep-throated growl from the leopard was enough to send the hyaenas scuttling. Not daring to contest the kill again, they departed after finishing their share.

Here is another video showing a leopard utterly destroying a hyena really fast.

Hyenas do not have what it takes, leopards dominate hyenas in serious encounters and hyenas have shown no competitive behavior vs leopards in serious encounters. A leopard would for sure beat a female spotted hyena.

Related Answer
Which animal would win in a fight between a hyena and a grey wolf?

Daniel White, lives in Harrisburg, PA Updated Jun 29, 2018

This should help answer your comment. It seems to me everyone believes the hyena will win. Well I will answer these arguments made from other users.

"The hyena is bigger so it automatically wins"

I would assume this match is at near and/or equal weights, so I will put this out of the way.

"Wolves are only strong as a group"

The above is wrong, as wolves can, and have taken large prey solo. Also hyenas work as a clan, so they indeed work in groups as well. Bad logic there.

"Hyenas have stronger and better bites"

First of all, psi estimates are handled by pressure, not force. Also, the wolf has superior killing jaws (greater R-Shift, better incisors, easier disembowelment, longer canines, more teeth, wider gape, and better leverage/technique) The wolf outclasses the hyena here. Also, a wolf broke into the eye orbit of a musk ox, everyone constantly talks about this bone breaking bite hyenas have yet I haven't seen a single feat about this! I've never heard of a hyena breaking a bone of another hyena solo, nor have I heard of a hyena breaking a bone of a large herbivore solo.

"Hyenas are more aggressive"

No, hyenas actually are pretty non aggressive towards predators, the account of a leopard deterring 5 hyenas shows this. Hyenas are very bold, but they don't seem very aggressive. In that video the hyenas simply toyed with that old, thin leopard. Replace those hyenas with wolves and the leopard is being ripped apart.

"Hyenas are a lot stronger"

This is the biggest argument for the hyena, but it actually is not significantly stronger. Humerus robusticity correlates to overall body mass, the hyena used in that study was larger. The wolf would likely have about 1% (little more, little less perhaps) less robust measurement than the hyena. That is not significant and it's one of the only advantages the hyena really has.

Wolves go for the skull and apply the bite and shake method, hyenas do not bite anywhere significant when they fight, most of the pics/vids that say they're 'skull biting' just show hyenas making desperate ear bites, nothing more.

Also, for those hyena Europe sources, hyenas are LARGER than wolves! Which makes the source irrelevant as this is a near equal or equal weight match.

Also, Arabian wolves DO NOT COUNT for this match, Arabian wolves are tiny!

Are there any proved cases of dhole packs killing adult tigers or leopards?

Serge Elia, Animal lover Answered Jan 30, 2018

On some occasions, dholes may attack tigers. When confronted by the canines, the striped cats will have to choose between seeking refuge in trees and standing their ground – in the second case, it would be wise for the dholes to make a hasty retreat and leave the big cats alone.

Sure enough, tigers, being the top of the food chain in Southern Asia, are dangerous opponents for dholes, as they have sufficient strength to kill with a single paw strike, and may eat a dhole if given the chance. There have been lots of recorded instances of tigers standing against dholes, such as this:

In this clip from a Animal Planet documentary called Tigress Blood, a pack of dholes zone in on a tigress after she tried to stalk them. But despite her weakness, the tigress, whose name is Mona, stands her ground, not running away, but rather chasing any attacking canine. Eventually, the dholes fall back, leaving her be.

This is proof that nothing, not even a strong pack of dholes, can put stand against a tiger. As such, the tiger truly is the most feared animal in India, and the ultimate king of the Indian jungles. Thus, there are very few instances of dhole packs killing adult tigers.

Concerning leopards, since they are smaller than tigers, dhole packs tend to react more aggressively towards the spotted cats than they do towards their bigger striped cousins.

The wolf will out grapple, out fight, and out kill the hyena in this match.

Related Links

Can a hyena kill a leopard in a one-on-one fight?

Can a male African leopard kill a female spotted hyena in the wild if he comes upon a lone female hyena?

Are there any proved cases of dhole packs killing adult tigers or leopards?

Why do hyenas only nip lions when attacking them instead of disembowelling them like they do with their prey?

Is it true that leopards have killed adult lions and adult tigers in the wild?
How come lions don't eat hyenas after killing them?

What will happen if male cheetahs form a coalition of 10 in the wild? Would they be able to stop spotted hyenas, lone leopards, and lionesses from stealing their kills?

Can a lioness kill an adult spotted hyena?
How dangerous is a lone spotted hyena?
Who would win, a striped hyena or the Indian leopard?

Are lions the most fearless wild animals?

Oliver Starr I sometimes sleep next to a wolf...Updated 1y

Not by a long-shot.
Lions are a relatively recent species. They're highly evolved mammals with complex brains, the same could be said for wolverines, wolves, and every other furred creature with the hint of a badass reputation.

But they are mere pretenders. Every one of them will exhibit fear.

This guy will kill you accidentally while deciding if you're food.

Sharks have been around in their modern form for about 100,000,000 years.

Compared to a lion, sharks have much simpler brains and they live generally solitary lives. It's likely that they have a limited capacity to feel anything akin to what we describe as fear. This doesn't mean they lack a self-preservation instinct, but avoidance behavior and fear are not the same things.

Above: this guy will try to eat you and the cart your rode in on. Your puny golf clubs won't even slow him down.

Alligators popped up for the first time around 37 million years ago. Their reptilian brain is far less developed than any mammal's. They may retreat from a stimulus that they perceive as threatening, but I think it's highly unlikely they experience fear the way more recent creatures with more modern brains do.

Above: meanwhile puny humans can scare the king of beasts right off their dinner.

Related Links

Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
Would a full lion in the wild be safe for a human being to approach?
What are some mind blowing facts about lions?
If I saw a wild tiger or lion, would it attack me if I tried to stroke it?
What is the most fearless animal?
What do lions do most of the time?
Which animal is most dangerous for a lion?

Why does it seem like lions are more loved than tigers, and lions get more credit and recognition than tigers do when they're equally beasts?

What animal is a lion scared of?

They can also opportunistically take unguarded livestock when wild natural prey is scarce due to human encroachment or overhunting. Though simple livestock management techniques have been shown to reduce this by 100%.

And if the opportunity to take a small mammal runs past their nose also take that opportunity to grab a snack.

Opportunities also present themselves in larger packages, when cheetahs have the numbers of a good coalition or family group.

So on the whole, cheetahs usually hunt small to medium antelope and gazelles, but they are smart enough to take advantage of a good opportunity when they can.

[Image Credits: Onesmus Irungu, Cheetah Research Project, Animal Africa, Ahmad Abu Ganem.]

If I saw a wild tiger or lion, would it attack me if I tried to stroke it?

Alex Cooper Answered Apr 27, 2020

This is a complex question and will depend on your own knowledge and quick thinking.
Lions and tigers are much like the mythical Sphinx. Should you wish to pet them, you must answer a complex riddle.

The tiger will ask: “What’s the difference between a duck?”

The answer, of course: “One leg is both the same.”

It subverts your expectations of what a joke should be.

The lion will ask you whether a cream tea should be made with jam then cream on the scone, or vice versa.

For the next course: (human) finger sandwiches.

Actually, the lion will then kill you whichever option you choose. He’s kind of an arsehole.

Sorry for that little detour around the question. We've arrived at an actual answer, so enjoy your stay and don't forget to thank the bus driver:

Of course it would attack you. (Also, people will occasionally tell me that my jokes are not obvious enough and lead to misunderstandings. So I'm going to come clean with you: lions and tigers do not ask you riddles or enquire about your afternoon tea preferences.)

Wild big cats are for all intents and purposes a different species to captive ones. (Not literally; you know what I mean.) A captive-raised lion or tiger is still dangerous, but people (e.g Kevin Richardson) can form some kind of bond with them.* Even he doesn't interact with animals he hasn't known since birth.

Unless Carole Baskin has smeared some sardine oil on your shoes.*

A wild animal you've never seen before? It wouldn't let you get anywhere near close enough. "Fight-or-flight" would kick in, and the big cat would probably be very confused. Other animals don't tend to just want to chill and be friends with them.

It might just walk or run away (perhaps intimidated by the insanity radiating off someone who would try this), but more likely it would see you as a threat and precipitate your shuffling off this mortal coil.

Footnotes

[1] What is the Key to Cheetah Cubs' Survival? - Cheetah Conservation Fund Canada
[2] Cheating cheetahs seen chasing hyena before stealing its prey
[3] Livestock Guarding Dogs Protect Cheetahs and Wolves, Too! • Cheetah Conservation Fund

Can cheetahs be counted as opportunistic feeders? Or are they more of the selective eater type?

Nick Nicholas · Follow Studied Big Cats for 40+ years Apr 23

Cheetahs generally aim for prey which are small to medium sized. It is unusual to see a single cheetah go for anything much bigger than an adult Grant's Gazelle.

Coalitions of cheetahs like the Brothers of the Masai Mara can take down bigger prey like gnu or zebra.

To the best of my knowledge cheetahs do not eat carrion. In that respect they cannot be regarded as opportunistic feeders though they will hunt anything suitable which crosses their path.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Posted by Jo Mburu Wed

A researcher once played a recording of an elephant who had died. The sound was coming from a speaker hidden in a thicket. The family went wild calling, looking all around. The dead elephant's daughter called for days afterward. The researchers never again did such a thing.

NATURE
The Depths of Animal Grief

BY CARL SAFINA WEDNESDAY, JULY 8, 2015 NOVA NEXTNOVA NEXT Elephants in Kenya's Amboseli National Park

An elephant in Tanzania carrying her stillborn calf.

Elephants die; we all do. In elephants and some others, it matters who has died. It's why they are "who" animals. The crucial importance of memory, learning, and leadership in a family's survival is why individuals matter. And so, death matters to the survivors.

A researcher once played a recording of an elephant who had died. The sound was coming from a speaker hidden in a thicket. The family went wild calling, looking all around. The dead elephant's daughter called for days afterward. The researchers never again did such a thing.

Elephant Burials

Elephants' response to death has been called, "probably the strangest thing about them." They almost always react to a dead elephant's remains. Occasionally they react to a human's. The remains or bones of other species, they ignore.

Joyce Poole writes, "It is their silence that is most unsettling. The only sound is the slow blowing of air out of their trunks as they investigate their dead companion. It's as if even the birds have stopped singing." They cautiously extend their trunks, touching the body gently as if obtaining information. They run their trunk tips along the lower jaw and the tusks and the teeth—the parts that would have been most familiar in life and most touched during greetings—the most individually recognizable parts.

Cynthia Moss, director of the Amboseli Elephant Research Project in Kenya , told me of a wonderful matriarch named Big Tuskless. She died of natural causes, and a few weeks later Cynthia brought her jawbone to the research camp to determine her age at death. A few days after that, her family passed through the camp. There are several dozen elephant jaws on the ground in the camp, but the family detoured right to hers. They spent some time with it. They all touched it. And then all moved on, except one. After the others left, one stayed a long time, stroking Big Tuskless's jaw with his trunk, fondling it, turning it. He was Butch, Big Tuskless's seven-year-old son.

Nowadays humans immediately cart off every tusk. But in 1957, David Sheldrick wrote that elephants have, "a strange habit of removing tusks from their dead comrades." He noted, "many instances" when elephants took tusks weighing up to 100 pounds up to half a mile. Iain Douglas-Hamilton once moved part of an elephant shot by a farmer to a different location. Soon a familiar family came along. When they caught the scent, they wheeled around and cautiously approached the body, drawing nearer with trunks waving up and down, ears half-forward. Each seemed reluctant to be first to reach the bones. They advanced in a tight huddle, then began their detailed sniffing and close examination of the tusks. Some bones, they rocked and gently rolled with their feet. Others, they clonked together. Some they tasted. Several individuals in turn rolled the skull. Soon all the elephants were investigating, many carrying bones away. George Adamson once shot a male elephant who had chased an official around his own garden. Local people butchered him for meat, then moved the carcass half a mile away. That night, elephants returned a shoulder blade and leg bone to exactly the spot where the elephant had fallen.

Elephants sometimes cover dead elephants with soil and vegetation, making them, as far as I'm aware, the only other animals who sometimes perform simple burials. Elephants have done the same when humans are involved on several recorded occasions. When sport hunters shot a large male elephant his companions surrounded his carcass. The hunters returned hours later to find that the others had not only covered their dead comrade with soil and leaves—they had covered his large head-wound with mud.

In Distress

Do they have a concept of death? Do they anticipate death? One day a few years ago in Kenya's beautiful Samburu reserve, a matriarch named Eleanor, ailing, collapsed. Another matriarch, Grace, rapidly approached her with facial glands streaming from emotion. Grace lifted Eleanor back fully onto her feet. But Eleanor soon again collapsed. Grace appeared very stressed, and continued trying lifting Eleanor. No success. Grace stayed with Eleanor as night fell. During the night, Eleanor died. The next day an elephant named Maui started rocking Eleanor's body with her foot. During the third day, Eleanor's body was attended by her own family, another family, by Eleanor's closest friend Maya, and again Grace was there. On the fifth day, Maya spent an hour and a half with Eleanor's body. A week after her death, Eleanor's family returned, and spent half an hour. Recalling this to me, Iain Douglas-Hamilton used the word "grief."

Do elephants really grieve; could we really know? After a young elephant dies, its mother sometimes acts depressed for many days, slowly trailing far behind her family. When a female named Tonie gave birth to a stillborn baby, she stayed with her dead child for four days, alone in the heat, guarding it from lions who wanted it. Eventually, she moved on.

Elephants sometimes carry sick or dead babies on their tusks. An Amboseli elephant carried a prematurely born, dying baby about 1,500 feet into the cool seclusion of a grove of thick palms. Similarly, people have seen apes, baboons, and dolphins carrying dead babies for days. But is the mother really sad? Or is she carrying an infant a she would be carrying if it were alive? Answer: elephants and dolphins never carry healthy youngsters. It's different.

The same is true with orcas. In September of 2010 off San Juan Island, Washington, people watched as a killer whale pushing a dead newborn for six hours. If this whale understood death purely rationally, she should just leave it. But humans don't simply leave dead babies either. For us there is a concept of death, but also a feeling of grief. Our bonds are strong. We don't want to let go. Their bonds, too, are strong. Perhaps they, too, don't want to let go.

A few years ago on Long Island, a nursing-age young humpback whale, somehow ailing and alone, still alive, washed into the surf at Bridgehampton. Marge Winski, a lighthouse keeper 25 miles away at Montauk, told me that the night after the young humpback washed ashore, she heard "incredibly mournful whale sounds," as if from a searching mother. When a free-living Atlantic spotted dolphin named Luna got permanently separated from her days-old infant in murky water in the presence of a large tiger shark, Denise Herzing wrote, "I had never heard a mother more vocally distressed." When a captive dolphin named Spock suddenly died, his inseparable companion looked bewildered and lay lethargically on the bottom for days, rising only to breathe. After several days she resumed eating and begin socializing. Maddalena Bearzi writes, "A grieving dolphin mother may seek seclusion, away from her group, but in this time of grief, she might be visited by a group of her peers, perhaps coming to check on her, as we humans often do when someone we know is bereaved."

In Mourning

So— do other animals really grieve? To continue this discussion with intelligence and clarity, we need a more scientific definition of grief. Anthropologist Barbara J. King provides one. To qualify as grief, surviving individuals who knew the deceased must alter their behavioral routine. They might eat or sleep less, or act listless, or agitated. They might attend their friend's corpse. King's definition of grief is quite useful. Sadness is not a kilogram lighter than grief, and mourning isn't two meters shorter than happiness. Yet science thrives best on things that can be measured. In humans, these emotions grade, and sometimes come and go. And they seem to grade in non-humans, too. A person might miss several days of work following the death of a parent or sibling; mourners might attend a wake for a day or two; and an elephant family might for several days return to the body of the deceased. Later, the humans might visit the grave. Ditto the elephants. The trajectory of human lives may be permanently altered by the death of a key family member. Ditto, again, elephants, wolves, and apes.

Sadness is not a kilogram lighter than grief, and mourning isn't two meters shorter than happiness.

In a zoo in Philadelphia in the 1870s lived two inseparable chimpanzees. "After the death of the female," the keeper wrote, "the remaining one made many attempts to rouse her, and when he found this to be impossible his rage and grief were painful to witness…The ordinary yell of rage…finally changed to a cry which the keeper of the animals assures me he had never heard before…hah-ah-ah-ah-ah, uttered somewhat under the breath, and with a plaintive sound like a moan…He cried for the rest of the day. The day following, he sat still most of the time and moaned continuously." More than a century later at the Yerkes Research Center, a chimpanzee named Amos remained in his nest while the others went outside. The others kept returning indoors to check on Amos. A female named Daisy gently groomed the soft spot behind his ears, and stuffed soft bedding behind his back as a nurse might arrange a patient's pillows. Amos died the next day. For days afterward the others acted subdued, eating little. Two male chimpanzees in Uganda had for years been inseparable allies. When one died, the other, who'd been sociable and high-ranking, "just didn't want to be with anybody for several weeks," said researcher John Mitani. "He seemed to go into mourning."

