"The horse was fagged and bore a heavy man on his back-the lion was fresh and furious with hunger and came down upon him like a thunder-bolt. In a few seconds he overtook, and springing up behind Lucas, brought horse and man in an instant to the ground. Luckily, the poor boor was unhurt, and the lion was too eager in worrying the horse, to pay any immediate attention to the rider. "- The Literary Gazette: A Weekly Journal of Literature, Science, and the Fine Arts, Volume 11, 1827, p.197.

During a safari ride in Botswana in 2015. From a 10-meter burst, an adult male lion did a solo chase at a pack of 8 horse riders. The male lion selected an Arabian horse ridden by a brave woman. The Arabian horse's max speed 40 m/h (65 km/h). The male lion jumped on the horse and killed it. The woman was on the ground only two meters away. The guides came to the woman's rescue while a group of lionesses were watching from a distance. Another horse rider survived a lion attack.

- The Guardian, August 7, 2015

A successful male lion cheetah ambush

Related Links

How many human beings would it take to physically overpower a full-grown lion?

How fast could a male African lion kill a 200 pound, good shape, strong man, without any weapons?

Is it true that the lion preys on/hunts animals that are bigger, wilder, more aggressive, and more dangerous compared to what the tiger preys on?

In a fight between a grizzly bear and a silverback gorilla, who would win?

Who would win in a fight between a lion and a grizzly bear?
A full grown male Kodiak bear vs a full grown male Siberian tiger who wins?
How can you tell how old a lion is?
How much does a full-grown lion weigh?
What happens if you run towards a lion instead of running away?
What is the average speed of a lion?

Why can't lions be as fast as cheetahs?

Peter Nagy , studied at Indiana University Answered Sep 17, 2019

Why Lions Are Not as Fast as Cheetahs

Lions evolved to prey on much bigger animals than cheetahs did. Cheetahs take down small, fast prey, like the Thompson's gazelle. They do it mostly as solitary hunters. Lions cooperatively kill relatively large game, like wildebeests, zebras, warthogs, and even cape buffalo. For their predatory roles, they had to develop different bodies.

Cheetahs paired their bodies down for maximize speed. An adult cheetah weighs between 46 and 160 pounds. Cheetahs have very long, slender legs, a springy spine, and a relatively small head. They have also lost the retractability of their claws in order to turn them into cleats that give them better traction for their sprints that can reach 75 miles an hour. Even their teeth are smaller, and their jaw muscles weaker. They could never kill the lions' usual prey.

Lions are much bigger. A female lion is just under 300 pounds, while a male can exceed 500 pounds. They are muscular, powerful, armed with up to 4 inch fangs, and razor sharp, retractable claws that can inflict serious flesh wounds, and help wrestle big animals into submission. They kill by cooperative ambush.

To become like cheetahs, lions would be smaller, less robust, less well armed, and weaker. At this point, that strategy could not work, because neither the speed of the cheetah, nor of its prey appeared suddenly, but evolved in tandem. Smaller, faster lions would be too small and weak to kill their normal prey, but too slow to catch the prey of the cheetah.

Under some circumstances, however, lions could evolve the speed of cheetahs. First cheetahs and humans would both have to go extinct. If in an area that has a shortage of large game, some lions are cut off geographically from others, they would have to adapt by becoming smaller and faster. They would also have to abandon their cooperative hunting, otherwise they would become like African wild dogs. Over the course of thousands of generations they would gradually switch to smaller and faster prey, eventually evolving a body and physical capabilities much like a cheetah's.

Related Links

How many human beings would it take to physically overpower a full-grown lion?

How fast could a male African lion kill a 200 pound, good shape, strong man, without any weapons?

Is it true that the lion preys on/hunts animals that are bigger, wilder, more aggressive, and more dangerous compared to what the tiger preys on?

In a fight between a grizzly bear and a silverback gorilla, who would win?
Who would win in a fight between a lion and a grizzly bear?
A full grown male Kodiak bear vs a full grown male Siberian tiger who wins?
How can you tell how old a lion is?
How much does a full-grown lion weigh?
What happens if you run towards a lion instead of running away?
What is the average speed of a lion?

Why do tigers attack humans so much more than lions do?

Nick Nicholas Studied Big Cats for 40+ years Tue

There are several reasons for this.

Lions live out in the open savannah. Humans can normally see where the lions are and unless they are complete idiots will give the lions a very wide berth.

Tigers live in jungles where there is far more cover. Humans who go trekking through these jungles will not be able to see them from far away like they can with lions. Tigers also have superb camouflage enabling them to melt into the background at a distance of just a few yards.

If a tiger is surprised by a human it will likely attack especially if it is a female with cubs and in the Sunderbans mangrove swamps the tigers will actively seek out humans who are usually illegally fishing or going after honey.

SO although tigers are more likely to be maneaters than lions, it is largely due to human stupidity in going into a place where tigers live.

Everything Animals
Is a lion-leopard hybrid real?

Answered by Q.E.F.R May 5

The Leopon, although not natural, is a very interesting and gorgeous big cat hybrid.

They look like spotted lions, males can be 105–120 cms tall and weigh up to 150+ kgs while females don't exceed 110 cms in height and 105 kgs in weigh.

This makes leopons bigger than their father leopard since male leopards average 60–75 kgs with a max of 80–95 kgs and a few records reaching 97, 108 and 113 kgs.

Leopons are however generally as tall as male lions but weigh much less since male lions weigh generally 180-250 kgs even if larger ones above 270 kgs were recorded (record 313 kg).

Male Leopons are basically of the size of a female lion, while female Leopons are basically as big as a big male cougar.

FUN FACT

The Leopon was actually thought to have been spotted in the wild and identified as the Marozi Lion or Spotted Lion in Kenya after someone killed two felids that were a bit smaller than a lion but had the markings of a leopard which is strange since lions' spots appear only when lions are cubs and then disappear

Here's the skin of the alleged Marozi Lion

Fact is that there was a sighting of a whole pack of these felids that were most likely thought to live in the high zones of Kenyan Mountains and not in the savannah where lions, leopards and cheetahs rule. So the hypothetical presence of several Marozi lions makes us debunk the idea that a leopard mated with a lion, since the hybrid Leopon is characterized by infertility and can't reproduce.

So we will never know what this mysterious this big cat is, the last sighting of this alleged Marozi Lion is reported in late 1980s, meaning that it may be extinct.

Yes, we may have lost an alleged new big cat species.

For more informations about the Marozi or Spotted Lion, you should visit this https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Marozi

Marozi – mysterious spotted mountain lion | DinoAnimals.com

Marozi, spotted lion (Panthera leo maculatus) - a hybrid of a lion and a leopard, or a subspecies of a lion? Is marozi a cryptid or does marozi really exist?

https://dinoanimals.com/animals/marozi-mysterious-spotted-mountain-lion/

Related Links

Where should dogs be used now that they can be trained to detect Covid with high accuracy (even asymptomatic cases)?

What should you do instead of getting another pet after one of your pets die, and why?

Whale sharks look similar to whales and have similar habits. How does their intelligence compare to whales?

Has anyone ever had a pet fox in their home?

Did people in the past try to populate dingoes from Australia somewhere else?
How true is it that every other animal responds to the call of se^x only in season?

What visual navigation system does the dung beetle use?
What is the best method for controlling predation by coyotes?
For anyone experienced with birds, I gave some birds outside (mainly one Indian minor and two crows or ravens) a tiny pinch of cinnomon donut, will they be ok?

What are some amazing things about bats' echolocation?
How does the structure of the shark's skin help it to remain parasite free?

How do male spiders manage to find the females up high in their webs?
Why are humpback whales beginning to organize in groups?

Do cutaneous marginal pouches occur in all felids, from domestic and pedigree cats to the big cats (tigers, lions, leopards, cheetahs, etc.)?

Do women treat dogs differently than men (treat dogs)?

BLACK HISTORY & POLITICS

What do boxing enthusiasts think of the results of the superfight (Marciano v Ali)?

John McGlothlin · Follow 2y

Which results do you mean? the original results, broadcast on Radio? The completely different results released in the US after they changed the entire ending? Or the results released in the rest of the world, which had a third and different ending?

Boxing folks think the "multiple ending" computer fight was a made for TV gig that would had no significance at all, except for the interesting fact that Rocky Marciano and Muhammad Ali discovered they were kindred spirits and became fast friends.

CREDIT PICTURE PININTEREST

The computer fight was the invention by Murray Woroner in 1967, who had the idea of determining the all-time great heavyweight champion of the world by placing boxing champions of different eras in a series of fantasy fights.

Woroner sent out a survey to 250 boxing experts and boxing writers to help determine which heavyweights would be used in what would become a fantasy tournament. Hank Meyer, president and salesman with a one other partner in Systems Programming Services, an independent service firm, was instrumental in arranging the entire affair, and contended at the time that it was his idea.

According to certain critics, Woroner and Meyer’s intent was to craft a fantasy which excluded all the black fighters from winning - only there is not one teeny, tiny, miniscule bit of evidence that this is so. Nadda, none, period. Now perhaps racism influenced the historians and writers who filled out the survey, but the originators of the idea, there is no proof at all they had any racist intent whatsoever.

Every boxer's records during their prime were entered into - what was at the time a cutting edge - NCR-315 computer. Also their fighting styles, and perceived strengths and weaknesses were converted into mathematical formulas. The NCR-315 with 20K of memory was supplied by Systems Programming Services.

The fantasy fights were broadcast on radio worldwide. Even the boxers who were still alive at the time listened to the programs and some of them participated as commentators. The final fight was between Jack Dempsey and Rocky Marciano, with Marciano defeating Dempsey and declared the all-time greatest heavyweight champion by the computer. (Something that pleased Dempsey not one little bit!) Woroner awarded the real Marciano a gold and diamond title belt worth $10,000.

This radio result, with Dempsey losing to Marciano, was result #1 from the computer.

Muhammad Ali was not amused by being eliminated by Jim Jeffries by the computer, and sued. The lawsuit was settled when Woroner offered to pay Ali - who, in exile and unable to fight, desperately needed money - $10,000 whilst also getting his contractual agreement to be in a filmed version of a fantasy fight in which he would fight Marciano.

Ali and Marciano agreed on the condition that they would receive a cut of the film's profits.

So in 1969, Rocky filmed the so-called “superfight” with Muhammad Ali, where a computer had projected wins and losses of each great heavyweight. The Rock, retired 15 years and massively overweight, trained like a fiend to get his weight down to where he looked like Rocky instead of Andy Ruiz. His hair gone, Rocky got Muhammad to agree not to knock his toupee.

To the astonishment of everyone except Marciano and Ali, a very real friendship was forged outside the ring. Marciano, the quiet and shy white man who served his country in the second world war, and Ali, the brash Black man who refused draft induction, found themselves liking each other quite a bit.

"Through all the fakery, something is happening between us," Ali wrote in his autobiography, The Greatest: My Own Story. "I feel closer to him than any white fighter in the trade. We talk fighter's talk in the way only friends can, blood talk, nitty-gritty talk. Our work is phony but out friendship has become real."

Throughout filming Ali never referred to Marciano as anything other than 'champ'. In his autobiography he wrote: "Rocky was quiet, peaceful, humble, not cocky or boastful" adding that he "deserves his place as one of the greatest of the great heavyweights.”

Marciano, meanwhile, called Ali "the fastest man on wheels." Rocky said, in awe, he had never seen a human being as fast as Ali was. Rocky also called Ali “champ,” and the two men spent hours outside the ring talking about boxing, their families and lives, and their philosophy of life.

Ali came away impressed with Marciano’s toughness, and his humble, but relentless nature, and power, even after all the time he had been retired. Rocky was “even tougher than Joe Frazier,” Ali would say.

"But as the fraud came near an end, it was plain that neither of us, both heavyweight champions, liked the idea of being dramatized as defeated by the other – especially in a fake fight – and we were both on edge," admitted Ali. "One afternoon I unleashed a string of lightning-fast jabs that kept coming almost the entire round. Rocky was amazed and said: "I never seen a fighter with hands that fast."

The pair parted on excellent terms, with plans to tour the United States together and promote racial harmony. After all, as Ali said, “if a white man from Brockton and a Black kid from Louisville can like each other and find common ground, why not everyone else?”

When the computer fight was released in the US, and Rocky won, at first Ali was irate, but then he discovered he had won in the second version of the film. released elsewhere in the world.

Thus, computer ending number #2 in the US, and computer ending #3 in the rest of the world.

“We both ended up happy,” said Ali.

Dempsey was still mad. First he lost to Marciano in result #1, then he got bumped out of the title fight completely, in results #2 and #3.

A month later Marciano was dead when the three-seater plane he was travelling in from Chicago to Des Moines crashed into an oak tree in the middle of a cornfield. It was the evening before his 46th birthday.

Ali cried when he heard the news Rocky was gone…

And that is the real story of the computer fight, and it’s many endings.

Related Links

Who would win in a fight between Rocky Marciano and Muhammad Ali? Why?

Was Muhammad Ali really knocked down and out by Rocky Marciano in their 1969 computer fight? If not, why the hell would he fake something like this?

Since boxing is about match ups, can it be argued that Mike Tyson would defeat Rocky Marciano, Mohammed Ali would defeat Mike Tyson, and that Rocky Marciano would defeat Mohammed Ali?

What would happen if there was a boxing match between Anthony Joshua and Rocky Marciano?

What was Rocky Marciano's boxing style?

Who would be considered the greatest boxer of all time, Chuck Wepner, Rocky Marciano, Mike Tyson or Muhammad Ali?

What are some of the famous punches in boxing like Marciano's Susie Q?

Do you think Rocky Marciano would do well in today's boxing if he were alive today, since he used to take so much damage en route to victory?

Tournament. Boxers at their prime. Last 16 scheme. Ali vs W. Klitschko. Fury vs Holmes. Marciano vs Tyson. Bowe vs Foreman. Liston vs V. Klitschko. Marciano vs Frazier. Louis vs Holyfield. Lewis vs Wilder. What would be results?

Who would have won a hypothetical boxing match between Rocky Marciano

Besides Muhammad Ali, who's boxing's best ever heavyweight?

John McGlothlin Answered Feb 19, 2020

The great Joe Louis, the Brown Bomber, was the second greatest heavyweight to ever live.

CREDIT PICTURE BRITANNICA

Joe Louis Barrow was a unique, generational athlete and talent.

Joseph Louis Barrow, born on May 13, 1914 fought from 1934 to 1951. He reigned as the undisputed world heavyweight champion for an incredible 12 years, from 1937 to 1949. Nicknamed the "Brown Bomber," Louis' championship reign lasted 140 consecutive months, during which he had 26 championship bouts.

The great trainer Jack Blackburn fashioned Louis from a free moving, free wheeling amateur, into a deadly knockout machine who patiently followed his opponents around the ring, set them up with pinpoint jabs, and generally knocked them out with what Floyd Patterson called in 'The international hall of fame basic boxing skills" the "sweetest left hook I have ever seen, and the deadliest right cross."

A great boxer needs three things, according to Emmanuel Steward, the legendary, late, great, Hall of Fame trainer:

1. Talent; (speed, strength, reflexes);
2. Willingness to work and devote yourself to be the best;
3. Great people to teach you and be your team. Joe Louis Barrow had all three.

Sam Langford, one of the greatest fighters who ever lived summed up Joe Louis when he said, "The Detroit Bomber is another Gans, whom I consider the greatest fighter of all time… He (Louis) can hit, he is fast and is no slouch at employing ring craft. I am glad I am still able to see enough to watch the boy. He is the marvel of the age."

CREDIT THE JULY 20, 1935 EDITION OF Chicago Defender

Jack Blackburn made Joe Louis Barrow into the Great Joe Louis

Jack Blackburn is best known as the Hall of Fame trainer of the great Joe Louis, but he was also a great lightweight boxer who engaged in over 160 recorded professional fights from 1901 to 1923. (Blackburn claimed to have had 385 fights. In a time when boxing was illegal in many states, most of his fights probably went unrecorded.) That boxing career shaped Blackburn's subsequent career as a trainer.

Never a champion Blackburn still fought some of the greatest fighters of all time. He fought the legendary lightweight champion Joe Gans, "The Old Master" three times, all time great Sam Langford six times, (despite a major weight disadvantage), the great welterweight Dave Holly five times, future light-heavyweight champion Philadelphia Jack O'Brien, andHarry Greb, possibly the fourth greatest middleweight of all time.

Blackburn even fought heavyweights Jim Barry and Gunboat Smith. Billy Rocap said the greatest fight he ever saw was Blackburn's famous 15 round draw with Sam Langford in Marlboro, Massachusetts. Veteran historian Charley Rose rated Blackburn as the third greatest lightweight ever in his 1968 ratings.

And Blackburn watched every bit of what trainers did during his 22 year career, and applied it to become a truly great trainer himself.

Blackburn trained four fighters who went on to become world champions:

- bantamweight Bud Taylor,
- lightweight Sammy Mandell,
- welterweight Jackie Fields, and
- heavyweight Joe Louis.

Louis was his pride and joy, who he felt he had molded in the image of the great technicians of his day, the vicious but cerebral Blackburn, the "Old Master of the Ring" Joe Gans and power punching Sam Langford.

CREDIT FOR PICTURE OF THE GREAT JOE LOUIS AND JACK BLACKBURN: THE SQUARED CIRCLE AND TWITTER

Joe Louis as an amateur

Joe Louis started in the unpaid ranks with an amateur record of 50-4 with 43 knockouts and won the Detroit Golden Gloves titles and the National AAU Light-heavyweight championship in 1934, before deciding to turn pro.

Louis's manager, John Roxborough, sought to hire Jack Blackburn, to turn Louis into the champion they envisioned.

Blackburn was introduced to Joe Louis on June 25, 1934 and watched Joe sparring and hitting the heavy bag. Blackburn said later he saw at once Louis had natural punching power, something that could not be taught, but he also saw that he was completely dependent on his power, and lacked solid fundamentals.

Blackburn talked of his observations of the young Louis, and what he thought he would need to become great, to the Pittsburgh Courier, on July 20, 1935 saying

"Louis needed correction in everything except hitting. I had to teach him to back up his punches with the proper timing, accuracy and to instruct him in the proper art of balance. I trained him under the same methods I trained under when I was a fighter."

CREDIT COX'S CORNER, AND THE Pittsburgh Courier July 20, 1935 edition

Louis spoke of what Blackburn gave him in his autobiography Joe Louis My Life:

"He (Blackburn) saw my faults right off. I was hitting off balance. He corrected this by showing me how to plant my feet and punch with my whole body, not just swinging my arms. He said people going to fights don't want to see a dancer or a clincher –they want to see a man who goes for the guts. He said I had strength and that I could beat or knock out anybody I wanted to if I planted my body in the right position."

Louis said his first week with Blackburn the trainer did nothing but hold the heavy bag and taught Louis how to actually punch correctly.

CREDIT COX'S CORNER, AND Joe Louis My Life

Blackburn developed Louis into not only a boxer-puncher of extraordinary power and authority. Blackburn taught Louis to use short compact punches - compare his punching on You-Tube with Wilder's bolo punches!

Joe had weaknesses, though most could not take advantage of them

Manny Steward explained once, "no fighter is perfect. A good trainer finds his fighter's weaknesses, and devises ways to defend them, while finding his fighter's strengths, and emphasizing those."

Joe had weaknesses. His chin was decent, but not great, and he was not the fastest afoot of heavyweights, though his hand speed was impressive. He compensated for his weaknesses with pin-point accuracy, superb fundamentals, and truly impressive power.

Thanks to Jack Blackburn, Joe Louis was one of the best technical boxers to ever grace the ring.

Joe Louis was the best “finisher” of all time

Grantland Rice, the great sportswriter, described Louis as a "brown cobra."

In 50 Years at Ringside Ring magazine founder Nat Fleischer said that Louis was the most effective, deadliest boxer at finishing any opponent once they were in trouble - and Louis owed that to Blackburn.

The Great Joe Louis faced 9 opponents in the top hundred

Joe’s top competition was:

5 Rocky Marciano (lost)

#7 Ezzard Charles (ranked at light heavyweight, but was heavyweight champion)

#12 Max Schmeling (lost one, won one)

#21 Max Baer

#22 Jack Sharkey

#27 Jimmy Bivens

#33 Joe Walcott

#53 Primo Carnera

#88 Lou Nova

BoxRec: Ratings

CREDIT TO BOXREC FOR ALL RANKINGS AND RECORDS

Joe Louis retired the first time in 1949 with a record of 61–1 over a 15 year career, in which he had been undisputed champion the last 12, (and he had avenged that one loss). Shamefully, the Internal Revenue Service forced Louis back into the ring to pay dubious taxes assessed on “winnings” from exhibitions in which he had collected not a penny, but donated the purses to the war effort and veteran’s groups. Nonetheless, the government, insisting he owed money for those efforts - which he was never told at the time - forced the old Bomber back into the ring.

Joe should be remembered, as Rocky Marciano said, ‘as the guy we grew up cheering for.”

Max Baer summed up fighting Louis best: "I define fear as standing across the ring from Joe Louis and knowing he wants to go home early."

Related Links

Based solely on technique, what are the top 3 in heavyweight boxing history?
Who was a greater heavyweight boxer; Joe Louis or Muhammad Ali?

How many heavyweights today could Muhammad Ali have gone the distance with? His skills be outdated today because of boxing evolution and modern training.

We know a prime Muhammad Ali matches well against anybody. But how does a 70s era Ali fare against the more modern super heavyweights (Lewis, the Klitschkos, Fury, AJ, Wilder) and why?

If Muhammad Ali competed today would he be one of the top 10 heavyweight boxer today? Since modern training (boxing evolution) has improved a lot since 1967.

Could Muhammad Ali beat even the weakest modern heavyweights today? Since every modern heavyweights refuse to have Ali's outdated skills in their arsenal, Ali's skills are outdated due to boxing evolution and modern training has improved a lot.

Who was the most overrated heavyweight boxer of all time?
Did Muhammad Ali really consider himself the greatest?
Could any heavyweight of today defeat Ali in his prime?
Apart from Muhammad Ali, is there any boxer in history who had a reasonable?

BOXING TREND
Since boxing is about match ups, can it be argued that Mike Tyson would defeat Rocky Marciano, Mohammed Ali would defeat Mike Tyson, and that Rocky Marciano would defeat Mohammed Ali?

John McGlothlin Updated Feb 3, 2020

Muhammad Ali's billing as "The Greatest of All Time" was more than just a monicker, according to Iron Mike Tyson, and Rocky Marciano as well.

Styles make fighters, neither Tyson nor Rocky had the style to beat a 1967 fast as lightning Ali.

Mike Tyson and Rocky Marciano both flatly said that Ali, a young, 1967 Prime Ali, could beat either one of them.

CREDIT: PICTURE TO GQ

Here is what Mike Tyson says about fighting Ali:

“I can’t beat that man. Hell fucking no. No fucking way,"

Then Mike goes on to analyze Ali as the best ever:

"From a boxing perspective, Ali is a fucking animal. He looks more like a model than a fighter. What he is is a Tyrannosaurus Rex with a pretty face. He’s just mean and evil. He’ll take you to deep water and drown you. He’s very special. Best in the world.

"Nobody beats Ali."

CREDIT FOR THE QUOTES TO RAPPLER

Rocky Marciano analyzed Ali too.

Rocky Marciano, who filmed the "computer fight" with Ali in 1969 while Ali was banned from boxing, is quoted in Lombardi Dies, Orr Flies, Marshall

Cries: The Sports Legacy of 1970 by Brad Schultz as saying about Ali "the fastest man on wheels, no fighter who ever lived was that fast."

Rocky, when asked if he could have beaten Ali, said:

"Most would make the guy before they made him stop fighting – the fighter that destroyed Cleveland Williams, before time off took so much of the skip and slip from his legs – a strong favorite over anybody, anytime, anywhere, including me."

In this case, we can go by what the boxers said about each other. Only in a never was world do we ignore what people say, because they do not feed our narrative!

Let us examine these three fighters:

Rocky Marciano:

At his best, Rocky may have been the best conditioned heavyweight of history. Naturally weighing about 200 pounds, he trained himself down in order to be able to fight full bore for 15 rounds. With the better nutrition and training available today, Rocky would have probably fought around 200 to 210.

And Rocky was TOUGH. Sonny Liston, who did not respect or like a lot of people, said of Marciano in tribute, after his death, "he was a great champion, he was never defeated, and he refused to be defeated." To Sonny, being tough made you a man, and Sonny made clear, Rocky, to him, was a MAN.

Rocky was also a relentless, highly conditioned, extremely powerful fighter who depended on an iron chin, his conditioning, to keep him firing away as well in the 15th as he was in the first, enormous strength, and a right hand which was as good a punch as boxing has ever seen. Budd Schulberg, award-winning screenwriter and boxing fanatic, correlated Marciano's capability of grinding down an opponent to a "hydraulic drill attacking a boulder."

Arthur Daley exalted him as a "perpetual motion punching machine."

Rocky was a fanatic and dedicated trainer. Marciano's boundless reserves of stamina explained his overpoweringly swarming style and his remarkable recuperative powers meant he was seldom troubled.

Dan Cuoco of the International Boxing Research Organisation explained Marciano's success thusly, "What Rocky Marciano gave up in height and reach he more than made up with one punch knockout power, extraordinary strength and stamina, an insatiable will to win, mental toughness and plenty of guts…Although he missed a lot his savage body attack would wear his opponents down. What he lacked in speed, he more than made up for by the volume of punches he threw. When he was caught with a good punch, his world class chin held up admirably.”

Rocky's trainer, the highly respected Charley Goldman, originally just laughed at the challenge facing him. But after a number of years of working with the dedicated Rocky he remarked, “I got a guy who is short, stoop-shouldered and balding with two left feet, (Rocky’s victims) all look better than he does as far as moves are concerned, but they don’t look so good (laying) on the canvas.”

Rocky at 5'10 1/2" with the shortest reach of any champion, would almost always be undersized in comparisons with other champions, historically. But in this fight, he is actually a half inch taller than Mike Tyson, though his reach was 3 inches shorter. Still, size wise, it is going to be close. Mike's best fighting weight was about 212-215, so they would be very close to the same size.

Still, heart, toughness, relentless motor, unmatched conditioning, desire, all have to count - Rocky had one style, and one motor. He went after his opponent, as Ali once said, "he gave 'em hell from the start of the bell, and at the end of the round he was ready for more!"

One last factor: look at Rocky's six title defenses. He is the ONLY heavyweight champion in history to have made every single defense against the highest ranked available contender. Read that again: Rocky is the ONLY heavyweight champion in history to have made every single defense against the highest ranked contender.

Of his six title defenses, 5 of them were against the #1 contender, and the sixth was against the #2 contender who had just beaten the #1 contender in a title elimination bout.

No other champion in history made every single defense against the top available contender. Rocky may not have faced the best in history, but he faced the best available every single time out, and no other champion has ever done that.

Rocky is currently ranked by BoxRec as the 5th greatest heavyweight boxer in history. His knockout-to-win percentage of 87.76% remains one of the highest in heavyweight boxing history. Marciano was The Ring Fighter of the Year for 1952, 1954, and 1955. He was also in Ring's Fight of the Year three times. The fights were: 1952 Rocky Marciano vs. Jersey Joe Walcott (1st meeting); 1953 Rocky Marciano vs. Roland LaStarza (2nd meeting); 1954 Rocky Marciano vs. Ezzard Charles (2nd meeting).

Now we look at Iron Mike Tyson

Mike Tyson is a unique fighter in his style, short for a heavyweight, with a very short reach, (he is a half inch shorter than Rocky, though he has a 3 inch reach advantage on Rocky), he is not a swarmer, but a mid-range volume power puncher. Blessed with incredible speed and strength, he used his short stabbing jab to set up his hooks. He had a much lower KO percentage than Marciano, of 76% to Marciano's 88%, with more of his KO's coming later in fights from accumulated beatings.

Neither man fought particularly great competition. Both, however, in their primes, could only fight who was available.

Tyson's chin was far less impressive than Rocky's, who was never stopped, while Tyson was knocked out by Buster Douglas, Danny Williams, and Lennox Lewis, TKO'd by Holyfield, and stopped by Kevin McBride. His chin was far less impressive than Marciano's.

But Mike's speed, and defense, cannot be underestimated. In his prime, he was a short, lightning fast boxer with enormous power and incredible handspeed, was always vulnerable to taller rangy fighters who could rotate out and away, and control the fight with a jab. Under Rooney, he neutralized those fighters by being in good enough shape to go the distance, with constant movement, bobbing and weaving, to slip punches, and great defense. Under Rooney Mike landed 56 percent of his power punches, which is 15 percentage points higher than the heavyweight average. For instance, against Trevor Berbick, Tyson landed more power punches (46) than the total punches that Berbick threw (43), according to CompuBox. After Rooney, Mike's punch stats showed a complete change, with lesser totals, and lesser accuracy.

Kevin Rooney himself has been very candid about when he worked with Tyson, from the start of his career up to the Spinks fight, Tyson was trained to be, and was, a volume combination boxer-puncher. Rooney says " he punched fast and hard. That’s a difficult combination to deal with. Especially when those fast punches come in bunches, in good, solid, combinations,"

Rooney has talked in detail about Mike's defense in those days, saying, "he was elusive. The best thing about it was these guys couldn’t hit him. When you can’t hit somebody, that becomes very frustrating. In boxing, I’m trying to hit you, you’re moving your head and I can’t hit you. And I’m like, what the *. That’s what happened in a lot of Mike’s fights. They couldn’t hit him."

Mike was Ring Magazine's Prospect of the Year in 1985, it's Fighter of the Year in 1986 and 1988; the Boxing Writers Association of America Fighter of the Year in both 1986 and 1988, KO Magazine Fighter of the Year in 1986. Mike was named the 14th greatest heavyweight of all-time by The Ring Magazine in 1998, the72nd greatest boxer of the last 80 years by The Ring Magazine in 2002, the 16th greatest puncher of all-time by Ring Magazine in 2003, the 50th greatest boxer of all-time by ESPN in 2007, and the 9th greatest heavyweight of all-time by a panel of experts in The Ring Magazine in 2017.

A Marciano vs Tyson fight

This fight would depend on which man imposed his style on the other. If Tyson allowed Marciano to get inside, he would beat the hell out of Mike and stop him.

f Tyson managed to move, bob and weave, against the crouching Marciano, and stay at mid-range, his deadly speed volume power punching could, over an accumulation of rounds. wear Rocky down. I don't believe Mike could stop him, but he could certainly cut him to pieces.

There is simply no way that Mike knocks Rocky out in the first round. No one in Rocky's career knocked him out, and only Jersey Joe Walcott and Archie Moore knocked him down at all! If Mike was able to move, and stay out of Rocky's comfort zone, he was capable of wearing him down for a stoppage. Mike was also at a disadvantage in that Rocky, like Joe Frazier, was a rare fighter who never grew tired, and who would be firing away as hard in the 15th round as he was in the first. Mike grew tired, Rocky never did.

And, while everyone knows what a puncher Mike was, he was not the one hitter quitter Rocky was. As the Associated Press' Jack Hand reported after reporting on Rocky’s title defenses, Rocky's right hand "changed night into day."

Nonetheless, in the end, this would be a test of styles and wills. If Rocky imposed his style on the shorter man, he would win. If Mike imposed his style, he would win.

Muhammad Ali: in his Prime the best ever, both Tyson and Maricano said they could not have beaten him, and they are right

Ali was the best he ever was in 1967, when he was 25. He would have gotten better though, had he not been forced out of the ring for four years.

Ali was, back then in his best years, outboxers, who used movement, jabbing, combinations and technique to win their fights.

SAli was 6′3″ with a 78 inch jab, 5 inches taller than Rocky, 6 inches taller than Mike Tyson, with a 10 inch reach advantage over Rocky, and a 7 inch reach advantage over Mike.

Ali was faster, according to Jim Jacobs, who helped manage Tyson, than any fighter in history, with a lightning jab, and a command of distance that no other heavyweight in history could match.

Taking the numbers to his first retirement, Ali had a 79% KO rate.

CREDIT TO BOXREC FOR RECORDS AND STATISTICS

Angelo Dundee's old crack that Ali liked to fight in a room, Mike Tyson in a large closet, and Joe Frazier in a phone booth, could be expanded to say that Rocky Marciano liked to fight in the same phone booth as Joe.

CREDIT FOR INFORMATION COX'S CORNER AND MONTE COX

Ali was more talented physically than any other heavyweight who ever lived

Boxing Historian Monte Cox wrote that "Muhammad Ali was the most naturally gifted heavyweight champion in history."

http://coxscorner.tripod.com/196...

His phenomenal speed in his prime never ceases to amaze people who saw him in person, or even on TV, or who have studied him later on film. The late Jimmy Jacobs, then the owner of the world's largest fight film collection, once measured Ali's jab by an omegascope.

Ali's jab was not only faster than any heavyweight of all time - including Larry Holmes by a wide margin, but Jacobs found that Ali was faster than any middleweight he measured - for instance, Sugar Ray Robinson's jab took 8.5 frames of film. Ali's took only 6.5!

CREDIT COX'S CORNER MONTE COX

Canadian heavyweight George Chuvalo said of Ali's speed, "my plan for the fight was simple: as the shorter guy, I wanted to stay close to Ali, nullify his speed and prevent him from using the whole ring. I also wanted to make it rough. The rougher, the better. But it took all of about 30 seconds for me to realize he was the fastest fighter I'd ever seen. It's one thing to expect it; it's another thing to feel it, live it."

CREDIT TO RING FOR QUOTE BY GEORGE CHUVALO

Fighters who faced both Ali and the great Larry Holmes, such as Ken Norton, in "Going the Distance" and Earnie Shavers, in Welcome to the Big Time, both said on the record that Ali's jab and speed - even though he was by then in his 30's - was superior to Larry's or to anyone else they had faced - and that was when Ali was way past his prime.

A master of both the flicker and paw jabs, Ali also had the fastest jab in history.

Zora Foley, who fought both Ali and Liston, said "Sonny had the hardest jab in history, Ali had the fastest. Both of them were on the money, so pick your poison!"

Angelo Dundee said it best: "in his prime nobody could match Ali's jab, he just cut people up with it."

Frank Lotierzo wrote about great jabbers Ali and Holmes "Their left jab was their best punch. The post exile version of Ali's was faster, if only by a morsel, and he threw more. Holmes jab was harder and straighter. That said Ali's had more variation. He could change it's direction up or down after he released it, something that makes his jab more effective…"

Why Frazier Would Have Beaten Holmes

But it was more than Hand speed that made the 1960's Ali unique.

Dave Christian, in the Modern Martial Artist, describes Ali's footwork, the circle and jab, as perfect for all manner of combat arts as "it allows you to cover a huge amount of distance with minimum effort, and each step is another chance to pivot, accelerate, or change direction."

Christian also said "By traveling quickly in a wide arc, Ali made his opponent lose their balance and timing when they tried to follow him, and he took advantage of the openings this created in their guards…I've found that Ali's footwork works really well for setting up deceptive kicks when sparring, believe it or not."

"You can't hit him," said Cleveland Williams, "you just cannot hit him!" According to CompuBox, Williams landed only 10 punches the entire fight. Does a fighter with no technique, no ability to slip punches do that? of course not! Williams said "I threw hooks, I threw uppercuts, I missed them all! Hell, I couldn't even land a jab!"

Zora Folley, after facing Ali, said "you can't hit him! But he sure can hit you."

Ali's top 100 opponents are:

#1 all time light-heavyweight Archie Moore;

#4 Floyd Patterson

#6 Larry Holmes

#7 Bob Foster ranked as light heavyweight

#10 Joe Frazier

#17 Sonny Liston

#18 George Foreman

#26 Ken Norton

#42 Jerry Quarry

#43 Jimmy Ellis

#51 Henry Cooper

#67 Jimmy Young

#74 Doug Jones

#75 Zora Foley

#82 Joe Buger

#84 Oscar Bonavena

#89 Leon Spinks

#97 George Chuvalo

#95 Ernie Terrell

Ali faced better competition than any other heavyweight in history.

Ali faced 19 of the top 100 all time greats plus five more in the top 150!

Muhammad won 23 of 27 from top 100 fighters, a feat not matched by anyone else in history.

Muhammad won 28 of 32 from top 150 fighters! Deontay Wilder has not beaten ONE top 150 fighter, not one!

Ali beat every one but Larry Holmes, whom he fought ill at 39, at least once, and four of them twice.

Ali was and is the first and only three-time lineal World Heavyweight Champion.

Ali was and remains the first World Heavyweight Champion to come back from retirement and regain the title.

Ali beat 14 world champions, from the years 1962 to 1978, over an incredible 16 year period.

Ali won twenty-two World Heavyweight Championship fights over a 14 year period.

Ali made a total of nineteen successful title defenses of the undisputed title, nine during his first reign and ten during his second reign.

Another record he set which stands today, he has a record of 11-0 in rematches. Ali faced a heavyweight record of 8 Hall of Fame fighters, winning against all but one, and making 11 total fights against Hall of Famers.

Ali was named Ring "Fighter of the Year" for 1963, 1966, 1972, 1974, 1975 and 1978. Ali was named the Boxing Writers Association of America "Fighter of the Year" for 1965, 1974 and 1975. Ali was named Sports Illustrated "Sportsman of the Year" for 1974. Ali was named The Ring "Fighter of the Decade" for the 1970s.

Ali was inducted into the U.S. Olympic Hall of Fame in 1983. He received the Boxing Writers Association of America James J. Walker Memorial Award for 1984. Ali was inducted into the World Boxing Hall of Fame in 1986. He was inducted into the The Ring Boxing Hall of Fame in 1987. Ali was inducted into the International Boxing Hall of Fame in 1990. Ali was named "Athlete of the Century" by GQ magazine in 1998. He was named "Sports Personality of the Century" by the BBC in 1999, and "Sportsman of the 20th Century" by Sports Illustrated.

Ken Norton said it best about the man he fought three closely contested bouts with. In an interview with boxing writer and historian Frank J. Lotierzo on ESPN radio 1490, he said:

Frank: In your book you say Ali is the best ever. Do you believe that?

Norton: "As far as I've been around, yes."

Frank: "Is Ali the best fighter you ever fought?"

Norton: "Yes."

A fight against either Marciano or Tyson

Both men called it themselves. Rocky marvelled at Ali's speed, and Tyson does too. Both men had no reason to lie, and only delusional people claim they would lie to make themselves look bad!

Ali in his 1960's Prime was just too fast for either Iron or Rock to catch him!

And those are the real facts, not ones from never-was-land!

BOXING TREND
What if Rocky Marciano fought in Mike Tyson's era?

Charles Warwick

John McGlothlin Updated Oct 12, 2020

Rocky would have been a competive, top, heavyweight in Tyson's era, could have won the title, and would have had a decent chance to beat even the best version of Mike Tyson.

CREDIT PICTURE BAD LEFT HOOK

Rocky would most certainly have been competitive and more, in Tyson's era. Time has dulled people's memory of who Rocky was, and what made him special.

Cus D'Amato, Mike Tyson's surrogate father and the man who molded him into the youngest world heavyweight champion, was asked once to explain how a small heavyweight like Rocky could be so dominant. He replied:

When men of near equal skill meet- the man with the superior "will to win" -will win every time, unless the man's skill is so far above that of his opponent that his will is not tested…Rocky had that superior will to win."
Pulitzer Prize winner Red Smith said of Rocky:

Rocky couldn't box like [Gene] Tunney, and probably couldn't hit like [Joe] Louis, but in one respect he had no challenger. He was the toughest, strongest, most completely dedicated fighter who ever wore gloves. Fear wasn't in his vocabulary and pain had no meaning."

First, let us disabuse the fanboy notion that Rocky only could have fought at 184, that he would have been a modern light heavy or cruiserweight

First, to all the people who say Rocky would be a light heavyweight or cruiserweight - look, if you propose bringing Rocky to the present, with the advances in training and nutrition, AND with fighting 12 round fights, he would be fighting at his natural 205 plus, not 184. The Rock would have been a small heavyweight, but a heavyweight certainly.

Rocky is generally considered to have been the best conditioned fighter, not just heavyweight, of history. Naturally weighing, in top shape, about 205 pounds, he trained himself down in order to be able to fight full bore for 15 rounds. With the better nutrition and training available today, Rocky would have probably fought around 205 to 210.

In between fights, in the normal course of his life from 1947 to 1955, Rocky was a rock hard 205 pounds. Rocky would run 6–7 miles a day when he was not training for a fight! His uncle, Charlie Piccento, said he even followed his routine and ran on Christmas mornings and every holiday, including his and his children's birthdays. He never missed a day during his 8 year career, not one.

And that was in between fights, not in training camp.

Rocky also did calisthenics and other conditioning exercises in between fights. He would work the heavy bag especially, (in his case, the heavy bag was REALLY heavy!), just to help stay in top shape. His normal weight, with no discernible fat, was 205, and he made sure he never gained a pound over that in between fights.

Further, nutrition and exercise physiology has advanced exponentially in the 64 years since Rocky held the title. Creatine supplements, for instance, designed for strength enhancement, were not commercially available until 1993 when a company called Experimental and Applied Sciences (EAS) introduced the compound to the sports nutrition market.

And weight training - if Rocky had the benefits of the weight equipment, knowledge and training that Holyfield had in the late 1980's when he moved up to heavyweight, the Rocky could have easily gotten up to 215 or so.

Finally, Rocky would only have to train for 12, not 15, rounds. Today Rocky would be a rock hard 205-215 pounds, and still able to fire full bore for 12 rounds.

Make no mistake, Rocky would have been a heavyweight.

Modern fans think a short, stocky man with no reach cannot be a great heavyweight - a man like Mike Tyson

A short stubby guy with no reach, Mike Tyson, becamse a pretty fair heavyweight.

And guess what? Cus D'Amato used many of Rocky's training methods precisely because they made a small heavyweight with no reach like Rocky or Tyson world champion.

According to Confusing the Enemy: The Cus D'Amato Story Cus, familiar with Rocky's routines, thought that using that bag for a limited time would best help Mike develop his potential power. Cus realized that, due to Tyson's size deficits, and his lack of reach, that a style to counter those deficits would have to bring, as Rocky did, incredible power and endurance, saying:

"Charlie Goldman created the roadmap for a short, stocky, heavyweight to become world champion. In a world of Goliaths, David can still rule, if he has enough heart, and works hard enough, like Rocky did, and like I know Mike can."
Cus beleived Mike needed to have incredible punching power in both hands to compensate for lack of size and reach, and, as Rocky had, enough endurance and stamina to use his style for 15 rounds. (this was before the Manicina-Kim tragedy inspired the reduction of championship fights to 12 rounds) So Cus put Mike on a 300-pound bag, unbelievably heavy for a 13-year-old, and told him to develop his natural punching power in both hands.

Mike used the "Rocky Bag" for five years!

Cus knew Marciano trained using this technique and was quick to get Mike on part of the same routine, as he saw Mike with many of the same weaknesses in size and reach that Rocky had to overcome.

You think Holyfield lived in the gym? Rocky made him look like a 98 pound weakling

Rocky ran an average of 45 miles a week, 7 days a week, year round. Rocky spent at least 4 hours a day 6 days a week training when not training for a fight!

Ben Bently, Rocky's press agent, said after signing for a fight he would increase his running in the morning to 9-10 miles. And then the last week before a fight he would increase his running to 12-15 miles in the mornings. EVERY morning.

In camp, he would run in the morning, and fast walk another 10 miles at night.

He also did wind sprints during the day! He liked to run short distances, a couple of hundred yards, up a hill in training as fast as he could, and then run back down facing backwards! And then he repeated over and over until he was exhausted.

He used a speed bag but not like anyone else does or did, he would hit it with hooks and slow power shots to work on his accuracy.

He trained using a custom made 300 pound heavy bag.

He would power clean a giant rock and toss it forward with both hands. (the rock weighed over a hundred pounds)

He did crunches that combined kicking a heavy medicine ball out to the trainer

He believed in calisthenics, and did up to several hours worth in addition to everything else.

Several days a week Rocky went shoulder deep in a swimming pool and threw hundreds of underwater punches for up to an hour.

And then, in the late afternoon, Rocky would spar!

Rocky literally trained every day from before sunup, to after sundown. For three months! So he could do 15 rounds.

Rocky was willing to pay the price to be great

Charlie Goldman told Rocky from his first day with him:

you know you're a short, bald, fat guy. You ain't got a lot of speed. Are you willing to put in the hours, and days, and months, and years, to bring what you do got to the top?"
And Marciano was, and did.

It made him an all time top 5 great heavyweight. And he would have been great in any era.

What made a short guy with no reach a top 5 all time heavyweight, other than a world class trainer and an immense amount of work

Drive, discipline, courage, a ferocious desire to have a better life, and one of the 3 or 4 greatest trainers ever.

It is vital to understand the poverty, and bitterly mean life Rocky came from, to understand the fierce, burning desire that made him the most highly conditioned fighter in all boxing history, according to Bert Sugar, and others.

To begin with, according to legendary trainer Ray Arcel, Rocky was far and away the best conditioned heavyweight of all time, and it isn't even close.

Rocky was a fantastically conditioned, but limited, boxer, with physical limitations - the shortest reach of any heavyweight champion - but with incredible toughness, power, heart and conditioning.

Rocky is the only heavyweight champion to retire undefeated, he knocked out 42 of 49 opponents, for an 88% KO rate, the highest by far among undisputed champions.

At his best, Rocky may have been the best conditioned fighter of history. Not just heavyweights, but the best conditioned fighter, period. Naturally weighing about 205 pounds when in top shape, he trained himself down in order to be able to fight full bore for 15 rounds. With the better nutrition and training available today, Rocky would have probably fought around 200 to 210.

And Rocky was TOUGH. Sonny Liston, who did not respect or like a lot of people, said of Marciano in tribute, after his death,:

"he was a great champion, he was never defeated, and he refused to be defeated."
To Sonny, being tough made you a man, and Sonny made clear, Rocky, to him, was a MAN.

Rocky was also a relentless, highly conditioned, extremely powerful fighter who depended on an iron chin, his conditioning, to keep him firing away as well in the 15th as he was in the first, enormous strength, and a right hand which was as good a punch as boxing has ever seen. Budd Schulberg, award-winning screenwriter and boxing fanatic, correlated Marciano's capability of grinding down an opponent to a: "hydraulic drill attacking a boulder."

Arthur Daley exalted him as a: "perpetual motion punching machine."

Rocky was a fanatic and dedicated trainer. Marciano's boundless reserves of stamina explained his overpoweringly swarming style and his remarkable recuperative powers meant he was seldom troubled.

Dan Cuoco of the International Boxing Research Organisation explained Marciano's success thusly:

"What Rocky Marciano gave up in height and reach he more than made up with one punch knockout power, extraordinary strength and stamina, an insatiable will to win, mental toughness and plenty of guts…Although he missed a lot his savage body attack would wear his opponents down. What he lacked in speed, he more than made up for by the volume of punches he threw. When he was caught with a good punch, his world class chin held up admirably."

Rocky's trainer, the highly respected Charley Goldman, originally just laughed at the challenge facing him. But after a number of years of working with the dedicated Rocky he remarked:

"I got a guy who is short, stoop-shouldered and balding with two left feet, (Rocky's victims) all look better than he does as far as moves are concerned, but they don't look so good (laying) on the canvas."
Rocky at 5'10 1/2" with the shortest reach of any champion, would almost always be undersized in comparisons with other champions, historically. But he is actually a half inch taller than Mike Tyson, though his reach was 3 inches shorter.

Still, heart, toughness, relentless motor, unmatched conditioning, desire, all have to count - Rocky had one style, and one motor. He went after his opponent, as Ali once said:

"he was the toughest, most determined fighter I ever saw. He was tougher than Joe Frazier, and I didn' t think that was possible!"

A modern myth: Bigger is better, and size trumps skill - Tyson's opponents were not better than Marciano's simply because of their size

For big men, bigger is not better when they have no boxing skills.

Bigger does not mean better.

There are writers on here, like good old never was, who know nothing of boxing, and who confuse size with skill.

Boxing writer and historian, Frank Thomas, explains the difference between size and skill:

In the minds of some, size trumps all. Ergo, the Klitschkos [or Joshua] should defeat any other heavyweight who is not of similar stature. This gravely misunderstands the role of size in boxing, as amply demonstrated by yesteryear's Primo Carnera, the Golden Age's own Ernie Terrell, or modern fighters such as Nikolai Valuev and Lance Whitaker. In addition to height, it also misreads what "size" is.
Many modern heavyweights are bigger than their 1980s counterparts. 1980's heavyweights were bigger than those of Rocky's time or the Depression Era. Yet does that mass make them a better fighter? If it was earned by lifting weights, [or PED's] as is all too often the case, then the answer is no.

Bulky muscles look impressive, but they do not help a fighter hit harder. Instead, they slow a fighter down and serve as useless bulk which must be hauled around the ring all night. Anyone who has trained using old school boxing methods is familiar with just how difficult it is to build good boxing muscle through weight lifting."

Because fighters since Rocky's time are bigger, does not mean they are better. A physique like AJ's is useful if he is posing on a stage for Mr. Universe, and not a bit of help in the ring while a fat Mexican is pounding his huge posterior. His size helps him against boxers without the skill to actually box him.

Emmanuel Steward said of the trend toward bigger fighters:

they are nowhere near as skilled as the old fighters. All the good big men are in the NFL or NBA!"

He went on to say that the money is so good in the NBA and NFL, which have medical coverage and a good pension plan to boot, that fighters like Joe Louis, or Foreman and Liston, would today be in other sports.

And finally, how do you measure the size of a person's heart? In that area, Marciano possibly had the largest in the history of boxing. He refused to stay down, and he refused to lose. He might be bloodied and beaten, but he wouldn't be beaten.

Marciano's records stands the tests of time

Marciano was The Ring Fighter of the Year for 1952, 1954, and 1955. He was also in Ring's Fight of the Year three times. The fights were: 1952 Rocky Marciano vs. Jersey Joe Walcott (1st meeting); 1953 Rocky Marciano vs. Roland LaStarza (2nd meeting); 1954 Rocky Marciano vs. Ezzard Charles (2nd meeting).

One last factor: look at Rocky's six title defenses. He is the ONLY heavyweight champion in history to have made every single defense against the highest ranked available contender. Read that again: Rocky is the ONLY heavyweight champion in history to have made every single defense against the highest ranked contender.

One fanboy insists that Nino Valdes was #1 conteder and forgets to mention that Valdes lost his #1 contender status and his title shot by fighting #2 contender Archie Moore in a title elimination bout.

Of his six title defenses, 5 of them were against the #1 contender, and the sixth was against the #2 contender who had just beaten the #1 contender (Nino Valdes) in a title elimination bout.

No other champion in history made every single defense against the top available contender. Rocky may not have faced the best in history, but he faced the best available every single time out, and no other champion has ever done that.

People always talk about how old Rocky's opponents were - they were younger than Fury, Joshua, and Wilders top competition

Rocky's oldest opponent was younger than Klitschko was when he faced Joshua and Fury. Povetkin was older than every foe of Rocky's when he faced Joshua. So of the five all time top 100 opponents Fury, Wilder and Joshua faced, 3 of them were older than anyone Rocky faced!

The same fanboys who cry about Joshua and Fury beating Wlad Klitschko and Povetkin forget to mention that Wlad was 41 when he fought Joshua, 39 when he fought Fury, and Povetkin was 38, older than any of Rocky's foes!

Only Fury and Wilder themselves were not old men, older than anyone Rocky faced, of the few top fighters they faced!

Rocky beat more top 100 competition than the three modern stooges, Fury, Wilder, and Joshua combined - and his competition was younger than theirs!

Let us take a real look at Mike and Rocky's competition:

Anthony Mason, boxing writer, said:

I think the only way to fairly rank a boxer's place in history is by comparing their résumés. And that does not mean just wins and losses - it is too easy today to fight only has beens or never will be's, and run up the record."

Rocky fought 8 top 100 all time greats:

#1 Ezzard Charles (ranked as light heavyweight, but was heavyweight champion - and contrary to one answer, Ezzard Charles never fought as a heavyweight lighter than 182 pounds)

#1 Joe Louis (Joe was 37 but had won 8 in a row in his comeback, including over the #2 contender, who is ranked #10 of all time heavyweights)

#2 Archie Moore (ranked as light heavyweight, but fought for heavyweight title)

#11 Harry Matthews (ranked as an all time great light heavyweight, but fought half his career at heavy)

#33 Jersey Joe Walcott

#76 Don Cockell

#81 Lee Savold

#85 Rex Layne

Rocky fought 8 top 100 fighters 10 times, 4 of them in the Hall of Fame, and he won every fight, he was 8 for 8, 100%.

Further, Rocky was the first heavyweight champion to take the color barrier and heave it out the window. He told his family he would have no part of bypassing a deserving Black fighter. "I'm gonna fight whoever deserves it, no matter what color he is," he told his brother.

Rocky fought the best competition available.

Yes, Jersey Joe was older, but he remained a great fighter. He had won 8 of his last ten fights, losing only two to Ezzard Charles, and one to Rex Layne, who was ranked #6 at the time, and who is ranked historically in the top 100 of all time.

Everyone completely downplays Rocky knocking out a 37 year old Joe Louis. Joe was not what he had been, but after he lost to Ezzard Charles in his first fight back, he had won eight consecutive victories in less than a year's time, including a sixth-round knockout of #2 contender Lee Savold, also ranked historically in the top 100 of all time, and a ten-round decision over future Hall-of-Famer Jimmy Bivens - and Bivens, ranked #10 of all time among heavyweights, was in his prime years!

Let us look at who Mike Tyson fought:

#5 Lennox Lewis

#7 Mike Spinks (ranked as light heavyweight but he was heavyweight champion too)

#11 Evander Holyfield

#15 Larry Holmes

#64 Buster Douglas

#70 Frank Bruno

#98 Tony Tucker

Mike was 4 of 7, 57% against top 100 competition.

Mike fought 7 ranked in the top 100 of all time in 8 fights, beating 4 of the 7 top 100 fighters he faced. He faced 4 Hall of Fame fighters, only beating 2, one was 38, had been retired 2 years, and was only given 6 weeks to lose 40 pounds to fight Tyson, and the other is ranked in the Hall as a light heavyweight. More importantly, he never beat a Hall of Fame heavyweight in his prime.

Could Rocky have beaten Mike's competition?

All but Lennox Lewis, yes. Lennox was simply too huge, and the wrong style for Rocky. (Though if Rocky succeeded in getting inside on the Lion, Lennox's chin would definitely have been vulnerable to Rocky's power!)

Holyfield? Evander beat Mike by going inside and beating him up. That NEVER would have worked on Rocky, who relished an inside war like Andy Ruiz relishes an all you can eat buffet.

Spinks? Rocky would have roared inside on the almost 33 year old Spinks, and stopped him.

Holmes was too old.

Other than Lewis, who did Mike fight than Rocky could not have beaten?

Buster Douglas would have been a real challenge at his best, but Buster was so rarely at his best, and Rocky with his bend-over-hit-you-anywhere-my-fists-land style would have been a far rougher challenge for the big man.

Two fighters Mike did not fight, George Foreman and Riddick Bowe, would likely have been too much for Rocky - but unlike Tyson, Rocky would have tried.

The great Joe Louis summed up Marciano the best:

“The Rock don’t know too much about the boxing book, but it wasn’t a book he hit me with, it was a whole library of bone crushers. It may not look pretty,” said Joe, “but Lord it hurts!”
Joe would say later:

“Rocky, he ain’t pretty, but he could get it done against anybody!”

Could Rocky have beaten Mike himself?

Such a fight would depend on which man imposed his style on the other. If Tyson allowed Marciano to get inside, he would beat the hell out of Mike and stop him.

I have written another answer on this, and for a detailed analysis of such a fight will refer anyone curious about that to it:

John McGlothlin's answer to Who'd win between prime Mike Tyson and prime Rocky Marciano?

If Tyson managed to move, bob and weave, against the crouching Marciano, and stay at mid-range, his deadly speed volume power punching could, over an accumulation of rounds. wear Rocky down. I don't believe Mike could stop him, but he could certainly cut him to pieces.

There is simply no way that Mike knocks Rocky out in the first round. No one in Rocky's career knocked him out, and only Jersey Joe Walcott and Archie Moore knocked him down at all! If Mike was able to move, and stay out of Rocky's comfort zone, he was capable of wearing him down for a stoppage. Mike was also at a disadvantage in that Rocky, like Joe Frazier, was a rare fighter who never grew tired, and who would be firing away as hard in the 12th round as he was in the first. Mike grew tired, Rocky never did.

If Mike did not stop Rocky early - and I don’t believe he could have - then the longer the fight went on, the more it favored Marciano…

Rocky in Tyson's era would have competed, and been a champion. Assuming you put him in when Tyson began his career, Rocky could have been champion and certainly competitive with Mike until Lennox Lewis or Riddick Bowe hit their primes

CREDIT TO:

Boxrec for height, reach, records, statistics

Bad Intentions : The Mike Tyson Story by Peter Heller

Confusing the Enemy: The Cus D'Amato Story by Dr. Scott Walker

Rocky Marciano by Everett M. Skehan

Rocky Marciano: Biography of a first son by Everett M. Skehan

The Greatest: My Own Story by Muhammad Ali

The Rise of Mike Tyson, Heavyweight by William F. McNeil

Unbeaten: Rocky Marciano's Fight for Perfection in a Crooked World by Mike Stanton

Undefeated: Rocky Marciano - The Fighter Who Refused to Lose By Everett Skehan

Related Links

Who would win in a fight between Rocky Marciano and Muhammad Ali? Why?

Was Muhammad Ali really knocked down and out by Rocky Marciano in their 1969 computer fight? If not, why the hell would he fake something like this?

Since boxing is about match ups, can it be argued that Mike Tyson would defeat Rocky Marciano, Mohammed Ali would defeat Mike Tyson, and that Rocky Marciano would defeat Mohammed Ali?

What would happen if there was a boxing match between Anthony Joshua and Rocky Marciano?

What was Rocky Marciano's boxing style?

Who would be considered the greatest boxer of all time, Chuck Wepner, Rocky Marciano, Mike Tyson or Muhammad Ali?

What are some of the famous punches in boxing like Marciano's Susie Q?

Do you think Rocky Marciano would do well in today's boxing if he were alive today, since he used to take so much damage en route to victory?

Tournament. Boxers at their prime. Last 16 scheme. Ali vs W. Klitschko. Fury vs Holmes. Marciano vs Tyson. Bowe vs Foreman. Liston vs V. Klitschko. Marciano vs Frazier. Louis vs Holyfield. Lewis vs Wilder. What would be results?

Who would have won a hypothetical boxing match between Rocky Marciano and ..?

What animal feeds on Komodo dragons?

Jerome Cohen Animal friend for more than ½century. Translator May 21

Samuel Perloff Nearly 20 years experience This answer may not be a faithful translation of the answer of Samuel Perloff

No animals eat adult Komodo dragons. Humans can kill them but are very unlikely to eat them unless desperate. Eggs and young are vulnerable mainly to wild dogs and perhaps especially to larger Komodo dragons, which are likely many opportunistic cannibalistic predators.

The following predators are theoretical. As for wild pigs, which are often a source of prey for large dragons, I wouldn't be surprised if they occasionally raid any nest they come across. I wouldn't be surprised if large birds of prey like Flores' eagles and Bonelli's eagles take hold of a small, young dragon.

Quels sont les faits intéressants sur les dragons de Komodo ?

– Après un temps où nous pensions que le plus grand lézard du monde avait des bactéries toxiques dans sa salive pour tuer sa proie, il a été établi qu’il possède un véritable venin plutôt que des bactéries nocives, tout comme les serpents venimeux. En effet, ce venin peut rapidement faire baisser la tension artérielle, augmenter la perte de sang, provoquer l'hypothermie, et rendre la victime trop faible pour s'échapper ou riposter.

Par conséquent, aucun animal, aussi grand ou dangereux qu'il soit, n'est à l'abri du puissant venin du dragon de Komodo.

– En plus de leur puissant venin, les dragons de Komodo (appelés aussi varans de Komodo) ont 60 dents acérées dans leurs mâchoires, chacune mesurant environ 2,54 cm de long. Ces dents sont idéales pour lancer une attaque et infliger une morsure désagréable. Cependant, la force de morsure du dragon de Komodo est plutôt faible comparée à celle d'autres prédateurs (environ 120 kg par centimètre carré, comparé à un crocodile d'eau de mer pouvant délivrer une morsure mortelle d'environ 1 113 kg par centimètre carré). Lorsque l'animal part en chasse, sa force de morsure est compensée par le venin.

– Comme je l’ai dit précédemment, le dragon de Komodo est le plus gros lézard du monde, car certains mâles adultes peuvent atteindre 3 mètres de long et peser entre 70 et 91 kg.

Et pourtant, lors de la chasse, le dragon de Komodo est complètement silencieux. Effectivement, il rampe furtivement vers sa proie, sans émettre un seul son ; ainsi, la victime n’a aucune idée qu’elle est traquée. Lorsqu’il est suffisamment proche, au moment propice, le dragon de Komodo attaque l’animal ciblé avec une combinaison de dommages par lacération et de perte de sang.

Une fois la mort advenue, le reptile déchire de gros morceaux de chair et les avale en entier, grâce à ses mâchoires mal articulées, un crâne flexible et un estomac extensible. Par conséquent, rien n'est laissé pour compte, tout est avalé : cornes, sabots, os, crânes, etc…

– Comme les serpents et la plupart des lézards, les dragons de Komodo ont un sens de l’odorat qui se déploie à travers leur longue langue fourchue. Cette langue recueille des particules dans l’air et transmet des informations vitales au cerveau par l’intermédiaire de deux fosses situées au sommet de la bouche, où un organe spécialisé appelé « organe de Jacobson » analyse les molécules en suspension dans l’air, exactement comme les serpents.

En outre, le sens aigu de l’odorat du dragon de Komodo lui permet de détecter des proies disponibles ou des carcasses en décomposition sur plus de 9 kilomètres. En fait, un varan individuel aurait été conduit dans une maison humaine par l’odeur des chaussettes sales portées par un garde forestier, la prenant pour une charogne !

– Le dragon de Komodo tire son nom d'une vieille rumeur disant que des créatures ressemblant à des dragons terrorisaient l'île indonésienne de Komodo, jusqu'à la découverte de l'espèce en 1910. Les habitants l'appellent même « ora », un terme qui signifie « crocodile terrestre », même si le dragon du Komodo est en fait un varan (un type de grand lézard), loin d'être apparenté aux crocodiles.

– En tant que prédateurs opportunistes, les dragons de Komodo peuvent se nourrir d'une grande variété de proies, y compris les cerfs, les singes, les buffles, les oiseaux, les cochons, les chèvres, les insectes et même les humains – s’ils en ont l’occasion, ils peuvent tuer et manger les leurs, en particulier les petits qui viennent d’éclore.

Lorsque les proies vivantes sont difficiles à attraper, les énormes lézards recourent à la nécrophagie, au cours de laquelle ils se gorgent de charogne pourrie, sans subir aucun préjudice. Et c’est ce qui leur donne la réputation de « pilleurs de tombes », car ils peuvent s’aventurer dans des cimetières humains et déterrer les morts afin de s’en régaler.

– Les dragons de Komodo ont un appétit qui correspond à leur taille, car ils peuvent manger jusqu'à 80% de leur propre poids.

– Les dragons de Komodo sont généralement solitaires et férocement territoriaux ; ils ne rencontrent donc jamais leurs congénères, sauf pendant la période des amours, bien que rien n'empêche un groupe entier de dragons de Komodo (généralement une douzaine d'individus) de se rassembler autour d'une carcasse en décomposition ou une proie tuée.

– Lorsque deux mâles rivaux se rencontrent, ils se dressent sur leurs pattes arrière et se combattent violemment, en se servant de leurs longues griffes et de leur longues queues pour se fouetter. Cependant, le combat peut nous sembler comme si les mâles dansaient ou s'embrassaient ! Les combats ne durent généralement pas très longtemps et n'ont pas de résultat épouvantable.

– Les bébés dragons de Komodo ne sont pas plus gros qu'une main humaine, et leur petite taille les rend facilement vulnérables à la prédation, en particulier de leur propre espèce. Pour cette raison, ils passent généralement leurs premières années dans les arbres et y restent jusqu'à ce qu'ils soient grands et suffisamment audacieux.

– Les dragons de Komodo habitent les îles volcaniques indonésiennes de Komodo, Rinca, Flores et Gili Motang, et ils sont les seuls grands prédateurs de ces îles, sans aucun tigre, crocodile ou grand serpent pour les affronter. C'est pour cette raison que les lézards sont devenus les ultimes superprédateurs régnant sur les écosystèmes de ces îles (des forêts aux prairies), inégalés et inarrêtables.

– Contrairement aux autres superprédateurs, les dragons de Komodo sont en réalité diurnes, ce qui signifie qu'ils ne sont actifs que pendant la journée, alors qu'ils ont tendance à s'endormir la nuit.

– Les dragons de Komodo sont des coureurs rapides qui peuvent atteindre des vitesses allant de 19 à 20 km/h. Cependant, comme d'autres grands reptiles, ils peuvent facilement être dépassés par d'autres animaux (y compris les humains), principalement en raison de leur état de sang-froid qui les rend si peu endurants et donc dépendants de la furtivité. Mais ce n'est toujours pas assez pour essayer de s'échapper à un varan attaquant, car la victime doit fuir autant que possible tout en empêchant l'animal de s'approcher suffisamment afin de tuer – sinon, cette personne sera envenimée et sa mort sera garantie.

– Bien que les attaques de dragons de Komodo sur des êtres humains soient rares, de nombreuses victimes ont néanmoins été enregistrées, entraînant souvent la mort, en particulier des enfants. Malheureusement, de plus en plus d'attaques sont courantes en raison d'un important empiétement humain sur le territoire des varans.

– Comme tous les autres superprédateurs, les dragons de Komodo sont vulnérables à l'extinction, principalement en raison de la perte d'habitat et du déclin de leurs proies. Aujourd'hui, leur population est d'environ 6000 individus, et pourtant ils décroissent rapidement. C'est pourquoi il est plus essentiel que jamais de leur fournir une protection malgré notre peur d'eux.

Voilà donc les faits les plus étonnants sur les dragons de Komodo auxquels je pense jusqu’à présent. Si vous croyez qu’il y en a plus, n’hésitez pas à me le faire savoir dans les commentaires. Merci d’avoir lu et passez une bonne journée! !

A quelle vitesse grandissent les dragons de Komodo ?/ How fast do Komodo dragons grow?

Aurélien Breton MaraîcherTraducteur · Traduit le 14 mai

Christian Bantolo Cabansag Published author chez Nat Geo Wild (2018–aujourd'hui)

Les dragons de Komodo mettent environ 8 à 9 ans pour atteindre leur stade adulte, et peuvent vivre jusqu'à 30 ans.

À l'éclosion, les bébés dragons de Komodo mesurent environ 30 centimètres ! Il faut 5 à 7 ans pour que ces créatures atteignent leur taille définitive.

Questions similaires

Comment les reptiles ont-ils évolué en mammifères, est-il possible qu'un reptile qui pond des oeufs se transforme en mammifère qui donne naissance à des petits ? Quels animaux se trouvaient dans la phase intermédiaire de cette transformation ? Comment se reproduisaient-ils ?

Les dragons de Komodo paralysent-ils leurs proies ?
A quoi ressemblent les bébés dragons de Komodo ?
Que font les dragons de Komodo pour le monde ?

Est-ce que les écailles des reptiles grandissent ou bien deviennent-elles plus nombreuses au fur et à mesure de la croissance des animaux ?

Qu'y a-t-il d'intéressant dans les dragons de Komodo ?
Que mangent les dragons de Komodo ?

Pourquoi les reptiles n'ont-ils pas la capacité de voler ? Pourquoi il n'existe même pas un petit dragon ?

Comment survivre à une morsure venimeuse de dragon de Komodo si je suis seul dans la nature ?

Combien de fois la queue d'un lézard peut-elle repousser ?

Animals In The Wild: Are there predators with hooves?

Jerome Cohen A lifelong friend of animals of all species. Translator 2 years_

Serge Elia animal lover

To answer this question, science has revealed that one of many animals that meet this criteria is extinct. Dear readers, allow me to introduce the Entelodont, a frightening-looking prehistoric monster, also known as "the Terminator pig".

Entelodonts were gigantic pig-like omnivores (weighing around 500-900 kg) that roamed the forests and plains of North America and Eurasia around 45 million years ago. Despite their nicknames, these animals weren't really pigs; rather, they were related to hippos and whales. They are said to have cloven hooves - like modern ungulates - and a heavy head supported by a vertebral hump, as well as complete teeth, including large canines, heavy incisors, pointed premolars and flat molars, which suggests an omnivorous diet that allowed Entelodonts to feed on plants and other animals.

Armed with this material, the Entelodont was a much feared killer, a daring thief who did not hesitate to steal from neighboring carnivores - he used his monstrous size and unparalleled power to intimidate other predators (some being well smaller than this huge behemoth) and fend them off - as well as a mighty hunter who used his superior strength and nightmarish jaws to crush the skull of his unfortunate victim. Any animal could be on the menu, no matter how large or simply insignificant, such as primitive horses and camels.

The perfect example of a hoofed predator, although not exactly the only one, as there were many other hoofed carnivores in prehistory. For more information read here: Gary Meaney's answer to Why aren't there any hoofed carnivorous animals? Gary Meaney's answer to Why aren't there any hoofed carnivorous animals?

Over the years, when climatic conditions began to change, the Entelodont evolved to become even larger than it was initially. But that only led to its downfall, especially when it couldn't adapt to hunting new, faster prey - including some that developed longer legs to reach breakneck speeds of up to 80 km/h or more! and it was overtaken by new carnivores that had more sophisticated weaponry and were much more adaptable, including the fearsome Amphicyonid, aka "dog-bear" (see below).

In this context, the Entelodonts finally followed the path of complete extinction 19 million years ago. Soon after, in the millions of decades that followed, there were no more hoofed carnivores.

It's not always obvious why you don't find hoofed carnivores these days, although there is a plausible theory, hinted at by another Quoran Sorin Bota : to catch prey (including the large game like zebras and antelopes), a carnivore needs speed and agility, aided by sharp claws and legs and walking on toes or fingers - hence the classification of some carnivores as "digitigrades" -; while hooves are more useful for running like hell, and they're not really good for performing hunting maneuvers.

Related: What are the predators of the aardvark?

Lions, leopards and pythons (and to be precise, the African royal python) are among the natural predators of the aardvark. Indeed, these three carnivores are not only powerful and equipped with deadly weapons to subdue their victims and eventually kill them, but they are also opportunistic predators - a characteristic that allows them to attack any animal that has the misfortune of crossing them, whether big, small or even insignificant; so much so that the aardvark would be considered a snack you crave!

By the way, I strongly doubt that the cheetah can be counted among the main predators of the aardvark. I'm not saying that they are incapable of killing medium-sized, and therefore easy, prey (aardvarks weigh around 50 kg, while cheetahs can reach 68 kg or more) - it's just that it doesn't there are no recorded cases of cheetahs killing and eating an aardvark; and moreover, I think that spotted cats are rather selective eaters who prefer to exclusively hunt ungulates (gazelles, wildebeests, and occasionally zebras) and small prey like hares, without giving their attention to other animals like aardvarks (I could be wrong, so feel free to comment).

Other predators of the aardvark include hyenas (whether of the spotted, brown, or striped subspecies), as they are also opportunistic feeders, and they never refuse a free meal, even if the targeted prey are much smaller than them. Moreover, they have at their disposal wicked bone-crushing jaws - I mean the most powerful jaws among the carnivorous mammals of Africa, capable of tearing an unfortunate victim to shreds, down to the bone.

So it's easy to see why aardvarks, like all other animals, fear hyenas and run to the nearest den (often at lightning speed) when chased by one. - the video above (must see) proves it.

Let's not forget the Nile crocodiles - the biggest, strongest and most fearsome of all African reptiles, which gladly feast on anything that dares to venture into their waters, including an unfortunate aardvark - and the human beings, the ultimate threat to the survival of the aardvark.

Indeed, human activities - deforestation, the expansion of agriculture, the use of pesticides that decimate termites (the aardvark's main food), the bushmeat trade, the relentless hunting of parts of the body of the animal to make amulets, climate change, etc... - have strongly contributed to the decline of aardvark populations, even if these insectivores are not considered as threatened as other species (many conservationists suspect that this claim is unverified, particularly due to the lack of field studies to determine the status of the species).

At a time when we are losing biodiversity at an alarming rate, and on Earth Day (a special day to raise awareness about protecting the only home we have), if we don't If we don't act now to protect aardvarks from irresponsible human behavior, these unique creatures could inevitably follow the path of complete extinction.

Similar questions

Why are some predators afraid of honey badgers?

What are the serval's predators?

Are there hoofed predators? Why don't predators normally have hooves?

Which animals are both predator and prey to each other?

What were the predators of pterodactyls?

What are the natural predators of wild boars?

Why are there no predatory mammals with horns?

Sami Mudakkir

T.Barczuk Studied at Gdansk University of Technology Translator 1 year_

The golden jackal is the only predatory mammal with a horn.

It lives in Southeast Europe, Southwest Asia, South Asia and Southeast Asia. Even though its name contains the word "jackal", it is not really related to African jackals. It is rather related to wolves and coyotes. It likes to live in valleys, near rivers and seashores. Surprisingly, for an animal related to wolves and coyotes, it sometimes eats fruits and insects, in addition to its more obvious meat diet. A third of them live solitary and the rest in groups of two or three individuals, or even more.

They don't all have this horn. Only occasionally do they have a bony growth on the back of their head. As it is rare, humans associate it with something magical. Unfortunately for jackals, this horn is sought after in Sri Lanka to make magical wish-granting amulets. The wizards of Nepal claim that it helps to win at games of chance. In Bengal, a horn placed in a safe is believed to increase the amount of money inside.

Horns are not retained by the evolutionary process of predatory mammals because they do not give them any real advantages. If a predatory mammal tried to kill prey using a horn, it would get stuck on the predator's head. It would need limbs flexible enough to pull out prey, but if those limbs were so mobile, why not just evolve something sharp on those limbs, like claws?

An amulet made from the horn of a golden jackal.
Image source: Wikipedia.

Similar questions

Why are some predators afraid of honey badgers?

What are the serval's predators?

Are there hoofed predators? Why don't predators normally have hooves?

Which animals are both predator and prey to each other?

What were the predators of pterodactyls?

What are the natural predators of wild boars?

Are Nilo-Saharans like the Dinka and Masai closely related to West Africans and the Bantu tribe? Or are they more closely related with East Africans genetically?

Ygor Coelho Avid reader on history of peoples and population genetics. Updated 1y

Nilo-Saharan is a linguistic group, not necessarily a homogeneous genetic cluster of related populations. Nilo-Saharan speakers in or near West Africa (see map below) seem to include a lot of former speakers of other language families, like Chadic (one of the basal branches of Afro-Asiatic), but also including others conquered or assimilated throughout the time. Those people would certainly have had a lot more West African ancestry than the initial Nilo-Saharan speakers, who probably started spreading from somewhere in modern day western Sudan or South Sudan. These people were most probably of almost entirely indigenous East African origin, which on its own separates them from West Africans by dozens of thousands of years.

In East Africa, there are also relevant signals of admixture between several distinct populations in some Nilo-Saharan populations, including with West Eurasian-admixed peoples that must have been mainly speakers of Afro-Asiatic languages, like Cushitic, Egyptian, Chadic, Berber and, much later, Semitic.

Dinkas and Massai do have some “Cushitic-like” admixture, which is not surprising considering the location of Nilo-Saharan speakers right next to the dominions of Afro-Asiatic peoples in East Africa and North-Central Africa. Conversely, all those other East African peoples, as Afro-Asiatic herders expanded southward from North Africa, absorbed a lot of indigenous East African ancestry from peoples who were either Nilo-Saharan or more remotely related to them.

Those reciprocal gene flows brought them closer, and that is probably the reason some Nilo-Saharan ethnicities have very significant E1b1b and J (J1 + J2) clades mainly associated with Afro-Asiatic speakers in their Y-

DNA philogeny (e.g. the Nubians from Southern Egypt); while some neighboring Afro-Asiatic ethnicities have substantial frequencies of haplogroups A and B, very basal Paleo-African haplogroups that are typically found in highest frequency, among peoples from modern East Africa, in the Nilo-Saharan ethnicities.

There are also Nilo-Saharan people who have admixed a lot with Bantu speakers, who are of mostly West African extraction, so among them you will find a lot of E1b1a, the most typical West African Y-DNA haplogroup (e.g. Luo), possibly helped by local founder effects and social selection of a few lineages over others along the centuries.

As you can see, no single answer can be given, because Nilo-Saharan being a language family there is no way you can make a generic statement about all those who speak one of the languages from that family, because language identity and genetic ancestry, though often correlated, do not depend entirely or even necessarily on each other.

CHECK BELOW: ~60 populations, out of a dataset of 300+ modern populations, that appear to be genetically closest to the Dinka and the Masai. Notice that the Dinka and Masai are also quite distant genetically one from another (0.1493 is a significant degree of genetic distance), a fact that reveals the genetic diversity that exists between the populations that linguistically belong to the same broad Nilo-Saharan family.