Researchers have witnessed a range of emotions in elephants, including what appears to be grief.

Patricia Wright studies Madagascar's primates, called lemurs. Pat says that when a lemur dies, "For the whole family, it's a tragedy." She detailed for me what she observed after a cat-like mongoose called a fossa killed a sifaka lemur. "After the fossa left, the family returned. His mate gave the 'lost' call over and over. When sifakas are really lost they give it less often and it's higher and more energetic. But this was a low whistle, mournful, haunting; over and over." The other members of the group, all sons and daughters of the dead male, also gave "lost" calls while viewing the corpse from just above it, in tree branches 15 to 30 feet off the ground. Over five days, the lemurs returned to the body fourteen times.

Professor and behavioral ecologist Joanna Burger's Amazon parrot, Tiko, used to spend time in the company of Joanna's mother-in-law while she was living with them during her final year of life. During the elder woman's final month, Tiko would try to prevent the hospice people from touching her. If they merely wanted to take her temperature, he'd attack them; he needed to be moved to his room while they were there. In her last week, Tiko spent the days sitting by her head as she lay there sick, guarding her. "He barely wanted to leave to eat," Joanna explained. The night the woman died, after her body was removed from the house, Joanna says, "Tiko spent a lot of the night screaming from his room where he'd never before made a sound at night, no matter what was going on downstairs." For months, Tiko would spend hours on the bed that his elderly human acquaintance had used.

Love Lost

Grief is not just a response to death. Sometimes people we know die but we don't grieve. Sometimes people we love decide to walk out of our lives, and though they remain alive, we grieve. We simply, terribly, miss them. Knowing them changed our lives, and losing them changes our lives. Grief isn't solely about life or death; it's mostly about loss of companionship, loss of presence. Barbara J. King says that when two or more animals have shared a life, "Grief results from love lost."

Is love really the right word? If an elephant sees her sister and calls to maintain contact, or a parrot sees its mate and wants to be nearer, some feeling of the bond makes it seek closeness. One word we use for the feeling behind our desire for closeness is love. Elephants and birds don't feel their love for one another the way I feel my love, but the same is true of my own friends, my mother, my wife, my step-daughter, and my next-door neighbors. Love isn't one thing, and human love isn't all identical in quality or intensity. But I believe that the word that labels ours, labels theirs. Love, as they say, is many splendored. Love probably is the right word.

Excerpted from Beyond Words: What Animals Think and Feel by Carl Safina, to be published July 2015 by Henry Holt and Company, LLC. Copyright © 2015 by Carl Safina. All rights reserved.

Photo credits: Diana Robinson/Flickr (CC BY-ND) , Anna Ritenour/Flickr (CC BY), Glenn Simons/Flickr (CC BY-NC)

Related Links

Is it true that cheetahs do not attack or eat humans? If that is true, then why not?
Why are wild cheetahs (generally) so friendly to humans?
Why are cheetahs friendly to humans?

Do animals know when to stop eating or eat less their prey since their prey can't reproduce quick enough?

If cheetahs were once tamed animals, why won't they breed in captivity?

Do cheetahs hunt smaller preys such as birds and rodents, or do they have a more selective taste for impalas and gazelles?

Are cheetahs adapted to hunting in groups?

What makes the cheetah the fastest terrestrial animal, more so than other big cats and herbivores?

With cheetahs being weak and unable to defend their kills against rival predators, how will they evolve in the next million years in order to survive as a species, if at all?

Why do cheetahs have difficulties to reproduce in captivity?

Can cheetahs be counted as opportunistic feeders? Or are they more of the selective eater type?

Robin Shepard, Projects, Volunteer at Cheetah Conservation Fund
Answered Apr 24

Cheetahs are smart!

They are fast - and they know it. Cheetahs are the kings of speed on the savannah and usually hunt for fresh meat.

But… they are occasionally opportunistic when that's the smart move!

If hunting is difficult in an area due to high predator conflict, they have been known to steal, or scavenge a kill from other predators.[1] [2]

These cheetahs stole a kill, which a spotted hyena took down, after chasing him off. The exact opposite of the way we think of hyena—cheetah relations!

They can also opportunistically take unguarded livestock when wild natural prey is scarce due to human encroachment or overhunting. Though simple livestock management techniques have been shown to reduce this by 100%.[3]

Related Links

Is it true that cheetahs do not attack or eat humans? If that is true, then why not?
Why are wild cheetahs (generally) so friendly to humans?
Why are cheetahs friendly to humans?

Do animals know when to stop eating or eat less their prey since their prey can't reproduce quick enough?

If cheetahs were once tamed animals, why won't they breed in captivity?

Do cheetahs hunt smaller preys such as birds and rodents, or do they have a more selective taste for impalas and gazelles?

Are cheetahs adapted to hunting in groups?

What makes the cheetah the fastest terrestrial animal, more so than other big cats and herbivores?

With cheetahs being weak and unable to defend their kills against rival predators, how will they evolve in the next million years in order to survive as a species, if at all?

Why do cheetahs have difficulties to reproduce in captivity?

What happens to an alpha male Lion if he is beaten?

Faith Paul B.S. in Zoology and Biology, Delaware Valley University (Graduated 2021) 3y

Male lions are quite the busy bees. Successful males may reign over several prides, often with other males (usually brothers or cousins).

A male lion unfortunate enough to be kicked out of his existing pride will either die alone or find a new pride and attempt to keep it as long as he can.

Life for an elderly male lion, especially that of one who is alone, is not glamorous or any lifestyle commonly associated with a king. It's often a lonely existence, full of hardship, starvation, and nomadic migration. Mostly, it's hanging on long enough to catch another meal or take over another pride.

Many exiled males die of wounds sustained either from the initial fight which lost them their pride and territory, or hunting injuries acquired after being thrown out.

Every once in a while a male may come across a prideless female(s) and begin a new pride with her, but opportunities like that almost never occur.

Coalitions consisting of up to three male lions are ideal. There is strength in numbers and the more males available to assist in territory patrol, upkeep, and defense decrease the odds of a pride takeover by outsiders.

Related Answer
What happens to an alpha male Lion if he is beaten?

Faith Paul , B.S. Zoology and Biology, Delaware Valley University (2021)
Answered May 31, 2018

Male lions are quite the busy bees. Successful males may reign over several prides, often with other males (usually brothers or cousins).

A male lion unfortunate enough to be kicked out of his existing pride will either die alone or find a new pride and attempt to keep it as long as he can.

Life for an elderly male lion, especially that of one who is alone, is not glamorous or any lifestyle commonly associated with a king. It's often a lonely existence, full of hardship, starvation, and nomadic migration. Mostly, it's hanging on long enough to catch another meal or take over another pride.

Many exiled males die of wounds sustained either from the initial fight which lost them their pride and territory, or hunting injuries acquired after being thrown out.

Every once in a while a male may come across a prideless female(s) and begin a new pride with her, but opportunities like that almost never occur.

Coalitions consisting of up to three male lions are ideal. There is strength in numbers and the more males available to assist in territory patrol, upkeep, and defense decrease the odds of a pride takeover by outsiders.

Adam Wu, Amateur scientist Answered May 31, 2018

Assuming he survives the defeat, he goes back to the life he lived before he won his current pride - that of a lone bachelor male.

If he is lucky he may find other bachelor males to team up with in a sort of bachelor group.

If not, he will have to go it alone.

All the while he will be trying to win another pride. Sometimes the same pride he originally lost, if the opportunity arises (perhaps the male he lost to gets sick or injured, giving him a chance for a rematch under more favorable odds)

It is a precarious time for him, as a lone male lion is generally not able to hunt sufficiently well to maintain his nutritional needs indefinitely. So the period without a pride is one of slow, gradual (or not so gradual) starvation. It goes without saying that the longer he goes without winning a new pride, the weaker he gets and the less likely he will be to ever win that new pride.

The three potential outcomes boils down to:

1. He wins a new pride
2. He gets killed fighting for a new pride
3. He starves to death

The older the lion at the time of his dethronement, the more likely option 3 is to be his fate.

Related Links

Why don’t lionesses stop a male lion from killing their cubs? There are surely enough females that would beat him, right?

Why do male lions back off when the lionesses try to attack them?

What happens to the old male lions who are thrown out from their pride by the young lions?

How do they survive? Can old lions live in coalitions like the young ones sometimes do?

What happens to a lion after he has been beaten by another male lion and kicked off his pride?

How do young male lions live after leaving the pride?
Are male lions abusive towards their lionesses?

Why don't male lions hunt considering that they are bigger and stronger than lionesses?
Do lions kill orphan cubs?

How do you keep an Alpha Male from leaving you for another woman?
Why do lions fight each other using their paws rather than going with much more

Why are cheetahs just found in Africa? Why can't they be introduced in other countries by humans?

Serge Elia · Follow Animal lover 2y

As the other answer pointed out, cheetahs don’t solely live in Africa, they’re also found in Asia. However, after a time in which the Asiatic cheetah (see above and below) lived from India all the way to the Middle East, years of over-hunting and habitat loss reduced its range dramatically, right until the species became limited to fragmented pockets in Iran, where their population is now numbered to less than 50–100 individuals.

The only hope for the cat's survival lies in the sheer success of conservation efforts, including the ones that aim to stop poaching and deforestation, lessen conflits with humans, rehabilitate and reintroduce captive individuals to the wild, and ensure cheetahs a better future. In fact, in 2009, the government of India contacted its Iranian counterpart to explore the possibility of supplying cheetahs in order to reestablish the species' presence in India (since the species has been extirpated there since the 1950s) – Indian authorities also put out the project of importing cheetahs from Africa. The reintroduction project was on the verge of being arranged, but as of 2012, it's on hold.

Some uncovered fossils suggest that cheetahs originated from North America and migrated to the Old World at around 5.5 million years ago, most likely due to a sharp decline in prey populations, which resulted in a population bottleneck. One particular species, the giant cheetah – so named because of its larger size, around 2 meters long (see above) –, roamed the wide open plains of Europe and China during the early and middle Pleistocene, before going extinct around 10,000 years ago.

Eventually, cheetahs left the Americas, and ventured into their current ranges, the great plains of Africa and Asia, where they thrived, roamed by the millions, and enhanced their sprinting abilities and survival skills. Unfortunately, the world's fastest land animal faces today a grim and uncertain future, because even its incredible speed is not enough to escape all the man-made catastrophes (trophy hunting, habitat loss, poaching, conflicts with farmers, global warming…), all of which are rendering it greatly threatened with extinction.

So, it’s only up to us humans to help cheetah populations replenish again, by encouraging all conservation efforts that are under way to protect these magnificent felines, and by punishing all those who delight themselves in torturing the poor cats for personal interests.

Related Answer
What are the different types of cheetahs in the world?

Marcus Waltz studies at Mount Othrys (2025) Answered Oct 10, 2018

Northwest African Cheetah: It is a critically endangered species and is native to the Sahara desert and the Sahel.

Northeast African Cheetah: Contemporary records contain confirmed population status only in South Sudan and Ethiopia. Population status unknown in other Northeast African countries.

East African Cheetah: Mainly found in grasslands and Savannahs of Eastern Africa. Mainly inhabits the Serengeti region.

Est-ce qu'il existe un hybride lion-léopard?/ Is a lion-leopard hybrid real?

Jerome Cohen Ami des animaux depuis plus d' 1/2 siècle.Traducteur · 9 mai

David M. Prus Lifelong interest in animal behavior, ecology, and evolution

Oui. On les appelle léopards et lipards.

Quelques-uns sont apparus naturellement dans la nature, mais d'une manière générale, ces animaux rares ont été délibérément croisés, selon des tests génétiques.

No image available

Acinonyx jubatus velox: Now recognized invalid species discovered in Loita Plains in Kenya.

Related Links

Why are cheetahs friendly to humans?
Can India bring cheetahs back to its forests?
Is it true that cheetahs do not attack or eat humans? If that is true, then why not?
Why are wild cheetahs (generally) so friendly to humans?
Are there wild African cheetahs introduced in the Arabian countries?
How are they faring? Is the introduction process still ongoing?
Why are cheetahs endangered?
How many cheetah species are there currently in the world?
Why did humans originate from Africa only and not some other part of the world?

If cheetahs are so fast, why do gazelles outrun them 9/10 times? Aren't gazelles faster by that fact?

Why is Africa so rich but so poor?

Réponse similaire

Quels sont les animaux sauvages qui ont une mauvaise réputation mais qui sont en fait des animaux pacifiques qui n'attaqueraient pas les humains à moins d'être provoqués ?/ What are some wild animals that get a bad reputation but are actually peaceful animals that wouldn't attack humans unless provoked?

Vincent Person , Master Droit, Universités (2015) Traducteur · Traduit le 2 sept. 2020

Scott Rivers Wildlife Relocator, lives in New Mexico, USA

La plupart des animaux sauvages ne se réveillent pas le matin en se disant "Je vais attaquer à un humain aujourd'hui." 99% des animaux que vous voyez dans la nature sont heureux d'éviter tout type de conflit, que ce soit avec d'autres animaux ou avec des humains. Même les animaux dits "dangereux". C'est pour ça que mon travail est si difficile, j'essaie généralement d'attraper un animal sauvage et ils font de leur mieux pour s'éloigner de moi.

J'ai vu bien plus d'animaux se détourner et s'éloigner de moi dans la nature que ceux qui m'ont approché, de façon menaçante ou non. Ma réponse est donc que la plupart des animaux sauvages (si ce n'est tous) ont une mauvaise réputation en ce qui concerne leurs interactions avec les humains.

Maintenant, si vous vous promenez en provoquant les animaux (pensez à la dame au cul stupide et au bison de Yellowstone), vous serez probablement "attaqué". Si vous marchez sur un serpent à sonnette et que vous lui donnez un coup de pied, vous serez probablement frappé avant qu'il ne s'éloigne. Jetez un tas de sang et de copains dans l'eau et allez ensuite nager, un requin vous rendra peut-être visite et voudra grignoter votre stupide cul. Si vous vous enfoncez le bras dans le terrier d'un mignon petit chien de prairie et que vous en attrapez un, vous risquez de vous faire mordre (oui, je l'ai déjà fait).

J'ai plus peur d'être blessé par des "animaux non sauvages" comme les vaches, les chevaux et les chiens que par beaucoup de créatures sauvages.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les animaux devraient-ils être protégés ? Les dodos ne manquent à personne, non ? Je ne comprends pas pourquoi on doit conserver les animaux sauvages et dangereux.

Quels sont les exemples d'animaux qui sauvent délibérément d'autres animaux et/ou des personnes dans la nature ?

Quel est l'animal le plus dangereux sur Terre ?
Quel animal de compagnie préférez-vous entre le chien et le chat ? Et pourquoi ?

Est-ce que le fait de porter des vêtements décourage les animaux sauvages de vouloir attaquer les humains, ou est-ce que cela n'a aucun effet ?

Si quelqu'un élève un animal sauvage depuis qu'il est bébé, y a-t-il de fortes chances que l'animal, une fois adulte, s'attaque à son propre maître ?

Si les animaux sauvages, à la fois prédateurs et proies, ont adapté leur apparence pour devenir un camouflage dans leurs habitats naturels, pourquoi aucun d'entre eux n'est vert ?

Est-ce que les animaux sont racistes ?
Quelles sont les marques d'intelligence animale les plus terrifiantes ?
Existe-t-il des animaux sauvages élevant d'autres animaux pour leur propre

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Rangers Guide Lost Wild Baby Elephant Being Stalked By Lions Back To His Mom.

· Follow Posted by Kathy Pennell Fri

(Photo credit: Lewa Wildlife Conservancy)

When rangers with the Anti-Poaching Team of Lewa Wildlife Conservancy received news that a very young elephant calf had wondered off and lost his mother and herd, the men sprung into action to save his life!

Not only was the elephant calf at risk from being separated from his herd, but he also had a pride of 10 lions tracking him, waiting for the right time to strike.(Thankfully, the rangers arrived to help him get back safely to his family.

"Rangers tried to keep the calf calm as they continued to lead him towards his mother and herd," Lewa Wildlife Conservancy wrote on Facebook. Rangers continued to steer the lost elephant calf to his herd.

When they finally got close enough, the baby's mother came over to bring him back home! The calf was finally reunited with his family thanks to the rangers' quick thinking!

The Lewa Wildlife Conservancy located in Northern Kenya is home to several hundred elephants, an oasis amid the slaughter and devastation many African elephants are facing because of poachers. That's why the life of every wild elephant is precious!

Source: Nature World

Rangers Guide Lost Wild Baby Elephant Being Stalked By Lions Back To His Mom

Rangers Guide Lost Wild Baby Elephant Being Stalked By Lions Back To His Mom When rangers with the Anti-Poaching Team of Lewa Wildlife Conservancy received news that a very young elephant calf had wondered off and lost his mother and herd, the men sprung into action to save his life! 1 | 5 2 | 5 3 | 5 4 | 5 5 | 5

https://nature.ugurturkum.com/rangers-guide-lost-wild-baby-elephant-being-stalked-by-lions-back-to-his-mom_995?fbclid=IwAR3RbLIvmn8ptzILI3eaI9HRetKKZolKq4sRbbvp9es8XOWzl_gyKiiVqh0

Do all big cats kill their prey in the same way?