Related Links

There is a new DNA study attached below that shows modern West Africans and sub-Saharan Bantu speakers are not native to the region and that they only arrived there around 500 BC. So where did they come from?

How were the Nilotic and Cushitic people more advance than the Bantu people before the Great Bantu migration?

Are there Bantus in West Africa?

What are the differences between Bantu, Nilotic, Yoruba, Igbo, Hausa, Pygmy, Bushmen, Hottentot, Oromo, Lamba, and Cushitic people?

We Bantus are indigenous to Central, Southern and Eastern Africa. Nigeria is in West Africa. Only semi-Bantus live there and they are not Bantu people like us. Why?

What is the difference between West Africans and Bantu people?

Are West Africans considered Bantu?

What are the average phenotypical differences between "The True Negro", "Forest Negro", "Bantu Negro", "Nilote", and "Negrillo"?

Did the Bantu mainly kill of the existing populations during their expansion?

Are Cushites older than Bantus?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: Bald Eagle Size

Posted by Jo Mburu May 24

Bald eagle size vs grey coyote, caught on trail cam.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: KENYA-A proud young king!

Kathy Pennell

Author 12 Young Adult books and 1 Adult Mystery, Ret Teacher Sep 15

At some point he lost an eye but that didn't stop him from becoming a dominant pride male. He is Engogu, one of five Enkoyonai young males who settled in the Mara North Conservancy and successfully took over the Offbeat pride from Olerai and Olekiti. With all the competition it seems that Olekiti paid the ultimate price. Without any sightings of him for months it's pretty save to say that Olekiti is not alive anymore.
The Enkoyonai males on the other hand are thriving and have sired their first litters of cubs with the Offbeat pride. Despite the fact that they're still young themselves - the dominant male Lenkoe is now 5,5 years old, the remaining four brothers will only turn 5 years in December - there was nothing less expected from them. After all they're the sons of the legendary veterans Lolparpit and Olbarnoti. Two absolute boss cats during their lifetime!

September 2022

Maasai Mara

Photo credits: Kunal D Shah

WAR-Wildlife at Risk

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD KENYA-A proud young king!

Kathy Pennell

Author 12 Young Adult books and 1 Adult Mystery, Ret Teacher

Posted by Kathy Pennell Sep 15

At some point he lost an eye but that didn’t stop him from becoming a dominant pride male. He is Engogu, one of five Enkoyonai young males who settled in the Mara North Conservancy and successfully took over the Offbeat pride from Olerai and Olekiti. With all the competition it seems that Olekiti paid the ultimate price. Without any sightings of him for months it’s pretty save to say that Olekiti is not alive anymore.

The Enkoyonai males on the other hand are thriving and have sired their first litters of cubs with the Offbeat pride. Despite the fact that they’re still young themselves - the dominant male Lenkoe is now 5,5 years old, the remaining four brothers will only turn 5 years in December - there was nothing less expected from them. After all they’re the sons of the legendary veterans Lolparpit and Olbarnoti. Two absolute boss cats during their lifetime!

September 2022

Maasai Mara

Photo credits: Kunal D Shah

WAR-Wildlife at Risk

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: Act of kindness!

Posted by Kathy Pennell Oct 2

Samburu women give and share the little they have with Grevy's Zebras. The looming droughts in the North are wanting.
Story: Joseph ole Kodonyo.

WAR-Wildlife at Risk

Do non-human animals make choices about their lives and actions?

Zuberi Sebu Primary School Teacher (2007–present) Sat

Animals have to make choices to find food,water, mates and habitat,in order to survive. Wildebeest and zebras crossing the river to better feeding and breeding areas.The crodiles ambush them at the river for their own survival.

Related Links

Which animals regard humans as their prey?

Do any animals besides humans have morals?

What non-human animals have friendships?

What is the difference between humans and other animals?

Which is the most random animal that can kill you?

What is one of the things that humans do that animals don't?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: The Nilgai.

Upvoted by Alioune Ngom

Posted by Jo Mburu

Nilgai is the largest antelope that is native to Asia. It can be found all the way from the Himalayas in the North, to the state of Karnataka in the South. It usually has 4 to 5 feet in height, 6 to 6.6 feet in length, weighing up to 530 pounds. Only males have horns. Nilgai lives 12 to 13 years in the wild. They are not endangered.

Photo by Mathew Joseph.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Posted by Jo Mburu Sep 25

Male Cheetahs are sociable and form groups called coalitions, which hunt together and defend their territory. In most cases, a coalition will comprise of brothers born in the same litter who stayed together after becoming independent.These coalitions are capable of taking down larger prey than a single cheetah could, such as adult wildebeest.

Habitats that are favored by cheetahs include grasslands and deserts. Cheetahs are terrestrial, but have been known to climb trees on occasion. (Caro, 1994; Ortolani, et al., 1996)). The specimens differed from other cheetahs having longer and softer fur and deviations from the typical spotted pattern. King cheetahs had dark bars in addition to spots on the typical yellow pelage. Fourteen skins were recorded from the wild in Zimbabwe and Burkina Faso. It is now accepted that these individuals are an atypical phenotype of cheetahs (Acinonyx jubatus) with a slight melanistic trend. Individuals with king cheetah markings have been bred from captive cheetahs with otherwise typical litters. Little information is available for other phenotypic variations. Albanism and melanism have been well documented in other species of cat, including the tiger, the African lion, the leopard, and the jaguar. (Caro, 1994; Cuvier, et al., 1978; Eaton, 1982; Kitchener, 1991; Krausman and Morales, 2005; Lydekker, 1895; Nowak, 1999)

https://animaldiversity.org/accounts/Acinonyx_jubatus/

How big is an anaconda and how dangerous is it?

Donna Fernstrom

Professional ball python breeder from 2007 to 2014. Updated 4y

There are four species of anacondas. Anacondas are a type of boa. The largest anaconda species, and the only one considered to actually be dangerous, is the green anaconda. (The others are around half its size - still risky to handle alone, but never documented to have killed anyone).

The green anaconda is the heaviest snake on Earth, and the second longest snake. However, most of the truly large green anacondas have been wiped out by humans. The last intensive study of green anacondas involved measuring more than 1000 wild snakes, and the longest was a mere 17 feet. Eleven feet shorter than the record.

Green anacondas have killed humans in the wild - they are ambush predators, and stepping too close to a hidden snake may result in an attack. They cannot, however, swallow a human. Their gape isn't wide enough to get around human shoulders. Attacks on humans are very, very rare, as humans simply aren't natural prey for this animal. (Green anacondas prefer fish and capybaras).

As you can see in this video (which has some exaggerated facts), green anacondas are not usually a huge threat to humans.

If you aren't engaging in the suicidally reckless behavior of wading in or walking right next to the Amazon river and its tributaries in wilderness areas, you don't really have anything to fear from green anacondas. (And if you do engage in that behavior, you're much more likely to be taken out by a caiman first, and never even see an anaconda. In fact, you might also be taken out by a giant stingray or pulled in by an enormous catfish, or attacked by piranha - all at least as likely or more so than being attacked by an anaconda).

In captivity, owners must take the same precautions as they would with other large constrictor snakes - keeping them in a secure enclosure, and opening the enclosure only when there is another knowledgeable person present to help in case of an emergency. Yes, you can generally save a person from a constrictor if you know what you are doing. Captive snakes aren't usually interested in eating their owner - most mishaps occur when the owner has been handling the snake's food, and they forget to wash their hands afterward. The snakes have poor vision, but a great sense of smell - the entire thing is an accident.

As a result, only about 1 person every other year is killed by a captive reptile (including constrictors, crocodiles, and venomous snakes) - almost always as a result of not following one of the safety rules, and interacting with the animal while alone. Keeping any very large animal has its risks - horses kill around 20 people per year, and bulls kill around 3. Ignore safety around huge, powerful animals at your own peril.

Green anaconda temperament is typically standoffish, if not downright irritable. There are some very tame individuals, but in general, the species isn't known for its willingness to be handled. A defensive bite from a 20 foot green anaconda is going to hurt, and probably require stitches… and may result in nerve damage. As a result, it's not a very popular pet snake. The reticulated python (the world's longest snake) has a much better reputation, despite being at least as, if not more, dangerous - many retics are kept as pets, and they're selectively bred for a variety of unusual colors and patterns. The retic is considered to be a smarter and more tameable animal.

Related Links

Can an anaconda eat a person? Are there any legitimate documented cases of an anaconda eating a person?

Is the anaconda really as dangerous as shown in the movies of the same name?

Do anacondas really exist? If so, what is the proof for it?

Can humans beat an anaconda?

What animal could possibly prove a match for a giant anaconda, not counting another giant anaconda?

Has an anaconda ever killed a human being?

Do lions eat any animals larger than themselves?

Zuberi Sebu Primary School Teacher (2007–present) Wed

Lions can kill and eat buffalos, giraffes and even elephants when they get the opportunity.They, nevertheless,attack the weaker ones or baby animals.

Related Links

Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?

Do lions and tigers get depressed being in zoos? What are the signs of a depressed big cat? Is there a chance that big cats actually prefer being in Zoos because they no longer have to hunt for food?

How do lions decide what's prey and what's not? Sometimes they're kind to other animals and people/humans, sometimes they want to eat other animals and people/humans.

What Do Lions REEEALLY Eat?

Do lions eat the same as any other animal?

Do lions eat the entire prey when it is a large one, or do they just eat until full?

Are pumas related to lions?

Patrick Colligan

Former Elephant Trainer at San Diego Zoo Safari Park (1987–1998)Apr 30

Pumas are Mountain Lions (Puma concolor.) Mountain Lions along with Cheetahs, are Honorary Members of the Big Cats. Those two not belonging to the Genus Panthera and also, not able to roar.

Puma (Mountain Lion, Puma concolor)

African Lion (Panthera leo)

ANIMAL PREDATORS: Why don't predators attack other predators to feed?

Sly BIANDOU Cyber security analyst (2009 – present) 1 year

Predators are trained by their parents to hunt a certain type of prey depending on the species, and these prey are mostly animals representing minimal danger to the predator.

the environment of the wild nature is a competitive environment for the survival of the predator who lives there, it would not be good for him to seriously injure himself while trying to target another predator, the injuries could condemn him for the rest of his life , and even make him easy prey for other predators.

The wild world being competitive, the predators meet and clash, this with the main aim of eliminating competition, or of asserting their hegemony on a territory.

Thus, to remain in its full physical potential, the predator prefers to prey on other animals that cannot easily injure or even kill it.

Similar questions

What are the main predators of the gorilla and how do they kill it?

How to recognize a predator in the wild?

What are the cheetah's predators?

What is the crocodile's predator?

What are the predators of the aardvark?

What is man's predator in the cycle of life?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD- KENYA-King of the nomads!

Posted by Kathy Pennell

"While the territorial male lions keep playing their game of life and death, the aging outlaw Jesse seems to outlive them all.

This special lion has not only adapted to the life of a nomad without any support of partners or prides but instead brought it to perfection. You will see him popping up here and there in the whole reserve and it's conservancies, moving between foreign territories with an unparalleled instinctive certainty.

Always fit. Always healthy. This male lion doesn't need anyone. He hunts for himself, scavenges for himself and has slipped through his rivals claws so many times that it's not worth counting anymore. And when he's actually forced to fight, don't expect him to go easy on his opponent - like one of the Black Rock males experienced first hand.

Old Jesse has been living that kind of life longer than any other male lion in the Maasai Mara and beyond it's borders. In fact he's been longer a nomad than he had been a pride male. And he seems to enjoy it that way. With 11 years of age he's still in formidable shape, in fact he looks better, bigger and bulkier than most pride males. It's obvious that he's still not done yet!"

Maasai Mara

Photo credits: Saeed Hadipoor

WAR-Wildlife at Risk

ANIMALS In The Wild: Do tigers ever eat other big cat species (lions, leopards, etc.) in the wild? If so, what is the reason behind it?

Nick Nicholas Studied Big Cats for 40+ years 25m

Yes. Leopards are sometimes although this is rare.

A female tiger will not tolerate a leopard in her territory when she has cubs so will go out of her way to kill any leopard there if she can catch it. Tigers do not have overlapping territories with other big cats except aforementioned leopard.

Below - tiger with leopard which it has killed:

Related: Are big cats like lions and tigers ever friends?

Laurence Boorer Former Education TechnicianJul 13

A fairly interesting question Prompt Generator.

I can go one better than that. Have a B L T (Bear, Lion, and Tiger) who were inseparable “friends for life”. Baloo, Leo, and Shere Khan were rescued from the basement of a drug dealer’s house in Atlanta, and had been kept together since they were cubs, and all three showed signs of neglect (open wound, embedded harness, parasites, seriously underweight). Attempts were made to split them up, but they all went into a state of deep depression, refusing to eat, etc, until they were reunited. Even given a three acre enclosure, they would nearly always be found within thirty metres of each other, and often a lot closer as they would frequently groom each other, and even eat together.

So, although it’s unlikely, as the species would virtually never meet up in the wild, then under very unusual conditions, it’s possible. Whilst most of these “friendships” occur when the animals are young, and fade as the animals mature, these three remained together even as adults until, after 16 years, Leo’s health deteriorated and tests showed that his liver had shut down. After Leo’s death, Baloo and Shere Khan became even closer.

Related: Are big cats like lions and tigers ever friends?

Valentin Todorov Religion - Scientific atheist 6h

No, they don't eat them. Tigers, who are at the top of the natural food pyramid, attack and kill all other large predators at every opportunity, but rarely eat them. Tigers chase and kill other large carnivores even more ferociously than their prey. Do they catch them, kill them and then leave them intact.

Except for the bears. Brown and Himalayan bears make up 5-8% of the food ration of the Amur tiger, thus occupying the third place in it, after deer and wild pigs.

When tigers kill leopards, wolves, and wild dogs (and other tigers too), it is not for food. The main reason is the competition of large predators for the same prey. By killing them, the tigers simply reduce the competition.

In the photo - a leopard killed by a tiger and abandoned in India.

The other, equally important reason is that by killing the other large carnivores in the region, they reduce the danger to their own offspring, because all of them (including other tigers that kill foreign cubs) would kill cubs at every opportunity.

In the photo - another leopard killed by a tiger and also abandoned, again in India.

Lions do the same. They also chase leopards, cheetahs, hyenas, and wild dogs more fervently than, for example, antelopes, zebras, or their other prey. One of the few things that can make a lion stop eating is the appearance of another large predator. Then, like the tiger, he becomes a killer.

The difference between tigers and lions in this never-ending war for resources and security is that the former seem to do it quite purposefully, while the latter when given a convenient opportunity. A case has been described in the Amur region where a male Amur tiger purposefully chased a pack of over 30 wolves for a whole month, killing all but 2 that managed to leave the area.

Which animal has strong legs, a lion or a tiger?

Benjamin Keno Knows EnglishUpdated 1y

All wild animals have strong legs or limbs (unless they have been injured or something), that's how they survive in the harsh wilderness!

Southern African lion (Panthera leo melanochaita) at Etosha National Park (northern Namibia, credit: Africa Photography) versus Northern Bengal tiger (Panthera tigris tigris) at Kaziranga National Park (northeast India, credit: India Nature Watch):

Related Links

Do lions and tigers get depressed being in zoos? What are the signs of a depressed big cat? Is there a chance that big cats actually prefer being in Zoos because they no longer have to hunt for food?

Can big cats learn to co-exist with each other if they are around each other at a young age, e.g., a lion and a tiger?

Do 'big cats' (lions, tigers, etc.) get along with house cats?

Why are tigers considered the largest of the big cats when tigers and lions are clearly the same size?

Do big cats like lions or tigers purr?

Why aren't cats fierce and dangerous like lions, tigers, and mountain lions (or …)

Who would win in a fight between a Barbary lion and a hippopotamus?

Mr.Someone

Manga and Comic's Reader.14h

Can’t believe there is a damn debate going on about this, the Hippo fucking slams the lion like the fodder it is.

This is what happens.

Related: Who would win in a fight between a Barbary lion and a hippopotamus?

Roronoa-Zoro Right hand man at Straw Hats (1969–present)
Sat

Even tho Barbary Lions are Huge, they are still not really going to do much against a hippopotamus
Barbary lions are big

10 feet

A full-grown male Barbary lion is said by historians to have weighed more than 500 pounds, compared with less than 400 pounds for today's male African lion. A Barbary could measure 10 feet from its ears to the tip of its tail.

Convert units

Length

10	=	3.048
Foot		Meter

FORMULA for an approximate result, divide the length value by 3.2808399

But hippos are bigger and heavier, due to it's massive body his durability is also higher

Common hippos, also known as river hippos, are very rotund animals and are the third largest living land mammals, after elephants and white rhinos, according to the African Wildlife Foundation. They grow to between 10.8 and 16.5 feet (3.3 and 5 meters) long and up to 5.2 feet (1.6 m) tall at the shoulder.

Facts about hippos | Live Science

www.livescience.com/27339-hippos.html

Barbary Lions have a bite force of around 1000 PSI

One of the few things that is known about this large lion's strength is its bite force. The Barbary lion has also been documented to have one of the strongest bite force among all the lions reaching an average of around 700+ psi with maximum rates of 1000 psi. 12-Mar-2022

Hippos are almost double of that, not to mention it open his mouth can be far more widely opened compared to almost any animal

1800 PSI

According to 5 sources

Besides IQ (Lions are one of the smartest animals compared to other big cat species)

And Speed

81 km/h (50.3mph)

According to 2 sources

Hippopotamus · Speed

30 km/h (On land, Running)

Lions get completely bodied

Overall, if Barbary Lions get caught in one or two bite of a hippo he would be more or less..

Related Links

Which animal is stronger: the elephant or the hippopotamus?

Which animal would win in a fight between a rhino and a hippo?

Who will win a fight between a lion, a crocodile, and a hippo?

Who would win in a fight between a Barbary lion and a gigantopithecus? Why?

Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?

Who would win a fight between a lion and an elephant?

ANIMALS In The Wild: Who would win in a fight between a tiger and a domestic horse?

Scott Reptile enthusiast, canine enthusiast, and artist.Sat

The horse wins, I mean that…
Mot ignorant (or mostly delusional) people don't seem to understand that it's only through ambush tigers can ever hope to take down large, powerful and dangerous animals like a water buffalo or gaur. However, ACTUAL powerful and larger animals (like polar bears, some brown bears like grizzlies,) can take down, bring down and kill animals more than twice their size… and as I said, all head on.

Head on, NO bovine is afraid of any tiger and will quite run off any cat. In most cases, a tiger is either killed by a gaur because of a failed ambush attempt or for simple being around in its presence (they know tigers are a threat, probably).

A horse is a significantly bigger threat, really. It is smarter, it is much faster, it is more agile, it is just as powerful and strong as a gaur (They are stronger pound for pound), it has stronger legs, they can get much larger (the largest horse, Samson, was actually heavier than the heaviest gaur. However, it was not by a significant amount and they were kinda about the same in range. Both were in 1500s, the horse being a bit heavier),

There is the constant myth (and sometimes) obvious lie that tigers (and cats in general) are the strongest mammalian animals (pound for pound)… this isn't true. In my other answers, I have debunked cats being the strongest pound for pound. I'll give my thoughts on this area here, I think that when it comes to carrying up prey, tigers are simply better climbers than animals like bears. This is like how leopards aren't actually much stronger than lions (pound for pound), they're just really impressive and very skilled climbers. Lots of people claim tigers can do things like drag 1300 pound gaur carcasses (even then, there is NO footage of a tiger doing any of this), but horses have been known to drag and pull trucks… not even comparable when it comes to strength and muscle,

Other feats of immense strength and power by horses:

And much, much, much, and much more than even all this!

When it comes to strength, NO cat will ever come close (not even pound for pound). Horses are already FAR larger than any tiger could ever hope to be, this is already another major bonus to its advantages. And when it comes to being tough as nails, there is a video showing a circus tiger and lion attacking a (bless that horse) horse. It's impressive how tough and durable horses really are… even getting mauled there as well, the horse quite literally fought off those cats, dragged them both easily (another feat of strength), and simply backhanded those cats with ease and kept on going fighting them.

Horses have even been know to fight off pumas and some small bears with ease, especially head on where the horse can see them and prepare (cats are ambush predators, they can not take down a large animal head on). Heck, even brown bears (like grizzlies, which are larger and stronger than any tiger) show respect to wild horses and give them their space sometimes.

Horses are also significantly far smarter animals than any cat (despite being domestic, though. Having said that, I can only imagine just how smart a wild horse is). Horses are scientifically proven to be highly intelligent (despite not looking or acting like it). They are said and proven to be self-aware (something that is never said for a cat, not even a domestic one. even African lions have failed all self-awareness tests. And really, they are scientifically proven to be the smartest big cats), they can solve problems (sometimes even complex ones. Examples include opening gates, for one) and situations, etc.

A horse is also a significantly faster animal, the top speed for a horse being 55mph and the top for a tiger being only 40mph. A horse may not be as agile as a tiger, but this is all the cat has… nothing else. Even then, the athleticism of a horse shouldn’t in the slightest be ignored here!

Lots of people are claiming that a horse might not be able to catch a tiger because of its agility and maneuverability… but that's all the mere cat has, it had nothing else besides those two very insignificant advantages. And really, if even things like walruses are able to catch and kill polars (have Ben known to stab them with their tusks, but polars bears are obviously significantly faster, more maneuverable and more agile than a walrus on land), then a tiger is not gonna make it. Regardless, the tiger wil, be fighting the horse close up and personal (especially if it's in an enclosed area)… so it really isn't looking too good for a the tiger here. And honestly, people do seem to forget that tigers (like all big cats) have very subpar stamina. However, horses have amazing stamina, especially if they are race horses. In fact, some have been known to cover up to 20 to 40 miles (32 – 64.5 km) in a day while trotting.

Verdict: Tigers are no match for a blood-listed and specifically trained bull domestic horse, no. A horse is a bigger, stronger, smarter, faster, more durable (most likely, it seems), and just a better built and superior animal here.

I have noticed of people claim horses aren't fighters and that they can't fight against against some large predators… this isn't true in the slightest, especially on the fighting predators part.

To be honest, herbivores (espcislly mammalian ones, obviously) are constantly underestimated in their capabilities and strengths. A-lot of people will assume a big cat would win (despite being significantly smaller and weaker than, say, a gaur) simply because its a predator and it knows how to fight and kill… but mutiple videos clearly debunk this. If a herbivore decides to fight, then you can see in the video I posted that a tiger would stand zero chance.

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD:A Mother Taking Care of Her Many Children

Posted by Kathy Pennell Oct 18

Family is important. A ranger with her child and jumbo family at an elephant orphanage in Northern Kenya.

You can see Long'uro behind the caregiver.

Reteti Elephant Sanctuary

Is a lion really the king of the forest?

Zuberi Sebu

Primary School Teacher (2007–present)18h

Lions actually live in the grasslands.The male lion's majestic look and manner makes people to consider him, to be the King of the beast. His strength, long mane and loud roar also contributes to this idea..The other animals like tigers and elephants have had no say in this.

Related：With an elephant being the most powerful and social animal in a forest, why is a lion the king of the forest?

I think that title king of the forest/jungle was given because we identify with predators more than herd animals. But make no mistake the African Bush Elephant has no equal in the animal kingdom of land animals.

Darren Pellichino B.Sc Zoology & Biotechnology, Govt Arts College, Coimbatore (2017)2y Biology DegreeUpvoted by சாமுவேல் ஜோசப் ராஜ். வே

Here is a male african bush elephant throwing a male cape buffalo. A cape buffalo weighs around 1,300 with some weighing 2,000 pounds while a lion weighs around 400 with a max being around 480 pounds, a male bush elephant can weigh up to 13,000 pounds. Elephants have an amazing 4 to 1 body to head ratio. The sperm whale has a 3 to 1 body to head ratio which is the greatest among mammals. I have seen a video that shows an elephant throw a rhino which are heavier than the cape buffalo.

When we named the Lion king we really didn’t put enough thought into it. BTW a polar bear is more dominant than a lion if the 2 were kept together. A polar bear can weigh as much as 2,000 pounds.

One more size chart to compare the african bush elephant to the rest of the animals.

But if I had to pick the all time king of the animal kingdom I would lean toward the sperm whale. While not as large as the blue whale the sperm whale is known to have an extremely high amount of testosterone and coupled with their extremely large square shaped heads I give them the edge, only slightly though. I call them the personification of a battering ram.

Related questions

Does the lion know that he is the king of the forest?

Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?

What should I do if I meet a lion in a forest?

In the animal world, what makes a lion the king of all animals in the forest?

If a lion is the king of the forest, then what is a tiger?

Why is the lion called "the king of the forest", even though the tiger is bigger

Which would win in a fight: Horse Vs Zebra?

Neil Morrison Lives in Kent, UK10mo

The Zebra!
Consider…

The Zebra is wearing Disruptive Pattern Camouflage. That says military! Don't be fooled that a larger horse is facing-off against a smaller zebra. The zebra that you see has hidden backup in the shape of snipers, mortar teams, artillery, and Close Air Support. This contest is not coming down to biting and kicking. The horse has been lured into an ambush and will be dogfood very soon.

The Zebra is a real badass! This is what happened when a lion made a comment about a zebra's sister!

[math]\quad\quad\quad\quad\quad\quad\quad\quad\quad\quad[/math]Yeah! Karma's a Bitch, baby!

www.HorseyHooves.com

www.DeviantArt.com

www.YouTube.com

How can you tell if a lion is looking at you?

Debi Ehrlich Aviles Oct 14

Ok here goes;
Lions looking at you…

Lions really not looking at you…

Lion looking…

Lion not looking…

Lion laughing at this whole question…

Hope this helps you get an idea when there's a look, a non look or a laugh. Have a good day

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: “As the largest animal in the ecosystem, elephants have a tendency to hog the water hole and really aren't interested in sharing.”

Posted by Kathy Pennell

“The other animals all have to wait their turn. So you know the situation is getting severe when an eland is willing to challenge an elephant for access. Elands are the largest antelope species and impressive in their own right, but usually not this brave. Hopefully this elephant decided to play nice.

Big Life's rangers are providing strategic water and food for wildlife around the ecosystem as the drought worsens.”

Big Life Foundation

ANIMALS In The Wild:Are lions and tigers equal in terms of physical strength, or is one stronger than the other?

Vikas Nair Sep 18

Animal strength is measured by observing their evidenced strength behaviors. Since otherwise there will not be any possibility of knowing the strength of a snake, a crocodile, a bird or an ant . Animals unlike humans obviously cannot be put to participate in a strength contest.

(Image source: Google)

What does BBC have to say about the strength comparison between a lion and a tiger?

BBC is a neutral authority and is not biased towards the lion or the tiger. Here is where they have placed the Tiger as the 8th strongest animal on the planet and the lion is not in the list.

Even if the lion and tiger are very anatomically similar under the skin, there is a clear winner

Two individuals can have the same muscle mass, very similar build but there will always be one stronger person than the other. The same is the case with the lion and the tiger, though they are anatomically very similar, the Tiger is clearly stronger than the lion.

Evidence

1) If both the lion and the tiger are anatomically similar , why does the Tiger have a stronger bite force ratio than the lion :The Tiger has a bite force ratio of 1050 psi and the lion has a bite force ratio of 750 psi . Then answer is because the Tiger is stronger than the lion and was able to translate its superior strength to a higher bite force.

2) Display of strength

A tiger weighing around 225 kg dragged a buffalo kill weighing 770kg over 200 metres.

Buffalo Kill

The strength of a tiger is unbelievable. We were visiting Manas Wildlife Sanctuary in Assam during late January 1987. We had gone to the area serviced by the river Beki, after crossing a few dried beds of rivulets. Near Kapurpura, we saw six wild buffaloes (Bubalus bubalis) in a beel (seasonal wetland). Unfortunately, Dharni Kalita, the forest guard escorting us, inadvertently exposed himself and was observed by the animals who, one by one, climbed over an escarpment and vanished in the grassland beyond. We could not follow the herd for long as it went into the thick of the sub-Himalayan jungle. After about three hours, we took a detour to the Narayanguri area across Purana Beki river. We met a forest guard on the way who signalled us to stop. He informed us that nearly two hours before, a large tiger had attacked a herd of six wild buffaloes, killing a cow which he had dragged into a scrub forest.

The forest guard agreed to accompany us to the site. We travelled about 300 metres in the jeep, then trudged another 300 metres or so, till we came to the spot where the tiger had attacked the buffalo. Signs of the bitter struggle and drag marks were clearly visible. We were now on very dangerous ground but Kalita had a rifle, which was probably more morale-boosting than really effective against any determined tiger attack. We cautiously followed the drag mark for about 200 metres through a forest of semal (silk cotton), sheesham and bogori (berry), when the guard signalled us to stop and pointed towards something black beneath a Bogori tree. It was the wild buffalo kill. Either the tiger had heard our approach and retired, or after the first feed and drink, was lying in some cover nearby, as he had made no effort to hide the kill.

Pic. 3 Arati beside the wild buffalo kill.

The tiger could not have weighed more than 225 kg but he had hauled a nearly one tonne carcass over undulating ground for nearly 200 metres. About 10 kg of meat had been eaten from the rump after dragging out the rumen. There were severe claw marks on the back of the buffalo. The tiger evidently had leapt over the victim before sinking his long canines into its throat and killing it by strangulation and suffocation (Pic. 3).

At the moment inspite of there being more than 10,000 lions in Africa, there is not a single instance of any strength feat from the lion. This is not to put down the majestic lion but to talk factually.

So the Tiger is clearly stronger than the lion.

Do crocodiles kill lions on land?

Serge Elia animal lover

Nile crocodiles and African lions are sworn enemies due to their shared diet, which undoubtedly leads to intense competition between the two animals. So when they meet around an animal carcass along the river, it's all out war.

On land, crocodiles are less agile and lethargic due to their bulk (while they are very fast in water), which makes them very vulnerable to attack by lions - some individuals, like this male, have even been spotted killing crocodiles.

However, on numerous occasions, the lion's sharp teeth and claws fail to deliver a fatal blow to the crocodile's thick armor, resulting in the two contestants being evenly matched: the reptile cannot kill the lion. , either because it is too fast and stealthy or because it is outnumbered, and the feline cannot kill the crocodile because the latter is protected by its impenetrable exoskeleton.

In water, on the other hand, it is obvious: adapted to aquatic life, the crocodile can quickly kill a swimming lion.

Which rainforest animal eats anacondas?

Gresse Florian

patent des colleges de saint louis crest

Invertebrates, lizard, coati any scavengers. Anacondas break their pipe like everyone else. But you mean which predator is strong enough to defeat and eat this animal?

Too manly to be attacked, huh! Well, can you imagine that only females are built like that?

The males are another story. Chunky they are the prey of: Coyote, maned wolf, puma, giant otter it's all you can eat buffet for those over 30 kilos. Good going back to the anaconda as we know them. their predators would be: Jaguar, caiman and also smaller and grouped marabunta and piranha

Similar questions

Why do female anacondas eat their mates?

Have anacondas ever eaten people?

How to escape an anaconda after it wraps around you?

What do anacondas eat in the rainforest?

Can an anaconda eat a person? Are there any legitimate documented cases of anaconda eating a person?

Why is an anaconda bite terrible?

Has a president ever raised his hand to another head of state?

Lawrence Richard

Writer Updated 1 year ago

I don't have an example of two heads of state fighting each other in recent history, but here are two parliamentarians banging on each other!

The thing is happening in Somaliland in 2015.

These two parliamentarians from Somaliland (a state not recognized by the international community) suddenly started fighting in the middle of an official ceremony, while they were holding hands a moment earlier.

It is not known what caused the fight. It took ten men to separate them...

Edit: Thanks to Jerome Cohen for pointing out that the two men were not the President and Prime Minister of Somalia as claimed in the original dispatch, widely spread on the Net.

Similar questions

What is the most extravagant thing that a president of the republic has ever done, all countries and times combined?

We call the wife of a head of state "first lady". What do you call the spouse of a woman who is head of state?

Who was the greatest and the smallest head of state in history?

Which rulers of the past were really bad (in the sense of bad)?

Could a former president become president of another country?

Has a president ever made a revealing slip, if so which one?

What rainforest animal eats anacondas?

Serge Elia Animal lovers Feb 12

Anacondas are often considered the apex predators of the Amazon – some would say (exaggeratedly) that these constrictors are the ultimate terror of the South American tropics – a characteristic that makes them insurmountable, unmatched and feared by all. However, this does not prevent them from being vulnerable to attacks from other neighboring predators.

As mentioned in other answers, the jaguar (whether yellow with black rosettes or completely black like the individual in the photo above) is the anaconda's enemy number one, and by extension the main threat to the survival of our favorite snake. Since jaguars are among the few felids to include reptiles in their daily diet, they do not disdain attacking any anaconda that comes within their reach, no matter how huge.

In fact, even if the anaconda is endowed with the power of constriction, nevertheless it has nothing in store to overcome the jaguar and its powers of stealth and speed, as well as its sharp claws and jaws capable of crushing the bones (the most powerful of all felines) – and the worst is that the lack of endurance and the cold-blooded or ectothermic characterof the snake only aggravate the problem.

Typically, anacondas feed on caimans, but there have been quite a few cases where these cousins of the crocodile manage to turn on their main predators, going so far as to kill them before devouring them - indeed, even While caimans are smaller than crocodiles and alligators, they're still just as strong and aggressive, with powerful muscles and sturdy jaws that make short work of any ill-fated victim.

There are also the giant otters, since they have no natural predators to fear (even jaguars are no threat!), in light of their fiery nature and extraordinary strength in union. Consequently, giant otters have been seen harassing any anaconda that has had the misfortune to pass within their reach – in fact, given the chance, they are capable of killing and devouring a anaconda.

Voici quelque chose que les autres réponses n'ont pas mentionné : on a aperçu beaucoup d'anacondas en train d'avaler leurs propres congénères ! À titre d'exemple : à 5 ou 6 mètres de long, les femelles anacondas sont bien plus grandes que les mâles, lesquels ne dépassent pas la taille de 3 mètres de long, ce qui les rend tout à fait nains par rapport aux grosses mémères – ainsi, les mâles doivent rester sur leur garde pendant le rituel nuptial, car les choses peuvent se détériorer à tout moment et la femelle pourra étouffer son partenaire dans ses anneaux avant de le dévorer !

As to why this form of cannibalism takes place remains a mystery, but there are theories, the most credible of which states that said cannibalism serves to fill the need for extra protein, which is especially useful when female anacondas are fasting. during the period of pregnancy which lasts about seven months – moreover, they use 30% of their body weight to give birth (by the way, the anaconda is viviparous like human beings); and so, according to Venezuelan biologist Jesús Rivas, "appropriating seven or eight extra kilos of meat before entering this phase is not such a bad idea".

What a cruel world for this giant snake, isn't it?

© PicsPick

Kichwa
anangu

ANIMALS In The Wild: Do hippos and rhinos have any natural enemies besides humans, lions, hyenas, and crocodiles?

Samuel Perloff

Extremely well read with some field experience Tue

No they do not beyond the aforementioned species. Even lion prides rarely threat these megafauna. While a few isolated cases of successful predation on hippopotamus adults by lion prides have been documented, they are not typical quarry and lions seem to know to fear and avoid the cranky herbivore's giant jaws. When they do decide to attack a hippo, even a juvenile, lions attack entirely from the rear so as to avoid being counterattacked and try to prevent the hippo from taking refuge in water. A very large clan of spotted hyenas has in a singular case been known to reportedly take on a rare hippo. Cases of lions taking rhinos are even rarer. Two historic and anecdotal accounts show adult black rhinoceros being taking down by lions. Additionally, white rhinoceros up to half grown ones have been taken down by lions. Adult white rhinos seem to be invulnerable and even the calves are often successfully protected and avoided due to lions apprehension regarding facing off with rhinos, not only due to their huge size but their great speed, extremely thick skin and giant horns. Coincidentally, the same number of adult black rhinoceros

(two) have been known to be successfully taken by Nile crocodiles in anecdotal cases. Nile crocs are forced to cohabitate with hippopotamus and often tend to avoid them, even calves, as they are wary of being chomped and killed by the hippos. However, large mature male Nile crocodiles that are bold enough will prey on hippo calves. Also, they are known opportunistically to finish off male hippos injured in battles with other males, especially if working in aggregations of crocs.

Related Links

Which animal has the thickest skin, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, or crocodiles?

How come lions don’t eat hyenas after killing them?

Is it true that hippos and rhinos fear hyenas more than lions?

What are the predators of crocodiles? What are the crocodiles’ natural enemies?

Are hyenas considered as lions biggest enemies?

Why do crocodiles not attack hippos?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: Don’t mess with a lioness’s cub.

Posted by Jo Mburu 15h

Lioness will give birth to 1–3 cubs each 2 years. Cubs have spots at birth, but they disappear in time. Until they reach 2 years, lions can`t roar. Lionesses are very protective of their young cubs. They fight tooth and claw to defend their cubs.

Photo source: Infrographics-bish on Reddit

Do cheetahs and leopards get along in the wild?

Samuel Perloff

Nearly 20 years experience15h

Originally Answered: Do Cheetahs and leopards get along in the wild?

No absolutely not. Let’s start with physical characteristics. Cheetahs and leopards are close to each other in size but very different structured. Cheetahs are cats adapted to speed above all else, with elongated legs, making them taller than leopards, at best semi-retractable claws, a long tail for balance and an elongated spine. Meanwhile, the leopard is a true big cat with a well-muscled frame, often giving them a weight advantage over cheetahs, and is in general built to maximize power and hunt a variety of prey in a variety of habitats, resulting in leopards being the most widely distributed modern wild cat. While cheetahs rely on speed to target fleet-footed, modestly sized antelope, leopards rely on their strength, cunning and versatility.

Ecologically, they both compete in a mildly subordinate position among Africa’s top predator carnivorans. While lion prides terrorize, dominate and kill both cheetahs and leopards given the opportunity, spotted hyena clans usually do the same (although big male leopards, which are quite as massive as hyenas, have been known to defeat and kill adult spotted hyenas in the most escalated conflicts). African wild dogs are vulnerable to leopards but can overtake them as well if they can surround and outflank them on the ground. Along with wild dogs, both cheetahs and leopards often specialize mostly in a similar guild of mostly mid-sized antelopes. Therefore they regard each other as direct competitors and the strength of the leopard allows it to dominate the cheetah. On occasion, cheetah cubs and even adult cheetahs are ambushed and killed by leopards. These killings are not predatory but likely competitively motivated.

A leopard with a treed cheetah kill.

How fast can a crocodile run?

Jerome Cohen Animal friend for more than 1/2 century. Translator August 26

Serge Elia animal lover

Original Question: How fast can a crocodile run?

On land, there's a good chance you'll outrun a crocodile - at a gallop, most crocodile species can only reach speeds of around 12-14 km/h for short periods of time, which is a bit slower than a normal human being (about 35-40 km/h). This is not surprising, because crocodiles, due to their mass, are rather stiff and slow when moving on land.

The Australian freshwater crocodile, the smallest living crocodilian, is also the fastest of them all, with a speed of around 17 km/h when running at a gallop for distances of 20 to 30 meters - if quickly, in fact, that it is already gone when you notice it!

In contrast, it's a whole other story in water: Crocodiles, well-equipped to swim faster than any living amphibious creature, are extraordinary ambush predators that have the ability to launch a surprise attack that almost never let their victims (including ourselves) know what hit them.

Therefore, when hunting in water, large crocodiles - including the famous Nile crocodiles and their infamous saltwater counterparts - accelerate over short distances into intense action. While doing so, they can move about 12 meters for a quarter of a second, which is enough to capture prey standing a body length away.

This is why crocodiles propel themselves from a standing start, hoping to cover the short distance to their prey before it can react. However, these cold-blooded reptiles cannot sustain this acceleration for more than a brief moment.

Associated: What animals can never be domesticated? Why ?

Alexander Maq entrepreneur (2020 – present) Translator · 1 year

Marty Severiano Johncox MA in Journalism , University of Oregon (Graduated in 1989)

Which animals can never be tamed? And why?

Zebras. In theory, they could be tamed and ridden like horses. In reality, they are mean as hell.

Any prey species that can thrive around lions, leopards, crocodiles and hyenas must have a serious attitude problem.

Wild Horses Can't Be Broken: Attempts to Domesticate Zebras - Thomson Safaris

To make a lion suffer.

Hurt another lion.

Hurt a fucking crocodile!

In a mosh pit with wildebeest.

And, of course, put the wound on another zebra. Good luck tapping a saddle on one of these critters and mounting it.

It would take hundreds of years of selective breeding to domesticate the zebra and make it big enough to carry most people around, without wanting to kill them. Horses can already do this and there isn't much use for horses anymore either.

Similar questions

Are there animals that cannot be domesticated by human beings?

What are examples of animals deliberately saving other animals and/or people in the wild?

Why can't wild dogs be domesticated?

Why can some animals be domesticated and others not?

Can a rooster survive in the wild?

Do animals in general coexist peacefully in nature?

Jerome Cohen

.
Follow
Animal friend for more than 1/2 century. Translator · 25 Jan.

Is it true that predators and prey observe a truce near a waterhole?

Ansh Badal Seen leopards, tigers and dholes (and now lions!) in the wild

© Caters News Agency

No way.

There is no "truce" near a water point, it is even the opposite.

Predators are always waiting at waterholes, and herbivores have to risk their lives every time they want to drink water. More herbivores are killed at waterholes and rivers than anywhere else.

In nature there is no truce, only one rule - kill or be killed.

Jerome Cohen

.

Follow

Animal friend for more than 1/2 century. Translator · 25 Jan.

Ansh Badal

Seen leopards, tigers and dholes (and now lions!) in the wild

This answer may not be a faithful translation of the answer of Ansh Badal in Quora in English :

Is it true that predators and prey have a thing near a watering hole?

Is it true that predators and prey observe a truce near a waterhole?

No way.

There is no "truce" near a water point, it is even the opposite.

Predators are always waiting at waterholes, and herbivores have to risk their lives every time they want to drink water. More herbivores are killed at waterholes and rivers than anywhere else.

In nature there is no truce, only one rule - kill or be killed.

ANIMALS In The Wild:Why do other animals reproduce for the sole purpose of continuing their species, while humans seem to have so many other reasons such as passing on the family name, having someone care for them in their old age etc.?

Antonio Hardcastle

Lifelong animal nerd Wed

Humans breed for the same reason other animals do. It's the same directive coded into their instincts. The only difference is humans talk and explain and rationalise their obeyment of their programming. If lions could speak and were egotistical grandiose narcissists like us they'd explain idiotically why they do what they do, but like us it wouldn't be the real reason. Like us it would be silly nonsense.

We like having sex because it like, wards off hyena spirits, attracts zebras and like cleanses our chakras.

The real reason is still the biological directive to continue their genetic legacy. Even when gay dudes have sex their instincts think, mistakenly, that they are continuing their genetic legacy. That's STILL the real reason WHY they are doing it. That's always the reason.

Related Links

Why do all animals want to reproduce? What is their benefit of offspring, and why do humans stop?

Why are humans the only animals that reproduce year round?

Do humans reproduce for the same reason other animals do?

Do humans reproduce solely for the purpose of continuing our species?

What is the purpose of humans on earth?

Why do animals who have no advantages in reproducing are built to

What would've been the outcome of a fantasy match between Evander Holyfield from 1990 era vs Earnie Shavers from 1977 era?

Jawed Akrim Boxing fan, big-fight analyst, tactician & historian Oct 29

Shavers probably by way of TKO.

Back in '77, Shavers was close to prime & he gave a fading Ali hell. Many experts agree that the bombs Shavers landed on Ali in their 1977 match were the hardest non-KO punches ever…It was only Ali's granite jaw that kept him standing.

1990 Holyfield was still very much a heavyweight in development & although he had the skill— he hadn't yet gone into beast mode. This lack of physicality at that time would likely prove his undoing against '77 Shavers.

For some evidence — one can use the 1991 matchup between Holyfield & another slugger named Smokin' Bert Cooper. In the 3rd round of that slugfest, Cooper dropped Holyfield with a solid barrage of punches & was close to forcing a stoppage. The initial big punch was a short right hand delivered from the clinch…If a solid, strong journeyman like Cooper can catch Holyfield, then we can conclude — a hit man like prime Shavers can catch him more easily.

The main worry for Shavers would be his gas tank, which was always his Achilles heel…Sluggers like Shavers & Foreman always have limited stamina which comes back to haunt them — if they can't get rid of their opponents early.

In the end, I see Shavers & Holyfield going to war in the trenches — with the superior firepower of Shavers coming out on top . As always, Holyfield will fire back but that 1990 version of Holyfield wasn't the hardest puncher & I can't see him deterring a prime Shavers.

Related Links

Who wins and why - Evander Holyfield vs Smokin' Joe Frazier?

What if Mike Tyson fought Evander Holyfield in 1990?

What would have been the outcome if Evander Holyfield, instead of Buster Douglas, fought MikeTyson before he went to prison?

Would a prime Evander Holyfield defeat a prime George Foreman?

Who would win, Prime George Foreman or Prime Earnie Shavers?

Who would win Sonny Liston vs Evander Holyfield both in their prime?

Do any animals take care of their parents when they get old and sick? If so, what kind of animals do this?

Jason Bahirwa

I have one or two thoughts that might be your solution. Oct 27

Afrcan wild dogs have been documented taking care of the elderly. Usually when the wild dogs get too old for hunting, they are assigned the role of taking care of the pups while the rest go hunting. When they return, they feed everyone including the elders.

Related Links

Why don't animals get sick from drinking dirty water?

What is the only animal that never dies from old age?

Do young animals care for their old like humans do?

Do animals suffer from illness like malaria?

What animals are the best parents to their young?

Do psychopaths like animals?

Related: Why are hippos grey?

Jack Flash May 4

Hippos are grey or brown in colour but often have a red or pink shine to their skin. Hippos secrete a substance called blood sweat that gives them that colour.

Related Links

Why are hippos so fat?

Do lions ever hunt hippos?

Why do hippos sunbathe?

What are hippos sometimes called?

Why are hippos so big?

What animal is closest related to a hippo?

Entertainment spots in Mombasa to check out this holiday

Entertainment spots in Mombasa are many. But before we look into that, let's first have a little background information on the city.

Mombasa is the second largest metropolitan area in Kenya after Nairobi. The vibrant city was previously known as 'Manbasa' – meaning an island of war. And it's because it was the stage for several wars of occupation by Arabs, locals and the Portuguese many years ago.

Mombasa now boasts a unique blend of culture, rich history and several attractions like Fort Jesus and Nyali Beach.

When it comes to vacation, Mombasa never disappoints. The city has everything from amazing hotels, white sand beaches, and architectural wonders to bustling nightlife and vibrant shopping centres.

Let's explore the best entertainment spots in Mombasa that you should visit this coming holiday.

Learn more about Entertainment spots in Mombasa to check out this holiday

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Posted by Kathy Pennell Sun

"This photo will forever hold a place in our hearts. This is raw pride. Like new fathers, our Rhino Monitors congratulated each other on the safe delivery of a new calf born at Care for Wild.

They have watched over Twinkle since she arrived as a small orphan and continued to protect her when she was released into the Intensive Protection Zone. 7 years after her arrival, she has given birth to a little girl.

Honour, discipline, integrity. The core values of our anti poaching team. Empowered and proud members of the community safeguarding and conserving a heritage for future generations."

WAR-Wildlife at Risk

ANIMALS In The Wild: Who would win in a fight a Liger or a Kodiak Bear?

Milan Zhang Has 2 cats, 1 dog, 2 guinea pigs,Always can help with pets.1y

Kodiak bears are true beasts, weighing up to 1,500 pounds! Ligers normally weigh up to 1,000 pounds, and that's way smaller. The liger can't exist in the in the wild because they depend on humans to feed them because they cannot hunt. Meanwhile Kodiak bears are on Kodiak island hunting prey like elk. Obviously the Kodiak bear would make the Liger a fine cat meal.

Related: Who would win, a liger or a Kodiak bear?

Shannon Phelps

Former Former Navy Seal Officer, Combat Veteran at Martial Arts and Fitness Instructor1y

I really don't enjoy addressing these inquires, but I sometimes use them to offer a little insight on the animals themselves. First, Kodiak. Bears- I'm a big fan ! I lived on Kodiak island and had to become familiar with these guys…they are found as well on Afognack- and may lay claim to be the world's largest land carnivore. The world record may go to the polar bear but average weight , some claim goes to this- "the king of the brownies". Who cares , really? (They don't). Let's see… Ligers? Everyone knows I'm a tiger fan- born in the year of the tiger and in the hour of the tiger . BUT… let's be truthful. I've never seen a liger in person- I'm not a fan- they are not a natural creature in my mind, but a creation of our making. They do have some design flaws… perhaps sterility (?) I can't personally evaluate their strength, agility - are they just bigger, better , faster or sluggish, aberrations? I say this to spur answers from those who might know…. what is indisputable is that they are a domestic product, in captivity only and have no wild experience. Even strong, healthy tigers/ lions would never be able to compete in the wild without pains-taking acclimation training- a liger, I fear, wouldn't stand a chance out there. He would have no invaluable survival experience. I think, (hope)owners know this!. You may have noticed that no reputable zoo, encourages this breeding. Now., against a wild 1300 to 1500 hundred pound wild Kodiak bear?!!!! You've got to be kidding!!

Related Links

Which would win in a fight, a tiger or a bear?

Which animal would win a fight between a Kodiak Bear and a male Lion?

A full grown male Kodiak bear vs a full grown male Siberian tiger who wins?

Who would win between a Siberian tiger and a grizzly bear?

Do tigers really eat bears? How are they able to kill such powerful animals?

Who wins in a battle between a black bear and a gorilla?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Posted by Jo Mburu 33m

King Kitili.

He's 8 years old. Not sure how he lost his eye. Any lion that can survive the tough, ruthless, and harsh conditions in the untamed African wilderness should be admired. King Kitili is revered and feared by other lions, no lion can dare to cross into the territory that he jealously guards. Long live King Kitili.

Photo by Fareed Gulamhusein IG.

ANIMALS In The Wild: How long do tigers live in the wild? And how long do they live in captivity?

Serge Elia Animal Lovers June 16

The average life expectancy of a wild tiger varies between 10 and 15 years. And this is all the more true since tigers do not become adults until they reach the age of 2 or 3 years – at this age, it is already the equivalent of an 18-year-old adult human being.

Also, the reign of a male tiger does not exceed two years. After which, he becomes too old and too weak to assert his dominance, and subsequently finds himself vulnerable to attacks by rivals who turn out to be younger, stronger and much more vigorous, ready to take advantage of them in order to seize the throne – indeed, a very short (albeit glorious) reign for such a magnificent creature.

Tiger longevity in the wild is so short compared to us humans, as striped cats (like all animals around the world) have a hard time surviving in a dangerous world, constantly forced to search for food, to avoid getting sick, to defend their territories against rivals and to protect their young from any potential danger, which unfortunately does not always pay off – moreover, out of a litter of five baby tigers, only two or three manage to reach the adult stage, because they expose themselves to a high risk of early mortality, the main cause of which is attacks by other tigers.

As I said before, wild tigers live up to 10 or 15 years on average, without ever exceeding this longevity, with a few notable exceptions of which I cite the late Machli (see below) , the most famous tigress of India, aged 19 on the day of her death – she is thus considered the oldest tigress living in the wild, the equivalent of a human supercentenarian.

On the other hand, tigers in captivity enjoy a much longer life span, up to 22 or 26 years. Which makes life so much easier around people – whether in a zoo, an animal sanctuary, a circus, or even someone's own home (just take a look at some 6,000 tigers belonging to the American citizens of Texas, while there are no more than 4000 individuals left in their natural range) –, since they benefit from a fair amount of care, protection, nutrition and medical aid 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, without having to worry about predatory threats, disease, or habitat issues.

Similar questions

Environment: While 60% of wildlife has disappeared in just 44 years and China is once again allowing the sale of tigers and rhinos, can we think that wildlife is doomed or is this situation still reversible?

Why do we find tigers in forests but not lions? What is the source of the lion's aversion to heavily forested areas and its preference for open areas?

What animals are useless to nature?

Is it possible that the Tasmanian tiger, the thylacine, is not completely extinct and if so, what population size would have been needed for the species to survive?

What are the rarest animals?

Animals do more than offer the perspective of a new urban geography,

Will a seven-foot spear be effective against serious predators like tigers and grizzly bears?

David Wilson Lifelong interest in animals Aug 7

These guys hunt lions with spears. The Maasai used to do it one-on-one but there are too few lions now. Note that they are tall, athletic and strong. They also know how to use those spears.

I have one of those spears at home. It has a very long blade (like a sword) and a long sharp spike at the base. The total spear length is closer to 6 feet than 7.

So its possible to hunt and kill a tiger or bear, using a spear. There's huge potential for it to go wrong, of course, but that's part of the fun I guess.

What is the most disgusting article you have read?

Bristow Michael Disgusting Wed

I have never imagine any other article most disgusting than this man actions.

A Man Who Molested A Mad Woman Asked To Choose Between Going To Jail Or Marry Her.

A Kenyan man who pleaded guilty to a sexual harassment to a mad woman was given a choice between marrying her or going to jail for the crime...continue reading visit link.

Man Who Molested A Mad Woman Asked To Choose Between Going To Jail Or Marry Her.

Man Who Molested A Mad Woman Asked To Choose Between Going To Jail Or Marry Her. A Kenyan man who pleaded guilty to a sexual harassment to...

https://worldbreakingnewsz.blogspot.com/2022/11/man-who-molested-mad-woman-asked-to.html?m=1

Patrick Colligan

Former Elephant Trainer at San Diego Zoo Safari Park (1987–1998)Feb 12

Elephants perceive Safari Vehicles as another Large Animal challenging their territory. So, they may at times, feel the need to stand up to, or challenge them. Lions, on the other hand, do not feel threatened by Safari Vehicles. To a Lion, a Safari Vehicle does not seem to be suitable prey.

Alioune Ngom

upvotedThu

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD
Posted by Jo Mburu Thu

Cheetah.

Best known as the fastest animals on the land. A fully grown cheetah has between 75 and 145 pounds, is 4 feet in length, and reaches 2 to 3 feet in height at the shoulder. Cheetahs are unrelated to other cats in Africa. Their closest living relative is the Puma or Cougar from the Americas. Most cheetahs are killed by competing predators, especially lions, leopards,s and hyenas, for this reason, they are very wary of their surroundings. Cheetahs are easily spooked. The slightest bird call made in close vicinity to cheetahs can send them running. They choose the daytime to hunt because most animals in Africa hunt during the night when the temperature drops down.

Photo credit: Jo Mburu.

Related:Why won't a single lion just run up and attack elephants?

Alex Cooper 1y

A buffalo can do this to a lion:

An elephant can do this to a buffalo:

So, what could an elephant do to a lion?

Ask Neil Pawstrong, who unwittingly became both the first lion on the moon and the last lion to charge an elephant on his own.

His peers seem reluctant to follow his one giant leap for lionkind:

I surmise that dead lions are less successful at passing on their genes, so lions have evolved a reluctance to being flung into space. (No one cares about the second lion on the moon, anyway.)

Thank you for coming to my TED (Total Elephant Domination) Talk.

Related Links

Why do lions not attack when you are in a safari vehicle?

Why is the lion considered to be the king of the jungle? Why not a tiger or an elephant?

Why is the lion the king of the jungle when there are other animals bigger than the lion, for example, an elephant?

In the African bushes, why do lions not spot people in open top cars as people, whereas elephants do?

How many male lions does it take to kill an adult elephant?

Who would win a fight between a lion and an elephant?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: Farming Community Kills no Lions in Retribution For Dead Livestock

Posted by Kathy Pennell Sun

"By In the 3rd quarter, there were ZERO lions killed in violation of the Predator Compensation Fund, a core component of Big Life's Predator Protection Program. Thresholds for compensation were increased in the 3rd quarter in light of increased depredation. Weak livestock means easy prey for area predators like lions, hyenas, jackals, and cheetahs. Compensation was issued for 123 cows, 1,296 goats, and 16 donkeys totaling $51,334."

Big Life Foundation

ANIMALS In The Wild: In a one-on-one fight, would a Jaguar's superior bite easily kill a lion?

Alex Cooper 3y

Originally Answered: In a 1v1 fight would a Jaguar's surperior bite easily kill a lion?

Could it kill a lion? I mean, yeah, I see no reason why not.

A jaguar killing a moist snappy lion.

The jaguar's bite force is well-known to be very strong, and sometimes they even kill with a bite through the brain. Their jaws can crush turtle shells and penetrate the tough skin of a caiman, so if it got to bite a lion's skull it would be over.

On the other hand, would it get to bite the lion's skull? Probably not.

Lions are much larger and stronger on average, even if the jaguar's bite force is superior (in relation to body size). While a very large male jaguar might have a shot against a smaller female lion, average male/female vs average male/female doesn't look good for the jaguar.

Simply Googling "Lion bite force" gives a figure of 650 PSI, while the Jaguar's is supposedly 2000, although these are from a fairly dodgy-looking site. This has got to be nonsense; there's no way the jaguar's bite is three times as strong as the lion's. That just doesn't make sense.

While the jaguar's bite force is the strongest of the big cats relative to its size, it's not the strongest outright, and after more digging I found this article (OK, it was near the top of Google too, I'm hardly Sherlock Holmes):

Which big cat has the strongest bite?

^The study cited in that article found that the jaguar's bite force was 3/4 that of a tiger, in absolute terms.

One of the men who carried out the research said:

If you had to choose, you'd want to be bitten by a jaguar, not a lion or a tiger. But pound for pound, jaguars pack a stronger punch.
So no, I'm fairly sure the jaguar doesn't have a "superior bite" unless it's a very large male against a small female lion, where perhaps the pound-for-pound superiority of the jaguar's bite will mean its bite is stronger outright.

Even a stronger bite is not everything, though. Styles make fights in the world of MMA (Mixed Martial Animal) combat, and if the lion is a better grappler, the jaguar may only have one shot to get in that telling blow.

The lion's bigger body, larger paws and its own formidable bite probably mean it will dominate as long as it has a reasonable size advantage.

Average vs average individual, lion wins 97.32/100 times.

You can quote me on that.

(I mean…I'm not sure what good it will do to quote me, but…you can. I'm just saying, the offer's there.)

Related Links

Despite animals preferring not to fight at all, Is there a Situation where a Puma could kill or beat a Jaguar in a fight?

If a jaguar was of the same size as a tiger, which would win in a fight?

Can a tiger kill a jaguar?

Which animal can kill a lion easily?

Who would win in a fight between different species of cats: lion, tiger, leopard, jaguar, snow leopard, cheetah, and puma?

Who will win a fight to the death an African lion or a Bengal tiger?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: Long live king Tom.

Posted by Jo Mburu Sun

Dark is the dominant tom cougar from Torres del Paine, Chile. He has beaten all the odds by remaining the king of his territory at the post-prime age of 14. He's very shy and not often seen, but when he is, he always makes sure to impose his presence.

This legendary tom is known by different names, Ceniza (Ash), Nahuel (Nawel), and the most popular Oscar (Dark). He's well-known for his dark, ash-coloured grey coat and for his massive size. Some estimates put him at over 220 lbs. This tom has remained dominant in the Torres del Paine NP for over a decade and has sired many cubs. Unlike the females who are often well-habituated and tolerant of tourists, big males like him are much more reserved and are often not seen.

Photo credits: Pumas_Chile (IG).

Are any African countries wealthier than they were during colonization?

Victor Isyamba Place making of Rwanda Nation1h

Allow me to use my personal background as an example to illustrate to you that Africa is much better than it was immediately after independence.

I believe we are much wealthier today than during independence because no single colonialist ever left Africa carrying shiploads of stuff back to Europe.

How It Started in the 1920s

The period between 1929–1967, a 20,000-acre farm was carved out of the larger Mt. Elgon slopes and given one to Mr. Jackson from the UK.

Photo Courtesy: Kenyan National Archives.

My grandfather was hired in the year 1931 to establish a a farm estate comprising of 700 African laborers to work on 10,000 acres of coffee

Arabica bushes, 4,000 acres of highland tea, a tea factory, a coffee milling factory, a primary school, two dams, and a couple of all-weather roads.

Photo Courtesy of Kenya National Archives

The Transformation after 1963

Immediately after Kenya was granted independence , the African government made sure that everything was decolonised and shared up with citizens.

My grandfather and his workers, transformed from squatters to land-owners each owning a share of the 20,000 acre property.

Today, over 10,000 households have their name on an asset. Our family included as seen here my dad is a proud coffee farmer.

I am also a happy vegetable farmer.

Coffee and Tea farming is flourishing amidst global economic issues going.

Is that not worthy celebrating as a milestone?

To answer your question: Are any African countries wealthier than they were during colonization?. YES, the Whole African Continent has grown by 2000% after Independence.

Related Links

Why was Africa undeveloped before colonization?

If Africa is so rich, why hasn't it yet developed and recovered after colonization?

Why are Africans the only ones who never recovered from colonization?

What was the first African country to be colonized?

Is sub-Saharan Africa richer today than it was under colonisation?

Was colonization on the whole good for Africa?

After leaving a pride, how long does a bachelor lion usually hunt by itself?

Ava Emily

.

Exucative at Amazon (company) (2017–present) Tue

It is surprising for a male lion to get removed from a pride without help from anyone else. He ordinarily has no less than one, on the off chance that not two siblings with him. They will rummage and chase while progressing looking for a pride to dominate. This cycle can take anything as long as 2 years by which time they will be completely developed and beginning to enter their prime.

There is no assurance that there will be a pride they can take over as the guys who are occupant in that pride will guard it regularly until the very end.

It is said the eight out of ten male lions don't come to development. In the event that the lions attempt and assume control over a pride where the occupant guys set up a battle, this can end seriously.

Related Links

How do young male lions live after leaving the pride?

Why do lions have sex for 10 seconds, and pigs for 30 minutes?

Does a male lion have sex with his child?

Why do male lions back off when the lionesses try to attack them?

Why do male lions kill the cubs?

Do lion prides look after sick and injured members?

ANIMALS In The Wild:Let’s say I meet a tiger face-to-face in the wild, or at least I come across one some day: will it just randomly attack me for no reason?

Nick Nicholas

Studied Big Cats for 40+ years Oct 28

Originally Answered: Let’s say I meet a tiger face to face in the wild or I just come across a tiger one day, will it just randomly attack me for no reason?

Every encounter is different.

If the tiger feels in any way threatened or has cubs, it will most likely attack. If the tiger is surprised, it will also most likely attack. And if a tiger feels it is being followed, it will most likely attack. If it has eaten well however and a bit lethargic you may get lucky providing you do not get too close.

Here are two pics. In the first one, the tiger has been surprised and will most likely attack. In the second you will possibly get lucky providing you keep your distance.

Related Links

Face to face with a lion/tiger/wild animal, what's the best way to save your life?

Why are tigers afraid to attack a person if they are facing them despite a person being much weaker than a tiger?

What would you do if you were face-to-face with a tiger?

Why don't wild orcas attack humans?

Would a tiger in the wild attack me if I safely approached it to pet it/hug it?

Do tigers attack humans unprovoked?

Which creatures sacrifice their own young when threatened by a predator?

Josh Breshears

Hotel General Manager (2017–present) Updated 3y

This one isn’t an exact match for what you are looking for-

But Komodo Dragon babies instinctively climb to the trees within 2–3 days of hatching.

Adult Komodos cannot climb trees.

The reason Komodo babies flee to the trees, is because after a 2–3 day period of time and sometimes sooner, they become open season for the adults, including their mother, in the event she or others gets the post-partum munchies and is too lazy to go on a hunt.

If we are going for "Greatest parental failure of the year" award, I don't think it would be the parent that abandons their baby-

I think it would be the parent that literally eats their baby… Out of sheer laziness.

*The above centered Komodo is not actually getting its head eaten- just the opposite;

It is trying to steal the food out of its friends mouth, while its friend on the left, Paul, says "Whoa man… you need to calm down a bit… Boundaries."

Update: Cheese n' crackers people, this is by far my most popular answer ever! Its a bit surprising because I only spent a few minutes typing it out, but I'll take it!

Here are a couple other animal related answers people seem to like as well!

Josh Breshears's answer to Who would win in an arm wrestling between Neanderthals and humans?

Josh Breshears's answer to What species' extinction would bring about catastrophic consequences?

Related Links

What animals sacrifice their young when threatened by a predator?

Is there honor among animals, predators in particular? Do they sometimes avoid predating prey animals which happen to be young, old, pregnant, sick, or asleep?

Why do predators typically eat their prey alive? Why don't they kill them before so they don't suffer?

Has a predator ever been killed by a prey?

If a lion kills only 20 animals a year, how does the wildlife balance happen? Who eats all those zebras and wild buffaloes?

Which animal (besides humans) kills the most other animals?

Associated: What are rats used for in nature?

Thierry Saunier The wild world 2 years

Oh the rats…. Curious how certain names take on a detestable or even ignoble connotation in anthropological jargon. The rat is a pest, it is useless, etc. Well no ! I'll surprise you, but I hope after reading my answer you'll view this "pet peeve" differently.

First to remember that when we talk about rats, we are talking about two species of the genus Rattus :

Rattus rattus (common rat, black rat)
Rattus norvegicus (field rat, brown rat).

Ah the city rat and the country rat…. Thank you Mr. De La Fontaine!

So let's be clear: the rat bothers us because in our minds it is to the sewers what the pigeon is to our roofs. He is dirty, he can bite, he can be a vector of diseases like the too famous bubonic plague (among others). The cursed, infernal rat… It frightens, it repels. In short, it is a nuisance for the common of humanity.

Another belief: rats are numerous, they reproduce quickly, they proliferate. Well not quite, in fact they are less subject to human pressure than other species:

" While wild animal species are becoming rarer in the face of increasing pressure from the human species, rats, older than us on Earth, are proliferating at the same rate. They occupy the entire Earth, except Antarctica, and are as numerous as men. More than 5 billion specimens. In other words, each man has his rat ." Francis Petter – National Museum of

Natural History

You do not know ? You have your rat companion somewhere on this earth… Rat exterminators still have a bright future ahead of them…

Well let's start with the diseases: the rat is indirectly a vector of the diseases of which it is accused, because it is indeed the fleas that it harbors in spite of itself the real culprits... Another mammal could therefore have been blamed just as much as the rat .

Another aspect, which you may have forgotten, but which our ancestors knew: the rat can predict the future!

the peasants were warned of an incipient fire when they saw the rats fleeing the sailors knew their ship was going to sink when they saw the rats fleeing

In Asia, the rat releases a positive image which radiated as far as Siberia; originally, the Japanese god Daïkoku whose faithful companion was… a rat. Rat which is a sign in Chinese astrology.

Well, that's very nice, but how useful is the rat to us?

Well, precisely to help us recycle the countless waste that urban consumers generate en masse. Remember that nearly half of the world's population lives in urban areas... where the most rats are found.

In Paris alone, it is estimated that the consumption of waste consumed by rats would be around 800 tonnes per day, or 292,000 tonnes per year. For comparison, this is equivalent to more than two incinerators for an annual budget of 188 million euros. Well, at the global level, you can well imagine that we cannot have figures.

Another cause for which the rat serves us well without it bothering us in the least: research. The laboratory rats that we use as consenting guinea pigs (you have to tell me when others cry foul: I don't take sides). And yet, for several years, researchers have been studying the rat and its emotions; thus, without going into long and tedious details, the rat could:

Smile Facial Indicators of Positive Emotions in Rats flee photographs of suffering rats to prefer those of rats at peace Receiving of emotional signal of pain from conspecifics in laboratory rats being sensitive to tickling Effects of repeated tickling on conditioned fear and hormonal responses in socially isolated rats show more interactions with peers when smiling Neural correlates of ticklishness in the rat somatosensory cortex show solidarity with another rat if it has been subjected to a situation of distress (form of empathy?) Rats will help their fellow rats in distress even more quickly if they themselves have been confronted with this situation feel the sensations of orgasm during reproduction… Do rats have orgasms?

Good to finish, I can not miss the culinary talents of the rat:

Here it is: after this little overview, I hope you will see this animal with another eye… or not!

Similar questions

Why can an elephant be trained to be rideable but a giraffe cannot?

Is the elephant the largest land animal?

How smart are elephants?

Are elephants aggressive?

Why can't an elephant jump?

Since the elephant is the most powerful and social animal in the forest, why is

Do grizzly bears fear lions?

Samuel Perloff Nearly 20 years experience Sep 23

Grizzly bears and lions live on nearly opposite sides of the world from each other. At one time, Atlas bears might've encounter Barbary lions. It would've been interesting to imagine their interactions. Asiatic lions still potentially encounter sloth bears in the Gir forests. Both the Asiatic lion and the sloth bear are somewhat smaller than their now-gone cousins in far Northern Africa would've been but also utilize different habitats and have never been documented interacting to my knowledge.

Based on morphology, strength and barbaric animal cage fights, a brown bear would probably be capable of killing and prevail against a single lion in a face-to-face battle. However, lions would have a key advantage, which is clearly their living in prides. A pride of lions, or even just a pair of male lion brothers, would be able to kill an adult bear but it would be a tough enough fight to have given even the "King of the Jungle" pause. However, I have little doubt bears would fear the social big cat if forced to coexist with them.

Related Links

What is a grizzly bear's style of fighting? Could they win against a tiger or a lion?

Who would win in a fight between a lion and a grizzly bear?

Is a polar bear really more dangerous than a grizzly bear?

Do grizzly bears fear people? Why or why not?

Which animal can beat a grizzly bear in a 1 on 1 fight?

Can an African lion kill a grizzly bear with one swipe?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: Reteti's Head Keeper, Leleluk.

Posted by Kathy Pennell Oct 22

“He is most often seen in amongst the herd, moving ,listening and responding to them as if they were an extension of himself.

For the past 5 years, Leleruk has been the rudder of the ship here at Reteti, his guidance steers the keepers and the Sanctuary.

He has a wealth of experience with caring for orphaned elephants, and his leadership... "hakuna ndofu hakuna binadamu" is something you will hear Leleruk say often to explain things to others.

It translates to "if there are no elephants, there are no human beings".

This couldn't be more true for the Samburu who's lives are so intricately woven with the elephants. We are so grateful for his knowledge and kindness which he gives away selflessly to the elephants and keepers of Reteti.

Ashe oleng (thank you), Leleruk!”

Reteti Elephant Sanctuary

ANIMALS In The Wild: What do crocodiles eat?

Waqas Ahmed BS in Zoology (college major) & Science, Government Post Graduate College Mansehra Pakistan (Graduated 2020)2y
Well..Crocs eat:

Crocodiles are carnivores, which mean they eat only meat. In the wild, they feast on fish, birds, frogs and crustaceans. At the zoo, they eat small animals that have already been killed for them, such as rats, fish or mice. They also eat live locusts.

In the wild, crocodiles will clamp down on their prey with their massive jaws, crush it, and then they will swallow the prey whole. They do not have the capability to chew or break off small pieces of food like other animals.

To help with digestion, crocodiles swallow small stones that grind up the food in their stomachs. Thanks to their slow metabolisms, crocodiles can survive for months without food.

Crocs are known to eat hippos child and also prey on human also.

© Barcroft Media

Related Links

Can crocodiles be tamed?

Why are crocodiles dangerous?

Can saltwater crocodiles live in freshwater?

Do killer whales eat saltwater crocodiles?

What happens when a crocodile eats a human?

Can a dolphin kill a crocodile?

Related: Do crocodiles eat other crocodiles?

Waqas Ahmed Former Teacher at The College and University Experience Jul 17

Their prey consists almost exclusively of larger mammals, although they do also eat fish, birds or reptiles as they are opportunistic hunters. "Crocodiles very occasionally turn to cannibalism and eat each other. "They do this when there's an absence of prey or food competition, doing what is necessary to survive.

New Guinea crocodile

Dwarf crocodile

Freshwater crocodile

Morelet’s crocodile

Slender-snouted crocodile

Related Links

Can crocodiles be tamed?

Why are crocodiles dangerous?

Can saltwater crocodiles live in freshwater?

Do killer whales eat saltwater crocodiles?

What happens when a crocodile eats a human?

Can a dolphin kill a crocodile?

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

On Indian Ocean coast of East Africa

Official title of the state - The Republic of Kenya.

Flag description:

Three equal horizontal bands of black (top), red, and green; the red band is edged in white; a large Maasai warrior's shield covering crossed spears is superimposed at the center; black symbolizes the majority population, red the blood shed in the struggle for freedom, green stands for natural wealth, and white for peace; the shield and crossed spears symbolize the defense of freedom.

Neighbours

Uganda on W. Tanzania on S. Somalia on E. Ethiopia, Sudan on N.

Land boundaries; total 3,477 km. Border countries; Ethiopia 861 km, Somalia 682 km, South Sudan 232 km, Tanzania 769 km, Uganda 933 km.

Founder of The Nation
Jomo Kenyatta (known as Mzee)

Local division
47 devolved County governments including the capital (Nairobi)

According to the newly amended constitution of Kenya, the Counties are the newest administrative prefectures created in the most radical reforms in the entire history of decentralisation in Kenya.

Government type
Republic - semi-presdential

Legislation chamber
Unicameral Parliament (Bunge)

Form of State
Republic

Chief of State is the President who is elected every five years

The President is eligible for a second term . A unitary multi-party republic with one legislative house. The parliament (Bunge) 224 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch

Separated by Chief of State and Head of Government.

Chief of State is the President; VP appointed by the Chief of State; President elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms, eligible for a second term. Head of Government is to be appointed as leader of a party held majority seats in the parliament (Bunge). Prime Minister; constitutionally charged with coordinating government business and the Cabinet which is appointed by the President and headed by the Prime Minister. According to the newly approved constitution, 47 County governments would be charged with managing the affaires of the people at the grassroots level. Meaning the 47 governors will be elected directly by the people. They will be "mini-presidents" with powers of control over county finances and administrative functions. The Kenyan President, who is a politician, runs a government through the cabinet and civil service, the county governor will also run the county using the county executive and the county civil service.

Former Rulers

1964 – 1978 Jomo Kenyatta (Mzee)

1978 - 2002 Daniel Toroitich Arap Moi

2002 – 2013 Mwai Kibaki

2013 – present Uhuru Kenyatta

Judicial chamber

High Court - Judje appointed by the president with legislature's approval.

Capital city

Nairobi Altitude 1820 mtrs/5970 ft Geographic coordinates - 1.17S , 36.49E. The name comes from the Massai phrase "Enkare Nyirobi, which translates to "the place of cool waters". Founded in 1899, to become capital of free Kenya Republic in 1962.

Name of main towns

Mombassa, Kisumu, Nakuru, Eldoret, Matchakot.

Date of independence

12, December, 1963.

Religions (Major)

Protestants 45 %, Roman Catholics 33%, Muslim 10 %, traditional belief 10%, others 2%.

Main spoken languages
English (official), Kiswahili (national), various tribal languages.

Currency unit

Kenya Shilling (KeSh)=100 Cents.

Area in Km2

582,646,00

Country area comparison in Africa

23 out of 55 states

Demographic terms

Average annual population growth rate 2.588 %

Birth rate 35.14 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 9.26 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 58.82 years

Male 58.33 years ; Female 59.32 years;

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 22, Female: 30

Average per capita income

USD 1, 600

Population density

68.7/km2

Urban population (%)

22

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishing: 24, Industry: 17, Social service: 59

Main Export Items

Coffee, Tea, Petroleum products, Fruit, Vegetables, Cement minerals.

Economy is based on

Agriculture, Tourism & Light industry

Climate

Hot & Humid coastal, highland semi-desert, etc., varies from tropical along coast to arid in interior.

Extremes;-

Lowesst point; Indian Ocean 0 mtr.

Highest point; Mt. Kenya 5199 mtrs

Weather of the Capital city (Nairobi) average temperature 17.9oc.

Altitude - 1820 mtrs
Hottest Month
February 13-28oc.

Coldest Month
June, July 11-23oc

Driest Month
August 24 mm Av. Rf .

Dry season
15mm

Wet season
211mm.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

3 hours ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays

1st July, October 10, 20 December 12, 25, 26, January 1, Good Friday, Easter Monday, May 1(labour day), June 1, All Muslim holidays.

Ethnic groups

Kikuyu 22%, Luhya 14%, Luo 13%, Kalenjin, 12%, Kamba 11%, Kisii 6%, Meru 6%, others including Asians, Arabs & Europeans 16%.

Topographic & Environmental concern

The Northern three-fifths of Kenya is arid to the low coastal area and plateau varying from 915 mtrs/3,000 ft to 3050 mtrs/10,000 ft. The great rift valley enters the country N to S flanked by high mountains. Environment: Deforestation; soil erosion; desertification; poaching. Bio diversity, climate change, endangered species, Marine dumping, and Shipping pollution, and water pollution from urban and industrial wastes;

Economy Overview

Industry

Tourism, light industries, consumer goods, plastics, furniture, batteries, textiles, clothings, agro-products, horticulture, oil refining, aluminum, steel lead, cement, commercial ship repair.

Chief crops

Coffee, corn, tea, cereals, wheat cotton, sisal, sugarcane, fruit, vegetables, dairy-products, beef, pork, poultry, eggs.

National resources

There is little exploitation of minerals in Kenya. Gold, Limestone, Diatomite, Soda-ash, Salt, Barytes, Manganese, Gem-stones, Fluorspar, Zinc, Gypsum, Wildlife, Hydro-power.
Other resources

Timber, Hides & skin.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 8

Grassland: 65

Forest woods: 5

Other: 22

Marine:

Coastline; 536 km.

Commercial Sea port:- The port of Mombasa is not only Kenya's main and largest port but is a busiest port on the East African coast, and port of Kisumu. The Kenyan government plans to build a new port at Lamu to relieve the overcrowded port of Mombasa. A third port at Lamu proposed in 2011 and it expects the first Ship to call there before the end of 2012.

Development prospect;-

Kenya is struggling to restore economic growth to levels last seen in the boom years before 2007. Just as Kenyans were getting used to living in an improving economy, with growth of 5.6 percent in 2010, soaring inflation and a weakening Kenya shilling looked set to end the goodtimes in 2011. Despite a more optimistic forecast by the IMF, planning minister Wycliffe Oparanya estimated GDP growth for 2011 down to 4 percent in October, and he forecast between 4-5 percent for 2012. This slowing may result in fewer employment opportunities and lower living standards. The economic outlook thus seemed likely to put a damper on President Kibaki's last year in office and heighten debate over prospects for the majority of Kenyans. Gaps between the top and low earners and among the ethnic communities are in danger of widening again. Inflation was running at 18.9 percent in September, up from 5.4 percent in January, on reduced supply of food items, expensive energy and the weak shilling, which lost 25 percent against the dollar. Depressed economic spirits spawned a free fall in share prices at the Nairobi Securities Exchange. Planned investment in 2012 could also be put on hold because of concerns about a repeat of ethnic violence that followed the previous vote in 2007. Already, foreign investors have reduced their participation in Kenya's red-hot property market and in the NSE; dealers expect them to remain mute in 2012 on increased political risks. "Strong policies are urgently needed to improve the outlook and to reduce the risks," said central bank governor Prof. Njuguna Ndung'u. "Decisive and immediate action is required from the monetary policy side to stem these inflationary pressures, stabilise the exchange rate and re-establish a healthy growth base." Poor rainfall during the long rainy season from March through May – a vital period for farming – has damaged crops in an economy that derives almost a quarter of its GDP from agriculture. This implies that East Africa's largest economy will face acute supply shortage in the foods where a price rally has become one of the major drivers of inflation in the country. Inflation is expected to breach the 20 percent mark in the first quarter of 2012, leaving consumers with lower disposable incomes to spend on airtime, clothing and beer. Lower farm earnings from a sector that offers employment to a significant number of Kenyans will aggravate the sagging demand for goods, which slowed growth in the industrial sector to 3 percent in the second quarter compared to 4.9 percenct in a similar period a year earlier. Thanks in part to the strength of the dollar against the shilling, the main foreign exchange earners, tea, horticulture and tourism, performed well, but the upbeat performance of the export business has not helped support the shilling against major global currencies because of rising demand for dollars to import fuel and machinery for the construction and energy sectors. As the trade deficit widened, the shilling moved above Ksh100to the dollar compared to Ksh80 at the start of the year, and the ongoing currency woes and high inflation seem set to curtail growth.

What is it like to live in Nairobi, Kenya?

Victor Makau

Lives in Nairobi, Kenya (2017–present)4y

I will try to be as honest as possible so that you get an accurate picture of the city.

First of all,some bio about Nairobi.The name is derived from a Maasai word Ewaso Naiberi meaning a place of cool waters. It has a population of roughly 4 million people,most of whom are from several parts of the country while others are visitors from other countries. People from different races and backgrounds coexist well here,as there is virtually no form of racism.

If you are white person in Nairobi, expect to receive some form of special treatment from the locals. It could be because Nairobians are innately patronising ,but I think we have a sense that you guys are “superior”, for lack of a better word.I would attribute this to a mentality of the colonial times.

Nairobi life is an interesting oxymoron. In the western parts are the high-end ,posh areas and the East of Nairobi mainly consist of the less affluent estates and some slums.The Nairobi Central Business District is not very flashy ,but its decent enough.

One outstanding thing in Nairobi are its matatus-which are the major means of public transport within the city.If you do not own a private automobile,you will most likely find yourself commuting in one of these beasts:

hey feature loud music so be ready to have your ears taken for a treat.

Okay this is quite something-It is the only capital city in the world that boasts of National park within its boundaries-Nairobi National park.That means you can enjoy a serenic view of lions and elephants and cheetahs and other fauna without leaving the city.But don’t worry,it is not that dangerous.

Generally,I would give Nairobi a 6/10.

And if you have not been here,pay a visit and I promise you won't be disappointed.

Related Answer

What is it like to live in Nairobi, Kenya?

Kie Ayanga

Busy by day... dead by night and a bit dangerous too especially the affluent suburbs so avoid late night parties in such areas. Arranging for extra security is a wise idea. Do not depend on the police or the emergency services to save you in time. Too much traffic in the evenings from 5pm up to 8pm. While motoring, do not stop for strangers or if you are bumped in the back if unsure of your security. All types of good oriental and continental restaurants and coffee houses around. Pretty good international and local hotels around. Cool women- an independent well exposed middle class. Lower than that and your in trouble. Do not drink and drive at night without sufficient knowledge of back roads- the cops will not accept bribes. There are no high tech night clubs- only bars, lounges and bistros. Meat loving football crazy country. Avoid malls on weekends. Nice country for out of town off road excursions. No asphalt tracks for motorsport enthusiasts. No cool sports arenas or championships either- no investment in leagues. Decent housing is not a problem. Decent schools and hospitals but healthcare is still not first class in terms of accurate first time diagnosis and prognosis of complicated conditions. What else ummmmmm..... Golf and country clubs are pretty decent. Casinos not so big like in other parts of the world.... A lot of festivals of the arts occur quite often and the theater/auditorium is very active and lively . Cant really call nairobi an entertainment capital but the weather is good all year round

Related Links

What advice would you give to someone who is moving to Nairobi, Kenya?

What is the average living cost in Nairobi, Kenya?

What is it like to live in Kenya?

How safe is Nairobi for Indians, and what safety instruction you will give?

Kenya: Is 500000 KSH per month a good salary to live in nairobi?

What is a good salary for expats in Nairobi, Kenya?

What are some disadvantages of living in Kenya (Nairobi)?

Is there any IKEA store in Nairobi?

Is life hard in Nairobi, Kenya?

How is life in Nairobi?

What is the longest Olympic winning streak for a nation in a particular sport?

John Ferguson

.

Follow

Top Writer 2018 Updated 10mo

Kenya has won every men's Steeplechase race since the 1984 Olympics in Los Angeles. That's ten consecutive Golds.

EDIT: This is what's called "The Commentator's Curse". A few days after I wrote this, Kenya lost their streak at Tokyo 2020, finishing 3rd behind Morocco and Ethiopia.

But for sheer, across-the-board dominance of a sport, it's hard to look beyond Table Tennis for China.

Since being entered into the Olympics for the first time in 1988, the Chinese have dominated the sport, winning 28 of the 33 available Gold medals, including every Gold in the women's singles, every Gold in the men's doubles (contested up to 2004) and men's team tournament (contested from 2008 onwards), and every Gold from 1992 onwards in the women's doubles and women's team tournament. It's only the men's singles where China haven't had it all their own way… but they've still won six of the nine Olympic Golds.

They have also won 18 of the 33 Silver medals, producing several Chinese one-two finishes. Until the IOC actually limited the number of athletes any nation could send to the tournament to two, exclusively Chinese podiums were not uncommon.

Related Links

Which is the longest winning streak in any sport?

What is the longest goalie win streak?

Are gold medals or total medals a better indicator of a country's success at an Olympic Games?

What are the least popular Olympic sports? Why are they unpopular?

Who holds the longest undefeated winning streak in boxing?

How much money do you get for winning an Olympic medal? Why do Olympic champions bite their medals? What is the reason behind this?

How does a country benefit from winning a lot of medals at the Olympics?

How can India win medals at Olympics?

What is the longest individual winning streak in Olympic swimming?

Who has the longest undefeated streak in boxing?

Orphaned Baby Giraffe Makes Friends With Baby Elephants Just Like Him

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Posted by

Kathy Pennell

Jun 7

Kiko the baby giraffe was found was found wandering alone in Meru National Park in Kenya by people traveling through the park. They knew the newborn animal needed immediate aid if he was to survive.

After coordinating with the Meru Mobile Veterinary Unit, a rescue team from the David Sheldrick Wildlife Trust (DSWT) was mobilized to get him from Meru Naitonal Park and to their Nairobi Nursery.

The orphaned giraffe was specially flown to the nursery where he was immediately fed and given the care he needed to survive.

He loves his keepers and has made friends with two of the orphaned baby elephants who have recently arrived at DSWT.

Loboito is just 3 weeks old and has grown quite attached to Kiko and follows him around wherever he goes.

Neither animal would have survived without the help of the keepers at the park and the efforts of the David Sheldrick Wildlife Trust.

Source: Elephant Lover

Orphaned Baby Giraffe Makes Friends With Elephant Elephants Just Like Him - us.35express.org
https://us.35express.org/orphaned-baby-giraffe-makes-friends-with-baby-elephants-just-like-him/?fbclid=IwAR1vAmwU7HAjhGW23e49lGk4NbnyqcVuqTHqtUgTpeiJUbb0PG1cuodk25A

Who has ever heard of the Maasai tribe in East Africa?

Olivier Chouraki

Animals lover19 Jan

"Day 3: We visited the Maasai village of Esilalei. The teacher, Leapa, showed us around the school, where he teaches Swahili, English, maths, to 125 students, either in the classroom or at the foot of the giant tree that gives the village its name. We saw a woman "repainting" a hut with Maasai cement, made of cow dung, earth and water. The huts are round, made of wood and "cement", covered with straws. We visited a hut. They have large huts for humans, and small huts for baby animals, lambs and kids. Adult animals are led by the Maasai to the pastures during the day, then returned for the night to an enclosure formed by acacia branches with large spines that protect from leopards, lions and hyenas. The Maasai live mainly from raising cows. They drink a lot of milk, which they keep in gourds made of a hollowed out calabash, often decorated with pearls. The village chief is very rich, he has more than 2000 cows. He has 20 wives and 70 children. He had this school built for them. When he marries a woman, from the age of 16, he gives 3 to 5 cows to his parents. The Maasai danced and sang for us, and we sang and danced with them, the women facing the men. Then we bought them handicrafts, pearl bracelets, etc. Then we went to Manyara Park, we visited marshes, forest and the shores of the Salt Lake of Manyara. We saw hippos, buffaloes, blue monkeys, a monitor lizard, storks, pelicans, and all kinds of birds. In addition to all the usual animals, elephants, zebras, giraffes, wildebeest, monkeys, warthogs, impalas, ... which are for us now like pigeons and sparrows. We went shopping in a shop and bought treasures, especially ebony carved objects."

Similar questions

Almost every black and African man I know desires a non-black woman. Many have told me that they don't want a black partner. This seems to me to be internal racism. Does racism exist between black men and women?

Is Africa poor because of colonization? If colonization had never taken place, how would Africa look?

Who were the Berbers, who lived in North Africa, long before the Arabs arrived?

What are the disadvantages of colonization in Africa?

With 50,000 FCFA what can we invest here in Senegal?

Has colonization also had positive effects on Africa?

Which countries in Africa are the richest, and what is the main source of their wealth?

What can the France do to counter China's rise in Africa?

The only advanced ancient civilizations in Africa were in North Africa, while there were virtually none in sub-Saharan Africa. Because of that, I'm starting to hate being black. Is it wrong?

Why is Africa on the margins of development?

What do people in Kenya typically eat?

Silantoi Olting'idi

Lives in Nairobi, KenyaUpdated Apr 13

1. Ugali

There are several staple foods we eat in Kenya. One of the most popular is Ugali. Otherwise known as cornmeal. It is normally white but can be yellow if mixed with spices, or brown if it undergoes minimal processing. Most of our meals serve greens.

Ugali is eaten alongside greens & protein as seen in the photos below;

Ugali, Kale(Sukuma) & Stewed Fish & grated Carrots

USA (Ugali, Sukuma & Avocado). Very popular in Kenyan Colleges

Ugali, Sukuma & Fried Egg/Omlette

Ugali can be eaten for lunch or dinner depending on preference. I personally find it very heavy. So I slate it for weekends.

2. Rice

Pilau Rice: Meat and rice cooked in Swahili spices

3. Chapatti :

Made from wheat.

It can be eaten with any type of stew & vegetables.

4. Githeri: Beans & corn. It's boiled first till tender. Then it is sauteed and seasoned(optional). Best eaten with avocado & vegetables. Some people add potatoes but I find this too starchy.

There’s a lot more to what we eat in Kenya but these are the popular ones.

Choma Ugali & Kachumbari

Edit.

I can’t believe I forgot to add this!! Kenyans LOVE beef!! Choma is beef roasted/barbecued over open fire or charcoal. No spice, only salt. Afternoon hangouts with the boys at the local joint, normally watching European football, are not complete without Ugali and choma!

I do not own any of the photos used.

Related Links

Do people from Kenya eat pork?

What are some traditional foods from Kenya?

What are some popular street foods in Kenya?

What do you eat for lunch in Kenya?

What two regional foods would you recommend to any visitor going to Kenya?

What are the must eat foods in Kenya and Tanzania?

What do Kenyan people eat?

What are native fruits in Kenya?

What's a typical meal in Kenya?

What are the foods usually eaten for lunch and dinner in Kenya?

Kenya calls for immediate deployment of regional force to eastern Congo
Wednsday: 8:47 PM

KINSHASA (Reuters) - Kenya's President Uhuru Kenyatta on Wednesday called for the immediate deployment of a new regional military force to try to stop rebel violence in eastern Democratic Republic of Congo.

The seven countries of the East African Community (EAC), which Congo joined this year, agreed in April to set up a joint force but had not specified when it might be deployed.

"The East African Regional Force shall be deployed to the Ituri, North Kivu and South Kivu provinces immediately to stabilize the zone and enforce peace in support of the DRC security forces and in close coordination with MONUSCO (UN peacekeeping force)," Kenyatta said in a statement.

His call comes against the backdrop of a major offensive in eastern Congo by the M23 rebel group, which on Monday seized a strategic town on the Ugandan border.

The offensive by the M23, whose last major insurrection captured swaths of the eastern Congo countryside in 2012 and 2013, has rekindled tensions between Congo and neigbouring Rwanda. Congo accuses Rwanda of supporting the M23, including by sending its own troops across the border. Rwanda denies this.

The precise composition of the EAC force, including whether it would include Rwandan soldiers, has not been announced.

Rwanda and Uganda invaded Congo twice in the 1990s, leading to wars that sucked in more than half a dozen regional countries, cost millions of lives and spawned militias that remain active to this day.

Kenya said preparations for the deployment should be finalised at a meeting of regional commanders in Nairobi on Sunday.

It was not clear from Kenyatta's statement whether Congo had approved the deployment. Congolese authorities could not be immediately reached for comment.

Uganda deployed troops to eastern Congo last year to conduct joint operations with Congolese soldiers against a Ugandan Islamist militia active in North Kivu and Ituri provinces.

(Reporting by Fiston Mahamba and Djaffar Al Katanty; Writing by Nellie Peyton; editing by Aaron Ross and Richard Pullin)

CPJ joins letter calling on Kenya to ensure internet access is maintained throughout election

Kenya's President Uhuru Kenyatta is seen in Nairobi on April 29, 2022. CPJ recently joined a letter calling on Kenyatta and other officials to maintain internet access throughout the upcoming elections. (AP/Khalil Senosi)

In a joint letter addressed to Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta on Tuesday, June 21, the Committee to Protect Journalists joined 51 other organizations calling on authorities to ensure free and secure internet access during the country's upcoming general elections, scheduled for August 9.

The organizations, all members of the #KeepItOn Coalition against internet shutdowns, note that the internet and social media platforms "play a critical role in enhancing participatory governance" and guaranteeing rights enshrined in Kenya's constitution.

The letter acknowledges that, while officials have made public commitments not to interfere with internet connectivity during the elections, "attempts to exert control over information flow" had been seen during previous elections.

During and after Kenya's last general elections in 2017, CPJ documented press freedom violations that included assault and harassment of journalists, and a shutdown of major broadcasters.

The letter, also copied to other senior government officials and telecom operators, is available here.

Odinga's running mate in Kenyan election promises corruption crackdown if elected

NAIROBI (Reuters) - The alliance led by Kenyan presidential candidate Raila Odinga will come down hard on corruption if it wins in August, his running mate Martha Karua said, but dismissed her nickname "Iron Lady" as a sexist trope directed at tough women leaders.

"Strong leadership in women is seen as an exception and not the norm because I haven't heard of an 'iron man'," the 64-year-old former justice minister told Reuters in an interview.

© Reuters/THOMAS MUKOYAInterview with Martha Karua, Kenya's opposition leader Raila Odinga's running mate, in Nairobi

Karua and veteran opposition leader Odinga, who heads the Azimio La Umoja One Kenya Alliance coalition, are facing off with Deputy President William Ruto and first time lawmaker Rigathi Gachagua, in an election on Aug. 9.

The election is seen as a key test for stability for East Africa's biggest economy. Two of its three last elections were marred by violence, amid disputes over alleged rigging.

Since Karua's selection as his running mate, Odinga has overtaken Ruto in opinion polls. A Radio Africa poll, published on June 13, put Odinga ahead with 44.6% of voters favouring him against 38.9% for Ruto.

In his campaign Ruto has largely focused on economic inequality, pledging to lift up Kenya's poorest whom he calls "hustlers".

Karua, who would be Kenya's first female deputy president if elected, said Azimio's priority once in power would be to stamp out corruption, which is estimated to cost the government a third of its budget every year, about 800 billion shillings ($6.83 billion).

She said the funds lost each year would be enough to fund her coalition's plan to offer direct monthly support to 2 million of Kenya's poorest people.

"Corruption is strangling or choking the nation," she said at her NARC-Kenya party office.

TOUGH

A former political prisoner, Odinga, 77, ran his previous four races as an anti-establishment candidate, but now he has teamed up with outgoing President Uhuru Kenyatta whose ruling Jubilee Party is also part of his alliance.

Kenyatta, who must stand down after serving the maximum of two five-year terms, opted to back Odinga against his deputy Ruto, with whom he had a falling out.

In Odinga's last three campaigns for office in 2007, 2013, and 2017, he challenged the outcomes, saying his victories were stolen. Deadly clashes followed the 2007 and 2017 votes.

Kenya is East Africa's most well-off and stable nation and a close Western ally that hosts the regional headquarters of international firms like Alphabet Inc (GOOGL.O).

But public debt has more than tripled by 7 trillion shillings ($61.32 billion) since Kenyatta assumed office in 2013, pushing against the nation's debt ceiling.

"Our intention is to renegotiate the debt and make them long term so that we are able to meet our obligations," Karua said.

She said Azimio also wants closer scrutiny of private wealth of public sector workers and political leaders, adding that tackling corruption was the only way to fix the country.

"It is governance, stupid!" she said, adapting a well-known line from an advisor of former U.S. president Bill Clinton.

Odinga has already designated Karua as his justice minister if they win. Over the years she has earned the nickname Kenyan "Iron Lady" for her determination, starting with her victory over a powerful former civil service head during her first parliamentary election in 1992.

In 2001, she defiantly walked out of a rally by former authoritarian president Daniel arap Moi, after she was denied a chance to speak.

She also left the cabinet after six years in 2009 because of differences with the then government of President Mwai Kibaki on human rights, tackling corruption and judicial appointments.

Among her achievements Karua said she counted her role in helping to lay the ground for Kenya's constitutional charter and fighting for multi-party democracy as a lawyer in the early 1990s.

Karua said she learnt early lessons on taking responsibility from her paternal grandmother in a rural county near Mt. Kenya where she grew up on a farm and took care of her younger siblings while also attending school.

"I'm grateful for that sort of upbringing. I'm not able not to give a 100 or 102%. Work is in me," she said.

($1 = 117.1000 Kenyan shillings)

(Reporting by Duncan Miriri; Editing by Raissa Kasolowsky)

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD:

Enormous Nile Crocodile Attacks a Wildebeest Crossing the Mara River.

Follow

Posted by

Jo Mburu

Mon

Crocodiles have impressive sophisticated hearts (only reptile with a four chambered heart as opposed to 3) that help make crocodile`s digestion the most efficient in the animal kingdom . After a meal , a crocodile's heart directs deoxygenated blood , rich in acidic carbon dioxide , to the stomach . The blood stimulates the production of the most acidic gastric juices known in nature , which can easily dissolve bones and hooves . This incredible system means crocodiles can secrete stomach acid 10 times faster than any other animal . They also shallow small stones called gastroliths to help improve digestion . Those stones can remain inside the crocodile`s stomach for years .

Photo source . Walla1890/Reddit .

Can a lion bring down a giraffe?

Matthew

.

Follow

Tue

Yes, absolutely. Although, giraffe isn't the preferred prey of lions, they will occasionally hunt them. There are a few documented incidents of a single male lion bringing down a fully-grown giraffe by itself. These incidents are quite rare, but they do happen.

Joseph Eidos

.

Follow

Holder of Random Knowledge3y

Related

Can a giraffe kill a lion?

Absolutely, the horns on that giraffe arent just for show, they use those things by literally swinging their heads and ramming their horns into their unfortunate victim causing enough force to possibly even break bone…

Not only that but a male giraffe weights up to about 1800 pounds which is more than 4 times what a male lion can (400 pounds), so one stomp from a giraffe in the right place might also do the trick…

As flimsy and gentle as a giraffe may look they shouldnt be underestimated, they can be some deadly mother@$!#*% if the need may rise…

For lions, which prey is harder to take down, an elephant or a giraffe?

Ansh Badal

Seen leopards, tigers and dholes(and now lions!) in the wild8mo

Killing an elephant is much harder. Giraffes can kick, but they can be toppled over by lions, even adults. Elephants are much more stable, even a weakened subadult needs much more effort than a full grown giraffe.

Giraffes are both too tall and unstable, and have a long neck. Elephants have literally no neck at all! Lions have to work harder to topple it and even harder to suffocate it.

That's why adult elephants, let alone tuskers, are always off the diet, while even full grown giraffes are hunted by lions. Even the subadult elephants are more difficult to hunt than giraffes.

Do lions avoid attacking giraffes?

Abhisek Mallick

.

Follow

master of surgery in Master of Surgery & Toxicology, Andhra Medical College Vishakapatnam8mo

Lions often kill other predators, such as lions, hyenas, and giraffes, cheetahs, but they rarely eat them.The main predators of giraffes are lions. They attack giraffe cubs as well as adults. More than half of giraffe cubs never reach adulthood, and lion extinction may be the leading cause of death.

People rarely see these attacks. Lions hunt subspecies and adult giraffes. Lions are carnivores. They eat almost anything they can control. Yes, lions eat giraffes like many other animals like deer, buffalo, wild beast, zebra.A giraffe can kick in any direction and manner, and it is known not only to kill a lion with its foot but also to behead.There are certain predators of giraffes, their primary predators are lions. Lions use the power of total pride to capture their prey, but giraffes are also preyed upon by leopards and hyenas.

Related Links

What exactly makes the lion the king of the jungle? I'm not even sure lions are the strongest animals.

Who will win a fight between a tiger and a lion?

Will a giraffe survive if he is attacked by a lion or a tiger?

Can a giraffe kill a lion?

Who would win a fight between a lion and an elephant?

Who will win between a giraffe and a lion?

How can a giraffe protect itself from a lion or other predators?

How do zoos get rid of the remains of dead large animals like elephants or giraffes?

How is it possible that a 400 pound lion can kill a nearly 4,000 pound bull giraffe?

Zoology: How could giraffes survive with lions as neighbors in Africa?

What bird is faster than an eagle?

Journey into the Wild
Answered by

Birender Sharma

Jun 17

Yes. The Peregrine falcon is the fastest bird – and in fact the fastest animal on Earth – when in a dive. As it executes this dive, the Peregrine falcon soars to a great height, then dives steeply at speeds of over 200 miles (320 km) per hour.

These gorgeous birds are small but they are the fastest breeds of flying birds and they can travel up to 390/hour.

pinterest images.

Related Links

What wild animal has the most interesting fur markings?

Can you share a picture of a thunderstorm?

Can you fish without bait?

Can you share a creek nestled in a fantasy paradise?

Can you share a poem which contains animals or nature?

Can you share an amazing smiles from wildlife animals that brightens your day?

Can you share a night view landscape photography of any region?

Are there any thing to be caught for dinner inside ocean tide pools?

What is the smartest land animal there is?

Can you share a kodak moment?

Can you share an ancient legend or supernatural event of the past?

Can you share a road sign in the wild?

What is one of your favorite hoofed animals?

Can you share a rare reptile?

What is your animal fun fact of the Day?

What bird is faster than an eagle?

Journey into the Wild
Answered by

Birender Sharma

Jun 17

Yes. The Peregrine falcon is the fastest bird – and in fact the fastest animal on Earth – when in a dive. As it executes this dive, the Peregrine falcon soars to a great height, then dives steeply at speeds of over 200 miles (320 km) per hour.

These gorgeous birds are small but they are the fastest breeds of flying birds and they can travel up to 390/hour.

pinterest images.

Related Links

What wild animal has the most interesting fur markings?

Can you share a picture of a thunderstorm?

Can you fish without bait?

Can you share a creek nestled in a fantasy paradise?

Can you share a poem which contains animals or nature?

Can you share an amazing smiles from wildlife animals that brightens your day?

Can you share a night view landscape photography of any region?

Are there any thing to be caught for dinner inside ocean tide pools?

What is the smartest land animal there is?

Can you share a kodak moment?

Can you share an ancient legend or supernatural event of the past?

Can you share a road sign in the wild?

What is one of your favorite hoofed animals?

Can you share a rare reptile?

What is your animal fun fact of the Day?

Why is Kenya a developing country?

Kirtan Patel

Born and raised in Kenya Updated 4y

I spent the first 20 years of my life in Kenya. Throughout those 20 years here is what I have observed:

1. Income inequality between the rich and poor is quite high. I'm not saying other countries don't have that kind of inequality. A lot of countries have that problem. Even China has that problem even though it's the 2nd largest economy of the world by GDP.
2. Corrupt politicians. This point is pretty self explanatory. Being a politician is the best career in Kenya if you want to make a lot of money in a short time.
3. Kenya needs good quality education facilities. Our universities and public schools need massive upgrades. We need to fund a lot of research to solve our country's problems. If we could invent M-Pesa we can do anything.
4. Kenyan youth have access to very limited economic opportunities. A person who wants to start a business will find it extremely difficult to find affordable loans. Average interest rates are above 15%. That's a very high cost of debt.
5. Insecurity and corrupt police force. A lot of reforms needed in the Kenyan police including upgrades to intelligence gathering and forensics to catch criminals.

Despite of all this I see a lot of potential in Kenya. It's GDP has been growing steadily after the post election violence. Kenya is the gateway to East Africa. There is a huge potential in tourism. If Dubai can achieve it Kenya can surely make tourism the major income earner of Kenya.

The reason why Kenya is still a developing country is because it has a lot of reforms that need to be implemented before it becomes developed. We will get there, someday, hopefully.

Related Links

Why is Kenya considered a Third World country?

What country is poorer than most people think?

Why is Kenya more famous than most other African countries?

How is Kenya as a country? Is it better than India?

How did Japan become a highly developed country?

Is Turkey considered a developed or a developing country?

Is Russia considered a developing or developed country?

How much chance is it for a poor country to become a developed country?

Why hasn't Africa developed as well as other continents?

Which country is richer, Ghana or Kenya?

Why don't wild animals attack a safari vehicle filled with humans?

Info Orb
Answered by

Mathew P. Vanderburg

Tue

One day, I was in an open safari vehicle, sitting very close to watch a fully grown leopard, the guide suddenly opened the door and got out of the vehicle. The leopard's attitude immediately changed. Hearing the guide's rustling footsteps in the grass, the leopard went from being completely relaxed and ignoring us, to suddenly getting angry. Very scary.

Suddenly the leopard jumped up and made one swift jump ... to disappear into the bushes.

He didn't attack us and instead ran

Open safari vehicles have no protection against predators who intend to attack vehicle occupants. If a lion or leopard wanted to jump into the vehicle to start having a good meal, it could easily do so.

But that didn't happen.

Why are there thousands of open-air vehicles passing through safari every day in different parts of Africa, and we hardly ever hear of predators attacking people in safari vehicles?

The answer is a combination of two things.

First, the vehicle, and the people in it, are not prey for these predators. Predators don't see it as food, and in most cases don't see it as a threat either.

And the second reason why predators don't attack humans in vehicles is because wild animals are afraid of humans by nature. Humans are at the top of the food chain, and wild animals know that. In most cases, a predator will flee from even a single human who approaches it on foot. And if there are humans in a crowd, their natural fear of humans is multiplied.

But when humans stay in the vehicle, they are less afraid because they don't recognize it as a vehicle full of people. Sometimes predators approach open safari vehicles without fear or desire to attack. In many national parks, predators are used to vehicles and will not mind having a safari vehicle very close to them.

Of course, there are some exceptions.

There are special cases where predators attack humans in vehicles. In most of these cases, wild animals were raised by humans, or indeed grew up in captivity. They may not be wild predators by nature, but they have lost their natural fear of humans, or been overfed by humans. In such cases, predators have learned to associate humans with food.

And in one or two cases that I know of, animals are not fed or raised by humans but are very old, sick, or seriously injured. Old and injured animals can become very dangerous and act unexpectedly.

In one such case several years ago, an elderly male leopard, unable to escape from a viewing vehicle that was constantly harassing him and intruding on his privacy, the old leopard attacked a guide whose arm was hanging out of the window, and bit his arm. . But such occurrences are very, very rare.

I've been in the safari industry for many years and we've done thousands of open-air safaris, and seen thousands of incredible predators, many of them we've seen up close. Not once did a predator try to attack any of our vehicles or the people in them.

Statistically, you're much, much safer in an open-air safari vehicle inside a national park surrounded by wild animals than when you're on a big city highway where you could die in a car crash.

Related Links

For flat earthers, what would the movement of the Earth be like, in such a way that there are hours of light and hours of darkness, days and nights?

If the Earth had a cubic shape, what would happen if you walked along one of the edges?

Why haven't anesthetics for vaccinations been developed yet, so that patients don't feel pain while getting vaccinated?

What is the first sentence spoken in the history of mankind?

Why doesn't gravity act on fire?

What is the most curious island in the world?

Why did humans lose the staff (penile bone)?

What are the vestigial organs that nowadays cause discomfort to have them?

Is a turtle without a shell naked or homeless?

Can a turtle lose its shell?

What are the top 5 things women wish men knew about a woman's body because explaining them to a man can be embarrassing?

What are the most Chinese things in history?

What is the most curious fact you have about a celebrity?

What is the animal that has the strangest color?

What is the most amazing thing you know about any animal species?

Multimedia Journalist | ATS Compliant CV & Cover Letter writer | LinkedIn Profile Optimization

23h • 23 hours ago
President Uhuru Kenyatta advised Kenyan men to prioritise their wives if they want to succeed and be prosperous in life.
Kenyatta said spending money on mistresses is a recipe for poverty and hopelessness in their children's future.

"You get your money, you start spending it on the other woman. You forget the woman you left at home and later, you leave your family broke. Men, please, let us change," the president added.
Photo: State House Kenya

#africa #kenya #marriage

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD

Follow Posted by Jo Mburu

Thu
Mother cheetah was captured chasing a lion after it tried to kill her cubs in Kenya's Masai Mara National Reserve.

Photo by Kisemei Saruni.

https://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-10107259/Brave-cheetah

Kathy Pennell

.

Follow

Author, 12 Young Adult Mysteries, 1 Adult Mystery at Lancaster County, PA (2000–present)Tue

A king of the Mara meets his match

This lion, named Sikio Kali, is one of the Mara's famous four Musketeers. He recently got on the wrong side of a warthog's tusks during a predation attempt, leaving him with a deep wound to his forehead. Taking down prey is not without risk for lions, as warthogs can inflict nasty gashes with their tusks (as can buffalo and wildebeest with their horns). In this case, Masai Mara Reserve rangers spotted Sikio's plight just in time, as his wounds were septic and covered in maggots.

After receiving the call for help and rushing to the scene, the SWT/KWS Mara Mobile Vet Unit found the lion lying in the shade, trying to shield his face from flies. The intervention came not a moment too soon for Sikio, as vets manually cleaned and disinfected his wounds, before administering drugs to aid healing. Subsequent sightings have shown him recovering well, although this battle-worn fellow – who is already missing most of his left ear – will look even more distinctive as he waits for the centre of his mane to grow back.

Helping injured animals is all in a days' work for the SWT/KWS Mobile Vet Teams but we also work to help threatened ecosystems too.

Source: WAR-Wildlife at Risk

WILD. Tue

Lionesses often synchronize their birth .

Jo Mburu

.

Follow
Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE

The female lions from the same group give birth close to each other . All the cubs then are the same age and all the lioness can nurse them, assuring they are fed. If a mother lioness has less milk than her cub needs, it can get it from other recent mothers.That the synchronized birth has an added benefit that the cubs will be protected while one of the lionesses goes hunting.

Photo source . Reddit/pardusco

Jo Mburu

.

Follow

Founder of PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD. Thu

A young Frogmouth peeking out of its mother's feathers.

Frogmouths are found in India , Asia and Australia . They mate for life , frogmouth pairs are so close that they evict their offspring and spend the rest of their lives close together , perching trees leaning against and grooming each other

Photo by @yfenglim Explore .

Did Prince Philip have a long history of racist and problematic language stretching back nearly 40 years?

Ephraim Kimani Njeru

.

Follow Lived in Nairobi, Kenya (2019–2020)1y

I would not know much about him and the royal family outside Kenya, but I know a bit about him in Kenya.

He was beside Princess Elizabeth, just the two of them up-close, in a Kenyan forest when he broke the news of her father's death. At least that's how the story goes.

The royal family did a lot to end the Mau Mau bloodshed. Shockingly, they were more neutral and surprised British settlers by treating them as equal to black Kenyans. British settlers believed black skin was some incurable sickness that made Africans incapable of making a proper political judgment. The Queen didn't seem sure about that. I know because London representatives trashed settler political ideology at the Lancaster house. I know because of the ridiculous setup of the Legislative Co. from the 1920s to 40s (that British settlers were monsters). I know because in 1957 someone very powerful in the British government was sick and tired of the Mau Mau bloodshed. The rebels were losing but someone up there said "enough" to the British army. I know it's not the governor because of the videos before and after the cession of hostilities, with the governor calling for "more force". Someone more senior ended the bloodshed, though I don't know who.

But perhaps the most provocative image I will remember him for is this

I didn't even know this happened. This appeared on the internet after his death.

Kenya had just become a republic in 1964 (Jamhuri), the Prince represented the queen at the occasion. At the ball, he picked Tom Mboya's wife for a dance. The problem is, she was BLACK. In 1964, British settlers would have never done that, unless she was the first lady. After all, they had superior blood. But the Prince did, much to their displeasure. It was a day for black freedom, he might have reasoned. The Queen through the British government and her special envoy ceased to be Kenya's commander in chief and vowed to respect Kenyan sovereignty, and come to our aid when in need. Almost sixty years later, I feel they have kept their oath with great honor. The least troublesome government in the west to our relentless Kenyan values.

It's interesting how the little acts of nobility we do, linger on even after we are gone. Rest in peace Prince Philip.

Related Links

Is Prince Philip genuinely racist or ironically racist?

Why is Prince Philip, as Queen Elizabeth II's husband, not titled "King"? And why is he not next in line for the throne (after Elizabeth) instead of their son, Prince Charles?

Is Prince Phillip the most racist member of the UK Royal Family?

Is Prince Philip really racist?

What do people in the U.K. think about Prince Philip?

Why isn't Prince Philip the King of the UK when his wife is the Queen?

Is Princess Anne a racist?

Why is Prince Philip so renowned even though he has said and done so many outrageous, inappropriate things?

As the former Prince of Greece, does Prince Philip speak or at least understand some modern Greek?

Could Prince Philip be quite soft-hearted under his brusque exterior? Are there

LESOTHO

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

It is an enclave within the “Republic of South Africa”. The kingdom of Lesotho was founded by Moshoeshoe I a 19th century leader faced by Boer encroachment onto Basotho grazing lands from one direction, and violent population upheavals precipitated by the military rise of Shaka Zulu in Natal from another. Moshoeshoe I, then a minor chief, initially led his people to a mountain refuge where they established a new settlement; subsequently he established a policy of affording haven to refugees willing to help with defence. In 1824 he shifted his headquarters to a more easily defensible hilltop called Thaba-Bosiu. From the 1830s onwards, Moshoeshoe I began to welcome Christian missionaries into his newly established kingdom as potential allies.

Under Moshoeshoe I the Basotho - who had adopted horses and guns from their erstwhile opponents - inflicted some sharp defeats on their European enemies. But in 1868 the King felt obliged to seek British protection from Boer encroachments. The Kingdom of Lesotho (previously the Basutoland Protectorate) became independent on 4 October 1966 as a constitutional monarchy with a parliament elected by universal suffrage. The Prime Minister at independence was Chief Jonathan of the Basotho National Party (BNP). At the first post-independence elections in 1970, Chief Jonathan, anticipating defeat by the opposition Basutoland Congress Party (BCP), declared a state of emergency and suspended the constitution. He was overthrown in a military coup in 1986. A Military Council ruled Lesotho until a General Election was held in March 1993, when all seats were won by the BCP. However against the background of unrest in the armed forces the constitution was suspended and parliament dissolved for several months in the next year. King Moshoeshoe II, who had been dethroned by the Military Council in 1990, returned to the throne from exile in the UK in January 1995. A year later he was killed in a car accident. On the advice of the College of Chiefs, King Letsie, who had reigned during his father’s exile, succeeded him. The present Lesotho emerged under the Great King Moshoeshoe in 1822.

The culture is mainly of native Bantu. Origins of name: The name is derived from the Sotho People, the dominant ethnic group. Formerly known as Basutholand.

Former British colony

Achieved it's independence from Britain on 4th October, 1966. Headship since independence; Head of post-colonial Lesotho Monarchy

Renamed the "Kingdom of Lesotho", upon it's independence from the UK in October, 1966 under King Moshoeshoe II as head post- colony Lesotho monarch, he was head of the monarchy until recently, it's name "Lesotho" translates roughly into "the Land of the people who speak Sesotho" King Mosoeshoe was dethroned and led to exile by Major General Justin Metsing Lekhanya in November, 1990, then his son HRH prince Constantine Bereng Mohato Seeiso to be crowned as King Letsie III until February, 1995, while the king was in exile, at early April of 1993.

In a concession reached, constitution amended that ended the seven years of military administration, and Major General Elias Phisoano Ramaema surrendered his government to a civilian rule, and the King Letsie III, was stepped aside and his father king Moshoshoe II reinstated in February, 1995.

King Moshoshoe II has died with a tragic car accident on the 15th January, 1996 when he was travelling to his private rural Animal-farming at the Malotti mountains of Lesotho, he was the first king of Lesotho, who sruggled to define the monarchy as he was twice sent into exile and was once deposed. The heir to the throne, prince Constantine David Bereng Mohato Seeiso was succeeded his father once again as King Letsie III on the 7th of February, 1996, but his coronation took place on 31st of October, 1997, in Maseru, subsquent constitutional reforms have been taken relative stability in the kingdom restored at the end.

Lesotho is an Inland Kingdom forming enclave entirely surounded by the Republic of South Africa. The tiny African kingdom of Lesotho crowns its monarchs. The last such ritual was held on 31 October 1997, when current king Letsie III was crowned in a sports stadium in the capital city of Maseru. King Letsie entered the stadium escorted by units of mounted police clad in red uniforms and carrying sabers and lances. Donning a traditional coat of animal skins, the new ruler was crowned by two chieftains with a beaded headband containing a brown and white feather. Traditional dances and songs followed. Lesotho's ethno-linguistic structure consists almost entirely of the Basotho, a Bantu-speaking population created a number of chiefdoms in the area in the sixteenth century. The most powerful to be was the Basotho in 1824, that obtained a British protectorate as Basutholand in 1843, the then King Moshoeshoe's death in 1870s marked the end of the traditional era, Moshoeshoe's birthday one of the national holidays in modern Lesotho, celebrated every year on the 11th of March to commemorate as the day of his death, annexed to British Cape colony in 1871, when the area totally became a British territory and later a protectorate. In 1884 it was separated from the colony and became a British high commission territory. Formerly known as Basutholand, renamed the "Kingdom of Lesotho", upon it's independence from the UK in October, 1966 under King Moshoeshoe II as head post - colony Lesotho monarch, he was head of the monarchy until recently, it's name "Lesotho" translates roughly into "the Land of the people who speak Sesotho", he dethroned and led to exile by Major General Justin Metsing Lekhanya in November, 1990, then his son HRH prince Constantine Bereng Mohato Seeiso to be crowned as King Letsie III until February, 1995, while his father was in exile, at early April of 1993. In concession reached, a new constitution adopted that ended the seven years of military administration, and Major General Elias Phisoano Ramaema surrendered his government to a civilian rule, and the King Letsie III, was stepped aside and replaced by his father king Moshoshoe II reinstated in February, 1995. The King Moshoshoe II has died with a tragic car accident on the 15th January, 1996 when he was travelling to his private rural Animal-farming at the Malotti mountains of Lesotho, he was the first king of Lesotho, who sruggled to define the monarchy as he was twice sent into exile and was once deposed. The heir to the throne, prince Constantine David Bereng Mohato Seeiso was succeeded his father once again as King Letsie III on the 7th of February, 1996, but his coronation took place on 31st of October, 1997, in Maseru, subsquent constitutional reforms have been taken relative stability in the kingdom restored at the end. under a traditional law "Chiefs of tribes" have the power to depose the monarch, determine who is next in the line of succession, or who shall serve as regent in the event that the successor is not of mature age. A parliamentary constitutional monarch was restored after nearly seven years of military rule. A peaceful parliamentary elections /by popular vote/were held in 2002 and 2007.

Accession to the throne of King Letsie III, by succession.

Tentative parliamentary elections calender-February. Lesotho –

Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

1820s - Basutoland founded by Moshoeshoe, who unites various groups to repel challenges from Zulus.

1834 - Territorial encroachment by Boer trekkers starts decades of conflict.

1860s - Becomes a British protectorate.

1871 - Annexed to the Cape Colony without people's consent.

1884 - Becomes a British colony after revolt against Cape Colonial rule. Paramount chiefs retain large degree of autonomy.

1939-45 - World War II, with 20,000 Sotho serving in the British forces.

1950s - Political parties emerge, press for independence.

1966 - Independence as Kingdom of Lesotho, with Moshoeshoe II as king and Chief Leabua Jonathan (Basotho National Party) as prime minister.

1970 - Oppostion Basutoland Congress Party leads in polls but Chief Jonathan suspends constitution, sends king into temporary exile.

1986 - South Africa blocks borders, demanding expulsion of anti- apartheid activists. Major-General Justin Lekhanya replaces Chief Jonathan in coup.

1990 - King Moshoeshoe II goes into exile. His son is sworn in as Letsie III.

1991 - Lekhanya forced out by Colonel Elias Tutsoane Ramaema, who lifts ban on political activity.

1993 - Basutoland Congress Party comes to power in elections.

1994 - Fighting among rival army factions.

1995 - Moshoeshoe II restored to throne, but dies in a car crash. Letsie III restored as king.

1997 - Basutoland Congress Party dismisses Ntsu Mokhehle as leader. He forms the Lesotho Congress of Democrats (LCD).

1998 - LCD wins general elections, Pakalitha Mosisili becomes prime minister. Opposition stages protests against results. Rioting breaks out. At government's urging the South African Development Community (SADC) sends military force to help restore order.

Multiparty Interim Political Authority is established to review the electoral process and organise next elections.

May 1999 - Last of South African and Botswanan troops sent to quell 1998 unrest withdraw.

February 2000 - Tens of thousands of people and heads of state attend King Letsie III's marriage to Karabo Montsoeneng at national sports stadium in Maseru.

May 2002 - Masupha Sole, former head of Lesotho Highlands Development Authority, found guilty of accepting bribes from foreign construction companies in return for business on Lesotho Highlands Water Project, which supplies water to South Africa.

May 2002 - Ruling Lesotho Congress for Democracy (LCD) wins parliamentary elections, held under new system which gives smaller parties voice in parliament. Poll endorsed by international observers but rejected by opposition as fraudulent.

June 2002 - Prime Minister Mosisili is sworn-in for a second five-year term.

February 2004 - Prime Minister Mosisili declares state of emergency, appeals for food aid. Aid officials say hundreds of thousands face shortages after three-year struggle against drought.

March 2004 - Official opening of first phase of multi-billion-dollar Lesotho Highlands Water Project, which supplies water to South Africa.

April 2005 - First local elections since independence: Voters choose representatives for 129 local councils. Opposition parties boycott the vote and allege a lack of preparation.

November 2005 - Lesotho launches programme to offer HIV tests to all citizens.

October 2006 - Lesotho marks 40 years of independence from Britain with a new flag.

Former communications minister Thomas Thabane and 17 other MPs leave the ruling LCD to form the opposition All Basotho Convention (ABC).

November 2006 - Dutch aid worker shot dead at house of Trade Minister Minister Mpho Malie, who is thought to have been the intended target. The attack is similar to one which injured Foreign Minister Monyane Moleleki and another which killed MP Bereng Sekhonyana earlier in the year.

February 2007 - Ruling LCD wins early parliamentary elections, taking 61 of 80 constituencies; leader of the opposition ABC challenges the outcome.

March 2007 - General strike following opposition call for action in protest over allocation of parliamentary seats.

July 2007 - State of emergency declared as Lesotho experiences its most severe drought in 30 years.

October 2007 - Five charged with high treason for their alleged role in attacks on the homes of the opposition leader and cabinet ministers.

April 2009 - Premier Mosisili survives an apparent assassination attempt.

April 2011 - Government and opposition announce deal over allocation of parliamentary seats at the 2012 elections, aimed at easing a dispute over the 2007 vote.

Seven suspected mercenaries charged in connection with 2009 attempt to kill Prime Minister Mosisili.

May 2012 - Thomas Thabane becomes prime minister following elections.

September 2012 - Lesotho facing one of its worst food crises in living memory, according to World Food Programme.

September 6, 2014: Her Majesty Queen Mamohato Bereng Seeiso Queen Mother of Lesotho Dies'

Her Majesty Queen Mamohato Bereng Seeiso, the Queen Mother of Lesotho dies. Her Majesty died suddenly while attending church services at St. Cecilia's Roman Catholic Church outside Maseru.

Her son, Principal Chief and Prince, Seeiso Bereng Seeiso said that she had suffered from a heart ailment for close to 20 years. Her Majesty was the widow of the late King Moshoeshoe II, and the mother of the present king of Lesotho, Letsie III. During several instances in which KIing Moshoeshoe was compelled to go into exile or to temporarily abdicate during his struggles with the dictatorial late Prime Minister Chief Jonathan, Queen Mamohato had often acted in the role of regent and carried out royal duties in a blameless and dignified manner. The present Prime Minister of Lesotho, Pakalitha Mosisili, said that during her life, the Queen Mother saved the country's monarchy when it was on the brink of collapse. Her late majesty was very active in programs to alleviate poverty and famine in Lesotho and throughout the region, and in programs geared towards the advancement of women. She was active in promoting cultural and traditional preservation as well. Her majesty the Queen Mother of Lesotho was buried after a state funeral, in the Roman Catholic Cemetery at St. Louis mission, at Matsieng, south of the captial, Maseru.

Why was Lesotho never annexed by South Africa? How is it this kingdom, despite being completely landlocked and surrounded on all sides by its much larger and more powerful neighbor, has maintained independent sovereignty?

By Jürgen Walter

Unfortunately, a tremendous amount of your description is incorrect, geographical malapropisms aside. First of all, the British were not in possession of the Transvaal at the time of Protectorate (the tussenregering was 1877-1881; Moshoeshoe was dead in 1870, two years after Protectorate). The treaty was in response to the Free Staters who were displaying a growing ability to besiege Thaba Bosiu, and the British in fact recognized the Boer taking of the Caledon River territory (today the so-called “conquered territory” that Lesotho would very much like back). The baSotho did beat British and Boer forces at various times, but that was not one of them.

King Moshoeshoe I (c.1786-1870) 1833 (engraving) French School, (19th century). Private Collection.

In fact, after Moshoeshoe's death, the British tried to give them over to the Cape Colony anyway. This did not go well, and eventually led to Morosi's Rebellion in 1879 and the Gun War in 1880-81, when the Sotho horsemen actually held the Cape forces at bay and forced negotiation that ended up with the resumption of direct imperial Protectorate in 1884.

After that point, Britain maintained a long-term goal of putting the High Commission Territory in some future confederated or federated South Africa; Bechuanaland, Lesotho, and Swaziland, as protectorates, made it very clear they would sooner fight than be pushed into union with South Africa. Ronald Hyam's The Failure of South African Expansion is still the book you want for those developments, even though it's now 40 years old. For the Gun War, Betsy Eldredge's Power in Colonial Africa and the preceding A South African Kingdom are both good to pick up. I'm not in Texas at the moment, so I don't have the rest of my Lesotho bibliography to hand, but those are the major ones I know off the top of my head. (Another, Abortive British Imperialism in Lesotho, 1884-1910, I can't adjudge in terms of the OP's request.)

I'm not sure what Kimberley would be the "northeastern part" of. It's the northeastern part of Griqualand West, sort of. I honestly did not meet many southern Sotho in Gauteng when I lived there; most Sotho-speakers seem to identify as Pedi or other north Sotho. Jozi changes the calculus, as do the mines, but if you want to meet more speakers of south Sotho, go to Bloemfontein (or Maseru, naturally).

Related Links

Why is there a little country inside of South Africa called 'Lesotho'?

What would happen if South Africa cut off relations and closed its border with Lesotho?

How is South Africa more developed than Namibia, Botswana, Lesotho, and Limpopo?

Why do Eswatini (Swaziland) and Lesotho exist? How come they exist separate from South Africa (or, in E Swatini's case, possibly Mozambique)?

Around the times when South Africa pushed for independence, did anyone in South Africa oppose independence and wanted to stay a dominion?

Why did the 2010 calls for Lesotho to join South Africa end without success?

Lesotho police arrest a radio presenter, suspend one station's license, and raid another

Lusaka, December 14, 2021 — Authorities in Lesotho must stop their sustained efforts to gag the press and should allow journalists to operate freely without fear of arrest or being forced to disclose their sources, the Committee to Protect Journalists said today.

On November 14, police arrested and allegedly tried to suffocate Lebese Molati, a current affairs presenter on the privately owned 357 FM in the capital, Maseru, over statements he made about missing police guns during his "Semphu Se Nkha Kaea" (Where Is The News) daily show, according to a statement by the Lesotho chapter of the regional press freedom advocacy group Media Institute of Southern Africa (MISA) and the journalist, who spoke to CPJ via messaging app. Molati said he was released that evening.

Four days later, the state broadcasting regulator, the Lesotho Communications Authority (LCA), withdrew 357 FM's broadcasting license for allegedly failing to comply with a directive of its Broadcasting Disputes and Resolution Panel, according to a statement the authority posted on Twitter and a media report. The panel had ordered the station to apologize to the leader of the opposition Basotho Action Party (BAP), Professor Nqosa Mahao, who accused the station of waging a campaign of character assassination, according to the statement and media report.

The station has been suspended and is off air until January 10, 2022, according to the LCA statement shared on Facebook and Molati.

LCA spokesperson Thato Ponya told CPJ via messaging app that the regulator relied on Sections 25(1) and 25(2) of the Lesotho Telecommunications Authority (Broadcasting) Rules of 2004 to impose a suspension for refusing to abide by the directive.

357 FM appealed to the Magistrate's Court, which sent the case back to the regulator for determination, according to Molati and Ponya.

Separately, on November 17, police stormed the office of another privately owned radio station in Maseru, People's Choice FM (PCFM), and questioned presenter Teboho Ratalane and some of the station's management about a report about the missing police guns, although no one was arrested, according to a separate MISA Lesotho statement.

PCFM's Ratalane told CPJ via messaging app that the police had wanted him to disclose the source of a police union press release that he had referred on air about the theft of 75 firearms, but he had refused to do so.

"The arrest and alleged assault of a radio presenter and the questioning of journalists over a story of public interest relating to missing police guns, followed by the suspension of 357 FM's license, is extremely worrying and reinforces perceptions that press freedom remains under threat in Lesotho," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator, in New York. "Instead of censoring the press and demanding that journalists violate their ethics by disclosing their sources, authorities should encourage a diversity of opinion and views so that citizens can make informed decisions as the kingdom goes to the polls next year." –CPJ Report

What would have happened to Africa if it hadn't been colonized?

Mario Biermann Follow Lived in Africa 17m

Everything should have been “normal”!

Follow Mario Biermann

Related Links

Is Africa poor because of colonization? If colonization never happened, how would Africa have been?

Why hasn't Africa developed as well as other continents?

Could Africans with guns have much more easily beat back the European colonizers, starting with the Portuguese and eventually the English? Why did Africa never discover or acquire the knowledge of firearms?

If Africa is so rich, why hasn't it yet developed and recovered after colonization?

If Africa is poor and backward because of colonialism, why is Ethiopia also poor and backward although it was never colonised?

Why did the world allow Europe to colonize Africa and the entire world? I don't get it. How did colonization happen, and why was it allowed to happen? Before the European colonization, was there ever anything similar?

Why are Africans the only ones who never recovered from colonization?

Why do so many people claim that the colonization of Africa made Europe rich, when Europe was already much more developed than the rest of the world by the 15th century?

If civilisation started in Africa, and all people are believed to come from Africa, how come Africa remains poor and far behind the development?

If colonization hadn't occurred in this world, what would the face of Earth be like as compared to the present day?

Why didn't China colonize Africa? They had superior naval technology than the Europeans and many Chinese travelled to Africa and sent back information. How different would Africa be if this happened?

What would have happened if Columbus had never found America?

Why is Africa the continent which has been mostly abused even throughout history?

Why didn't the Africans colonized Europe?

Why was Africa undeveloped before colonization?

Who is the tribe in "The Gods Must Be Crazy" movie, and do they still dress like that?

Movies & More

Follow Answered by Rynne Ivarsson Nov 1

Interesting question and I'm glad you asked because it took me on a mini-learning journey.

The wiki for the film attributes it to the San peoples (also Saan), or Bushmen. They are members of various Khoe, Tuu, or Kx'a-speaking indigenous hunter-gatherer cultures that are the first cultures of Southern Africa, and whose territories span Botswana, Namibia, Angola, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Lesotho and South Africa. In 2017, Botswana was home to approximately 63,500 San people, which is roughly 2.8% of the country's population, making it the country with the highest population of San people.

Their type of dress has not changed in centuries. Below is a scene from the film, below that is a contemporary photo of tribesmen.

Follow Space

Related Links

In Pulp Fiction (1994 movie), what would happen to Vincent and Lance if Mia died and Vincent told Marsellous Wallace that she was a junkie and it wasn't his fault?

Should Tom Cruise make Jack Reacher 3?

How would someone like Clark Griswold from the Vacation movies be treated if he went to Mexico or China with his family and caused chaos without realizing it or insulted the locals with his behavior?

What actor/actress has the best cameo role in a comedy?

In an episode of M*A*S*H, a North Korean soldier on the operating table tried to escape, knocking over the last bottle of AB negative blood. How much of a problem was it during the Korean War (or any subsequent) for medical units to run out of blood?

What didn't you like about Spider-Man: No Way Home?

Which celebrity most Generously donated from Income?
What movie portrays dementia most accurately?
What's your thoughts on the movie "Stillwater" with Matt Damon?
What is the Gimp's backstory in Pulp Fiction, and what happened to him after Butch left?
Which is the most successful Fast and Furious movie?
What movies are part of your Christmas traditions?
What are some of the best books, movies, or shows that deal with the human mind?
How was the term "silver screen" coined?
What are the best comedy movies released in 2021?

Peut-on tomber enceinte en avalant du sperme ?

Fab Fabrice BingeWatcher professional 2 ans

J'ai d'abord rigolé en voyant cette question, mais ensuite je me suis rappelé d'une histoire qui avait vachement tournée sur les réseaux il y a de cela quelques années.
Vous savez? le genre d'histoire qui circule avec un titre rocambolesque du genre:

Née sans vagin, elle tombe enceinte après une fellation!

Sauf que dans ce cas là c'est vrai!

En 1988 au Lesotho en Afrique, une jeune fille de 15ans est admise à l'hôpital pour des blessures très grave à l'abdomen. La pauvre gamine s'était retrouvée au milieu d'une rixe entre son ex et son nouveau mec et s'est pris 2 coups de couteau lui valant 10 jours d'hospitalisation.

9 Mois plus tard elle est prise de maux de ventre terrible et retourne donc à l'hosto. Les médecins lui annonce la bonne nouvelle: elle est enceinte et faut qu'elle accouche NOW (par césarienne)!

Elle avait beau s'arrondir de plus en plus depuis des mois, elle s'est pas trop posé de question, elle pensait peut-être souffrir d'une étrange constipation, on sait pas! Mais elle ne pouvait pas imaginer être enceinte vu qu'elle est née sans vagin (aplasie vaginale distale me dit google)

"Comment que c'est il que c'est ce possible??" me dites vous !

Sciences et Avenir donne l'explication, rationnelle mais inattendue : avant d'être poignardée, la jeune fille a pratiqué une fellation à son petit ami. « Le sperme, contenu dans l'estomac perforé par l'arme blanche, est passé dans la cavité abdominale où il a ensuite gagné un des deux ovaires. Les spermatozoïdes ne peuvent survivre dans un environnement à faible pH, mais la salive a un pH élevé et l'estomac, vide, de la patiente n'avait pas un pH acide. Tout ceci a pu contribuer à la survie des gamètes mâles » argumente la revue scientifique.

Fallait y penser…

Questions similaires

Qu'est-ce que les femmes du Moyen Âge faisaient pour ne pas tomber enceintes?
Une fille peut-elle tomber enceinte sans un rapport sexuel ?
Peut-on tomber enceinte en allant à la piscine ?
Combien de temps faut-il à un couple moyen pour tomber enceinte ?

Une fille vierge, qui se comporte vraiment comme une vierge, sans aucun contact sexuel (attouchements, etc…) peut-elle tomber enceinte ?

A quel moment une femme est la plus susceptible de tomber enceinte ?
Peut-on tomber enceinte par la salive ?
Est-il possible de tomber enceinte pendant les règles ?
Combien de temps vous a-t-il fallu pour tomber enceinte ?
Comment une fille peut tomber enceinte pour deux hommes en même temps ?

Comment tomber enceinte naturellement, selon les conseils des professionnels de la santé, quand le couple n'y arrive pas ?

Qu'est-ce qui vous a finalement aidée à tomber enceinte après avoir essayé pendant si longtemps ?

Combien de rapports sont-ils nécessaires pour tomber enceinte ?
Peut-on tomber enceinte en ayant été en contact avec du liquide préspermique ?

Est-il possible de tomber enceinte alors qu'on utilise un contraceptif ?

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

In southern Africa.

Official title of the state

The Kingdom of Lesotho: is a landlocked country and enclave, completely surrounded by its only neighbouring country, the Republic of South Africa.

Flag description:

Three horizontal stripes of blue (top), white, and green in the proportions of 3:4:3; the colors represent rain, peace, and prosperity respectively; centered in the white stripe is a black Basotho hat representing the indigenous people; the flag was unfurled in October 2006 to celebrate 40 years of independence.

Neighbours

Completely surrounded by Republic of South Africa. Land boundaries; total 909 km. Border countries; Entirely surrounded by Republic of South Africa 909 Km.

Founder of The Nation
King Moshoeshoe II

Local division
Administratively, Lesotho is divided into 10 Districts, each headed by a district administrator. And 22 wards of principal chiefs.

Government type

Constitutional Monarchy with parliamentary democratic system

Legislation chamber

Bicameral Parliament

Form of State

Parliamentary constitutional monarchy

Head of State is the Prime Minister

A Parliamentary or constitutional monarchy where the king serve a largely ceremonial function with two legislative houses. Consists of the Senate 33 seats, which composed of 22 principal chiefs whose membership is hereditary plus 11 appointees of the King, and the National Assembly (Elective) 120 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch

King, Prime minister, Bicameral parliament Separated by monarchial head (hereditary) without executive or legislative powers, considered "living symbol of national unity", and the head of Government. According to the constitution, the leader of the majority party in the assembly appointed by the king to become PM, following legislative elections.

Former Rulers

1965- 1965 Sekhonyana Nehemia Maseribane- Prime Minister

1965 to 1986 Joseph Leabua Jonathan- Prime Minister

1986-1991 Justin Metsing Lekhanya - Chief of the Military Council and Head of Government.

1991-1993 Maj. General Elias Phisoana Ramaema – Chief of Military

Council and Head of Government.

1993 - 1998 Ntsu Mokhehle Prime Minister

August 17, 1994- September 14, 1994 Hae Phoofolo – Interim PM

1994 - 1998 Ntsu Mokhehle – Prime Minister

1998 - present Bethuel Pakalitha Mosisili

Judicial chamber

High Court

Capital city

Maseru Altitude 1600 mtrs/5248 ft.

Geographic coordinates - 29.19S , 27.29E. Meaning for in Sesotho, "place of the red sandstone", located on the Caledon river, bordering South Africa. Founded in 1869, when the country achieved independence in 1966, retained it's status as capital.

Names of main towns

Tepateyaneng, Mafeteng, Leribe.

Date of independence

4th October,1966.

Religions (Major)

Protestant 49%, Roman Catholic 43%, few Muslims.

Official language

English/Se-sotho (official).

Currency unit
Malotti (LSL) =100 Lisente (Lothi using).

Area in Km2

30,355.00

Country area comparison in Africa

44 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms ;-

Average annual population growth rate 0.277 %

Birth rate 27.17 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 15.71 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 50.67 years

Male 50.58 years ; Female 50.76 years

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 14, Female: 3

Average per capita income

USD 1, 700

Population density

39/km2

Urban population (%)

62

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishery: 15

Industry: 45

Social service: 40

Main Export items

Diamonds, wood, mohair and textiles.

Economy is based on

Agriculture & remittances by migrants working in the South African mining.

Climate
Continental extreme temperature, cool/cold, dry winters, hot, wet summer.

Extremes;-

Lowest point; Junction of Orange and Makhaleng River 1,400 mtrs.

Highest point; Tshabana Ntlenyaha 3482 mtrs.

Weather of the Capital city (Maseru) average annual temperature 14.80c.

Altitude
1600 mtrs/5248 ft

Hottest Month
January 15-33oc.

Coldest Month
July 3 – 17oc.

Driest Month
June 7mm average Rf.

Wettest Month
February 141 mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

2 hours ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays

4th October (Independence day), 11th March (Moshoeshoe's day).

Ethnic groups

Sotho 98%, others.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Mostly a highland with plateus, hills and mountains. More than 80 % of the country is 1,800 mtr above sea level. Landlocked and mountainous with altitudes ranging from 1524 mtrs/5,000 ft to 3354 mtrs/11,000 ft.
The country, which is entirely surrounded by the Republic of South Africa is predominantly mountain and plateau rising from 1.500 mtrs/4920 ft in the west to 3.350 mtrs/ 11,000 ft in the east. A number of rivers, among them, the Orange (senqu) the Caledon and the Malibamatso, rise in the country's central plateus, most of the population lives in the lower lands of the north and west, where the capital, Maseru, and most of the arable land are situated. Environment: population pressure forcing settlement in marginal areas results in overgrazing, severe soil erosion, and soil exhaustion; desertification; Highlands Water Project controls, stores, and redirects water to South Africa.

Economy Overview

Industry

Diamond polishing, food processing, beverages, textiles, apparel assembly, handicrafts, construction, tourism.

Chief cropes

Grains, peas, beans, pulses, sorghum : livestock.

Natural resources

Up to the present time, the only mineral product which exploited in Lesotho is diamond. Water-resource, agro-grazzing land, sand, clay, quarry-sites are the main ones.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 13

Grassland: 64

Forest woods: 1

Other: 22

Marine:

Coastline; None.

Commercial Sea port:-

An Inland kingdom with coast to the contact of South African Sea ports.

Development prospect;-

Lesotho is assisted by China to build a major new dam, which that’s improving Lesotho's capacity to earn revenue from power generation and sales of under surface water to South Africa. The economy is vulnerable to domestic politics and hostage to external factors beyond its control, especially the difficult economic conditions in South Africa. A sharp fall in revenues from the Southern African Customs Union has resulted in large fiscal and external current account deficits. It will not be easy to replace this key source of revenue. Remittances from workers in South Africa have been falling and the domestic textile industry is yet to bounce back after the economic downturn in the face of increased price competition from Asia and a fall in demand from the US, Lesotho's main textile exporting destination. Thousands of textile workers have lost their jobs. The GDP growth rate fell to 3.1 per cent in 2009. Although a return to 5 per cent growth has been estimated it is hard to see how this can be achieved. Amid these difficulties, a government priority has been to maintain the momentum of construction of water projects, which can earn steady if meagre revenues for the country. China is proving a helpful partner in this ambition, and Sinohydro Corporation was awarded a $79.9m contract for the construction of the $413m Metolong Dam, expected to be completed in 2013. The dam is complementary with the cross-border Lesotho Highlands Project, a joint project with the South African government, due for completion in 2017. The mining industry is staging a comeback after operations in the Liqhobong and Kao diamond mines were temporarily suspended during the financial crisis. They restarted in 2009 and 2010 respectively. Sales from the newly opened Mothae diamond mine began at the start of the year whilst the new Lemphane mine opened in 2010. Growth in the industry is expected to rise in line with the recently recovering global demand for diamonds.

LIBERIA

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

Liberia is the only African country that was not colonised by a foreign power (Ethiopia shares that to an extent, having only been briefly occupied by Italy from 1937 to 1941). Liberia was established as an independent state by freed slaves from America in 1847. They were joined by Africans released from slave ships off the West African coast. For more than 130 years from its founding, politics were dominated by the small minority of the population descended from these original settlers, known as the Americo-Liberians or Congo. During that era, Liberia was renowned for its stability, its functioning economy and the large amount of foreign investment it attracted in the rubber plantations and the iron ore mines. But the indigenous Africans were largely excluded from political power. In 1980 Master Sergeant Samuel Doe, a member of the indigenous Krahn ethnic group, seized power in a violent military coup. Key members of the Americo-Liberian elite, including the President and his Cabinet were summarily executed in public on the beach. The USA, a traditional strong ally of Liberia, withdrew its support. Doe mismanaged the economy and transformed the armed forces into an ethnic Krahn militia which committed extensive human rights abuse against Liberia's other ethni c groups. In 1989 the National Patriotic Front of Liberia (NPFL), led by Charles Taylor, began a revolt against the Samuel Doe regime. It quickly became a vicious civil war. The Doe dictatorship collapsed and he was murdered by a rebel faction in September. At this point Taylor (and to a lesser extent other rival warlords) already controlled large parts of Liberian territory. Despite occasional truces and no fewer than a dozen abortive peace agreements, the conflict continued for a further six years. During this period the rival warlords, and West African peace keeping forces, looted the country's natural resources and state revenues. Democratic elections were finally held in July 1997. Charles Taylor won but the elections bought only temporary respite. Taylor's government set about plundering the state of its assets and stifling opposition activity.

Taking advantage of the government collapse in Sierra Leone, assisted a rebel movement, called as the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) and emerged, with backing from the Liberian warlord, and in 1991 led a rebellion against the APC government. The government government of Sierra Leone was unable to cope with the insurrection, and was overthrown in a junior Officers coup in April, 1992.

Charles Ghankay Taylor was elected president of Liberia with a 75% majority and took office on 2 August, 1997. On 4th June, 2003, his indictment by the Special Court of Sierra Leone and warrant of arrest were unsealed, and on 11 August, 2003 he stepped down from the presidency and went into exile in Nigeria.

In 1999 fierce fighting began and by July 2003 Charles Taylor had lost control of most of the country, including much of Monrovia. Peace talks in Accra in August led to the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) in September. A new ECOWAS peacekeeping force was deployed, which has since been replaced by the 15,000 strong UN force (UNMIL). Taylor was forced into exile in Nigeria. Indicted by the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL), Taylor was arrested in Nigeria on 29 March 2006 and subsequently transferred to the Special Court in Freetown where he was charged on 3 March with offences relating to the Sierra Leone civil war. He has subsequently been transferred to The Hague Mandate where his trial is ongoing. On 26 April 2012 the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) handed down its landmark judgment against Charles Taylor, former President of Liberia. The Court found Taylor guilty of aiding and abetting and planning crimes against humanity and war crimes during the brutal

Sierra Leonean civil war. He has now been sentenced to fifty years imprisonment. His appeal is in process.

In 2003, he applied to the Special Court to quash his indictment and set aside the warrant of arrest on the grounds that he was immune from the jurisdiction of the Court by virtue of the fact that at the time the indictment and warrant of arrest were issued, he was a sitting head of state. This application was denied by the Trial Chamber and its decision was upheld by the Appeals Chamber on 31 May, 2004 on the grounds that the sovereign equality of states does not prevent a head of state from being prosecuted before an international tribunal or court.

On 29 March, 2006, Charles Taylor was arrested in Nigeria by the government of President Olusegun Obasanjo which had given him sanctuary in Calabar at the behest of ECOWAS, AU and the UN. The arrest followed a request by the Liberian president, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, who had been leaned upon by Washington to surrender Taylor to the Special Court. Shortly, thereafter, Taylor was transferred into the custody of the Court in Freetown, Sierra Leone, and was formally arraigned on 3 April, 2006, when he pleaded not guilty to all the 11 counts in the indictment. Because of security concerns, Charles Taylor was transferred to the International Criminal Court (ICC) facilities in The Hague on 20 June, 2006.

Charles Taylor's court case: The prosecution case commenced on 4th June, 2007 and closed on 27th February, 2009. During the Defence case, the Prosecution was granted leave to reopen its case to call three addional witnesses (including the American supermodel Naomi Cambell) who testified on 5, 9, and 10th August, 2010. In sum, 94 witnesses testified for the Prosecution, including three expert witnesses. A total of 782 Prosecution exhibits were admitted into evidence, including five expert reports. The Defence opened its case on 13th July, 2009 and closed on 12th November, 2010, having called 21 witnesses, including Charles Taylor who testified for seven months from 14 July, 2009 until 18 February, 2010. A total of 740 Defence exhibits were admitted into evidence. After 420 trial days over the course of three years and 10 months, the case was formally closed on 11th March, 2011. A total of 115 witnesses testified, 1, 522 exhibits were admitted into evidence, 49, 622 pages of trial records were transcribed, and 281 written interlocutory decisions were issued by the trial Chamber.

On 16th May, 2012 the Special Court of Sierra Leone (SCSL) gave ex-President Charles Ghankay Taylor the opportunity to speak in court before sentencing was imposed on 30th May, 2012.
On 30th May, 2012 after a trial lasting three years and ten months, the former Liberian president Charles Ghankay Taylor was found guilty by Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) on 11 counts of “aiding and abetting” crimes committed in Sierra Leone by rebel forces b/n 1996 and 2002. But as SCSL aquitted him of the most serious charges of “joint criminal enterprise”, “command and control” “instigating” and “ordering the crimes.

Origins of name: Widely believed Liberia’s name derived from the word "Liberty". Liberia was founded in 1821-22 by the American Colonisation Society as a place for freed Afro-American slaves. The freed slaves formed an elite that founded the Republic of Liberia in 1847 and named their capital Monrovia after the fifth US President James Monroe.

By 1847, the Americo-Liberians under Joseph Jenkins Roberts, Liberia's first non-white Governor-general were able to found the first republic in Africa.

Liberia declared itself a republic in 1874.

Headship since declaration as Republic; Head of State

The 18th, long standing (1943 to 1971), President William Vacarant Shadrach Tubman did much to promote foreign investment and to bridge the economic, social, and the political gaps b/n the descendants of the original settlers and the inhabitants of the interior, after his sudden death on the 23rd of July, 1971. During his term President William Tubman improved public housing in Monrovia and decreased by 50 % the tution fees at Universities. It's well known that, the ruling True Whig Party (TWP) provided candidate-presidents for over 130 years to Liberia.

Up on the death of President William Tubman his vice president, Dr. William Richard Tolbert elevated as president of Liberia and chairman of the ruling-True Whig Party (TWP) until a small unit of non-commissioned soldiers in the Liberian army, under sergeant Samuel Doe came to power mastering an assassination-coup against the nineteenth president, breaking his bedroom at the state house in Monrovia at the night of 12th of April, 1980, staging a televised torture and execution against his predecessor Dr. William Tolbert including many officials of the regime, marked the end of the Americo-Liberians long political dominance over the descendants of indigenous Africans.

A Republic in West Africa

Liberia is an oldest Repubic in Africa located in West Africa along the Atlantic ocean. It was founded in 1822 as a home for freed Afro-Americans with land purchased by the American society of colonization. By 1847, the Americo-Liberians under Joseph Jenkins Roberts, Liberia's first non-white Governor-general were able to found the first republic in Africa, Liberia declared itself a republic in 1874. Believed it's name derived from the word "Liberty". The 18th, long standing (1943 to 1971), President William Vacarant Shadrach Tubman did much to promote foreign investment and to bridge the economic, social, and the political gaps b/n the descendants of the original settlers and the inhabitants of the interior, after his sudden death on the 23rd of July, 1971, his vice president, Dr. William Richard Tolbert, elevated as president of Liberia and chairman of the ruling-TWP, during his term improved public housing in Monrovia and decreased by 50 % the tution fees at Universities. It's well known that, the ruling True Whig Party (TWP) provided candidate-president for over 130 years to Liberia until a small unit of non-commissioned soldiers in the Liberian army, under sergeant Samuel Doe came to power mastering an assassination-coup against the nineteenth president, breaking his bedroom at the State house in Monrovia at the night of 12th of April, 1980, staging a televised torture and execution against his predecssor Dr. William tolbert including many officials of the regime, marked the end of the Americo-Liberians long political dominance over the descendants of indigenous Africans.

A destructive civil war consumed all years of the 1990s, a civil war launched against Samuel Doe regime by former civil servant namely, Charles Ghankay Taylor in December, 1989, killed some 150, 000 people led to prolonged civil war resulted by a grusome torture and execution of president Samuel Doe by the rebel faction of Captain Jermiah Johnson on the 9th September, 1990, made most Liberians refugees or displaced in neighbouring countries, in due course of the civil war in Liberia drove child-soldiers to unleash their ravaging anger and despair onto their country. In accordance with the Abuja (Nigeria) agreement of August, 1996, the Liberian warring factions finally agreed unsuccessfully to make - up of a new Interim council under former senator Mrs. Ruth Perry which legitimized the council hold elections for 20th civilian government, then Mr. Charles Ghankay Taylor confirmed to become president -elect for years to come. As self-exiled in Nigeria, in early 2005, the ex-president Charles Ghankay Taylor has been in pre-trial detention for fifteen months first at the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) in Freetown and later transferred to the International Criminal Court (ICC) detention centre at Scheveningen, the Hague, the Netherlands, prosecuted with eleven counts, such as acts of terrorism, murder, unlawful killings, violence, and smuggling of weapons to the next door i.e. into the Sierra Leonian civil war, all of which he denies over his alleged role in the brutal civil -war.

The allegation labeled against the former Liberian president, Charles Ghankay Taylor, for his alleged role in the 10-year civil war in Sierra Leone, the prosecutor charged that ex-president Charles Taylor was responsible for the crimes that were committed by the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) under

Mr. Foday Sankho and the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) rebel forces under Majour Paul Koromah in Sierra Leone in that he, among other things, lent military and other logistics support to the rebels with the intention and the knowledge (awareness) that his assistance would have a substantial effect on the Commission of crimes against civilians by the RUF rebels. The same support that Charles Taylor allegedly gave to the Sierra Leonian rebels, such as military advice and personnel, arms and ammunition food and medicine, radio communication capabilities, etc. A trial of the ruthless Liberian warlord Charles Ghankay Taylor before the International Criminal Court (ICC) on charges of crimes against humanity and war-crimes recently concluded in the Hague, the Netherlands after three and one -half years of litigation. A verdict is expected in the foreseeable future.

In 2005 elections for presidential and legislative bodies were held respectively, a lady in the name of Ellen Sirleaf Johnson was declared the winner, the first woman 22nd president of Liberia, to be elected head of state of the oldest Republic in Africa. The election as president in 2005 of Mrs. Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf in Liberia, the first woman head of state ever to occupy this position in Africa after Empress Zawditu Menelik the monarchial head of Ethiopia in 1916, inaugurated to office on the 16th of January, 2006 since the nation declared itself a Republic in July, 1874. President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf has six female cabinet ministers, part of these strategic portfolio includes Justice, foreign affairs, agriculture and commerce, under her presidency, the Africa's oldest republic is slowly finding it's feet again. To "break the final barrier and become the first elected female head of state of Liberia, a post -conflict country and indeed in Africa, was not an easy road. I spent the early years of my career earning respect in man's world. Something that women should not have to fight harder for than men", she quoted as saying in her recent interviews. Therefore, reconstruction of post-war Liberia should not only border on restoring electricity, repairing the roads and reforming the economy, but needs to instill more patriotism among the Liberians, great attention should also be paid towards redirecting the attitudes of Liberians to really consider Liberia as their own and only home for all it's citizens. The Nobel peace laureate Mrs. Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf became Africa's first female elected head of State after the 2005 elections following the end of Liberia's 14-year civil war. That was the first post war elections organized by the Liberians themselves- the previous poll was run by the United Nations, which still has some 8, 000 peace-keepers in the country.