Billy Gladman Lives in London (1998–present) 3y

Talking about the true 4 big cats, Leopards, Jaguars and Tigers all sneak up on their prey and ‘ambush’ them. Lions are known as ‘pursuit’ predators. They will stalk their prey and wait for the right time to pounce. Pretty similar style to be honest, but different approach to it I guess. They mostly kill the same way, clamping down on their preys throat, but there is 1 that kills in a slightly different style.

Lions: Bite preys neck, suffocates/blocks arteries leading to brain, resulting in death

Tiger: Bite preys neck, suffocates/blocks arteries leading to brain, resulting in death

Leopard: Bite preys neck, suffocates/blocks arteries leading to brain, resulting in death

Jaguar: Well.. these guys are a bit different. While Jaguars are more than capable of killing their prey by suffocating them, and they do quite often, Jaguars prefer a slightly different approach. They bite through the skull. Yep. The skull. They even hunt Aligators.

Jaguars have a CRAZY strong bite force of around 1300PSI. To put that into perspective, a fully grown human Male can bite down at about 150PSI. Tigers (the largest and most powerful cat) have a bite force of around 1000PSI and Hyenas (Who can bite through bone easily) are around 1150PSI. So Jaguars have a stronger bite force than the largest cat by quite some distance, the beasts of Africa who eat their preys bones when there isn’t enough meat and almost 10 times stronger than a humans.

So they all have a similar build up style when hunting. They will all get as close as possible and ambush their prey (Lions being the exception) but Jaguars typically get the kill using a different technique.

Hope this helped.

Edit: Jaguars don’t hunt Aligators, they hunt Caimen which is basically a small crocodile. Sorry for any confusion.

Related Links

Do all big cats kill the prey the same way? If I was attacked by a big cat, would it kill me the same way?

How do Big Cats kill?
How silent are big cats when they stalk their prey?

If I got lost on an African safari and came face-to-face with a growling lion, what should I do to garner the best chance of survival?

Why do cats torture their prey before a kill, a habit (except leopards) not found in the big cats? Why are cats evolved to do so?

Why don’t lions attack people in open jeeps?
Why do lions not attack when you are in a safari vehicle?
What should you do when you see a lion?
Why do big cats attack other animals by the neck?
How do I escape from tigers?

Related Answer
If I got lost on an African safari and came face-to-face with a growling lion, what should I do to garner the best chance of survival?

Originally Answered: If I were to get lost on an African safari and come face to face with a growling lion, what should I do to garner the best chance of survival?

The first thing you do when coming across a "growling lion" is freeze and avert your eyes. You also do not point at it.

p

see stalking indications then raise your arms above your head and wave them and most importantly SHOUT YOUR HEAD OFF. If you have something in your hand then throw it at the lion. Even if the lion charges you do not run. Believe me this can be extremely intimidating. They charge at 80 km per hour and the roaring is deafening. If you have frozen and then lion is not approaching but not leaving either then start to back slowly away. If it starts to move, then freeze immediately.

My wife, Marjet, once walked into a whole pride at a concession we were running in Botswana. It was early morning during the cool season and she was walking from our home to the camp (a couple of hundred meters away). The lions had just arrived and were sunning themselves in the tall grass, so she didn't see them till she was right on top of them. Despite the aggressive roaring and repeated charges from different lionesses she held her nerve and walked away without a scratch. Needless to say she doesn't take any nonsense from me...

Night time encounters are another story. I was once doing problem animal control in Gache Gache in Zimbabwe, trying to bait and shoot a lion that had killed several people and the night before had almost succeeded in breaking into Chief Mangare's hut. It was dark but moonlit and I was lying on the ground, carefully backed into a euphorbia hedge along with two game scouts and a fellow ranger. I heard a very faint noise behind me and the lion was crawl-stalking me and just 10 foot back! He had actually carefully crawled through the dense hedging to sneak up on us. He was too close for me to be able to turn and shoot. However, I turned on the torch in my hand and shone it in his face. He ran off. So, if you are walking in the bush at night (it happens in safari camps especially) and come across lions, keep your beam in their eyes and back away.

One of the biggest myths is fire. Lions are not afraid of campfires and will often walk round them and see what's happening. However, keeping a fire between you and a lion is probably better than nothing!

Related Answer
What could I do if I am in a car surrounded by lions in the wild?

Varad Joshi, lives in Dubai, United Arab Emirates Answered Aug 29, 2016

Originally Answered: What could I do if I am in a car surrounded by lions in a wild life ?

First thing would be to enjoy the majestic view!!!

5 answers already and no one mentioned it already. Sigh.

This would be the case only if you are in a sanctuary or in wild jungles of Africa or India.

I have been to lot of safaris and never been in such scenario unfortunately. Enjoy the view of lions up close as not everyone is as lucky as you.

Here are some DON'Ts:

Don't make weird faces to them. They don't care about it. Also most important thing is DO NOT COME OUT OF THE CAR OR ROLL DOWN THE WINDOWS (if you have).

Slowly try to drive away once you have seen them enough. If they are in front then you don't have any other option than waiting there. I wouldn't recommend honking at all.

Hope you get in this situation, which is like a dream come true for me.

Related Links

Do all big cats kill the prey the same way? If I was attacked by a big cat, would it kill me the same way?

How do Big Cats kill?
How silent are big cats when they stalk their prey?

If I got lost on an African safari and came face-to-face with a growling lion, what should I do to garner the best chance of survival?

Why do cats torture their prey before a kill, a habit (except leopards) not found in the big cats? Why are cats evolved to do so?
Why don't lions attack people in open jeeps?
Why do lions not attack when you are in a safari vehicle?
What should you do when you see a lion?
Why do big cats attack other animals by the neck?
How do I escape from tigers?

How quickly can an anaconda kill its prey? What does the prey die from?

Jacques Malan Updated 2y

Anacondas kill via means of constriction. They bite the prey animal and then wrap their powerful bodies around it in what is called constriction coils. This immobalizes their prey and allows them to kill it.

Load cell tests inside mock prey items have verified that the anaconda can exert pressures of 90 PSI - that is like being pinned down by a truck. The movies will claim that the Anaconda would break your ribs, rupture your organs and snap your spine; this is a lie. For the most part, bones are not broken during killing. Despite the occasional bone being broken, Anacondas and other constrictors therefore take great care to not break any bones. But why?

Broken bones are sharp and they are dangerous. A snake crushing its victim so hard that it fractures its bones runs the risk of those very same bones protruding and piercing the skin of the snake. Snakes, unlike their crocodilian cousins, do not have the immense healing properties their blood gives them and are quite prone to infection. Deliberately breaking bones is therefore a bad strategy.

So how do they kill?

Wrapping themselves tightly around their prey, they wait for the first exhale. When the animal takes a breath, the snake tightens. Another breath, another tightening. You can actually feel what an anaconda's squeeze would be like; you just need one of these:

Fit your arm snugly inside the patch and then with every exhale, you pump three times. See how long it takes before you get really uncomfortable…and then you think about this happening around your chest whilst a 300 lbs snake is operating a 90 PSI pump.

What eventually happens, is that the snake shuts off blood flow to vital organs, such as the heart and brain. What follows is usually cardiac arrest, although a few proponents have posited that the constriction would interfere with neural processes by forcing too much blood to the brain. Either way, the death is not very pleasant.

How long does it take?

Obviously the time it takes the snake to kill a prey item depends largely on the prey animal itself. Are we talking a mouse, a bird, a capybara, a gazelle, a cayman or a jaguar? The bigger the animal, the longer it takes.

What about humans?

Large constrictors like Reticulated Pythons, African Rock Pythons, Anacondas and others, have been known to hunt and kill (and in some gruesome cases, eat) humans. How long would the average human last in such a powerful constriction?

Below you see a pretty good comparison in humans: the rear naked choke aka the sleeper hold.

The rear naked choke accounts for more than 60% of all submissions in MMA due to the ease of application of the hold. Obviously, in MMA, the trapped fighter has to either escape the hold or tap out. If not, unconscious can follow in as little as 45 seconds. If the hold is not released, brain death will follow usually in 3–5 minutes.

I would guess that a human in the coils of a giant Anaconda or Python would last roughly the same amount of time.

Can a pack of wolves take down a fully grown tiger?

Serge Elia · Follow Tiger lover Updated 2y

The answer is no.

Wolves' greatest threat, other than man, is the tiger. Even a lone tiger is more than a match for a whole pack of wolves. (Check the climax of the 2016 Jungle Book, during which Shere Khan fights off the wolves)

Today, wolves are considered scarce in tiger habitat, being found in scattered pockets, and usually seen travelling as loners or in small groups. First hand accounts on interactions between the two species indicate that tigers occasionally chase wolves from their kills, while wolves will scavenge from tiger kills. Tigers are not known to prey on wolves, though there are four records of tigers killing wolves without consuming them.

Recently released tigers are also said to hunt wolves. This competitive exclusion of wolves by tigers has been used by Russian conservationists to convince hunters in the Far East to tolerate the big cats, as they limit ungulate populations less than wolves, and are effective in controlling wolf numbers.

How many unarmed fully grown men does it take to defeat one fully grown Siberian tiger in a well-lit, open, environment without obstacles?

Can a pack of wolves kill a male tiger?
What animal can take down a full grown tiger?
How many wolves would it take to kill a Siberian tiger?
Chimpanzee vs. Wolf, which animal would win? Why?
Who would win in a fight: a pride of lions or a pack of wolves?
Are there any proved cases of dhole packs killing adult tigers or leopards?
Which would win in a battle: a pack of 14 wolves or one tiger?
Who's side would win: a tiger or 5 wolves?

Humans are practically defenseless. Why don't wild animals attack us more?

Walter Bradley Maggs Maguûdzé · Follow Startup Founder, Investor, Curious mind & all round nice guy Sun

The bloke in this picture is an average sized man who is probably not the most physically imposing specimen. He was ambushed & attacked by a large male lion but this man was not ready to be the lions lunch, he killed the king of the jungle with his bare hands. A 190+kg apex predictor was killed by an unprepared & unarmed 65kg unfit middle aged man!

Most answers here are giving all sorts of fancy theories but having lived in Africa I've seen the practical real world answer to this question. Humans are not defenseless we have the best natural weapon there is….our glorious thinking ability!

The bloke in the picture is one example. He doesn't have the unique attacking or defensive abilities animals have & definitely lacks in physical strength as well so he's hopeless if ambushed by a predator well in theory that is. The lion attacked him in the one one way it knows how & used it's size, huge claws, teeth & strength to try & make lunch out of an easy target but our hero here doesn't have those physical attributes to match the Leo but he does have his impressive human superpower, the most powerful of all abilities the animal kingdom. He knows how the lion will attack & knows a bit about biology & how things work so if the lion has size & strength as it's tool then it's probably using a lot of oxygen too so sticking a hand down it's throat & pinning it with the rest of his body will probably work & it did. He got heavily injured but the lion having limited thinking ability couldn't think to change it's habits & got checkmated even if it had the physical advantage & the surprise element.

Now imagine if the man knew the lion would one day try to hunt him in his own property. He'd have carried & weapon & easily killed it or even killed it without even being there by using traps etc. Humans are not hunted by animals as a primary source of food because we are the hardest animal to mess with naturally animals evolved to hunt more easier & convenient prey. Being big thinkers also means we are prone to emotions like anger & seeking revenge. Animals probably learned not to mess with a creature that will wipe out your species for hurting one of their own. Humans are top of the food chain so animals are naturally programmed to attack easier prey.

Quel est le prédateur de l'hippopotame ?

Erwan Vaineau Serviteur de l'humanité (1987–aujourd'hui) 2 ans

Réponse originale : Quel est le predateur de l'hippopotame ?

L'hippopotame commun est un animal d'une puissance formidable et peu peuvent rivaliser avec lui, au point que même les humains y font attention. Le problème c'est qu'ils sont aussi très lourds et que leur puissance les rend dangereux mais presque uniquement quand ils sont dans l'eau.

Or l'hippopotame ne vit pas que dans l'eau, étant herbivore, il se déplace la nuit sur la terre ferme pour rejoindre des pâturages et fait parfois des distances importantes pour cela. Dans ces instants là il est peut être vulnérable, principalement à des attaques de lions ou de hyènes qui peuvent y voir un formidable festin L'hippopotame se déplaçant souvent en groupe, ce sont essentiellement les jeunes qui sont visés, les adultes, surtout mâles peuvent toujours faire très mal. Plus rarement, les crocodiles peuvent s'en prendre aux hippopotames mais c'est plus souvent par opportunisme qu'autre chose.

Related Answer
Quel est le prédateur de l'hippopotame ?

Jean-Jacques Fauquet, Maitrise histoire de Université Lille III (1978)

Répondu 20 août 2019 Réponse originale : Quel est le predateur de l'hippopotame ?

Le pauvre hippopotame a de nombreux prédateurs.

D'abord le crocodile,puis les lions,le léopard,les hyénes les pythons,

Sont principalement chassés les jeunes puis les adultes agés et enfin les individus isolés sur terre.

Questions similaires

Quel animal est prédateur du rhinocéros ?
Quels sont les principaux prédateurs du gorille et comment le tuent-ils ?

Quel est le prédateur le plus puissant du règne animal (individuellement et collectivement) ?

Quels sont les prédateurs naturels des sangliers ?
Quels sont les prédateurs des hyènes ?
Qui est le prédateur du lion ?
Quels animaux sont en même temps prédateur et proie entre eux ?
Quel est le prédateur du crocodile ?
Quels sont les prédateurs de l'ours noir ?
Quel prédateur fait fuir de peur les gorilles ?

Is the anaconda a prey?

Nathaniel Rice · Follow Bi, animal researcher & amateur wildlife historian11mo

Originally Answered: Is anaconda a prey?

Definitely. Anacondas are apex predators, and at their maximum size they have few, if any, predators. At their much more common sizes, they are preyed on by other apex predators.

Jaguars will prey on anacondas.

So do caimans.

So do river otters.

I've heard of other animals preying on anacondas of varying ages and sizes. Turtles like the huge Arrau turtle will feed on young snakes, as will piraiba and other large fish.

Piranhas and river dolphins have been recorded attacking younger individuals and scavenging larger ones.

Related Links

How quickly can an anaconda kill its prey? What does the prey die from? What animals prey on anacondas?

Can an anaconda eat a person? Are there any legitimate documented cases of an anaconda eating a person?

Can humans beat an anaconda?

Why is the bite of an anaconda terrible?
What do green anacondas eat?
Can an anaconda swallow humans?
Do anacondas and pythons always kill their prey before consuming them?
Are the Anaconda attacks on humans defensive or offensive?
What are the special survival strategies of the anaconda?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: The Barbary Lion

· Follow Posted by Jo Mburu Tue

Once the largest of all lions, roamed until the early 20th century when it was declared extinct in the wild. Weighing 30% more than today's African lions, Barbary lions were also distinguished by dark manes that stretched to their shoulders.

Photo by Dennis Donohue.
Source Lion recovery fund .

Which animal has a greater capacity to conserve its energy in combat, the crocodile or the python?

Samuel Perloff · Follow Around 20 years experience as a bird and nature watcher Wed

Both animals are known to have limited energy to expel and try to conserve as much as they can, as large cold-blooded animals. I would give the python the edge in the greater capacity for energy in combat over the crocodile.

Mutual killing between a reticulated python and a king cobra, with the latter (a specialized predator of other snakes) probably overestimating their ability to take a grown python.

Pythons use their coils to try the get the better of prey and enemies, a lengthy process of constriction followed by the tiring process of engulfing if the victim is prey. Crocodiles try to finish attacks and combat as quickly as possible, retreating to the water to rest after if possible. Crocodiles have high levels of lactic acid in their blood which allows them to stay underwater for long periods but if put through a length period of struggle, the lactic acid levels in their blood can kill them.

DAILY NATION:

Trouble in William Ruto's Kenya Kwanza Alliance as aspirants say they're being ignored

Waikwa Maina, Mwangi Muiruri - Yesterday 5:00 PM

Deputy President William Ruto and his running mate Rigathi Gachagua visits in the central Kenya region have left politicians in small parties affiliated to the Kenya Kwanza Alliance bitter.

The aspirants have convened a crisis meeting to discuss the way forward with a high possibility of a resolution to quit the alliance.

During the political tours, aspirants sponsored by Chama cha Kazi and The Service Party of Kenya, (TSP) were frustrated after the UDA team campaigned for their candidates and denied others the opportunity to address the rallies.

Incidentally, TSP party leader Mwangi Kiunjuri has of late not joined UDA officials and candidates in their political campaigns in central Kenya.

During the DP's tour, the biggest casualty in Nyandarua was Speaker Wahome Ndegwa who wants to unseat Governor Francis Kimemia. Mr Wahome was openly frustrated and rejected by his Chama cha Kazi party leader Moses Kuria, who appealed to the voters to elect UDA candidate Kiarie Badilisha.

Trouble between Mr Wahome and Mr Kuria started when the party cancelled his ticket in favour of the UDA candidate, but Mr Wahome, who claims to have paid a Sh500,000 nomination fee for the ticket and an equal amount to support party activities, moved to court and was reinstated.