Politics

Ms Johnson-Sirleaf’s election as Africa’s first woman president was historic. However, she is still seen as part of the old Americo-Liberian elite.

The ongoing peace-building in Liberia and the trial of Charles Taylor by the Special Court for Sierra Leone hold major implications for African countries dealing with impunity like Sudan and Kenya.

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission set up by President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf was a milestone for the country. Incidentally, she has been mentioned among those who should be banned from holding office for collaborating with Charles Taylor at some point.

Enduring political stability depends on genuine accommodation between the Americo-Liberians and the indigenous Liberians

Economy

The government has set as a priority the recovery of the economy that was devastated by civil war.

In 2005 it signed a deal with the international steel firm Mittal for resumed export of iron ore, the main natural resource.

The civil war economy featured the alarming exploitat ion of the region's diamond wealth. Over $300 million worth of Liberian and Sierra Leonean diamonds were being exported annually to fund the two country's civil wars. This led to the coining of the infamous word "blood diamonds".

The lifting of a UN embargo on the export of the "blood diamonds" in 2007 is helping the economy recover

Social

Civil war left an estimated 300,000 Liberians dead. Infrastructure devastated by the civil war. The country is trying to cope with the consequences of numerous dislocated families. There are thousands of former child soldiers in need of social rehabilitation.President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf has made the restoration of peace in the sub-region the cornerstone of her foreign policy. Her focus on this end has been on reciprocal peace-building initiatives in neighbouring Sierra Leone and Guinea. Liberia is particularly keen to be regarded as the leading US ally in Africa. President Johnson-Sirleaf's offer for Liberia to host US military's Africa Command (AFRICOM), however, was not taken up by the US Government

Major Conflicts

End of the First Republic

When: 1980

Who: Non-Commissioned Army soldiers led by Sergeant Samuel Doe vs William Tolbert's government

Why: Poor pay for soldiers ignited the coup but the deeper reason was the severe marginalisation by the Americo-Liberian elite of indigenous Liberians since the founding of the Republic in the 19th century

Outcome: President Tolbert and his Cabinet were shot and the First Republic overthrown

First Civil War

When: 1989 –1994

Who: Charles Taylor launched an insurgency backed by Burkina Faso, Cote d'Ivoire and later Libya. In 1990, Nigeria, Guinea and Ghana, as part of an Ecowas military taskforce, intervened

Why: Doe's dictatorial and capricious leadership inflamed the situation. It initially gained Taylor local support. Other armed groups emerged, one of which was led by Yormie Prince Johnson who captured, tortured and killed Doe in 1990.

Outcome: The civil war did not quite end but ran into a stalemate, from which the warlord Taylor emerged triumphant

Second Civil War

When: 1999 – 2003

Who: A gathering of rebel forces, some backed by Guinea, rose against Charles Taylor.

Why: Taylor's brutal and dysfunctional administration worsened the situation. His recruitment of child soldiers and his backing of rebels, who were committing atrocities in neighbouring Sierra Leone, turned international opinion against him Outcome: With Nigeria and the US in the lead, Taylor was forced to resign in 2003 and accepted exile in Nigeria. In 2006 he was captured and handed over to the Special Court for Sierra Leone, where he was wanted for crimes against humanity arising from his involvement with the Sierra Leonean civil war. He is currently being tried at The Hague, for security reasons.

Side notes: If you want a country that blatantly imitates the US 'Stars n' Stripes' flag, it is Liberia. The colours and stripes are identical, only that the 'star' is a single one. In the past good times the Liberian Dollar (LRD) and the United States Dollar (USD) have worked along. The Kendeja National Cultural Centre located along the Atlantic Ocean beach displays all aspects of tribal life, customs and traditions of Liberia. With 29 political parties having contested the

Liberian legislative elections, a great amount of neck-in-neck election campaign was going on as political alliances are formed and dissolved. Mrs. Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, the 2011-joint Nobel Peace Prize awarded finished third in the first round of the election held on the 11th of October, 2011. She garnered 44% of the votes while Winston Tubman, a former UN diplomat got 32.7% with former rebel leader, Prince Johnson picking up 12% of the votes. Mrs. Ellen Johnson Sirleaf was expected to win the most votes in the first round but without neccessary 50%. The Presedent was not able to clinch the 50%+1 winning mark. It was in the second round that the real battle would be fought as contenders were bitterly fought to get the votes of the supporters of the 14 candidates who dropped out of the first round. Prince Johnson the former rebel leader turned legislator, captures the third spot in the election poised to make or break the candidacy of the two opponents in a presidential run-off fixed for the next month. He has been refering to himself as the "king maker", the person whose endorsement counts the most, as he can direct his supporters to vote for one of rival candidates. From all indications, Prince Johnson, the rebel turned legislator will endorse the incumbent president, but he has made it clear that he "can change his mind at anytime". The Liberian National Election Commission (NEC) had presented the electorate with four propositions in a National Constitutional Referendum: to reduce the residency requirement for the presidency and vice presidency from 10 to 5 years within the country: to increase the retirement age of judges from 70 to 75 years: a change in the election date from the secon Tuesday of October to the second Tuesday of November: and with the exception of the presidency for all elections for public office to be won by a simple majority for outright victory.

Side note: The UN-backed Special Court for Sierra Leone in The Hague said he aided and abetted war crimes during the Sierra Leone civil war. Taylor, 64, has been on trial for almost five years. Charles Taylor ‘s Sierra Leone war crimes trial verdict welcomed: "This is an incredibly significant decision," Elise Keppler from the campaign group Human Rights Watch (HRW) told the BBC. "Charles Taylor has been called to account for the crimes in Sierra Leone. It is an incredible day for international justice but most of all for victims in Sierra Leone and everywhere," she added. Taylor was accused of backing rebels who killed tens of thousands of people in Sierra Leone's 1991-2002 civil war. He was convicted on 11 counts including terror, murder and rape - but cleared of ordering the crimes. David Crane was the first prosecutor for the Special court for Sierra Leone. In 2003 he signed the indictment against Charles Taylor. He told the BBC's Newshour programme that it was irrelevant that he was not convicted on all charges. "When I drafted that indictment and signed it there were three [charges] and you only had to [find him guilty on] one, so therefore at the end of the day it's what they did with the charges that matters, and they found him guilty as charged... of the horror story in Sierra Leone," he said. Taylor is the first former head of state convicted by an international court since the Nuremburg military tribunal of Nazis after World War II. Another group, Amnesty International, said the verdict sent an important message to all high-ranking state officials. Charles Taylor says prosecution 'paid witnesses: "Witnesses were paid, coerced and in many case threatened with prosecution, if they did not co-operate" Former Liberian President Charles Taylor has accused the prosecution of paying and threatening witnesses in his war crimes trial. Taylor, who was convicted last month, also told judges in The Hague he was "no threat to society". It was the 64-year-old's last chance to speak at the international court before he is sentenced later this month. Taylor was found guilty of aiding and abetting rebels in Sierra Leone during its civil war. In its landmark ruling last month, the Special Court for Sierra Leone found Taylor guilty on 11 counts, relating to atrocities that included rape and murder. The prosecution wants an 80-year prison term, which the defence says is excessive. Delivering his statement from a witness box on Wednesday, Charles Taylor - who insists he is innocent of all charges - said money had played a "corrupting, influential, significant and dominant role" in his trial.

Side note: Liberia ex-leader Charles Taylor get 50 years in jail. Liberia's ex-President Charles Taylor has been sentenced to 50 years in jail by a UN-backed war crimes court. Last month Taylor was found guilty of aiding and abetting rebels in Sierra Leone during the 1991-2002 civil war. Special Court for Sierra Leone judges said the sentence reflected his status as head of state at the time and his betrayal of public trust. Taylor, 64, insists he is innocent and his lawyer has told the BBC he will appeal against the sentence. In Sierra Leone, where victims of the war gathered in silence to watch the hearing on a large screen in a courtroom in the capital, Freetown, the sentence was welcomed. The chairman of the country's Amputees' Association, Edward Conteh, told the BBC's Focus on Africa programme it came as a "relief" as Taylor was likely to spend the rest of his life in jail. "It is a step forward as justice has been done, though the magnitude of the sentence is not commensurate with the atrocities committed," AP news agency quotes Deputy Information Minister Sheku Tarawali as saying.

Accession to power of president Mrs. Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, by election.

Tentative election calendar-Presidential, November.

Liberia- Timeline Diaries updates and related Key notes:

1847 - Constitution modelled on that of the US is drawn up. July

6, 1847 - Liberia becomes independence

Liberia founded in 1822 as haven for freed slaves from Americas

Named after US President James Monroe

1917 - Liberia declares war on Germany, giving the Allies a base in West Africa.

1926 - Firestone Tyre and Rubber Company opens rubber plantation on land granted by government. Rubber production becomes backbone of economy.

1936 - Forced-labour practices abolished.

1943 - William Tubman elected president.

1944 - Government declares war on the Axis powers.

May 1951 - Women and indigenous property owners vote in the presidential election for the first time.

1958 - Racial discrimination outlawed.

1971 – President William Vakharant Shadrach Tubman dies and is succeeded by Dr. William Tolbert Jr.

1974 – Liberian government accepts aid from the Soviet Union for the first time.

1978 - Liberia signs trade agreement with the European Economic Community.

1979 - More than 40 people are killed in riots following a proposed increase in the price of rice.

1980 - Master Sergeant Samuel Doe carries out military coup. President Tolbert and 13 of his aides are publicly executed. A People's Redemption Council headed by Doe suspends constitution and assumes full powers.

1984 - Samuel Doe's regime allows return of political parties following pressure from the United States and other creditors.

1985 - Samuel Doe wins presidential election.

1989 - National Patriotic Front of Liberia (NPFL) led by Charles Taylor begins an uprising against the government.

1990 - Economic Community of West African States (Ecowas) sends peacekeeping force. Doe is executed by a splinter group of the NPFL

1997 - After several years of chaotic, stop-go fighting, Taylor wins a presidential election. International observers declare the elections free and fair.

January 1999 - Ghana and Nigeria accuse Liberia of supporting Revolutionary United Front rebels in Sierra Leone. Britain and the US threaten to suspend aid to Liberia.

August 13, 1999 The government has accused neighboring Guinea of providing bases for Liberian rebels. Some of the disorder in the border region is a spill over from the civil war in nearby Sierra Leone. Guinea responded by putting its army on alert. An armed group in the area, calling itself the Joint Forces for the Liberation of Liberia (JFLL) has been extorting UN aid workers, and even kidnapping some of them.

August 14; Up to 800 rebels have been raiding across northwest Liberia, fighting government troops sent in to restore order.

August 15, 1999 Rebels have been driven from three villages they invaded in northwest Liberia. The government charged that the rebels had come from bases in Guinea.

August 17; The government accused Guinea of firing artillery into Liberia to support rebels. The army is still chasing down the rebels, who in turn have been burning down villages and crops. Guinea in turn charges that Liberia and Burkino Faso are harboring rebel forces poised to invade Guinea. Some 11,000 refugees have fled the fighting.

August 19; Rebels have been accused of killing and robbing refugees fleeing the unrest in northwest Liberia.

August 20; Liberian refugees say that Sierra Leone rebels from the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) are involved in the fighting throughout northwestern Liberia. The RUF troops are operating with fighters from the Joint Forces for the Liberation of Liberia (JFLL), which is believed to include men formerly with the ULIMO militia (one of groups active in the early 1990s Liberian civil war) and renegades from the Mandingo tribe. There are some 50,000 Sierra Leone refugees in Liberian camps in the area of the current fighting. The unrest has cut off most food and other supplies to these refugees. Already, 800 tons of food aid and 13 trucks headed into the area have been stolen.

August 25; Fighting continues in the northwest, with the army advancing cautiously to minimize civilian casualties. The rebels dress are generally not in uniform and will mix with civilians when it suits them. The rebels are from two factions (ULIMO-K, led by Alhaji Kromah and ULIMO-J, led by Roosevelt Johnson) of the United Liberation Movement (ULIMO). Kromah is currently in the United States, and Johnson is in Nigeria. ULIMO was disbanded when the civil war ended in 1997, but these two factions, once rivals, joined forces to keep a rebellion going.

August 27; The fighting in the northwest, 260 kilometers from the capital Monrovia, has created some 25,000 refugee

August 30, 1999 Over 5,000 Sierra Leone refugees in northwestern Liberia have fled the fighting in the region.

September 1; Nigeria expects to have all of its peacekeeping troops out of Liberia by the end of September. September 9; Former Sierra Leone junta member Johnny Koroma has been reported to be living in a heavily guarded compound in the capital. Sierra Leoneans assert that Koroma is using his new residence as a command post for directing the activities of troops still loyal to him in Sierra Leone. Some of Koroma's troops have refused to abide by the new peace agreement in Sierra Leone.

September 11, 1999 Guinea claims that Liberian troops crossed the border and killed 28 Guineans.

September 14; Several hundred armed invaders entered northwestern Liberia. The identity of the invaders is no known, although the likely suspects are renegade fighters from Liberia's seven year civil war. The government accuses Guinea of allowing the renegades to operate from bases in Guinea. Casualties are reported to be over 200 men, women and children. Several thousand refugees are fleeing the area. There are already 35,000 refugees from Sierra Leone in the area.

September 18; The Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) has brokered an agreement to monitor the Liberian-Guinea border to prevent fighting between soldiers from both nations, and Liberian rebels operating from bases in Guinea.

September 23; The government announced that it had regained control of the northwest, where rebels have rampaged for several weeks. Several hundred deaths have been reported, and many more injured. Over ten thousand refugees have fled the area. The surviving rebels have fled to their bases across the border in Guinea.

September 29, 1999 Charles Taylor, president of Liberia, is attempting to end the fighting in Sierra Leone by holding talks with the two Sierra Leonean warlords; Foday Sankoh, head of the RUF (Revolutionary United Front) and Johnny Koroma, of the AFRC (Armed Forces Revolutionary Council). Foreign aid has been slow to come to Liberia because Taylor has been supporting the AFRC actions in Sierra Leone.

October 11; The border with Sierra Leone was reopened, after being closed due to fighting by Sierra Leone rebels in the area. Liberia has agreed to stop providing sanctuary for the rebels.

October 19; The government publicly destroyed some 15,000 weapons turned in by various rebel factions after the recent civil war ended.

October 23; The last Nigerian peacekeeping troops left Liberia.

October 25, 1999 Nigeria announced it has spent some eight billion dollars on its Liberian peacekeeping operation. Over 500 Nigerian soldiers were killed and many more injured. Some 12,000 Nigerian troops served in Liberia from 1990 to 1997. After that, some went home and others were sent to Sierra Leone. A few remained in Liberia.

October 27; A local human rights group (FOCUS) has shed light on a brutal anti-terrorist battalion led by president Charles Taylor's son Chucky. The unit, stationed in the troubled northeast (140 kilometers from the capital), has been using brutal methods for the past two years in dealing with real or imagined troublemakers in the area. President Taylor has refused to disband the unit, known as the ATU.

November 14, 1999 A sure sign that peace is returning. Most of the news of late has to do with corrupt government officials.

December 29; 1999 Liberia has appointed Brigadier General Kpenkpah Kona as Armed Forces Chief of Staff, and Brigadier General Samual Varney (who served with a rebel faction) as Deputy Chief of Staff. The new Army commander will be Colonel John Tarnue. --Stephen V Cole

January 10, 2000 Although the civil war is over, many of the 60,000 former fighters are still armed. These men are also frequently jobless, and often they turn to crime. The countryside is rife with banditry. In the towns, robberies take place in broad daylight. In the last week, the home (in Gbarnga, 160 kilometers northeast of the capital) of president Charles Taylor was robbed during the day by ten of his former soldiers. The men were armed with AK-47s, cleaned the place out and got away.

February 7, 2000 Liberia has destroyed 18,000 firearms and 3.2 million rounds of ammunition confiscated from eight warring factions last year. -- Stephen V Cole

February 8, 2000 President Charles Taylor is accused of preventing political opponents from using the mass media. The government has been slow in granting permission to start up radio stations.

February 28, 2000 President Charles Taylor is running a tight ship. State security, and government lawyers are going after those who dissent publicly. Not much violence so far, but the direction of government attitudes towards free speech is obvious. Taylor is also reluctant to allow opposition media to establish themselves, denying radio licenses for anyone with suspect opinions or intentions. The government is no protector of private property either, with home owners being evicted to provide housing for security forces. Note that this approach to government tends to produce a rebellion before long.

March 15, 2000 The government has shut down the nations two independent radio stations, denying opposition groups their most effective means of communicating with the majority of Liberians.

March 22, 2000 The government, bowing to local protests and international pressure, lifted its ban on a Roman Catholic run radio station.

March 27, 2000 Several Liberians were arrested in Sierra Leone as they prepared to cross the border into Liberia and start another insurrection.

March 30, 2000 Shooting broke out in the capital as police tried to disarm some soldiers who were carrying weapons outside their barracks (which is not allowed.)

April 6, 2000 It was members of the ULIMO rebel group (thought to be defunct) that were arrested in Sierra Leone on March 27th as they prepared to cross the border into Liberia and start another insurrection.

April 20, 2000 After police arrested an army captain for armed robbery, army troops went to free the officer. A gunfight broke out, leaving an army general wounded.

May 1, 2000 The government has agreed to reduce the army from 16,000 to 6,000 troops and to make sure that each tribe is equally represented.

May 5, 2000 President Charles Taylor has denounced the RUF Sierra Leone rebels, even though he has benefited financially from the illegal diamond trade from rebel held diamond mines in Sierra Leone.

May 9, 2000 President Charles Taylor has been appointed by fellow African leaders to negotiate with Sierra Leone rebel leader Foday Sankoh about the release of 500 UN peacekeepers the rebels are holding. Taylot and Sankoh have long been on good terms. But Taylor has also benefited financially from the illegal diamond trade from rebel held diamond mines in Sierra Leone. It is possession of these diamond areas that is prolonging the civil war in Sierra Leone. Taylor will travel to Sierra Leone to meet with Sankoh.

May 10, 2000 President CharlesTaylor has urged RUF not to advance on the Sierra Leone capital.

May 12, 2000 RUF leader Foday Sankoh was thought to be fleeing to RUF bases in Liberia.

May 15, 2000 Sierra Leone RUF rebels are holding UN peacekeepers just across the border in Liberia and it is from here that they are releasing them a few dozen at a time.

May 18, 2000 Libya has sent helicopters to move freed UN peacekeepers from RUF camps in Liberia to UN bases inside Sierra Leone.

May 25, 2000 Most Liberians appear to support the continuation of the UN arms embargo on Liberia. Outsiders listening to local talk radio and opinions expressed on the street have made it clear that many, if not most, Liberians see no need for additional arms. Charles Taylor, the current president, is a long time friend of Sierra Leone rebel leader Foday Sankoh and has operated the same way, mixing banditry with revolution. Liberians are afraid that Taylors government is turning into the same kind of corrupt dictatorship that Liberia has had in the past.

May 28, 2000 Nigeria has condemned Liberia for trading diamonds for arms with RUF rebels in Sierra Leone. Those weapons have killed hundreds of Nigerian peacekeepers over the last few years.

June 3, 2000 The British government warned president Charles Taylor against arming RUF and getting diamonds from RUF in return. Taylor denies this, but it is an open secret in Sierra Leone and Liberia.

June 12, 2000 Documents found in RUF leader Foday Sankohs house indicate that he was giving half the diamonds taken from RUF diamond fields to president Charles Taylor of Liberia. In return, RUF got weapons from Liberia and sanctuary for its bases. Meanwhile, Liberian politicians insist that 7,000 rebels are massing in neighboring Guinea, Ivory Coast and Sierra Leone to invade and overthrow the Charles Taylor government.

June 13, 2000 Britain asked the European Union to embargo aid to Liberia because Liberia is trading arms for diamonds with RUF rebels from Sierra Leone.

June 16, 2000 Anxious to get the threat of an European Union aid embargo against Liberia lifted, the foreign minister pointed out that it cannot get RUF to release 21 Indian peacekeepers while UN and Sierra Leone troops are fighting with RUF.

June 21, 2000 Liberia has moved elite army units to the presidential palace, and other army units to the Sierra Leone border. Liberia continues to deny that it is assisting RUF rebels and accuses Britain of bringing additional weapons into Sierra Leone in order to destabilize the region.

July 6, 2000 Documents discovered in Sierra Leone reveal that Liberian president Charles Taylor was deeply involved in the illegal export of diamonds from Sierra Leone through Liberia.

July 9, 2000 For the third time in two years, leftover rebels from the civil war (that ended in 1997) have invaded northern Liberia from bases in Guinea. These rebels are members of the Khran and Mandigo tribe and belonged to the ULIMO-J and ULIMO-K factions. These groups did not accept the 1997 agreement and fled to Guinea where they have prepared to restart the civil war. The rebels invaded in April and August of 1999, but were defeated. The rebels are thought to number 500-1,000 armed fighters.

July 10, 2000 Fighting continued in the north, with rebels trying to take the town of Voinjama, 320 kilometers north of the capital.

July 11, 2000 Fighting around the town of Voinjama continued for the third day. The government said the rebels numbered 300-400 and had surrounded government troops in Voinjama. Guinea has denied that that rebels are operating from Guinean bases.

July 12, 2000 The government has called all military age men to report to local military barracks. Rebels have invaded the country from Guinea and the Liberian government has described the situation as very serious. This is the third time in the last two years that rebels based in Guinea have invaded.

July 14, 2000 The government appealed to former militia leaders to reform their forces to help fight rebels in the north. The militias were disbanded at the end of the recent civil war and their leaders given government posts.

2000 July - Stability remains elusive. Government reports first attacks by rebels who identify themselves as Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy (LURD).

July 18, 2000 Guinean border guards refused to allow the Liberian ambassador to Guinea to enter Guinea.July 19, 2000 A state of emergency was decaled in the north (260 kilometers from the capital), where government troops and rebels have been fighting for week.

July 26, 2000 Fighting in the north has created some 35,000 refugees, as people continue to flee the fighting.

July 27, 2000 Fighting around the town of Voinjama (260 kilometers from the capital) continues. The town was been pretty much burned down when the government launched an attack to retake it. The attack failed, and fighting continues in the area.

July 31, 2000 The UN again singled out Liberia as the major conduit of illegal diamonds from Sierra Leone. In particular, Liberian president Charles Taylor was accused of personally benefiting from this trade. Liberia said the illegal trade had been going on since the 1950s and demanded hard evidence against Taylor.

August 8, 2000 The government announced an all out offensive against the rebels in the north. Nothing much seems to have changed after this announcement.

August 14, 2000 The war in the north is apparently not going well, as the government is now accusing the US of supporting the rebels and hiring assassins to kill president Charles Taylor.

September 5, 2000 The defense minister has been fired. This comes in the wake of reports that troops fighting rebels in the north are not receiving supplies.

September 10, 2000 Several thousand Liberian and Sierra Leone refugees in Guinea Bissau have been rounded up on suspicion that they were supporting rebels operating from bases in Liberia.

September 13, 2000 The government denies any connection to rebellion and unrest in Guinea Bissau. Guinea Bissau says raids from rebel bases in Liberia have left ten missing, 79 dead and many more injured. The source of all this grief are the UN run refugee camps in Guinea Bissau, which contain 125,000 Liberian and 330,000 Sierra Leone refugees. Many have been there for ten years.

September 15, 2000 Guinea has accused Liberia of backing armed groups that are raiding into Guinea.

September 18, 2000 Several thousand Liberians in Guinea Bissau have been told to leave the country, but the government has closed the border and prevented the Liberian government from flying its citizens out. Guinea insists that the Liberians are supporting Guinean rebels. In response, Liberia says it cannot guarantee the safety of Guineans in Liberia if Liberians are not let out of Guinea.

September 20, 2000 Some 13,000 refugees have fled the fighting in the north.

October 5, 2000 West African nations under Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) are sending military observers to Liberia to monitor the border areas where bandits and rebels are attacking from across the borders of neighboring nations.

October 9, 2000 Liberian rebels attacked from inside Guinea. Fighting continues some 210 kilometers northeast of the capital.

October 11, 2000 The US has warned American citizens to steer clear of Liberia in light of the fighting and civil disorder. Non-essential American diplomatic personnel have been withdrawn from Liberia. Because of Liberian involvement in the illegal diamond trade for Sierra Leonian rebels, the US has also restricted issuing visas for Liberian government officials and family members wanting to travel to America.

October 17, 2000 After a weekend of ethnic violence, police arrested 22 Gio, Mano and Mandingos suspected of instigating the violence. The Mandingos were accused to supporting rebels.

October 20, 2000 Troops have finally driven rebels from the northern province of Voinjama (260 kilometers north of the capital.) Fighting has been going on (and off since July. Some 18 rebels were killed in a two day battle to clear the provincial capital.

November 3, 2000 President Charles Taylor wants to meet with the head of Guinea-Bissau to personally work out the violence on their border region.

November 22, 2000 Army troops are battling rebel 270 kilometers northeast of the capital.

November 24, 2000 Army troops finally beat back attacks by rebels 270 kilometers northeast of the capital. The area is near the borders with Guinea-Bissau and Ivory Coast. The rebels operate from camps in Guinea-Bissau.

November 28, 2000 Three hundred armed war veterans attacked the offices of the Center for Democratic Empowerment (CEDE), smashing office equipment and stealing cash and valuables. The CEDE has been a critic of president Charles Taylor's corrupt rule. The country's infrastructure is still in ruins, with no electricity or running water in most areas. Lawlessness is common and the police and army are more involved with corruption than in fighting it.

December 26, 2000 Liberia is calling for more UN troops in Sierra Leone, noting that some one hundred Liberian troops killed fighting rebels and bandits based in Sierra Leone. Liberia says that it has spent over $50 million fighting the invasions fro Sierra Leone.

January 4, 2001 Police arrested 26 men, suspected of being mercenaries, as they were about to board a ferry to Guinea-Bissau. Most of the men were Liberians, the rest were Guineas and Sierra Leonians.

January 9, 2001 Some 15,000 Guinea-Bissau refugees have crossed the border to escape fighting in their country.

January 12, 2001 The government has sent an infantry battalion to the Guinea-Bissau border. The purpose is to deal with any cross border violence resulting when ECOWAS peacekeepers appear in the area shortly. Meanwhile, the government says it has expelled all RUF (Sierra Leone) rebels in its territory.

January 13, 2001 The government pledged to no longer support the Sierra Leone rebels.

January 18, 2001 The UN is considering extending it's eight year arms embargo on Liberia. The UN is miffed at Liberia because of the continuing illegal diamond trade through Liberia. Because of the arms embargo, Liberia has had to pay higher prices from gunrunners for weapons.

January 20, 2001 The government says it will no longer participate in efforts to bring peace to neighboring Sierra Leone. Liberian president has been under international pressure, and censure, for his involvement in the illegal diamond trade in Sierra Leone.

January 30, 2001 Fighting continues on the area where the borders of Liberia, Sierra Leone and Guinea Bissau meet. Liberia tolerates rebels from both nations, who set up camp in Liberia and raid into the neighboring nations. Guinea Bissau has been making attacks into Liberia to try and deal with the rebels. The Liberian government has made deals with the rebels and gotten involved in the diamond and arms trade. The UN is putting pressure on Liberia to stop supporting the rebels, but so far Liberia's response have been words, not deeds. Liberia even refuses to get involved in the fighting on its own border areas.

February 26, 2001 The government announced it is willing to create a corridor of "safe passage" for refugees trapped by rebel action in Guinea. However, the government either lacks the troops, or the willingness, to make this happen. Everyone is still waiting for the ECOWAS peacekeepers to arrive in the border area. But this has been delayed again and again. No one is in a big rush to place troops in the middle of this mess. ECOWAS is asking for a two month delay in deploying their troops. There are leadership and logistical problems. Liberian troops are skirmishing with sundry armed groups in the border area, but no one really controls the place.

February 28, 2001 The government has accused Guinea of firing on Liberian troops near the Guinea border. Guinea says it is attacking rebels who have been operating inside Guinea and using bases in Liberia.

March 5, 2001 Rebels led by former General Julue have captured the town of Voinjama, near the Guinea border. The government claims Guinea supports the rebels, Guinea denies that.

March 7, 2001The UN passed a resolution imposing an arms embargo on Liberia, and an economic embargo in two months if Liberia does not halt its support for the RUF rebels, including importing diamonds from Sierra Leone (RUF controls the diamond fields there.)

March 8, 2001 The government says it will fully comply with the UN demands, and go them one better by banning all diamond exports. This could have serious economic implications, as the national budget is only some $100 million a year and the diamond trade is estimated at anywhere from $25 million to over $100 million a year.

March 20, 2001 The ambassadors of Sierra Leone and Guinea have been expelled and the border with Sierra Leone closed. Liberia accuses Guinea of harboring Liberian ULIMO rebels. Liberia has long traded arms for diamonds with Sierra Leone rebels, which has led to battles on the Liberian border with Sierra Leone troops.

March 21, 2001 The embassy staffs of Sierra Leone and Guinea were ordered cut in half and the remaining diplomats forbidden to travel more than 50 kilometers from the capital.

March 22, 2001 The arrest of four local journalists for reporting on military spending has caused demonstrations, especially by college students. The police are cracking down violently.

March 24, 2001 The president has cancelled his trip to a Nigerian peace conference. This meeting was to discuss the violence on the Guinean and Sierra Leone border.

April 5, 2001 In the north, the army is engaged in heavy fighting rebels. Liberia accuses Guinea of tolerating rebel bases in Guinean territory. No reports on casualties.

April 11, 2001 At the urging of other West African nations, the government has reversed it's decision to expel the ambassadors from Guinea and Sierra Leone. President Charles Taylor finally decided to attend a conference outside Liberia and this allowed for some personal diplomacy.

April 28, 2001 Rebels captured the border town of Zorzor in the north. The fighting has been intense, if largely uncovered by journalists. But some 15,000 refugees have fled the violence in the last three weeks.

May 2, 2001 The government says it is succeeding in defeating rebels in the north. But few reporters are able to reach the combat zone and refugee accounts contradict the government reports.

May 4, 2001 The fighting in the north intensifies, with reports of unidentified armed men indiscriminately slaughtering civilians. Some 10,000 Liberians have fled to Sierra Leone.

May 5, 2001 Liberia claims that Guinea is fighting in their border region in order to gain control of diamond fields in the area.

May 7, 2001 Today, new UN sanctions on Liberia begin. The main one prohibits any diamond exports from Liberia. This measure will stop the trade of illegal diamonds via Liberia. Rebels in neighboring countries have long supported themselves via an illegal diamond trade. Liberia is protesting the sanctions, but there has been a long history of evidence that president Charles Taylor is involved in the illegal trade. Other sanctions limit the international travel of senior government officials.

May 9, 2001 After shots were fired at the Egyptian embassy, the government suggested that foreign diplomats stay off the streets. More soldiers were assigned to guard embassies. The attack was blamed on rebels, although many of the government's followers are angry at UN sanctions against Liberia. There is considerable unrest throughout Liberia, as most citizens are now aware that Taylor's government is as corrupt as the one he replaced.

May 11, 2001 The fighting in the north continues. The rebel group, Liberia United for Reconstruction and Development (LURD), formed around supporters of former Liberian president Samuel Doe. The leader of the rebels is a former general in the Doe government, Charles Julu. Liberian president Taylor accuses unnamed foreign nations of supporting LURD.

May 2001 - UN Security Council reimposes arms embargo to punish Taylor for trading weapons for diamonds from rebels in Sierra Leone.

May 17, 2001 The UN is trying to convince Guinea to open it's border to Liberians fleeing fighting in their country. Some 50,000 Liberian refugees are stuck at the border. Guinea has accepted hundreds of thousands of refugees from war torn Sierra Leone and Liberia. The refugee flood has caused problems in Guinea, as the refugees compete with locals for resources and harbor armed (and violent) bandits and rebels. Guineans are also resentful of the aid the refugees receive.

May 23, 2001 The government claims the recapture of a town in the north from LURD rebels. But these towns change hands frequently, with neither side being very good at hanging on to anything they capture.

May 26, 2001 Fighting against LURD rebels in the north intensified. A senior Liberian officer was reported killed while trying to rally troops. The government says it has things under control, but other sources report that the government has lost control of much of the border area. Guinea is accused of supporting the rebels. It also appears that Guinea is doing this partially to keep the rebels (who often act like bandits) from attacking Guinean civilians.

June 6, 2001 Government troops have recaptured the town of Voinjama, 260 kilometers north of the capital.

June 9, 2001 The government claims that it's troops have killed hundreds of rebels in the north and driven the survivors back into Guinea. An invasion of Guinea was ruled out. This means that the bases of the Liberian rebels in Guinea are safe. The rebels belong to factions on the losing side of the civil war that brought the current government to power.

June 18, 2001 Over the weekend, a US Army sergeant, serving as an assistant military attach at the US embassy, was shot and wounded at a military checkpoint near the presidential palace. The event occurred at 3 AM on Sunday when the sergeant tried to drive through the checkpoint without stopping.

June 27, 2001 With it's diamond trade disrupted by UN sanctions, Liberia has turned to timber exports. Chinese and French firms are buying millions of dollars of prime timber a month. Even many in the Liberian government are appalled at the speed and extent of the logging, which goes after valuable types of trees quickly before such operations are declared illegal.

July 3, 2001 The government reported that Guinea based rebels have counterattacked in the north (310 kilometers north of the capital), turning the border area into a no-man's land. The rebels are using mortars and artillery to keep the army at bay. There are also reports of rebel activity 70 kilometers north of the capital.

July 6, 2001 Although most of the teenage soldiers have been disarmed, there are some ugly aftereffects. These young men grew up seeing power come from whoever had a gun. Traditional respect for elders was eroded. Now there is a generation of teenagers and young men who, while they don't have guns, do have their fists and access to knives and machetes. The crime rate has gone up and there is a lot more violence within families.

July 24, 2001 In the north, where rebels have driven many government troops out of the area, troops still managed to ambush a group of fifteen rebels, kill them all and seize a large supply of weapons and ammunition. The fighting has been going back and forth for several weeks in the area some 250 kilometers north of the capital.

July 26, 2001 President Charles Taylor has declared an amnesty for rebels and those accused of treason. This will bring a number of prominent dissidents back into the country. It's unlikely that many of the rebels in the north will accept the amnesty, for most of those rebels have become bandits.

August 1, 2001 Some 30,000 civilians have fled the fighting in the north. Some 4,000 went to Ivory Coast, and another to Sierra Leone. But the remainder are in refugee camps in the center of the country, where relief organizations provide food.

August 2, 2001 Relief workers in the north report that government troops and rebels are both using rape and torture to terrorize the civilian population. The government has denied that it's troops have abused civilians. In the past, Liberian troops have frequently treated civilians poorly.

August 10, 2001 The government reports that rebels in the north, having taken a beating from government troops, are now moving to western Liberia (an area 120 kilometers west of the capital.) The army is sending more troops to this region in order to keep the pressure on the rebels.

September 5, 2001 Rebels attacked 100 kilometers north of the capital, but were repulsed, leaving two rebel leaders and three soldiers dead. There was also some property damage and vehicle theft. In another incident, twenty rebels were killed when their truck was ambushed. The government controls most of the northern areas now, but small rebel bands continue to raid and attack.

September 7, 2001 With the Guinea based LURD rebels being defeated, another rebellion appears to be brewing. The government of former rebel John Taylor is increasingly totalitarian, banning or blocking opposition groups and programs. The Taylor government is also pretty corrupt.

September 12, 2001 The government denounced the September 11 terrorist attacks in the United States.

September 17, 2001 A radio station that aired anti-American comments was closed and the host of the show arrested (he was later freed). The comments were about America not caring about the long unrest and loss of life in Liberia. For that, a caller to the station said on the air, "American deserved it (the September 11th attacks.)"

September 24, 2001 President Charles Taylor says he will not tolerate any Islamic fundamentalism in Liberia. Some 20 percent of the population in Liberia is Moslem.

October 24, 2001 Liberia said it will reopen it's borders with Guinea and Sierra Leone, but did not say when. There is still some shooting on the Liberian side of the border, although the level of violence is much lower than it was a short time ago.

November 3, 2001 Liberia denied that the bin Laden organization was involved with the illegal diamond trade in Sierra Leone. The UN accusations (also directed at the RUF rebels) recognize the fact that many Arabs (largely refugees from the 1975-90 Lebanese civil war) have settled in West Africa and now dominate much of the retail and wholesale trade in the region. Bin Laden's organization has depended on Arab speaking banking and trading organizations around the world to provide banking and other services. Some of the local Arabs know they are dealing with terrorists, some don't. Business is business, especially if the customer speaks Arabic.

November 6, 2001 The government had the deputy Minister of Labor arrested for the murder of a Nigerian businessman. Such crimes have been common and diplomats from the victim's homelands have increasingly hostile over these matters.

November 17, 2001 The government says it will eliminate the rebels in the north by Christmas. The principal rebel group is the LURD, composed of members of former government of Samuel Doe (killed in 1990). There are also tribal antagonisms at play. Some 60,000 people have fled the fighting so far.

November 28, 2001 Rebels in the north attacked two towns in the north. The rebels, many of them locals, used hidden paths in the bush to outflank army units. Foreign aid workers are fleeing, as are some of the troops.

November 29, 2001 The fighting in the north has begun spreading to the south. Fighting over the last two days has killed hundreds of people, mostly civilians. The government blames the rebellion on Guinea (which accuses Liberia of backing Guinea rebels.) But the rebels are most likely tribal groups opposed to the tribes in power.

November 30, 2001 The security situation in the southwest has become so dangerous that foreign aid workers are leaving the area.

December 7, 2001 Troops retook two towns, along the Guinean border, from LURD rebels. A rebel commander and at least 27 of his troops were killed, December 10, 2001 The government reported that Deputy National Security Minister Emmet Ross was killed in a rebel ambush in the northwest last week.

December 12, 2001 Fighting along the Guinean border has, so far, created 12,000 refugees.

December 15, 2001 Government troops have taken the rebel stronghold of Kolahun, near the Guinean border. The market town, held by Guinea based rebels for the past nine months, made it easier for the rebels to get supplies from Guinea. Rebels continue to resist and are apparently going to attempt a counterattack.

December 18, 2001The renewed fighting in the north has caused at least 40,000 people to flee their homes.

December 19, 2001 For the second time this year, LURD rebels (75 of them) moved out of Guinea and attacked the north Liberian town of Zorzor. The small garrison fought for a while and then fled. Rebels and troops continue to fight over control of Kolahun, 310 kilometers north of Zurzor. Most of the fighting in this border war is between small groups of troops, often no more than a few dozen, rarely more than a few hundred on a side.

December 24, 2001 Some 20,000 refugees living in northern Liberia camps have fled to avoid fighting between rebels and government troops.

December 31, 2001 Liberian soldiers attacked a refugee holding 15,000 Sierra Leone refugees. At least 1,300 of the refugees fled into Sierra Leone.

January 10, 2002 Fighting in the north has died down, but the rebels are still in business.

January 2002 - More than 50,000 Liberians and Sierra Leonean refugees flee fighting. In February Taylor declares a state of emergency.

January 16, 2002 The government has released Raleigh Seekie, who had founded the ULIMO rebel group (which has since split into two tribal factions' Krahn and Mandingo), from prison. This is another move to defuse brewing rebellions.

January 23, 2002 In another peace move, the government released ten LURD prisoners and handed them over to their families in a ceremony attended by the Red Cross and media. The increasing presence of UN peacekeepers in Sierra Leone has made it more difficult for LURD to maintain its bases in Sierra Leone.

January 28, 2002 Fighting with LURD rebels has reached refugee camps in the north, causing the refugees to become refugees once more.

January 29, 2002 Up to a hundred thousand civilians are fleeing fighting in the north. This includes Sierra Leone refugees as well as Liberians.

January 30, 2002 The government has warned foreign aid workers not to venture into the northern part of the country, where the troops are fighting LURD rebels.

February 4, 2002 The government reported that fighting with LURD rebels in the north had intensified.

February 5, 2002 The government complained that the the UN arms embargo (imposed because of Liberia's involvement with the illegal diamond trade and Sierra Leone rebels) has left the armed forces so weak that they have lost over a thousand soldiers to the three year old LURD rebellion.

February 8, 2002 The government has declared a state of emergency because LURD rebels have advanced to within 40 kilometers of the capital. The government blames the UN arms embargo (imposed because of Liberia's involvement with the illegal diamond trade and Sierra Leone rebels). Some government opponents say it's all a ploy to cancel upcoming elections and to get the UN to lift the sanctions. After all the LURD represent remnants of the previous dictatorship, which was deposed in 1990 and was arguably worse than the current one.

February 9, 2002 Thousands of refugees are fleeing the fighting north of the capital. More army troops are moving north to attack rebels in the town of Klay Junction.

February 10, 2002 Rebels have left the town of Klay Junction, along with most of its inhabitants, after fighting with army troops. Soldiers are pursuing the rebels, but are still encountering resistance.

February 11, 2002 Police raided a LURD rebel hideout in the capital and arrested several suspects. Over 11,000 refugees have fled to the capital to escape the fighting.

February 13, 2002 Fighting continues 25 miles from the capital, along with an increase in banditry and looting. Thousands of civilians are fleeing the area. In the capital, police have arrested or attacked journalists accused to publishing "inflammatory statements" about the fighting with the rebels.

February 14, 2002 Over 700 refugees have fled Liberia into Sierra Leone. More are expected as lawlessness and fighting continues in Liberia. In western Liberia, LURD rebels attacked the garrison town of Tubmanburg and burned down army barracks. At least a thousand local civilians fled.

February 16, 2002 The LURD rebels have apparently backed off on their advance on the capital, while moving further west to attack and plunder other towns. No one knows how many rebels there, but it apparently only a few hundred. Most of the army is spread out over the country in small garrisons. The total strength of the army is only about 4,000 men, although there are several thousand others who can be called up, armed and sent out in organized units.

February 17, 2002 UN peacekeepers in Sierra Leone are on the Liberian border, but have not found any LURD operations to police.

February 18, 2002 LURD rebels are operating in the Klay region, 40 kilometers from the capital.

February 25, 2002 The LURD rebel offensive has petered out as a military threat, but remains a formidable source of rumors. The most outrageous (but not completely dismissed one) is that the "LURD offensive" is a government scam to obtain sympathy from the UN (which is mad at the government for dealing in diamonds with various rebel groups.) Other rumors have to do with government corruption and the inability of the army to deal with a small, ramshackle rebel outfit like LURD.

March 2, 2002 Over 10,000 Liberians have fled the current fighting with LURD. The refugees have gone to neighboring countries.

March 6, 2002 The LURD rebels call for peace talks, but not if they involve president Charles Taylor (which the rebels accuse, with some accuracy, of massive corruption and misrule.) The government refuses to hold peace talks unless Taylor is involved. The rebels want to arrest Taylor and try him for his crimes.

March 15, 2002 The LURD rebels refused to attend peace talks because they say they got the invitation too late, and they don't trust the government.

March 16, 2002 After two days of peace negotiations, the government and civic groups (but not the LURD rebels) agreed that a ceasefire would be a swell idea. Disarmament and an end to fighting was not agreed on. There was a call for an end to tribalism, but not for an end to dictatorship and corrupt government. While everyone is tired of the fighting, not everyone is willing to clean up the government and stop the army from being a bunch of uniformed bandits (troops are often not paid for months and turn to looting to support themselves.)

March 21, 2002 Some 95 kilometers northwest of the capital, rebels attacked a convoy of five timber company trucks, killing a number of people. The rebels made off with one truck and destroyed two others. The other two trucks escaped with survivors. The timber companies involved are owned by friends and relatives of president Charles Taylor. Two soldiers and an army general with the convoy were wounded. The export of lumber is one of the more lucrative activities in the country.

March 25, 2002 The government has arrested some of the 250 employees of the state run radio station and accused them of sabotage. The radio station staff have been complaining that they have not been paid in 14 months.

March 30, 2002 Lack of accurate reporting from the diamond mining areas in the north leaves everyone wondering if the government is still in control up there. Apparently many small bands of armed rebels are moving about the area, skirmishing with groups of soldiers, and often running off the troops. The town of Suehn may not have fallen, as the government insists. But apparently the rebels aren't after towns, but the diamond fields, which are now being worked by rebels, or miners willing to share their finds with the rebels. It's all about money more than anything else.

April 4, 2002 The government has asked for former soldiers to rejoin in order to deal with the LURD rebels. Some 4,000 soldiers have left the army since Charles Taylor came to power in 1997 (and 2,200 of those in the last year). At least 300 of these veterans were seen assembling by the defense ministry. Rebels have been reported operating 55 kilometers from the capital.

April 5, 2002 LURD rebels continue to move about the country unchallenged, raiding towns. The government reported that the provincial capital Tubmanburg was under attack, but communications within the country are so bad that the government was unsure exactly what the extent of the attack was.

April 26, 2002 The government has banned political rallies, citing the danger of rebel activity against such gatherings. More likely, the government is fearful of popular protests against the depredations of what passes for a Liberian army. Most of the troops have little training and discipline is slack (the officers are selected more of political reliability than for military skills.) The troops tend to loot and rape whenever they have the chance, causing much resentment and anger among civilians.

May 1, 2002 Some 20 members of LURD were arrested as they crossed from Liberia into Sierra Leone. The Sierra Leone police are questioning the men. LURD camps are usually located in Guinea. The fighting in northern Liberia between LURD and the government has degenerated into bands of government troops and LURD rebels wandering around and attacking local civilians more than each other. Thousands of civilians have been fleeing the chaos.

May 7, 2002 The UN extended the arms embargo on Liberia for a year. Liberia protested, pointing out that the RUF rebels (in Sierra Leone) Liberia was accused of supporting had surrendered and disarmed. Meanwhile, Liberia was still fighting LURD rebels operating from bases in Guinea.

May 8, 2002 LURD rebels attacked and captured one of the army's major bases; Camp Naama. Located 170 kilometers northeast of the capital. The rebels were also said to be on the move in the northeast and are closing in on the provincial capital of Gbarnga (160 kilometers north of the capital.

May 10, 2002 For two days, fighting between the army and LURD rebels for control of the provincial capital of Gbarnga has led to the government forces retreating to the outskirts of the town. At least 20,000 refugees are fleeing the fighting 160 kilometers from the capital. The defense minister is said to be personally supervising the army operations in Gbarnga.

May 12, 2002 LURD rebels have been reported in the towns of Klay (35 kilometers north of the capital) and Arthington (20 kilometers northwest.) The rebels made it to Klay back in February, but were driven back.

May 13, 2002 The government says it has stopped the LURD advance 160 kilometers north of the capital, but LURD fighters are reported in other areas of the country, some quite close to the capital (where artillery fire could be heard). There is no national police to keep an eye on local rebel operations and the army is unreliable and spread too thin across the country.

May 14, 2002 There is panic in the capital as The sounds of artillery can be heard in the capital. LURD rebels are fighting troops in Arthington (20 kilometers to the northwest)

May 15, 2002 Panic subsided in the capital as the sounds of fighting were no longer heard on the outskirts.

May 16, 2002 Government troops have recaptured the provincial capital of Gbarnga 160 kilometers north of the capital. Gbarnga has considerable symbolic importance, as it was president Taylors base during the Liberian civil war of the 1990s. Meanwhile, a police commander was dismissed for looting president Taylor's home in Arthington (Taylor's home town 20 kilometers northwest of the capital.) There has been much looting in all the areas where troops and rebels are fighting, and both sides apparently join in.

May 17, 2002 Liberia's neighbors are calling for peace talks, but LURD (thought to be 3,000 fighters from various factions current Liberian president Taylor defeated in the late 1990s) is not saying much. Some 40,000 Liberians have fled the fighting in the north.

May 19, 2002 In a sure sign that the LURD rebels are now a very serious threat, Lebanese merchants, who control most of the wholesale trade, have begin evacuating their families. Lebanese came to West Africa in the 1980s, to escape civil war in Lebanon. Meanwhile, LURD has been fighting government troops in the towns of Klay (35 kilometers north of the capital) and Arthington (20 kilometers northwest) for the last few days.

May 20, 2002 The current fighting is creating several thousand new refugees a day, with most of them trying to get out of Liberia. LURD says it is willing to negotiate with the government.

May 21, 2002 Government troops have forced LURD out of Gbarnga (160 kilometers northwest of the capital) and two smaller towns 20 kilometers outside the capital. The US State Department has warned Americans to stay out of Liberia because of safety concerns.

May 23, 2002 LURD rebels were fighting the army in two towns 45 kilometers northwest of the capital.

May 24, 2002 LURD rebels have taken the town of Gbah, 40 kilometers northwest of the capital and a astride key route to Sierra Leone. The artillery fire could be heard on the outskirts of the capital. LURD control of captured towns is generally brief, with the rebels disappearing when too many government troops show up.

May 25, 2002 The government has refused a proposal by neighboring countries to assist in setting up negotiations with LURD. The government feels that this would legitimize LURD, which is mainly composed of factions defeated by the current government in the 1989-96 civil war. But many civilian groups and pro-government political parties are urging negotiations, and the government may change its mind. The disputes are personal and tribal. LURD wants a cut of foreign aid, and any other money making deals the government has set up. Corruption is widespread, with the government insisting on a cut of any significant economic activity.

May 29, 2002 UN peacekeepers have warned the Liberian government to do something about armed men crossing the border into Sierra Leone to loot and pillage. The Sierra Leone side of the border is well patrolled by UN peacekeepers and Sierra Leone police, while there is no patrolling on the Liberian side. Meanwhile, LURD has captured Garmou, 180 kilometers northeast of Monrovia. Government forces appear incapable to hunting down and destroying LURD units, which disappear into the bush if pressed too hard.

May 30, 2002 LURD rebels ambushed members of the ATU (Anti -Terrorist Unit) in the northwest and killed 20 of them.

June 3, 2002 An army offensive near the Guinean border, in an attempt to cut off LURD from their camps in Guinea, has resulted in heavy fighting 260 kilometers northwest of the capital. Fighting also continues at Tubmanburg, 65 kilometers northwest of the capital. The government says it would have an easier time of it if the UN arms embargo were lifted.

June 4, 2002 In Sierra Leone, police arrested 50 Liberian soldiers who had crossed the border to steal food and rob villagers. Police reported that these incursions are becoming more common as the fighting with LURD in Liberia causes more chaos in the Liberian economy. In the last week, some 3,400 Liberians fled to refugee camps in Sierra Leone.

June 6, 2002 A military delegation from ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States) has arrived in Liberia to try to get peace talks going between the government and LURD. The ECOWAS delegation will also look into the extent of LURDs control and the viability of the current government.

June 7, 2002 The government said it was fighting for control of a rebel held town in the diamond rich area 96 kilometers north of the capital. The government has raised armed citizens to help troops clear rebels out of northern Liberia. Some 150,000 people have become refugees because of the fighting. Relief supplies have not been able to get through to many refugees because of the fighting.

June 10, 2002 The government says it has had success in fighting the LURD rebels, capturing large stocks of enemy ammunition, liberating key towns and killing 150 rebels. The government admitted as many as 50 of their troops had died.

June 12, 2002 President Charles Taylor, responding to widespread complaints about government corruption, fired the head of his party for complaining about government corruption. Taylor insists that corruption is normal and that it occurs in all countries. The LURD rebels have gained some popular support for saying they are against corruption.

June 13, 2002 LURD rebels and government troops are fighting for control of a 70 kilometer section of highway north of the capital. The rebels hold the high ground in the area, making it difficult to dislodge them.

June 18, 2002 Civilian witnesses claimed two soldiers and four civilians were killed in a rebel ambush 40 kilometers north of the capital. The government denied this and said bandits were just raiding markets in the area. It's often difficult to tell the difference between bandits and rebels.

June 20, 2002 The current round of fighting has created over 250,000 refugees, most of them staying in the country, but without food and shelter. The UN fears mass starvation because of the inability of relief workers to get food to many refugees because of the fighting.

June 21, 2002 LURD rebels attacked the town of Sinje, 70 kilometers northwest of the capital. Five nurses were taken captive, food and other items were looted and 11,000 refugees staying in the area fled.

June 26, 2002 The recent fighting with LURD rebels has created some 350,000 refugees inside the country. Because LURD tends to spend more time looting and abusing civilians, than fighting, they have created more refugees. Civilians will flee at the hint of LURD moving in their direction. Aid organizations have had a hard time getting aid to many of the refugees, as LURD (and sometimes the army) will loot aid supplies and rob aid workers. Army troops have also been caught looting villages abandoned by fleeing refugees.

June 27, 2002 LURD has offered to release the six nurses it kidnapped last week. But first it wants a little recognition and respect. It's no known if the kidnapping was deliberate or just an accidental side effect of the looting and pillaging accompanying the attack on a refugee camp.

July 2, 2002 LURD continues to attack refugee camps, causing a continuing stream of refugees fleeing into neighboring Sierra Leone.

July 5, 2002 Police scoured the western and northern suburbs of the capital looking for LURD infiltrators. Six men were arrested. LURD has been rumored to be sending men into towns before an attack in order to scout the area and see if there is any local support for the rebels.

July 6, 2002 The government is cracking down on the local media, arresting or harassing editors who publish "anti-government stories."

July 8, 2002 The UN has moved it's offices to a safer area (a neighborhood containing embassies) in the capital. President Charles Taylor has said he cannot leave the capital because there is a possibility that the capital will be attacked soon.

July 10, 2002 The government says it has almost finished driving LURD rebels out of the Bomi Hills region 65 kilometers northwest of the capital. The area is rich in diamonds.

July 11, 2002 A Liberian peace conference hosted by Burkina Faso ended without the Liberian government participating. LURD attended and all called for a ceasefire and negotiations. Representatives of nine Liberian political parties attended. The government does not want to negotiate.

July 18, 2002 LURD and NGOs have accused the government of using teenagers as soldiers and forcing civilians to do non-combat work for the army. LURD also says the army is using civilians as human shields in combat. None of these accusations are unusual in Western Africa and both LURD and the government are probably guilty.

July 19, 2002 Years of war have left the country with an 80 percent unemployment rate and with nearly as much of the population living in dire poverty. This has increased the crime rate. The economic conditions also provide support for those fighting against the government (mainly the LURD group.)

July 21, 2002 Government troops have recaptured Tubmanburg (65 kilometers north of the capital) from LURD rebels.

July 26, 2002 President Charles Taylor held a peace conference in the capital, but all the groups opposing him, particularly LURD, denounced it as a sham and stayed away.

July 30, 2002 The government has agreed to negotiate with LURD if the rebels first lay down their weapons. This is unlikely to happen. Fighting continues 60 kilometers north of the capital, as LURD tries to recapture Tubmanburg.

August 2, 2002 The fighting in the north is directed more at local civilians than at enemy fighters. Rape and pillage are common activities of soldiers and rebels alike.

August 8, 2002 The fighting continues in the north, with no clear advantage to either side. In fact, both the army and the rebels appear to be spending most of their time looting, and avoiding fighting each other.

August 9, 2002 Refugees from the chaotic fighting are becoming a problem. There are (estimated) 50,000 refugees around the capital, 50,000 elsewhere in the country and another 68,000 in neighboring countries (30,000 in Sierra Leone 20,000 in Guinea, 16,000 in Ivory Coast and so on.) The war has reduced about 75 percent of the population to extreme poverty.

August 11, 2002 UN peacekeepers in Sierra Leone stated that both LURD rebels and Liberian army units have been crossing the border to loot villages and refugee camps. Locals are often kidnapped to serve as porters to carry the loot back to Liberia.

August 15, 2002 Fighting continues 150-200 kilometers north of the capital. The government claims success in pushing the LURD rebels out of towns, then someone from LURD gets on a cell phone and denies it. The area is too dangerous for most journalists, with gunmen from both sides too eager to do a little robbery and murder on the side if they encounter reporters.

August 16, 2002 The government announced that its troops had recaptured Voinjama (270 kilometers north of the capital), which was being used as the headquarters for the LURD rebels. Voinjama has changed hands three times recently and is pretty much wrecked.

August 21, 2002 LURD denied that government troops had recaptured Voinjama. LURD did accuse the government troops of attacking from Sierra Leone, with the assistance of Sierra Leone RUF rebels. Liberia, mainly it's president Charles Taylor, has long been accused of backing the RUF rebels in return of a piece of the illegal diamond trade in Sierra Leone. Taylor has always denied everything, but if this particular military coalition is proven, Taylor's misdeeds will be confirmed.

September 2, 2002 LURD released five nurses kidnapped in June. The nurses worked for an aid organization and the LURD had been demanding ransom. The nurses were handed over to UN officials on the Guinea border.

September 9, 2002 Apparently, some of the demobilized soldiers and rebels in Sierra Leone are returning to fighting and showing up in Liberia.

September 10, 2002 Gunfire was heard on the Sierra Leone border, but otherwise there was no indication of LURD activity.

September 11, 2002 In the capital, diplomats from Sierra Leone, Guinea and Liberia met to work out ways to cooperate against the LURD rebels.

September 12, 2002 LURD claims to have 7,000 armed members and control 45 percent of the country. LURD is against corruption and former warlords trying to make a comeback. LURD is pretty much a popular organization, working on no budget because they have not been getting money from extortion or smuggled diamonds.

September 13, 2002 The government says it recaptured the town of Bopolu, a town 120 kilometers northwest of the capital.

September 14, 2002 Civilian survivors of fighting in the north say that government troops caused most of the damage (destroying buildings and killing civilians) while the LURD rebels tried to protect civilians.

September 15, 2002 The government lifted the state of emergency and restrictions on political activity.

September 16, 2002 The government has rejected the use of foreign peacekeepers to deal with the violence and rebellion in the country.

September 17, 2002 LURD rarely makes public pronouncements, but now it says that it will capture the capital and oust the current government within six months.

October 5, 2002 Fighting has died down, and the government has lifted the state of emergency. The government appears to be gathering more forces. LURD claims that the government is hiring former Sierra Leone RUF rebels to fight as mercenaries against LURD. Guinean troops have been going after what appear to be LURD troops pillaging for supplies along the Liberian border. Then again, the looters may have been Liberian troops or just bandit. It's often hard to tell the difference, because neither the army nor LURD always provides its fighters with food and other items on a timely basis.

October 10, 2002 The government says that in 2003, half of the $70 million national budget will go to fighting the LURD rebels. The fighting has settled down to sniping and raids by soldiers and rebels looking for loot.

October 14, 2002 President Charles Taylor accused neighboring Guinea of arming the LURD rebels.

October 15, 2002 A UN investigation has accused the government of smuggling in 200 tons of arms and military spare parts over the Summer. The supplier was in Yugoslavia, the arms being surplus Yugoslav army stuff. The weapons came in on six cargo flights. UN sanctions prohibit selling arms to Liberia.

October 19, 2002 President Charles Taylor accused a South African diamond dealer, Niko Shefer, of financing LURD in order to gain a monopoly over Liberian diamond fields.

October 25, 2002 The government says that it has LURD on the run and is fighting the last remnants of the rebels around Jenneh Town (170 kilometers north of the capital). Small forces are involved; about a thousand army troops and a few hundred rebels. The government said that they captured Kolahun on September 30 after losing four soldiers and killing 18 rebels (including two leaders.) The government had attacked Kolahun nine times over the last three years and failed to take it from LURD each time.

November 2, 2002 A UN report asserts that the government has spent nearly all it's income (that wasn't embezzled) on military operations. Defying the UN arms embargo, and restrictions on the international movement of government leaders and their families, the country has descended into anarchy. The LURD rebels, raised from tribes that oppose the tribes supporting the government, get their weapons from outlaws and gun runners in neighboring Guinea, Sierra Leone and Ivory Coast. Despite the failure of the embargo, the UN wants to extend it for another year and try to find ways to better enforce it. No one is interested in sending any more peacekeepers to Liberia.

November 16, 2002 LURD claims to have captured the northern (330 kilometers from the capital) town of Foyah. The government counterattack in the north has apparently failed.

November 27, 2002 Fearing a major attack on the capital by LURD, the government has put troops on alert for the last two weeks and ordered fishing boats away from waters off the capital. Apparently it is feared that LURD would use stolen fishing boats to attack from the sea. But nothing has happened. Yet.

December 1, 2002 Apparently some Liberians are joining in the Ivory Coast fighting, as French citizens in Ivory Coast report being robbed by English speaking armed Africans. In this part of Africa, English is commonly spoken only in Liberia. But the Liberians may be in Ivory Coast primarily to take advantage of the disorder and to loot.

December 2, 2002 Because of the fighting in neighboring Ivory Coast, the border was closed to keep the mayhem out of Liberia. There are already nearly a thousand Ivorian refugees in Liberia.

December 14, 2002 The government says it has boosted security on its border with the Ivory Coast, and is stopping any armed men from entering Ivory Coast. Reports of English speaking mercenaries in the Ivory Coast led people to suspect they were from Liberia, the nearest nation with an English speaking African population.

December 18, 2002 Even as thousands of Liberians flee to neighboring Ivory Coast to escape fighting in the north, the current war in Ivory Coast has forced 43,000 people to run back into Liberia. This includes some 22,000 Liberian refugees in Ivorian camps.

December 20, 2002 LURD is on the move again and has recaptured two key towns. One is Bopolu, which is a hundred kilometers north of the capital. The other is Weasua, which is in a diamond mining area.

December 25, 2002 President CharlesTaylor is accusing of the US of conspiring against him, sending in assassins and subsidizing opposition political partie.

December 27, 2002 An Economist magazine survey of all the world's nations concluded that Liberia would be the worst place to live in 2003. War, banditry and economic collapse all contributed to this dire state of affairs.

December 29, 2002 Thousands of civilians are fleeing central Liberia, apparently on the rumor that LURD troops are advancing. Apparently, bandit activity is being misinterpreted as another LURD advance. But no one is sure, as neither journalists or government officials are willing to risk looking too close to find out exactly what is going on.

January 1, 2003 The government has denied claims that it had worked with al Qaeda in the illegal arms trade that made money for terrorists and bribes for government officials and warlords. The illegal arms trade continues despite extensive efforts to clamp down in the "blood diamonds" trade.

January 4, 2003 UNMIL extended its deployment to the rebel -held towns of Tubmanburg and Tapeta over the weekend. Units would soon reach Zwedru near the eastern border with Ivory Coast. On the 3rd, 250 Ethiopian troops took up station in a town controlled by the MODEL rebel group just 35 kilometers from the eastern frontier with Ivory Coast. On the same day, Pakistani troops moved into Tubmanburg (60 kilometers northwest of Monrovia), where LURD had their military headquarters. LURD had prevented Pakistani troops from deploying to Tubmanburg on December 25, but they were allowed to establish a position at Kley Junction (15 kilometers from the town) two days later. - Adam Geibel

January 5, 2003 UNMIL troops are already deployed in Grand Bassa County (a MODEL rebel stronghold), Nimba County (partly control by MODEL and the former Government forces). Other units have been deployed in western Liberia (controlled by LURD). The Capital, Monrovia and its environs are also secured by the peacekeepers.

The disarmament process was recently suspended, to allow the troops to make adequate preparations for the establishment cantonment sites around the Country. The only cantonment site for former Government fighters is established in Camp Scheifflin. The Pakistani troops deployed in Tubmanburg will set up another cantonment site there.

UNMIL maintained that the disarmament program will resume on January 20th 2004. Over 40,000 combatants are expected to be disarmed and demobilized by UNMIL. - Adam Geibel

January 6, 2003 The US has cut back on embassy operations because of security concerns.

January 7, 2003 Deputy Force Commander Joseph Owonibi placed UNMIL's strength at 60 percent of authorized strength, with about 75 percent by the end of January and that all of the troops would be in the country by the end of February. At full strength, UNMIL will muster 15,000 peacekeepers, making it the largest UN peacekeeping mission in the world. The UN took over peacekeeping operations in Liberia October 1, 2003, but the arrival of the troops have been very slow. UNMIL authorities attributed the slow deployment to negotiations with contributing countries.

The United Nations said that it was reassessing the way it would conduct its planned disarmament program in Liberia. UNMIL started to disarm fighters loyal to former president Charles Taylor at a barracks near Monrovia on 7 December, but was forced to abandon the exercise 10 days later after former combatants rioted in the city to demand cash for handing in their guns. At least nine people were killed during three days of disorder and looting. UNMIL subsequently agreed to pay former fighters a $75 advance on their $300 rehabilitation allowance as they surrendered their weapons, but the demobilization camp then found it overwhelmed by people rushing to hand in guns and claim the cash.

Three journalists who had gone to the UN offices to cover the weekly briefing session on the missions operations were apprehended and assaulted by an unidentified UNMIL security officer. That particular security officer was know for bullying journalists in the past.

Meanwhile, the State Department urged Americans to avoid traveling to Liberia, citing the lack of an effective police force and delays in the full deployment of a UN peacekeeping unit. - Adam Geibel

January 8, 2003 LURD and army troops are fighting for control of a diamond and gold mining district in the northwest. The fighting is centered around the towns of Wesua and Wieju.

January 9, 2003 Neither the government or the LURD rebels appear sincere in peace negotiations. The fighting has degenerated to a struggle for loot between what appears to be two different collections of bandits.

January 10, 2003 In the last week, up to three dozen refugees fleeing the fighting in Ivory Coast have been killed by bandits and soldiers as they fled into Liberia.

January 15, 2003 A group of armed volunteers fighting for the government stormed into a prison 70 kilometers north of the capital, and freed 25 inmates. The prison guards were so terrified that they have refused to return to work. The armed volunteers often turn into criminal gangs, or were criminals before they offered their services to the government. The volunteers have been accused of rape and pillage in rebel and government controlled areas.

January 16, 2003 One thing that appears to be causing fighting to die down is the movement of hundreds, if not thousands, of rebels and soldiers into Ivory Coast to loot and pillage while the country is distracted by the current civil war there. The Liberians are easy to identify, as many speak English in a country where French is the preferred second language.

January 17, 2003 The US has warned American citizens to stay out of Liberia, which is currently experiencing the worst chaos and internal disorder in Africa.

January 20, 2003 The army pushed LURD rebels out of the town of Gbein, on the Ivory Coast border. The town was attacked the day before by what appeared to be a force of LURD looters, and Liberian army deserters along for the loot. Both groups were ambushed today as they headed back to Ivory Coast with their loot.

January 21, 2003 LURD rebels operating out of the Ivory Coast, attacked the border town of Gbein. The Liberian government claims some Ivory Coast soldiers were involved.

January 24, 2003 Ivory Coast reports that Liberian army troops are fighting with local rebels. President Taylor says that any Liberians fighting in Ivory Coast are either rebels or renegade soldiers. The Liberian army has a lot of renegade soldiers.

February 1, 2003 LURD rebels, forced back to their bases or into nearby Guinea, have counterattacked. Army troops some hundred kilometers from the capital. The government, deprived of much of its revenue from the illegal diamond trade, has not been able to pay most of the army. Many of the troops have turned to banditry, and several hundred went to neighboring Ivory Coast to loot and pillage during the civil war there.

February 4, 2003 LURD rebels continue advancing, to within 20 kilometers of the capital.

February 5, 2003 LURD rebels have surrounded the capital and announced that they will move into the capital next week. The rebels have demanded that president Charles Taylor and his followers leave the seaside capital, otherwise the rebels will enter the capital in force and much death and destruction will result.

February 7, 2003 The government announced it had defeated the LURD rebels and retaken the town of Tubmanburg, 60 kilometers north of the capital. Up until this action, it was feared that the rebels were going to surround the capital. Maybe they still will, for journalists are reluctant to get too close to trigger-happy rebels and soldiers out in the bush.

February 12, 2003 The LURD rebels have agreed to hold peace talks with the government and the government has agreed to work out a time and place to talk. Meanwhile, a popular rumor in the capital is that LURD is actually on the payroll of president Charles Taylor, being paid with money from illegal diamond sales to provide the illusion of instability to intimidate opposition politicians who want to vote Taylor out of office. However, the violence LURD is inflicting on civilians is very real, and the army troops are not much better. Whatever LURD's motives, the damage they are doing is very real.

February 13, 2003 LURD rebels have moved into southeast Liberia for the first time, taking the town of Toe on the Ivory Coast border. The area is a stronghold of the Krahn tribe, which has supported president John Taylor.

February 14, 2003 Civilians are fleeing the seaside town of Roberts Port as LURD rebels enter the area.

February 19, 2003 LURD is attacking in several areas, and now controls the Sierra Leone border area. Some of the government soldiers have fled back to the capital, where some are in trouble for rowdy behavior. So far, nearly 40,000 civilians have fled the fighting. Some Liberian soldiers are also reported fleeing into Sierra Leone.

February 21, 2003 Troops are fight LURD rebels along the Sierra Leone border, about 90 kilometers from the capital. Several thousand Liberians have fled into Sierra Leone in this area recently. In the last few months, some 300 Liberian officers and soldiers have fled to Sierra Leone and surrendered to military authorities there.

February 25, 2003 Fighting has died down around the capital, but LURD rebels occupy towns and villages within ten kilometers of the capital and could advance at any time. Many are fleeing the capital by sea. The capital is not completely surrounded, and many army units continue to operate elsewhere in the country.

February 26, 2003 The government accused Guinea of tolerating LURD rebels operating from camps in Guinea. This may be true, but Guinea gains little by going after Liberian rebel camps in their territory. As long as LURD behaves itself in Guinea (which rebel groups tend to do in such situations), the Guinean government takes the easy way out and looks the other way.

February 28, 2003 LURD has not made a move to take the capital, but rather is concentrating on looting areas around the capital.

March 1, 2003 The government blames Ivory Coast for allowing Liberian mercenaries, fighting in the Ivorian civil war, to attack into Liberia. However, it's unlikely anyone controls these armed bands, other than money and the prospect of loot. According to the Liberian government, Ivory Coast officials encouraged the Liberian mercenaries to go raid into Liberia. This seems a perfectly reasonable strategy for anyone from Ivory Coast.

March 4, 2003 Refugee camps are no longer a refuge, with the fighting near the Ivory Coast border forcing thousands from Ivory Coast to flee refugee camps.

Troops have recaptured territory in the southeast, near the Ivory Coast border. But the operation is chaotic, it being difficult to tell who is a soldier and who is a rebel, or just a bandit.

March 6, 2003 Three aid workers disappeared near the Ivory Coast border, and the bodies of two of them were later found. Rebels and troops have looted freely, including from aid organizations.

March 10, 2003 Government troops attacked LURD rebels near the Sierra Leone border.

March 11, 2003 The government denied that the hundred armed Liberians arrested by French troops in Ivory Coast were working for Liberia. The Ivory Coast said the armed Liberians were not working for them. The Liberian "mercenaries" were attacking Ivorian rebels, but they may turn out just to be opportunistic bandits.

March 12, 2003 The body of the third air worker has been found. All three were working in refugee camps near the Ivory Coast border. LURD rebels are blamed for the three deaths, although it could have been government forces or bandits.

March 2003 - Rebels advance to within 10km of Monrovia.

March 17, 2003 Responding to international pressure over the death of three aid workers near the Ivory Coast border, the government has ordered an investigation. Relief supplies for refugees is still a major asset for the Liberian government, because they can steal some of those supplies, and have some influence over who gets jobs with the aid agencies.

March 18, 2003 LURD rebels are fighting five kilometers outside the capital. The army troops in the capital have been ordered to show up for a "daily briefing" which sounds more like a mandatory headcount to help cut down on desertions.

March 19, 2003 In the eastern town of Gbarnga, LURD rebels and army troops battle for control. Over 15,000 civilians flee the area.

March 21, 2003 LURD rebels seized the provincial capital of Gbarnga in the center of the country.

March 22, 2003 The army launched an attack on the provincial capital of Gbarnga, in an effort to push LURD rebels out.

March 25, 2003 Army troops and LURD rebels continue fighting over the provincial capital of Gbarnga. Over fifty have been killed in several days of fighting. Both sides have sent in reinforcements.

March 27, 2003 The US government warned it's citizens to stay away from Liberia, because of the growing chaos created by the ongoing civil war.

March 28, 2003 In the last few days, various groups of gunmen in eastern Liberia have kidnapped at least 80 aid workers, causing many aid operations to shut down.

March 29, 2003 The government says that it has retaken the provincial capital of Gbarnga in central Liberia. Dozens of rebels are said to have been killed. But LURD announced that it still held 14 key towns in the northern part of the country, including Gbarnga.

March 31, 2003 Three relief workers by rebels, but several others are still missing.

April 1, 2003 Fighting between LURD rebels and troops in the north has caused 15,000 civilians to flee to nearby Guinea. Both the rebels and the soldiers tend to loot and abuse local civilians. Aid organizations are withdrawing their personnel from the country, not just because of the increasing anarchy, but mainly because various bandits and rebels are attacking and kidnapping aid workers. Of the 80 aid workers kidnapped in the last week, only seven have been released.

April 2, 2003 Fighting appears to have broken out all over the country, including 25 kilometers outside the capital. The government troops are, more and more, operating like the rebels. That is, looting and abusing anyone they come across. Foreign aid groups continue to withdraw, considering the country another Somalia.

April 5, 2003 LURD rebels continue to push back government troops, but have not yet been able to rout the government forces. The government is blaming neighbors, like Guinea, for the rebel success. This is sort of true, as Liberia's neighbors find it easier to tolerate the Liberian rebel camps in their territory than sending in troops to fight them. The deal is the standards one, as long as the foreign rebels behave themselves, their camps are tolerated. Guinea also supports refugee camps full of Liberians, and 7000 more Liberian refugees came across the border to those camps in the last few days.

April 7, 2003 Fighting near the capital has reached refugee camps in the area and caused thousands of refugees to flee once more.

April 8, 2003 Some 350 Liberians, from the army and LURD, have crossed the border into Sierra Leone and asked to be allowed to sit out the violence in their country. Sierra Leone insists on confining the men to camps in return for refuge, but many of the military refugees are not keen on that kind of treatment. But since these men had to surrender their weapons when they crossed the border, there has not been a lot of trouble yet.

A new rebel group has been heard from; MODEL (Movement for Democracy in Liberia). The fighters are from the Krahn tribe and are paid and led by Charyee Doe, the younger brother of the former (and deceased) president Samuel Doe. This group is thought to have only a few hundred (at most) armed men.

April 9, 2003 More gunfire has been heard in refugee camps some 20 kilometers outside the capital. Most aid workers have left, and thousands of refugees are fleeing the camps to escape both soldiers and rebels.

Fighting along the Ivory Coast border has sent thousands of refugees there fleeing once more.

April 10, 2003 Because of the growing violence, foreign aid has been suspended in about 70 percent of the country. One thing the growing violence shows is that Liberia does not have an army. There are only warlords, with president Taylor being one of the more powerful ones. But with the illegal diamond trade crippled, Taylor has less money to pay his gunmen. Revenue is coming in by granting logging licenses to foreign companies, but this is not as lucrative as the diamond trade was. As a result, he has to allow his men to loot and pillage. Some of Taylors commanders are going freelance, and other Liberians with military experience (or a taste for organized violence) are becoming mercenaries in neighboring nations. There are probably less than 2,000 armed troops getting paid with any regularity, meaning that some are owned several months of wages. LURD sustains itself entirely on plunder, and looks likely to beat the government forces eventually.

April 11, 2003 Gangs of armed men, neither army troops nor LURD rebels, are now attacking refugee camps outside the capital. Local civilians fear they are vulnerable as well. The country is slipping into bloody anarchy.

April 15, 2003 Preparations for the October presidential elections have been postponed because of lack of money and law and order.

April 18, 2003 Fighting by small groups of soldiers and LURD rebels is taking place everywhere. Both groups, and similar ones that are basically bandits openly out for themselves, appear more concerned with loot and pillage than winning a war.

April 19, 2003 Civilians and soldiers are showing up at a hospital in the capital with amputated limbs, saying that the LURD rebels are now doing this to terrorize government soldiers and civilians. This form of mutilation was widely practiced by rebels in neighboring Sierra Leone in the 1990s.

April 25, 2003 LURD rebels now control 60 percent of the country, including most of the valuable diamond mining areas. This denies the government a major source of revenue, which will now be taken over by the rebels. The UN continues to maintain an arms embargo on Liberia, as well as a ban on diamond exports. Weapons still enter the country illegally, at higher cost. The illegal diamond trade continues as well, with the sellers getting less money to deal with the additional hassle of the UN ban.

April 28, 2003 MODEL (Movement for Democracy in Liberia) fighters are advancing in the southeast, along the coast. Government troops are not putting up much resistance. The area being overrun contain valuable timber and there are several logging companies that have paid off the government for the right to cut down and export valuable trees.

April 29, 2003 Government troops launched counterattacks on LURD forces in the north and MODEL rebels in the south. This has caused more civilians

(over 20,000 it is estimated) to flee the marauding fighters (who would rather loot than fight.)

May 5, 2003 A cease fire deal in Ivory Coast is supposed to mean that Liberian mercenaries working for the Ivory Coast government will return to Liberia. What is unknown is what side these mercenaries will take in the ongoing Liberian civil war. At the moment, Liberia is in chaos, with looting and pillaging soldiers and rebels present in most parts of the country.