Drama and humiliation

On the DP's visit, Mr Wahome downplayed the drama and humiliation. He dismissed Mr Kuria and other UDA party leaders as strangers in Nyandarua whose actions have no impact on his candidature."I did not contest so that I'm supported by a party or a stranger to Nyandarua," said Mr Wahome.

Ms Judy Muhia of TSP, who is battling for the Woman Rep seat with UDA's incumbent Faith Gitau, Chama cha Kazi's Marion Mwathi and Jubilee's Wanjiku Muhoho, terms what the DP and his running mate did as a real problem.

TSP deputy secretary-general Waithaka Kirika, who is also vying for the Nyandarua governor seat, said that UDA has discriminated against candidates from other coalition parties, especially in central Kenya."What we have seen is UDA preaching water but drinking wine. Everything about the Kenya Kwanza coalition is suspicious and they have no moral authority to accuse Azimio of insincerity."We have received concerns from our party candidates from all over the central Kenya region which has necessitated the convening of a crisis meeting to discuss the way forward, we have no business remaining in a coalition where we are not wanted," said Mr Kirika."There is hypocrisy in all that UDA is doing; they cannot give conditions of 70 per cent votes from western Kenya to Senator Moses Wetang'ula and ANC leader Musalia Mudavadi yet the two leaders are expected to accompany the DP in his campaigns all over the country," said Mr Kirika.

Campaign

"If the DP is sincere, let him facilitate the two leaders to campaign in western Kenya."DP Ruto is on a six-day campaign blitz in Mt Kenya in what is seen as an attempt to undo the gains of Azimio la Umoja One Kenya Coalition running mate Martha Karua's recent whirlwind tour of the region.

The two major formations locking horns in the August 9 General Election appear to have picked Mt Kenya as the battleground for the all-important win.

The battle lines became distinct when Ms Karua was named the running mate on May 16 and she kicked off her Mt Kenya onslaught in her home county of Kirinyaga on May 17 in the afternoon. In the morning, she toured Nyandarua County.

On May 18, Ms Karua campaigned in Meru County before proceeding to Tharaka-Nithi on May 19. Late in the evening of the same day, she ventured into Embu County. On May 20, she toured Nyeri and Murang'a counties before proceeding to Kiambu on May 21.

After Ms Karua left Nyandarua on May 17, Dr Ruto visited the area two days later on May 19. Accompanied by Mr Mudavadi, Mr Wetang'ula and Democratic Party's Justin Muturi, Dr Ruto said Ms Karua was "only helping Odinga sneak into the mountain camouflaged as an asset when we all know he is a liability".Earlier that day, Dr Ruto had attended the burial of Mr Gachagua's elder brother in Nyeri County before he proceeded to Gatundu South.On May 20, DP Ruto hosted an economic forum in Embu before he proceeded to Ukambani. The following day, the DP was back in Murang'a, before he headed to Mr Gachagua's Mathira constituency, and closed the day with rallies in Gatitu and Nyeri town.

Yesterday, both teams were in Kiambu County.Read also: Ruto brigade rejoices at Uhuru 'move to avoid' poll campaignsDr Ruto presided over an economic forum for Limuru constituency in the morning before he went back to Murang'a where he campaigned in Mathioya and Kigumo constituencies.

On the other hand, Mr Odinga was in Kiambu town for a meeting with religious leaders, accompanied by Ms Karua and Interior Principal Secretary Karanja Kibicho.8.6 million votesCounter attack strategy committee member Joe Nyutu, who is contesting the Murang'a senatorial seat on a UDA ticket, said the Kenya Kwanza team had zeroed in on Nakuru, Kiambu, Nyandarua, Nairobi, Laikipia, Murang'a, Nyeri, Kirinyaga, Embu, Meru and Tharaka-Nithi as the theatre of what he said will be continued efforts to lock the Azimio team. The 11 counties have 8.6 million votes."We are privy to the Karua tactical plan in Mt Kenya region ... we have decided that we will keep an eye on her moves and move in with timely responses to avert her effect," Mr Nyutu said.

Yesterday, Ms Karua maintained that she is on the ground to give Kenya Kwanza a run for its money."They need not panic because I have not even started in the follies ... they should wait for my second round and the third that will impart the sucker punch, leaving Mr Odinga as the region's candidate of choice," said Ms Karua in an interview on Inooro TV.

About pockets of heckling that have characterised her campaigns in the region, she said: "They don't have the guts to face me. They can only send children whom they have fed on alcohol and drugs to do the dirty job for them. I dare them to confront me one on one and we shall deal."“By virtue of speaking the area language, understanding the political dynamics and terrain, I have seen the UDA euphoria build and I understand how it was the case. I am bringing a counter-narrative that will certainly tilt the scales," she said.

Yesterday, Mr Gachagua sought to downplay the DP's forays of the mountain after Ms Karua's, saying the Kenya Kwanza team is out vote hunting just as they have been.“Karua is not an issue to us since she is not our competitor ... we don't want at any time to lose our focus on Mr Odinga who is our common political problem."Kandara MP Alice Wahome, another Ruto ally, said the political direction of the mountain had not changed.“Ms Karua is not competing against Dr Ruto hence why we are not interested in her activities," she said Ms Wahome. Murang'a Senator Irungu Kang'ata said Ms Karua had made no gains in the region.

What is one of the hardest lessons in life?

Gisele Histoires vraies et de la Fantaisie cuite chez Travailler à la maison (2019– aujourd'hui) dim.

La question est précise, alors voici le prédateur africain a la vie la plus penible:

Très triste ce que l'argent peut pousser les gens à faire. Juste pour l'ivoire qui ne satisfait jamais.

What is one of the hardest lessons in life?

Je partage les 35 leçons les plus dures de la vie. Elles ont été trouvées sur Internet et Quora pour qu'elles restent au même endroit.

Il devrait y avoir une passion qui est bien plus grande que le sexe.

L'ego n'est pas mauvais ; l'ego vous fait apprendre à survivre dans un monde crucial.

Tu ne peux pas blâmer la société pour ton échec à jamais.

Ne vous servez pas des femmes comme centres de réadaptation pour vous sortir de votre relation violente passée.

Une fois que vous informez les gens de votre succès, il y a moins de gens qui sont réellement heureux de votre succès, ils seront jaloux et voudront vous faire tomber.

Les femmes ne sont pas des objets sexuels.

Personne n'est aussi sincère avec toi que ton père.

Dans le monde de l'entreprise, les gens ne s'intéressent pas à vos opinions, ils s'intéressent à "être d'accord" avec eux.

Vivre ta vie selon le code "ce que les gens pensent" est inutile.

Dire "Non" aux bonnes personnes, au bon moment, c'est la leçon la plus dure de la vie.

Faire des compromis avec des gens qui te traitent comme une merde juste pour satisfaire ta solitude temporaire.

Prouver un argument aux gens qui n'ont pas de rêves est inutile.

L'argent vous achète le bonheur est la chose la plus difficile à comprendre

La vie, c'est bien plus que du sexe, de la nourriture et un toit.

Vous ne pouvez pas vivre sans les gens et les gens ne sont pas dignes de confiance.

"Plus d'amis" n'est rien d'autre qu'une distraction pour une personne avec des rêves.

Tu devras prétendre que tu t'en sors bien, c'est la leçon la plus dure.

La recherche de la perfection est une perte de temps, d'énergie et de passion ; au lieu de cela, cherchez simplement une façon intelligente d'exécuter ce que vous avez commencé.

Pardonner quelqu’un c’est comme lui enlever le couteau planté dans le corps

Dans le monde de l'entreprise, "être gentil" signifie laisser les gens se servir de vous, et les gens se servent de vous sans scrupules.

Ils ne t'aiment pas, ils survivent à une rupture difficile.

Un jour ou l'autre, vous mourrez, peu importe ce que vous croyez.

Personne ne s'intéresse aux vérités sur lui/elle veut juste entendre des mensonges agréables.

Si vous attendez un miracle, vous ne verrez aucun miracle dans votre vie.

Dieu et le bonheur ne sont pas des choses à trouver en dehors de toi.

Il y a moins de temps que vous ne le pensez pour apprécier vos proches et vos parents.

Personne ne va mourir vierge, la vie nous encule tous.

L'apparence est importante à moins ou jusqu'à ce que vous soyez incroyablement riche et fortuné.

Il y a toujours quelqu'un qui aura de moins bonnes notes, mais beaucoup plus intelligent que toi.

Épargner et investir l'argent de votre salaire est la leçon la plus difficile à tirer lorsque vous n'avez pas beaucoup de temps et d'argent à investir ou à épargner.

Les gens vous respectent pour ce que vous avez ou ce qu'ils pensent de ce que vous avez.

Dieu vous donne l'espérance dans les moments les plus sombres de votre vie

Si vous cherchez la vie de certitude, vous vivrez la vie moyenne
Ne faites jamais connaître vos rêves futurs.

Les gens sont plus intelligents et plus riches que toi.
source : Expériences personnelles, Internet et Quora

P.S. Il ne vous en coûtera rien si vous appréciez mon travail de rassembler ces 35 leçons les plus dures de la vie" de Quora et Internet.

(!) Il s'agit d'une traduction

Questions similaires

Comment s'appelle l'animal qui a la plus longue durée de vie ? Et combien d'années pourra-t-il vivre ?

Quels sont les deux animaux les plus improbables qui se sont accouplés avec succès ?
Quelle est la chose la plus difficile à comprendre de la culture anglaise pour les Français ?
Quelle est la relation prédateur-proie la plus étrange ?

Quels sont les prédateurs des crocodiles ? Quels sont ses ennemis naturels ?
Quelle a été la décision la plus difficile de votre vie ? S'est-elle avérée être la bonne ?

Quel est l'intérêt des rayures des zèbres (qui ne semblent pas dissuader les attaques des prédateurs) ?

Quelle est la chose la plus difficile à expliquer à propos de votre vie ?
Quel animal est inoffensif alors qu'il paraît être un dangereux prédateur ?
Quelle est la spécialité médicale la plus difficile ?

Are crocodiles meaner than alligators?

Reese Mac , Strong like bull, smart like tractor Updated Oct 29, 2021

Ten years directly on the Everglades on the edge of Fort Myers, Florida.
Much of the rest of my life in northern Australia.

The sheer number of alligators on the everglades is something to see.
There are stretches of old 41 where the canals that run parallel and alongside the highway are so full of alligators you could literally walk across them. I am talking back to back for miles and miles.

Thousands of them.

They're under parked cars, in parks, walking across golf courses and in peoples swimming pools.

I have witnessed each of those examples personally many times (I'm a pool plumber).

Crocodiles can be thick too but not even close to that thick.

I am no particular expert but know crocodiles are territorial and having witnessed alligators cohabitating in the numbers referenced above, suspect crocs are territorial to a degree alligators aren't.

While crocodiles can certainly be found around towns and populated areas and often are, where crocodiles are contextually high in numbers is usually in remote river systems, off beaches and in mangroves more often than not hundreds of miles from the closest population centers.

I will tell you this though:

I will take chances with American alligators I would never even think to take with Australian Salt water crocodiles.

I have swum across alligator infested canals and rivers.
You would never catch me even considering that in Northern Australia because while American Alligator's diet includes these:

Related Links

What's more dangerous, alligators or crocodiles?
Where do alligators and crocodiles live in the same ecosystem?
Reptiles: If an alligator fought a crocodile, which animal would win?
Are alligators tamer than crocodiles?
What can alligators do that crocodiles can't, and vice versa?
Which would you say is more vicious and/or intimidating, Alligators or Crocodiles?
Do crocodiles and alligators like each other, or could one eat the other?
What should I do if a crocodile attacks me?
Are there alligators and crocodiles in Hawaii?
Is crocodile or alligator leather more durable than calfskin?

Why don’t crocodiles kill outside of water?

Patricia Snyder , former aerobic/swim instructor, plant person, science fan
Answered Mar 5, 2018

Originally Answered: Why didn't this crocodile kill that antelope?

Looks like a case of biting off too much to chew, to me. Crocs and alligators have a size range for their prey, which they prefer to drag into the water to drown. That is always the game plan. Clamp on, submerge, roll, and bite off pieces to swallow. They don’t have teeth to chew. They just take smaller prey into their jaws and crush them, bone and all, and the larger prey is torn apart. In fact, in Florida, where I live, offering a big gator an arm to chew on, instead of a more vital part, is one strategy to stay alive while you figure out what to do next. Well, not swimming in a canal at two in the morning would be strategy A.

All of the crocodilians - crocodiles, alligators and caimans - are known for being ferocious predators. They will eat just about any animal, fish or bird that they are large and strong enough to kill. The largest crocodilians will attack and eat animals that are as large as a bull! Their main way of inflicting death is to rush, bite and try to retreat back to the water to drown their quarry, coupled with rolling and violently shaking and breaking bones with their teeth, causing massive blood loss.

The fact that this didn’t happen with the animals in the clip makes me think that the crocodile decided the prey was too large to wrestle with or perhaps was simply defending it’s nest or territory and not in the hunting mode. That would be extremely unusual given that the quarry was not that large, I thought, and already down. It was a very lucky antelope. Certainly it’s not something that happens very often.

Related Links

Is any python capable of preying on a full-grown Nile crocodile?
Can a python kill a crocodile?
What happens more often, pythons killing alligators or vice versa?

Can crocodiles be tamed?
Which animal has a greater biting force, the hyena or the crocodile?
Why don’t crocodiles kill outside of water?

How are crocodiles able to move and react so quickly (given their size etc)?
Have here been any studies on this.

Why did my ball python strike and bite me after I fed him?
What is the highest any animal can jump?
Which animals are crocodiles afraid of?

What are some mind blowing facts about lions?

Joshua Walters , Life long fan of wildlife. Updated Nov 12, 2018

Lions are some pretty cool animals and while other answers have covered most of the cool facts on these guys, I'll throw in my two cents. Hopefully you will learn at least one new thing about the "king of beasts".

1. Around 2000 years ago millions of lions roamed all across the regions of Europe, Syria, Israel, Iraq, Pakistan, Iran, and India. Today, there are as few as 32,000 on Earth.

2. Aslan is the Turkish and Mongolian word for "lion". Now you can see where C.S Lewis got the name for his famous character in the Chronicles of Narnia.

3. You can tell the relative age of a lion by its mane. The darker the mane, the older the lion.

4. Besides protecting the neck in fights and indicating age, the mane has another function. It seems that females are attracted to lions with darker, fuller manes as this indicates better overall health.

"Son I'm not lion when I say the ladies like their men tall, dark and handsome."

5. Despite not loving the water lions are still great swimmers. If they need to, they will swim to cross a river or pursue prey.

6. Lions are powerful animals and can leap up to 35 feet forward. Their ability to pounce should never be underestimated.

7. Lions need a lot of food and eat around 10-17 pounds of meat per day. That would be like a human eating 20 hamburgers! Of course this doesn't always happen if the cats haven't caught any food.

8. The lion is the only member of the cat family with a tasseled tail. Besides looking really cool and offering the perfect fly swatter, these tails allow lions to relay simple messages to each other when on the hunt.

"Mom! Mom! I want to show you something!"

9. Only around 1 in 8 male lions survive to adulthood with many of them dying right after being kicked out of the pride at age two. Life for a lone male is a tough one.

10. Life can get better for a male by forming a coalition. A coalition is a group of around 3–4 males that hunt, live and work together. Often these bands will attack neighboring males to take over their prides and territories.

11. One of the most famous coalitions is the Mapogo 6, a band of brothers who were credited with killing an excess of 40–100 lions. They ruled the lands of the Sabi sands with an iron paw but after a while they were beaten out by rivals. Now only two of these scarred brothers remain as they search for new territory.

“Do you want to know how I got these scars?” (This lion just gives me Joker vibes)

12. Sadly, lion bones are becoming more popular on the Chinese black market as tigers become rarer. Just like the tiger bones those of the lion are used for traditional medicine.

13. Trophy hunting can devastate a pride's dynamic. Not only does it destabilize the entire pride but it also wipes out the old male’s dominant genes as the replacement will kill all his former cubs.

14. In 2002 conservationists were surprised to find that a lioness had adopted an orphaned baby antelope. Sadly, 2 weeks later a male lion killed the young ungulate and the lioness was observed roaring in what seemed to be anger.

"I won't let anything happen to you my son… I promise."

15. A male lion can stretch up to 10 feet long and can weigh around 420 pounds. Females are typically smaller at 250–350 pounds.

16. Just a century ago around 200,000 lions roamed Africa. Now there are only 20,000–32,000 left.

17. African lions are vulnerable and their numbers are on the decline. Luckily they were recently placed on the Endangered Species Act in 2015 which should give them some protection.

18. In a full out straight sprint, lions can run at around 65 km/h but only for short periods. This allows hunting lions to take down prey before the chase even begins.

19. The lion has the loudest roar of any big-cat and can be heard from around 5 miles away.

20. Lions can see in the dark 6 times better than humans. A reflective coating at the back of the eye captures moon light while a white patch of fur under the eye reflects even more light towards the eye. This allows lions to be fearsome predators at both night and day.