May 8, 2003 Nearly a thousand armed Liberians have been either chased out of Ivory Coast, or arrested (140 are being "detained.") The UN has also renewed the arms embargo on Liberia for another year. Within Liberia, chaos reigns, with armed men preying on civilians and occasionally fighting with each other. LURD (mostly) and MODEL rebels technically control about two-thirds of the country, but many of the government and rebels groups are beyond anyones control.

May 9, 2003 Life is getting interesting for Charles Taylor since some of his dirty little secrets are floating to the surface of the cesspool. Citing Liberia's "active support" of rebel groups destabilizing West Africa, the United Nations Security Council renewed sanctions against that country, extending the measures to include a ban on timber exports in addition to existing arms and diamond embargoes. The new ban on timber exports begins on July 7 and will run for 10 months, but the Council will review the sanctions by September 7, to consider how best to minimize their impact on the country's humanitarian situation and could allow exports to resume to fund relief programs.

Former Sierra Leonean R.U.F. rebel commander Sam Bockarie (AKA "Mosquito"), indicted on war crimes charges by a UN court and on the run in Liberia, died after a shoot-out with government forces. The son of a diamond miner, Bockarie was born in eastern Sierra Leone in 1963 and led a "interesting" life before he joined the rebels; he worked as a professional dancer, a hairdresser, an electrician and a waiter.

There are two versions of what happened to Bockarie. In the first, he crossed the Liberia border into Ivory Coast and was asked to surrender by Ivorian government troops. He refused and his body guards opened fire on the soldiers, who returned fire. Bockarie and several of his bodyguards were killed, while the Ivorians lost one man.

The second version was that Bockarie and some of his bodyguards (40-50 former RUF rebels) were spotted crossing into Liberia near the Ivorian border town of Binhouin in the early hours of the 7th (driven back into Liberia by the Ivorian rebels.) Liberian government forces with orders to arrest him were met with stiff resistance, and there were casualties on both sides.

When a new Liberian rebel group, known as the "Movement for Democracy in Liberia" (MODEL) started to seriously threaten Taylor's

"pepperbush" (or personal source of income, in this case the logging industry), Mr. Taylor decided to sue for peace. Convinced that the MODEL was supported by the Ivory Coast's President Gbagbo regime, Taylor had a meeting arranged a meeting in Togo. To get Gbagbo to back off, Taylor allegedly engineered the murder of Ivorian rebel leader (and his former friend) Felix Doh. Taylor's designated hitter was Sam Bockarie. Bockarie was said to have fled the Ivory Coast with over 300 vehicles that were sold in Liberia for about $500.00 apiece.

Taylor may also have engineered the death of Bockarie, to ensure that the "Mosquito" was never positively identified as the main supporter of the revolution in Liberia. - Adam Geibel

May 10, 2003 The human rights and environmental group Global Witness claims that several Hong Kong firms are using their port city to smuggle Chinese-made AK-47s, machine guns and rocket-propelled grenade launchers to Liberia, using the global timber trade as a cover in two ways: by shipping guns on the boats that transport the Liberian timber to mainland China or by using the money paid for the timber to purchase arms. China is a major importer of Liberian timber and the funds raised by the Liberians are also used to buy weapons from Eastern Europe and Libya

President Taylor has set up a new unit known as the "Special Monitoring Group," comprised of approximately 3,000 men from former Sierra Leone RUF rebels, ATU, Marine Forces, and militia forces. This unit is heavily armed and equipped with arms recently brought into Liberia from outside sources in spite of the UN arms embargo. - Adam Geibel

May 12, 2003 Liberian refugees in Ivory Coast camps are being forcibly recruited to fight for the government against northern Moslem rebels. There are some 200,000 Liberian refugees in Ivory Coast, most of them Christian. The Ivory Coast government is controlled by Christians from the southern part of the country.

May 14, 2003 Representatives from LURD are visiting countries in the region to try and persuade Liberia's neighbors to condemn the current Liberian government and recognize LURD as well. The LURD people also say that they can get along with the new rebel group, MODEL, which is also fighting the Liberian government led by Charles Taylor.

May 15, 2003 While it was reported earlier that rebel leader Sam Bockarie was killed in a shoot out with government forces while attempting to enter Liberia. Bockarie had actually met Taylor in Monrovia the day before he was killed and threatened to "spill the beans" if he were handed over to the Special Court.

Taylor could be prosecuted for allegedly harboring Bockerie and another indicted rebel leader. Taylor ordered his arrest, but Bockarie and his guards resisted and were killed.

The chief of investigations at the Special Court for Sierra Leone Alan White also claimed to have credible information that Bockarie's family may have been eliminated to avoid possible DNA profiling. Liberian authorities have refused to transfer Mr. Bockarie's body to the Court for an independent forensic examination in order to provide positive identification.

The rebel warlord's death is basically poetic justice, since Bockarie chopped off limbs, lips and ears of his victims during the fighting in Sierra Leone's decade-long civil war (which ended in 2002) and the western Ivory Coast. His Revolutionary United Front (RUF) also systematically raped women and abduction of thousands of children, who were then forced to fight. - Adam Geibel

May 17, 2003 The government and the two main rebels groups, LURD and MODEL, have agreed to hold peace talks in Ghana starting June 2nd. Diplomats from the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) worked it all out. The government has, in the past, refused such talks. But the situation is getting desperate. Most (some say 80 percent) of government income (legal and illegal) goes to fighting the rebels (with bribes, payoffs and weapons for poorly disciplined gangs of kids and murderous adults.) The country is in chaos, with even the foreign aid organizations being attacked and robbed by the rebel and government "troops."

May 19, 2003 Following a weekend of intense fighting with government forces, Movement for Democracy in Liberia (MODEL) rebels captured Liberia's main timber export port at Harper close to the Ivory Coast's border. Fierce clashes between LURD rebels and Liberian troops in the town of Ganta (265 km northeast of the capital Monrovia) also continued from the 18th. The Liberian government accused Guinean troops of delivering truckloads of ordnance to the Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy (LURD) rebels at Ganta, and even fighting alongside them. In a recent report, U.N. investigators found Guinea has provided LURD fighters with logistical support, including ammunition and weapons, trucked across the border to LURD bases. Guinea has repeatedly denied backing Liberia's rebels.

About 1,200 Ivorian refugees in Harper and some 800 people from other West African countries who had been awaiting evacuation by ship, were forced to flee by the fighting. An estimated 10,000 refugees had crossed into the Ivory Coast in the last 48 hours. Many of those fleeing Liberia were using canoes to cross the Cavally River, which forms the border between the two countries.

Most of those displaced from Harper had sought refuge there just a few weeks ago to escape fighting around Zwedru further inland. They originally entered Liberia seeking refuge from the Ivory Coast's civil war, but had become subsequently become victims of Liberia's own conflict. - Adam Geibel

May 20, 2003 President Charles Taylor says he will not share power with LURD or MODEL, but will go ahead with peace talks. It looks like this dispute will be settled out in the bush, with guns, not in any peace talks.

May 21, 2003 Liberian soldiers were still holding a timber-company vessel at gunpoint in Monrovia's port, having docked at midnight on 19/20th. The 50 troops were fleeing the MODEL rebel advance and commandeered a cargo ship at Harper on the 18th. They brought 1,000-1,500 civilians on board (along with their goats, chickens, bedding and other household materials), then ordered the Croatian captain and his crew of six to carry them to the capital. One child was born on board, during the short voyage.

The "Benty" is flagged in the Caribbean Islands of Saint Vincent and Grenadines and owned by a Guinean company. According to Capitan Josip Alborghetti, the Liberian soldiers also managed to loot all the passengers and seriously damaged the ship.

Harper is one of three main ports for the export of timber, the government's main source of foreign exchange earnings. The timber port of Greenville (200 km further west) fell to MODEL earlier this month and only Buchanan is still in government hands.

While President Charles Taylor's government has not confirmed the fall of Harper, all other evidence supports MODEL's claims. Retreating government troops looted the offices and warehouses of UNHCR, World Food Program and Danish Refugee Council in Harper. They took at least two vehicles, power generators, solar panels, radio communication equipment and 17 tons of food.

The Liberian conflict has displaced 1 million civilians within the country and sent 300,000 others fleeing to neighboring nations. The rebel offensive has sent over 10,000 fleeing into neighboring Ivory Coast on the 18th and 19th. A transient camp has been set up in the Ivorian border town of Tabou, about 80 km along the coast from Harper

The ship "MV Sandra" is on standby off Liberia to repatriate Guinean nationals, to complete rotations between the port of Takoradi in western Ghana and Conakry. Other refugees from Burkina Faso, Mali, Niger, Benin, Togo and Nigeria would be repatriated by land.

Meanwhile, the French are expanding their influence into the English-speaking nation. While President Taylor's links with French companies date back to the early 1990s, the French have smelled the change on the wind.

According to the leader of Liberia's principal opposition party, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, the French foreign ministry has held official consultations with her for the first time since Charles Taylor became president of Liberia six years ago. Earlier this month, the United Nations Security Council unanimously agreed to add timber exports to the arms, diamonds and travel sanctions already imposed against Taylor's regime two years ago. The French suddenly supported the timber ban. France (and China) had been a major purchaser of Liberian tropical wood and previously opposed the timber embargo. - Adam Geibel

May 22, 2003 Some 15,000 refugees fled Liberia and into Ivory Coast, where the border is now patrolled by French troops. Some of these refugees are Ivorians who had earlier fled into Liberia to get away from violence.

May 23, 2003 The government is attempting to retake the lumber ports of Harper and Jerbo. Some 500 troops, led by a senior police official, are headed north to the ports, which not only provide a major source of money for the government (via fees for allowing lumber to be cut), but also are where new supplies of weapons and ammunition are landed.

Meanwhile, at Harper, troops seized a second lumber ship to move some 2,000 refugees out of the port and away from advancing rebels.

May 26, 2003 The US State Department urged all American citizens in Liberia to leave as soon as possible. Only one rebel faction, LURD, sent representatives to Sierra Leone to make arrangements for peace talks. Not a good sign.

May 27, 2003 The Liberian government accused the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) of supplying rebels with food at the Port city of Harper. They alleged that three UNHCR trucks loaded with food and an unknown helicopter landed in MODEL-controlled parts of Harper about three days prior. The UN lost four marked trucks to looters and knew nothing about helicopters flying arms shipments into areas controlled by the rebels. - Adam Geibel

May 28, 2003 A United Nations official claimed that Liberia needed an outside stabilization force, to ensure aid reaches hundreds of thousands of victims of the long-running civil war. He characterized the country as suffering from "a total lack of authority" as warlords and militias killed, looted and raped at will. No single party to the conflict can be trusted to ensure security for the delivery of humanitarian aid, or for the people receiving it. International agencies had suspended aid deliveries because the food can't be moved and that all public services had broken down. - Adam Geibel

May 29, 2003 MODEL rebels agreed to halt their advances on Government positions around the port of Buchanan, as a result of appeals from the United States Government. However, the rebel forces said they would defend their positions if attacked. Meanwhile, the Australians followed the Americans' lead by advising their citizens in Liberia to "depart with the first available flight". - Adam Geibel

May 31, 2003 Rebel and government troops are fighting again in the northeast near the Ivory Coast border, around the city of Tappita. There is a strategic crossroads, with one route heading towards the port of Buchanan and the other to the capital. Skirmishing has also been reported on at least other three fronts: at Ganta near the Guinean border, at the port of Harper in the southeast and in Guthrie, near the Sierra Leonean border. - Adam Geibel

June 2, 2003 Representatives from the government, the two main rebel groups and 18 political parties are assembling in Ghana for peace talks sponsored by Nigeria.

June 3, 2003 President Charles Taylor ordered the release of all prisoners of war before heading off for Ghana.

June 4, 2003 For the first time in history, a war crimes tribunal has indicted a head of state still in power. Charles Taylor was indicted for war crimes for supporting the civil war in Sierra Leone. Taylor promptly flew back to Liberia. The indictment caused panic back in Liberia, as Taylors supporters feared revenge attacks by the rebels if Taylor falls and the government falls apart.

June 5, 2003 Thousands of refugees, in camps outside the capital, are starting to move because of rumors that LURD is now advancing on the capital. There are at least 17,000 refugees in camps ten kilometers outside the capital.

Meanwhile, after returning from the peace talks in Ghana, president Charles Taylor has offered to form a new government with rebels taking senior positions. The rebels say they will only join the government if president Taylor resigns. Taylor also reported that he had foiled a coup attempt organized by unnamed foreign diplomats.

The Ghanaian government said that it had received an international arrest warrant for Charles Taylor before Taylor flew back to Liberia. The war crimes officials said they had deliberately indicted Taylor now because they knew he would be out of Liberia and thus vulnerable to arrest . Ghanaian officials apparently were reluctant to violate their hospitality to those attending the peace talks by honoring the arrest warrant and taking Taylor into custody.

June 6, 2003 LURD rebels have been seen on the outskirts of the capital, five kilometers from the city center. Hundreds of civilians have fled at the approach of the rebels. LURD reported that some of its men were attacked by government troops and they were responding.

June 7, 2003 As gunfire could be heard in several areas outside the capital, the United States ordered its "non-essential" diplomats out of the country. There is fear that the airport will soon come under fire and commercial flights will cease.

June 8, 2003 'Child soldiers' are back on the streets of the capital Monrovia, riding around in pick-up trucks with automatic rifles. Several times this year, President Taylor's loyalist forces raided schools and displaced persons camps, in search of young recruits. However, others joined the government militias as volunteers, to avenge the killing of their parents by rebel fighters. After 14 years of on-and-off civil warring, the Liberian economy is so wrecked that there are few jobs, no open schools and little hope left for these kids. - Adam Geibel

June 10, 2003 In a sure sign that the end is near, the Lebanese, who control much of the retail and wholesale trade in the country, are leaving. Many may not come back. The Lebanese came in during the 1975-90 Lebanese civil war, when many Lebanese with some money and skills fled the country to find safe haven elsewhere. Parts of West Africa were wide open for skilled traders and thousands of Lebanese families eventually arrived.

The US sent in 35 more troops to shore up the security for the American embassy in Liberias capital Monrovia.

The end of the Taylor government in Liberia could be nasty. Taylor was recently indicted as a war criminal, so his escape options are limited. Moreover, the supporters and opponents of his government are organized along tribal lines, meaning that any change in power will be accompanied by much bloodshed and settling of scores.

June 11, 2003 The government says it has stopped the LURD advance and pushed the rebels back to the outskirts of the capital.

French troops evacuated 538 foreigners from 38 nations, via helicopter to a French ship offshore.

June 13, 2003 The fighting in the capital over the last week has left at least 400 dead, with many of the bodies still lying in the streets. LURD is reported to be holding over a dozen Filipinos and Liberians who were caught while trying to get out of Liberia overland.

June 14, 2003 The US amphibious ship Kearsarge has been ordered to Liberia for possible use in evacuating American citizens. The ship was on its way home from action in Iraq and has 1800 combat ready (and now combat experienced) Marines on board, as well as a crew of 1200 sailors. The Wasp class, 40,000 ton LHD carries four helicopter gunships and two dozen CH-53 and CH-46 transport helicopters, as well as six AV-8 jets, landing craft and over a hundred trucks.

There are over a million Liberians around the capital who have fled their homes and the fighting between rebels and government troops. Looters are all over the place, as are armed gangs looking for anything to steal.

Government and rebel negotiators in Ghana say they are near an agreement on a ceasefire, after several days of negotiating. The LURD and MODEL rebel groups now control 12 of Liberias 15 counties. The rebels are demanding that the current government, led by Charles Taylor, step down. But Taylor was recently indicted for war crimes (during the civil war in neighboring Sierra Leone) and has said he would not give up as long as the indictment stood.

June 2003 - Talks in Ghana aimed at ending rebellion overshadowed by indictment accusing President Taylor of war crimes over his alleged backing of rebels in Sierra Leone.

June 16, 2003 The government has concentrated several thousand of its troops in the capital and has apparently stopped the rebel advance into the capital.

June 17, 2003 The government and rebels signed a truce agreement that includes president Charles Taylor resigning and a new government formed that includes members of the rebel groups.

June 18, 2003 There was apparently a coup attempt against president Charles Taylor recently. Three of his government ministers have disappeared and are believed dead.

Thousands of Liberians are trying to flee the capital on crowded ships. Over a hundred thousand refugees are in the capital, without food, medical care or shelter.

June 20, 2003 President Charles Taylor has backed off from resigning and allowing the formation of a new government that would include rebel leaders. But the truce has allowed aid groups to return and continue distributing food and other aid. Both rebel and government troops depend on this food aid, and the truce was agreed to partly because everyone knew this would allow food air distribution to resume.

June 21, 2003 President Taylor was seen moving weapons and household goods from the capital to his farm 160 kilometers north, in territory dominated by his tribe. Such a move would make Taylor almost impossible to capture. The Liberian violence over the last two decades has largely been based on tribal loyalty. Taylor's tribe will defend him. For this reason, Liberians are now calling for American or British troops come come in. In Sierra Leone, British Royal Marine Commandos were brought in for a few months to eliminate those rebel groups that appeared invulnerable.

June 23, 2003 The peace deal has apparently fallen apart, as LURD rebels have renewed their attacks on the capital.

June 24, 2003 Panic broke out in Monrovia as LURD rebels advanced 18 kilometers from the town of Klay to attack government troops on the strategic Po River bridge (17 kilometers outside of Monrovia). Thousands of displaced residents who had just returned to their homes in the suburbs were sent fleeing back in the rain to the capital's center. The city of one million is already packed with refugees, who have taken refuge in schools, stadiums and other buildings.

The sound of heavy shelling could be heard at 5.30 AM and continued throughout the morning in the western city suburbs of Duala, Brewersville and Caldwell. Duala was heavily contested when the rebels entered the capital for the first time earlier in the month. Government troops prevented civilians from going beyond the St. Paul's bridge, which separates Monrovia's outskirts from those western suburbs, although some rebels had apparently already crossed it.

Pro-government militiamen in open trucks moved out of the city to try to repulse the rebels, while LURD commanders claimed that they weren't actively pursuing an offensive but simply responding to government assaults. There were also reports that 17 suspected LURD supporters were executed, when pro-government militia raided the refugee camp "Voice Of America" just west of the city.

Government sources also reported fighting with MODEL rebels at Tapeta, in the northern Nimba County and at Ganta, a key crossroads town on the Guinean border 60 km away. Government forces have been patrolling the northeastern town of Ganta, after forcing out the rebels - who set on fire almost every building in the town as they left.

June 25, 2003 Rockets and mortar shells fell in an American State Department housing area that is being used to shelter refugees. There were some casualties.

Convoys of loyalist troops were also seen moving to the city of Gbarnga, 180km north-east of Monrovia, which Taylor used as a stronghold around ten years ago when he led the rebellion that overthrew Samuel Doe.

In the Ghanaian capital Accra, rebel representatives said they would suspend active participation in the peace talks with President Taylor's representatives, because repeated government attacks on their positions were in contravention of a week-old ceasefire.

June 26, 2003 Rebels continued fighting at two bridges that lead to the center of the capital. The fighting has died down, but could flare up at any time. President John Taylor has no place to run, after being indicted for war crimes. So he will probably fight to the end.

A MODEL leader said that his troops had captured General William Toe with 30 of his men and a huge cache of arms in Grand Kru County in southeastern Liberia.

Taylor sent Toe, his former Assistant Minister of Defense into the Sinoe County to retake positions before the Joint Verification Team (JVT) entered Liberia. MODEL claimed that they weren't interested in killing him, but would hand him over to the International Community soon.

After the warrant for his arrest was issued, Taylor had threatened the Sierra Leoneans and observers figured that he planned to use the Liberian Antiterrorist Unit (ATU) Special Forces to attack Sierra Leone again. Prior to the outbreak of the war in Sierra Leone 1991, Taylor had threatened to cause trouble (which he did). Now Taylor's other nightmare has began, since the Special Court in Sierra Leone succeeded in having his Swiss bank accounts frozen. It's hard for former dictators to run when they have no cash. - Adam Geibel June 27, 2003 LURD announced a cease fire. Government troops and militia have stopped the LURD advance into the capital, but the government defenders have been seen celebrating by looting the neighborhoods they are in.

June 28, 2003 Over the last five days, over 200 people have been killed in the capital and even more wounded, by fighting between government troops and LURD rebels.

June 29, 2003 The Liberian government and most civilians are calling for American and UN peacekeepers to come in and stop the fighting between the government troops and LURD rebels. For most Liberians, the rebels are seen as a tribal faction that will take revenge against the inhabitants of the capital and the refugees there. Tribal politics has always played a role in Liberian politics and it is believed that only foreign peacekeepers can halt the fighting and atrocities against civilians.

West African nations are willing to provide about 3,000 peacekeepers, but they want American troops to participate as well. There is a US Navy amphibious task force in the area, with a reinforced marine battalion. The other West

Africans also want American logistical support and money to support any peacekeeping. The American leadership is divided over getting involved, feeling that the tribal conflicts are endless and the corruption intractable and that Africans should provide the peacekeeping forces for conflicts among their neighbors. Complicating the situation is the indictment of Liberian president Charles Taylor for war crimes. His term of office ends with the end of this year, and he said he was willing to step down earlier if peacekeepers come in. Apparently he feels that getting arrested by the peacekeepers would at least get him out alive. If the rebels get Taylor, he can expect rough justice.

June 30, 2003 This week, the US will probably be compelled to get involved, to some degree, with a peacekeeping effort. The media coverage of the fighting in the Liberian capital is applying too much political pressure to avoid the problem.

July 1, 2003 Thousands of Liberian citizens celebrated outside of the US Embassy in the capital Monrovia after hearing a local rumor that US President George Bush had agreed to send peacekeeping troops. A White House official said the US was "actively discussing" ways to uphold the ceasefire in Liberia, although there has been no commitment.

United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan was behind the appeal for manpower, saying that "we need a country with military capacity, that can deploy a robust force -- it doesn't have to be very large -- that can make a difference on the ground and team up with West African forces". But Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld is opposed to international proposals that the United States dispatch 2,000 troops to head 3,000 peacekeepers from an assortment of other African countries. American forces are already spread thin, dealing with higher priority problems.

Meanwhile, several dozen US Marines have been on standby at a Spanish military base for the last few days, in case they are needed as extra security at the US Embassy in Monrovia or to evacuate Americans. The USMC MEU (SOC)'s have deployed to Liberia so many times, the running joke is that it's part of their Special Operations Capability Exercise training package. - Adam Geibel

July 2, 2003 President Charles Taylor rejected a Nigerian offer of safe haven, partially because he feared that it won't protect him from the June 4th U.N. indictment on war crimes charges. Last month, Taylor had offered to cede power as part of peace talks toward ending the Liberia insurgency, but later retracted his offer (just like he had done before) and threatened serve out his term until January 2004. The cheapest and simplest solution to the roadblocks for Liberian peace would be to get rid of Taylor.

Later in the day, the Bush administration decided to send a "fast team" to Monrovia (most likely the 50-75 Marines on standby in Spain).

Unfortunately, the amphibious assault ship USS Kearsarge, which had been sitting off the Liberian coast with a Marine expeditionary force aboard, returned to Norfolk, VA this week. Two weeks ago, there were about 450 U.S. troops "on the ground" in Monrovia, elsewhere in Liberia and in surrounding countries. They had been monitoring the situation and assisting French efforts to evacuate Western civilians, but were pulled out after the warring parties declared a cease-fire. - Adam Geibel

The US has demanded that president Charles Taylor resign. Meanwhile, at least 30,000 Liberian refugees have arrived in neighboring Ivory Coast.

July 3, 2003 The US has decided to send some peacekeeping troops to Liberia. The Department of Defense is preparing plans for sending from 500-2000 troops, depending on what the final decision is for the overall peacekeeping force.

July 4, 2003 A meeting of West African regional defense staff chiefs in the Ghanaian capital Accra approved the set up of a 3000-strong "interpositional force", to keep the peace in Liberia and a total of 5000 peacekeepers, with the extra troops being supplied by the United States, South Africa and Morocco. An ECOWAS report estimated the cost of a six month deployment of the force to be $104-million, but that a 'robust' force was needed because of the difficulties of the Liberian terrain.

Former Liberian warlord Roosevelt Johnson (who has close links to Nigeria) was picked up by armed men from a hotel in Ivory Coast's economic capital, Abidjan. Hotel workers in the affluent suburb of Deux-Plateaux said Johnson and two other Liberians were taken away from their rooms by unidentified people in a red BMW. At least one man was injured in a shootout at the suburban hotel on the evening of June 30, as Johnson's guards fired back at the abductors. Ivorian security officials said they had no information that Johnson had been picked up.

Johnson led a faction of the United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy (ULIMO). Johnson's faction, ULIMO-J, split away as a result of divisions within ULIMO in 1994. Earlier this year, President Taylor named two of Johnson's former associates in ULIMO-J as leaders of the new rebel group, Movement for Democracy in Liberia (MODEL). In January, Roosevelt's name had been mentioned in the same breath as Liberian mercenaries (former ULIMO fighters) in Ivorian military uniforms working along the western border area. MODEL representatives have disassociated themselves from Roosevelt's various public statements. - Adam Geibel

July 6, 2003 This was the seventh day of peace and quiet in Monrovia, after the army and rebels had re-instituted the June 17th ceasefire. Nigeria's President Obasanjo and Liberian President Taylor met for what aides said would be a discussion of a Nigerian offer of asylum for Taylor. It was later reported that Taylor accepted the offer, although the terms were not disclosed.

General Roland Duo, commander of the Liberian Army, noted earlier that Taylor had officially informed the army to expect a new government by July 15. He also claimed that the army was not interested in continuing to fight or to gain extra territory, but would await the peacekeepers to whom they would disarm. Taylor also ordered that each Liberian government soldier be paid "a farewell compensation" of $200. - Adam Geibel

July 7, 2003 Three helicopters carrying a US military assessment team landed at the U.S. Embassy compound in Monrovia. Among the 32 members, half are Marines and half are experts in civil engineering, civil affairs, medicine, water purification, logistics and contracting. The assessment team will be taken to hospitals and displaced persons camps while the mission's security component would review the situation that triggered the recent fighting.

The most readily available American troops are a Marine expeditionary unit based on the amphibious assault ship USS Iwo Jima, accompanied by several warships. This group is currently off the coast of Djibouti, where they plan to conduct exercises having returned from duty in the Persian Gulf.

Meanwhile, the MODEL rebels welcomed Taylor's decision to step down, but said they'd believe it when they see him leave. - Adam Geibel

June 8, 2003 'Child soldiers' are back on the streets of the capital Monrovia, riding around in pick-up trucks with automatic rifles. Several times this year, President Taylor's loyalist forces raided schools and displaced persons camps, in search of young recruits. However, others joined the government militias as volunteers, to avenge the killing of their parents by rebel fighters. After 14 years of on-and-off civil warring, the Liberian economy is so wrecked that there are few jobs, no open schools and little hope left for these kids. - Adam Geibel

July 9, 2003 Government troops kept hundreds of Liberians chanting "We want peace, no more war" away from the US assessment team, after they overflowed onto an airport runway in the pouring rain. However, rather than a robust force of combat units, the US presence in Liberia might consist mostly of advisers and trainers to avoid stretching American forces too thinly across the world. US logistical support was also mentioned as desirable by South African President Mbeki.

Meanwhile, Nigerian President Obasanjo is seeking the approval of his Senate to deploy two battalions (some 1,520 soldiers) to Liberia, as part of his country's contribution to the ECOWAS effort. - Adam Geibel

July 10, 2003 Charles Taylor faces a tricky problem in accepting sanctuary in Nigeria, and that has to do with his armed followers and their fears about their own fate after peacekeepers arrive. Losers are not treated gently in African civil wars, and many of Taylors followers are heavily armed, not very well disciplined and getting more nervous by the day. Taylor wants peacekeepers more to protect his own people, and thus himself, than for any other reason. If Taylor were to slip off to exile in Nigeria without a fuss, the group that supported him, the "Americo-Liberians" (the descendents of freed slaves that founded Liberia 180 years ago), would still have to face the wrath of the various Liberian tribes (which have long felt abused and disdained by the "Amero-Liberians.") Tribal animosities, as always, define war and peace in Africa.

July 14, 2003 The army was put on "maximum alert" on all fronts, following attacks by two rebel groups and in expectation there may be another attack on the capital. Artillery fire could be heard in the Bomi Hills. The army has been on the "highest level of alert" for the last five days and they expected the next 24 hours to be decisive.

A LURD rebel leader denied that an attack on the capital was imminent and counterclaimed that the President's forces had violated the ceasefire on several fronts. While they had no plans to attack the capital, they would fight back if the government forces continued to attack.

The UN World Food Program warned that their trucks can not reach over 100 000 civilians in camps outside the capital of Monrovia because of recent fighting and that they face the threat of starvation.

Meanwhile, South Africa's Cabinet considered a request to send troops to Liberia as part of a multi-national peacekeeping force and answered with an "unequivocal no". South Africa did not have the soldiers to send, but may consider sending observers. Nigeria, Mali and Ghana are preparing up to 1,500 troops for deployment into Monrovia in the next two weeks, as part of an ECOWAS effort and a second deployment of up to 6 000 soldiers could follow. - Adam Geibel

July 15, 2003 President Charles Taylor is in a difficult position. Although he has been assured of refuge in Nigeria (and no extradition for his war crimes indictment), this does not take care of efforts to seize his off -shore assets (money he made from illegal activities in Liberia and Sierra Leone), or the anger of his followers if he tries to skip out and leave them to the wrath of the rebels. This could all be solved it someone kills Taylor, something Taylor himself is acutely aware of. But nothing with prevent a settling of scores between the rebels and Taylor's followers.

About a hundred American troops arrived in Liberia. Three Marine helicopters were seen, as well as a US C-130 transport. These troops are to provide security for the American team checking out facilities in Liberia that could be used by American peacekeepers.

July 16, 2003: Liberia's government and rebels would welcome US troops to their country, but the insurgents said they wanted the American presence to be "overwhelming." There is a "Catch-22" situation brewing, since President Bush won't commit US troops until President Taylor leaves Liberia and President Taylor won't step down until after the US, ECOWAS and the UN deploy a peacekeeping force in Liberia.

Taylor claimed that he expected to leave Liberia shortly for Nigeria, but gave no date and left open the possibility of returning. However, Taylor has not carried out promises in the past and even if he does leave, there is the matter of the outstanding war crimes charges. Exactly how the Liberian loyalists would react to the peacekeepers if President Taylor ever went on trial is open to speculation. Furthermore, Taylor has described a US force of anything less than 3,000 troops as "a joke" and said that "you do not come into a country, drive its president out, and bring a Band-Aid approach to this country".

Loyalist troops said that LURD forces were massing at Kley Junction, 38 km northwest of Monrovia, for a possible assault on the capital. On the 14th, government fighters were stopping all civilian vehicles at the Iron Gate checkpoint (13 km northwest of the city) on the road to Kley Junction. This critical point is three km beyond St Paul's bridge, which links the mainland to Bushrod Island where Monrovia's deep water port is situated.

After meeting with President Bush on the 14th, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan told reporters that following Taylor's departure, his plan would have an ECOWAS force reinforced by US troops would go in, which in turn would be replaced by a UN multinational force. While the size of such a US force is still being determined and probably won't be very large, they would also only be deployed for less than six months. Nigerian Brigadier General Festus Okonkwo was chosen to lead the ECOWAS force, which was mandated to monitor cease-fire lines in and around Monrovia.

The United States sent four aircraft and about 100 troops to Senegal and Sierra Leone on the 13th, to facilitate a quick exit if necessary for the Humanitarian Assistance Survey Team. Three HH-60G Pave Hawk helicopters from the US naval air station in Keflavik, Iceland, flew into Sierra Leone and one MC-130P Combat Shadow airplane from RAF Mildenhall air base flew to Senegal.
- Adam Geibel

African countries have told the UN that peacekeeping troops could not be available to for service in Liberia for about two weeks. African armies tend to be casual, ill equipped and poorly trained. It takes time for them to get additional equipment and training before they head off for duty that might involve actual fighting.

Meanwhile. president Charles Taylor is in danger of getting killed by his own followers if he tries to go into exile. Taylor's followers know that the president provides leadership for the current ruling faction. Moreover, Taylor controls much of the money obtained by the current government using illegal diamond trading and other scams. If Taylor leaves the country, access to the money for his Liberian followers goes with him.

July 17, 2003: Shooting and explosions could be heard in areas where rebel and government troops have been facing each other. There were reports that rebels had attacked Klay Junctions (35 kilometers from the capital) and the nearby town of Sasstown.

July 18, 2003: Rebels have resumed their advance, moving to within 12 kilometers of the capital. This appears to be an attempt to occupy the maximum amount of territory before African peacekeepers arrive.

The US says it will not send troops until after UN peacekeepers arrive. President Charles Taylor says he will not leave until the Americans show up. The UN peacekeepers are likely to try and arrest Taylor for war crimes.

July 19, 2003 Advancing LURD rebels captured the St. Paul's Bridge (nine km from the city center) on the edge of Monrovia, pushing government troops back from the key crossing point into the city. During the morning they were moving towards the brewery, about seven km from the city center. The day before, a LURD military adviser said that they did not intend to seize Monrovia, but only to control the Po River bridge to prevent Taylor's forces firing on them.

Police fired in the air, in an attempt to clear thousands of people demonstrating after a false rumor that West African peacekeeping troops had arrived at the port. A French photographer was wounded, received emergency treatment at the United States embassy and would eventually be evacuated overseas.

Radio Veritas, a radio station run by the Roman Catholic church, went off the air when some mortar shells landed in the station's compound, damaging its equipment and six vehicles. At least 20 displaced people were killed when a shell landed on the Freemasons hall in the city center, where refugees had been hiding.

An official from the government-owned Liberia Petroleum Refinery Corporation noted that if no vessel docks in Monrovia with fuel within one week, the country will be completely paralyzed by lack of all petroleum products. - Adam Geibel

July 20, 2003 Rebels pounded Monrovia with mortars and pushed deeper into the northern suburbs, before being repelled by government forces into the port area.

The bridges leading from Bushrod Island directly into downtown Monrovia present are the easiest approach for any force attacking from the north, but the terrain also leaves attackers exposed to defensive fire from the city center's higher ground.

Government militia fighters repeatedly charged down towards the bridge spans, firing automatic rifles toward a bank of warehouses until the rebels fell back in early afternoon.

This retreat may have been a rebel bait-and-switch move, since another LURD group fought its way almost two kilometers down a highway that eventually circles around to the base of the capital peninsula. LURD gained control of a third bridge and moved into the northern suburb of New Georgia, from where they were positioned to move on downtown Monrovia from the east. If successful, Taylor and his forces would be could be cut off and bottled up.

By that afternoon, the French medical group Medecins Sans Frontieres (Doctors Without Borders) had received one dead and about 90 injured civilians. The British aid group Merlin treated 30 more civilians, while the city's main John F. Kennedy hospital received more than 60 wounded (most of them soldiers) and the Red Cross trauma unit in Monrovia took in 100 seriously wounded patients (mostly civilians).

The fighting continued into the night, with LURD insisting they were only trying to pressure Taylor to step down. The United States called for an immediate end to fighting in Liberia and urged the country's neighbors to block the flow of arms to combatants. - Adam Geibel

July 21, 2003 LURD rebels battled government troops with mortar fire, killing at least 70 people. During a two hour exchange, one shell killed 25 Liberians when it hit an American diplomatic compound where at least 10,000 refugees have taken refuge, across the street from the US Embassy complex. One shell hit the commissary building inside the main US Embassy compound, but no one was injured.

During the mortar bombardment, a shell hit a house in one neighborhood, killing 18 people inside. After the blast, enraged Liberians lined up their bodies in the street outside the embassy. An American journalist was wounded in Monrovia's port area, and another 27 Liberians were killed in other attacks.

LURD was attempting to encircle the city, in order to cut Monrovia's main highway to the international airport further east. The rebels had moved reinforcements from Bong county in northern Liberia towards Kakata, a government-held town 54 km north of Monrovia, on the main road that connects the capital to the interior. Government forces used pickup trucks to move from the city's center to meet the rebels, while other loyalists took up rooftop positions downtown. Some of them took advantage of the chaos to break into and loot closed shops in the city center.

A U.S. European Command in Germany also noted that 41 more Fleet Anti-Terrorism Security Team (FAST) members were sent to help reinforce security at the U.S. embassy in Monrovia. The same helicopters took off with 25 to 30 foreign aid workers and foreign journalists. American officials announced that some 4,500 more American sailors and Marines had been ordered to position themselves closer to Liberia to be ready for possible duty in the embattled West African nation.

ECOWAS and even the MODEL rebels called on LURD to stop their offensive, while Liberian army chief of staff General Benjamin Yeaten sounded like he'd been reading too many books about Stalingrad. He told Reuters that "Nobody retreats and nobody surrenders. This is a battle for survival, it may be the last battle for them. It may be the last battle for us." One can only hope so. - Adam Geibel

July 22, 2003 Civilians in the capital again called on the U.S. to send peacekeepers. But as long as the civil war is still going on, what these people are really asking for is American intervention on the side of the government. But the current government is led by an indicted war criminal. Intervening on the side of the rebels raises the question of; which rebel faction? And the rebels are probably no better than the current government. Liberia has, despite its democratic veneer, undergone cycles of tyrannical government and rebellions for over a century. Tribal and class animosities continue to fuel these upheaval. None of the neighboring nations will send peacekeepers until the civil war is over, which may happen sooner rather than later. And when it does, there will be the usual round of bloody retribution, and the new government will stick it to the losing tribes and set the stage for the next rebellion.

Nevertheless, the US began moving several battalions of marines, and their amphibious ships, towards Liberia.

July 23, 2003 While LURD has dropped some mortar bombs into densely packed refugee camps, the panic they're creating outweighs the number of tubes they actually have. Western media headlines screamed that over 600 civilians had been killed in the last few days, citing Liberia's Defense Minister Daniel Chea and yet aid workers only calculated that about 100 civilians had been killed. Chea's motivations are questionable and probably prone to extreme exaggeration, since his neck will be one of those on the block if American troops don't arrive before the current government is overrun.

Just to be on the safe side, the Pentagon has already ordered about 4,500 sailors and marines closer to Liberia by routing their ships from the Horn of Africa into the Mediterranean Sea. The three-ship USS Iwo Jima Amphibious Ready Group (ARG) includes the USS Iwo Jima, USS Nashville and USS Carter Hall. This also includes over 2,100 Marines and sailors from the 26th Marine Expeditionary Unit (Special Operations Capable), based at Camp Lejeune.

The 26th MEU (SOC) is a Marine Air-Ground Task Force made up of four elements: Battalion Landing Team 1/8 (the ground combat element made up of infantry, light armored vehicles, artillery and amphibious assault vehicles), Marine Medium Helicopter Squadron-264 (a composite helicopter squadron forming the aviation combat element), MEU Service Support Group-26 (a combat service support element that provides logistical support) and the command element.

The 26th MEU recently completed an eight day training exercise near Camp Lemonier, Djibouti This included live-fire training in near 120-degree desert heat for its tanks, artillery, infantry, light armored reconnaissance, combined anti-armor teams and the command element. While cynics might point out that desert training isn't preparing anyone for urban operations in a verdant country, these Marines are pretty flexible and the 26th will be ready by the time they swap out their tan BDUs for green. - Adam Geibel

July 24, 2003 About twenty percent of the capital's population has fled their homes to escape the fighting. Over 100,000 additional refugees have fled to the city for safety. But these 300,000 homeless people have little access to food, or even water. Government services have broken down, with army troops pillaging as vigorously as the rebels. Aid groups have largely shut down because their staff are often attacked by rebel and government troops. Rebels, or someone, continue to fire mortar shells into the city. The government says the civilian death toll in the last week is about 600, but the real figure appears to be about half that. This probably includes many government troops and rebels, most of whom do not wear uniforms. When any of these lads are killed, their weapons disappear quickly. The fighting itself does not stress inflicting a lot of casualties, but making maximum noise and martial display. But the rebels are trying to take control of the port and key roads.

The US has not yet committed to sending troops to Liberia. The unsaid reason is that there is a civil war going on, and both sides have blood on their hands. Both sides are run by shady characters who are more interested in personal gain than what is best for all of Liberia. The factions are still based on tribes and tribal interests always come first. Once the US gets involved, the US losses, because whoever wins the civil war will behave badly and America will get blamed. This is nothing new. The cycle of civil wars and tribal infighting has been going on here forever.

Two battalions of African peacekeepers are expected next week. African peacekeepers have been here before, and were accused of behaving little differently than the rebels. The current peacekeepers have some training from American instructors on how to do peacekeeping properly.

July 2003 - Fighting intensifies; rebels battle for control of Monrovia. Several hundred people are killed. West African regional group Ecowas agrees to provide peacekeepers.

July 25, 2003 An American amphibious task force was ordered to move to the Liberian coast. It is understood that no American troops will come ashore until African peacekeepers have separated the warring groups and established some order. Most American troops will be providing logistical and other support.

July 26, 2003 Heavy fighting continued around two bridges leading to the heart of Monrovia and mortar rounds landed in the city's central diplomatic quarter while President Taylor reaffirmed that he would step down, but not specifying when. A conflicting account had Taylor claiming that more than 1000 people had been killed during the latest rebel attack on the capital and warning that there would be bodies all over the city, if he was not allowed to stay in power. Taylor's speech came only hours after a mortar shell smashed into a Monrovia church, killing three refugees and wounding dozens more.

The internationally backed War Crimes Tribunal in Sierra Leone has given the green light for mercenaries to arrest President Taylor, if they can raise their own funds for the operation and deliver him across the border. The special war crimes court was set up jointly by the Sierra Leone Government and the United Nations to prosecute those responsible for atrocities during Sierra Leone's civil war. They issued an indictment against Taylor last month.

The British-US military company Northbridge Services Group submitted a $4.8 million plan to arrest Taylor, but the special court turned it down. Northbridge claims that they were privately told to try and raise the money from foreign governments, particularly the United States. Northbridge was last in the news back in early May, when their threat to send three C-130s full of ex-SAS troops down to break up a Nigerian oil workers occupation of four offshore rigs was successful. The Nigerians let their 100 hostages go without any 'mercenaries' ever appearing.

While the practicalities haven't been worked out yet, the very idea that 'private military companies' are now politically correct is a far cry from just a decade ago, when the very idea of mercenaries was enough to make headlines scream with indignation.

During the night, LURD units broke out of their Bushrod Island positions and crossed the Stockton Creek bridge, gaining access to Somalia Drive (the ring road that loops round the northern outskirts of the city). - Adam Geibel

July 27, 2003 Government commanders admitted that their units at the Johnson and Old bridges were "under serious attack" during the morning and LURD units were across the Stockton Creek Bridge during the day. General Benjamin Yeaten, coordinating government military operations at the bridges, had his men quartered in a concrete building overlooking the approach causeway. He admitted losing three killed and nine wounded since the rebels started their latest offensive.

Another rebel column was moving away from the northern Monrovia suburbs towards Paynesville, an eastern neighborhood that hasn't been fought over yet. During the weekend of torrential rains, LURD also launched a simultaneous attack on the port city of Buchanan (120 km to the southeast) .

US Ambassador John Blaney called for a new cease-fire line about 10 km northwest of Monrovia, urging rebels to pull back to the natural boundary of the Po River outside the capital. This would leave LURD with some of their recent gains but reopen the port, with its food warehouses and outlying refugee camps, to aid workers. LURD's chairman rejected the offer. - Adam Geibel

July 28, 2003 Examining news footage and photographs, most of the new purchased Serbian AK-47s seem to be in the hands of inexperienced, even child, 'soldiers'. They carry little in the way of web gear or spare magazines, don't aim or even hold their weapons with much familiarity. Those carrying RPG-7s seem to have universally discarded the PSO-1 optical sight (which can seem complicated for even trained troops) and rely on the iron sights, thereby reducing the weapons' effective range.

However, there are some fighters - generally older - that are displaying all the indicators of good fire discipline. Some of them can even be seen guarding President Taylor and his defense minister. - Adam Geibel

Nigerian troops are expected to arrive on July 30th. The US is trying to prepare the way by having their ambassador to Liberia persuade the LURD to withdraw from the capital and allow aid groups to resume feeding refugees. LURD says that every time they pull back and stop fighting, government troops take advantage and advance. A major problem is that many of the troops are not well led or disciplined. Commanders have to use beatings and summary execution to impose discipline. But commanders have to be careful, as too many unhappy troops result in a murdered commander.

American marines will be offshore this week, but are not expected to go ashore. The primary peacekeeping problem is that most of the fighters are unpaid amateurs who expect to be paid eventually. If they can't loot, they expect some other consideration (a job or goods.) The problem is that there is not much left to steal in Liberia, and wealthier nations like the US are expected to come through with an aid package that will buy peace long enough for the local economy to get going again. That, however, is not a long term solution as long as tribal animosities continue to create corrupt officials who prevent the establishment of stable government and economic growth. While many Liberians are thoroughly tired of years of fighting, joining one of the government or rebel militias is one of the few ways to get employment. Peacekeepers can intimidate many of the government and rebel troops to back off, and even disarm some of them. But many will simply go off and become bandits.

To the east of the capital, MODEL rebels are fighting their way into the nation's second largest port, Buchanan. This city is full of refugees from the capital, many looking to find a ship that will take them away from the fighting.

July 29, 2003 LURD rebels continued to use 60mm, 81mm and 82mm mortars against targets in the capital. The rebels are either not well trained in the use of the mortars, or are simply firing randomly, as there is no pattern of where the shells fall. The capital is crowded with over a 100,000 refugees and dozens of these are wounded daily by mortar shells.

MODEL rebels have taken over most of Buchanan, the second largest (after the capital) port.

July 30, 2003 The US has agreed to provide the financing for ECOMIL. Terms were not disclosed. Negotiations were intense, as Nigeria was asking for more money ($50 million) than the US was willing to supply ($10 million). Nigerian peacekeeping operations in the past have been noted for corruption and misuse of funds.

August 1, 2003 The African peacekeepers did not arrive this week, despite efforts to do so. But an advance party of a few dozen officers and troops did arrive. This group is inspecting facilities and generally checking out the situation first hand. The 1,500 Nigerian troops are now expected to arrive on August 4th or 5th. One battalion of Nigerians will enter from Sierra Leone, another will fly in from Nigeria. Another 2,000 peacekeepers will follow within three weeks. The peacekeeping force, called ECOMIL, has announced that president Charles Taylor will have three days, after the arrival of the peacekeepers, to depart for exile in Nigeria. Taylor has said that he will decide when he will leave. ECOMIL is the ECOWAS (organization of West African states) mission in Liberia.

Meanwhile, the fighting goes on between government and LURD fighters, with the rebels trying different routes into the capital. When government troops discover LURD moving into a new area, a firefight breaks out. The result is usually LURD just staying where they are, or withdrawing. There have been rumors of LURD running short of ammunition, but there is still a steady clatter of gunfire every day. The rebels say they won't stop shooting until the government fighters do, and until Charles Taylor leaves the country.

Civilians are also being shot at when they come out of their hiding places to search for food. Since most rebel and government troops do not wear uniforms, civilians will often be shot at on sight on the chance that they are armed opponents. Foreign aid groups have not been able to distribute food, medical or other relief supplies in most of the country because of the lawless behavior of government and rebel troops. Disease, especially cholera, is breaking out among some of the refugees in the capital, who are living under very crowded and unsanitary conditions.

When Nigerian peacekeepers were here in the 1990s, they fought regularly with government and rebel fighters, and suffered several thousand casualties. The Nigerians expect to have to fight again. ECOWAS wants American troops involved, but the US won't send its troops in until Charles Taylor leaves and Taylor shows no sign of leaving soon. The US is reluctant to send troops in because there is no peace to keep and there is not likely to be until the current civil war is over.

August 2, 2003 President Charles Taylor says he will step down and depart for exile in Nigeria on noon, August 11. ECOWAS has insisted that Taylor leave within three days of the ECOWAS peacekeeping troops arriving. The first peacekeepers are expected on August 4th.

Fighting continued in several parts of the capital, but nothing that indicated a major push by either side.

August 3, 2003 Lost In Liberia- America has good reason to stay out of Liberia, for the country was unstable from the start and Liberians have yet to decide who is in charge.

The country was not founded by freed American slaves as much as it was conquered by them. Between 1822 and 1861, some 25,000 freed slaves from the United States and the Caribbean arrived in what is now Liberia. But the area was already settled by over two dozen tribes. The wealthy Americans who sponsored the settlement (including several former presidents), thought the freed slaves would easily adapt. But they didn't. The Amero-Liberians (as the freed slave settlers came to be known), were seen as little different than the European colonizers. The Amero-Liberians (as the descendents of the freed slaves came to be known) spoke English and had superior technology, which they used to keep the tribes at bay.

After a few generations, about five percent of the population was Amero-Liberians, who looked down on the tribal peoples and did little to integrate them into Amero-Liberian society. Tribal peoples could not even vote until 1951, and even then only a few percent of them. Up until 1926, when the Firestone Tire company set up what eventually became the world's largest rubber plantation, there wasn't much of a cash economy, either. The Firestone operation covered four percent of Liberia's territory and ultimately employed over 20,000 workers. The rubber operation quickly became the largest economic activity in the country. For the first time, many of the tribal peoples had access to the cash economy, education and a different life.

The Americo-Liberians did well, as they comprised the majority of literate people in the country, and controlled the ports and retail trade along the coast. When World War II came along, and the Allies lost access to the large rubber plantations in Southeast Asia, Liberian rubber became even more valuable. Liberia also hosted American air and naval bases, bringing more jobs and money. The downside, for the Amero-Liberians, was that many of the tribal peoples were getting a taste of the modern world, and realized that everyone in Liberia could be a Liberian, if the Amero-Liberians would let them.

During the 1930s, there was a major scandal when senior government officials were caught, by the League of Nations, engaging in slavery. The government was exporting tribal Liberians to serve as slave labor in Spanish colonies. International pressure forced the government to treat the tribal people more fairly, something which was already happening, at least in terms of education, because of the growing economy. The World War II boom, led to even greater prosperity after World War II as Liberia became a "flag of convenience" for merchant ships world wide. And then iron ore and diamonds deposits were exploited, followed by lumber exports.

While some of the new prosperity found its way to the tribal areas, there was also more money for the politicians to steal. Bribes and extortion became more common, and this was noted by a post World War II generation, many of whom were going to college in the United States. Despite all the new money, only a third of the population was literate and 75 percent still got by with subsistence farming. In 1980, an army NCO, who was not Amero-Liberian, staged a coup and the Amero-Liberians were not able to muster enough muscle to save themselves. The last colony in Africa was now run by the native population.

The Amero-Liberians never expected to lose control, as they considered themselves African by virtue of ancestry and appearance. There had been an unsuccessful coup in 1963, and the politicians thought they were paying off enough tribal leaders to forestall another one. The Amero-Liberians also extended voting right to all tribal peoples in 1963. But the main problem was that the massive foreign investment and new jobs were only reaching about a quarter of the population. The majority felt excluded, and they were.

In the past, when the Amero-Liberians had trouble with foreign countries, the U.S. always helped them out. The U.S. recognized Liberian independence in 1862, and between 1892 and 1911, the United States helped Liberia negotiate fixed borders with Britain and France (who controlled colonies that surrounded Liberia.) But the U.S. had also long complained of the corruption of the Amero-Liberians and their harsh treatment of the tribal peoples. Thus America had no interest in helping out the Amero-Liberians in 1980.

With the Amero-Liberians no longer in power, there followed over two decades of fighting between the major tribes over who would get control of the government, and the opportunities to plunder the national wealth. After 1990, cheap guns (AK-47s for $20) and a network of middlemen willing to pay cash for natural resources like diamonds and lumber, armed tribal militias that kept fighting over what wealth was left. The AK-47s came from the huge arsenals of the former communist countries. They didn't need all those weapons, so they sold them cheap. AK-47s were showing up all over the world in the early 1990s, being hustled by East European gunrunners.

In the early 1990s, Nigerian peacekeepers tried to disarm the young men, but only got about a third of the 60,000 weapons in the country. East European gun runners still came by, because there were still customers. The fighting has killed over 200,000 people so far, and left nearly a quarter of the population homeless. The Nigerians departed in 1999 and left a lot of ill will in their wake. The Nigerians often pillaged as enthusiastically as the irregular gunmen they were trying to disarm.

To stop the fighting, you have to intimidate the teenage gunmen into giving up their weapons and force them to go back to subsistence farming, because that's all that's left. Billions of dollars in infrastructure has been destroyed, and donors are not lining up to replace it. Firestone is gradually leaving and other foreign firms only want to come in quickly and take diamonds or lumber. No one wants to set up a business in a country where the people hate each other in 34 different languages. There are no easy answers to the problems in Liberia, there aren't many hard answers either. Africa's last colony wants someone to come in and put the pieces back together. But no one is eager to do the job. Neighboring African countries, who have a direct interest in maintaining peace in the region, want the United States to help subsidize the peacekeeping. Even the neighbors don't want to get lost in Liberia.

August 4, 2003 One battalion of Nigerian peacekeepers flew into Liberia today, another is advancing by road from neighboring Sierra Leone next week.

Fighting continues in the capital, relief organizations cannot deliver food and hunger is moving towards starvation.

August 5, 2003 LURD rebels control the port area of the capital, where the aid groups have warehouses full of relief supplies. Some of these supplies have been distributed by the rebels. Civilians in the capital note that the rebels are less of a threat as looters than the government fighters.

August 6, 2003 Rebels and government troops have largely stopped fighting, sensing that better trained and armed peacekeepers would soon arrive. Neither side is quite sure which side the peacekeepers will be on.

There are 450 Nigerian peacekeepers now holding the main airport outside the capital.

A seven man team of US marines landed in the capital, to help with logistics for the peacekeepers.

August 7, 2003 Nigerian peacekeepers guarding the main airport have prevented the government from removing two containers of weapons that just arrived via a Boeing 707. The weapons apparently came from Libya, which has long supported president Charles Johnson.

A handful of Nigerian peacekeepers entered the capital, touching off celebrations among civilians.

The parliament approved president Charles Taylor's plan to resign on the 11th and be replaced by the vice president. Keep in mind that, while Taylor was responsible for much of the corruption and theft of national assets, his political followers have all had their hands in the till as well.

August 8, 2003 While president Charles Taylor appears determined to leave on Monday and go into exile in Nigeria, his followers will have a lot of incentive to fight on. Unless peacekeepers can enforce some kind of amnesty, Taylor's cronies will face retribution if they give up.

More Nigerian peacekeepers entered the capital, others went to suburban areas.

August 9, 2003 While the western media has been focused on the battle for Monrovia, a fierce battle was under way for control of Liberia's second city, Buchanan (100 km to the east). MODEL rebels captured the port on July 28, but the government militias counter-attacked and heavy fighting was under way in the city's center on August 6th. Unable to leave their homes for fear of getting killed, civilians are going hungry. The Red Cross and other relief agencies are struggling to deal with a mounting casualty list, while 8,000 people were holed up in the courtyard of a convent.

The rebels have taken the port sections of the city, which lends credence to the Italian Catholic news agency MISNA's claim that a ship loaded with weapons for government forces has been waiting in the waters off Buchanan since the 6th, unable to dock. This is apparently in addition to the recently impounded weapons shipment found on a jet at Monrovia's Robertsfield Airport. This load was originally destined for Buchanan, but diverted when the port fell on July 28th. Liberian Defense Minister Daniel Chea has freely admitted that he wanted to deploy additional arms and ammunition in Buchanan-Tapeta corridor. - Adam Geibel

August 10, 2003 LURD rebels control the ports, and thus the food warehouses of foreign relief organizations. As a result, there is growing hunger in those portions of the capital controlled by the government. This food situation is putting pressure on the government to do something and may be encouraging Charles Taylor to go into exile.

August 11, 2003 President Charles Taylor flew off to exile in Nigeria. Taylor promised that he'd be back. Former president Taylor and his associates looted Liberia freely over the past decade. At least $1.4 billion of that loot has been found in Swiss banks, and frozen. But there is probably more. Each year, Taylor would import millions of dollars in consumer goods (including at least 200 SUVs last year) for his key followers. Meanwhile, government and rebel violence has driven most farmers off their land and shut down most other enterprises. Unemployment in Liberia is estimated to be 50-80 percent.

August 12, 2003 With the departure of President Charles Ghankey Taylor and the appointment of Vice President Moses Blah as his replacement, fighting has flared up again 45 km from the capital's Roberstfield international airport at the Firestone plantation. Both sides accused the other of instigating the skirmishing. MODEL rebels were reported using mortars.

Less than 800 Nigerian troops have arrived in Liberia so far and their commanders are privately admitting that their force is not yet strong enough to take full control of the capital. This means the Nigerians can't take control of the strategic port, so relief operations can't resume to feed the city's one million beleaguered residents, let alone deal with problems outside of the city. The United Nations estimates that up to 450,000 people in the capital have been forced out of their homes by three rebel attacks on the city over the past two months. Many of these displaced people were starving, since aid agencies have been unable to access food supplies at warehouses in the rebel-held port for the past three weeks. U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said there were humanitarian aid ships off shore ready to "swing into action" once the port has been opened.

The ECOMIL force will muster 3,250 men by the end of August, but assorted unnamed diplomats and relief workers were hoping that with Taylor's departure, US Marines from the naval task force that has been lying just over the horizon for the past week would come ashore. The United States recently moved their amphibious battle group (the USS Iwo Jima, USS Carter Hall and USS Nashville, with 2,300 Marines) closer to the Liberian coast and within sight of the capital, as a way to send a "powerful message" to the warring factions. The task force commander Major General Thomas Turner went ashore soon to meet with LURD leaders.

The ECOMIL units are patrolling Monrovia's streets (although armed militias haven't disappeared yet) and have taken over the responsibilities of Taylor's elite "Anti-Terrorist Unit" at checkpoints outside the Executive Mansion. This may become a problem, since Taylor has threatened to use the "Anti-Terrorist Unit" as an instrument of revenge against the special court in Sierra Leone.

While Nigerian troops were cheered when they arrived in Monrovia last time, too many locals remember these troops carrying loot home when they left after the last peacekeeping mission in 1998. Author Stephen Ellis' account of recent Liberian wars, "The Mask of Anarchy," noted that West African peacekeeping forces "did business with every faction at one time or another."

The UN Security Council has ordered UN peacekeepers to replace the planned 3,250-strong West African multinational force already deploying to Liberia. The West Africans went in because they were closer to the problem and could move faster than the UN, while the UN is prepared to stay longer. Whether either force will ultimately be effective is still a open question.

The United Nations peacekeeping force composition is still being formulated. Namibia has pledged 1,600 soldiers (two full battalions) for the UN's peacekeeping force in Liberia, which they claim are ready to go at any time. Bangladesh had made the most recent offer of troops, volunteering to send one full strength brigade (with headquarters, an 800-man Engineer battalion and all ancillary support services, about 3,500 to 4,800 troops). India, Pakistan, Ireland and South Africa are also reported to be considering offering troops or assistance.

However, the South Africans are admitting that they're already stretched thin, with about 2,700 troops assigned to the Congo and Burundi, with 500 more scheduled to deploy to the Congo soon. South African peacekeepers are rotated every six months. For every one soldier deployed, another three were required at home (one in reserve, one preparing for the mission and one resting after having returned). For each soldier deployed, there's ten soldiers involved in supporting him. - Adam Geibel

LURD signed an agreement with African ECOWAS peacekeepers that included LURD troops pulling back from the capital on the 14th. But this only happens if peacekeeping troops are available to take over. LURD also said it would not join the current government. This means the fighting continues until the current government (which is still pretty much former president Charles Taylor's organization) gives up with little power it has (control of about 20 percent of Liberia.)

The US has told LURD and MODEL that if they don't come up with a peace deal fast, they will be considered outlaws and destroyed. This threat was made after the amphibious ships carrying three battalions of US marines hove into view off the capital. The US also said that former president Charles Taylor would eventually be brought to justice on war crimes charges, in spite of Nigeria's promise to shield Taylor from prosecution.

August 13, 2003 There may be as many as 40,000 Liberians running around with guns, and a lot of them, if not most of them, are teenagers. Most are illiterate, and have no job prospects, except perhaps subsistence farming back at the village they came from. But many of the villages are destroyed or abandoned, and many of these adolescent gunslingers grew up in one of the larger towns. Most urban areas in Liberia have been trashed as well. So taking away guns from these kids is going to be difficult, as the gun is all they have. And they know that with the gun they can get food, sex and all manner of goodies. Back in the 1990s, Nigerian peacekeepers tried to disarm that generation of teenage Liberian gunmen and wound up killing thousands of them. The Nigerian troops suffered over a thousand casualties as well. This time around, the African peacekeepers are advocating the disarmament technique used in Sierra Leone with some success; bribes. In other words, offer cash and goods for the guns. As long as the kids have guns, there will be no peace.

August 14, 2003 LURD rebels began withdrawing from the capital, which led to civilians looting food, other relief supplies and anything portable in warehouses near the port area. LURD had already helped themselves, and before that, government troops lived off the foreign food aid.

Some 200 American troops (marines and SEALs) landed in the capital to help keep the peace.

August 15, 2003 A UN aid ship arrived with 9,000 tons of food, which is expected to prevent starvation among some half a million refugees around the capital. Since Nigerian peacekeepers and American marines control the port in the capital city, Monrovia, this aid is unlikely to be stolen. It's a common pattern in African countries for rebels and bandits to intimidate aid workers and live off the food aid. Often, the gunmen will steal all the food they can get their hands on, and sell what they can't eat, to hungry civilians.

Nigerian peacekeepers took over most of the LURD checkpoints in the capital, especially at bridges, as LURD gunmen withdrew to some 20 kilometers outside the capital.

August 2003 - Nigerian peacekeepers arrive. Charles Taylor leaves Liberia after handing power to his deputy Moses Blah. US troops arrive. Interim government and rebels sign peace accord. Gyude Bryant chosen to head interim administration.

August 16, 2003 After two days of delays because of bad weather at the airport outside the capital, the second battalion of Nigerian peacekeepers arrived today. This puts about 2,000 peacekeepers (including nearly 300 American troops) in the country, versus more than 20,000 ill-disciplined government and rebel troops around the capital and elsewhere in the country. In addition, there are about as many less-organized men with guns in Liberia. LURD rebels have withdrawn from the capital, but they also control, or at least are the strongest armed group, in about half the country. MODEL rebels hold the nations second port, Buchanan, which is some 120 kilometers southeast of the capital.

Peace talks continue in Ghana, but not much progress. There is general agreement that a new government will be selected in October. But there is no agreement on who will be in that government or how it will be put together.

August 18, 2003 The government and rebels agreed to a peace deal. Fighting will end and an interim government will be selected. Armed groups will be disbanded and disarmed. Peacekeepers will make it possible to distribute foreign aid.

The president and vice president -- to be called the chairman and vice chairman -- will be chosen from candidates proposed by political parties and civic groups.

The new government will have 76 members: 12 each from Blah's government and the two rebel groups; 18 from political parties; seven from civil society and special interest groups; and one from each of Liberia's 15 counties.

The president and vice president (referred to as the chairman and vice chairman) will be selected, in the next few days, from candidates put forward by political parties and civic groups. The new government will have 76 members (12 each from the current government, LURD and MODEL, 18 from existing political parties; seven from prominent Liberians and special interest groups; and one from each of Liberia's 15 counties.) Major government decisions need at least 51 percent of the 76 to become effective. Implicit in the deal is the arrival of lots of foreign aid, and heavily armed peacekeepers.

August 21, 2003 The UN has resumed making food aid deliveries outside the capital. LURD has promised not to molest aid workers or the food and other aid they are transporting. The problem with this is that LURD, MODEL and the government do not have complete control over all their troops. Many groups of gunmen do not have radios and often get their "orders" via rumor.

Liberian businessman Gyude Bryan was selected as the head of the interim government. Bryan will assume power this October and remain in charge until 2006, at which time there will be elections. Moses Blah, who took over as president when Charles Taylor resigned and went into exile i n Nigeria, will be a caretaker president until Bryan takes over. The LURD and MODEL rebels agreed to turn themselves into political parties and compete for office. Earlier, the rebels had demanded some senior government positions, but foreign mediators said no.

August 22, 2003 The government reported that MODEL fighters attacked army troops outside the port of Buchanan. ECOMIL peacekeeping troops will not enter Buchanan until next week. Buchanan is the countries second largest city and the second largest port.

August 23, 2003 The new peace agreement is off to a shaky start, as skirmishes between rebels and government are breaking out in several parts of the country. But there is little left to fight over. Some 14 years of fighting has left most of the nation's infrastructure destroyed and the people destitute. The rebels and government troops largely operate as bandits, foraging for food and whatever else they can scrounge. But there is so little left to take that the peace deal seemed the best option to avoi d starvation. Now the problem will be to see if the peacekeepers can prevent rebels, soldiers and full time bandits from plundering the foreign aid (mainly food) that is beginning to move throughout the country.

August 24, 2003 Unverified reports from central Liberia indicate that over a thousand civilians have been killed by marauding government troops and rebels. The gunmen are hungry and willing to kill for a meal.

Another battalion of Nigerian peacekeepers have arrived, bringing the peacekeeping force to 1,500.

August 25, 2003 A force of 150 US Marines returned to their amphibious ship offshore. The marines are a rapid reaction force, to back up Nigerian peacekeepers. It was felt that the rapid reaction force could operate more effectively if it was based on the ships, rather than ashore. However, local civilians are dismayed to see the marines leave.

August 27, 200 Government troops and rebels have begun fighting again. The lack of discipline on both sides is the major problem. The only trained troops in the country are about 1,500 peacekeepers. These troops can intimidate the thousands of armed men wandering about, but cannot control them. The fighting going on now appears to be clashes between government and rebel gunmen who are disputing who shall plunder a village or neighborhood. Actual, or rumored, clashes also send thousands of civilians fleeing down roads or into the bush, in fear of a major outbreak in fighting. But the largest threat these days is hunger and disease. Aid groups are bringing in food again, as peacekeepers have secured the major port in the capital. But it is feared that rebel and government troops will again steal a lot of this food. The food is taken not only to feed the gunmen, but for resale in local markets.

August 28, 2003 Based on experience in Sierra Leone, the UN believes it needs 15,000 peacekeepers to pacify Liberia. Right now, the initial force of 3,200 peacekeepers are still moving in, and all won't be in place for another week. It's uncertain if enough countries will provide troops for a 15,000 man force.

September 2, 2003 There are still thousands of armed men, and boys, wandering around the countryside, living off the land and unsure of what to do next. The government and rebels both used a very loose military organization. The basic combat unit was sort of a "battalion" led by a "commander" who had the wits and other resources to keep his "fighters" armed and somewhat organized. Each faction (government, LURD, MODEL) have a dozen or more commanders, and these guys form something of a ruling council for that faction. But commanders sometimes disagree with their factions policy, or choose to follow it only partially. Thus it's important to realize that there are really more than three players in Liberia, and many commanders don't fully control all their fighters. There are probably thousands of fighters who don't belong to any kind of organization and have gone freelance as marauding bandits.

September 4, 2003 One indicator that the war is over; fighters from neighboring countries are trying to get home with their loot. Many men are trying to cross into Sierra Leone and Ivory Coast with large quantities of "pre-owned" appliances and other consumer goods.

There are some half million refugees (out of Liberia's three million total population) around the capital, and aid workers are reluctant to venture too far outside the capital because of the number of bandits and undisciplined soldiers and rebels out there. Nigerian led peacekeepers have restored order in the capital and the port of Buchanan down the coast.

While only two or three percent of the population is armed and lawless, it's enough to cause the economy to collapse. Farmers won't plant crops, because of the fear that bandits will come by and steal it at harvest time. Shopkeepers are out of business for the same reason.

September 5, 2003 Around 60,000 people have fled their homes in the central Liberian town of Totota (80 km from Monrovia), following reports that rebels were mounting an assault and UN officials have asked for ECOMIL troops to patrol the area. The ECOMIL task force sent a patrol from Monrovia up the road to Totota, to try and restore confidence among the frightened civilians while two Harrier ground attack jets from the US naval task force flew in support. The clashes, which began on the 2nd, appeared to be a series of minor skirmishes rather than a set -piece battle.

Adam Sirleaf, the government's field artillery commander in Salala, noted that the clashes started at about 2.00 pm and that one of his commanders, "T-Boy", had returned to their lines for reinforcements.

Meanwhile, notorious ex-RUF [Revolutionary United Front] Colonel Sama Banya (aka "Z Man"), is reported to be training rebels in Liberia for use in Sierra Leone. Other former RUF commanders are also reportedly fighting for the different factions in Liberia. They have reportedly joined LURD for fear that if they remained in Sierra Leone, the Special Court might indict them. - Adam Geibel

September 6, 2003 The polyglot ECOMIL force will total 3,200 soldiers when it reaches full strength at the end of this first week of September. There are 2,000 soldiers from Ghana, Mali, Nigeria and Senegal already deployed in Liberia. The Nigerian troops make up the bulk of the peacekeeping force, with some 1,400 soldiers on the ground. A company of 150 Togolese troops left on the 4th, while a Gambian company of 150 had embarked on the 1st.

The 650-man Guinea-Bissau Armed Forces battalion that left for Liberia on September 2 was trained over the last few months by Portuguese instructors and inspected by US 'technicians'. ECOMIL stationed the

Guinea-Bissau troops in the Banga region, Liberia's northern border with the Ivory Coast. The ECOMIL mission has a two year duration, which means rotations of units. A second Guinea-Bissau battalion has begun training in anticipation of their deployment six months from now. - Adam Geibel

September 7, 2003 According to the UN, while Monrovia's streets remain relatively calm, they are festering with disease. The city of 1 million plus has had no regular garbage pickup since 1996 and sanitation has become virtually non-existent. Clean water reservoirs are perilously low, with only 32 per cent of the population having access to potable water and less than 30 per cent to latrines. Most people depended on unprotected wells for water. The threat of a cholera outbreak hangs like a cloud over the city. From 25 to 31 August, over 2,000 new cases had been reported. - Adam Geibel

September 8, 2003 Twelve US Marines from the 26th Marine Expeditionary Unit who were in Liberia last month in support of a West African peacekeeping mission have contracted malaria and 21 others have symptoms of the disease. Two Marines were flown from the USS Iwo Jima (off the coast of Liberia) to a US medical facility in Germany on September 7 and 31 others were flown from the ship the next day to the Bethesda Naval Medical Center. There are about 136 US troops ashore in Liberia, mostly Marines providing security at the US Embassy in Monrovia. The Iwo Jima task force off the coast has about 2,200 Marines and about 2,500 sailors aboard.

Meanwhile, fighting in central Liberia has delayed ECOMIL plans to deploy about 600 Guinea-Bissau troops to the region north of the capital Monrovia. The Guinea-Bissau battalion was scheduled to move on the 7th, but government needed to remove army check points from the highway leading to northern Liberia before the peacekeepers could proceed. - Adam Geibel

September 9, 2003 The UN is trying to obtain enough money to disarm up to a hundred thousand armed Liberians. Paying the gunmen to turn in their weapons, and providing agricultural tools and other goods has been shown to work elsewhere in Africa. But not everyone turns in their weapons, and an effective police force has to be trained and equipped before the peacekeepers can leave. If this is not done, the rebellion will start again. This has already happened once in Liberia since the 1990s.

September 12, 2003 Many groups of government and rebel troops (a few dozen to a few hundred armed men) are wandering the country, doing pretty much what they like. Most of the mayhem is inflicted on civilians, who are routinely robbed, raped and killed. The gunmen will sometimes fight each other, but mostly they are just looking for their next meal and some loot.

September 13, 2003 Some 400 ECOMIL peacekeepers arrived in Buchanan (the nations second largest town) and began establishing order.

September-October 2003 - US forces pull out. UN launches major peacekeeping mission, deploying thousands of troops.

September 16, 2003 Nigeria warned former Liberian president Charles Taylor that he must cease communicating with his followers in Liberia or lose the protection of the Nigerian government. Taylor has been using his cell phone daily to control henchmen (some of whom are still government officials) back in Liberia. Some of these cronies have visited Taylor in Nigeria. It is thought that Taylor will not be able to resist continuing to meddle in Liberian affairs, that the Nigerians will expel him and that Taylor will get arrested for war crimes.

September 17, 2003 Aid groups have resumed distributing food in Buchanan (the nations second largest town), something that could not be done earlier because of the risk of government or rebel gunmen stealing any food shipments that appeared. There are still many parts of the country where aid cannot be provided because of the danger from undisciplined gunmen. More peacekeepers will be required to deal with the gunmen out in the bush.

September 18, 2003 UN investigators estimate that exiled president Charles Taylor stole at least $100 million in government funds in the last four years. It was no secret that Taylor was grabbing everything he could, including most of the receipts from Liberia's lucrative ship registration service. This kind of theft is fairly typical of African dictators, except that in Taylor's case, investigators got their hands on government records and were able to detail the thefts. Taylor spent much of the money on maintaining his close followers and bands of gunmen that passed for the Liberian army.

September 19, 2003 The UN has agreed to send a 15,000 man peacekeeping force to Liberia for at least one year. This is the second time in ten years a peacekeeping force has gone to Liberia.

September 22, 2003 Liberians on Monrovia's streets now see the planned arrival of UN peacekeepers as the best chance for peace they have had for a generation, since former government troops are now reportedly robbing and raping at will. Around 5,500 refugees have fled to Guinea since fighting began in northern Liberia in late August and now continues at a rate of 300 to 450 persons per day. Once again, the phrase "the situation will get worse before it gets better" has now become a Liberian mantra.

The 15,000 strong UN force promised last week is expected to operate under a Chapter Seven mandate, which would give them the most robust mode of operation available under the UN charter. Their primary mission will be to restore security and to devise a plan to disarm an estimated 30,000 militiamen (including child soldiers) still active in the countryside.

Nigeria would contribute the most troops (3,500) while the UN Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) announced that the 850-strong Bangladeshi battalion (currently on a one-year tour of duty ends in northern Sierra Leone) would redeploy to Liberia on the 23rd. The battalion's shift would take ten days. The UN peacekeeping mission would also include more than 1,115 civilian police.

So why do member nations have such enthusiasm for this Liberian mission? Compared to a mission like Iraq, the threat in Liberia is less aggressive and, as always, United Nations pay is highly desired amongst the armies of poorer member nations. Can we say "gravy train"? - Adam Geibel

September 23, 2003 As aid workers are able to get out into the countryside, they have found that rebel groups have created a hellish economy where they have enslaved villagers and forced them to work to provide rebel troops with food and other supplies.

September 24, 2003 The UN estimates that there are some 15,000 troops on both sides who are under age 18. Before 1997, some 20 of fighters were under 18. Since then, the proportion has grown to 70 percent. Warlords all over Africa have discovered that armed kids are easier to control, and cheaper, than adults with guns.

The main airport outside the capital has resumed scheduled air service.

September 27, 2003 LURD declared that the war was over, apparently feeling that the power sharing deals would work out and lots of foreign peacekeepers would soon arrive.

September 30, 2003 The US Navy amphibious force that has been off Liberia, is now leaving.

Fighting continues, but most of it is related to criminal activity, usually at night, by rebel and government troops. In both cases, these guys are basically untrained teenagers with guns.

October 1, 2003 Three to five people were killed in a shootout between government troops and rebel fighters in Monrovia, before ECOMIL peacekeepers arrived at the scene in armored cars and calmed the situation down. Rebel LURD chairman Sekou Damate Conneh was being escorted in a

35-vehicle convoy to meet Liberia's Interim President Moses Blah when a crowd in the eastern Gardnersville suburb confronted the convoy, blocking its further movement. In an attempt to clear the road, the rebels were confronted by government troops. When the soldiers threw stones, the rebels pulled out AK-47s and grenade launchers stashed in their vehicles and opened fire. Soldiers from nearby Congo town joined in the 20 minute fray.

Meanwhile, the 3,500-strong ECOMIL force were swapping their green helmets for the blue of the UN peace force (UNMIL). These West African soldiers became the core of UN force, which will eventually number 15,000 soldiers and has an initial mandate of one year. There were also 1,100 international policemen signed up to retrain and restructure the country's security and police system. The ECOMIL forces were mostly limited to Monrovia and it's immediate suburbs, but when at full strength, UNMIL will be able to cover the entire country.

Nigeria has contributed the bulk of the soldiers for the force currently deployed in Liberia, with Gambia, Ghana, Guinea-Bissau, Mali, Senegal and Togo contributing troops. Jacques Klein, the UN Secretary General's representative to Liberia, claimed that 15 countries had expressed interest in contributing troops to UNMIL (including Ethiopia, Ireland, Namibia, Morocco and "some" European countries).

Kenyan born Lieutenant General Ishamel Opande has been appointed the UNMIL Force Commander, after having led UNSAMIL in Sierra Leone and being involved in the disarmament of over seventy thousand rebels. Opande, a graduate of Britain's Sandhurst Academy, has served in the Congo, Mozamibique and Namibia and was Chief Military Observer in Liberia. Opande promptly warned Liberia's warring groups to strictly stick to the 18 August Peace Agreement they all signed in the Ghanaian capital, Accra. - Adam Geibel

October 2, 2003 Shooting continued in the capital, with government and LURD fighters continuing to shoot at each other. At least a dozen people have been killed and many more wounded. The UN has halted aid operations because of the violence.