22. Tanzania has the largest population of lions in Africa.

23. White lions occur both in the wild and in captivity. This is not albinism but a recessive mutant gene that gives them a white coat. Surprisingly, wild white lions seem to thrive just as well as their normal cointerparts despite their different coloring.

"I was a polar bear this Halloween…"

24. In the wild male lions live to around 12–16 years of age. Lioness fair better at 15–18 and in captivity lions can live up to 20 years.

25. "Canned" lion hunting is when lions are farmed and put in an enclosure where they are easy to hunt. Companies will often send out catalogs so hunters can choose the lions in which they hunt. Prices can range from 5,400–48,000$ and I find this practice to be truly despicable.

26. Male lions mate up to 100 times in 2 days to ensure the lioness becomes pregnant and carries on his genes. Unlike us humans, mating sessions can last only a few seconds. Now that's fast!

27. Asiatic lions were once found all throughout Europe and India but now there are fewer than 600 individuals left. These felines are quite different from their African cousins and now they are only found in India's Gir National park.

"Quick fact! Asiatic lions have unique longitudinal fold of skin that runs along their belly. This is absent in African lions."

28. Unlike African lions, male Asiatic lions live primarily solitary lives (They may form small coalitions.) and only live with the females and cubs during the mating season.

29. The lions of Africa's coast have been known to travel 50 kilometers a day along the beach, searching for seals to eat.

30. Cape buffalo are one of the lion's main prey and also one of its greatest rivals. Buffalo are very aggressive, known to harass other animals for no reason and lions are no exception. Cape buffalo kill more lions than any other prey animal.

"Eat my dirt!!!"

31. Lion claws are around 3 inches long, the length of a human finger!

32. Lioness usually spend their whole lives in the prides they grew up in. On the flip side males leave their families at age 2 to look for their own pride to rule.

33. The earliest recorded images of lions are found in the Chauvet cave in Southern France dating back 32,000 years.

34. In Botswana 90% of free roaming lions are infected with FIV, the feline version of HIV.

35. Sadly, around 600 lions are killed each year by trophy hunters.

36. The farmers of east Africa use a poison called Furadan to kill lions, hyenas and other predators. Just a small handful sprinkled on a carcass can wipe out an entire pride. This poison my be banned in the US and EU but lion don't really live in regions they control so…

37. Ever wonder how Simba in the Lion King got his name. Well it turns out "Simba" is Swahili for lion.

38. While quite rare, there are certain large lion prides that are specialized in bringing down elephants. The elephant killers of Botswana are a pride numbering 30 strong and have been fairly well documented killing the largest land mammals on earth.

"Like I say time and time again. Size is irrelephant."

39. A lion hunt is a symbolic act and a sort of coming of age for many tribes in Africa such as the Maasai.

40. Many mythical creatures are based off the lion such as the Griffin, Manticore, Chimera and Nemean lion.

41. Lions have a well attuned sense of hearing, enhanced by movable ears that can adjust to the direction of sound. With this acute sense lions can hear prey from very far away.

42. When a lion curls up its lips over its teeth its using its Jacobson's organ in the roof of its mouth to "taste" the air. Then by sticking out their tongue and showing their teeth in "flehmen response" they can determine if their food is close by and/or worth eating.

"Ugghh! Nothing good to eat guys….just those filthy hyenas."

43. Lions have an interdigital scent gland in their toes which allows them to mark territory. So essentially they can smell with their feet. Strange!

44. The lion's loose skinned belly allows it to be kicked, rammed or stomped by prey and suffer less injury.

45. The lion's tongue is rough enough to peel skin and is used when eating. Just a few licks from a lion could shear away the skin of a human being.

46. A lion can roar at the age of 2.

47. It is a common misconception that the lion's claws are retractable, they are actually protractible which means they are sheathed when the animal is at rest. If lion claws were retractable they would need to walk around tense to keep them sheathed and that wouldn't be very convenient.

48. There are many lion hybrids out there such as the Liger (Lion+Tiger), Tigon (Lion+Tiger), Leopon (Lion+Leopard) and Jaglion (Lion+Jaguar).

49. Lions are the national animal of many countries such as Albania, Belgium, Bulgaria, England, Ethiopia, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and Singapore.

50. The famous MGM lion is named Leo the lion and has opened in everyone of their movies since 1929. 4 different lions have been used for this role.

"You're gonna hear me roooaaarrr!!!!"

51. African lions are actually quite diverse with 6 different sub-species.

52. The average lion pride consists of 13 animal but they can range anywhere from 2–40 members.

53. Lioness have been known to bring back baby animals so that their cubs can practice their hunting.

"A childhood game of tag in the African plains."

54. A lion pride's territory can stretch up to 248 square kilometers.

55. Lions mostly hunt at night with success rate of around 25%. They do this in the cover of the dark as it allows for more stealth.

56. Lions sleep the most of the big cats at 22 hours per day. Additionally lioness do 90% of the hunting while the male rests.

57. Male lions have 2 main jobs: Defend the pride from rival males and to mate with all the females and ensure the next generation of young lions is born. The average male will keep his pride for 4 years. In addition male lions do hunt when in coalitions and in prides they are often recruited against bigger game.

"When we do decide to hunt its go big or go home!"

58. The mane of a male lion starts growing at 18 months and continues until the cat is 5 years of age.

59. Lions are skilled hunters but also notorious scavengers that steal around 50% of their meals on average. Being the largest predator on the savannah comes with some perks and even hyena clans can't defend their meals against the full strength of the pride.

60. Lions hate hyenas but some males have taken this hatred to a whole new level. First, the lion will wait near a group of feeding hyenas to discover the identity of the dominant female. Then the lion will kill her, throwing the hyena clan in to disorder for a good long while. This eliminates competition for some time, giving the lions an easier life.

"Come back here!!!"

Thanks for reading these 60 quick facts on lions and hopefully you learned at least one new thing about the second largest of the big cats.

Meanwhile the African wild dog seems to be continuing with his schemes…

"The only way to stop those arrogant lions from stealing my pack's kill is to get rid of them. I will deal with them the same way I dealt with those wolves!"

Related Answer
What are some mind blowing facts about lions?

Pallavi Das (pal-la-Vi) , Animal lover. Updated Jun 17, 2020

1. Lions don't live in the jungle

Lions mostly live on grasslands and savannah. Sometimes they inhabit forest, shrubland and desert. But never the jungle.

So it's also incorrect to think of lions as the kings of the jungle. They are the kings of the savannah.

2. Lion numbers have dropped from 200,000 to just 23,000.

What a shocking statistic! And this near 90% drop in the lion population has occurred in a little over 100 years. This is really one of the saddest facts about lions.

Yet in some places these majestic predators are still hunted legally. Legally!

3. Lions are vulnerable on the IUCN red list.

It wasn't that long ago that lions were classified as an animal of least concern. The king of the savannah didn't have any predators. Then cowards and colonialists turned up with gun. At this rate our next generation won't even have the opportunity to see these animals in the wild.

4. Lions are extinct from 26 countries they previously roamed.

This list includes Congo, Egypt, Israel, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Gabon, Gambia and Iraq.

Lions are also believed to be extinct in a further seven African countries, including Ghana, Guinea, Mali and Togo.

These magnificent cats once roamed through all of Africa, along with parts of Asia and Europe. They are now restricted to East and Southern Africa, with a handful of individuals in West Africa and India's Sasan-Gir National Park.

5. A lion's roar can be heard from over 8 km away

A roar is a sign of dominance, so the louder the better as far as lions are concerned. Lions use these impressive roars to warn rivals and show off how big and bad they are.

This is one of the great sounds you can hear on a safari and it really echoes through the night. Males have a deeper roar than the lionesses.

The incredible roar is caused by a ligament in their voice box. This ligament is stretched to enable more air to pass across the vocal cords, making the incredibly deep and loud sound.

Note that this ligament is only found in the biggest cats – lions, tigers. So it is only these animals that can roar.

6. Purrs, grunts, snarls, moans and hums.

Lions make an incredible variety of sounds. Low-pitched grunts are commonly heard on a safari while individuals communicate through moaning, huffing and humming.

They also purr, although some say this isn't a true purr as it is only produced on the exhale; domestic cats purr continuously, on the inhale and exhale of breath.

Baby lions make a sound that is just like a meow but is really a feeble first attempt at roaring.

7. Lion cubs weigh just 1.5 kg when they are born

How cute is this fact about lions? A tiny lion cub is so small and light you could tuck it into a pet carrier bag and show it off in a shopping mall (or wherever people show off their puppies and kittens).

Even cuter is this fact: lion cubs are born with blue eyes! How adorable, until the cub turns two years old and mauls you to death. These animals are definitely not pets. The blue eyes change to brown or amber when the cubs are two to three months old.

1.5 kg is less than 1% of a lion's adult weight. So while lions are born tiny and cute they quickly develop into 150-250 kg carnivores.

8. Lions don't hunt or eat every day

Hunting requires a lot of energy and it is not always necessary. Instead, these predators literally stuff themselves to bursting point at a single sitting.

On average an African lion needs to consume 5-7 kg of meat for each day they are alive and healthy. But if the pride takes down a buffalo then a single lion may eat 35 kg of meat in one sitting! If there is enough food available these cats can eat an incredible 15% of their body weight in one meal!

How often a pride hunts is dictated by the prey. Hunting Cape buffalois is hard but rewarding work, so a pride that does this in the Okvango Delta will only need to eat every five to six days. Those living predominantly off zebra will need to hunt more often.

Still, these cats will always be looking for opportunity. If an easy meal crosses their path they will eat it, even if they are not hunting. Just like we will consume a cupboard full of snacks, even when we are not hungry!

9. Lions can snooze for 20 hours a day

The king of the savannah is often the easiest of all the big cats to spot on safari. They don't hide away and spend most of the day in the same place.

Lions love to sleep, especially after they have just finished a large meal. Note that they don't actually sleep for 20 hours a day. Often they are snoozing with one eye open.

On a game drive it's relatively common for a pride of lions to fall asleep in the shade created by your vehicle. You will drive close to the big cats and they suddenly see some shade – such encounters are an incredible connection with your wild side.

10. Lions are visibly different all around Africa

What's most incredible about these carnivores is how adaptable they are. They have evolved to survive in a remarkably varied range of habitats. In fact the only place they don't live is the jungle!

THANKS FOR SCROLLING!

————- Pallavi.

EDIT- Thanks for so many upvotes and views guys.EDIT 2- Thanks for 32k+ views and 1.5k+ upvotes guys. Love y'all ❤️❤️❤️ **.

Related Links

What are some interesting facts about tigers?

What exactly makes the lion the king of the jungle? I'm not even sure lions are the strongest animals.

What are some interesting facts about crocodiles?
Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
Can hyenas beat lions?

What are the personality traits of a lioness?
Can 7 lionesses kill a full-grown male tiger?

Why does it seem like lions are more loved than tigers, and lions get more credit and recognition than tigers do when they're equally beasts?

How do lions decide what's prey and what's not? Sometimes they're kind to other animals and people/humans, sometimes they want to eat other animals and people/humans.

Are lions the most fearless wild animals?

Comment les grands félins des zoos peuvent-ils manger de la viande crue ?/ How are big cats in zoos able to eat raw meat?

Jerome Cohen Ami des animaux depuis plus d' 1/2 siècle.Traducteur · 19 mai

Nick Nicholas Studied Big Cats for 40+ years

Au zoo où je travaillais, nous avions des contacts dans toute l'industrie de la viande et nous obtenions presque toute la viande dont nous avions besoin pour les prédateurs pour presque rien. La plupart des morceaux et des organes internes étaient invendables. Les chats sauvages ont un estomac extrêmement robuste qui peut décomposer la viande crue sans être endommagé par les bactéries que la cuisson élimine.

J'ai vu une fois un documentaire qui montrait un groupe de lions consommant un phacochère dans un état avancé de putréfaction qu'ils avaient repêché dans un trou d'eau où il s'était noyé.

Editer - quelque chose que je vais ajouter. Il est important de nourrir les chats sauvages de tout - viande, muscle, tendon, os, cartilage, tout le reste - tout cru. Vous ne pouvez pas leur donner seulement les bonnes choses que les humains mangent.

Ci-dessous - lion avec un cadavre qui a largement dépassé sa date de péremption :

Questions similaires

Comment l’humain a t-il commencé a manger de la viande ? Cela semble étrange de trouver un animal mort et de juste penser a le manger, en plus la viande crue n’est pas si bonne.

Quel est l'animal qui mange le plus sur Terre ? Est-ce que c'est l'être humain ? Avez-vous déjà mangé un animal vivant ?

Pourquoi mange-t-on la viande de certains animaux et pas d'autres ? Y a-t-il des animaux qui ne sont pas comestibles ?

Pourrait-on se contenter de ne manger que la viande des animaux qui sont morts naturellement ? De cette manière, on pourrait subvenir à la demande en viande tout en épargnant les animaux ?

Pourquoi les lions tuent-ils les hyènes sans les manger ?

Pourquoi tout le monde ne se sent-il pas mal à propos de manger de la viande ? Une fois que les gens ont appris ce qu’il fallait impliquer, comment peuvent-ils encore manger de la viande ?

Pourquoi les animaux qui gobent leurs proies vivantes ne se font-ils pas manger de l'intérieur ?

Combien de kilos de viande les félins consomment-ils par jour ?
Quel est l'animal le moins intelligent que nous élevons pour sa viande ?

What are some mind blowing facts about lions?

Alex Cooper 3y

Alex, don't you get bored writing about lions all the time?
No, lions are awesome. Shut up. Without further ado…

Male lions do hunt

They also manage to look ridiculously photogenic while doing so. (Image: Reddit)

I've already mentioned this in a couple of answers but I keep seeing questions about it, so it seems at least some people still believe it. While males in charge of a pride/prides won't hunt as much as the females, they'll still get recruited when the pride is after larger game, since their size comes in handy.

Pride males often patrol their territory for long periods, and during this time they also catch prey. Coalitions of brothers such as the Mapogos were famous for being adept at hunting. Nomadic males must also hunt, if they can't scavenge.

There are still some lions in India

A small number of Asiatic lions (less than 1000) still live in India—namely Gir Forest National Park, in Gujarat. Their habitat doesn't overlap with that of the tiger, although that doesn't stop people getting overexcited on the internet about who would win in a fight.

On the subject of fighting…

Lions with darker manes win more fights

Darker manes mean more testosterone, which translates to stronger, healthier animals. A lion's mane doesn't just stay one colour throughout its life either; it varies based on the health of the lion.

The Darker The Mane, The More Powerful The Lion - KnowledgeNuts

Female lions also prefer darker manes

It makes sense to mate with strong, healthy lions so they can make strong, healthy babies.

If lionesses were at the cinema watching this guy, there wouldn't be a dry seat in the house. (Image: Flickr)

Also, let's be honest—dark hair, regardless of species, just looks cooler.

Did I mention that I have brown hair and a beard?

Ladies.

Lions often scavenge from hyenas

Don't listen to Lion King propaganda. As I mentioned earlier, lions like to scavenge, while hyenas, despite their reputation, also like to hunt. Both species will happily chase off the other from a kill if the numbers are in their favour.

While we're on the subject of that movie…

Roars in The Lion King weren't really lions

Mufasa and Simba's majestic roars were actually a combination of tiger roars and some dude named Frank with a trash can. No, I'm not making it up.

Here's the video if you want to take the red pill and embrace a world that just doesn't make sense any more:

The Lion King has been lying to you for all these years

White lions are sometimes born in the wild, not just captivity

(Image: Barcroft)

White lions are of the same species as regular African lions but carry a rare, recessive mutant gene. The Timbavati Nature Reserve in South Africa has seen the most white lions born in the wild, though in the past cubs have been taken, reared and then re-released as part of a reintroduction program.

White lions return to the wild in South Africa

Rare White Lions Get Wild

Lion bars do not actually contain real pieces of lion

Related Links

What are some interesting facts about tigers?

What exactly makes the lion the king of the jungle? I'm not even sure lions are the strongest animals.

What are some interesting facts about crocodiles?
Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?
Can hyenas beat lions?
What are the personality traits of a lioness?
Can 7 lionesses kill a full-grown male tiger?

Why does it seem like lions are more loved than tigers, and lions get more credit and recognition than tigers do when they're equally beasts?

How do lions decide what's prey and what's not? Sometimes they're kind to other animals and people/humans, sometimes they want to eat other animals and people/humans.

Are lions the most fearless wild animals?

How do hyenas catch their prey?

Serge Elia Animal lover Answered Aug 24, 2019

Spotted hyenas hunt sometimes alone, but they mostly hunt as a pack, something especially helpful when it comes to tackling large game like wildebeests, zebras, and even buffaloes.

In the process, they employ a unique modus operandi that consists of pursuing and harassing the prey altogether – all while using speed in combination with an incredible stamina, something that allows them to run for miles without tiring –, cantering after it and snapping at its heels, until they sink their bone-crushing jaws into its belly, and then cripple, disembowel and drag it to the ground, before eventually eating it alive!

As a result, during takedown, the unfortunate prey is sometimes too paralyzed to protect itself.

When striped hyenas hunt prey (such as deer, antelope or wild boars), they prefer a solo hunt rather than with teamwork. In the process, they run their quarry down, grab them by the flanks or groin, and inflict mortal wounds by tearing out the victim's internal organs – in doing so, they will kill any animal they can overcome.