October 3, 2003 The UN has resumed operations, as the capital is quiet again. Peacekeepers have talked to rebel and government military leaders and got them to agree to stop fighting.

October 5, 2003 LURD rebels attacked the prosperous (by Liberian standards) town of Bong Mines, 50 kilometers north of the capital. The rebels looted the town, especially looking for food.

October 7, 2003 Government and rebel fighters continue loot and menace civilians, as well as foreign aid workers. The few thousand peacekeepers in the country cannot be everywhere, but the armed irregulars appear to be. The peace appears very fragile, the return of violence seems real as well.

October 12, 2003 Liberia severed diplomatic ties with Taiwan and recognized China instead. Taiwan believes that China offered the Liberian more money than Taiwan had been paying. Taiwan and China have long bid against each other for diplomatic recognition by African nations. The bribes usually go into the pockets of local politicians.

October 14, 2003 The new interim leader, Gyude Bryant, was sworn in. With the help of thousands of UN peacekeepers, Bryant will try and restore order among the nations 3.2 million people. But there are still over 40,000 armed men and boys on the loose.

China has offered to send troops to serve as peacekeepers in Liberia.

October 15, 2003 While over twenty years of fighting have killed over 200,000 people and driven even more into exile, not all Liberians are ready for peace. Half a million of the 3.2 million population have fled their homes, and gone to other parts of the country. There is still fighting between "government" and "rebel" factions. In reality, this violence is largely the result of marauding bands of armed men fighting over loot or access to areas that might have something to steal.

The rebels have promised to start disarming once the interim government (which has rebel members) is sworn in. But this will be difficult as the rebel (and government) want to know how they will be fed.

So far, some 4,000 of the 15,000 peacekeepers have arrived and not gone much beyond the two largest towns on the coast.

October 17, 2003 Although the government has handed over some heavy weapons to UN peacekeepers, there are still scattered firefights between government and rebel troops. It appears that the two rebel groups do not control all of their fighters, nor does the army. It's estimated that MODEL has 3,000-5,000 armed men, LURD 7,000-10,000, and the government forces 30,000-40,000.

October 25, 2003 Disarmament has been put on hold because the interim leader of the country refuses to allow the LURD military leader to become the head of the national army. LURD now wants the interim leader removed, and their man made head of the army, before disarmament can proceed. Two other LURD appointments were also turned down, because it was felt the proposed men did not have sufficient experience. Disarmament is supposed to begin in mid-November.

October 30, 2003 With only 4,500 peacekeepers on hand, the civil war, or at least civil disorder, continues outside the capital. Only a few hundred peacekeepers are operating outside the capital. There are supposed to be 15,000 peacekeepers on hand by early, 2004. Meanwhile, aid organizations fear operating outside areas protected by peacekeepers. This is because rebels and government troops tend to steal foreign aid, particularly food, before it can be distributed. Rebels, government troops and bandits continue to rape and pillage, as well as fight with each other over loot.

Since food aid has not gotten through to some interior areas for months, some rebels and government troops are enslaving local civilians and forcing them to grow crops for the gunmen. Over a million civilians have fled this sort of thing, heading to neighboring countries or Liberia's capital, where peacekeepers guard several large refugee camps.

November 2, 2003 The United States Congress authorized President George Bush to spend $2 million to "capture" former Liberian President Charles Taylor. Jacques Klein, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan's special representative in Liberia, has said that Taylor (wanted for war crimes by a U.N.-backed court in Sierra Leone) took an estimated $1 billion out of Liberia when he fled to exile in Nigeria.

However, the reports that the US Congress approved a $2 million bounty is raising fears that mercenaries may take up the challenge to kidnap Mr Taylor. At the end of August, an Anglo-American firm, Northbridge Services International, offered to "enforce the indictment and arrest warrant for President Charles Taylor".

The real danger would be from trigger-happy amateurs, since Military Service Providers (MSPs) like the firm Intercon (which guards the US Embassy) are already in Liberia. Retired Marine Horacio Hernandez noted that his personnel fought like soldiers during rebel sieges, at times lifting guns from slain rebels. Under the former US/African military partnership called the African Crisis Response Initiative (ACRI), the firm MPRI trained African peace enforcers who are currently serving in Liberia. - Adam Geibel

November 3, 2003 Rebels overran some towns and villages in northeastern Liberia (on the border with Ivory Coast), leaving scores of people killed or wounded. The rebels were also reported setting fire to villages in Nimba county, near the stronghold of the rebel Movement for Democracy in Liberia (MODEL). An unnamed government official claimed that the fighting involved government forces and MODEL rebels, which a MODEL legislator in the transitional government promptly denied. The United Nations confirmed the reported fighting, having sent a helicopter to overfly the area on the 2nd. After seeing burning villages, the UN dispatched a fact-finding mission to the area.

Special UN envoy to Liberia Jacques Klein urged France to send peacekeepers to Liberia, to address cross-border issues with neighboring Francophone states Ivory Coast and Guinea. Most of the United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL) speak English as their international language. A contingent of 145 Philippine soldiers has departed on the 3rd, to serve at the UNMIL headquarters in administrative, postal, medical, transport and other non-combat positions.

Recent news reports claimed that former president Charles Taylor's son was in the Ukraine, negotiating for arms to launch a fresh attack from the Ivory Coast. The country already has a fair number of weapons in the wrong hands. Despite UNMIL calls for the warring parties to make Monrovia and its suburb weapons free, there were local press reports of a huge cache of arms and ammunition buried behind the house of the former leader of the militia navy command and on a nearby island. The residents of the area claim that militias still loyal to the one time general patrol the area at night.

United Nations officials also opened and inspected a 40-foot container on the 3rd, that had tons of assorted munitions imported by Taylor (just days before he went into exile in Nigeria). The shipment that arrived at Roberts International Airport on August 7 included two 60 mm mortars, 149 boxes of mortar ammunition, 67 boxes of rocket-propelled grenades, 299 boxes of AK-47 rifles and about 699,000 rounds of AK-47 ammunition. UN officials would not say where the shipment was manufactured or from where it might have originated. - Adam Geibel

November 6, 2003 The UN will not lift sanctions (meant to stop arms imports and diamond exports) yet because arms and diamond smuggling is still going on.

November 10, 2003 Fighting between rebel and government fighters in the northeast left dozens dead. There are not enough peacekeepers in the country to take care of unrest this far inland. The UN and the interim government are sending negotiators to try and work out some kind of deal with the rival groups.

November 12, 2003 UN peacekeepers forced rebels and government (actually, pro-Charles Taylor) groups to stop shooting at each other in Buchanan (a port 90 kilometers from the capital.) All over the country, armed groups fight over food and loot. Food, and other aid, tend to get stolen unless the aid groups make deals with the strongest warlord in the area to provide security. The UN peacekeeping force won't reach its full strength of 15,000 until early next year.

November 13, 2003 One of the many items slipped into the $87 billion the US Congress appropriated for Iraq operations was a two million dollar reward for the capture and trial of former Liberian president Charles Taylor. The US State Department is now saying that the money will not be used (Congress can appropriate money, but the president does not have to spend it.) However, the US said that the reward money might be used to encourage the capture of Taylor. At the moment, Nigeria is providing sanctuary for Taylor, and leaning on him to stay out of Liberian politics. Thanks to cell (and satellite) phone technology, it's possible for Taylor to retain some control over armed groups in Liberia. Taylor still controls a lot of money he stole while he was president of Liberia. Money is a weapon, and if Taylor continues to use it, America says it will use it as well.

November 14, 2003 In the port town of Buchanan, UN peacekeepers managed to disarm some 300 armed followers of former president Charles Taylor. The power sharing agreement that sent Taylor into exile last August doesn't always work because neither the government or rebel forces were well disciplined. Many subordinate units were quite independent and prone to disobey orders from above.

November 18, 2003 In the northeast, major fighting broke out between LURD and MODEL rebels. Lesser fighting takes place daily throughout the country, but this is usually just posturing and use of firearms to punctuate verbal disagreements over loot. Many of the government and rebel troops still have to steal food to live, and this often leads to violence because there is not enough to go around.

November 20, 2003 More countries are sending peacekeeping troops, including China. The plan is to use these troops to guard aid operations, which will get food and medicine throughout the country and reduce the fighting over food and other loot. Disarming the thousands of armed young men will take longer, but it thought to be practical, because of the successful disarmament of militias in neighboring Sierra Leone.

November 21, 2003 UN peacekeepers set up more check points around the capital after it was discovered that armed groups were transporting illegal weapons. There is still an illegal arms trade going on inside the country.

November 24, 2003 With the arrival of 140 Irish troops, there are now two non-African contingents (the other is from Bangladesh) among the 6,000 peacekeepers. The peacekeeping force won't reach its full strength of 15,000 until early next year.

November 27, 2003 Marauding groups of "rebels" and "government soldiers" still wander the countryside, raping and pillaging at will. The new government is trying to get the marauders to turn in their weapons, but unless you can offer the armed men (or, more often, teenagers and younger kids) food and a future, they will prefer living off the wasteland they have created. Many villages towns have established their own defense organization, and fight off the marauders. Other localities are, in effect, ruled by marauders, who have enslaved the local civilians and forced them to grow food for them.

December 3, 2003 The UN began collecting weapons from 1,400 armed men working for the government and rebel organizations. Only 300 weapons were collected (out of over 40,000 thought to be out there.) Men giving up their weapons are to receive cash, food and help with finding a job.

December 8, 2003 Several dozen of the government soldiers, who were supposed to surrender their weapons, instead began looting in the capital. The men were upset when they discovered that they would not be given all of the cash payment immediately when they surrendered their weapon. Instead, they get two $75 payments and one $150 payment when they have completed retraining and settled down.

December 9, 2003 Disorder continues to be the norm throughout the country. Too many unemployed young men with guns, and not enough police and peacekeepers. Actually, there are practically no police.

December 10, 2003 The interim government has mobilized some reliable "soldiers" who, along with UN peacekeepers, are trying to round up the former "soldiers" who are looting in the capital. The former soldiers are protesting the payment schedule for those surrendering weapons.

December 11, 2003 Peacekeepers fought government and rebel gunmen in the capital and killed at least nine. The gunmen had come to surrender their weapons, but found that there was a long line at the disarmament camp. So they went off to do a little looting and were confronted by peacekeepers.

December 15, 2003 The disarmament program is being suspended for a month so that the capacity of the disarmament center can be increased. The problem is that too many men showed up to turn in their weapons.
The disarmament camp set up outside the capital could handle 250 men a day, but were getting over a thousand men a day, with over 9,000 backed up. As a result, some of the men who came to surrender, and found they could not, went off with their guns and resumed looting and pillaging. The demobilization camp is being expanded to deal with many more fighters at a time.

December 17, 2003 UN peacekeepers are trying to arrange, with neighboring nations, increased attention to the illegal arms trade with people inside Liberia. Cold War surplus AK-47s, and other weapons, are still abundant and cheap. It also appears that rebel groups in Liberia and neighboring nations, are planning to shift stockpiles of weapons across borders in order to legally conform with peace deals. For example, the Sierra Leone LURD rebels (which were backed by Guinea) are disarming by selling to storing weapons outside the country, including Liberia. Ivory Coast rebels, supported by Liberian rebel group MODEL are also moving weapons back and forth across the border.

December 18, 2003 The 6,000 peacekeepers in Liberia have been sending teams all over the country to get an idea of who is out there and what are they doing. It appears that up to 60,000 armed men are scattered through out the country. Some have attached themselves to villages, or groups of villages, as a defense force, in return for food. There is a general lack of food because so many people have fled their farms to avoid the marauding gunmen. But most Liberians, including the majority of the gunmen, want all the violence and chaos to end.

December 27, 2003 While some 12,000 fighters, most of them nominally working for the government, have turned in their weapons (for cash and other goods), the main rebel group, LURD, is holding out for more loot. In the last few days, armed LURD men have blocked peacekeepers from advancing north of the capital to set up a disarmament camp for LURD fighters. LURD leaders want more government leadership jobs (and access to foreign aid money) now, not later.

The UN only has about 6,000 of the authorized 15,000 peace keepers on hand. Many of the countries that pledged troops have been slow in delivering. The peacekeeping force was to have been at full strength in a few months, but this seems unlikely. Without more troops, the rebel and government troops cannot be forced to abide by the peace deal. And some Liberian military commanders are having second thoughts. Most of the country is still being ravaged by marauding bands of armed men.

January 1, 2004 Despite being outnumbered, UN peacekeepers have advanced into towns held by MODEL and LURD rebels and begun aid operations operations. A battalion of Bangladeshi troops went into the MODEL held port city of Buchanan while more Bangladeshi troops went into the LURD controlled inland towns of Gganga and Tubmanburg. The rebels had first resisted these advances, but after a show of force by the peacekeepers, and a threat to cut off food aid, they relented. Most Liberians want peace, and most of the gunmen will give up their weapons for a few hundred dollars. But these same men and adolescents will keep their weapons if they have no other way to get fed. There are still 40,000 armed men with government and rebel forces, and only about 7,000 peacekeepers. Some 11,000 men have offered to surrender their guns, but a shortage of money and troops to handle that many has caused disarmament efforts to be delayed until January 20th.

Meanwhile, the interim government agreed with the UN decision to maintain sanctions on Liberia. This prevents trade and weapons imports. The reason for this agreement is because most of Liberia is still controlled by warlords who will engage in illegal export of diamonds, lumber and other items, and the import of weapons, if they get a chance. The government also agrees with the UN that the country is not yet safe enough for the return of 400,000 Liberian refugees living in neighboring countries. The 3.3 people in Liberia are worse off than the refugees. Aid groups trying to deliver food and other supplies face the threat of attack by bandits and armed men belonging to government or rebel forces. Even an armed escort of peacekeepers does not guarantee shipments will get through.

Most of Liberia is still a lawless no-man's land overrun by hungry guys with guns and not much adult supervision.

January 8, 2004 A LURD rebel 'general' and 15 of his fighters walked right past a handful of shocked UNMIL guards at the Finance Ministry and seized one of the Directors, kidnapping him for a few hours. This is not the first time that LURD has used gang tactics at the Finance Ministry. Finance Minister Lusena Kamara was also hostage for few hours, until he was rescued by UNMIL soldiers backed by tanks.

However, instead of a financial shakedown this kidnapping was part of a greater drama. A group calling itself LURD's "military high command" later announced that they had replaced rebel chairman Sekou Damate Conneh with his estranged wife Aisha Keita Conneh, after accusing him of trading LURD's posts in the transitional government for money. The biggest problem with these sudden behind-the-scenes changes of leadership could threaten to derail the peace process.

The Dutch naval ship Rotterdam (attached to UNMIL) rescued 265 Liberian refugees coming home from Ghana from the Nigerian-registered El-Shaddai, which had been four days without power five kilometers off of Harper, near Liberia's eastern frontier with Ivory Coast. - Adam Geibel

January 13, 2004 UN special envoy Jacques Klein claimed that Liberia is growing more secure and stable each day, while its people appear to be committed to putting their long civil war behind them.

A Ukrainian An-124 jumbo transport plane carrying four Mi-8 helicopters and 21 personnel from the 56th Detached Helicopter Squadron arrived outside the Liberian capital of Monrovia. Two days earlier, another 21 personnel arrived with two Mi-24 helicopters.

The day before, United Nations police officers began a two-week intensive course to retrain 400 Liberian policemen. However, only about 100 of the authorized 1,115 UN police officers have reached Liberia so far. - Adam Geibel

January 15, 2004 In another sign of progress, UN humanitarian agencies are preparing to follow the peacekeeping troops that have been fanning out into the interior of Liberia for the past three weeks. Two UN World Food Program (WFP) truck convoys would leave Monrovia early next week for the towns of Tapeta and Saclepea in north central Liberia.

The resumption of its campaign to disarm an estimated 40,000 former combatants in Liberia would be delayed by 20 to 30 days. UNMIL needs the extra time to prepare four new reception and cantonment sites, as well as conduct an information campaign throughout the country to make sure all of the former combatants are fully aware of how the disarmament process would work. In these circumstances, ignorance of procedures tends to turn into gun battles.

Meanwhile, about 200 protesters from the Special Security Service (SSS) and the Special Security Unit (SSU) demonstrated outside the presidential palace in Monrovia, threatening to resume fighting if they do not receive paid months of back pay. - Adam Geibel

January 18, 2004 With Liberia growing more stable and secure by the day, the United Nations will ask member nations for between $400 and $500 million to help rebuild Liberia at a donor conference in New York next month.

Meanwhile, China is reestablishing ties with Liberia by reopening its Embassy near Monrovia and the Chinese Resident Ambassador is expected to arrive within a couple of months. China has approved sending in up to 600 peacekeeping troops to join UNMIL, about 100 more than what was previously announced. The Government of China has also provided up to $3 million to augment the operational budget of the Transitional Government. - Adam Geibel Peacekeepers are now moving into remote rural areas, providing the first security those areas have seen in years. About a thousand Ethiopian troops have established themselves in the jungles of eastern Liberia. Also for the first time in years, the train system is running again (one locomotive and a few cars moving goods from the interior to the capital.)

January 19, 2004 A thousand UNMIL peacekeepers took up positions along the Ivory Coast border, and will attempt to stop the movement of armed men and weapons back and forth across the frontier.

January 20, 2004 The head of LURD, Sekou Conneh, is faced with a rebellion within the group led by his wife, Asha Keita-Conneh. The wife has the backing of several sub-commanders and insists that she is the brains behind the LURD leadership.

January 25, 2004 MODEL and LURD demand that Charles Gyude Bryant, the interim president of Liberia, be removed. The rebels threatened to not disarm if this was not done. Bryant was selected to run the country until elections in 2005. The rebel groups are upset over the distribution of jobs and money by Bryant. To make matters worse, LURD and MODEL are breaking up into factions, usually over issues of money or power.

January 28, 2004 UN food distribution has now moved into northern Liberia. The armed men in the area have been discouraged from stealing the food by the UN peacekeepers who operate with the UN aid workers.

The United States has warned the leaders in MODEL and LURD to comply with the peace agreements and disarm or face military action.

January 29, 2004 LURD and MODEL appear to have backed down, for the moment, on their demand for the removal of the head of the government. The break up of the rebel groups continues and it is feared that some of these factions will go back to fighting.

February 18, 2004 UNMIL, the UN peacekeeping force, has 11,600 troops in Liberia, and expects to have the full force of 15,000 troops by next month. But the peacekeepers won't be stationed throughout the country until April. The task of disarming some 50,000 irregular fighters is delayed again and again. In the meantime, many of these armed men continue to loot and abuse civilians wherever there are no peacekeepers to prevent them. The looting includes an illegal logging operation run by MODEL. The logging business was, until last year, run for the benefit of the former president of Liberia, Charles Taylor.

Most of the population has no access to a safe water supply or medical care. Several hundred thousand people are threatened by starvation.

February 19, 2004 MODEL rebels stormed and looted a rubber plantation in the southeast, then began selling off its assets. Russian-made UNMIL helicopter gunships began regular patrols of the country's borders with the Ivory Coast, Guinea and Sierra Leone, to control illegal logging and other unauthorized cross-border movements. - Adam Geibel

February 20, 2004 The United Nations peacekeepers in Liberia will no longer pay cash up front to former combatants handing in weapons, once the stalled disarmament program resumes in March or April. When they did that in December, the situation merely destabilized. - Adam Geibel

February 23, 2004 United Nations peacekeepers extended their deployment to Liberia's western border with Sierra Leone at the weekend. Namibian troops deployed to three towns lying on the main road from Monrovia to the Sierra Leone border.

The presence of the UN troops inspired a group of over 500 Liberians to spontaneously return on the 21st, in self-organized convoys through the Liberia-Sierra Leone border town of Bo Waterside. They made their way into a UNHCR assisted camp for the internally displaced persons.

Meanwhile, Liberia's Human Rights Commission accused forces loyal to ex-president Charles Taylor of killing more than 360 civilians (including babies, children and pregnant women) in a massacre in April 2003. - Adam Geibel

February 24, 2004 A Swedish reinforced mechanized infantry company of 240 troops will go to Liberia in March to join the Irish battalion in UNMIL for a 12 month rotation. An advance force of 50 troops will leave on February 25.

International health agencies launched an emergency vaccination campaign, after three confirmed and 11 suspected cases of the potentially fatal Yellow Fever viral illness were found. The mortality rate for Yellow Fever can be as high as 50 percent, even among hospitalized patients. There are fewer than 80,000 doses of Yellow Fever vaccine available in Liberia, while 722,000 people above 6 months of age need the shot. - Adam Geibel

February 25, 2004 Nearly 3,000 registered Liberian refugees have spontaneously returned from neighboring countries since December 2003, but since the capital is Monrovia still in ruins, most have sought shelter in Internally Displaced Persons (IDP) camps. The UN refugee agency wasn't quite ready for these eager people, since they to wait until all 15,000 UNMIL troops was fully deployed in the interior and security there had improved.

The UNHCR figures that it will have facilitate the return and reintegration of an estimated 320,000 Liberian refugees, most of whom live in Sierra Leone, Guinea, Ivory Coast and Ghana, as well as 300,000 camp-based IDPs once the UN peacekeeping force.

Meanwhile, the UNHCR will repatriate an estimated 13,900 Sierra Leonean refugees via truck convoys on 2 March. So far, 150,000 refugees have been returned to Sierra Leone and over 10,000 have shown an interest in repatriation since December 2003. - Adam Geibel

February 26, 2004 United States is providing $114 million in assistance to Liberia (the first installment in $200 million pledged for reconstruction). The World Bank has pledged $29 million to Liberia in post -conflict grants in 2004. The World Bank and the United Nations estimate that Liberia will need roughly $488 million during the next two years to meet its most pressing reconstruction needs. - Adam Geibel

March 11, 2004 A Liberian government team investigating claims that hundreds of fighters were secretly training in the northeast reported that no evidence had been found so far, but that weapons were available everywhere. They urged UN peacekeepers to deploy quickly to the borders with Ivory Coast and Guinea, where armed Taylor-loyalists are still on the loose. - Adam Geibel

March 18, 2004 A 180-strong Chinese truck transport company left for a peacekeeping mission to Liberia in aboard UN planes. This unit will operate 179 trucks and other pieces of major military equipment. An advance group of 60 from this unit had arrived in the country on December 10, 2003. Ultimately, the Chinese Government will send 550 peacekeeping troops to Liberia: a 240-member transport company, a 275-member engineering team and 35 medical staff for a UN hospital. - Adam Geibel

March 19, 2004 United Nations Peacekeepers sent reinforcements to Buchanan, Liberia's second city still controlled by MODEL rebels, to stop a chaotic rebel looting spree, and at least one civilian died. A helicopter gunship was deployed from Monrovia to control the outbreak and there are now over 800 peacekeepers in the city. The trouble began after a rebel fighter tried to take food from a local civilian, who resisted and was subsequently beaten. - Adam Geibel

March 25, 2004 Liberia has been ranked, by international security firms, one of the ten most dangerous places to be on the planet. Rampant crime and political instability earn Liberia this dubious honor. Despite the presence of 12,000 peacekeepers, the security situation is still bad.

May 1, 2004 The original estimates of armed men wandering around the country were 38-40,000. But last month, a more complete list of all the armed men has been compiled, which produced the larger number. Some 19,000 thousand men have turned in their weapons, and received cash ($300) and goods (tools, training) for that. This virtuous bribery is being subverted, however, by many men who are turning in order, or defective weapons, while hiding a working weapon away. So far, 11,000 weapons and four million rounds of ammunition have been turned in.

The disarmament program was supposed to start last December, but confusion and lack of preparation delayed it until April 15th. Now that disarmament has got going again, it turns out that about half the rebels "disarming" are unarmed. Last year, peacekeepers estimated that there were three weapons for every fighter in the country. It is suspected that some families, or groups, will try and send as many people through the disarmament program as possible, to collect the cash and resalable goods. The population of Liberia is estimated to be 3.3 million, with over half a million adolescent and adult males who could potentially claim to be gunmen eligible for disarmament payments. The 15,000 peacekeepers are trying to avoid more of this by insisting that only men enrolled by one of the government or rebel militias are to be "disarmed." But corruption is widespread, and the lists are still subject to tampering.

Many of the rebel and government gunmen are also bitter that the promises of their leaders, for a better life, have not been fulfilled. If many of these men hold back a weapon, the seeds of a another civil war have been planted. This is how the just ended civil war got started, and the cycle seems to be repeating itself.

May 12, 2004 So far, 25,961 government and rebel fighters have been disarmed. In the last 27 days alone, 12,385 were disarmed. There are four camps where the fighters can register, turn in their weapon and get their $300. As expected, there has been some fraud, with people scrounging up a weapon and claiming to be a fighter. Moreover, none of the demobilization camps are in the rural areas. Out there, bands of armed men still roam about, looting and pillaging as they go. There are 14,127 UN peacekeepers in the country, which has not been enough to clear the armed men out of the more remote areas. Despite that, the UN has declared 85 percent of the country safe for the civil government and aid organizations to operate in. However, it is still estimated that 25,000 or more armed men are still in the country. And many of those who disarmed are believed to have hidden away another rifle or pistol.

October 2004 - Riots in Monrovia leave 16 people dead; the UN says former combatants were behind the violence.

Mrs. Ellen Johnson Sirleaf elected first female president of Liberia.

May 17, 2004 Several hundred former government troops rioted in the capital. Armed with knives and clubs, the men looted shops and marched on UN headquarters complaining that they had not received the second half of their $300 disarmament payment. UN peacekeepers eventually showed up and dispersed the rioters, but not before one was killed and several were injured by shopkeepers who joined together to defend their property.

May 18, 2004 The UN is dismayed at the fact that only 11,000 rifles and pistols, many of them not in working order, have been turned in so far. Last year, the UN estimated that there were over 100,000 firearms in the country. On a more positive note, four million rounds of ammunition have been surrendered. But even in areas that are considered secure, armed men will show up and establish roadblocks to extort money from passing traffic (including UN or foreign aid workers.)

October 23, 2004 The country is at peace, sort of, but the war isn't over. UN peacekeepers have only taken control of four of the 15 counties. Only 25,000 weapons have been seized. Some 83,000 fighters have turned themselves in, producing some kind of weapon, or ammunition, to do so. But only 30,000 of those have the received the promised $300 payment, and fewer are receiving the job training. Not that there are many jobs to be had. It's estimated that only about 15 percent of the population has a job. Farmers still fear planting any crops, even if they had the seed and tools. For too many years, armed men would show up at harvest time and steal the crop.

The 14,000 peacekeepers are the only law in the country, and there are still some 50,000 armed men out there, among the three million Liberians. There isn't much shooting because there isn't much ammo left, or anything to steal. The country is flat on its back. No one in neighboring countries is interested in spending any money to support armed gangs. The illegal diamond trade in neighboring Sierra Leone has been largely shut down, and the UN is trying to get the economy going again. But in an endless pattern, a revived economy without a working government, will just produce more bandits and warlords to destroy it. Forming a government that can actually rule, and defend itself, and the Liberian people, has yet to be done.

October 27, 2004 Representatives from the IMF, World Bank and US Treasury visited and examined the governments books. Most of the budget comes from foreign aid, and donors are much less willing to tolerate corruption than they were in the past. The auditors demanded that the government publish all the details of the government budget, and sanctions against diamond and timber exports would not be lifted until that was done. Corruption not only wastes a lot of foreign aid, but is a major cause of civil wars and disorder in general.

October 30, 2004 Thousands of young men rioted in the capital, destroying much property. Eighteen people were killed, hundreds injured and over 200 arrested. The fighting was religion based, with Christian and Moslem gangs going after each other. Three churches and two mosques were burned down. The countries population is 40 percent Christian and 20 percent Moslem. There has rarely been any religious violence. This outbreak had more to do with lots of unemployed young men sitting around idle, than anything else. UN peacekeepers calmed things down after about two days of unrest. The disarmament program apparently worked, as few of the rioters were using firearms. But much damage was done with knives, clubs and machetes.

October 31, 2004 The voluntary disarmament program ended today, with some 93,000 people participating, and some 26,000 weapons, and much ammunition, being turned in. And to underscore that, UN peacekeepers arrested LURD leader Philip Kamara, about 80 of his followers, and seized several weapons.

November 2, 2004 Last weeks riots were partially due to simmering ill will between the various factions that took part in the recent civil war. The "armies" in that civil war were made up of dozens of groups, each led by a guy who was a natural leader. Many of those gangs are still intact, even if they have turned in all, or most, of their firearms. And the gangs still tend to support their former "boss of bosses." The big guys, like exiled former president and war criminal Charles Taylor, deny any involvement in the recent violence. UN peacekeepers are not sure.

November 4, 2004 The three main warlord factions (former president John Taylor's forces, plus the LURD and MODEL rebel groups) have officially disbanded. Nearly 100,000 former members of these groups have presented themselves for official demobilization (and payment from a $50 million fund established for this.) Although some 26,000 weapons have been turned in, many warlords are still in business, and are scamming the peacekeepers. Warlords send in individuals with worn out weapons, or the minimum number of bullets (150) to qualify for a demobilization payment. The warlords then take most of the money. It is believed that thousands of the newest weapons are being held back, and when the peacekeepers leave, the warlords will be back in business.

November 16, 2004 The Ivory Coast government is hiring experienced Liberian gunmen to fight in the Ivory Coast civil war. Refugees have spotted at least 50 of these armed mercenaries moving into Ivory Coast. The Liberian fighters are being paid $500 each, and promised ample opportunities to loot in rebel held northern Ivory Coast. Many of the Liberian mercenaries are recently demobilized teenage boys.

November 21, 2004 Refugees are again becoming a problem, because of the new outbreak of war in neighboring Ivory Coast. There are still about 70,000 Liberian refugees in Ivory Coast camps (and another 270,000 in other countries). But in the last week, about 13,000 Ivory Coast refugees have fled into Liberia. So far, the Liberian refugee camps in Ivory Coast have been left alone, but it is feared that the Ivory Coast refugees, currently mostly women and children, will become bases for armed men, taking a break from fighting in Ivory Coast.

February 1, 2005 UN Peacekeepers have been able to stop the fighting, but have not always been able to restore peace. Crime is rampant. Much of the theft is food and personal possessions. There are fights over this, resulting in injuries, and sometimes death. There are some more bizarre incidents. In southeastern Liberia, local religious practices have gotten out of hand, and at least six people have been murdered as part of black magic rituals. Peacekeepers have had to protect people accused to participating in the rituals. In many parts of Africa, people are accused, and often attacked, because of participation in black magic rituals, or religious practices that involve cursing, or killing, people.

February 15, 2005 About a 100,000 people presented themselves to UN peacekeepers as former soldiers or rebels, and demanded the $300 disarmament payment, as well as training and tools needed for rehabilitation. This was twice as many people as the program anticipated. Naturally, the money ran out before everyone could be taken care of. The UN has been trying to raise another $60 million to keep the program going. Thousands of disarmed men have turned in their weapons, but have not received what they were promised. This has caused some unrest, and some of the men have turned to petty crime or banditry. Many of the unanticipated people seeking disarmament were frauds. It quickly became known what the minimum requirements were for disarmament benefits (what kind of weapon or how much ammo to turn in, and what kind of story to tell) and a lot of non-fighters lined up to defraud the system. The UN had no way to double check most of the frauds.

February 25, 2005 After disarming most of the known rebel and army troops, UN peacekeepers have declared 13 of the countries 15 counties safe enough to receive returning refugees. There are some 850,000 refugees, 350,000 of them outside the country. They have been living off food aid, in refugee camps. Now they can return to their farms and other property. The fighting between rebels and soldiers, plus the looting by these forces, and bandits, have left most of these farms looted and burned. Homes and businesses were also destroyed. Burned out ruins are a common sight throughout the country. Foreign aid has to provide tools, seed and building materials so that the refugees can become self-sustaining. Schools and clinics are being rebuilt as well. Some refugees began returning on their own last year, risking fatal encounters with rebels and soldiers who had not disarmed, or bandit gangs that will never disarm. The bandits are hunted down by peacekeepers, and are arrested, forced to scatter, or killed.

But some of the disarmed rebels, soldiers and bandits have been better organized, and have taken over farms or businesses, and claim to be the owners. The peacekeepers are less well prepared with cases like this, which are usually handled by lawyers and courts. Sorting out who owns what, with most government records destroyed during years of fighting, will itself take a long time. Some ownership disputes will never be adequately resolved, and some will lead to renewed violence. There are few layers or courts in Liberia, and this is not expected to change for several years.

March 7, 2005 Lack of money, and trained personnel, has delayed the organization of a new Liberian army. The big problem is a shortage of money to pay off the existing 15,000 soldiers, and demobilize them. A new army would then be recruited from all over the country, and trained as professional troops, not the armed bandits that the army has been for the last decade.

March 18, 2005 The new parliament, and government, has been tainted by corruption. Several members of parliament and government officials have been caught, and removed from office. It is feared that this will cause the civil war to revive. It's also reported that many of the child soldiers who have recently been demobilized, have gone back to the armed groups they previously belonged to.

March 23, 2005 In northern Liberia, two peacekeepers were injured when someone threw a fire bomb at a checkpoint. There are a lot of disgruntled former soldiers and rebels wandering around. Many of the demobilized troops miss the ability to loot at will (there's not much left to steal, the groups of armed men have been disarmed and broken up, and there are lots of peacekeepers around.)

March 26, 2005 There are now about 15,000 UN peacekeepers in the country. Since they first arrived in October, 2003, 40 of these peacekeepers have died, largely from disease and accidents.

March 28, 2005 The UN may move soon to secure the port facilities in the capital, Monrovia, in order to reduce smuggling (of arms, people, diamonds, drugs, etc.), and thus further stabilize the situation. This is likely to tick-off some of the domestic factions, who control portions of the port and profit greatly from this. Some of these factions are basically "legitimate" (they were not part of any rebel force or pro-government militia), but this no-questions-asked type trade fueled the violence for over a decade. The gunrunners and money launderers are still in business, and the UN is having a hard time sorting out who is naughty and who is not.

November 23, 2005 - Ellen Johnson Sirleaf becomes the first woman to be elected as an African head of state.

2006 February - Truth and Reconciliation Commission is set up to investigate human rights abuses between 1979 and 2003.

April 2006 - Former president Charles Taylor appears before a UN-backed court in Sierra Leone on charges of crimes against humanity. In June the Netherlands-based International Criminal Court agrees to host his trial.

June 2006 - UN Security Council eases a ban on weapons sales so Liberia can arm newly trained security forces. An embargo on Liberian timber exports is lifted shortly afterwards.

July 2006 - President Johnson Sirleaf switches on generator-powered street lights in the capital, which has been without electricity for 15 years.

April 2007 - UN Security Council lifts its ban on Liberian diamond exports. The ban was imposed in 2001 to stem the flow of "blood diamonds", which helped to fund the civil war.

May 2007 - UN urges Liberia to outlaw trial by ordeal.

June 2007 - Start of Charles Taylor's war crimes trial in The Hague, where he stands accused of instigating atrocities in Sierra Leone.

January 2008 - Supreme Court rules that the president can appoint local mayors because the government cannot afford to hold municipal elections. Municipal elections have not been held since 1985 because of financial constraints and successive civil wars.

February 2008 - US President George W Bush ends a five-country tour of Africa with a visit to Liberia, one of America's staunchest allies on the continent.

March 2008 - Liberia conducts its first census since 1984.

February 2009 - President Johnson Sirleaf admits to Truth and Reconciliation Commission that she mistakenly backed ex-President Charles Taylor when he launched the 14-year civil war in 1989.

July 2009 - Truth Commission submits report to parliament, recommends prosecuting 200 people and listing others who should be barred from public office, including President Johnson Sirleaf.

September 2009 - UN Security Council votes to extend mandate of UN forces in Liberia (UNMIL) into 2010 to help with 2011 elections.

February 2010 - Fighting erupts between Christians and Muslims in northern province of Lofa after the killing of a Christian student. Several churches and mosques are destroyed.

June 2010 - IMF, World Bank devise plan to relieve Liberia of heavy debt burden.

September 2010 - The 19-nation Paris Club of creditor countries pardon $1.2bn worth of debt owed by Liberia.

November 2010 - President Johnson Sirleaf dismisses cabinet, reportedly to start with a "clean slate".

April 2011 - War crimes trial of former Liberian leader Charles Taylor ends, with a judgment expected to be handed down later in the year.

October 2011 - President Ellen Sirleaf Johnson awarded Nobel Peace Prize.

October to November 2011- Presidential elections. President Johnson Sirleaf wins re-election. Her main rival boycotts the second round.

February 2012 - Energy companies report discovery of oil off the coasts of Liberia and Sierra Leone. Work continues to estimate their size.

March 2012 - George Boley, the former leader of the rebel Liberial Peace Council, is deported to Liberia from the US over his role in the civil war in the 1990s.

April 2012 - Ex-president Charles Taylor is found guilty of war crimes for aiding and directing rebels in Sierra Leone. He is sentenced to 50 years in jail.

June 2012 - Liberia closes its border with Ivory Coast after seven UN peacekeepers are killed on the Ivorian side, by attackers allegedly based in Liberia.

September 2012 - President Ellen Sirleaf Johnson suspends forestry chief and launches probe into recent timber deals amid concerns of widespread fraud.

October 14, 2013: Liberia's Charles Taylor prefers Rwandan jail to UK’

BBC News: Ex-Liberian President Charles Taylor has asked to serve his 50-year sentence for war crimes in Rwanda, rather than the UK. In a letter sent to the court that convicted him, he says it would be easier - and less expensive - for his family to visit him in Africa. He also said he feared being attacked in a British prison. Taylor was convicted of aiding rebels who committed atrocities in Sierra Leone during its civil war. Last week, a UK minister confirmed that Taylor would be transferred to a British prison. He was convicted by the UN-backed Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL), but his trial was held in The Hague in case it sparked renewed unrest in West Africa. The Netherlands only agreed to host the trial if he was imprisoned elsewhere.

December 2, 2013: Liberia: 'I'm Back in Good Shape' – Ellen Sirleaf’

The New Dawn (Monrovia): Amid rumors here of her death, President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf returned home on Friday, assuring the nation that she is in good health and physically fit to execute the job of the Liberian people. President Sirleaf said the reception she got from citizens at places she visited on Saturday, 30 November 2013, meant that they themselves didn't believe rumors here that she had passed, saying, "Today, they were relieved to know that I'm back." "I'm back in good shape to do those things that I was elected to do," said the President during an interview with journalists over the weekend. "I had fun with them you know. Each person was trying to look [at] me; looking at my feet to make sure my feet [and] hands in a good place. I think it was good for the people to receive me so well in all the different areas," she noted.

Longstanding rumors here surrounding the purported death of President Sirleaf ended Friday, 29 November when the 75 years-old Liberian leader touched down at the Roberts International Airport or RIA in Margibi County at 8:20 p.m., as some of her officials and the loyalists cheered "resurrection." Before embarking on a tour of roads and infrastructure projects earmarked for the dry seasons in Monrovia and other parts of Montserrado County on Saturday, the President had told journalists upon arrival at the RIA that when she heard rumors of her death being spread in Liberia, she thought: "Well, I just thought maybe like Jesus Christ, I would be resurrected." At the end of a day-long tour of the city and its surroundings, President Sirleaf said she did not think biological age has anything to do with a person's stamina and strength.

Since her departure in November to attend the Arab-African summit in Kuwait and subsequent visits to other countries, speculations had abounded that the President was secretly flown out of the country due to critical health condition. During her stay out of the country, some claimed that President Sirleaf had died, while others said that she suffered a stroke after fallen off. But after touring several communities in Monrovia, Madam Sirleaf said she was glad to be on the road to see how happy the people were to see her, "having risen from the dead." The President, accompanied by her officials, including Public Works Minister Antoinnette Weeks and her deputies, visited the unfinished Defense Ministry where a proposed Ministerial Complex is expected to be constructed, and then moved on to Duport Road, parts of Paynesville and Brewerville, respectively.

July 28, 2014: Ebola outbreak put a number of countries in a lockdown’

Ebola May Expand It’s Deadly Reach Beyond Africa, 670+ people i n West Africa dead + spread to 60 locations in four countries. The worst Ebola outbreak in history has put a number of countries in West Africa in lockdown, led to the deaths of nearly 700 people since February and brought new reports of doctors, including Americans, contracting the virus they are attempting to contain. The situation is undeniably scary.

How bad is the outbreak? Bad — very, very bad. It's concentrated in three small West African states: Sierra Leone, Liberia and Guinea, where reports of Ebola infections first emerged in February. The outbreak has claimed more than 670 lives and, worryingly, infected medical personnel attempting to stop its spread. A prominent Liberian physician died Sunday. What's particularly scary, though, was the recent death of a Liberian man in Lagos, the bustling coastal mega-city in Nigeria, Africa's most populous country. The man, a consultant for the Liberian government, had traveled from Liberia through an airport in Lome, the capital of Togo, before arriving in Nigeria. The hospital where he died is under lockdown, and the WHO has sent teams to Togo and Nigeria.

Doctors Without Borders has described the Ebola epidemic sweeping across West Africa as “out of control.” The Ebola virus, which is fatal in 90 percent of cases, has killed more than 670 people in West Africa and spread to 60 locations in four countries. The obstacles to bringing the virus under control are formidable, among them a shortage of medical resources and resistance from local communities terrified by a disease they do not understand. The current outbreak began in Guinea in March. Sierra Leone is now the epicenter of the epidemic. The situation is deteriorating rapidly in Liberia. On Friday, a man died of an Ebola infection in Lagos, Nigeria.

Nurses and doctors are also falling victim to the disease. Two American aid workers have tested positive, and a doctor at Liberia’s largest hospital, the John F. Kennedy Memorial Medical Center in Monrovia, has died of the disease. The virus is amplified by a mobile population, especially across the shared borders between Guinea, Sierra Leone and Liberia. In the Nigerian case, the infected victim entered on a passenger flight from Liberia. The World Health Organization and the Nigerian government have shut down the hospital where the man died, and other passengers on the flight are being tracked down and tested.

Infected individuals must be isolated in health centers to prevent the virus from spreading to others and to give them the care they need. Bodies of victims must also be disposed of with care: The virus, present in bodily fluids, including sweat, is most infectious at the end-stage. Then there is widespread ignorance among the most vulnerable populations about what needs to be done. The result is that many people are hiding sick loved ones at home and transporting bodies for burial with no understanding of the precautions they must take.

Liberia’s president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, has declared a national Ebola emergency. The governments of Guinea, Sierra Leone and Nigeria must also act with equal urgency to raise public awareness, put additional trained medical personnel on the ground and trace patients’ contacts with others. The current Ebola outbreak is more than a sum of national emergencies. It is now a regional crisis, and the whole of West Africa must act to contain it. (Text ends)

EBOLA ALERT: Liberia shuts schools to tackle outbreak

BBC (July 30, 2014) Liberia's government has announced that is is closing down all schools across the country to stop the spread of the deadly Ebola virus. Some communities would be placed under quarantine as well, President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf said. Non-essential government workers will be sent home for 20 days and the army deployed to enforce the measures. The number of people killed by the virus in West Africa has now reached 672, according to new UN figures.

The BBC's West Africa correspondent Thomas Fessy says treatment facilities have reportedly been overwhelmed in the Liberian capital Monrovia. Some wards have already filled up, forcing health workers to treat some patients at their homes. President Sirleaf said that Friday 1 August would be a non-working day in Liberia to allow for the disinfection of all public facilities. "All non-essential staff - to be determined by the heads of ministries and agencies - are to be placed on 30 days' compulsory leave" she added.

Rapid spread: The US humanitarian organisation Peace Corps said it was withdrawing 340 volunteers from Liberia, Sierra Leone and Guinea because of the spread of the virus. Ebola kills up to 90% of those infected, but patients have a better chance of survival if they receive early treatment. It spreads through contact with an infected person's bodily fluids. The outbreak - the world's deadliest to date - was first reported in Guinea in February. It then spread to Liberia and Sierra Leone.

September 17, 2014: U.S Sending 3,000 Troops To Liberia “To Fight Ebola”

President Barack Obama announced new measures Tuesday to help fight the worst-ever Ebola outbreak in West Africa, including sending 3,000 U.S. troops to the region.

(AFRICANGLOBE) A White House statement detailing the program said the troops will be sent to a new command center in Liberia’s capital, Monrovia, where they will help with the transportation of supplies and personnel. The U.S. will also build and staff Ebola treatment centers, and set up a facility to train 500 healthcare workers a week.

The White House said the goal of the program is to control the Ebola epidemic at its source, lessen the economic and political toll it takes on the region and build up global “health security infrastructure” in West Africa and beyond. The United States Agency for International Development will also carry out a campaign to hand out protection kits and train people to protect themselves and their families. It will initially target the 400,000 most vulnerable households in Liberia, and then expand to cover all of Liberia and the region.

The Ebola virus has infected more than 4,700 people in West Africa, spreading from Guinea to Sierra Leone, Liberia, Nigeria and Senegal. Liberia has been the hardest hit, accounting for about half of the more than 2,400 deaths. Obama traveled Tuesday to the headquarters of the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta to meet with health experts and publicly announce the new U.S. efforts.

A White House spokesman said Monday that because of its capability, the United States has a unique responsibility to step up in the midst of the international crisis. The new programs will bring the total U.S. commitment to fighting the Ebola outbreak to $175 million dollars. Diplomats say the U.N. Security Council will hold an emergency meeting on the Ebola crisis on Thursday. They say it will only be the second public health crisis discussed by the council, which met on the AIDS pandemic in 2000.

U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Samantha Power said the Ebola situation is dire and the international community must work together to stem its spread. “I don’t need to tell any of you how unusual Security Council debates on public health issues and public health crises are, but at this moment it is crucial that council members discuss the status of the epidemic, confer on a coordinated international response, and begin the process of marshaling our collective resources to stop the spread of the disease,” said Power. In a recent interview, President Obama said while Ebola does not pose an imminent threat to Americans, containing the outbreak is a top national security priority. (Text ends)

October 14, 2014: American military forces are now in Africa trying to develop good will at the local level and train troops to handle counter-terrorism operations. Many of the American troops in Africa have experience doing the same thing in Iraq and Afghanistan. There they ran into serious problems with corruption, especially among local leaders. Afghanistan is more similar to Africa than Iraq because the Afghans are more tribal and less literate than the Iraqis.

Efforts to curb corruption in Africa have been largely unsuccessful. Too many senior Africans consider corruption a right and something worth getting violent in defense of. The result is a lot of ineffective aid programs because there are not enough competent (in terms of training and experience) uncorrupted Africans available to carry out and sustain development projects. This is compounded by the fact that infrastructure (roads, power supply and so on) is generally inadequate to sustain many aid financed improvements. This is especially the case with anything that depends on regular supplies of electricity or outside goods (spare parts or maintenance assistance).

While aid projects in urban areas have less problems with infrastructure, there is always the corruption there to steal money, equipment or anything of value. When you have enough uncorrupt staff to operate an aid project, the results are satisfying. But all too often the corruption and other problems take over as soon as the army (or aid organization) leaves and soon there is little left to even indicate that that there had been a substantial effort to improve the lives of the locals.

The problem with aid programs is that those who authorize them, then get the necessary money and people to implement them tend to underestimate or ignore the obstacles corruption and unqualified (as in illiterate and untrained) locals impose. Literacy and other training programs help, but little has been done about the corruption because this is the most difficult problem aid workers will encounter. Even in situations that are critical to the very survival of the locals, like ones involving water supplies and improved agricultural techniques, are often crippled or delayed by the corruption.

What it all comes down to is that as long as corruption is played down as a problem many, if not most, aid programs will be failures or much less than they could be. It has to be recalled that more than 3, 500 people have died from Ebola in Liberia, which along with Guinea and Sierraleone has seen the vast majority of deaths from the disease.

Daily OBSERVER October 1, 2014:Ebola, AIDS Manufactured by Western Pharmaceuticals, US DoD?

Scientists allege deadly diseases such as Ebola and AIDS are bio weapons being tested on Africans. Other reports have linked the Ebola virus outbreak to an attempt to reduce Africa's population. Liberia happens to be the continents's fastest growing population. Tuesday September 9, 2014 Scientists Allege By: Dr. Cyril Broderick, Professor of Plant Pathology

Dear World Citizens,

I have read a number of articles from your Internet outreach as well as articles from other sources about the casualties in Liberia and other West African countries about the human devastation caused by the Ebola virus. About a week ago, I read an article published in the Internet news summary publication of the Friends of Liberia that said that there was an agreement that the initiation of the Ebola outbreak in West Africa was due to the contact of a two-year old child with bats that had flown in from the Congo. That report made me disconcerted with the reporting about Ebola, and it stimulated a response to the "Friends of Liberia," saying that African people are not ignorant and gullible, as is being implicated. A response from Dr. Verlon Stone said that the article was not theirs, and that "Friends of Liberia" was simply providing a service. He then asked if he could publish my letter in their Internet forum. I gave my permission, but I have not seen it published. Because of the widespread loss of life, fear, physiological trauma, and despair among Liberians and other West African citizens, it is incumbent that I make a contribution to the resolution of this devastating situation, which may continue to recur, if it is not properly and adequately confronted. I will address the situation in five (5) points:

1. EBOLA IS A GENETICALLY MODIFIED ORGANISM (GMO)

Horowitz (1998) was deliberate and unambiguous when he explained the threat of new diseases in his text, Emerging Viruses: AIDS and Ebola -

Nature, Accident or Intentional. In his interview with Dr. Robert Strecker in Chapter 7, the discussion, in the early 1970s, made it obvious that the war was between countries that hosted the KGB and the CIA, and the 'manufacture' of 'AIDS-Like Viruses' was clearly directed at the other. In passing during the Interview, mention was made of Fort Detrick, "the Ebola Building," and 'a lot of problems with strange illnesses' in "Frederick [Maryland]." By Chapter 12 in his text, he had confirmed the existence of an American Military-Medical-Industry that conducts biological weapons tests under the guise of administering vaccinations to control diseases and improve the health of "black Africans overseas." The book is an excellent text, and all leaders plus anyone who has interest in science, health, people, and intrigue should study it. I am amazed that African leaders are making no acknowledgements or reference to these documents.

2. EBOLA HAS A TERRIBLE HISTORY, AND TESTING HAS BEEN SECRETLY TAKING PLACE IN AFRICA

I am now reading The Hot Zone, a novel, by Richard Preston (copyrighted 1989 and 1994); it is heart-rending. The prolific and prominent writer, Steven King, is quoted as saying that the book is "One of the most horrifying things I have ever read. What a remarkable piece of work." As a New York Times bestseller, The Hot Zone is presented as "A terrifying true story." Terrifying, yes, because the pathological description of what was found in animals killed by the Ebola virus is what the virus has been doing to citizens of Guinea, Sierra Leone and Liberia in its most recent outbreak: Ebola virus destroys peoples' internal organs and the body deteriorates rapidly after death. It softens and the tissues turn into jelly, even if it is refrigerated to keep it cold. Spontaneous liquefaction is what happens to the body of people killed by the Ebola virus! The author noted in Point 1, Dr. Horowitz, chides The Hot Zone for writing to be politically correct; I understand because his book makes every effort to be very factual. The 1976 Ebola incident in Zaire, during President Mobutu Sese Seko, was the introduction of the GMO Ebola to Africa.

3. SITES AROUND AFRICA, AND IN WEST AFRICA, HAVE OVER THE YEARS BEEN SET UP FOR TESTING EMERGING DISEASES, ESPECIALLY EBOLA

The World Health Organization (WHO) and several other UN Agencies have been implicated in selecting and enticing African countries to participate in the testing events, promoting vaccinations, but pursuing various testing regiments. The August 2, 2014 article, West Africa: What are US Biological Warfare

Researchers Doing in the Ebola Zone? by Jon Rappoport of Global Research pinpoints the problem that is facing African governments.

Obvious in this and other reports are, among others:

(a) The US Army Medical Research Institute of Infectious Diseases (USAMRIID), a well-known centre for bio-war research, located at Fort Detrick, Maryland;

(b) Tulane University, in New Orleans, USA, winner of research grants, including a grant of more than $7 million the National Institute of Health (NIH) to fund research with the Lassa viral hemorrhagic fever;

(c) the US Center for Disease Control (CDC);

(d) Doctors Without Borders (also known by its French name, Medicines Sans Frontiers);

(e) Tekmira, a Canadian pharmaceutical company;

(f) The UK's GlaxoSmithKline; and

(g) the Kenema Government Hospital in Kenema, Sierra Leone.

Reports narrate stories of the US Department of Defense (DoD) funding Ebola trials on humans, trials which started just weeks before the Ebola outbreak in Guinea and Sierra Leone. The reports continue and state that the DoD gave a contract worth $140 million dollars to Tekmira, a Canadian pharmaceutical company, to conduct Ebola research. This research work involved injecting and infusing healthy humans with the deadly Ebola virus. Hence, the DoD is listed as a collaborator in a "First in Human" Ebola clinical trial (NCT02041715, which started in January 2014 shortly before an Ebola epidemic was declared in West Africa in March. Disturbingly, many reports also conclude that the US government has a viral fever bioterrorism research laboratory in Kenema, a town at the epicentre of the Ebola outbreak in West Africa. The only relevant positive and ethical olive-branch seen in all of my reading is that theguardian.com reported, "The US government funding of Ebola trials on healthy humans comes amid warnings by top scientists in Harvard and Yale that such virus experiments risk triggering a worldwide pandemic." That threat still persists.

4. THE NEED FOR LEGAL ACTION TO OBTAIN REDRESS FOR DAMAGES INCURRED DUE TO THE PERPETUATION OF INJUSTICE IN THE DEATH, INJURY AND TRAUMA IMPOSED ON LIBERIANS AND OTHER AFRICANS BY THE EBOLA AND OTHER DISEASE AGENTS.

The U. S., Canada, France, and the U. K. are all implicated in the detestable and devilish deeds that these Ebola tests are. There is the need to pursue criminal and civil redress for damages, and African countries and people should secure legal representation to seek damages from these countries, some corporations, and the United Nations. Evidence seems abundant against Tulane University, and suits should start there. Yoichi Shimatsu's article, The Ebola Breakout Coincided with UN Vaccine Campaigns, as published on August 18, 2014, in the Liberty Beacon.

5. AFRICAN LEADERS AND AFRICAN COUNTRIES NEED TO TAKE THE LEAD IN DEFENDING BABIES, CHILDREN, AFRICAN WOMEN, AFRICAN MEN, AND THE ELDERLY. THESE CITIZENS DO NOT DESERVE TO BE USED AS GUINEA PIGS!

Africa must not relegate the Continent to become the locality for disposal and the deposition of hazardous chemicals, dangerous drugs, and chemical or biological agents of emerging diseases. There is urgent need for affirmative action in protecting the less affluent of poorer countries, especially African citizens, whose countries are not as scientifically and industrially endowed as the United States and most Western countries, sources of most viral or bacterial GMOs that are strategically designed as biological weapons. It is most disturbing that the U. S. Government has been operating a viral hemorrhagic fever bioterrorism research laboratory in Sierra Leone. Are there others? Wherever they exist, it is time to terminate them. If any other sites exist, it is advisable to follow the delayed but essential step: Sierra Leone closed the US bioweapons lab and stopped Tulane University for further testing.

The world must be alarmed. All Africans, Americans, Europeans, Middle Easterners, Asians, and people from every conclave on Earth should be astonished. African people, notably citizens more particularly of Liberia, Guinea and Sierra Leone are victimized and are dying every day. Listen to the people who distrust the hospitals, who cannot shake hands, hug their relatives and friends. Innocent people are dying, and they need our help. The countries are poor and cannot afford the whole lot of personal protection equipment (PPE) that the situation requires. The threat is real, and it is larger than a few African countries. The challenge is global, and we request assistance from everywhere, including China, Japan, Australia, India, Germany, Italy, and even kind-hearted people in the U.S., France, the U.K., Russia, Korea, Saudi Arabia, and anywhere else whose desire is to help. The situation is bleaker than we on the outside can imagine, and we must provide assistance however we can. To ensure a future that has less of this kind of drama, it is important that we now demand that our leaders and governments be honest, transparent, fair, and productively engaged. They must answer to the people. Please stand up to stop Ebola testing and the spread of this dastardly disease. (Text ends)

What if during the colonisation period in Africa, Liberia decided to expand their borders in Western Africa? What would be the outcome of this event if this happened?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam

I am the West African History Guy Answered July 14

Liberia is a colony. It also expanded its borders. Monrovia is to Liberia as Jamestown is to the USA.

Nothing much happened because of that.

Its military might overawed the locals it subjugated. Its flag was also American. Its western institutions and financial independence prevented European powers from conquering it.

Later, it lost some of its claimed territories to British and French annexation. Those are now in Sierra Leone and Cote D'Ivoire.

The outcome of this real hypothetical was its later effects. Their expansion led to demographic changes. That later stripped American Liberians of their political monopoly in bloody circumstances.

Related Links

Why were Ethiopia and Liberia not colonised?

Why isn't Liberia the headquarters of the African Union since it wasn't colonized along with Ethiopia?

Why was Liberia, which wasn't organised by the government, the only American colony in Africa? Why did the USA stay out of the scramble for Africa when they were already an established power at the time colonizing in the Pacific?

Why was Liberia never colonized?

If colonialism is the root of Africa's problems, why is Liberia such a mess?

What if Liberia had actually been made an American colony?

The USA has 4.5% of the world's population but 25% of the world's prison population. Why is this?

Why did the Rhodesian Front fought tooth and nail to retain the racially discriminatory policies? Is this through people challenging and trying to repeal specific laws?

Kevin Richardson Researcher, Biologist, Historian, Anthropologist. (2008–present) Oct 29

Hi, thanks for your comments and questions.
My principal academic research focuses on colonial and post-colonial Zimbabwe, so I have had a difficult time over the years reconciling differences between what academic scholarship has to say on racial discrimination. The biggest problem I have found (especially with questions such as the original one I first responded to) is a generalization. In talking about racial discrimination in Southern Rhodesia, I have to put a hundred years of history into a few thousand words. Obviously, laws, policies and social attitudes were constantly changing throughout that period, and especially during the escalation of the liberation struggle from the mid-1960s, so you will always be able to find exceptions to the broader picture.

That being said, I would like to address your questions and comments theme by theme, if that's okay.

i) Laws regarding Africans in certain areas

The specific legislation this relates to is both municipal and state. On a state level, the Town Location Regulations and the subsequent Native Urban Location Ordinance (no.4 of 1906) both made it a criminal offense for an African to be outside of a native location (i.e. in any European area) unless on his employer's property or with a signed and dated pass from his employer. [for reference see C.Palley, The Constitutional History and Law of Southern Rhodesia, 1888-1965 (Oxford, 1966), pp.122 and 144]

Salisbury and Bulawayo municipal by-laws reaffirmed such laws and stated that Africans outside of native locations before 7 am and after 9 pm would be detained if found without a signed pass from their employer, a municipal authority, or the security forces. [see Native Registration and Pass Laws, n.d. (1945), The National Archives/28685]

These policies were again expanded in October 1960 by the Vagrancy Act which empowered to police to arrest without warrant any person in a non-native area who could not show that he was employed or had adequate means of support. This included citizens and migrant laborers (referred to as aliens) and did not take into account the length of time spent in Rhodesia, only the country of birth.

Referring as well to laws regarding social mixing, the most pertinent law was the Immorality and Indecency Suppression Act which made it an offense for miscegenation, particularly between a Black man and White woman. In 1957 amendments were suggested to include African women and European men, and the motion was passed in the House but never ratified.

There is an article here which goes into greater detail about this topic. This, however, brings me on to your second point.

ii) Distinction between the law and the enforcement

With everything that I talk about here and talked about in my original answer, there is a fundamental distinction between what was codified and what was subsequently enforced. Laws on social mixing or on African access to European liquor, for example, were both routinely flouted — for example, at the UCRN. Similarly, the number of convictions under the Immorality Act was relatively low (see the article sourced above). Yet these laws were inherently discriminatory on the basis of race and that they may not have been consistently enforced across the nation does not detract from the fact that these laws existed and could be enforced if required. Individual experiences and particularly those of whites, who by the colour of their skin, legally existed in a different class to the African majority, can impact upon how such enforcement was perceived. Again, here, it is crucial to talk about the differences in enforcement during the Federal Period and the RF period, as an escalation in convictions did occur. Peter Godwin and Ian Hancock's Rhodesians Never Die (an in-depth account of White society, politics and policies), for example, states that between 1964 and 1973, the number of arrests for breaches of either the Immorality Act or the Native Urban Location Ordinance jumped by almost 1300 percent (p.11).

Furthermore, despite the success of campaigns by various organizations like the CACBA mentioned earlier, racial segregation largely continued unabashed, particularly in rural areas where the majority of the African population resided. Small victories (the desegregation of public swimming pools and state restaurants, such as on the railway dining cars) were largely overshadowed by the large-scale policies of the Land Tenure Act, the Land Apportionment Act, and the Land Husbandry Act which were all rigorously enforced up until the mid-1960s. The only genuine challenges to these all-encompassing acts emerged once military action against the state had begun and White control over the TTLs and African Purchase Areas became fragile and increasingly reactionary. The Land Apportionment Act's racial segregation was savagely indicted by the Constitutional Council in 1964 as a breach of human rights in the territory. The Council stated that the Act is the embodiment of racial discrimination and [...] in express terms and with penal sanctions, enforces it [...] The reasons which were originally advanced for the passing of the Act whether or not they were valid at the time, are no longer valid today [...] The implementation of the Act has been responsible for not only intangible prejudice but actual material prejudice in the financial sense, to all races in Southern Rhodesia [...] discrimination and prejudice in the essence of the Act [...] Every principle in the Act has been condemned by an exception made to it either by the Act itself or by a court decision or by Federal intervention [...] One wonders at what stage the Act ceases to be the Magna Carta of the European and becomes a farce.

Such condemnation by a Rhodesian organization not only highlights that White society was not homogenous (something which has been repeatedly researched and proven), but also demonstrates that such condemnation meant little to the RF state at this point (i.e. when it had military superiority both in terms of anti-insurgency and over public disorder). Despite the huge discrepancies in size between the African and White population — by 1971, the White population was outnumbered 20-to-1, and each year more African babies were being born than existed Whites in the entire colony — and yet land remained divided almost equally between both groups.

You mention also the concept of emergency measures due to the war — yet the majority of the emergency measures had been introduced long before the nationalist forces had organized anything like enough to trouble the state. The Declaration of Emergency of 1958 which gave Whitehead an excuse to arrest a huge number of nationalist leaders, also gave rise to the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act (a horrific piece of legislation which dramatically circumscribed the liberties of Africans and ensured the police and security forces had legal backing to repress any anti-colonial activities with force. The Unlawful Organisations Act, the Preventative Detention Act, and so on were all introduced in the 1960s, long before the first White civilian was killed by guerrillas. The fear of a majority rule ('black peril') or of what was happening in the Congo, where Africans were enacting their revenge on a very small proportion of the White population, was a factor long before any war in Rhodesia. The Land Husbandry Act was particularly brutal as it saw excess cattle killed to meet quotas, regardless of local circumstances, and affected poorer and smaller African livestock farmers more significantly than their White counterparts. (if the Native Commissioner was told to kill 1/10 of the cattle and an African farmer has only 5 cows, he instantly suffers more than one of the White farms with a hundred.)

To read further on the issue of racially segregatory policies and how they were supported in practice, I would recommend Ngwabi Bhebe and Terence Ranger's Society in Zimbabwe's Liberation War, and perhaps most significantly an article by Claire Palley 'Law and the Unequal Society: Discriminatory Legislation under the Rhodesia Front from 1963-1969', Race, Vol.XII, No.1 (1970).

For more intimate accounts and personalized accounts, David Caute's Under the Skin highlights both African and White perspectives on racial segregation in practice.

To be honest, though, there is a significant amount of literature that discusses such policies from a multitude of perspectives. Ngwabi Bhebe's chapter in Canaan Banana's Turmoil and Tenacity, titled 'The Nationalist Struggle, 1957-63', makes a very strong case for why African opposition to such policies developed rapidly between 1957 and 1963 and became public mass movements. A march of 3000 people in July 1960, for example, resulted in the worst riots seen thus far in Salisbury, and saw police shoot dead 12 people and arrest over 700 for a variety of crimes, and led to calls within the Internal Security Weekly Reports for a much harsher response to even non-violent breaches of the law, including social mixing.

iii) Enfranchisement

Moving on now to issues related to the vote. Of course, as you pointed out, many Whites also did not have the vote. Yet such a fact does not negate the truth that the enfranchisement qualifications were inherently and deliberately racialist, and the proportion of Whites who could not vote, versus the number of Africans who could not should emphasize this point.

The White population numbered about 100 000 in 1933 versus an African population of about 3.4 million — yet out of an electorate of 28 515, only 58 were African. In 1958 the White population was about 158 000, the African population was 4.3 million, and the electorate was 55 802 — yet only 560 were African. That 33% of the White population had the vote, versus 0.00013% of the African, in a country where the White population was a tiny minority should indicate the racialist intent of such qualifying criteria. (All figures from National Archives of Zimbabwe documents, including census records — analyzed in Josiah Brownell's The Collapse of Rhodesia).

The idea of a non-racial voters roll was espoused by the governments of Todd, Whitehead, and Welensky right up until the RF's electoral success in 1963 but such concepts were naturally flawed — the qualifications were deliberately high, there was no specific deadline or plan to balance White and African votes, and the number of MPs in parliament remained racially divided - a European could fill an African members seat, but not vice versa - and out of the total 56 seats made available in the 1961 constitution, only 14 were for African MPs. Even if Africans could out-vote the whites, they couldn't get an African majority in Parliament.

iv) Labour Migration

Labor migration into Rhodesia from neighboring countries was not unique - many Malawians and Zambians went to Southern Africa or Rhodesia simply because there was a greater level of industrial development (i.e., mining) and thus it was possible to earn more in such countries than it was in the largely subsistence agriculture or cash crop economies of Malawi of Zambia.

View of the Kariba Dam, located on the Zambezi River between Zambia and Zimbabwe, seen here around the time of its completion. In the foreground are two young men of the indigenous Tonga population. Photograph by Ilo Battigelli. Gwembe Valley (Middle Zambezi Valley), Zimbabwe. 1959–1960.

The copper belt along the Kariba provided a good source of income for workers from both sides of the river (and White and African Zimbabweans could be found in Zambia as frequently as the other way round). Zoe Groves has written about just this thing in two articles (‘Urban Migrants and Religious Networks’ and ‘Transnational Networks and Regional Solidarity’) and the points she makes regarding the waged labor available to such migrants in Rhodesia, is buttressed by the point that a much larger proportion of migrants went to South Africa for work despite its apartheid. The simple reason was that despite the relative differences between White and African wages within South Africa or Rhodesia, waged labor on the mines paid significantly more than comparable agricultural-based labor in Malawi, at least until the 1970s. In fact, many migrants were just temporary — as this paper shows, Malawian migrant labor returned en masse to Malawi following independence and with the development of Banda's economic policies.

There was also a fundamental labor shortage in Zimbabwe. Despite the vast proportion of African males, Zimbabwe still drew heavily from the labor reserves of Zambia and Malawi. Since labor in Rhodesia was designed to prevent African advancement and specifically competition between African and European skilled and unskilled laborers for the same jobs, the desire for a cheap labor policy would naturally incline the management of businesses to employ cheaper Africans, or at least that was the fear. The railway system was one key example — Rhodesia Railways set out in 1974 to integrate grades and salary scales, and introduce Africans to the lower levels of skilled jobs (Learner Diesel Drivers or Junior Enginemen, for example). The White trade unions protested, stating that more Africans would apply for these jobs forcing the young Whites without a trade or good O-levels to emigrate, thus causing a fundamental change in the racial composition of the labor force. (See Godwin and Hancock, Rhodesians Never Die, p.128) As a result, the company kept Whites and Africans on separate pay scales.

Your point about conditions is fair though — conditions on the copper belt, or the Rand, or in Zimbabwe's mines were fairly equal, regardless of whether their government was Black or White. Giovanni Arrighi has explained why this was the case — a desire for stabilization of the workforce to prevent the retardation of specialization that a migrant labor force entailed. (see page 55 of this article. The benefits of trying to keep their labor forces outweighed the marginal costs of improved working conditions, and ironically it was the massive input of funds from the Federation (between 1953 and 1963) that generated almost £260 million after-tax for Southern Rhodesian industries (largely consisting of mining royalties and dividends taken from Northern Rhodesia's Copperbelt and thus hampering Northern Rhodesia's post-independence development for at least a decade) that permitted Southern Rhodesia's mines and manufacturing industries to improve more than their counterparts to the north, even after the Federation ended.

v) Tax

Tax is an awkward issue but can be simplified — even tax paid by Europeans was largely paid with money earned through the exploitation of cheap African labor. Also, only a tiny percentage of state expenditure on Africans came from European taxes. African taxes funded African areas and vice versa. To give a specific example, let's consider Bulawayo.

The Africans who worked in the factories around Bulawayo and lived in the Black townships paid their rates (council tax), as did the factories they worked in, to the City Treasury. Of that amount, the township where the African workers lived received $R0 for general municipal services. Similarly, of the money earned from the White ratepayers of Bulawayo, $R0 was given to the African township. Instead, the White Superintendent of the township relied upon beer revenues of about $R8 million a year collected from the Africans themselves to be able to provide basic rights to the African population (water, electricity, roads, buses, and other general public services). All taxes and local rates were spent on White services and White areas, including the majority of the rent and rates that came from African employees and their White employers. (Taken from Caute, Under the Skin) It should be remembered also that by the mid-1970s, the White war effort cost about $1 million a day, and had to be subsidized by the South African government for almost 50 percent. Rhodesia also suffered four years of economic stagnation between 1973 and 1977, and a shrinking tax base due to emigration and a refusal to pay taxes by rural Africans, further compounded the issue of state expenditure. Further facts and data can be found in Philip Daniel's Africanisation, Nationalisation, and Inequality (1979) and W.H. Morris-Jones From Rhodesia to Zimbabwe, especially pp.115-116). Also see Marcia Burdette's 'Industrial Development in Zambia, Zimbabwe and Malawi' in Studies in the Economic History of Southern Africa.

vii) Ordinary rural Africans

There has been a significant body of work done on the opinions and attitudes of rural Africans to all of this. Terence Ranger's Peasant Consciousness and Guerrilla War in Zimbabwe: A Comparative Study (London, 1985) was the first and perhaps most comprehensive text, but other studies by Norma Kriger (Zimbabwe's Guerrilla War: Peasant Voices) and Heike Schmidt ('The Social and Economic Impact of Political Violence in Zimbabwe, 1890-1990: a case study of the Honde Valley', Ph.D., University of Oxford, 1996) have also brought forward the rural experiences and opinions of the majority of Africans.

I know I haven't answered everything you asked, and feel free to ask anything else, but I hope this has helped. I'm an academic, yes, but I'm also a Zimbabwean Africanist. For the 5 million Africans in Southern Rhodesia, racial segregation was prevalent, and affected them socially, politically and economically. Comparisons with South Africa are naturally made and the fundamental difference between them was simply that the Whites had been in South Africa 300 years longer than they had in Zimbabwe, so apartheid there was naturally going to be more advanced and the size of the White population would also play a part.

Related Links

How did the people of Zimbabwe manage to defeat the British colonial Rhodesian army and win their freedom?

South Africa and Rhodesia had apartheid systems with minority white rule, but was there any general difference between the two countries and their apartheid system, and how did they treat the natives?

Was Rhodesia a racist state?

If America had supported Rhodesia and South Africa, would they still be Western countries today?

Why did Rhodesia collapse so much quicker than Apartheid South Africa?

Why do so many people on the internet romanticize Rhodesia when it was a backwater economically ruined country where everyone was skin and bone with a racist Prime Minister in charge? What did it have going for it that 1970s Britain didn't?

Did Rhodesia have all the apartheid laws like South Africa?

Was there KKK in African countries? How big was the KKK in South Africa and Rhodesia and how did it get started there? Was the KKK in SA and Rhodesia similar to the group in the US? Was there coordination between branches internationally?

Why did the West hate Rhodesia much more than the apartheid in South Africa? Rhodesians treated black people far better than the South Africans.

What made the Rhodesians so effective during the Bush War?

What was it like to be in Rhodesia as a white?

Why didn't Rhodesia get the same international support as Zimbabwe even though all races enjoyed a much higher standard of living than Robert Mugabe ever provided?

What was Rhodesia? Why are people so passionate about it?

While apartheid–South Africa and Rhodesia was ruled by Pro-White government and has a big place in White supremacist hearts, were there any Black members of Parliament in Rhodesia and Apartheid South Africa?

What happened to the white minority in Rhodesia after they lost the Bush War?

Africa in Real Time

Why is Africa left far behind in terms of technology, especially West Africa, depending on imported products?

Answered by Uduekwe Onyeka Augustine Nov 11

Africa is left behind because of African's attitude towards goods made at home and the ones made abroad.

Both those in government and those not government, the elites and the masses all have a bad attitude towards goods made at home and good attitude towards goods made abroad.

They make local goods seem inferior and foreign goods seem superior.

Related Links

Why do Nigeria government tell Lay's on what is happening in the country?

What was the role of Queen mother Yaa Asantewa and Queen mother Nzinga in the eradication of colonization and slavery in Africa?

Why do French speaking African countries still pay colonial taxes to France?

Which country in West Africa is the about 725m high Zuba rock located?

Is Lovecraft right about the maritime history of Sub-Saharan Africa?

Is this the main problem with South Africa? Their employment laws fail to create & deliver the one magic word called job? As a result, there is no monthly salary coming in at all? Is that why people tend to turn to crime?

Has economic freedom in Africa been increasing in the last 20 years? If so, is that definite or could it suffer major drawbacks?

What do black Quorans from any nation think of Jesse Lee Peterson and his views?

“The Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) are a utopia. None can be achieved in Africa by 2030.” How justifiable is this assertion?

Why is Nigeria not having a red colour in their flag? Why is it green white green?

Having natural resources like gold, cocoa, timber, oil, etc. in a country like Ghana is a mixed blessing. Why?

Why should Nigeria not be classified as a religiously free country?

Will ICC spare Buhari after he leaves office over the genocide that was committed at the Lekki toll gate by the Nigerian army under his watch?

Why is the African continent so rich in mineral deposits but still its people are very poor?

Why is Africa so backward that it doesn't look like they will ever get it right?

How many countries does Queen Elizabeth II rule or is monarch of? What is the list?

Andrew Hagen Studied Political Science at Acadia University Nov 3

15.

Today, a governor-general is Queen Elizabeth II's representative in each of the 15 of the 16* Commonwealth countries in which she is head of state: Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Belize, Barbados, Canada, Grenada, Jamaica, New Zealand, Papua New Guinea, St Kitts and Nevis, St Lucia, St Vincent and the Grenadines.

Her Majesty The Queen is currently monarch of 16 independent nations - the Commonwealth Realms. This will go down to 15 on 21st November 2021, when Barbados becomes a republic.

Here's the list (as at 4th November 2021):

- Antigua and Barbuda
- Australia
- Bahamas

- Barbados
- Belize
- Canada
- Grenada
- Jamaica
- New Zealand
- Papua New Guinea
- Saint Kitts and Nevis
- Saint Lucia
- Saint Vincent and the Grenadines
- Solomon Islands
- Tuvalu
- United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland

Her official style and title changes depending on the realm, normally placing that particular realm first, but always including the title Head of the Commonwealth. For example, her title in the United Kingdom is 'Her Majesty Elizabeth The Second, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and Her Other Realms and Territories, Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith', while her style and title in Belize is 'Her Majesty Elizabeth The Second, by the Grace of God Queen of Belize and of Her Other Realms and Territories, Head of the Commonwealth'.

Related Links

Why is Queen Elizabeth II the head of state in many countries?

Who will be King of the United Kingdom after Queen Elizabeth II?

What if Queen Elizabeth II is publicly killed in which is ordered by another country? What would happen?

Who hurt Queen Elizabeth II the most?

Queen Elizabeth II has remained in power for nearly 68 years now, as both Britain and the world's longest-reigning living monarch. What happens when the Queen dies? Who crowns the next monarch?

How many countries is Queen Elizabeth II a monarch of?

Who will be the next King or queen of England if the current queen dies?

Was Queen Elizabeth the first woman ruler of England?

If Queen Elizabeth II wanted to skip Charles and hand the crown directly to William, how could she accomplish this?

Will Queen Elizabeth eventually retire, or will someone take her place only once she dies? What happens when she does?

Can there be a king in Britain instead of a queen if Queen Elizabeth II dies?

Queen Elizabeth II is the Monarch of 16 countries including Canada, Australia, and South Africa. Since she is from UK, does this indirectly imply that all these 16 countries under the monarchy of Queen Elizabeth II are still ruled by UK?

Will Queen Elizabeth abdicate in favor of Charles or William?

How did God choose Queen Elizabeth to become Queen? What qualifications did she have?

How many countries is Queen Elizabeth in control of?

Outside the United Kingdom, where The Queen normally resides, she is represented by a Governor General, who will undertake her duties on her behalf. This individual is generally appointed by the monarch on the advice of the respective government - the Governor General of Jamaica, for example, is appointed based purely on the advice of the Jamaican government, with no input from any other government.

Why did some Americans believe that Martin Luther King Jr. was a communist?