Brown hyenas rely on their scavenging habits rather than their hunting habits, but nothing prevents them from hunting Cape fur seal pups along the Namib coast, prey items they usually kill via a deadly bite to the neck or head, or a crushing bite to the internal organs or the bones.

To which family group does the hyena belong?

Originally Answered: What animal family do hyenas belong to?

The hyena family. It contains four species:

Spotted hyena

Striped hyena

Brown hyena

Aardwolf — not a wolf; its name is Afrikaans for ‘earth-wolf’; it eats insects and their larvae, mainly termites

Despite their appearance and the name of that last species, they are closer to cats than dogs.

Related Links

Why do hyenas like to eat their prey alive? Why don't they kill before eating like lions do?
Can you keep a hyena as a pet?
Why won't scavengers or predators eat the carcass when the dead animal was killed by lightning?

Why do hyenas feed off other animals' prey, rather than their own?
Can hyenas beat lions?
Which animals regard humans as their prey?
Why don't lions and hyenas kill vultures near them?

Why do cats torture their prey before a kill, a habit (except leopards) not found in the big cats? Why are cats evolved to do so?

What exactly is it that prevents tigers and lions and wolves from being tamed?

Is it a psychological void? Why can't they be tamed even if they've never seen or experienced violence?

Is man the most dangerous animal?

Do male lions recognize their cubs?

Nick Nicholas Studied Big Cats for 40+ years Answered May 17, 2020

Yes - always.

While growing up the cubs are under the protection of the pride's males. This ensures their genes get passed on. The smell and look of them is enough for the male to recognise them. In the same way he will recognise cubs that are not his and kill them.

Many of you reading this will think they all look alike.

Lions probably think all humans look alike.

When I worked for a zoo I knew the name of every lemur by sight and many times was asked by vistors how I could tell the difference. It came naturally and it is the same for the lions.

This lion would not tolerate this from a cub which was not his.

I considered posting pictures of humans who all look the same but did not want to be accused of racial stereotyping.

Can a tiger learn different words when in captivity? We know dogs can learn different words, can a human communicate with a tiger in captivity, using different words, the same way?

Nick Nicholas Studied Big Cats for 40+ years Apr 22

Yes.
The principle is largely the same as training a dog and a tiger, in return for a reward, will follow a command though only if it wants to. Some days tigers are far too excited (they are naturally highly strung) and you will not get anything out of them if they are 'hot'.

I will add this is not a practice that I especially approve of. Having a tiger perform what is largely 'tricks' in return for a reward is little better than a circus tiger. We always preferred to keep our tigers as wild as possible.

The tiger in the below pic fairly obviously is not in the mood for human commands on that particular day.

Related Links

When male lions commit infanticide, how do they know it is not their own cubs they are killing?

Do male lions ever kill not another male's cubs, but their own?

Why don't lionesses stop a male lion from killing their cubs? There are surely enough females that would beat him, right?

Do lions kill orphan cubs?
Does a lioness grieve when her cub or her mate is killed by another lion?
Why do male lions back off when the lionesses try to attack them?
How do lions honor their dead?
Do lions and tigers mate with their siblings and offspring?

Do male lions take their cubs away to a safer place when other lions want to attack them?

How can a lion who has huge fangs carry their babies by biting them in the

Why do lions fight after mating?

Ross Wind Answered Mar 20, 2020

THE LIONESS SMACKS THE MALE SAYING ENOUGH

THE LIONESS SMACKS THE MALE SAYING ENOUGH.

It is not really fighting more a way for the lioness saying stop. All female cats have similar behavior. To what have read, mating is painful for female felines. Although not at the lion level, female domestic cat would have similar reaction. We can only imagine what the poor lioness endure, lions may mate every 15 min or so up to 150 times in just 2-3 days!

During this time normally lions don't hunt, therefore don't eat. This is not all, lions are social, so the same lioness will also mate with each pride dominant males as well. Normally there are more adult lionesses than males. Each male will mate with each of them as well. It is also an additional evidence for both genders of the lion's toughness. Healthy male lions have high levels of testosterone fighting regularly, they are already very aggressive in mating time even more.

Related Links

Why do lions look so angry when mating?
Why do male lions back off when the lionesses try to attack them?
Why do lions bite when mating?

Why don't lionesses stop a male lion from killing their cubs? There are surely enough females that would beat him, right?

Are male lions abusive towards their lionesses?
Does a lioness grieve when her cub or her mate is killed by another lion?
What are some mating behaviors of African lions?

How can a lion who has huge fangs carry their babies by biting them in the neck and doesn't hurt them?

Can lions keep count? For example, if a female lion has 6 cubs and one is taken away secretly without her noticing, will she notice that one cub has gone missing?

How do young male lions live after leaving the pride?

Why do lions not attack humans?

Simon Janevic · Follow Studied at Pioneer High School (Graduated 2022) Sat

Originally Answered: Why don't lions eat humans?

Well, um…

Lions kill an estimated 200 people per year in Africa.

Most often this happens when the lion is ill or injured, and unable to hunt its usual prey, or said prey has been depleted due to human activity. The latter is becoming more frequent as Africa's human population grows and encroaches onto lion habitat.

However, sometimes they're just being opportunistic. It's kind of hard not to when people are being stupid— like an American woman on safari in South Africa in 2015, who rolled her windows down to take pictures of a lioness. The big cat took advantage of the opening, and tragedy ensued.

Imagine this WITHOUT the windows' protection!

A few more recent examples of deadly encounters from the headlines:

A 27-year-old man at Marataba Safari Lodge in South Africa was killed by lions in 2021.

In 2020 in Tanzania, the parents of three children let them go into the forest by themselves to search for lost cattle. It didn't end well.

A lion in Tanzania entered a French man's tent in 2015 and tore off his arm. You may have also heard about the stories of lions that have become full-on-man-eaters. One of the most terrifying examples was a pride of lions in Njombe, Tanzania, who from 1932 to 1947 killed no less than 1,500 people. It's thought that they originally targeted us due to competition, and after realizing how tasty we were, developed a culture of man-eating.

There was also Kenya's infamous Tsavo man-eaters. In 1898, around 30 people were killed by a pair of lion brothers over a nine-month period. The frequent lion attacks actually halted construction on the Kenya Uganda railway, since the cats kept picking off workers. It is believed this may be because the lions had dental problems, or because their usual prey had been depleted.

So, when you're in lion country, practicing proper safety is very important. You should stay in the car and keep your windows rolled up. Don't walk around at night in areas where lions and other dangerous wildlife occur. When on safari, stick with the tour guides who know what they're doing. Also, research a safari company beforehand!

Should you encounter a lion, don’t run. It’ll trigger their prey drive and they’re way faster than you— you’re pretty much sentencing yourself to death if you flee from a big cat. Instead, stand your ground. Wave your arms in the air and make lots of noise, perhaps while slowly backing away. Pepper spray can also be useful in getting the lion to back off.

If it goes in for the kill, punch and kick, aiming for the head and eyes. This might sound like it would be pretty useless, but there are many documented records of people fending off lion attacks this way.

This man survived a lion attack after punching it in the face!

In short, lions are majestic predators, and we should protect them and their habitat.

Just remember that to them, you’re nothing but 150 pounds of fresh monkey meat.

Related Links

Why do lions not attack when you are in a safari vehicle?
Why do male lions back off when the lionesses try to attack them?

Why do lions fight each other using their paws rather than going with much more deadly bites?

How do lions decide what's prey and what's not? Sometimes they're kind to other animals and people/humans, sometimes they want to eat other animals and people/humans.

Do lions attack humans for no reason?

Would a lion eat a human being? I was near a lion’s enclosure, and it didn’t make an effort to scare me off. Do they even go for us?

Why don't wild lions attack human tourists in open vehicles?
Do lions attack humans for no reason or if they are hungry?
Would a full lion in the wild be safe for a human being to approach?
Will animals like lions generally not continue trying to attack you if you hi
If a hyena could break a lion's leg in a single bite, why don't they kill lions more often, especially since they live in humongous clans?

Serge Elia, Animal lover Answered Jul 4, 2021

There’s no denying that spotted hyenas have a far stronger bite-force than lions – probably the strongest among carnivorous mammals –, one that is practically bone-crushing, capable of dismembering a hapless victim while it’s still alive, whether prey (antelope, zebra, buffalo and the like) or foe (including an unlucky lion). Not only that: they also have incredible stamina, supreme intelligence and strength in numbers at their disposal, with their clans ranging from 6 to well over 100 members that work in unison to outwit any large game or threat.

But hyenas are smart enough to assess the risks, and they know better than to push their luck further – and thus face the risk of getting seriously injured or even killed –, even with the help of humongous clans. As such, while they do frequently challenge and mob lions – to the extent of ousting their eternal enemies as Africa's apex predators –, nevertheless there are times in which hyenas, despite their numbers, must make a hasty retreat when facing lions (especially the big males) that act with what seems to be an irrational but unparalleled bravado.

In light of this, hyenas only maim and kill adult lions when seriously outnumbering them or when sensing a weakness in the targeted lion(s). In other cases, it's wiser to retreat if you wanna stay alive and unharmed.

Don't get me wrong, I still prefer hyenas over lions. But the golden cats have attitude and sheer aggression that earned them the title "Kings of the Beasts". Sure enough, they never think twice before assaulting any hyena they meet – particularly the vulnerable loners that don't have a clan fighting at their side –, at a point of killing it mercilessly and leaving its uneaten corpse to rot, all because of dietary overlap and competition over the same prey and hunting grounds, the both of which result in recurrent territorial fights.

And that's why spotted hyenas don't often kill fully grown adult lions, even though they have clans at their side, as well as a powerful bite-force that is more than capable of breaking a lion's leg. It's something all top predators worldwide do: with all their strength and power, they instinctively know that they must at all cost avoid serious injury and death, especially when it comes to confronting bigger and far more dangerous animals – for this reason, a predator will always evaluate the risk versus the benefit, without ever becoming overly confident; otherwise, even a minor injury may knock the predator out of action…

Ultimately, in the eternal war between lions and hyenas, the battle's outcome heavily depends upon the courage of individual contestants, both on the lion side and the hyena side, so it's mainly 50–50 for both species.

Related Links

If a hyena could break a lion's leg in a single bite, why don't they kill lions more often, especially since they live in humongous clans?
How long does it take for a hyena to give birth?
Can you keep a hyena as a pet?
What is it like to be born with both male and female reproductive parts?
What would happen if a baby hyena was raised as a dog?
Can a male hyena give birth?
Can an intersex person (hermaphrodite) get pregnant?
What is a female hyena called?
Do female hyenas produce more testosterone than male hyenas?
What pictures of hermaphroditism of humans are there?

What are hyenas scared of?

Serge Elia Animal lover Updated 3y

Spotted hyenas are among Africa's ultimate top predators, equipped with their sheer power, bone-crushing jaws (the most powerful on earth after those of the saltwater crocodile and the great white shark), incredible stamina, intelligence and sheer strength in numbers – in fact, hyena packs are so strong they regularly challenge lions, sometimes ousting them as the continent's apex predators.

However, all these facts do not stop hyenas from being vulnerable to attacks from neighboring wild animals times in which hyenas, despite their numbers, quickly make a hasty retreat when under attack from charging male lions, which can be intimidating with their formidable mane and sheer aggression. Though the outcome heavily depends upon the courage of our contestants.

Usually, cheetahs have a lack of brute strength that renders them incapable of fending off the much better built hyenas, a fact that obliges the spotted cats to surrender a kill. But there are times in which individual cheetahs, particularly protective mothers, have been seen to mob hyenas with an extraordinary defensive behavior – such a behavior involves stomping on the ground, lowering the head and moving toward the aggressors in a stalking mode, raising hairs on the cheetah's back to look bigger and more aggressive, snarling and hissing at the aggressors, and glaring at them with pale yellow eyes. As such, some hyenas can be scared and forced to back off.

When venturing near rivers, hyenas must be wary of Nile crocodiles, the largest and most dangerous reptiles in Africa. Sure enough, these crocs are opportunistic feeders that will gladly eat anything daring to enter their watery domain, including other predators like hyenas.

African rock pythons, the continent’s longest snakes, also don’t mind hunting other predators, including hyenas, whether adult or young.

Packs of African wild dogs, thanks to their work in unison (a fact that hyenas lack), frequently mob and easily repel hyenas whenever the two species interact.

In addition to all the previously mentioned animals, we mustn't forget that Africa is truly a land of giants, and hyenas are always wary whenever they meet up with these giants, especially:

– Elephants, who can and will charge at any threat to their calves.

– Giraffes, whose size is undoubtedly problematic, alongside a kick that can kill in one hit.

– Cape buffaloes, bad-tempered bovines that can charge at any animal that gets in their way.

– Rhinos, equipped with their bulk, deadly horn and extremely bad-temper.

– Hippos, probably the most aggressive beasts alive.

Qui a la plus grande probabilité de succès dans une chasse, une troupe de lions ou un tigre seul avec son camouflage ?/Who has a better probability in a hunt, a lion pride or a single tiger with its camouflage?

Les lions qui travaillent ensemble ont un taux de réussite d'environ 30 %, contre 25 % pour un lion seul.

Pour les tigres, c'est un peu plus difficile, car ils ne chassent que seuls, à moins qu'une mère ne protège ses petits. On pourrait donc penser que le taux de réussite est bien inférieur à 30 %. Pour les tigres, cela dépend de l'environnement. En Russie, les tigres chassant le sanglier ont enregistré des taux de réussite allant jusqu'à 54 %, alors qu'en Inde, ils n'atteignent que 10 %. Cela peut avoir un rapport avec les animaux de troupeau en Inde, la moyenne se situant probablement autour de 20 %.

Ces deux grands prédateurs sont mis à mal par le numéro un de la planète, le lycaon, qui a un taux d'abattage incroyable d'environ 85 %. En travaillant ensemble et souvent en relais, les chiens gardent la proie en mouvement jusqu'à ce qu'elle s'épuise avant de la tuer.

Questions similaires

Quelle race de chien peut tuer un tigre, un lion ou un jaguar dans un combat individuel ?

Si je sauvais un tigre de la noyade, saurait-il que je l'ai sauvé et essayerait-il de me dévorer malgré mon aide ?

Pourquoi trouve-t-on des tigres dans les forêts mais pas des lions ? Quelle est la source de l'aversion du lion pour les zones fortement boisées et de sa préférence pour les zones ouvertes ?

Le tigre est le plus fort des grands félins, le lion le plus rapide et le léopard le plus arboricole et agile. En quoi le jaguar excelle-t-il ?

Un chien peut-il se battre à arme égal avec un lion, un tigre ou un jaguar dans un combat en un contre un?

Est-il possible de créer un lien avec un lion ou un tigre, et de le domestiquer jusqu'à un certain point ?

Si un ligre a été élevé par des lions dans la nature, pourrait-il être un membre prospère d'une troupe de lions ?

Pourquoi les lions mâles ne chassent-ils pas étant donné qu'ils sont plus grands et plus forts que les lionnes ?

Qui gagnerait un combat hypothétique entre un tigre et un lion ?
Quelles sont les différences entre les lions et les tigres en termes de style de

Qui est le prédateur du tigre ?

Serge Elia Amoureux d'animaux 2y

Comme nous le savons, le tigre, en tant que grand fauve, est un superprédateur, qui se situe au sommet de la chaîne alimentaire, et est pratiquement craint de tous les autres animaux de son domaine, que ce soient ses proies (cerfs, sangliers, buffles…) ou d'autres prédateurs (léopards, chacals, loups, ours, etc.). Ce qui fait, en principe, que cet imposant carnivore n'a personne à redouter, sauf qu'il existe des exceptions.

En effet, même le roi de la jungle (oui : dans la vie réelle, c'est bien le tigre qui est le roi de la jungle, et non le lion, car ce dernier habite plutôt les savanes sèches que les forêts tropicales) doit se méfier de certains animaux qui n'hésiteront pas à se battre pour se défendre, et par la suite assurer leur survie ou celle de leurs congénères. C'est le cas notamment de plusieurs ours lippus, lesquels ont été aperçus en train d'attaquer les fauves rayés de front, avant de les faire fuir – pour être plus précis, ces ours en question étaient des femelles, ayant un instinct maternel très fort afin de protéger leurs oursons.

Certains léopards ont été témoignés faire de même. Toutefois, ces individus ne faisaient que se défendre vaillamment face aux tigres attaquants, et par la suite les faire fuir, sans les tuer – ne l'oublions pas : malgré sa force robuste, le léopard reste tout de même beaucoup plus petit (il pèse environ 50 à 77 kg), et donc beaucoup plus faible, face au tigre tout puissant, le plus grand et le plus dangereux de tous les félidés (il fait environ 220 à 310 kg !).

Par contre, dès lors qu'il aperçoit un bébé tigre sans défense, un léopard adulte n'aura aucun problème à le tuer – ceci se déroule pour les deux raisons suivantes : (1) les léopards sont des chasseurs opportunistes qui dévoreront tout ce qui passe à leur portée, y compris les jeunes d'autres prédateurs ; (2) à l'état sauvage, en tuant un petit appartenant à une espèce différente, tous les prédateurs (lions, tigres, léopards, ours, loups, hyènes, crocodiles, serpents et autres) éliminent un futur concurrent pour le territoire et la nourriture, ainsi qu'une menace potentielle pour leur propre progéniture (une preuve que seul le fort survit dans la nature, et non le faible ou l'inexpérimenté).