Brent Cooper Trial and appellate counsel for Cooper & Scully (1993–present)
Nov 25

Primarily because of his association with others who were members of the Communist party.

In the first part of 1962, Attorney General Robert Kennedy approved a request from FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover to install wiretaps on the home and office of a New York City-based lawyer named Stanley David Levison. According to FBI informants, Levison had been an influential member of the Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA) as late as 1956. They believed he was now wielding influence in a different way—as a top adviser to the nation's most prominent civil rights leader, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

As King's fame and stature grew over the next several years, the FBI intensified its surveillance of him under its domestic counterintelligence program, COINTELPRO, arguing it was a matter of national security. The bureau's relentless scrutiny of King failed to reveal any communist leanings. However, it did turn up evidence of King's extramarital affairs. Hoover and his agents then tried to leverage that information not only to discredit and weaken King as a leader of the civil rights movement, but to blackmail him into taking his own life.

King preached actively against communism from the early 1950s onward, arguing that it was fundamentally incompatible with Christianity Despite this, he was forced to defend himself against allegations that he was a communist throughout his career.

William Malzone Chief Operating Officer (2016-present) updated Nov 3, 2019

Originally Answered: Why was Martin Luther killed, and who did it?
James Earl Ray on April 4th 1968 in Memphis. If you want to remember the day try listening to U2's in the name of Love.

James Earl Ray was an escaped convict who was a devout white supremacist, he actually wanted to leave the US and go to Rhodesia which at the time had an equivalent to an apartheid government.

He originally plead guilty in an obvious effort to avoid the death penalty in Tennessee , if you plead guilty the death penalty while it technically could have been used was nearly reserved for jury conviction. As soon as his conviction was entered he withdrew the guilty plea and spouted off some nonsense (in my opinion) regarding a conspiracy.

While a civil jury found for the family of MLK on conspiracy its not likely that occurred. The Justice Department looked into it repeatedly, including by Janet Reno at the personal request of Coretta Scott King. I have sympathy for the family but the conspiracy desire is really the same thing I've seen in many conspiracy theory proponents which is a desire to avoid the randomness and to make a death mean something. Ray was something of an escape artist having broken out of jail on 6 different occasions and was actually serving a de facto life sentence when he escaped (he was serving more than 100 years). His hatred of Dr. King was also oft mentioned by fellow inmates. He bought a rifle in small store in Birmingham Alabama claiming he was going hunting with his brother and using a fake ID.

Dr. King's life has great meaning, it's a testament to that equality in the US while still far from perfect, is far superior to the country he found. He made the world and country a better place , not by armed conflict but because he specifically refused to arm and defend himself at times. No greater shift in this countries' leanings came than perhaps images of Alabama Sheriff Bull Connor turning fire hoses and dogs free on school children. It galvanized many people across the country to “do something” and to demand change take place in southern states.

Related Links

Why was Martin Luther King, Jr. shot and killed by James Earl Ray?

Why did Martin Luther King decide to be a Republican?

Who assassinated Martin Luther King Jr. And why?

Was Martin Luther King a communist?

Martin Luther King Jr. was accused of being a communist in his time. Do we see a pattern here?

If Martin Luther King Jr. was alive today would he be proud or disappointed?

Why did Martin Luther King say “America has given Negro people a bad check”?

Why did Martin Luther King and Malcolm X hate one another?

Why is it that Martin Luther King is more quoted than Malcolm X, while it appears they both fought for the same thing, freedom for black Americans?

How hated was Martin Luther King Jr. while he was alive?

What is the reason why Martin Luther King Jr. is famous?

What would have been the major changes in US history if Martin Luther King, Jr. had not been assassinated?

Was Martin Luther King Jr. against homosexuality?

How did Martin Luther King Jr. make money to live and pay for expenses during his life before Nobel Prize?

What do white Americans think of Martin Luther King jr.?

What do we know of the first ship to slaves out of Africa? What about the last ship to legally carry and sell humans in the Americas? Do we’ve copies of its manifests? What led them to traffic people? What was their mindset toward their captives?

Josue Dennis Chance

It seems that slaves were first transported across the Atlantic sometime in the early 16th Century, but in very small numbers; in the early years of European (primarily Portuguese and Spanish) colonization of the Americas, experiments in using local, Native American slaves were made. These first African slaves were likely domestic slaves of merchants, nobles and the like. At most, groups of maybe 20 slaves may have been transported, but not as part of any 'trade' in the sense we understand today.

In 1517 a license was granted to Jorge de Portugal to import 400 Black slaves in the Caribbean, but it seems the license was never executed. Then, in 1518, the Spanish on Hispaniola (modern-day Haiti/Dominican Republic) requested Black slaves to replace the indigenous population they'd already managed to work to death. As a result, a license for 4,000 was granted.

It therefore seems — and the records are either lost or very limited — that the 'first Transatlantic slave ship' began its voyage in late 1518 or early 1519. By the early 1520s, ships were regularly transporting around 200 slaves at a time; this figure ultimately reach as high as 1,000 in the 18th Century.

The last slaver is much harder to establish, as the trade continued well after abolition began to roll out across the world. For example, the Royal Navy's West Africa Squadron ('The Preventative Squadron'), which existed from 1808-1867, seized some 1,600 slave ships during its existence, but when one considers that Brazil did not abolish slavery until 1888, a trade almost certainly continued until around that time.

However, the last legal British slaver was Kitty's Amelia, which was cleared to sail on 27th April 1807. Abolition came into effect on 1st May of that year. One could argue that as the Royal Navy would effectively claim international jurisdiction to eradicate the slave trade, Kitty's Amelia was the last legal slave ship.

The last known US ship to bring slaves to America was the Clotilda, in the summer of 1860. The subsequent Civil War put an end to any further voyages.

One hundred and nine African captives survived the brutal, six-week passage from West Africa to Alabama in Clotilda's cramped hold. Jason Treat and Kelsey Nowakowski, NG Staff. Art: Thom Tenery.

Related Links

Why didn't America ship slaves back to Africa after they were free?

Did the slaves coming to the new world from Africa know they were being shipped there to work as slaves? How much would they know about the lands they were heading to? And did they for the most part accept their fate, or would many put up fights?

How were slaves really gathered in Africa? I concede others were sold to European Colonists, but how did they convince the Village elders to give them these people to take to America? Was it a "we-are-god-do-our-bidding"? Or was it a business deal?

Which part of Africa did the majority of slaves come from who were captured and sent to America?

Why is it that the original dialects, cultures and traditions of the slaves from Africa are not seen and practiced today in America and the other nations where slaves were taken to, even though we still see their descendants in these places?

Why did free slaves stay in the U.S. and not go back to Africa?

When did the last slave in America die? Does anyone know when the last child of slaves died?

What are the differences between the types of slavery traditionally practiced in Africa and the slavery that developed in the New World? How did other types of servitude, such as European serfdom, compare to slavery?

Why weren't Native Americans shipped to Africa, Asia or Australia as slaves, but Africans were shipped to the Americas as slaves?

Slavery in the New World was almost exclusively by black slaves and very few whites (most mixed races). But the barbary slavery was different and there was slaves from both Africa and Europe. How the European slaves treated?

Did any of the slaves escape and make their way back to Africa?

To whom are we the human beings slaves?

What was the name of the last slave ship to ever import African slaves and what country in the Americas did it dock?

Which was more brutal to Black Africans, Muslim Sub Saharan and West Asian slave trade or Trans Atlantic Christian slave trade?

I have been thinking about slavery lately. If all the slaves who were taken in European ships had jumped into the seas on first, second and then third shipments, what would have happened? Is the answer very obvious?

Who was the weirdest general in history?

Meet General Butt Naked.

Larry Jeremiah History and Geography enthusiast 2y

Yes, that is his nickname, you might find it funny but in Liberia and for NATO, his name was feared.

Born Joshua Milton Blahyi on September 30th, 1971.

He was raised in a tribe where at a young age they trained him to become a tribal priest and participated in human sacrifices.

He later became a high tribal priest which led him to become an advisor for the president of Liberia at the time.

During the course of the three-day ritual that followed, Blahyi says that he had visions in which he was told by the Devil that he would become a great warrior and that he should continue to practice human sacrifice and cannibalism to increase his power.

Insane, I know, but wait it gets worse.

Once the civil war broke out, Blahyi has said he led his troops naked except for shoes and a gun.

He believed that his nakedness was a source of protection from bullets.

Blahyi now says he would regularly sacrifice a victim before a battle, saying, "Usually it was a small child, someone whose fresh blood would satisfy the devil."

"Sometimes I would enter under the water where children were playing. I would dive under the water, grab one, carry him under and break his neck. Sometimes I'd cause accidents. Sometimes I'd just slaughter them."

Blahyi said in 2008 that he killed at least 20,000 people and carried out regular human sacrifice and cannibalism of children.

He has now stopped his vile practices and adopted Christian values which later on made him decide to become a Christian pastor. He insists it was satanic powers that possessed him in the past and he cannot be held responsible.

He is still alive and is now married with four kids.

Thanks for reading

Fun fact

In their musical, the book of Mormons, Matt Stone and Trey Parker renamed a character to "General Butt Fucking Naked" after General Butt Naked following rewrites when they felt that Kony (who the character is based on) became too controversial.

Related Links

Who is considered the greatest general in history?

Who was the weirdest general in US history?

Which single soldier, not a General, has had the greatest effect on a battle in history?

Who are some great generals in history that are not well-known?

Who was the worst general in history?

If you were to pick one general from history to command your military, who would you pick?

Who are the ten most badass soldiers, generals, or commanders ever born?

What is the most badass thing a private has said to a general?

Who was the most incompetent general in history?

Who is the only 6 star general in American history?

Do generals and admirals pull rank on each other much, or is the rank more of a formality?

What are some of the weirdest battles that have ever happened?

Who are the most brilliant war generals throughout history?

What are some examples of generals who personally led their soldiers into battle?

In history, were there any famous generals who never lost a battle in their lifetime? Who were they?

Wake Up Africa!

George Weah" I am never proud of the Ballon d'Or award since I won it and I suffer from racism in Europe!!

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Wed

I remember the headline of the front page of La Gazzetta dello Sport in the broad heading the next day, “And oh, the black wins the gold” Even inside Milan, they were making fun of me and Africa, repeating at every opportunity, "Did you sell it to buy them bread"!! Drogba won everything with Chelsea, Eto'o won everything with Barca and Inter, but did they give them gold? No...why?...because they do not have the humanity to give gold to black Africans!!

Gold is not a ball that is given to the best... Real gold is to be a good-hearted person and does not hurt the feelings of others. The truth is that they own racism but not humanity!!

What is the true origin of the Ga tribe in current Accra Ghana, West Africa?

Angelis Revocatus Ancient History Narrator (2019–present) 17h

I'm not sure if people in Africa and around the world still don't know or are not aware (due to ancestral brainwash we have suffered for ages) that many African tribes, especially those carrying Y-DNA Haplogroup E1b1a, such as the Bantu tribes and some Niger-Congo A tribes, of which I believe Ga, Igbo, etc., are among them, are the true Israelites!

The difference between the tribes like Ga, Igbo, Lemba, Beta Israel vs other Israelite tribes is the fact that those four tribes woke up out of their slumber early, and came out to let the world know that they are the true Israelites. They decided not to exist, any more, in the "brainwashed minds" scenario that were well crafted by the colonists to make people forget their true history!

The Bible and Bible apocrypha, as detailed below, specifically tell us that the 12 tribes of Israel (first 10 then followed by the other 2) fled to Africa or what was also known as Arsareth (and some to Europe [Lydia] and to South Sea Islands or the Pacific Rim).

Isaiah 66:19 DRB

{66:19} et ponam in eis signum et mittam ex eis qui salvati fuerint ad gentes in mari in Africa in Lydia tenentes sagittam in Italiam et Graeciam ad insulas longe ad eos qui non audierunt de me et non viderunt gloriam meam et adnuntiabunt gloriam meam gentibus

OR:

{66:19} And I will set a sign among them, and I will send of them that shall be saved, to the nations into the sea, into Africa and Lydia*, them that draw the bow: into Italy, and Greece,* to the islands afar off*, to them that have not heard of me, and have not seen my glory. And they shall declare my glory to the nations.*

Just the same as these book excerpts below say, but in historical point of view…

The primitive Negroid race of men developed in Asia wandered eastward as well as westward. They entered on the one hand Burmah and the South Sea Islands, and on the other hand they came through Mesopotamia and gave curly hair and a Negroid type to Jew, Syrian, and Assyrian. Ancient statues of Indian divinities show the Negro type with black face and close-curled hair, and early Babylonian culture was Negroid. In Arabia the Negroes may have divided, and one stream perhaps wandered into Europe by way of Syria. Traces of these Negroes are manifest not only in skeletons, but in the brunette type of all South Europe. The other branch proceeded to Egypt and tropical Africa. Another, but perhaps less probable, theory is that ancient Negroes may have entered Africa from Europe, since the most ancient skulls of Algeria are Negroid.

By: W.E.B DuBois - The Negro

all the Asiatic or Australasian peoples. Asiatic negroes also seem to have entered Australia from New Guinea and to have passed down the eastern part of that continent till they reached the then peninsula of Tasmania, not, of course, without mingling with the Australoids. There is a negroid (Melanesian) element in Fiji, and as far west as the Hawaii Archipelago and among the Maoris of New Zealand; in a much less degree also, in Burma, Annam, Hainan, Formosa, the Riu-Kiu Islands, and Southern Japan.

28. KADER YOUTH
Negroid tribe of Southern India

The Elamites of Mesopotamia appear to have been a negroid people with kinky hair, and to have transmitted this racial type to the Jews and Syrians.[1] There is a curliness of the hair, together with a negro eye and full lips, in the portraiture of Assyria which conveys the idea of an evident negro element in Babylonia. Quite probably the very ancient negro invasion of Mediterranean Europe (of which the skeletons of the Alpes Maritimes are vestiges) came from Syria and Asia Minor on its way to Central and Western Europe.

29. PANIYAN WOMAN
Negroid bush-tribe of Southern India

It is possible that in or on the verge of Arabia the ancient basal stock of the generalised negro parted, divided into two great streams of divergent emigration; one to proceed to Europe via Syria, and the other to pass through Arabia[2] to Egypt and tropical Africa. In Arabia or in Egypt (it may be) arose the difference between the long-headed African negro and the rounder, shorter-headed Bushman, the last-named becoming more habituated than his congeners to a life in arid deserts or scrubby, open country.

The African Negro was again differentiated (probably in East Africa) into three main varieties: (1) the prognathous "Strandlooper" type, of whom vestiges living and

[1] The Jews are composed of three or four separate racial elements. The Asiatic negroid strain shows itself occasionally in the curly hair, the long eye, and proportions of the skull. The Jewish hybrids with the Negro in Jamaica and Guiana reproduce most striking the Assyrian type (supra).

[2] It is quite conceivable that the great peninsula of Arabia was once populated, as far as its natural conditions allowed, by a primitive negro stock, which may have been later on partially exterminated by changing and unfavourable conditions of climate and by the after-coming of the white man in his types

2 Esdras 13:40-55 (An Apocrypha Book)

40 Those are the ten tribes, which were carried away prisoners out of their own land in the time of Osea the king, whom Salmanasar the king of Assyria led away captive, and he carried them over the waters, and so came they into another land.
41 But they took this counsel among themselves, that they would leave the multitude of the heathen, and go forth into a further country, where never mankind dwelt,
42 That they might there keep their statutes, which they never kept in their own land.
43 And they entered into Euphrates by the narrow places of the river.
44 For the most High then shewed signs for them, and held still the flood, till they were passed over.
45 For through that country there was a great way to go, namely, of a year and a half: and the same region is called Arsareth.
46 Then dwelt they there until the latter time; and now when they shall begin to come,
47 The Highest shall stay the springs of the stream again, that they may go through: therefore sawest thou the multitude with peace.
48 But those that be left behind of thy people are they that are found within my borders.
49 Now when he destroyeth the multitude of the nations that are gathered together, he shall defend his people that remain.
50 And then shall he shew them great wonders.

A video below, from 47:50 to about 1:11:22 proves that Arsareth is indeed Africa!
The video also mentions about the Ga people and a few other Israelite tribes… CLARIFICATION: Those identified as "Africans" in the video are the Black Africans who carry Y-DNA haplogroups A and B. These are the true indigenous Africans, who have been inhabiting Africa from the dawn of mankind, also some of whom went Out of Africa to populate the world. The rest of Black Africans (E1a, E1b1b, E2, J, R1b and T-M184), including the true Israelites (E1b1a), back-migrated to Africa from Eurasia, as detailed in different sources below.

Recent Africa origin with hybridization, and back to Africa 70,000 years ago | Indo-European.eu

Open access Carriers of mitochondrial DNA macrohaplogroup L3 basal lineages migrated back to Africa from Asia around 70,000 years ago, by Cabrera et al. BMC Evol Biol (2018) 18(98). Abstract (emphasis mine): Background The main unequivocal conclusion after three decades of phylogeographic mtDNA studies is the African origin of all extant modern humans. In addition, … Continue reading Recent Africa origin with hybridization, and back to Africa 70,000 years ago

https://indo-european.eu/2018/06/recent-africa-origin-with-hybridization-and-back-to-africa-70000-years-ago/

DE, D and E descend from CT-M168

This is an indisputable fact.

Haplogroup CT is therefore the common ancestral male lineage of most men alive today, including all non-Africans and E derived 'black' Africans.

"This E lineage back-migrated to Africa through the Levant as hypothesized by Hammer et al. (1997)).

"The hypothesis of a back migration from Asia to Africa is strongly supported by the current phylogeography of the Y-chromosome variation, because haplogroup K2 and paragroup R1b*, both belonging to the otherwise Asiatic macro haplogroup K, have only been observed at high frequencies in Africa.

"Thus the major sub-sets of Y lineages that arose from the M168 lineage do not trace to an African origin."
YAP insertion signature in South Asia 2007

"We discovered more than 65,000 variants, including SNVs, MNVs, indels, STRs, and CNVs. ...

"Consistent with previous proposals, a parsimonious interpretation of the phylogeny is that the predominant African haplogroup, E, arose outside the continent.

"This model of geographic segregation within the CT clade requires just one continental haplogroup exchange (E to Africa), rather than three (D, C, and F out of Africa).

Haplogroup E and its parent clade DE originated with CT Eurasians.

So how did haplogroup E come to be acquired by 'black' Africans such as the Bantu?

"Regions near but external to northeast Africa, like the Levant or the southern Arabian Peninsula could have served as an incubator for the early diversification of non-African uniparental haplogroup varieties like Y chromosome DE-YAP*, CF-P143* and mtDNA M and N molecular ancestors. These would have spread globally and diversified over time and space. This model would imply that both CF-P143 and the DE-YAP evolved nearby but outside Africa. One DE-YAP* ancestor would have spread to Asia and evolved to haplogroup D while another DE-YAP* returned to northeast Africa and evolved into hg E."
Saudi Arabian Y-Chromosome diversity and its relationship with nearby regions 2009

Although on the west coast of Madagascar a Bantu dialect is spoken, it is fairly certain that the tribes which speak it were originally either immigrants from Africa or, what I think more likely, were placed there against their will by the earlier Dravidian inhabitants.*

We have to look outside of Africa for the origin of the Bantu race. In trying to solve the problem we are necessarily thrown back upon the resources of Comparative Philology and,

* I do not consider myself qualified to pass an opinion upon the Lemurian theory, though I believe that there exists a good deal of zoological and botanical evidence in favour of it. But if Lemuria ever did exist, I am convinced that it became submerged before the human race entered upon its Western migrations.

man, which agrees with the Bantu well-known fact.

On these grounds I feel inclined to believe that the first invasion of Bantu in Africa came from some country near the mouth of the Indus, or a little to the west of it, and this would agree with the account given by Rawlinson. These probably landed in the present Somali-land (the ancient Punt) and driving the old Hottentot population before them, made their way to the neighbourhood of Lake Victoria Nyanza, where a portion of them settled, while another portion straightway worked their way to the west, where they became the ancestors of the Dualla, Mpongwe and other Bantu tribes of West Africa.

[redacted]

Of the second invasion of Bantu in ~~South~~ Southern Africa we have, however, more historical and trustworthy data. I have already shown that on account of the ancient Babylonian and Sumerian elements in some of the Bantu dialects, this invasion must have come from the mouths of the Tigris and Euphrates.

At the mouths of these rivers many of the old Sumerians had taken refuge, and their number had undoubtedly been strengthened by many Semites, who for some reason or other had considered it advisable to leave their original habitations. Nominally subject, these "Men of the Sea Coasts" were in reality independent of Babylonia, though there never seemed to be any trouble between them and the authorities. Matters changed, however, when, about the year 900 B.C., Babylonia became a dependency of Assyria, and the so-called King of Babylonia was really an Assyrian vassal. Many Babylonians, dissatisfied with the new regime, must have gone to the Coast, and strengthened the independent community which gradually was formed there. This community at last became so strong, that it became an eminent source of danger to the Assyrian Empire, and it would seem that the Kings of Assyria began taking steps to stop the continual increase of power of the "Men of the Sea Coast." The latter, thereupon, rose in open rebellion about 720 B.C. and found a capable and daring leader in Merodach-Baladan, the same person mentioned in II. Kings, 20. For some time the rebels had it all their own way, because the attention of the Assyrian King was drawn to other, more important, matters. They conquered Babylon and seemed to have penetrated to the very borders of Assyria itself. Then, however, Assyria determined to subdue the foe. For a considerable time a keen struggle went on between Merodach-Baladan and his sons on the one side, and the Kings of Assyria on the other. But though the Men of the Sea Coasts were assisted by the Elamites and the tribes west of the mouth of the Tigris, the power of Assyria at length prevailed. The rebels were completely vanquished; a huge slaughter took place, and those who did not fall by the sword left the country and sought refuge in the islands of the Persian Gulf. But Esarhaddon, the King of Assyria, equipped a large fleet and, attacking the rebels in the islands, succeeded in driving them even out of this refuge.

It is more than likely that the men who were thus driven out of their country, were aware that in or near Somaliland, on the neighbouring coast of Africa, there were living races who were nearly related to them. The Men of the Sea Coast were great mariners and traders, and if we remember that the great centre of trade in those days was the island of Socotra, it certainly is not surmising too much, if we believe that the Sumerians knew who lived in the country opposite Socotra. For that reason I believe that these fugitives, of whom nothing more is heard in Assyrian history, found a haven in Somaliland, and proceeded to join the Bantu tribes near the lakes. Assyrian chronicles place the flight of the Men of the Sea Coast in 680 B.C., so that this may also be considered the date when this second Bantu invasion of Africa took place.

It would seem that in the majority of cases the two elements

1842 - Notice sur André Alvarez d'Almada et sa description de la Guinée - André Alvares d 'Almada

"throughout this land of the Jolof, Serer, and Mandinka there is a nation held among them all to be Jews"

1848 - Wilson Armistead

A Tribute for the Negro:

according to several accurately informed and scientific writers, such as Waddington, Dr. Rüppell, and M. Rozet, there are black races in Africa, among the genuine descendants of emigrants from Arabia. Detachments of the Arabian family emigrated, eleven or twelve hundred years ago, into Africa, where they have founded...

passed into a perfectly black complexion; although improved in form and stature, and notwithstanding that they reside...

A remarkable fact in the history of Loango, in the empire of Congo, is, that the country, according to a statement which was fully credited by Oldendorp, himself a writer of most correct judgment and of unimpeachable veracity, contains many Jews settled in it, who retain their religious rites and the distinct habits which keep them isolated from other nations. Though thus separate from the African population, they are black, and resemble the other Negroes in every respect as to physical character.-It is probably in allusion to this case that Pennington (1827), in his "Text Book," says, "the descendants of a colony of Jews, originally from Judea, settled on the coast of Africa, are black."-

A

As Dalby (1970 : 147) noted: "Sub-Saharan Africa is linguistically one of the most complex and fragmented areas in the world, and the detailed recording of all its languages, approaching one thousand, still represents a major task for descriptive linguists." Nevertheless, as the result of serious research developed in the beginning of this century, the Negro languages came to be grouped under two broad headings: the Sudanic and the Bantu. The coinage of names for this broad distinction reflects some of the history behind the efforts to categorize Negro languages.

This broad linguistic distinction had at one time unfortunate repercussions, for it led to the belief that the Negroes of Africa consisted of two distinct races; and, moreover, it led to the belief among some that the Negro came to Africa from Asia. Thus Goodwin (1951, 1 (i) 18) claimed that the Negro entered Africa from Asia between 7000 and 5000 B.C. and in two main linguistic groups. The first group, he held, was the Sudanic which arrived north of the equator and migrated south of the Sahara to the Atlantic, and the second, the Bantu, which arrived south of the equator and spread over southern Africa. Smith (1930 : 143) had likewise claimed that "The Negro peoples of Africa are divided into two main groups — one, the Sudanese Negroes, stretching across Equatorial Africa from the head-waters of the Nile to Nigeria and the Gold Coast : the other, known as the Bantu Negroes, occupying the region from the Great Lakes southward".

This division of the Negroes which was at first held to be a somatic one, is in

Related Links

Why is Ghana called Ghana when the Ghana Empire was in present day Mauritania and Benin called Benin when the Benin empire was in the present day Nigeria?

What is it like to live in Accra, Ghana?

How is Kwame Nkrumah looked at in Ghana today?

Is $100 US money a lot in Accra Ghana?

What is the oldest tribe in Africa?

How many groceries will $50 buy in Accra Ghana?
Is there something wrong with me if I rather help my ancestral countries of Ghana 🇬🇭 Liberia 🇱🇷 and Sierra Leone 🇸🇱 rather than black people in America? I am the son of African immigrants and I feel nothing in common with black Americans.

What are the best activities to do with children when visiting Accra, Ghana?

Can you name some rich parts of Accra, Ghana?

Did the Ga tribe of Ghana really migrate from Israel?

What is the cost of rent in Accra, Ghana?

Why was the ancient kingdom of Ghana about where Mali is now, and the current country of Ghana is in a different location?

Is it true that the Bantu ethnicities in Central and Southern Africa are not related to West Africans?

I want to join Illuminati I'm in Ghana Accra how can I join it?

Is there a Hausa tribe in Ghana?

Who was the first black player to win the FIFA Ballon d'Or?

Colin Riegels admitted as a lawyer in five countries Dec 7

One of the slightly uncomfortable things about the Ballon d'Or is that players of African descent have not enjoyed a whole lot of success. The last black player to win was George Weah all the way back in 1995. Before him, it was Ruud Gullit in 1987. Before him you have to go way, way back to Eusébio in 1965. And…. that's it. Admittedly, there were fewer top level black football players in the old days, but given the high prevalence of top flight black players at the top echelons of European football over the past two decades, that makes for increasingly uncomfortable reading. That said, it is a weird point in history with two all-time greats like Ronaldo and Messi dominating recent awards.

It is isn't just that they don't win much: they don't even tend to place in the top three for voting. In 2019 Virgil van Dijk came second in the voting. Other than him, you have to go all the way back to 2006 (Thierry Henry) to find another black player even finishing in the top three for voting. Of the 45 players finishing in the top three for voting over all those years, only two were black? As I said: uncomfortable reading, given the prevalence of top quality black players in the modern game.

By Harry Pot - Nationaal Archief Fotocollectie Anefo, CC BY-SA 3.0 nl, Eusebio was born in Africa, in the then-Portuguese colony of Mozambique, and he played the bulk of his career with Benfica, where he amassed 315 goals in 301 appearances.

James Keenley , Lifelong Football/Soccer Fan, Current Referee Answered May 3

When George Weah won the Ballon d'Or in 1995, was the first non-European player to win that award. But he was far from the first black player to win it. 30 years previously, in 1965, the late, great Eusebio won the Ballon d'Or

I would say Georges Weah.

Frederic Salmon , Playing football manager for more than 10 years
Answered Apr 28

He has a playing style looking like Ronaldo 9.
I would even say Ronaldo9 took the playing style of Weah and the tricks and shots from Luc Nilis .

George Weah - Wikipedia

President of Liberia since 2018, former footballer George Manneh Oppong Weah (/ ˈ w iː ə / ; born 1 October 1966) [4] is a Liberian politician and former professional footballer who is currently serving as the 25th President of Liberia , in office since 2018. Prior to his election to the presidency, Weah served as Senator from Montserrado County . Often regarded as one of the world's best football players, he played as a striker in his prolific 18-year professional career, which ended in 2003. [5] He is the first African former professional footballer to become a head of state. [6] After beginning his career in his home country of Liberia, Weah spent 14 years playing for clubs in France, Italy, and England. Arsène Wenger first brought him to Europe, signing him for Monaco in 1988. Weah moved to Paris Saint-Germain in 1992 where he won Ligue 1 in 1994 and became the top scorer of the 1994–95 UEFA Champions League . He signed for AC Milan in 1995 where he spent four successful seasons, winning Serie A twice. [7] He moved to the Premier League towards the end of his career and had spells at Chelsea and Manchester City , winning the FA Cup at the former, before returning to France to play for Marseille in 2001. He ended his career with Al-Jazira in 2003. FourFourTwo named Weah one of the best players never to win the UEFA Champions League . [8] At international level, Weah represented Liberia at the African Cup of Nations on two occasions, winning 75 caps and scoring 18 goals for his country. He played an international friendly in 2018 where his number 14 jersey was retired. Regarded as one of the best players never to have played at the World Cup , [9] [10] Scott Murray in The Guardian writes Weah was "hamstrung by hailing from a global minnow". [11] Widely regarded as one of the greatest African players of all time, in 1995, he was named FIFA World Player of the Year and won the Ballon d'Or , becoming the first and to date only African player to win these awards. In 1989, 1994 and 1995, he was also named the African Footballer of the Year , and in 1996, he was named African Player of the Century. Known for his acceleration, speed, and dribbling ability, in addition to his goalscoring and finishing, Weah was described by FIFA as "the precursor of the multi-functional strikers of today". [12] In 2004, he was named by Pelé in the FIFA 100 list of the world's greatest living players. [13] Weah became involved in politics in Liberia following his retirement from football. He formed the Congress for Democratic Change and ran unsuccessfully for President in the 2005 election , losing to Ellen Johnson Sirleaf in the second round of voting. In the 2011 election , he ran unsuccessfully for Vice President alongside Winston Tubman . Weah was subsequently elected to the Liberian Senate for Montserrado County in the 2014 elections . Weah was elected President of Liberia in the 2017 election , defeating the incumbent Vice President Joseph Boakai , [14] [15] and https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/George_Weah

Related Links

How much is a football player paid for winning the Ballon D'or?

Who is the greatest footballer to never win the Ballon d'Or?

Which African player won the Ballon d’Or?

Who will win the Ballon d'Or in 2021?

Who is the football player with the most wins of the Ballon d'Or?

Who will win the 2021 Ballon d'Or, and why do you think he deserves to be the winner?

Do you think that an African player will ever win a Ballon d'Or?

What are the criteria for deciding the Ballon d'Or winner?

Who will likely be the top 3 players in the Ballon d'Or 2021?

Is Messi having any chances of winning the Ballon d'Or 2019?

What would be the reasons to give Messi the Ballon d'or this year?

What are the reasons Lionel Messi deserves the 2021 Ballon d'Or?

Why did Maradona never win a Ballon d'Or?

When was the last time the Ballon d'or was presented to a football player not playing in Europe?

Did Ronaldo deserve to win the Ballon d'Or this year?

Quel dictateur a été tué de la manière la plus cruelle ?

Gibbs Barry Suivre Auteur 11 h

Alerte : contient des images violentes à la fin…. Désoler.
Je suis quand même surpris que personne n'ai mentionné Mr Samuel Doe.

A sa mort j'avais 2 ans, mon père nous en as parler beaucoup pendant l'adolescence, pour nous dire combien tout était éphémère ici bas est qu'il fallait surtout faire le bien.

Vanité des vanités, tout est vanités, disait mon père.

Samuel Kanyon Doe est un militaire libérien qui accède au pouvoir suite à un putsch sur le Président William TOLBERT[1] mettant ainsi fin aux régimes des descendants afro-américains (TRUE WHIG PARTY)[2]qui dirigeaient le Liberia depuis leur retour des USA.

Ainsi donc, le 12 avril 1980 après son putsch, Samuel Doe est le premier africain de souche, autochtone à diriger le Liberia depuis son indépendance en 1847.

Il est élu en 1985 et dirige le pays d'une main de fer….

Je tiens à préciser que Samuel Doe, sous officier analphabète, a assassiner le président W. TOLBERT en faisant irruption en pleine nuit dans sa résidence, 3 balles furent tirées, d'aucuns dirons qu'il a été tué par un des sbires de Doe d'autres diront que c'est Doe lui même qui tenait le revolver, peu importe cela appartient à l'histoire, on retiendra seulement l'ascension au pouvoir de Doe lors de cette nuit meurtrière ayant conduis au putsch.

Les méthodes autoritaires et répressives de Doe, qui exerce le pouvoir depuis 1980, créent de vives tensions entre les différents groupes ethniques du pays. La situation dégénère en guerre civile;

Une rébellion se forme au début des années 90, lançant ainsi une guerre sans merci entre le Front National Patriotique du Liberia (NPFL) dirigé par le futur et tristement célèbre Charles Taylor[3] alors membre du gouvernement à cette époque.

Dix ans plus tard donc, un autre rédempteur se trouve aux portes du palais, sa mission « tuer DOE »… l'histoire se répète…. A la tête de cette rébellion, le métisse américain, Charles Taylor.

Bon… allons au but… Citons les faits macabres de Mr Doe.

11 jours après son accession au pouvoir, Doe, fais fusiller 13 membres de l'ancien pouvoir sur une plage de Monrovia et invite les médias étrangers a filmé la boucherie.

Un par un, les auteurs du putsch d'avril 1980 sont éliminés par le sergent Samuel Doe qui dirige la junte. Quand j'arrive à Monrovia en septembre 1981, huit ont déjà été exécutés. Photo Daniel LAINé (Actuel 1981)

Il fais raser des villages entiers du Liberia en massacrant sans pitié les habitants, car ils avaient le malheur d'appartenir aux ethnies qui formaient la rébellion armée de Mr Taylor on retiendra surtout:

La cannibalisme, car Doe et ses associés mangeaient carrément leurs ennemies, c'est d'une sauvagerie inouïe, des vidéos sont encore visibles sur YouTube.

Recrutement des enfants soldats, on compte plusieurs milliers d'enfants soldats durant ces afrontements, des vidéos sont toujours visibles sur internet.

Viols, pillages, profanation de cadavres, rééducation à l'esclavage pour les transports des matériels pillés etc

Au final le massacre de Samuel Doe et de Charles, cette terrible guerre civile et inter-ethnique libérienne opposant les Krahn, les Gios, et les Mandingues a fait 250 000 morts et forcé deux millions de personnes à quitter leurs maisons, laissant un pays exsangue, ruiné et traumatisé par l'horreur des combats.

SA MORT

Samuel Doe est capturé le 9 septembre et fais prisonnier.

On dis qu'il a pris une balle et succomber à ses blessures mais la réalité est toute autre.

Il a été mutiler vivant, cribler de balles sur les membres inférieurs puis donner comme repas, vivant, à ses chiens mangeurs d'hommes, car le tyran Doe avait pour habitude de jeter ses ennemis à manger pour ses chiens.

Des vidéos montraient où on voyait la mort atroce de Doe. Je vous mets un récit issu du journal Jeune Afrique. [4] Avec comme titre: Liberia : Samuel Doe, une mort au goût de Budweiser

Le président n'est presque plus rien, mais bientôt ce sera pire. Sans chemise, sans pantalon, le slip blanc gorgé de sang. On lui a arraché ses grigris. Il a les yeux écarquillés et déjà plus de jambes : une rafale de kalachnikov s'est chargée de les lui couper. Samuel Doe gît par terre, dans ce bureau miteux, au milieu de soudards surexcités, il supplie. Il est prêt à tout donner. Sa fortune, les caches où se planquent ses proches, le numéro de ses comptes bancaires, son pouvoir – si tant est qu'il lui en reste.

Dans un fauteuil en faux cuir, face à sa victime, Prince Johnson est impassible – ou peut-être a-t-il un petit air amusé. De temps en temps, il s'excite, se lève puis se rassoit. Une femme en blouse d'infirmière l'évente. Il faut rester calme, l'heure est grave. C'est peut-être celle de la victoire. Il boit une gorgée de Budweiser. Voilà près d'un 1/4 d'heure que Doe geint devant lui. Ça suffit. Ses hommes se ruent sur le président: Ils lui coupe une oreille… puis une joue… Encore un peu de Budweiser. La bière est si bonne: ELLE A LE GOÛT AMER DU SANG ET DE LA HAINE

Cette vidéo[5] YouTube montre Doe en slip à genoux devant ses ravisseurs entrain de supplier

Honnêtement je ne penses pas que de tout l'histoire moderne du monde, qu'un tyran a eu une mort aussi atroce, je n'imaginez même pas la douleur de se faire découper vivant et de se prendre des rafales de AK sur les membres inférieurs puis pour finir être donner aux chiens comme repas.

Samuel Doe mérite son sort et je prie pour que plus jamais en Afrique il y ai des dirigeants comme ces gars. Le Liberia a tellement souffert de ces guerres civils, tant d'innocents tues, des enfants morts, des femmes violees puis mutilees, des hommes partant au champ egorger simplement parce qu'ils appartenaient à une ethnie.

Charles Taylor, lui a eu une fin des plus tranquille, en prison à vie, mais dans une prison dorée à la Haye, durant son règne il a eu l'intelligence de distribué les diamants du Liberia aux grandes puissances, les diamants qu'on appellent tragiquement: Blood Diamond [6] A voir aussi le fabuleux film[7] du même titre avec Di Caprio (Oscar du meilleur acteur 2007), Djimon Hounsou etc.

Questions similaires

Quelles étaient les manies qu'avaient certains dictateurs ?
Quels sont les moments surprenants où un dictateur était humain ?
Quels descendants de dictateurs ont eu une vie intéressante et/ou inattendue ?
A-t-il existé des dictateurs éclairés qui ont réellement fait le bien de leur pays ?
Quelle était la punition la plus cruelle de l'histoire ?
Y a-t-il un dictateur qui a exterminé son propre peuple ?
Quel a été le dirigeant de France le plus cruel et qu'a-t-il fait ?
Quels sont les signes de la folie d'un dictateur ?
Y a-t-il eu des dictateurs pauvres ?

La dictature est-elle toujours mauvaise ? L'histoire n'a-t-elle pas d'exemples de bonn

Notes de bas de page

[1] William Richard Tolbert — Wikipédia
[2] True Whig — Wikipédia
[3] Charles Taylor (Liberia) — Wikipédia
[4] Liberia : Samuel Doe, une mort au goût de Budweiser (4/6) – Jeune Afrique
[5] https://youtu.be/DJSajKCKWMM
[6] Diamants de conflits — Wikipédia
[7] Blood Diamond

Do African Americans see Liberia as their African country?

Ke'Aun Follow African-American Cosmopolitan Mon

No.
The historical relationship between African-Americans and Liberia is… weird.

(Oversimplifications incoming)

It was “gifted" to African-Americans as a place to settle by White America, but African-Americans overwhelmingly rejected colonization, seeing it, correctly, as a ploy to get them out of America. Only a very, very small number of African-Americans went to Liberia over its history.

Following that, Liberia became kind of a pet project for the African-American elite, who spent some effort proping up the Americo-Liberian regime against internal and external threats.

African-American military officers in Liberia. For a time, African-Americans led the Liberian military in "pacification efforts" against Liberian natives along with trying to spearhead military reforms.

There were at least some ideas floating around about how African-American companies could make money in Liberia, but in general (far as I can find), Liberia never was a money machine for the African-American community.

I don't mean that in a "the colony was a net drain which proves that colonialism was beneficial to natives because why else would we be there", kind of way. I mean: I can find no evidence of money going from Liberia to the African-American community. Profits from Liberia either stayed with the Americo-Liberians or went to White American and European (especially German) pockets.

I still dig for information and will be happy to write a new post if I find something, but for now I have to say that whatever the African-American elite were doing in Liberia, they weren't doing it for big profits.

And for their own part, the Americo-Liberian elite never really wanted African-Americans getting too involved. They trusted African-Americans more than Whites, but they still didn't… trust them, lol. So they opposed Marcus Garvey's Back-to-Africa program (and in fact made it harder for African-Americans to migrate). They also stonewalled African-American attempts to reform the Liberian military.

As I said: a weird relationship.

So Liberia was from the beginning rejected by most African-Americans. It brought no money to the African-American community, so it wasn't even considered from a financial angle. It was a concern for the Black elite, but it never entered the consciousness of the African-American community as a whole.

Indeed, I can find no African-American response to the 1980 coup that ended the Americo-Liberians regime. No response at all. It's like African-Americans completely forgot about the country and their role in it by that time. If African-Americans saw Liberia as "their country," there would've been more concern over the coup. But there wasn't.

Liberia just slipped out of African-American historical consciousness. Its hold was never that strong to begin with, and nothing about the African-American / Americo-Liberian relationship reinforced that hold.

How did Liberia survive "Scramble for Africa"?

Ke'Aun · Follow

Liberia played the Scramble game, and when that wasn't enough it called on American support. For most of its early history Liberia was more of a trading state than a "territorial state". It mostly hugged the coast, focused on trade with native Africans and Westerners, and other than trade deals it did not impose its will on the native Liberians. (or at least, they imposed themselves less so than they would later)

The rulers of Liberia were "Merchant Princes," traders who were far more concerned about trade and wealth than they were about expanding Liberia.

For various reasons that I won't get into, the rule of the Merchant Princes collapsed in the 1870s. In their place rose the True Whigs.

Unlike the trade-focused Merchant Princes, the True Whigs were agriculturally-focused. They looked inland towards the unknown hinterlands, and saw vast wealth and a massive labor pool. They also saw the Scramble for Africa happening before them.

One thing that the Berlin Conference enforced was “rule on the ground.” Meaning that no one was obligated to recognize your claims of sovereignty in Africa, if you didn’t have “proof” of that sovereignty. What this meant in Liberia’s case is that the “trade protectorates” that Liberia imposed on the native peoples was no longer enough to keep the Europeans out — Liberia had to establish direct rule with clear borders if they were to keep the Europeans at bay.

The desires of the True Whigs to expand inwards dovetailed nicely with the necessities of the Scramble for Africa. To survive, Liberia had to expand inwards. And so they did. The “trade protectorates” were basically abolished (there was more to this process, but that deserves a separate question I think), and Liberia sent its armies inland to impose a kind of direct rule.

Liberian Frontier Force

Liberia was never quite wealthy or populated enough to fully reign in the natives on their own, to say nothing of warding off the Europeans. But this inland march did help Liberia defend its borders (to an extent — they did lose territory to Britain and France) initially.

At least, defend the borders in a legal sense. Which helped, but if push came to shove it would not be much of a challenge for Britain or France to run over the Liberians.

This is where diplomacy came into it.

The Americo-Liberians tapped into their connections with the African-American elite back in the States—and together they leaned on the US government to defend Liberia from European conquest.

Now, Washington was a fickle protector. It didn't stop Britain or France from shaving off territory. But it did stop them from eating the country whole, and America also supplied the Liberians with the weapons, ammo, naval support, and (African-American) officers necessary to enable the Liberian army to suppress native uprisings.

African-American military officers in Liberia

Tying Liberia into the American economy (ie the Firestone plantations) was, more than just a money grab, also a political strategy to keep America interested in the country. The idea of intertwining Liberia and America economically was actually a suggestion made by W.E.B. Dubois to Liberian President Charles King.

It was felt that, if push came to shove, African-Americans could defend Liberia from White Americans if the loan were used as an excuse to invade Liberia, whereas Africans in the British or French empires could not make the same promise.

Here is the letter from W.E.B. Dubois to President Charles King, saying as much.

Relevant Passage*: "On the other hand if white Americans invest in Liberia and if they do not treat Liberia fairly and they try and get the United States Government to back up their demands, the Negroes of America [unlike British or French Africans] have enough political power to make the government go slowly.*

And wouldn't you know it, that's what Liberia did. They tied themselves to America as much as possible, economically and politically, but without giving up sovereignty. African-American elites backed them up on this, and the US Government was interested enough to shield Liberia but not interested enough to press its advantages.

To sum up:

Liberia successfully played the Scramble game, conquering parts of Africa and establishing a (kind of) firm rule over its territories. This gave Monrovia the legal basis to ward off European encroachment (somewhat).

Liberian diplomacy was very successful. They allied with African-American elites and got the US government to defend them (kind of), while also preserving their sovereignty.

Of course, their skilled diplomacy kind of led them to neglect internal issues. It all blew up in their face in 1980, but for a while there things worked out.

Related Links

Why were Ethiopia and Liberia not colonised?
If colonialism is the root of Africa's problems, why is Liberia such a mess?

Why was Liberia, which wasn't organised by the government, the only American colony in Africa? Why did the USA stay out of the scramble for Africa when they were already an established power at the time colonizing in the Pacific?

What was the Scramble for Africa?
Why did Japan not participate in the scramble for Africa?
During the "Scramble for Africa", why wasn't the US involved?
Why did the Scramble of Africa not take place a hundred years before?

Why didn’t the United Kingdom send troops to fight in the Eastern front, especially in the critical years of 1941-42?

What if the US had been involved in the Scramble for Africa?
Why did the Confederate States of America lose the war?
Why was Liberia never colonized?
What if Americans participated in the Scramble for Africa?
Why was Liberia never colonized by a European power?

To what extent did African people benefit from the "Scramble for Africa" in the end of 19th century?

Why did the scramble for and partition of Africa take place towards the end of the 19th century?

To what extent were African Americans well integrated with Liberia in the 19th and early 20th centuries? How did they get received by indigenous Liberians?

Ke'Aun · Follow African-American Cosmopolitan Sat

I am going to assume that by “African-Americans” OP means “Americo-Liberians,” as that is what the settlers called themselves.

It’s important to keep in mind that the Pan-Africanism of the 19th and early 20th centuries had nothing to do with integrating into African societies. That is a very late-20th century concept.

“Westernized Africans” (African-Americans, Afro-Caribbeans, etc) had absolutely no interest in being adopted by African societies. They saw native African societies as backwards, pagan, and all of that other stuff you would expect Westerners to think of Africans at the time.

The difference between your typical European imperialist of the time, and your typical Pan-Africanist of the time, was that the Pan-Africanist firmly believed that the native African could be “uplifted’ into “civilization,” because they themselves had been “uplifted” into “civilization.”

So African-Americans who went into or who supported Liberia tended to believe that they could bring Christianity and Civilization to the natives, and in doing so turn the natives into people like themselves, and once that was done the rest of the world would see that the Black Race could indeed stand shoulder-to-shoulder with the White. It was (obviously) not racist, but very um… culturalist.

It was kind of like, a Big Brother Little Brother relationship, with the African-American (later Americo-Liberian) acting as the Big Brother.

—and another thing, soccer sucks. Now football, that's a sport.

One thing I notice in my readings, is that African-Americans and Americo-Liberians held very different viewpoints on the native Liberians:

African-American visitors to Liberia in the late 19th and early 20th century, especially the military and diplomatic officers, were constantly trying to get the Americo-Liberians to assimilate the natives into Americo-Liberian society. These officers felt that the Americo-Liberians were shooting themselves in the foot by not assimilating them (which was true), and that they were doing a disservice to the Black race by not doing so.

The Americo-Liberians, however, especially by the 20th century, saw themselves as a distinct group from the natives, and had no desire to do any of that, as that would mean sharing power and wealth. The did assimilate some natives into their society, and they did integrate the "Congos" (African slave trade victims that were rescued and then dumped on Liberian shores), but that was about it.

They also didn't care for the African-Americans all that much, but that's a different story.

But you'll notice that neither side was the least bit interested in integrating into native society. Integration was to run one way, the "civilized way," or not at all.

The kind of Pan-Africanism we of this time are most familiar with, with African-Americans falling over themselves to reclaim their African roots and such, is a modern invention; it didn't hit the scene until Decolonization in the 1960s and 1970s.

A person like Kwame Ture, who adopted African names and symbols while trying to forsake Western ideals to the best of his ability, would've been very alien in the 19th century.

Related Links

Between 1822 and 1865 over 15,000 former black slaves and free-born blacks relocated from the USA to Liberia. What was life like for returning slaves in Liberia? Were they accepted by the indigenous population and were there reintegration programs?

What happened in Liberia when former African American slaves moved there?
Approximately how many African Americans moved to Liberia?
Do African Americans have the right to move to Liberia?
What if the US colonized Africa in the 1800s and kept Liberia?
Do most Liberians have African American ancestry?

For the first half of the 20th century, black Americans accepted their position in society. What changed?

Can African Americans still move to Liberia today in the same manner as they did as freed slaves?

Were African Americans free during reconstruction?
Do African Americans see Liberia as their African country?
What do black Africans think about black Americans, and vice versa?

How is African American history important?
Were the original Jews black?

Why did African Americans enslave Black Liberians when they started their new country in Africa?

How could African Americans get their own country? Liberia was not successful in that regard.

If Liberia was really created for former slaves to return to Africa, why didn't more freed slaves go?

Ke'Aun Knows random history things Jan 28

A few reasons:

As you note in your question, Liberia was created for former slaves. But at the time that Liberia was created, most African-Americans were currently enslaved. So… what was supposed to happen? Basically, Liberia was at best a place for African-Americans to go after emancipation, and at worst a scheme to get free African-Americans out of the country (in truth, it was a mix of both). Which leads to--

Most African-Americans didn't want to go. Free Blacks saw Liberia as a scheme to get them out of the country, to stop them from agitating for abolition. So most of them resisted going, preferring instead to fight for equality in the US.

That's only part of the story however.

After the Civil War, when the iron fist of Jim Crow fell over the Black community, there was more interest in going to Liberia.

However, America still wanted their cheap Black labor source. So:

America, particularly the South, discouraged migration to Liberia in the postbellum period.

And lastly, after a certain point the Americo-Liberians lost interest in encouraging migration. They erected barriers against African-Americans that made it so only the wealthy could emigrate.

That last point is what blocked Marcus Garvey's Back-to-Africa ambitions.

Thomas Musselman Answered Jan 25, 2017

Originally Answered: How did the free black slaves from the Americas treated the native Africans living in Liberia?

Of course it is hard to generalize but I think if you were forced to summarize you would say the Americans had a sense of their superiority and did not think of the locals as worthy of equality. The Americans set up a "little America" to continue the life they knew and like tribes and culturally different groups in contact throughout history their "tribe" did not easily assimilate nor assimilate those they encountered. Locals raided the settlement and the Americans did not grant automatic citizenship to the locals until 1904. Probably the ethnic/cultural division helped lead to the 1980s coup and the protracted disaster that followed.

Anonymous Answered Feb 2, 2017

The African Americans, who had educated free Blacks, religious ministers and tradesmen in their midst, naturally formed a state as they knew it while the locals lived or tended to live in their traditional polities. The point of departure was taxation, i.e. the means to support the government. Taxation was something alien to most of Africa except those areas with significant Islamic influence. A typical traditional polity consisted of a system of courts. The chief's court was often the supreme body. These courts accumulated wealth (livestock as currency) through court costs enough to support their sitting members as well as men that enforce the court's judgement.

It is therefore easy to see how these communities could and did grow apart together. The African Americans were not a colonizing power with an army to impose their will. As former slaves they dreamed of an opportunity to experience liberty and the pursuit of happiness. It is very unlikely that they would perpetrate the very same abuse they suffered during slavery. Inevitably there was an overlap of the population. I doubt if the local Africans that lived in the African American community initially understood voting not to mention willing to pay taxes. It makes sense that by 1904, after 2 or 3 generations they would understand the workings of government and demand voting rights as a community. I don't believe there was systematic discrimination or feeling of superiority on anybody's part.

Related Links

Between 1822 and 1865 over 15,000 former black slaves and free-born blacks relocated from the USA to Liberia. What was life like for returning slaves in Liberia? Were they accepted by the indigenous population and were there reintegration programs?

Why don't descendants of American slaves ever return to Africa to live there?

How did the freed black slaves from the Americas treat the native Africans living in Liberia?

Is it true that more than 60% of African slaves were captured and sold by other Africans like the Ashanti?

Why didn't America ship slaves back to Africa after they were free?

I've heard "history buffs" say that slaves were purchased from blacks in Africa, but I've heard black historians say that blacks were placed there by colonialists to sell black slaves. Who do I believe?

Why did Abraham Lincoln refuse to send black slaves back to Africa after freeing them despite the fact that his advisers advised him to do so?

In hindsight, are African Americans thankful their ancestors were taken as slaves away from Africa to America?

Back when slavery was legal in the USA, were there any slaves who didn't want to be free?

Why was it so easy for American free slaves to dominate indigenous Africans of Liberia for over 100 years? Were they not outnumbered?

Why did most slaves come from West Africa not East Africa?
What happened in Liberia when former African American slaves moved there?

What ever happened to the white slaves that were brought to America in the early 15 and 16 hundreds, before black slaves were imported?

Why did free slaves stay in the U.S. and not go back to Africa?

If black Africans were involved in the practice of selling other black Africans into slavery, is it fair to blame white Europeans?

Resilient Women Everywhere
Internationally known as Africa's "Iron Lady," President Ellen Johnson

Sirleaf is a leading promoter of peace, justice and democratic rule.

· Follow Posted by Evy CeVie Fri

Ellen Johnson Sirleaf is a Liberian politician who served as the 24th President of Liberia from 2006 to 2018. Sirleaf was the first elected female head of state in Africa.

In 2010, as the only female and African Head of State, President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf was named by Newsweek Magazine as one of the World Top Ten Leaders.

She won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2011, in recognition of her efforts to bring women into the peacekeeping process. She has received numerous other awards for her leadership. In June 2016, Sirleaf was elected as the Chair of the Economic Community of West African States, making her the first woman to hold the position since it was created.

What would happen if all the black people during the 1920s moved to Liberia? Would it really be like how Marcus Garvey envisioned?

Ke'Aun · Follow African-American Cosmopolitan Mon

If all African-Americans went over huh?

Well, ignoring the chaos that would cause, as Liberian infrastructure would've been overwhelmed by the flood of millions and millions of people into the country…

It's hard to say. It would turn Liberia into a Garveyite state, as opposed to what it was in reality (a country with a tiny Americo-Liberian elite lording over everyone else).

And, given Garvey's ideas, it would thus be a revolutionary state with goals to expand into the rest of Africa.

UNIA members (Garveyites) parading in New York. They were into a militaristic aesthetic

African-American Garveyists wanted to liberate all of Africa from European rule, and "uplift" and "civilize" Africans as well. So Liberia might become a kind of "Black state" in the way that the Soviet Union was a "workers state:" universalist, expansionist, anti-nationalistic. But, also pro-Black, in the sense that all Black people could thrive in Liberia… so long as they agreed to civilize.

Obviously the British and French wouldn't care for this state very much. If such a thing came to pass I can't imagine that either London or Paris would just sit there and let such an openly anti-European state develop. But for the purposes of the theoretical I'll say that they're too busy to respond.

As far as the domestic situation: the native Liberians get crushed. The Americo-Liberian regime never had the numbers to conclusively pacify the native groups, and they never tried to assimilate them en masse either. The Garveyites do have the numbers to pacify them, and the ideological will to assimilate them. If it came down to it I don't think the Garveyites would shy away from violent measures if necessary for "the greater good." The Garveyites would try their utmost to liquidate the ethnic groups into one "Black" Westernized culture.

UNIA flag

That being said, the Americo-Liberians are just as finished. Their whole regime rests on a small closed-loop of familial connections and secret societies. The Garveyites probably wouldn't suffer this kind of thing for very long. Now, the UNIA was by no means democratic, but there would be little reason for them to deal with competition from a relatively small and reactionary group like the Americo-Liberian True Whig Party.

Perhaps this explains in part why the Americo-Liberians eventually worked to limit African-American immigration.

Economically the Garveyites were big on development. So they would definitely try to industrialize and promote capital accumulation, though how successful this would be is an open question.

One of the major problems in the Liberian economy was a labor shortage, reinforced by Americo-Liberian anti-integrationist policy. A mass migration of African-Americans, with an assimilationist bent, would solve that problem in one fell swoop. So that's something, but Liberian industrialization would need more.

Perhaps if the USA hated Britain and France, and invested in Liberia as a kind of counterweight to those empires, Liberia could industrialize a bit. Otherwise I'm not sure how it could work. The USSR is too busy absorbing capital for its own development to send some Liberia's way. And of course, getting investment from Britain and France, while also trying to kick them out of Africa, is a no-no.

Germany would be an interesting alternative, as a non-colonial power with no stakes in the region. Berlin has historically invested heavily in faraway regions, and it might be interested in getting at some of Liberia's rubber and iron. It's interwar relations with China might serve as an example of what could be in this alternative timeline.

Back to foreign policy.

I really, really don't think Liberia had the kind of resources necessary for the Garveyites to fight against France and Britain. At all. And I don't think they'd be crazy enough to actually try — at least not at first.

I can see them trying to cozy up to an anti-colonial power, like the USA or USSR, or Germany, for support and protection while they developed.

I can also see the Garveyites pulling a page out of the early-USSR's book. Perhaps a Pan-Africanist version of the Communist International, sponsoring independence and Pan-Africanist efforts on the continent.

Maybe during World War II the Garveyites might try and pounce on France's corpse, or try and cut a deal with the Allies where they join in in return for territorial concessions. Assuming the war goes as normal in this timeline.

In either case I think there'd be no way for Liberia to unilaterally embark on its crusade until the Decolonization era. In which case I'm not sure if they would only support independence, or actively try to move into the vacuum as an expansionist force. But now we're getting further and further from the 1920s, and it's impossible to make more hypotheticals this far out.

Would make an interesting alternate history story.

Related Links

Between 1822 and 1865 over 15,000 former black slaves and free-born blacks relocated from the USA to Liberia. What was life like for returning slaves in Liberia?

Were they accepted by the indigenous population and were there reintegration programs?

What would happen if all black people moved out of the US?
What happened in Liberia when former African American slaves moved there?
Why do some black people dislike lightskinned black people?
What would the world be like if black slavery never happened?

What if the US created Liberia (land for free blacks) as a state within the US in 1822 instead of a separate country in Africa?

Why are so-called black people labeled as black when in fact their skin is not black?
Are South Koreans racists towards black people?
What happens to white people who defend black people during the 18th century?
Were the Egyptians black?
Is there any truth to the Lincoln plan to send black people back to Africa?
And is that the reason for the beginning of Liberia?

Assume it's America, 1800s. What would happen if a black man and a white woman, who have been married for some time, with kids, were discovered by the horrible regular people of the 1800s?

Are there any Black people that would like to go back in time, to really see what it was like to be a slave?

Do African Americans have the right to move to Liberia?
Why did black people lose to white people during slavery?

Related Answer
Why were Ethiopia and Liberia independent in 1914?

Nubnub Hubbub, works at American International School Chennai
Answered Jul 25, 2015

Ethiopia is a mountainous nation that has existed for thousands of years, even existing as the kingdom of Axum in Roman times. It was a powerful empire at the time of the scramble for Africa, and, since it lacks natural resources, had a large military and good diplomatic relations with many nations, it was not a target for any of the major European powers. While Italy did twice attempt to conquer the nation, they won only due to their advanced European weaponry and occupied the nation for only a few years. The nation has had a strong sense of independence, and due to the skilled leaders Menelik II and Haile Selassie, Ethiopia remained a well known and powerful country and a member of the league of nations, which was supposed to guarantee its existence.

Liberia, while technically never colonized, was never taken over by Europeans because Americans got there first. It was supposed to be a refuge for freed slaves to return to "the homeland" and establish a new African nation, but it went horribly wrong and now the nation is a mess. Europeans have always feared a war with the U.S. and thus stay away from Liberia.

Related Links

Why was Liberia never colonized?
Why were Ethiopia and Liberia not colonised?
Why was Ethiopia never colonized?
Why was Liberia, which wasn't organised by the government, the only American colony in Africa? Why did the USA stay out of the scramble for Africa when they were already an established power at the time colonizing in the Pacific?

If colonialism is the excuse for why Africa is poor and messed up why are Liberia and Ethiopia poor nations although they were never colonised?

Why is Liberia poor if it was never colonized?
Why were Ethiopia and Liberia independent in 1914?
Why do we say that Ethiopia was never colonised, if it was occupied by Italy?
Was the European colonization of Africa for the benefit of Africans or Europeans?
How did Liberia survive “Scramble for Africa”?
Is it true that South Africa was empty when the colonizers arrived?
Was Ethiopia actually colonized by Europeans?

Why was Ethiopia the only African nation to never be colonized by Europeans?
What is unique about Ethiopia that made it difficult to conquer?

Why are Africans the only ones who never recovered from colonization?

Why is Ethiopia is considered to this days not to have been controlled/governed by colonists/Europeans when it was destroyed by Italy in 1936? Ethiopia was destroyed by Italy and was made a colony in 1936. Is this not being?

Why was Liberia never colonized by a European power?

Matt Riggsby MA Archaeology, Boston University 1y

Originally Answered: Why was Liberia never colonized by Europe?

Because it was colonized by America.

Liberia was founded and ruled by free Blacks who returned to Africa from the United States, and after independence in the 1840s, it retained ties with the US. Notably, the US maintained a sporadic naval presence in the region into the 20th century, indicating that it would go to some effort to maintain Liberian independence. So while Liberia did have border disputes with neighboring colonies (and, indeed, lost out on some substantial territorial claims), its existence wasn't seriously threatened because it was under an American umbrella.

Related Links

Why was Liberia never colonized?
Why were Ethiopia and Liberia not colonised?
Why was Ethiopia never colonized?

Why was Liberia, which wasn't organised by the government, the only American colony in Africa? Why did the USA stay out of the scramble for Africa when they were already an established power at the time colonizing in the Pacific?

If colonialism is the excuse for why Africa is poor and messed up why are Liberia and Ethiopia poor nations although they were never colonised?

Why is Liberia poor if it was never colonized?
Why were Ethiopia and Liberia independent in 1914?
Why do we say that Ethiopia was never colonised, if it was occupied by Italy?

Was the European colonization of Africa for the benefit of Africans or Europeans?

How did Liberia survive "Scramble for Africa"?
Is it true that South Africa was empty when the colonizers arrived?
Was Ethiopia actually colonized by Europeans?
Why was Ethiopia the only African nation to never be colonized by Europeans?
What is unique about Ethiopia that made it difficult to conquer?
Why are Africans the only ones who never recovered from colonization?

Why is Ethiopia is considered to this days not to have been controlled/governed by colonists/Europeans when it was destroyed by Italy in 1936?

Ethiopia was destroyed by Italy and was made a colony in 1936. Is this not being under Europe?

Why was it so easy for American free slaves to dominate indigenous Africans of Liberia for over 100 years? Were they not outnumbered?

Ke'Aun Afrofuturist Cosmopolitan Fri

Were they not outnumbered?
Yes, massively.

Once we include those native Liberians who were assimilated into Americo-Liberian society, we're talking maybe a few ten-thousand Americo-Liberians ruling over maybe a million or so natives.

Why was it so easy for American free slaves to dominate indigenous Africans of Liberia for over 100 years?

It wasn't easy. The native Liberians rebelled constantly. And I mean constantly. The Americo-Liberians never fully pacified the country; indeed native rebellions very nearly destroyed other colonization efforts--

(such as the Republic of Maryland, which was so depleted by native wars that it was forced to cede itself to Liberia to survivie)

--along with bringing down governments and bankrupting the state. The 1873 Grebo War, for example, went a long way towards destroying the rule of Merchant Princes in Liberia.

Let's not forget that at the end of the day, the native Africans literally shot most of the Americo-Liberian ruling elite in 1980. Not even the “Doctor of Violence” Robert Mugabe could claim such a feat in his war.

So “easy" is a bit of an exaggeration.

That being said, the Americo-Liberians did have some major advantages, such as:

Ties with the American government. Washington regularly sent arms, ammunition, military officers, and naval aid to Liberia. This usually gave Monrovia a military edge against the natives

Sea access, for trade and capital. The natives tended to lie inland, which meant less trade and money (though Britain and France did occasionally stir up trouble in the border regions)

A huge advantage for the Americo-Liberians is that the native Liberians were very divided and, in a lot of cases, hated each other more than they did the Americo-Liberians. So in that way this was typical "divide and rule" stuff.

Example: sometimes the Americo-Liberians would send in the Frontier Force (army) to pacify natives. The FF would usually attract a huge number of camp followers and "milita" -- armed natives who often had a bone to pick with other groups.

So say the army wanted to pacify the Z Tribe. The army was usually made up of Americo-Liberians officers and native recruits. Compounding that would be the "militas," armed natives who, while not part of the army, followed the army as allies because they wanted a share of spoils and/or they had a problem with Z Tribe.

So when the army launched its pacification campaign against Z Tribe, the native soldiery and especially the militia would often commit looting and atrocities against Z Tribe. And Z Tribe would remember forever how it was so brutalized by the Americo-Liberians… and the other tribes.

Things like this made unity very difficult between the native groups, and allowed the Americo-Liberians to remain at the top, acting as kingmakers.

Not every native group disliked the Americo-Liberians. Especially at first. In a lot of cases the Americo-Liberians protected smaller tribes from larger ones -- almost always out of self-interest of course, but such things don't matter to groups facing subjugation. Until the Americo-Liberians became truly dominant, in a lot of ways they were just one new faction out of many factions, not worth any special hatred or notice.

It took time for the Americo-Liberians to become the absolute rulers of Liberia. It wasn't a case of them just showing up and being made kings.

Some groups preferred A-L rule to the rule of their native rivals. Some groups benefited from A-L trade policies. Some groups were so far away from Americo-Liberian control (particularly the deep inland Muslims) that they simply had little reason to care.

Those that did hate the Americo-Liberians often could not move against them while also defending themselves from other tribes. Those that could usually found themselves staring down the barrel of a machine gun or a US naval battery.

And yet they kept trying. Over and over and over. And, eventually, they shot the Americo-Liberian president and most of the Americo-Liberian top government officials.

Cabinet members executed by the native coup plotters

I believe this is a photo of coup plotters having taken over the presidential palace

I'm sure in their last moments, the Americo-Liberian elite weren't thinking about how easy it was to rule Liberia.

Related Links

Between 1822 and 1865 over 15,000 former black slaves and free-born blacks relocated from the USA to Liberia. What was life like for returning slaves in Liberia? Were they accepted by the indigenous population and were there reintegration programs?

What happened in Liberia when former African American slaves moved there?

If Liberia was really created for former slaves to return to Africa, why didn't more freed slaves go?

How did the freed black slaves from the Americas treat the native Africans living in Liberia?

Did the freed blacks that emigrated to Liberia actually keep native Liberian slaves?

In hindsight, are African Americans thankful their ancestors were taken as slaves away from Africa to America?

Why would Americo-Liberians enslave indigenous Liberians when they themselves were victims of slavery?

Approximately how many African Americans moved to Liberia?

Was Liberia colonized by freed slaves from the USA? Why did they do this?

Why did African slaves often come from West Africa?

Related: Between 1822 and 1865 over 15,000 former black slaves and free-born blacks relocated from the USA to Liberia. What was life like for returning slaves in Liberia? Were they accepted by the indigenous population and were there reintegration programs?

Andrew Imlay interracially married for thirty years Upvoted by Tishidiv, lives in The United States of America (2004-present) 3y

Your question made me laugh. See, the returning blacks ("Americo-Liberians") assumed themselves to be far, far superior to the indigenous Liberians. So the Americo-Liberians basically colonized the indigenous. They pushed the indigenous off their land, created governments that didn't represent the indigenous, were morbidly cruel to the indigenous, and made lots of money off of them. Americo-Liberians stole indigenous land and then sold it to the Firestone Corporation, which planted enormous and profitable rubber plantations for car tires, and paid off Americo-Liberians for the privilege. Firestone and Americo-Liberians also chose the rulers of Liberia for a hundred years or so.

This arrangement only ended some decades ago, when a civil war engulfed the country, pitting Americo-Liberians against indigenous Liberians. The Americo-Liberians finally lost. And now, Liberia is, I believe, the poorest country in Africa.

So, you see, the issue was never whether indigenous Liberians "accepted" Americo-Liberians!

Related Links

Between 1822 and 1865 over 15,000 former black slaves and free-born blacks relocated from the USA to Liberia. What was life like for returning slaves in Liberia? Were they accepted by the indigenous population and were there reintegration programs?

What happened in Liberia when former African American slaves moved there?

If Liberia was really created for former slaves to return to Africa, why didn't more freed slaves go?

How did the freed black slaves from the Americas treat the native Africans living in Liberia?

Did the freed blacks that migrated to Liberia actually keep native Liberian slaves?

In hindsight, are African Americans thankful their ancestors were taken as slaves away from Africa to America?

Why would Americo-Liberians enslave indigenous Liberians when they themselves were victims of slavery?

Approximately how many African Americans moved to Liberia?

Was Liberia colonized by freed slaves from the USA? Why did they do this?

Why did African slaves often come from West Africa?

Related: Why did early Americans import African people to become their slaves when there were still millions of indigenous Indians they could have captured more easily for slavery?

Wes Frank Masters in American History from Northwestern University Upvoted by

Lyle Holmen , MA History of the United States of America, American Military University1y

If by "Americans," you are referring to the 17th Century British colonists on the North American mainland, they did not have access to "millions of indigenous Indians." Those mostly lived in Central America or South America, which had been under Spanish and Portuguese control for a century. The native tribes of the eastern seaboard of temperate North America numbered only a few hundred or a few thousand each and the total native population east of the Mississippi numbered only a hundred thousand to two hundred thousand.

Further, the English, Dutch, and French colonies in temperate North America had no military power and no soldiers to guard them. Few in number as the northern tribes were, they were stronger then the European colonists over the first decade or two of settlement. Colonial leaders had to negotiate with the local tribes to gain land to settle on. This was relatively easy because local chieftains and kings wanted access to European trade goods and did not realize the long-term threat the European colonists posed.

There was some limited trade in slaves in the British and Dutch colonies, but only in war captives purchased from tribal leaders inland, where war was endemic. This amounted to a very limited market of a few hundred slaves per year per colony.

Economically, it made more sense to tap into the Portuguese and Dutch slave trade between Africa and Brazil and the Caribbean. This was a dependable source of slaves who were not a threat to escape into the wilderness. When they did do so, hunters from local tribes like the Catawba in South Carolina could be hired to bring them back.

Related Links

Between 1822 and 1865 over 15,000 former black slaves and free-born blacks relocated from the USA to Liberia. What was life like for returning slaves in Liberia? Were they accepted by the indigenous population and were there reintegration programs?

What happened in Liberia when former African American slaves moved there?

If Liberia was really created for former slaves to return to Africa, why didn't more freed slaves go?

How did the freed black slaves from the Americas treat the native Africans living in Liberia?

Did the freed blacks that emigrated to Liberia actually keep native Liberian slaves?

In hindsight, are African Americans thankful their ancestors were taken as slaves away from Africa to America?

Why would Americo-Liberians enslave indigenous Liberians when they themselves were victims of slavery?

Approximately how many African Americans moved to Liberia?

Was Liberia colonized by freed slaves from the USA? Why did they do this?

Why did African slaves often come from West Africa?

Related:Do African Americans i.e. Americo Liberians see Liberia as their African country?

Ke'Aun African-American Cosmopolitan Upvoted by Edgar Bernal Sevilla, Assistant Curator at Imperial Valley Desert Museum and Yu-Hsing Chen, lived in The United States of America (1992-1995)Jan 17

The historical relationship between African-Americans and Liberia is… weird.

(Oversimplifications incoming)

It was “gifted" to African-Americans as a place to settle by White America, but African-Americans overwhelmingly rejected colonization, seeing it, correctly, as a ploy to get them out of America. Only a very, very small number of African-Americans went to Liberia over its history.
Following that, Liberia became kind of a pet project for the African-American elite, who spent some effort proping up the Americo-Liberian regime against internal and external threats.

African-American military officers in Liberia. For a time, African-Americans led the Liberian military in "pacification efforts" against Liberian natives along with trying to spearhead military reforms.

There were at least some ideas floating around about how African-American companies could make money in Liberia, but in general (far as I can find), Liberia never was a money machine for the African-American community.

I don't mean that in a "the colony was a net drain which proves that colonialism was beneficial to natives because why else would we be there", kind of way. I mean: I can find no evidence of money going from Liberia to the African-American community. Profits from Liberia either stayed with the Americo-Liberians or went to White American and European (especially German) pockets.

I still dig for information and will be happy to write a new post if I find something, but for now I have to say that whatever the African-American elite were doing in Liberia, they weren't doing it for big profits.

And for their own part, the Americo-Liberian elite never really wanted African-Americans getting too involved. They trusted African-Americans more than Whites, but they still didn't… trust them, lol. So they opposed Marcus Garvey's Back-to-Africa program (and in fact made it harder for African-Americans to migrate). They also stonewalled African-American attempts to reform the Liberian military.

As I said: a weird relationship.

So Liberia was from the beginning rejected by most African-Americans. It brought no money to the African-American community, so it wasn't even considered from a financial angle. It was a concern for the Black elite, but it never entered the consciousness of the African-American community as a whole.

Indeed, I can find no African-American response to the 1980 coup that ended the Americo-Liberians regime. No response at all. It's like African-Americans completely forgot about the country and their role in it by that time. If African-Americans saw Liberia as "their country," there would've been more concern over the coup. But there wasn't.

Liberia just slipped out of African-American historical consciousness. Its hold was never that strong to begin with, and nothing about the African-American / Americo-Liberian relationship reinforced that hold.

Related Links

Between 1822 and 1865 over 15,000 former black slaves and free-born blacks relocated from the USA to Liberia. What was life like for returning slaves in Liberia? Were they accepted by the indigenous population and were there reintegration programs?

What happened in Liberia when former African American slaves moved there?

If Liberia was really created for former slaves to return to Africa, why didn't more freed slaves go?

How did the freed black slaves from the Americas treat the native Africans living in Liberia?

Did the freed blacks that emigrated to Liberia actually keep native Liberian slaves?

In hindsight, are African Americans thankful their ancestors were taken as slaves away from Africa to America?

Why would Americo-Liberians enslave indigenous Liberians when they themselves were victims of slavery?

Approximately how many African Americans moved to Liberia?

Was Liberia colonized by freed slaves from the USA? Why did they do this?

Why did African slaves often come from West Africa?

Related: Between 1822 and 1865 over 15,000 former black slaves and free-born blacks relocated from the USA to Liberia. What was life like for returning slaves in Liberia? Were they accepted by the indigenous population and were there reintegration programs?

Your question made me laugh. See, the returning blacks ("Americo-Liberians") assumed themselves to be far, far superior to the indigenous Liberians. So the Americo-Liberians basically colonized the indigenous. They pushed the indigenous off their land, created governments that didn't represent the indigenous, were morbidly cruel to the indigenous, and made lots of money off of them. Americo-Liberians stole indigenous land and then sold it to the Firestone Corporation, which planted enormous and profitable rubber plantations for car tires, and paid off Americo-Liberians for the privilege. Firestone and Americo-Liberians also chose the rulers of Liberia for a hundred years or so.

This arrangement only ended some decades ago, when a civil war engulfed the country, pitting Americo-Liberians against indigenous Liberians. The Americo-Liberians finally lost. And now, Liberia is, I believe, the poorest country in Africa.

So, you see, the issue was never whether indigenous Liberians "accepted" Americo-Liberians!

Related Links

If Liberia was really created for former slaves to return to Africa, why didn't more freed slaves go?

Between 1822 and 1865 over 15,000 former black slaves and free-born blacks relocated from the USA to Liberia. What was life like for returning slaves in Liberia? Were they accepted by the indigenous population and were there reintegration programs?

Why was it so easy for American free slaves to dominate indigenous Africans of Liberia for over 100 years? Were they not outnumbered?

After the Civil War, what happened to all the freed black slaves? How did they support themselves?

The first settlement by freed African Americans to Liberia occurred only 14 years after the United States banned the international slave trade. Were people who had been born in Africa more likely to emigrate to Liberia than those born in the U.S.?

Did the freed blacks that emigrated to Liberia actually keep native Liberian slaves?

What caused Liberia to fail as a nation for freed slaves?

Was Liberia colonized by freed slaves from the USA? Why did they do this?

What happened in Liberia when former African American slaves moved there?

What if it was made mandatory instead of optional for all freed slaves to go to

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

On Southwestern coast of West Africa, b/n latitude 8o and 30'N.

Official title of the state

The Republic of Liberia

Flag description:

11 equal horizontal stripes of red (top and bottom) alternating with white; a white five-pointed star appears on a blue square in the upper hoist -side corner;

the stripes symbolize the signatories of the Liberian Declaration of Independence; the blue square represents the African mainland, and the star represents the freedom granted to the ex-slaves; according to the constitution, the blue color signifies liberty, justice, and fidelity, the white color purity, cleanliness, and guilelessness, and the red color steadfastness, valor, and fervor. Note: the design is based on the US flag.

Neighbours

Guinea on N. Cote D' Ivoire on E., Sierra Leone on W, on S and SW by the Atlantic ocean. Land boundaries; total 1585 km. Border countries; Guinea 563 km, Cote D' Ivoire 716 km, Sierraleone 306 km.