Normalement, même les meutes de loups et de dholes (chiens sauvages d'Asie) ne peuvent rien face à la force inégalée du tigre, lequel peut infliger un coup de patte capable de tuer presque toute la meute.

En fait, mis à part les hommes, les tigres sont considérés comme étant les plus grandes menaces prédatrices pesant sur les loups et les dholes, puisque ces fauves ont tendance à faire baisser le nombre des canidés, soit en contribuant à leur extinction localisée, soit en les réduisant à un nombre si faible qu'ils deviennent une composante fonctionnellement insignifiante de l'écosystème. Sauf que certains loups et dholes s'avèrent être assez audacieux pour vaincre certains tigres, soit parce qu'ils arrivent à les surpasser en nombre, soit parce que ces tigres en question ne sont pas expérimentés ou sont trop faibles afin de riposter.

Également, les crocodiles et les pythons, en tant que reptiles imposants et dangereux, sont capables d'abattre un tigre. Cela a été le cas, en août 2011, d'un crocodile de 4 mètres de long, qui a tué un tigre dans les marécages du Bengale occidental.

Il arrive des fois que les proies traquées par les tigres arrivent à riposter face à leurs prédateurs principaux, et cette riposte peut être fatale !

En effet, la majorité des herbivores dont se nourrit le tigre font environ 10 à 20 fois la taille du félin – par exemple : à 1 500 kg, le gaur ou bison indien (voir ci-dessus) est la plus grande espèce de bovidé au monde. En plus, à la course, ils sont plus rapides que le fauve manquant d'endurance, et ils sont équipés de toutes sortes d'armes plus sophistiquées, dont des cornes mortelles capables d'éventrer un chasseur affamé, des sabots dont le coup de pied peut écraser le crâne d'un prédateur en une fraction de secondes, et une grande force en nombre (ces herbivores vivent majoritairement en grands troupeaux) pour protéger leurs congénères.

Éventuellement, tous ces équipements possédés par les herbivores peuvent parfois forcer un tigre à abandonner la chasse et aller chercher une proie qui ne ripostera pas. Et ce comportement ne se voit pas uniquement chez les gaurs, mais aussi chez :

– Les buffles d’Asie, avec leurs longues cornes faisant 2 mètres de long.

– Les sangliers, dont la force et le mauvais caractère ne sont pas à sous-estimer.

– Les éléphants d'Asie, qui n'hésiteront pas à charger tout animal pesant une menace sur eux ou sur leurs congénères.

– Les rhinocéros, avec leur taille imposante, leur corne acérée et leur caractère agressif.

Pourtant, les vraies menaces pour la survie du tigre restent les autres tigres, ainsi que les êtres humains.

Comme tous les autres félidés – à l'exception des lions et des guépards mâles –, le tigre est solitaire par nature, ce qui le rend par la suite très territorial. En effet, les mâles établissent et défendent fermement leur territoire, lequel chevauche avec des territoires possédés par un certain nombre de femelles (les tigresses), mais exclut les autres mâles.

Et lorsque deux tigres rivaux se rencontrent, ils emploient souvent l'intimidation pour éviter la confrontation physique – les tigres passent généralement moins de temps à se battre afin d'éviter toute blessure ou infection, car ils ont besoin de leur puissance pour chasser et se nourrir –, mais une fois que l'intimidation échoue, un combat vicieux devient inévitable, un affrontement total des tueurs, ce qui peut parfois entraîner la mort d'un de nos concurrents.

Concernant la relation entre le tigre et l'homme, ce n'est un secret pour personne que les êtres humains constituent la raison principale et déterminante pour laquelle notre fauve préféré (ainsi que toute la faune mondiale) est actuellement en voie d'extinction – en effet, suite à de longues années de braconnage, de conflits avec l'homme et de perte de l'habitat, le nombre de tigres sauvages est passé des 100 000 individus dans les années 1900, jusqu'à seulement 4 000 de nos jours ; et même si leur nombre connaît actuellement une tendance à la hausse grâce aux efforts de conservation, les tigres ne sont pas tout à fait épargnés, car ils restent menacés par la chasse excessive, la fragmentation de l'habitat (surtout en Asie du Sud-Est) et l'abus au nom du divertissement en captivité.

Ainsi, pour éviter à ce que de nouveaux dommages ne se produisent, nous devons encourager les écologistes dans leurs efforts pour sauver les tigres et tous les félins, ainsi que la faune mondiale entière, du risque croissant d'extinction.

Quel monde cruel pour ce prédateur majestueux, n'est-ce pas ?

Questions similaires

Quels sont les prédateurs du léopard ?
Quels sont les principaux prédateurs du gorille et comment le tuent-ils ?
Quels sont les prédateurs des hyènes ?
Qui est le plus fort du lion ou du tigre ?
Qui est le prédateur supérieur entre un lion et un tigre ?
Quel est le niveau d'intelligence d'un tigre ?
Y a-t-il déjà eu un combat organisé entre un tigre et un lion ? Quel animal a gagné ?
Quel animal est inoffensif alors qu'il paraît être un dangereux prédateur ?
Quel est le prédateur du crocodile ?

Is there honor among animals, predators in particular? Do they sometimes avoid predating prey animals which happen to be young, old, pregnant, sick, or asleep?

Why don't humans eat live animals at least some of the time? All other predators either regularly or on occasion eat their prey while it's alive.

Why don't animals eat their own kind?
Why do some animals kill their prey before eating it but others eat their prey alive?
What body parts of an animal do predators never eat?
Why don't predators eat hibernating bears?
Why don't animals try to eat humans?
What animal eats bobcats?
What predators eat their prey alive?
Why is it that most predators normally don't attack humans?

News Nigeria
Kenyan media platform, NTV Kenya fires back at foreign media platforms using pictures of Africans for monkey pox articles.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong

They used a white person's picture for their monkeypox article instead.

The trending monkey pox outbreak is in 9 European countries, Australia, USA and Canada.

ABC News
@ABC

JUST IN: A Massachusetts resident has tested positive for monkeypox, the state health department confirms.

abcnews.go.com
1st monkeypox case in US this year reported in Massachusetts

9:48 pm · 18 May 22 · SocialFlow

Reuters Health @Reuter... · 6h

Portuguese authorities said on Wednesday they had identified five cases of the rare monkeypox infection, and Spain's health services are testing 23 potential cases after Britain put Europe on alert for the virus.

Portugal identifies five monkeypox infections, Spain has...
reuters.com

92 84 70

amp.cnn.com

What is monkeypox and its signs and symptoms?

Have there ever been cases where prey animals hunted predators' young as a preemptive protective strategy?

evolvopedia

Marwan Mohamed studied at Im Still in Middle School (2021) Answered Mar 29, 2021

I wouldn't characterize it as hunting, per se. But yes, in many instances if a herbivore comes a juvenile of it's predator, they will kill it. Here's a few well documented instances:

Cape buffalo's have been known to kill lion cubs and other predator's cubs as a preemptive measure. This behavior isn't just restricted to cubs, buffalo will attack lions that aren't on the hunt and are minding their own business. This is the only example I could find at the moment, but I wouldn't be surprised if other animals did this, such as Gaur with tigers, for instance.

Serge Elia , Animal lover Updated Nov 20, 2019

The best example to give is definitely the African Cape buffalo, particularly when the matter concerns its bitter relation with its main predator, the lion.

Sure enough, there have been loads of times, recorded on camera and seen in documentaries, in which buffaloes have stalked lions, as much as vice versa – in fact, most buffalo attacks on lions are oftentimes unprovoked, which means that they don't always happen in retaliation against hunting (as such, assaults occur even though the cats aren't hunting the bovines in the first place!) –, taking their own predators by surprise, before attacking them in a massive stampede, and chasing them away or ruthlessly killing some of them – in the process, a lot of the big bovines have murdered lion cubs that got in their way.

This proves that the buffalo, one of the most feared of Africa's gigantic beasts, rivals humans in claiming responsibility for most lion deaths, since this mighty herbivore always looks forward to disembowel every single lion it meets, even though some individual cats are merely relaxing rather than on the hunt, whilst others are merely cubs that are far too young and inexperienced to become dangerous – buffaloes don't take that into consideration; to them, a lion remains a lion (ie, a deadly killer) whether adult or cub, and the only good lion is a dead one…

In fact, when it comes to attacking lion cubs as seen in the videos above and below, buffaloes accomplish a defensive strategy, which consists of eliminating future predators that could kill buffaloes if given the chance, and thus potential threats to the bovines' lives, especially the vulnerable calves – another proof of the endless struggle for survival that unfolds in nature; needless to say, only the strongest survive this struggle, never the weakest, including the young that have yet to understand the dangers and to hone their survival skills.

Moreover, the fact that buffaloes thunder at the speed of galloping horses, move in a large, stampeding herd of over 90,000 individuals or more, and are very protective of their comrades, only worsens the danger, making it even more ghastly for every unfortunate predator that stumbles upon that stampede – in such cases, the hunter can quickly become the hunted in a blink of an eye, particularly when said hunter weighs the mere size of a domestic cat.

Other animals in the African savanna have also been seen attacking predators' young as a preemptive protective strategy.

For example: in this video, a female cheetah was teaching her cubs how to hunt, but one of them got so excited that it ran ahead, forgetting to stay by its mother's side, and soon found itself under attack by an angry zebra, which pursued it relentlessly and attempted to squish it under its hooves – luckily, the cheetah cub escaped with its life, but that's one painful lesson it will always remember!

Related Links

Why do prey animals seem to resist very little while being hunted?

What prey animals are more hardcore than the predators that hunt them?

Which animals regard humans as their prey?

Why do some predators wait until their prey is already weakened to attack them?

What tactics do predators use to catch prey?

What are the predators of crocodiles? What are the crocodiles' natural enemies?

How do predators know what animals are prey?

In a lifetime for the average prey animal, how many times will a predator attempt to kill/eat it? Do prey animals have to fight off predators constantly or is it a rare occurrence?

Have you ever seen a friendship between animals that are natural prey and predator?

What do animals teach their young ones to hunt prey?

Qui gagne habituellement dans les combats entre hyènes et lions ?/ Who usually wins in fights between hyenas and lions?

Thomas Dal-Molin , Modèle photo (2010-présent) Traducteur · Traduit le 19 nov. 2019

Joshua Walters Life long fan of wildlife.

En 2015, un affrontement entre un clan d'hyènes et un groupe de lions a été observée....

"Quand tu es le seul à avoir acheté à manger et que tes amis ont faim."

Un jeune mâle avait été laissé pour surveiller une proie tué par la meute pendant que les autres lions allaient prendre un verre. C'était une terrible erreur. Très vite, les hyènes sont venus en grand nombre pour chasser le jeune lion, mais ce conflit était loin d'être terminé.

Finalement, 3 lions d'une nouvelle meute sont arrivés et ont chassé les hyènes avec leur plus grande taille. Pourtant, les hyènes regardaient et attendaient.

Au fur et à mesure que leur confiance grandissait, les hyènes attaquaient, prenant un lion à la fois. D'abord, ils entoureraient leur cible, l'isolant du groupe. Ensuite, ils mordaient et pinçaient, pour finalement chasser le félin.

"Prenez la nourriture. Je me casse d'ici !"

Les hyènes ont répété le processus avec les deux lions restants, les forçant à partir et de sécuriser le buffalo pour leur clan.

"Hé les gars, attendez !!!!! Ne me laissez pas seul avec ces hyènes !!!!!"

Les Lions sont peut-être nettement plus forts que les hyènes, mais dans ce scénario, le nombre et la ruse des hyènes les ont aidés à gagner.

Source : Bataille pour les bisons : Les hyènes s'attaquent aux lions dans un spectacle épique de force | Vidéo sur la faune | Earth Touch News

En 2017, une autre confrontation a été observée entre les deux prédateurs principaux.

"Tactique de vol à l'arraché."

Une paire de lions ont été trouvés se nourrissant d'un zèbre et alors qu'il n'était pas clair qui avait tué ce zèbre, un clan d'hyènes affamés s'installait pour voler et/ou récupérer la carcasse.

Quelques hyènes ont utilisé le " je croque je cours" pour avoir quelques morceaux de viande, mais la lionne les a rapidement pourchassé. Dans une deuxième tentative pour obtenir de la nourriture, les hyènes ont essayé d'utiliser leur nombre pour effrayer les deux lions. Malheureusement pour eux, cela a échoué lamentablement.

"Où est la tête de zèbre. Est-ce que l'un d'entre vous m'a volé ma tête !?!"

Avec l'arrivée du mâle, les hyènes ont abandonné et se sont enfuies dans la peur. Heureusement pour eux, ils ont rapidement trouvé une gazelle nouveau-née qu'ils utiliseront pour nourrir leurs petits affamés.

"Parle pour toi, mon pote ! Ce n'était pas du tout une chance pour moi !!!!"

Source : Tu ne ris pas maintenant ! Les hyènes ne réussissent pas à voler la peau du lion

Résultat

"J'ai le terrain surélevé !"

Ainsi, après avoir fait des recherches sur encore plus de combats entre lions et hyènes, je peux affirmer sans risque de me tromper que les résultats de ces conflits se situent aux alentours de 50-50. Tandis que le lion est nettement plus fort en raison de sa taille plus grande, les hyènes le compensent par des chiffres et souvent rusées.

Dans une bataille, les hyènes peuvent essaimer un plus petit groupe de lions et gagner....

"Enlevez votre tête !!!!!"

...mais si les lions sont plus nombreux ou s'ils ont un mâle de leur côté, les choses pourraient sembler bien différentes.

"Boo !!!!!"

Dans l'ensemble, je dirais que le vainqueur de ces combats ne dépend que de qui a l'avantage dans la bataille spécifique.

J'espère que cela vous a aidé !

Alors que les lions et les hyènes s'éloignent du champ de bataille hypothétique, il y a un éclair tonitruant du ciel et ils disparaissent tous.

"Oui, mon ami chien sauvage. Maintenant que les lions et les hyènes sont partis, vous êtes le sommet des plaines africaines."

Qu'est-ce que la silhouette à capuche ? Où sont partis les lions, les hyènes et les loups ?

Une chose est sûre....ils reviendront.

"Au moins, leur disparition m'a sauvé !"

Questions similaires

Si une hyène peut briser la patte d'un lion en une seule morsure, pourquoi ne tuent-elles pas plus souvent les lions, d'autant qu'elles vivent en clans gigantesques ?

Si un ligre a été élevé par des lions dans la nature, pourrait-il être un membre prospère d'une troupe de lions ?

Pourquoi trouve-t-on des tigres dans les forêts mais pas des lions ? Quelle est la source de l'aversion du lion pour les zones fortement boisées et de sa préférence pour les zones ouvertes ?

Pourquoi les lions et les tigres grognent-ils sur leurs proies juste avant de bondir ? Est-ce pour provoquer la panique ou pour vocaliser leurs prouesses de chasse ?

Que se passerait-il si on relâchait un tigre mâle dans la savane et un lion mâle dans la jungle ?

Lequel d'entre eux réussirait le mieux à s'adapter au changement ?
Qui gagnerait un combat hypothétique entre un tigre et un lion ?
Quel est l'endroit le plus inhabitable de la planète ?
Est-il dangereux de garder un lion comme un animal de compagnie ? Pourquoi ?

Comment les lions décident-ils de ce qui est une proie et de ce qui ne l'est pas ? Parfois, ils ne sont pas hostiles avec les autres animaux.

Peut-on avoir une hyène comme animal de compagnie ?

Qui a déjà entendu parler de la tribu Massaï en Afrique de l'Est ?

Sylvia Créatrice de bijoux - Ex comptable 7 mo

Oui ! rencontrés lors d'un fabuleux voyage au Kenya, les "Masai" sont un peuple de guerriers de chasseurs et d'éleveurs semi-nomades, de tailles impressionnantes, on les rencontre également en Tanzanie. C'est un peuple chaleureux, accueillants qui en échange de quelques piécettes vous propose de découvrir leur culture, mais vous permet aussi d'assister à un spectacle de chant et de danse typiques.

Response similaires
Qui a déjà entendu parler de la tribu Massaï en Afrique de l'Est ?

Olivier Chouraki , Animals lover Répondu 19 janv.

Oui, j'en ai rencontré beaucoup en Tanzanie :

"3ème jour : nous avons visité le village massaï d'Esilalei. L'instituteur, Leapa, nous a fait visiter l'école, où il enseigne le swahili, l'anglais, les maths, à 125 élèves, soit dans la salle de classe, soit au pied de l'arbre géant qui donne son nom au village. Nous avons vu une femme "repeindre" une hutte avec le ciment massaï, fait de bouse de vache, de terre et d'eau. Les huttes sont rondes, en bois et "ciment", couvertes de pailles. Nous avons visité une hutte. Ils ont de grandes huttes pour les humains, et de petites huttes pour les bébés animaux, agneaux et chevreaux. Les animaux adultes sont conduits par les massaï dans les pâturages le jour, puis rentrés pour la nuit dans un enclos formé de branches d'acacia avec de grosses épines qui protègent des léopards, des lions et des hyènes. Les massaï vivent principalement de l'élevage des vaches. Ils boivent beaucoup de lait, qu'ils gardent dans des gourdes faites d'une calebasse évidée, souvent décorée avec des perles. Le chef du village est très riche, il a plus de 2000 vaches. Il a 20 femmes et 70 enfants. Il a fait construire cette école pour eux. Lorsqu'il épouse une femme, à partir de 16 ans, il donne 3 à 5 vaches à ses parents. Les massaï ont dansé et chanté pour nous, et nous avons chanté et dansé avec eux, les femmes face aux hommes. Ensuite nous leur avons acheté des objets artisanaux, bracelets de perles, etc. Ensuite nous sommes allés dans le parc de Manyara, nous avons visité des marais, la forêt et les rives du lac salé de Manyara. Nous avons vu des hippopotames, des buffles, des singes bleus, un varan, des cigognes, des pélicans, et toutes sortes d'oiseaux. En plus de tous les animaux habituels, éléphants, zèbres, girafes, gnous, singes, phacochères, impalas, ... qui sont pour nous maintenant comme des pigeons et des moineaux. Nous avons fait du shopping dans une boutique et acheté des trésors, surtout des objets sculptés en ébène."

Questions similaires

Presque tous les hommes noirs et africains que je connais désirent une femme non noire. Beaucoup m'ont dit qu'ils ne veulent pas d'un partenaire noir. Cela me semble être un racisme interne. Le racisme existe-t-il entre hommes et femmes noirs ?

L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait l'Afrique ?

Qui étaient les Berbères, qui vivaient dans le Nord de l'Afrique, bien avant que les arabes arrivent ?

Quels sont les inconvénients de la colonisation en Afrique ?
Avec 50.000 FCFA qu'est-ce qu'on peut investir ici au Sénégal ?
La colonisation a-t-elle eu également des effets positifs sur l'Afrique ?

Quels sont les pays d'Afrique les plus riches, et quelle est la source principale de leur fortune ?

Que peut faire la France pour contrer la montée en puissance de la Chine en Afrique ?

Les seules civilisations anciennes avancées d'Afrique se trouvaient en Afrique du Nord, alors qu'il n'y en a eu pratiquement aucune en Afrique subsaharienne. À cause de ça, je commence à détester être noir. Est-ce que c'est mal ?

Pourquoi l'Afrique est-elle en marge du développement ?

Quiet on the African Horizon and Momma and Her Cubs Rest!

Judy Hulen

.

Lifetime of teaching kids,M.Ed.retired, Gone Sharing 8h

(Courtesy of Jeff Jett).

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. Fri

Posted by Jo Mburu

Elephants are tremendous distance swimmers. They can swim for up to six hours and 25 miles (48km). They are so buoyant that if they tire in the water, they can just rest by floating and will not sink. They can also use their trunk as a snorkel and dive.

Photo source. Elephant Swim | Elephant Experiences | Jabulani

In 2016 after being shot by poachers, an Elephant in Zimbabwe named Ben made his way up the steep escarpment to the lodge during the night regardless the painfull looking wound on his shoulder and patiently waited outside a medical lodge for 5 hours. Ben was treated and made a full recovery . Elephants are so smart . This is a species that , even if it doesn`t have the same internal monologue as us , they clearly share an astonishing degree of self-awareness and critical thinking . Let`s promote a society where we can empathize with and care for all animals . I truly believe all animals should be respected as citizens of this earth .

Photo source . Ben The Elephant Poaching Survivor .

Quiet on the African Horizon and Momma and Her Cubs Rest! □

(Courtesy of Jeff Jett).

ELECTORAL POLITICS

William Ruto to abolish CBC in raft of anti-Uhuru Kenyatta reformsKenyatta reforms

Dputy President William Ruto's radical plans to reverse key flagship Jubilee projects have rattled President Kenyatta's camp and could heighten tensions in the succession race.

The DP has vowed to roll back key gains in the President's flagship project — the Standard Gauge Railway — as well as the competency-based curriculum (CBC), with its first cohort in Grade Six.

Work From Home Jobs | Search Ads

He has also pledged to remodel the Managed Equipment Services (MES) project and halt the bailing out of struggling state companies.

In the MES arrangement, counties pay Sh100 million a year for leased equipment the national government buys.

Last week, the DP vowed to rescind last June's decision transferring Kenya Ferry Services (KFS) operations to the Kenya Ports Authority (KPA).

The SGR deal has attracted the DP's harshest criticism, although he has previously vouched for the inland container depots (ICDs) in Naivasha and Embakasi on many occasions, including a 2018 Nakuru Investment Conference, in which he said it was the best idea to expand the economy.

"It was never the intention of the government to build the SGR and frustrate small businesses in Coast. It was meant to make the port more efficient and to improve services," said an analyst. "Unfortunately, a few people took advantage of the project and ended up with selfish programmes to the detriment of Coast residents."

Nakuru Governor Lee Kinyanjui yesterday termed the DP's plan as a form of economic sabotage. "My only question is, is Nakuru not part of Kenya? Instead of engaging in conversations on how to enlarge the national cake and reach everyone, we are entertaining retrogressive policies targeting certain regions for short-term political expediency," he said.

Murang'a Senator Irungu Kang'ata, however, said the reversal of the ICD model was not a way to kill Nakuru's economy as there were other ways to tap into its potential.

"A 'hustler' government will establish a free economic zone in Naivasha, where companies will get tax waivers. That will create employment for many. The current SGR is far away from Naivasha and terminates in a private land and locals don't benefit," he said.

Dr Kang'ata said most of those projects were rolled out with the aim of looting public coffers. He cited the controversial lease of medical equipment worth over Sh63 billion, saying, such a deal would be reversed and money channelled to the bottom-up economic model.

"Anything that has been done to enhance corruption will be undone. UDA [United Democratic Alliance] believes in transparency and a graft-free economy. We will jail those who have enriched themselves unjustly," he said.

On education, Amani National Congress leader Musalia Mudavadi said the CBC system was hurriedly implemented without wide consultations with stakeholders. He added that it's a big burden to millions of parents.

"The controversial system will be scrapped once the Ruto/Mudavadi government takes power in August," he tweeted in February. Mr Mudavadi, who could become the Prime Cabinet Secretary in a Ruto government, has repeated this in campaign rallies across the country.

Ford-Kenya leader Moses Wetang'ula recently observed: "There is something frustrating for students, teachers and parents called CBC. We will do away with this curriculum if we ascend to power come August 9."

Prof Masibo Lumala of Moi University yesterday said Ruto was making a big gamble by going for key projects implemented in a government he helped to form. "He is whipping up emotions against the SGR idea in Mombasa, but he's just looking for votes. He should instead talk about extending it to Kisumu and Malaba. His plan to reverse everything that the Jubilee government has done, which he is part of, may not work for him. This can be used to portray him as a person who cannot be trusted," he said.

Kimilili MP Didmus Barasa said the DP was only targeting "luxurious projects" even though he did not say how SGR, CBC and MES deals were in that category. "Those expensive flagship programmes are the ones that increase the tax burden to Kenyans. We will revise the tax payable and zero rate essential products to reduce the cost of living. We'll do away with luxurious projects," he said. The legislator said reversing the CBC will involve fresh public participation, adding, the current regime has been using threats.

"We bring all the stakeholders in the education sector together, which can be done within 100 days in office and engage them on how best to implement CBC. Education Cabinet Secretary George Magoha had closed the doors for public participation. Ours will not be about coercion, we will realign it to be in line with our economy," the Kimilili MP said.

On struggling sugar factories, the DP said bailing them out had not improved operations. "We've put money in Mumias and Nzoia sugar factories but we've not succeeded in finding a solution for the woes in the sector. As the government of Kenya Kwanza,as our first role in the first 100 days, we will write off all debts these factories owe to the government. We will bring back the balance sheet of Mumias and Nzoia to zero," DP Ruto said in Bungoma. "Where some of these debts belong to other companies, we'll renegotiate and the government will pay," he added.

While in Kiminini, Trans Nzoia County, recently, he said his administration will stop bailouts to big companies like Kenya Airways.

"If the government can pump billions to just one company like Kenya Airways, if that amount is redirected to SMEs, is there any problem?" he posed.

Jubilee Secretary-General and Ndaragwa MP Jeremiah Kioni described Ruto pledges as retrogressive. "Doing away with projects means that we've sunk in money that we can't recover. All projects should be completed. The Ruto team has not considered what should be done for the economy to thrive," he said.
onyangooluoch85@gmail.com

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD:
Pilot's Perspective: Saving a Trapped Leopard

Posted by Kathy Pennell May 28

Published on the 15th of May, 2022 (Long but worthwhile reading)

Despite the unrelenting pain she was experiencing, the trapped leopard was full of fight

The morning of 27th April began as most do: coffee at first light and in the air by 7 o'clock, off to patrol the boundaries of Tsavo West. Of course, this is but the beginning of an open-ended story, as every day in Tsavo comes with its own surprises.

Today's surprise makes itself known around noon. My phone rings, with Northern Rangelands Trust at the other end of the line. During a foot patrol, their rangers had discovered a leopard caught in a trip snare. Her front paw is completely trapped, and in her panic, she has resorted to desperate measures in an attempt to free herself.

This rescue mission is not going to be straightforward. The leopard is located in a very remote place called Ishaqbini, on the eastern banks of the Tana River towards the coast. It will take an aerial operation to reach her.

Today’s surprise makes itself known around noon. My phone rings, with Northern Rangelands Trust at the other end of the line. During a foot patrol, their rangers had discovered a leopard caught in a trip snare. Her front paw is completely trapped, and in her panic, she has resorted to desperate measures in an attempt to free herself.

This rescue mission is not going to be straightforward. The leopard is located in a very remote place called Ishaqbini, on the eastern banks of the Tana River towards the coast. It will take an aerial operation to reach her.

Given the patient's remote location, this would be a mission for Sky Vets

I pass the message through to the Trust's operations room, requesting availability of a mobile vet unit. The SWT/KWS Tsavo Mobile Veterinary Unit is currently on task with the other SWT helicopter in Amboseli, trying to save a big tusker called Tolstoy. It is an all-hands-on-deck operation and no resources can be spared from the scene. We quickly work to find a Plan B for our leopard.

This will be a mission for Sky Vets, our initiative designed to treat injured wildlife in inaccessible areas. Dr Njoroge, the KWS veterinarian who often leads these treatments, mobilises from KWS Nairobi HQ. He and his team are driven to Wilson Airport, where Boskovic Air Charters is waiting to deliver them to our Kaluku Field Headquarters.

Sky Vets is in full action today! One SWT helicopter is operational in Amboseli and now the second helicopter is preparing for a mission to Ishaqbini. As Dr Njoroge and team fly down to Kaluku, we load the leopard's location into Google Earth. It will be a 200-kilometre helicopter flight to Ishaqbini and I need to get my bearings.

Boskovic touches down in Kaluku at 3:15pm and Dr Njoroge quickly transfers his gear across to the helicopter. Within minutes, we are off, flying east over the Yatta Plateau. We continue over the endless plains of Tsavo East National Park, Galana, and Assa, where semi-arid plains stretch as far as the eye can see. It is vast and entirely wild, save for small pockets of Orma nomads and their camels and goats.

Finally, we reach the wide, snaking form of the Tana River. As we circle into the given GPS coordinates, we see four rangers waving us into a landing area. We are met by the senior warden of Ishaqbini, who briefs us on the situation. The leopard is trapped in a trip snare, a disguised cable loop that is staked into the ground while tension is held by a branch above. When an animal unwittingly springs the trap, it tightens around the victim like a noose. Poachers set them to catch small antelope, but as we are reminded today, trip snares can even be lethal to big cats.

The warden leads us a few hundred metres into the thick bush, where we quietly approach the leopard. Dr Njoroge notes that the animal is in good health, which bodes well for the operation. He says the treatment should be a simple dart, then cut the snare free of the leopard's front left paw

.After loading his dart gun with the required dosage of anaesthetic, Dr Njoroge lines up a good spot to deliver the dart. He then asks a small group of us to approach the leopard from another angle, so as to distract her attention and get her to show hindquarters. This meaty section of the hind legs is always the best area to dart an animal.

As we approach the leopard, she remains very calm but focuses intently on us as a threat. She lets out her deepest rumble, then proceeds to snarl and hiss at us, showing her impressive top and lower incisors. Her colours are incredible, vivid jet-black spots dotted over her sandy coat

.It is sad and frustrating to see a beautiful animal snared and in pain. At the same time, it is humbling to be metres away from such wild, raw power. On cue, Dr Njoroge releases a well-aimed dart to her right rear leg and we all slip out of eyesight, so the patient can drift off to sleep. Five minutes later, one of the rangers gives her a little prod with a long stick to be sure the anaesthetic has taken full effect. After confirming that she is asleep, treatment can commence.

Dr Njoroge inspects the damage to the paw and is confronted with a grisly sight: Working throughout the night and into the wee hours of dawn, the leopard desperately tried to escape the snare. Her incredible survival instincts had clearly kicked into full gear, for she had set upon the process of chewing off her own paw! She has so far managed to remove her three middle pads and claws.

As Dr Njoroge injects painkillers and long-acting antibiotics to stave off any potential infections, his vet assistant cleans the wound with hydrogen peroxide. We prepare the green clay, which provides an excellent early defence barrier for a fresh wound, and pack the wound generously. With a healthy coating of topical antibiotic spray, the treatment is complete.

Although the wound is grave, Dr Njoroge is confident that the leopard will make a full recovery. At a fit year or so old, she has age on her side. She will adapt to being almost clawless on one side, and she has the distinct advantage of living on the banks of the Tana River, where she has access to all kinds of small prey. Leopards are the ultimate survivor; there is no other mammal more capable of adapting to almost any situation.

Rangers remained on-site to monitor the patient as she awoke from anaesthetic,

It is time to wake the leopard. With dusk falling, time is of the essence. Dr Njoroge injects the reversal drug and briefs the rangers to monitor the leopard for the next several hours. The success of vet operations often hinges on many organisations and people working in collaboration, and this was no exception. We all shake hands, pack up the equipment and make a beeline for the helicopter. Our last light to get home safely is fading fast!

Source: Animal News

Pilot's Perspective: Saving a Trapped Leopard

The morning of 27th April began as most do: coffee at first light and in the air by 7 o'clock, off to patrol the boundaries of Tsavo West. Of course, this is but the beginning of an open-ended story, as every day in Tsavo comes with its own surprises.

https://www.sheldrickwildlifetrust.org/news/updates/saving-trapped-leopard?fbclid=IwAR1P4elO2R1qptjfFV-vM9fUz7mL1zw62UNqfz9toZCk2ck6C1Xo0jGHWSI

How fast can a full grown lion run?

Simon Whild · Follow Writer, Editor, Lecturer at Freelancing May 30

An adult male lion can sprint up to 80kph (50mph) for a short distance. They can also leap as far as 11m (36ft) to catch their prey. Due to their lack of a mane, lionesses can run only slightly faster than male lions.

The current fastest human in the world is Usain Bolt, who can run at nearly 45kph (28mph). This means that a full grown lion or lioness, despite their size and weight, can easily outrun any human.

If you are unlucky enough to see this, then you are lunch because running away is futile.

dreamstime

Which is the faster animal, lion or tiger?

Ross Wind Answered Mar 13, 2020

Originally Answered: Which is the fastest animal, lion or tiger?

THE LIONESS IS THE SECOND FASTEST FELINE

FASTEST MAMMAL LIST. ONLY TWO FELINES THE CHEETAH AND THE LION.

We see often a lioness sprinting in open fields not the tiger

The lion is a fast sprinter but like other cats can only maintain top speed for a short distance.

The statistics came from two reliable sources.

#E0012 LION: On the list of the 10 fastest mammals.

worldatlas CONTINENTS COUNTRIES ANSWERS TRAVEL SOCIETY ECONO

The Fastest Mammals In The World

	Mammal		Maximum Speed
1	Cheetah	Cheetah	109.4–120.7 km/h
2	Free-tailed bat		96.6 km/h
3	Pronghorn		88.5 km/h
4	Springbok		88 km/h
5	Wildebeest		80.5 km/h
5	Lion	Lion	80.5 km/h
6	Blackbuck		80 km/h
6	Hare		80 km/h
7	Greyhound		74 km/h
8	Jackrabbit		72 km/h
9	African wild dog		71 km/h
10	Kangaroo		71 km/h

From another reliable source. BBC News, November 2, 2017. Lion on the list not the tiger.

Top 10 Fastest Animals In The World 2018

Except for one antelope lioness chase the fastest mammals.

The lioness is faster than a male lion but the male lion is also short distance printer.

See some examples

E0105 MIND-PLOWING LION BURST. In a short distance a lion can outrun a horse.

Generally, the lion's attention is on the horse and not the human.

In 1822, two horse riders were brought down by lions, horses were killed men were spared. - Travels and Adventures in Southern Africa: Volume 1, by George Thompson, 1827, 1832, p.470.