Founder of The Nation
Liberia was established as an independent state by freed slaves from America in 1847. They were joined by Africans released from slave ships off the West African coast. For more than 150 years from its founding, politics were dominated by the small minority of the population descended from these original settlers, known as the Americo-Liberians or Congo.

Local divisions
15 Counties.

Government type
Republic – presidential

Legislation chamber
Bicameral Parliament

Form of State
Republic

President is Head of State and Head of Government President elected by popular vote for six-year term (eligible for a second term). A multi-party republic with two legislative bodies. The Senate 30 seats, members represented by counties to serve for nine-year terms, and the House of representatives 64 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for six-year terms.

Executive branch
Cabinet appointed by President and confirmed by the Senate, Bicameral Parliament. The President is both the chief of State and head of Government. President elected by popular vote to sreve for six-year terms, eligible for second term.

Former Rulers

1847 to 1876 Succession of leaders of Liberia's Republican True Whig Party (TWP) as Joseph Jenkins Roberts, Liberia's first non-white Governor-general

1876 to 1980 - Succession of leaders of the Republican TWP

1944 to 1971 – Mr. William Vacarant Shadrach Tubman (18th president)
1971 to 1980 – Dr. William Richard Tolbert

1980 to 1990 – Master Sergeant Samuel Kanyon Doe

1990 to 1994 – Professor Amos Sawyer

1994 to 1997 – Council of State (interim)

1997 to 2003 – Charles Gankhay Taylor

2003 to 2005 – Gyude Bryant (chairman of transitional government)

2005 to 2015 Ellen Sirleaf Johnson

2015 to Present George Weah (former Footballer)

Judicial chamber

Supreme Court

Capital city

Monrovia Altitude 30 mtrs. Geographic coordinates 6.18N , 10.48W.

Located on the Atlantic coast at Cape-Mesurado, Monrovia was named in the honour of US president James Monroe, who was a prominent supporter of the colonization of Liberia that founded in 1822.

Names of main towns

Gbaranga, Tchien, Buchanan, Roberts-port.

Date of independence

Independent since 1847.

Religions (Major)

Christian 40%, Muslim 20%, Traditional beliefs 40%.

Main spoken languages

English (official), Kpelle, Bassa, Kru, Vai and Manda, more than 20 ethnic-languages.

Currency unit

Liberian Dollar (LRD)=100 cents.

Area in Km2

111,369.00

Country area comparison in Africa

40 out of 55 states

Demographic terms ;-

Average annual population growth rate 2.782 %

Birth rate 38.14 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 10.88 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 56.58 years

Male 55.05 years ; Female 58.14 years;

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 37, Female: 47

Average per capita income

USD 500

Population density

39/km2

Urban population (%)

62

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishing: 77

Industry: 5

Social service: 18

Main Export item

Iron ore, Rubber, Timber, Diamonds, Cocoa, Coffee.

Economy is based on

Agriculture & forestry

Climate

Tropical; Hot and humid.
Extremes;-

Lowest point; The atlantic coast 0 mtr.

Highest point; Mt. Wuteve 1380 mtrs.

Weather of the Capital city (Monrovia) average annual temperature 26.60c.

Altitude
1000 mtrs/3280 ft

Hottest Month March 23 -31oc

Coldest Month July 22 -27oc.

Driest Month
January 30mm average Rf, July 996mm average Rf.

Measures

US & Metric systems.

Time zone

GMT/UTC+ 0

Public holidays

January 1, February 11, March 15, 2nd wednsday of March, Good friday, 2nd friday of April, July 26, August 24, 1st thursday of November, November 29, December 25 (x-mas).

Ethnic groups

Indigenous African 95% (including Kpelle, Bassa, Gio, Kru, Grebo, Mano, Krahn, Gola, Gbandi, Loma, Kissi, Vai, Dei, Bella, Mandingo, and Mende), Americo-Liberians 2.5% (descendants of immigrants from the US who had been slaves), Congo People 2.5% (descendants of immigrants from the Caribbean who had been slaves).

Topographic & Environmental concern

The Atlantic coastline rises to low mountains and plain forested interior 6 major river flows in parallel to the ocean. Poor sanitary conditions in Monrovia due to the infrastructural destruction caused by the civil war Large-scale ecommercial concessions such as the rubber monopoly granted to the Firestone company contributed to deforestation and destruction of biodiversities. The pollution of coastal waters from oil residues left by Maritime Shipping. Environment: tropical rain forest deforestation; soil erosion; loss of biodiversity; pollution of coastal waters from oil residue and raw sewage. For years, Liberia and Panama have led the world as flags of convenience for merchant shipping.

Economy Overview

Industry

Food-processing, rubber processing, palm oil processing, diamond processing, timbering.

Chief crops

Rice, cassava, coffee, cocoa, sugarcane, rubber trees, palm oil, bananas : sheep, goats, timber.

Natural resources

Iron ore, Diamond, Gold, Iron ore, Timber, Hydro-power.

Other resources

Rubber trees

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 6

Grassland: 21

Forest woods: 30
Other: 43

Marine:

Coastline; 579 km.

Commercial Sea ports:-

Monrovia, is the biggest deep-sea port and the only free port in West Africa.Other active ports Buchanan, Roberts-port, Greenville.

Development prospect;-

Although preoccupied with domestic matters, the government received thousands of refugees during the long political impasse in Côte d'Ivoire.

According to the UN, Liberians who fought in previous wars were recruited to fight in Côte d'Ivoire, which raised concerns about the delicate effort to rehabilitate former fighters, as several weapons caches have been seized. Foreign investment has begun to flow, although there is much to be done to allow benefits to trickle down to the impoverished majority Liberia may have done remarkably well to attract some $16bn in foreign investment over the past five years, but the government has been criticised for not facilitating the flow of those funds to the majority who remain in poverty. And no less than 21 members of Johnson Sirleaf's administration have been sacked for corruption. Despite such controversy, Liberia has few options in seeking to break the cycle of dependency on foreign aid. The economy is set to continue on its path of growth, and inflation is forecast to fall from 8.8% in 2011 to 1.6% in 2012.

Liberia's rubber industry has long been its economic engine, at times accounting for as much as 90% of official exports, but the economy is slowly diversifying. Singapore's Golden Agri Resources and Malaysia's Sime Darby are backing new oil palm plantations that will take a few years to develop. Chevron, Anadarko and Tullow have begun oil exploration but production may be a decade away. Exxon Mobil, Total and Petrobras are also said to be interested in the country's potential.

Exploiting iron ore mines will expand the export base. In late 2011, ArcelorMittal shipped the first iron ore from the country in 20 years, raising hopes that Liberia can regain some of the status it held when it was one of the top five iron ore producers in the 1970s. ArcelorMittal plans to ship 4m tn of iron ore annually. Several other mines, including ones run by BHP Billiton and China Union, are in various stages of development. Despite such investments, Liberia languished near the bottom of the World Bank's Doing Business rankings in 2011, at 155 out of 183 countries, down three spots from 2010.

LIBYA

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT BRIEFLY HIGHLIGHTS;- Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and news articles in timeline

Overview:

Italy took over the area around Tripoli from the Ottoman Turks until 1943.

It was relinquished by Italy in 10th February, 1947, and from UK, France under United Natons trusteeship in 24th December, 1951.

On December 24, 1951 Libya officially achieved independence with the Senussi or Sanussi (Arabic:

سلا سوذ قي) refers to a Muslim political-religious order in Libya.

Headship since independence; Monarchial Head;-

Full name Muhammad Idris bin Muhammad al-Mahdi as-Senussi. The Grand Senussi's grandson King Idris Muhammad of Libya known also as Sayyid Muhammad Idris bin Sayyid Muhammad al-Mahdi al-Senussi was the King of Libya (1951 to 1969). He was a member of the Walad Sidi Abdalla tribe, and the Chief of the Senussi Muslims.

A constitution was enacted in 1949 and adopted in October 1951. A National Congress elected

Mohammed Idris as King of Libya, and as Idris I he proclaimed the independence of the United Kingdom of Libya as a sovereign state on 24 December 1951.

Idris Ibn Muhammad from Benghazi, led the team negotiating with the United Kingdom and the United Nations over independence, which was fully achieved on 24 December 1951 with the proclamation of the federal United Libyan Kingdom with Idris as king. In 1963 the constitution was revised and the state became a unitary state as the "Kingdom of Libya".

King Mohammed Idris I of Libya (born to be Sayyid Muhammad Idris bin Muhammad al -Mahdi as-Senussi 12 March 1889 – 25 May 1983), was the first and only king of Libya, reigning from December, 1951 to September, 1969, and the Chief of the Senussi Muslim order. While in Burka, Turkey for medical treatment, King Idris was deposed in a September, 1969 coup d'etat by army officers led by Captain Muammar Quadhafi.

On 1 September 1969, while King Idris Muhammad was in Burka, Turkey for medical treatment, he was deposed in a coup led by a group of Libyan army officers under the leadership of Muammar Quadhafi. The monarchy was abolished and a republic proclaimed. The coup pre -empted Idris' abdication and the succession of his heir the following day. From Turkey, he and the queen travelled to Kamena Vourla, Greece, by Ship and went into exile in Egypt. After the coup of September, 1969, Idris was placed on trial in absentia in the Libyan People's Court and sentenced to death in November 1971. King Idris died at the Sultan Palace in Dokki, Cairo in 1983, aged 94. He was buried at Jannat al -Baqi, Medina, Saudi Arabia.

On September 12, 1969: While out of the country he was deposed in a military coup led by Captain Muammar al-Gaddafi. The Bloodless military coup of known as the "Al-Fatah (September) Revolution" brought a 27 years old Captain Muammar Abu-Minyar Al--Quadhafi to power, introduced his own political system, the third universal theory. This blends socialism and Islam that borrows heavily from traditional practices, setted March as tentative election calendar for then Jamahiriya committees.

On 25th May, 1983: The deposed former King Idris Mohammed I have died at age of 94 in Cairo, Egypt, where he exiled for so long, and was buried in Medina, Saudi Arabia.

On 21 January, 1992: The United Nations Security Council (UNSC) in it's Resolution number, 731 condemns Libya over destruction of Pan Am Flight 103 over the Lockerbie, Scotland and UTA Flight 772 over Niger. The United Nations imposed sanctions against Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi over the Pan AM Flight 103 bombing over Lockerbie, Scotland.

The Great Leader: Muammar Al- Quadhafi proclaimed the “Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya” and ushered the era of the state of the masses (Jamahiriya). He sought to elevate Libyan society by reducing it to a massive collection of “people's committees”. He brutally suppressed dissent and squandered the national resources of that country. He launched the Great Man-Made River, the world’s largest irrigation project and proclaimed it the “Eighth Wonder of the World.”

In 2008: US and Libya signed a bilateral comprehensive settlement agreement. This offered victims of the Lockerbie and La-Belle bombings, to recover the full compensation amount owed.

In January 2009, for the first time since 1973, Libya and US exchanged Ambassadors'.

In January, 2011 Libya, one of the most repressive regimes in Africa, is unable to stop the wave of popular uprisings against dictators that is sweeping through northern Africa and the Middle East. It's to be recalled that he north African protests began with the overthrow of Tunisia's despotic leader, Zine El-Abedine Ben Ali, and in recent time, President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak of Egypt resignedOn 6th October, 2011 the North Atlantic Treaty Organization usually abbreviated as NATO Defence secretaries have held a session in Brussels, Belgium on how to tighten protectection of civilians in the Libyan popular uprising.

On the 20th of October, 2011: After four decades in power, the “Brother Leader” and author of the Green Book literally suffered the death of a sewer rat. He left a legacy of division and destruction in Libya. The National Transitional Council (NTC) said that it's fighters reportedly cornered the despotic Libyan ruler of 42 years and shot him dead after injury in the town of Sirte, where he had been born and a stronghold of supporters, which finally fell to the rebels after weeks of tough fighting.

According to newsreports, the former Libyan leader Muammar Al-Quadhafi, has more recently been renowned for 42-year mercurial rule was to have been killed following the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) airstrike on his convoy fleeing his beleaguered hometown of Sirte, many were killed, but Al-Quadhafi and some of his supporters were said to have escaped, taking cover in a nearby drain before Quadhafi was found by government fighters. The ex - Libyan leader had been on the run for weeks after being chased out of the capital Tripoli by NATO bombers and the rebel TNC troops. The word of Al-Quadhafi's capture and death triggered celebrations in the streets of Tripoli and other cities with insurgent fighters waving their weapons and dancing jubilantly. The body of the former Libyan leader was taken to a location which is being kept secret for security reasons.

In 19th November, 2011 Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi's second son Saif Al-Islam had been captured on the run.

The ex-Liyan leader's family tree includes, first wife - Fathia (status unknown), second wife - Safia Farkash (fled), Daughter - Aisha (fled). And Sons - Mohammed (fled), Saif Al-Islam (captured), Saadi (fled), Mutassim (killed), Hannibal (fled), Saif Al-Arab (killed), Khamis (status unknown), and adopted son Milad (status unknown).

A Federal Republic on the Mediterranean coast of Africa.

Libya is a country in the Maghreb region of North Africa bordered by the Mediterranean Sea to the north. A mostly desert and oil-rich country on the southern shores of the Mediterranean Sea with an ancient history, It was dominated by the Egyptians, Phoencians, Greeks, Romans, Vandals, Byzantines, Arabs, Spaniards, Turks. It became an Italian colony in 1911 after centuries of domination by the Ottoman Turks, then Italia colonized Libya for over three decades (1911 to 1942) until Mussolini's armies driven & collapsed by the allied forces in 1942. When the Italians occupied that dirt-poor sandy land in the early 20th century, they took many Askaris from then protectorates, known as Eritrea now to subdue the Libyans. By the way, it was Italy which gave the name Libya to its former colony, as it did to its former Red sea colony. By contrast, the Libyan patriot in the name of Omar Mukhtar, fought the Italians for many years and is rightly honoured.

Divided after the world war II, into Tripolitania, Cyrenaica and Fezzan, under a United Nations mandated, British & French rule. Geographically speaking, Libya is hot and bitterly dry, Libyans were mostly nomad Bedouins, and much of it's people live in the greener Oases areas along it's 1050 miles along the Mediteranean coastline. Amir Muhammed Ibn Ali Al-Sanussi is said to be the founder of the Senussi order, that existed b/n 1787 to 1860, on the 3rd of December, 1950 his grandson known as Mohammed Idris, leader of the Senussi tribe, was elected Amir of Libya, chosen by then National assembly constituency, comprised of those three provinces, and a year later, when Libya acceeded to independence in December, 1951, he coronated as "Mohammed Idris I" of Libya, his reign ended at 17 years, and 251 days when a group of junior-ranking officers led by a young Army Captain namely, Muammar Abu-Minyar Al-Quadhafi 27, deposed the monarch on the 1st of September, 1969 while the King Mohammed Idris I, was under medical teatment in Bursa, Turkey, then the News of the Army-revolt was surfaced by Radio-Benghazi, "A Republic had been announced, the childless King Mohammed Idris had designated a nephew 35 years-old Hassan El-Rida as crownprince and successor, but the prince surrendered to have given-up his rights to the throne in the wake of the coup d'etat".

Crude-petroleum was discovered in 1959 and made the state, then a kingdom ruled by the head of the Senussi sufi order wealthy. Captain Muammar Al-Quadhafi came to power by overthrowing King Mohammed Idris I in a coup in September, 1969, ten years after independence, and Libya embarked on a radically new chapter in its history. The real change came when Oil -resource was discovered and the willy Captain Muammar Al-Quadhafi took power by coup. After initially seeking to emulate the Arab nationalism and socialism of Egyptian President Gamal Abdel Nasser, Captain Qadhafi's rule became increasingly eccentric. Ideas put forward in his "Green Book" aimed to set forth an alternative to both communism and capitalism. Captain Quadhafi called the new system a "Jamahiriya", loosely translated as a "state of the masses". Then he declared what he termed as "Jamahiriya" meaning for "Peoples Assembly" and the craftily young Captain began elected himself to the top position which allowed him later to control resources along with the Libyan Oil -wealth, and spend it as he saw fit. In theory, power was held by people's committees in system of direct democracy, without political parties, but in practice, Colonel Quadhafi's power was absolute, exercised through "Revolutionary committees" formed of regime loyalists.

He effectively implemented his own political system, the third universal theory, the system is a combination of Socialism and Islam derived in part from the tribal practices and is supposed to be implemented by the Libyan people themselves in a unique form of direct democracy, for years to come Muammar Al-Qadhafi considers himself a revolutionary and visionary leader, he is the powerful dictator who's bent the Libyans to his will. Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi is still on power by known as the Al-Fatah Revolution, self-appointed as "Brother Leader of the Revolution". A "coup forever", is the other name for his takeover of power by military coup since the 1st of September, 1969, an eventual succession probably may come onto one of his sons Seif Al -Islam Al-Quadhafi, the second son, or Mutassim, the fourth one, to step in as a leader of the reach but a sparsely populated African state, but Seif-Al-Islam quickely came to be seen as a force for economic and political reform, and activates in local politics, when the younger Mutassim became Quadhafi's national security advisor, another brother called Khamis, leads a military unit.

In the 1980s, Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi had many grand plans. In the military sphere, he wanted to strongly equipped the Libyan Armed Forces, and to far create a South Atlantic Treaty Organization (SATO) to protect Africa and Latin America. He advocated for a gold dinar standard as the currency of Muslim countries. Many of his plans were also of a pan-African nature, this included the formation of a "United states of Africa". He also envisioned independent pan-African financial institutions. The Libyan Investment Authority and the Libyan Foreign Bank were important players in setting up these institutions. Muammar Al-Quadhafi, through the Libyan Foreign Bank and the Libyan Investment Authority, was instrumental in setting up Africa's first satellite network, the Regional African Satellite Communication Organization (RASCOM), to reduce the African dependence on external powers. His crowning achievement would have been the creation of the "United states of Africa". The supranational entity would have been created through the African Investment Bank, the African Montary Fund, and finally the African Central Bank, which all these institutions were viewed with animosity by the Europen Union (EU), United States, International Montary Fund (IMF), and the World Bank (WB). Ordinary Libyans might lose now that he has gone: free electricity, interest-free loans- banks in Libya are State-owned and are not permitted by law to charge interest on loans to citizens. All newly-weds received the equivalent of USD 50, 000 to help them get up the property ladder. Free education and medical care- and before Quadhafi the literacy rate was about 25 per-cent. It's currently 83 per-cent. Medical treatment or education abroad were fully funded by the government, including a monthly USD 2, 300 accommodation and Car allowance. Muammar Al - Quadhafi also undertook the World's Mega irrigation project, known as "The Great Man-made River", to make water readily available throughout the desert country. Also any Libyan who wanted to start farming in full time receives a free allocation of land, equipment, house, seeds and livestock to get them started. It's common knowledge that Libya has no any external debt and it's foreign reserves amounts at USD 150 to 170 billion.

On his foreign travels, he usually lived in a luxury tent, he has a phobia about multi-story buildings. He trveles with whom all his bodyguards all women, with a "pistol packing posse, especially his longtime Ukrainian nurse Galyna, who has been described as a "valuptuous blonde", they were all recruited from ex-Soviet Union, whos most of them are independent states and from the sub-Saharan Africa, they travel with him whereever he goes, one of his accentricities is to live in tents, he travels to any direction of his choice outside Tripoli (Tarabulus), and instructs that a tent be patched-up deep in the Libyan deserts, then a driver delivers and returns. There he stays for as long as he wishes until he comes out again, and tries hard to meet some foreign dignitaries at his tent. Some sources described him as hypochondriac who insisted on being accompanied everywhere by buxom Ukrainian nurses. Yet for all his odd behavior, Muammar Al-Quadhafi continued to exercise authority in Libya, he personally supervised major government contracts, distributing favorable deals among his cronies and influential tribal chieftains. At the height of his influence, the Colonel was supporting over 300 liberation movements be political religious or trrorist activities in virtually every country in the world excluding the US , the richest country in the world. His ubiquitous presence everywhere in the world for over fourty years, whether backing terrorist groups in the 1970s and 1980s, funding civil wars in sub-Saharan Africa in the 1990s or hectoring world leaders at the UN General Assembly in New York.

The Libyan leader Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi bankrolled scores of rebel movements in Africa, particularly in Chad, Sudan, Sierra Leone, Liberia, and during the years of apartheid in South Africa,t he African National Congress (ANC) armed wing. He also financed the Black September movement of Palestinian terrorist group of the time, blamed for the 1972 massacre of Israeli Olympic athlets in Munich, Germany. In 1986, Libyan agents bombed a Berlin disco popular with US servicemen, killing two sergeants and a Turkish woman. The US retaliated by having Tripoli and Benghazi bombed, killing 60, including

Al-Quadhafi's adopted daughter. Two years later, the bombing of Pan-American Flight

103 over Lockerby, Scotland, in which 270 passengers were killed, was blamed on Libyan agents, and the country slapped with economic sanctions, but this did not prevent Libya from exporting it's Oil to world market, however. After the 1988 bombing of a Pan-Am plane above the Scottish town of Lockerbie, which the US blamed on Libya, the Gaddafi regime was shunned by much of the international community. In 2003 it underwent a dramatic rehabilitation by taking formal responsibility for the bombing, paying compensation and handing over two Libyan suspects, on of whom, Abdelbaset Ali Al-Megrahi, was convicted for the attack. The UN responded by lifting sanctions.

Libya's so-called "Brother Leader", wields absolute power with no formal title, has always done what he pleased and mostly gotten away with it. When his efforts to play a bigger role in Arab affairs were rebuffed, he began to push for the unification of African nations into a single political entity. Many African leaders were happy to take his money but indulged his fantasies only so far as to make him president of the African Union for a year. The Oil-reach Libya used money to buy influence across Africa, Al-Quadhafi has used Oil-wealth to gain favour and the Libyan government has invested heavily in at least of the 25 African countries, widely believed that it's undeniable to have a

What was Gaddafi's ideology?

Nadhiya Athaide

Iranian Historian & CuratorApr 30

Gaddafi was neither left-wing nor right-wing. Gaddafi formed his own ideology called the “Third International Theory” (highly recommend you read it). It was essentially a unique mix of socialism, self-reliance, Pan-African unity & Islamic leftism.

Gaddafi was a critic of democracy, but not for the reason that you might think. He believed that typical Western style democracy was essentially a never-ending dictatorship where politicians can hold power for decades through flawed party politics, minority governments & massive campaign spending. And as a result, they immediately become tools for the establishment instead of representatives of the people. He also criticized “Parliamentarianism” as a failed system where parties become like warring tribes who pose a threat to stability and unity. Gaddafi however, admitted that his ideology wasn’t perfect and that it would take time to transform into his actual idea of “Democracy”.

He severely criticized wage labor, capitalist markets, and private enterprises. Gaddafi argued that capitalism was slavery, and the people as a whole should be given collective control. Interestingly, once he began nationalizing many economic sectors of Libya, he didn’t purge land & business owners like the Bolsheviks. He instead re-incorporated them back into these newly nationalized industries.

Last but not least, Gaddafi was highly well versed on the Quran, Islam & Sharia law. Yet, he also believed in cracking down on the influence of the tribal Sheikhs. Gaddafi would challenge Sheikhs & scholars who opposed him on live TV. He would grill them with questions on Sharia, the Hadiths & Quranic Surahs. If they were unable to answer & or refute him, Gaddafi would shame and dismiss them instantly.

Gaddafi was a revolutionary. His real blow was his attempt to create a gold-based currency for all African states to use. A move that would've crippled the dollar (can't have that happen). He certainly was a man of many flaws, but I think people should take some genuine time to learn about his interesting political ideology. Such individuals are always more complex than they seem.

significant economic impact across the continent. At the time, he was able to to buy influence, but there are not many African countries that actively support him in his drive to an African high command, common currency and common army, even though Al-Quadhafi has long portrayed himself as an African, the support was always opportunistic and never that deep" says an African director of a Center for Conflict Resolution based in Capetown.

In 19th September, 1989 UTA Flight 772 DC-10 explodes in mid-air over the Sahara desert when a bomb hidden in it's forward Cargo hold detonates. All 170 passengers onboard are died. Responsibility for the bombing is later traced back to Abdullah Sanussi, the brother- in-law of the Libyan leader, whose government agrees to pay compensation to the victimes later. In mid-2003, the Libyan leader finally accepted responsibility for the bombing of Pan-American Flight- 103 over the Lockerby, Scotland and the UTA Flight 772 DC-10 that exploded in mid-air over the Sahara desert, and he agreed to pay up a sum of USD 2.7 billion in compensation to the families of the victims. Al - Quadhafi also admitted to having a nuclear-weapons program, which he then dismantled under international supervision. In the years that followed, western nations including the US normalized relations with Libya, foreign investment flooded into the country. Colonel Muammar Al -Quadhafi has also extracted war indemnity from the Italians, even though the Libyan people may not have need the money at a recent time even though the Libyan people may not have need such a compensation money. North Africa and the Middle East has recently seen a wave of protests fueled by public discontent over unemployment, rising living costs, corruption and autocratic leaderships, some recent figures showed that 29% of young Libyans were unemployed and 93% of Libyans described their condition as "struggling to survive" or "suffering". In August, 2008, Colonel Muammar Al - Qadhafi had a group of 200 traditional African kingships and named him, "King of traditional kings of Africa" at a conference held in one of his traditional Oases tents outside his birth town of Sirte. Colonel Muammar Al-Qadhafi, flanked by gun-totting female bodyguards is the Arab world's longest serving-leader, having ruled the Oil-rich north African state of Libya since he came to power by coup in September, 1969. He has always insisted that the country is run by a series of people's (Jamahiriya) committees, though, most outside observers believe it's a police-state with him firmly control.

When the north African protests began with the overthrow of Tunisia's despotic leader, Zine El - Abedine Ben Ali in January, 2011, and in recent time, President Mohammed Hosni Mubarak of Egypt resigned, Libya, one of the most repressive regimes in Africa, is unable to stop the wave of popular uprisings against dictators that is sweeping through northern Africa and the Middle East. In the first days, when the popular protest became more serious, Al-Quadhafi dispatched tanks, armored vehicles and jet fighters to pound and strafe protesters, hundreds were killed- the exact toll is impossible to know, since the regime shut-out the world's media and shut-down most communications. But the Libyan revolt which started on the evening of 15th February, 2011 continued in Benghazi, Libya's second largest city, about 580 miles (940 km) east of the capital along the Mediterranean coast by only about 2000 protesters, the number of protesters roughly doubled as others passerby and activists joined them, then the regime reacted with a firm determination to discourage further defiance of it's demonstration ban, up to 10% of the protesters were seriously brutalized, and many more suffered for minor-injuries, there were more outraged protesters to follow suit in Benghazi and nearby towns in the next days. And thanks to the enlightenment brought about by the electronic media this age is not dictator friendly, the protests have spread to other cities and nearby towns.

Libya- In timeline:

In August 2011, the world once again turned against the Libyan government over its use of violence against the popular uprising against the colonel, inspired by the anti -authoritarian protests sweeping through the Arab world. The UN Security Council passed a resolution authorising NATO airstrikes to protect civilians. The Libyan pro-democracy protesters are taking their activities outside of the capital to avoid direct clashes with the security forces that have been firing live-bullets on unarmed civilians in the first week of the protest, causing at least 285 deaths, in Benghazi, Al-Bayda and Zetan alone. In Benghazi, a center of the six-days revolt by Libyans inspired by uprisings in Egypt and Tunisia, frustrated by Colonel Muammar Al-Qadhafi's more than 40 years of authoritarian rule, protesters also set fire to a number of government buildings including Police -stations. The protests are the first in it's kind in Libya, where dissent is rarely allowed. Pro-government activists were also out on the streets in the capital, Tripoli, they shouted slogans in support of Libya's leader, Muammar Al-Qadhafi. The government has taken a series of measures, including blocking Internet sites and shutting-off electricity to protest areas, to try to quell the rising unrest. The regime has also reportedly offered to replace some top officials and regional authorities in a conciliatory move. Pro-government media-outlets loyal to Colonel Muammar Al-Qadhafi have threatened retaliation against protesters who criticize the leader through official statements, "the Jamahiriya (people's rule) people's power, the Al-Fatah revolution, and it's leader Brother-Colonel Muammar Al-Qadhafi are all red lines and those who try to cross or come near these lines are suicidal and playing with fire".

The mainstay of the unrest is in regional towns and cities, where many people live in poverty. Amid the crackdown, media-outlets reported that the government would replace many state executives and decentralize power and restructure the government, but it was unclear whether the political move was in response to growing unrest. Protesters were torching a municipal building and demolishing a statue of the so called "Green Book", such a charismatic collection of principles and political views by which Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi ruled.In a nationally televised speech, Saif Al-Islam Al-Quadhafi, the groomed successor for his father, said the Libyan army still backed his father, who was leading the fight against the protesters, although he added that some military bases, tanks and many weapons had been seized by the protesters, he says the protests may lead to a civil war that could send the country's Oil-fields up in flames. Indeed, he acknowledged that the Libyan army made mistakes during protests because it was not well-trained to deal with such demonstrations but added that the number of dead had been exaggerated, giving a death-toll of only 84. Human rights groups put the number over 174 through Saturday the 20th of February, 2011, and Medical doctors in the eastern city of Benghazi said more than 200 have died in the second largest city alone, exiled oppositions grops place the figure at over 500, since the protests began. Libya's second largest city, Benghazi, has fallen to anti-government forces after a crack army unit defected to opposition demonstrators and clashes spread to the capital, Tripoli, the nearby eastern city of Al -Bayda was no longer under government control.

At this moment in time, many arms have been stolen, tanks and armored vehicles are driven about by civilians. The younger Seif Al-Islam, offered to put forward reforms within days that he described as a "historic national initiative" and said the regime is willing and able to remove some restrictions and begin all-round political discussions for new constitution and reforms. He blamed Libyan exiles for fomenting the violence but also stressed a dialogue as rebel leaders were intouch with the egime on the country's future, saying that the General Peoples Congress, Libya's equivalent of a Parliament, would convene to discuss a clear reform agenda, while the government would also raise wages for civil servants. He offered also to change a number of laws, including those covering the Media and the Penal-code, he also admitted that the unrest had spread to Tripoli. He appealed for claim, promising to institute democratic reforms. In a warning suggesting that the regime was digging-in for a bloody fight for survival in the seat of power, Tripoli unless his proposals are accepted, "be prepared for civil war". The turmoil in the capital, Tripoli escalates a week of protests and bloody-clashes in Libyan eastern cities that have shattered Quadhafi's grip on the nation. Although, the elder Muammar Al-Quadhafi did not appear, analysts believed his son has often been put forward as the regimes face of reform.

In other set-backs for Quadhafi's regime, the Warfalla-tribe, the largest in Libya, although it had longstanding animosity toward the Libyan leader, had been neutral for most of the past two decades, was reported to have turned against the Libyan leader, has announced it is joining the popular movement. There are contingents professional soldiers too, men who defected from the regime's military in the early, heady days of the uprising followed by several military units mutinied army groups joined forces with protesters; many of the teachers, Oil -workers and lawyers turned fighters are dressed-in uniforms and armed with weapons that they took from captured military bases or that were abandoned by government troops; during battles, civilians with megaphones or loud-voices often assume the task of rallying the dis-organized rebel fighters; two jet-pilots flew to Malta, a nearby Mediterranean island rather than obey orders; And in a sign of the extent of the breakdown in Quadhafi's regime, has been hit by a string of defections by Ambassadors and diplomats abroad including it's UN delegation, and a few officials at home. Libya's head of mission to the Arab League said he resigned his post to protest the government's decision to fire on defiant protesters in Benghazi, the second largest city, Mr. Abdul-Monem Al-Houni, who resigned from all his duties and joined the popular movement, was part of the group of junior army officers that carried -out the coup of September, 1969 that brought Captain (now Colonel) Muammar Al-Quadhafi to power, he later fell-out with him, but they reconciled in 2000, then Quadhafi named him Liban representative to the League of Arab nations, based in Cairo.

In signs of disagreement inside Libya's ruling-elite, the Minister of Justice & Libyan Ambassadors to India, China, Poland and Indonesia were resigning in protest at the excessive use of force against protesters, after Benghazi and much of the territory in the eastern provinces have already taken to calling "Free Libya", walls of houses and shops in Tobruk, Al-Bayda and Zetan have been sprayed with signs saying "Fall Quadhafi". And some of the captured bases were being run by defecting-Generals and Colonels who appeared to be overseeing basic-weapons training. The rebel fighters headquartered in the main eastern city of Benghazi have already set-up an interim governing council that is urging international airstrikes against Quadhafi's strnongholds and armed forces. Liberated cities like in the east of the country are already being run by popular committees, each with a specific task; sanitation, food delivery and so on. The committees are led by engineers, doctors and other educated people-the kind who can form the next government, the ingredients for the future have to come from the movement itself. And the movement is civil and inclusive and calling for universal human rights and justice.. And several other leading activists in Benghazi are preparing a political - manifesto for the revolution-the draft, it will clarify the nature of this revolution, the revolution is going towards the creation of modern Libya, freedom and democracy based on pluralistic society, based on human rights, participation of all parts of Libya in creating their government and their institutions, said a leading protester.

It was on 1st September, 1969, when excited crowds poured into the streets of Beghazi to chant their support for the dashing 27-years old junior officer who had just ousted Libya's king Mohammed Idris Al-Zanussi. Muammar Al-Quadhafi has long out-stayed that welcome. In fast moving developments, after mid-night, demonstrators were reported to be in Tripoli's Green square, chanting "Allahu-wa-Akber" meaning for "God is great" and throwing stones at portraits of Quadhafi, preparing to march onto his compound as rumors spread that the leader had fled to Venezuela. But the defiant Muammar Al-Quadhafi, the longest serving Arab leader, rich in Oil and poor in friends, appeared briefly on Libyan TV early Tuesday to dispel rumors that he had fled to Venezuela, South America. He said, "I am a fighter, a revolutionary from tents, I will die as a martyr at the end, vowing to fight to my last drop of my blood", recounting his days as a young revolutionary leader who liberated Libya, a reference to the September 1969 military coup that brought him to power. And he roared at supporters to strike back against Libyan protesters to defend his embattled regime, "you men and women, who love Quadhafi, get-out of your homes and attack the protesters in their lairs", he warned "I have not yet ordered the use of force, not yet ordered one bullet to be fired, at the suitable time, we will open the arms depot, so all Libyans and tribes become armed, so that everything in Libya becomes red with fire", in a nation where tribal loyalties figure prominently in politics, it was also a subtle call to his kins to defend him.

Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi's control was whittled away as major Libyan cities and towns closer to the capital fell to the rebellion against his rule, in the east, now all but broken away, the opposition vowed to liberate Tripoli, where the Libyan leader is holed-up with a force of militiamen roaming the streets and tanks guarding the out-skirts. Foreign mercenaries and Libyan militiamen loyal to Quadhafi have fought fiercely to roll-back the uprising against his rule, attacking to nearby cities, but he is still believed to be firmly in control only the capital, some towns around it, the far-desert south and parts of Libya's sparsely populated areas. Colonel Quadhafi said the uprising was fomented by "bearded men", a reference to Islamic fundamentalists, and Libyans living abroad, who he named them as "small, and sick group", he accused also Al-Qaida operatives from Egypt to Algeria, and Afghanistan to the Palestinian territories for the turmoil roiling his country since February 15, 2011 the rebels say they are fighting for political change in Libya and deny any link to extremist groups, he complained all Libyans of lacking gratitude for all he had done for them and blamed the protests on terrorists, foreigners, and young drugs-abused.

It was an all-out call for his backers to impose control over the capital, Tripoli, and take back seized cities, he called on his supporters to hunt-down opponents in their homes. But his call for a popular attack on protesters reflected the deeply unstable nature of the system he has created over his rule, the longest of any current Arab leader. He has long kept the military and other intelligence forces relatively week, fearing a possible challenge to his rule and uncertain of loyalties in a population of multiple tribal allegiances. So far the crackdown has been waged chiefly by militia's and so called "revolutionary committees" made-up of Libyans and foreign fighters, many of them hired from other African countries. After weeks of upheaval, protesters backed by defecting army units have claimed control over almost the entire eastern halt of Libya's 1,000 miles Mediterranean coast including several Oil-producing areas. The United Nations, and the International community as a whole ended-up with statements, condemning the crackdown expressing grave concern and calling for an "immediate end of the violence" and drastic steps to address the legitimate demands of the Libyan people.There are widespread reports that Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi has unleashed numerous foreign mercenaries against his people, in a desperate gamble to crush dissent and quell the current uprising. Libya's embattled regime of Muammar Quadhafi passed-out guns to civilian supporters and sent armed patrol around it's capital to quash dissent and stave off-the rebellion that now controls large parts of the north African nation. Their origins mercenaries vary according to speculations; Chad, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Niger, Mali, Sudan and even Asia and East Europe. Some believe the Black-Africans could be veterans of civil wars in the Sahel and West Africa, speaking French, some had been in the country for months, based in training camps in the south, as if in anticipation of such an uprising, others had been flown-in at short notices.

These mix of Libyans and foreign mercenaries, who shot on the sight anyone found in the streets and opened fire from spreading vehicles at people watching from windows and balconies of their homes. Libyan troops loyal to Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi were also rounding-up Black-African migrant-workers to force them to fight anti-Quadhafi rebels, many of them were raided in their homes by soldiers, beaten and robbed of their savings and identity papers, then detained and finally prized lots of money to take-up arms for the state, but the government has denied such allegations, using foreign nationals to fight the rebels, saying instead that dark-skinned Libyans serving in it's security forces had been mistaken African mercenaries. The bloody attacks on protesters to a war crimes tribunal for investigation into possible crimes against humanity, according to human rights groups. At the latest, many cities in the east appeared to be under the control of protesters after army units defected, most of Quadhafi's dependable comrades -in- arms of four decades and closest associates, who had been defeated to desert first in Benghazi known to be Colonel Abdul -Fatah Younis, his Minister of Interior and commander of the powerful, Thunderbolt Commando Brigade, announced in Benghazi that Al-Quadhafi should step-down immediately. Colonel Abdul-Fatah Younis a close associate of Quadhafi, was known to be among the ex junior army officers who joined Al -Quadhafi in the September, 1969 coup, he was defecting earlier broke ranks and declared his support for the array of protesters demanding that Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi has to step-aside, and the armed forces should join the revolt.

Most of the eastern half of Libya has already broken away, and diplomats, ministers and even a high - ranking cousin who was one of Quadhafi's closest aids, Ahmed Quadhaf Al -Dam have abandoned the regime and sought refuge in Egypt. Protesters in the east claimed to hold several Oil -fields and facilities and said they were protecting them against damage and vandalism. Libya's opposition movement however launched a new push against Colonel Muammar Al -Quadhafi to solidify it's gains and loosen the longtime leader's grip on the capital, Tripoli. Residents in Tripoli have largely been holed-up at homes for days amid fear of pro-Quadhafi militiamen, a mix of Libyans and foreign mercenaries. "It's clear that Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi has lost the confidence of his people, he is overseeing the brutal treatment of his people, the fatal violence against his own peopl e and his legitimacy has been reduced to zero, in the eyes of his people", a White House top official told reporters. European senior diplomats were urging Muammar Quadhafi to handover power and put an "immediate stop" to the use of armed forces against Libyans. Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi warned the US and other western powers not to intervene, and imposing restrictions would prove the west's real intention was to seize his country's Oil-wealth, he vowed to turn Libya into "another Vietnam", and said any foreign troops coming into his country, "will be entering hell and they will drown in blood", he vowed to fight on "until the last man and woman", "we will defend Libya from the north to the south", "If Al-Qaida seizes Libya, that will amount to a huge disaster, he said, "If Al-Qaida fighters take this place over, the whole region, including Israel, will be dragged into chaos, then Osama Bin-Laden may seize all of north Africa that possibly faces Europe".

He called also onto Libyans in the rebel held east of the country to take back control from the opposition leaders who have seized the territory. Some Libyans are worried about his unpredictability as he desperately seeks to maintain his authoritarian four decade grip on power. International sanctions that believed to affect the senior political-leadership of a regime like Libya have been shown to have an effect, also pursuing actions that will ensure that the perpetrators of violations of human rights are held accountables. The rebel protesters have strengthened their hold after repelling repeated attacks by loyalists of Muammar Al-Quadhafi to retake. In mid-March, 2011 the UNSC voted to authorise "all necessary measures" to protect civilians in Libya after then-leader Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi launched a deadly assault on protesters against his rule. The former Libyan Minister of Justice Mustapha Abdul-Jalil, who resigned early from Quadhafi's cabinet in protest against the killing of protesters, told reporters he had led the formation of an Interim - government based in Benghazi, Libya's second largest city, in the eastern part of the country, now it's largely free of the regime's control, told the Interim transitional government has "military and civilian personalities". On March 22, 2011, the opposition's National Council announced the formation of a transitional government under Muhamoud Jibril, a US trained economist and erstwhile ally of Quadhafi's son Saif Al-Islam when he was the darling of those who thought the regime might one day reform, but it's to be recalled that, this council had previously said, Mustapha Abdul -Jalil, formerly Quadhafi's justice Minister was in-charge of a "provisional transititional body", and it's not yet clear how responsibilities will be apportioned between the two men. Of course, someone has to imagine it may be too much to expect a smoothly running set-up just a month into the uprising, nobody is sure who is leading the rebels in battles either, it could be anyone of three defected army Generals, it's Abdul-Fatah Younis, the former interior minister, the most prominent member of Quadhafi's cabinet to defect to the opposition. Or it might be Omar Hariri, a former army General who led unsuccessful coup attempt against Quadhafi in 1975. And the other is Khalifa Heftir a famed opposition hero who recently returned from exile to help lead the rebellion in Benghazi, as on the frontline some fighters cite Abdul-Fatah Younis as their leader, others say they are following Khalifa Heftir, but most say they don't care; they are simply volunteers who have come to fight only Muammar Al-Quadhafi, but military analysts say the regime's military forces still out-match those of the opposition by far.

International pressures on the Libyan leader increased as to insist Quadhafi to halt the violence and give-up power to the people. An international court began investigating whether to charge him and his inner circle with crimes against humanity, the top prosecutor at the Netherlands-based International Criminal Court (ICC) said he would investigate Al-Quadhafi and his inner circle including some of his sons, for possible crimes against humanity in the violent crackdown on anti -government protesters. Mr. Luis Moreno-Ocampo, chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) said, Quadhafi and several commanders and regime officials had formal or de-facto control over forces that attacked protesters, there will be "no impunity in Libya", he vowed. The Libyan leader was poised to make a final push against rebels holding-out in Benghazi, Libya's second largest city, and vowed to launch a final assault on Benghazi, and crush the rebellion for once and for all, as his forces advanced toward the city. The pro-Quadhafi forces appear to be targeting mainly Egyptians and Tunisians, apparently believing they triggered the uprising. Such significant political upheavals are occuring in some parts of the world such as North Africa and the middle east where western geo - political interests are conspicuous, ensuring energy sources or Oil -supplies and security against terrorism are the decisive elements in the relationships b/n the west and the regions, the geographic proximity of North Africa to Europe has it's own factor too. Libya, the Oil -reach OPEC-member state has taken most of Oil-production of 1.6 million barrels a day off-the market, amid signs the crisis in Libya may have cut crude supplies less that previously estimated.

It's to be recalled, Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi has been trying to bring his country out of isolation in previous years, announcing in 2003 that he was abandoning his nuclear development programe for weapons of mass destruction, renouncing terrorism and compensating victims of the 1986 La Belle disco bombing in Berlin, Germany and the December, 1988 bombing of Pan-American airliner over the Lockerby, Scotland. The US along with western allies maintained a stiff trade and and arms embargo against Libya for years, calling it a terrorist sponsor, the US eased restrictions over the past several years in recognition of Quadhafi's decision to renounce his nuclear weapons program and his cooperation in anti-terror operations. Although, he has been relatively well behaved in recent years, go back 20 years or so, and he was a significant sponsor of terrorist acts who had a nuclear program. Western governments have agreed finally to receive on behalf of families of the victims, what amounts to "blood money" of 10 million dollars for each of the 270 those killed in the plane crash over the Lockerby, Scotland perpetrated by Libyan security agents, involved in the talks that led to the Libyan convicted of the bombing of the airliner being released the only convicted Libyan namely, Abdulbasit Al-Migrahi from a british-jail of his heinous crime for the sake of Oil deal. Of course, those decisions opened the door for warmer relations with the western countries and the lifting of UN and US sanctions against Libya, but he continues to face allegations of human rights violations. The 69-years leader has had a rocky relationship since then, with the west. Libya ranks among the world's most corrupt countries and has enormous assets to plunder, confidential reports suggest that western banks manage hundreds of millions of dollars in Libyan assets and the government has built a multi-billion dollar wealth fund from Oil-sales.

Al-Quadhafi's innermost circle is made-up principally of his sons and people with family ties, and their loyalty is likely to be more robust. A global alert against Colonel Muammar Al -Quadhafi and 15 other Libyan nationals, 11 of his close associates, are imposed by travel bans, including four members of his family, which the assets freeze targeting. In a bid to warn member states of the danger posed by the movement of these individuals and their assets, to enforce sanctions under the United Nations security council Resolution number 1970/2011, as the individuals subject to the notice have been identified as being involved in or complicit in planning attacks, including aerial bombardments, on civilian populations. The ICC Chief-prosecutor Luis Moreno Ocampo said he was acting in accordance with UNSC resolution number 1970 ; which refered the situation in Libya to the ICC, and stressed the need to hold to account those responsible for attacks on civilians. The NTC, a disparate movement with its roots in eastern Libya, has risen to pre-eminence in post-Gaddafi politics. Residents of towns and cities in eastern Libya formed the NTC as an interim rebel administration in the early days of the uprising against Col Gaddafi. The NTC was joined by Mustapha Mohammed Abdul Jalil as it's chairman. Colonel Quadhafi's second son, Saif al -Islam, brought him into the government as justice minister in 2007 to cast himself in a more reform-minded light. Mr. Mustapha Abdul Jalil won praise from human rights groups and western powers for his efforts to reform Libya's criminal code during his tenure at the ministry.; had served as justice minister in the Quadhafi regime, and was sent to Benghazi in the early days of the revolt to deal with the protesters. But he quits on 21st February in protest at "the excessive use of violence against unarmed protesters" and within days became chairman of the NTC. Mr Abdul Jalil worked for more than two decades as a judge, during which time he gained a reputation for consistently ruling against the government.

In a wave of defections from the regime by military commanders, ruling circles and others, by swelling the opposition and leaving the pro-Quadhafi camp in large number, and now he is more isolated. Some reports said, Muammar Quadhafi's inner-circle of advisors was crumbling following the defection of the most significant diplomat, among the latest, the Foreign Minister Moussa Koussa, who has reportedly fled through cross-border trip to Tunisia first, then defected to Britain to join the protesters lately, many exile opposition figures called him the "Blackbox of Quadhafi", believed he was behind international crimes of Muammar Quadhafi, as he served chief of foreign intelligence service in previous years for about a decade before he appointed to Libyan foreign minister, some fear the ex-Minister Moussa Koussa, might have some more new information to offer British authorities about the Lockerby aircraft bombing, in which he was a key negotiator on the issue.

Colonel Quadhafi attempts to offer such concessions to the rebel Interim-Government in Benghazi and kill peaceful protesters at the same time, has only resulted in his hanging onto power by his fingernails while he and his sons are in a "do or die" situation with no light at the end during the Libyan protests. Scholars have been pilloried in the media in recent months for supposedly having cosied up to Muammar Quadhafi. Sir Howard Davies resigned as director of London School of Economics (LSE), which awarded Saif Al-Islam his Doctorate, which some allege it was plagiarised, and took money for the school from the Libyan regime. Regardless of Saif's more moderate posture in recent years, the true colours of Muammar Quadhafi were revealed by his murderous stance during the Libyan protests, Saif's recent support for his father suggests that he is not the real liberal reformer many took him to be. As a symbolic diplomatic victory for the rebel -opposition, France, which has been at the forefront of the international air-campaign, struck a more forceful tone, the League of Arab nations insisted for a UN sponsored no-fly zone to protect civilian protesters which were under an attack by the Libyan armed units. The French-led anti-aircraft fires erupted in the Libyan capital on Sunday of the 20th of March, 2011, marking the start of the international airstrikes, as Libyan rebels were more jubilant after the first round of strikes, which came as the overwhelming firepower of Quadhafi's forces had threatened to crush their month-old uprising. A top French diplomat said, "Libyan politicians could be targeted since they gave orders to the Libyan military, the rebels hope that the allied intervention will turn the tide in Libya's internal conflict, breaking sieges by Quadhafi's forces on several rebel-held cities and eventually leading to the Libyan leader ouster after nearly 42 years on power. The strategic city of Sirte, birthtown of Quadhafi, which considred Libya's de-facto capital, is dominated by members of his "Ghadhadfa-tribe" it's loss would perhaps be a symbolic blow, and will open the way to the capital, Tripoli. Rebel forces have been helped by the arrival on the front of more trained soldiers, heavier weapons somehow trained-skills, but they are still struggling to match the more experienced and better equipped government troops even with the aid of allied airstrikes as pro-Quadhafi forces still have clear advantage because they have the armor and artillery, said military experts.

Recently the Libyan regime has softened it's public stance against any compromise that would end the fighting in Libya, but a spokesman for the government "any changes must led by our leader Muammar Al-Quadhafi, who had ruled the country for more than four decades, do not decide our future from abroad, give us a proposal for change from within, we could have any political system, any changes ; constitution, election, anything, but the Libyan leader has to lead this forward" he told reporters in Tripoli, chastising western powers who have a "personal problem with the leader" and economic interests they believe would be, better served if Quadhafi's government collapsed. The United Nation security council authorized the operation to protect Libyan civilians after pro - Quadhafi forces launched attacks against the protesters who demanded that he step-down. The rebels were in danger of being crushed by his forces boasting they would bring him down as the airstrikes that began early morning gave immediate, if temporary, relief to Benghazi, which the day before had been under a heavy attack. The allied airstrikes campaign have crippled government forces came in the nick of time; an expeditionary force of pro-Quadhafi troops had made a foray into Benghazi on mid-March before being repelled by a desperate rearguard action by the rebel-fighters, then the rebels emboldened to advance less than two weeks after they had seemed at the brink of defeat. Some western countries, have sent officials to make formal contact with the rebel oppositon in eastern Libya, and asseses the strength and needs of the rebel forces in Benghazi, the rebels de-facto capital, in the event to decide onto support them politically and diplomatically, as perhaps to use a covert-action of shipment of arms to the rebels, and train them.

Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi, who has a legacy of brutality, called the international assault "simply a colonial crusader aggression that may ignite another large-scale crusader war". In an open letter written to the international community, Al-Quadhafi said, "the rebels, whose he called them as "Germ-insects" were supported by the Al-Qaida terrorist network, what is happening now is providing a cover for Al-Qaida through airstrikes and missiles to enable them to control North Africa and turn it into a new Afghanistan", accusing the international community of carrying-out genocide against the Libyans. Many analysts believe, possibly the political-power curtain is closing on a man who has had so much money, but not much friends, and who has done everything he fancied for over fourty years as he has not enjoyed any trust and warmth, that his Tunisian or Egyptian counterparts have had, in the end, western military intervention remained essential to support and empower the faltering rebels in the east.

As analysts, any long-term settlement poses tough questions about the fate of Quadhafi's family and the new leader of a post-Quadhafi nation, and the rebel opposition repeatedly rejected any solution that would involved one of his sons taking poewer. But elsewhere in the world, the rebel opposition saw success in their efforts to establish an internationally recognized government in eastern Libya, forging tighter links with Britain and Italy, both potentially major markets for Libyan Oil, while Italy, Libya's former colonial ruler offered diplomatic recognition to the rebel opposition council based in Beghazi, becoming the third country to do so after France and the Gulf-Arab state of Qatar. The tiny Arab kingdom of Qatar, is the first Arab state to swiftly recognize the rebels in-control of Benghazi as legitimate authority of the country, the wealthy Gulf-arab state of Qatar is one of the few Arab countries providing warplanes to the NATO air-campaign and has helped Libyan rebels sell-out to buy weapons and supplies, newsreports say, the allied aerial-campaign have begun to target pro-Quadhafi's armored units, on the grounds that they represent the greatest danger to civilians with targeting priorities included mechanized forces, artillery units, mobile surface -to-air missile sites, and their command and control. In the western city of Misrata (Mitsurata), the pro-Quadhafi forces are hiding their heavy armoured vehicles are using human-shields, after allied airstrikes, now known as "Operation Odyssey Dawn". At the latest, in protest against the Libyan leader, Mr. Shokri Ghanem 68, the chairman of Libya's National Oil Corporation (NOC) has reportedly defected to the rebels through Tunisia on the 17th of May, 2011.

A North Atlantic Treaty organization (NATO) warplanes bombed Muammar Quadhafi's second youngest son, Saif Al-Arab Al-Quadhafi 29, and three of Quadhafi's grandchildren all younger than 12, were killed during a direct attempt to assassinate the Libyan leader as Mr. Muammar Al -Quadhafi and his wife, Safia were in their son's home at the time but were not injured. Since then the Libyan leader is shuttling b/n Tripoli's hospitals to elude nighttime raids by NATO jets, he is moving b/n the hospitals because he knows NATO aircraft won't bomb them, is staying no longer than one night in any hospital, he is also concerned that senior supporters in the military and government may turn against him. It's to be recalled that Muammar Al-Quadhafi had an adopted daughter who was killed in a 1986 US airstrike on his Bab El-Aziziya residential compound, a retaliation for the bombing attack on a German La Belle disco in which two US servicemen were killed. And the US at the time blamed Libya for the Disco blast. Muammar Al-Quadhafi, who has been in power for more than four decades, has fought fiercely to put-down an uprising against his regime that began with protests inspired by a wave of Mid-east unrest and escalated into an armed rebellion since mid-February, 2011. The Libyan rebels rejected an offer from Mr. Quadhafi for negotiations to end the conflict in his country.

Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi is believed to have stashed $200 bn dollars all over the world. Shortly after the Libyan uprising last February, the British Government announced that it expected to seize “around £20 billion in liquid assets of the Libyan regime, mostly in London.” The Swiss Government similarly issued an order for the immediate freeze of assets belonging to Al - Quadhafi and his entourage in the amount of 613 million Swiss francs about USD $658 million, with an additional 205 million francs abour USD$220 million in paper or fiduciary operations. In 2008, Al -Quadhafi's Swiss holdings amounted to 5.7 billion in cash and 812 million francs in paper and fiduciary operations. In 2006, the Libyan Sovereign Wealth Fund had investments of about $70 billion. The U.S. has frozen about $37 billion in Libyan assets.

The ICC pre-trial chamber in the Hague, the Netherlands, ruled-out the chief-prosecutor is seeking to arrest the Libyan leader Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi and two others for crimes against humanity, his second son Saif Al-Islam, and Quadhafi's son in-law, the intelligence chief Abdullah Al-Sanussi bore the greatest responsibility for widespread and systematic attacks on civilians. The ICC chief - prosecutor said, "pro-Quadhafi forces attacked Libyan civilians in their homes and in public spaces, shot demonstrators with live ammunition, used heavy weaponry against participants in funeral processions, and placed snipers to kill those leaving mosques after prayers", "pro-Quadhafi forces have prepared a list with names of alleged dissidents, and they are being arrested, put into prisons in Tripoli and tortured", he added. Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi 69, ruled Libya with an Iron fist for almost 42 years.

On 22 August, as the rebels battled Col. Quadhafi's supporters for control of Tripoli, Mr. Abdul Jalil declared that the "Quadhfi's era is over". He is expected to play a prominent role in any future government and has set out his vision of a nation guided by moderate Islam. "We are a Muslim nation, with a moderate Islam, and we will maintain that," he recently told crowds of his supporters in Tripoli. Colonel Muammar Quadhafi seized control of Libya in September 1969 in a bloodless coup when he was just 27 years old. The then young and dashing army captain and his small band of military officers overthrew the head of monarch King Idris Mohammed I, setting up a new Libyan Arab Republic that over the years became increasingly isolated from the rest of the world. It's to be recalled Muammar Al-Quadhafi took over the top spot as the world's most wanted man after Osama Bin Laden was killed by US troops in Pakistan. He had been believed to be hiding in the vast Libyan desert while calling onto his supporters to rise up and sweep the rebels what he calls the m rats, insects, drug-adicts, and holigans. In mid October, 2011, the colonel's autocratic government was brought to an end by a six-month uprising and ensuing civil war. After months of near-stalemate, the rebels stormed into Tripoli, and several weeks later Colonel Quadhafi was killed when his last holdout was overrun. The country is currently governed by the National Transitional Council that emerged from the rebellion and has pledged to turn Libya into a pluralist, democratic state. A former Roman colony, Libya saw invasions by Vandals, Byzantines, Arabs, Turks and more recently Italians before gaining independence in 1951.

On the 20th of October, 2011 the National Transitional Council said that it's fighters reportedly cornered the despotic Libyan ruler of 42 years and shot him dead after injury in the town of Sirte, where he had been born and a stronghold of supporters, which finally fell to the rebels after weeks of tough fighting. According to newsreports, the former Libyan leader Muammar Al -Quadhafi, has more recently been renowned for 42-year mercurial rule was to have been killed following the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) airstrike on his convoy fleeing his beleaguered hometown of Sirte, many were killed, but Al-Quadhafi and some of his supporters were said to have escaped, taking cover in a nearby drain before Quadhafi was found by government fighters. The ex -Libyan leader had been on the run for weeks after being chased out of the capital Tripoli by NATO bombers and the rebel TNC troops. The word of Al-Quadhafi's capture and death triggered celebrations in the streets of Tripoli and other cities with insurgent fighters waving their weapons and dancing jubilantly. The body of the former Libyan leader was taken to a location which is being kept secret for security reasons. Images filmed on mobile phones before and after Quadhafi's death showed him wounded and bloodied but clearly alive after his capture in his hometown of Sirte, and then killed in cold blood amidst a jostling crowd of anti-Quadhafi fighters. Arguements over his burial and his killing after being captured raised serious of questions, but seeing him being beaten badly while he demands legal rights, to the sound of gunfire, many assume he was simply shot killed. If "Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi was killed after his capture, it would constitute a war crime and those responsible should be brought to justice, it's something that an investigation needs to look into "under the Geneva convention which lay-down the rules of conduct in armed conflict, it's prohibited to torture, humilate or murder detainees", said the Amnesty International. The Hague, the Netherlands based, International Criminal Court (ICC) says Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhaf's killing may be a war crime. The death of Libya's former leader "creates suspicions" of war crimes, says the chief-prosecutor of the ICC. The ICC was raising the concern with Libya's National Transitional Council (TNC). The NTC officials initially said he died in crossfire, after being caught by rebels in his hometown of Sirte, but promised to investigate the matter following pressures by western countries.

Under Islamic tradition, he should have been buried quickly within 24 hours in a Muslim cemetry as the Transitional National Council officials themselves are not agreeing on the place of burial. The rebels now control the entire country. Conflicting reports on the fates of Al -Quadhafi's seven sons and one daughter, Aisha, have emerged at various points over the last months of conflict. Libya's transition forces have claimed at various points since the fall of Tripoli in August to have captured or killed some of Quadhafi's sons only for them later to reappear. But according to latest information, five members of Quadhafi's family including his wife Safia to be living in exile, three sons and his one daughter, Aisha in neighboring Algeria, and the one son in Niger. Three of Quadhafi's sons appear to be dead. The fate of Quadhafi's most well-known son and onetime presumed heir apparent, Saif-Al-Islam appears to be a mystery while some newsreports claim that he was captured by the transition forces while others reports claim he has fled like his other brother to the neighboring Niger. It has to be recalled that there were unconfirmed reports from Libya's transition forces that they had captured Saif Al-Islam Al-Quadhafi. The longtime Libyan dictator Colonel Muammar Al-Qudhafi, his son Mutassim and a top aide, the ex-Minister of Defence were buried in an islamic ceremony at dawn on the 25th of October, 2011 in a secret location with a few relatives and officials in attendance. The burial closed the chapter on Quadhafi's nearly 42 years rule and the 8-month civil war to oust him, but did not silence the international calls for an investigation into whether the widely dispised tyrant was executed by his captors.

Two days after Muammar Al-Quadhafi's funeral, the Interim government has also declared Libya is fully liberated, it had said Saif Al-Islam was captured, but at the very same time the 39-year old appeared on foreign TV. But many believed Muammar Al-Quadhafi's second son Saif-Al Islam is now in Sudan's western region of Darfur under the protection of a rebel leader in the area. A Khartoum based newspaper quoted as saying Saif-Al-Islam and other former Libyan government officials were crossed the border from Chad and are being sheltered in Darfur rebel -held areas, but a Sudanese Army spokesman called the report "mere speculation" at the time. On the 31 October, 2011 the United Nations security council has voted to end international military operations in Libya. At the hunt for Saif Al-Islam intensifies, his younger brother Saadi Al-Quadhafi who escaped the country in September as rebel forces began to close in, has publicly lashed out about the death of his father and brother. As news and video footage of his death surfaced, the UN High Commission for Human Rights called for an investigation into the events surrounding his death, though video seems to show him in rebel custody, he allegedly died in crossfire. The Libyan interim government officially declared the country liberated, and has promised to bring democracy to the nation.

A new interim government is expected to be declared within a month, with elections for a constitutional assembly expected within 8 to 10 months. Meanwhile, Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi's second son Saif-Al-Islam Al-Quadhafi the only wanted member of the ousted ruling family to remain at large was captured on the 19th November, 2011 as he traveled with aids in a convoy in Libya's southern desert, the Libyan Transitional National Government officials said. A thunderous celebratory gunfire shook the Libyan capital as the news spread. Saif Al -Islam Al-Quadhafi was formerly considered Muammar Al-Quadhaf's heir apparent, long drew western by touting himself as a liberalizing reformer. On the 20th November, 2011 Abdullah Al-Sanussi Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi's brother-in-law and fugitive spy Chief has been captured, he who has not yet been seen in custody, was one of the last senior figures from the Al-Quadhafi regime still on the run, he is said to have been arrested at his sister's house in the southern town of Sabha. He was regarded as the late - leader's right/hand man and one of the regime's most feared figures, Mr. Abdullah Al -Sanussi, 62, is being sought by the ICC in connection with the repression of protests against Al -Quadhafi's rule.

Libya – At A Glance:

The ruling National Transitional Council (NTC) is now recognized as the Libyan Transitional Government (NTG), the nation's sole legitimate authority by most of the world's major powers, and has moved its headquarters to the capital, Tripoli. But NTC leaders have made it clear that the organisation is an interim body that will oversee a transition to democratic elections, expected in 2013.

Side note;- Mahmoud Jibril - head of NTC Executive Board sometimes referred to as the NTC's prime minister, US-educated Mahmoud Jibril is head of its Executive Board and in the early days of the rebellion was the most prominent voice of the NTC on the international stage. He is reputedly a capable technocrat and is said to make many of the day-to-day decisions involved in running the NTC.

Side note;- As Berbers call themselves "Amazigh", the Libyan tribe demands recognition. They consider themselves the original Libyans and they suffered decades of repression and discrimination at the hands of the Muammar Quadhafi regime. With now it has gone, they are hoping for a brighter future with the right to express their heritage and recognition of the sacrifices they made during Libya's bloody eight-month civil war. But now that Quadhafi has gone "we want our rights, guaranteed by a new Libyan constitution", explains an Amazigh rebel fighter. Amazigh make up 5 to 10% of Libya's 6 million population.

Side note;- The ruling Libyan National Transitional Council (NTC) and its Interim government now face the formidable challenge of imposing order, disbanding the former rebel forces, rebuilding the economy, creating functioning institutions and managing the pledged transition to democracy and the rule of law. In October 2011, the National Transitional Council said it would hold elections to a Public National Conference within eight months. The body will appoint an interim government and a constituent authority tasked with drafting a constitution within 60 days. A new Libyan constitution would be expected to rewrite in early-2012 and to hold a general election by mid-2012 (tentatively 7-8th June). The constitution would be put to a popular referendum, if it’s approved, general elections will take place within six months. Libya possesses considerable reserves of Oil and Gas.

Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi (Abu-Minyar)

The slain Libyan leader was indicted on 27th June, 2011 on two counts of crimes against humanity during the uprising against his government. The ICC alleged that he planned, in conjunction with his inner circle, a policy of violent opression of popular uprisings in the early weeks of the NATO led war against him. He is alleged to have formulated a plan whereby Libyan state security forces under his authority were ordered to use all means necessary to quell the public protests against his government. Muammar Al Quadhafi was killed on 20th October, 2011 and the ICC terminated proceedings against him on 22 November, 2011.

Saif Al-Islam Al Quadhafi

The late Libyan leaders second son was indicted on 27 June, 2011 on two counts of crimes against humanity during the Libyan uprising. Although, not an official member of the government, the ICC accuses him of the same crimes as his late father. Both the ICC and Libya want to put Saif Al-Islam Al-Quadhafi on trial for crimes under the former regime

Abdullah Al Senussi

He was indicted on 27 June, 2011 on two counts of crimes against humanity during the Libyan uprising. As the former head of Libyan military intelligence, he is alleged to have planned, in conjunction with the late Libyan leader Colonel Muammar Al Quadhafi, to use all means necessary to quell public protests against the government. Abdullah Al Senussi is also accused of having commanded forces in and around Benghazi, the second largest city and having directly instructed the troops to attack civilians demonstrating in the city. Both the ICC and Libya want to put the spy chief on trial for crimes under the former regime. Abdullah Al-Senussi's whereabouts are unknown for the time being.

Side note;- Documents found in the British embassy in Tripoli and revealed by "The Sunday Telegraph" show that Hana Quaddafi, supposedly killed 25 years ago, was actually granted a two-year visa to come to Britain as recently as October last year. The UK even paid her application fee.For the relatives of the Lockerbie victims it is a terrible betrayal. Quaddafi had used Hana's alleged death, aged 18 months, as a propaganda coup and to suggest to the British families that he too had suffered as they had. Dr. Jim Swire, whose 24-year-old daughter Flora was blown up on Pan-Am flight 103, was even shown - by Quaddafi himself - a photograph of Hana, covered in blood and on the verge of death, lying on a hospital trolley. That meeting took place in Tripoli 20 years ago and had a profound effect on Dr. Swire and his attitude towards the Libyan dictator.That the British Government never bothered to inform Dr Swire and the other Lockerbie relatives what really happened to Hana has simply added to the sense of betrayal."If the Government knew the story about Hana was phoney then it makes me angry," said Dr. Swire. "The Foreign Office has always kept me in the dark. In an ideal world the CIA and the people from MI6 should have sat down with relatives and said 'we cannot make this public, but this is what really happened'. But nothing of that sort ever happened. That is a source of considerable anger for me."

Side note;- Libya demands handover of Quadhafi spy chief Abdullah Al-Senussi' Libya's Transitional Government has formally requested the handover of Colonel Quadhafi's former intelligence chief following his arrest in Mauritania. A spokesman for the new government in Tripoli "insisted" Brigadier General Abdullah al-Senussi be extradited to Libya to face trial. Interpol says it has issued an international "red notice" arrest warrant at Libya's request. Al-Senussi is also being sought by the International Criminal Court (ICC) on charges of crimes against humanity. In addition, France wants to extradite him in connection with a bomb attack on a plane in 1989. Mauritania has already said it wants to carry out its own investigation before considering any extradition requests. Abdullah al - Senussi usually known as "Black box of Quadhafi" was held at the airport in the Mauritanian capital, Nouakchott, after flying in from Morocco using a false passport, officials said. However, Mauritania has not yet provided any evidence of his arrest. It is believed he is being held at the offices of the Mauritanian Intelligence Agency. An International Criminal Court (ICC) arrest warrant issued in June 2011; but Mauritania not a signatory to Rome statute, so direct transfer unlikely; Libya likely to strongly resist ICC transfer request as public will demand justice in Libya and officials say extradition process already underway; but international concern over fairness of trial. Already sentenced to life in prison in France; French authorities have involved in the arrest; but France may be obliged to hand him to the ICC. An era of people of unlimited power and longevity is coming to a close, embrace a better future for that allows political transition and real reform that meets the aspirations of the Libyan people, as has happened during the revolution of 1948, which threw out monarchies allover Europe and installed representative governments.

Side note;- Libya bans religious political parties;- Libyan authorities have banned the formation of political parties based on religious principles ahead of elections scheduled to take place in June, 2012. Parties based on faith, tribe or ethnicity will not be eligible to take part, a government spokesman said. The National Transitional Council said the law, passed was designed to preserve "national unity". But analysts say it is likely to infuriate religious parties such as the Muslim Brotherhood. "Parties are not allowed to be based on religion or ethnicity or tribe," the National Transitional Council (TNC) spokesman Mohammed al-Harizy told Reuters. Meantime, Libya's Belhadj quits military post for politics. Libyan Islamist commander Abdel Hakim Belhadj has resigned his military post in a bid to enter politics. Mr. Belhadj, a key brigade leader in the 2011 toppling of Colonel Quadhafi, plans to run in elections. He is a former member of an Islamist insurgent group which sought to overthrow Gaddafi in the 1990s. Mr. Belhadj is currently taking legal action against the UK authorities, alleging they were complicit in his 2004 rendition to Libya. He claims he was interrogated by agents from countries including Britain and United States while detained in Libya. Mr. Belhaj said he had handed in his resignation on Monday night, telling AFP news agency that it was "now time to turn to politics". He said he quits as head of Tripoli's Military Council in order to compete in the next elections as leader of The Nation party, which will be launched.

Side note;- Ex-Quadhafi spy chief Abdullah Al-Senussi 'charged' in Mauritania. Former Libyan intelligence chief Abdullah Al-Senussi has been charged in Mauritania with illegally entering the country, officials say. Mr. Senussi, who fled Libya after the fall of Muammar Al - Quadhafi, was held at Nouakchott airport after flying in from Morocco in March, 2012. Both Libya and the International Criminal Court want him extradited to face trial for crimes against humanity. Mauritanian officials say he faces trial for using false travel documents. A judicial source told, he had been placed in a specially prepared prison cell ahead of his trial. The Interim Libyan government has said it wants him back on Libyan soil so he can stand trial for numerous allegations of murder and human rights abuses while he was Quadhafi's head of intelligence. Nicknamed "the butcher", Mr. Senussi was Quadhafi's brother-in-law and has been described as one of his closest aides. He has been implicated in the massacre in 1996 of more than 1,000 inmates at the Abu-Salim prison in Tripoli. In March, 2012 soon after Mr. Senussi's arrest, Libya's Deputy Prime Minister Mustapha Abushagur said Mauritania had agreed to handover him. Mauritanian officials have said no decision has been reached on his extradition. Interpol has issued an international "red notice" call for his arrest at Libya's request. Mr. Senussi is also wanted on a 2011 ICC arrest warrant in connection with the violent suppression of protests during last year's Libyan uprising that toppled the late Colonel Quadhafi. In addition, he is sought by the authorities in France after a court there sentenced him to life in prison for his involvement in the 1989 attack on a French plane that killed 170 people. Mr. Abdullah Al -Senussi was seen as late Libyan leader Muammar Quadhafi's right-hand man.

Side note;- The concept of federalism is exciting passions nowadays in Libya. Hundreds of people danced and sang songs about federalism in the city of Benghazi, as local leaders proclaimed the eastern part of Libya to be the semi-autonomous "State of Cyrenaica". Outside the courthouse on the sea front that same day, a smaller number of people gathered to proclaim their implacable opposition to the idea: "No, no fedraliya," one man shouted out of his car window as he drove past. The drive behind the push for more autonomy in Benghazi seems on the face of it quite reasonable. Many in Libya's second city felt they were marginalised under Colonel Muammar Quadhafi. Benghazi was known as a city of dissent, a place where intellectuals met and formed opposition movements. So the Colonel starved it of funds. The east is also where most of the country's wealth lies, in the form of oil reserves. So, say the framers of the declaration of autonomy, "we just want to ensure we get our fair share." But the presence of the oil is also the reason why the move has met such ferocious opposition elsewhere. Or at least, it is one of the reasons. Mustapha Abdul -Jalil, the chairman of Libya's National Transitional Council (NTC) wasted little time in taking to the airwaves to denounce the declaration as a foreign-inspired plot. He would, he added, defend Libyan national unity, "with force" if necessary. But what exactly are the "separatists" calling for? Thair Elhairy, who calls himself the spokesman for the Congress of the People of Cyrenaica, believes the region should revert to a federal arrangement that was in force during the 1950s. Then, Libya was divided into three administrative regions: Tripolitania in the northwest, Fezzan in the southwest, and Cyrenaica in the east. Each exercised a significant degree of autonomy though regional legislatures. Libyan voters head to the polls in Benghazi local elections. Residents in Benghazi, the city where the Libyan uprising began, have voted in historic local elections. More than 400 people contested seats on the 44-member local council, even though the remit of local authorities has yet to be set. This was the first time such elections have been held in the city since the 1960s and turnout was high. National elections are expected to be held in June. Until then, the mandate of local council s will remain unclear. The BBC's reporter in Libya says people in Benghazi were excited and motivated to be taking part in a political process. Social networking sites were awash with pictures of people showing their inked fingers to prove they voted and some polling stations had to stay open for an extra hour to meet demand.

Side note;- The Lockerbie bomber Abdelbaset Al-Megrahi has been buried in a largely private ceremony in a western suburb of the Libyan capital, Tripoli. Al - Megrahi, the only person convicted over the December, 1988 bombing above Scotland which killed 270 people, died at his home in Libya. He was convicted by a special court in the Netherlands in 2001. He was freed from a Scotish jail in 2009 on compassionate grounds as he was diagnosed with terminal cancer. The BBC's reporter in Tripoli says Megrahi's body was transferred discreetly in an Ambulance to the burial site, followed by a convoy of male relatives close behind. The funeral was very much a private family affair and the funeral took place in the suburb of Janzour, where many other members of his family lay buried, the BBC correspondent says. "His pain is over now - he is with God," said his brother Muhammad, quoted by the AFP news agency. Another brother, Abdulhakim, said that Megrahi's health had deteriorated quickly and he died at home in Tripoli. Megrahi's release sparked the fury of many of the relatives of the victims of the Lockerbie bombing. The US - whose citizens accounted for 189 of the dead - also criticised the move. But some of the relatives of those killed believe he was innocent. In Libya, a spokesman for the National Transitional Council (TNC) said Megrahi's death would not close the Lockerbie file. Abdelbaset Al-Megrahi, a former Libyan intelligence officer, always denied any responsibility for the bombing of Pan-American Flight 103 in December 1988.

Side note;- Libyan ex-spy chief Abu Zeid Omar Dorda charged over protester deaths. The first senior official from the former Libyan regime has been charged in court in connection with the conflict that toppled Muammar Al-Quadhafi. Abu Zeid Omar Dorda, who was the head of external intelligence, appeared in the Tripoli court behind a metal cage. He denied all six charges, which included ordering the fatal shooting of protesters last year. The case has been adjourned until 26 June, 2012 as his lawyer asked for more time to review the case. Mr. Omar Dorda was arrested in September 2011, the month before Colonel Quadhafi was killed. The BBC's correspondent in the capital, Tripoli, says his trial is seen as a test case for Libya's judiciary and its capacity to deal with high-profile cases. My brother is one of the Libyan people who looks out for his country, for its people and it’s safety”, quoted as saying Abdullah Dorda younger brother of Abu Zeid Dorda. Mr. Dorda is charged with "mobilising security forces to fire bullets at the heads and chests of civilians" and "preventing, through the use of force and intimidation, the staging of peaceful protests", the Libya's state -run news agency Wal reports. He is also charged with arming his ethnic group with the purpose of inciting civil strife during Libya's seven-month rebellion last year.

Side note;- The Libyans in their first Abu Salim jail massacre remembrance; Libyans are for the first time publicly marking the anniversary of a prison massacre in which nearly 1,300 inmates were shot dead 16 years ago. The prisoners at the notorious Abu Salim jail in the capital, Tripoli, were killed after a protest demanding better conditions and fairer trials. Since the overthrow of long-time ruler Muammar Gaddafi last year, the jail has become an exhibition gallery. Quadhafi’s brother-in-law is accused of giving the order to shoot. Abdullah al-Senussi, who served as head of military intelligence, was arrested in Mauritania last November, a month after Col Gaddafi was killed - ending the eight-month uprising. The BBC's correspondent in Tripoli says the Abu Salim prison is now a site where former inmates, their families and others can publicly pay their respects to the 1,269 prisoners gunned down in 1996 and those who were incarcerated there for years on end. Libyans have been streaming in to look at items exhibited in one of the prison's inner courtyards, including prison slippers, pictures of those killed, and secret notes written by inmates, she says. US-based rights group Human Rights Watch (HRW) says Libyans can finally hope for justice, adding that suspected perpetrators of the killings should be treated humanely and get fair trials. Our reporter says justice is still on a rocky path in post-revolutionary Libya, with old scores being settled at times with the gun. However, the judiciary has recently started prosecuting members of the former government, she says. Nicknamed "the butcher", Mr. Abdullah Al-Senussi was one of the most feared figures in Quahafi's Libya and is wanted for by the International Criminal Court (ICC) for alleged atrocities committed against anti-Quadhafi protesters last year. The west African state of Mauritania has charged him with entering the country illegally, while the Libyan transitional government is demanding his extradition.

Side note;- Libya election materials destroyed in Adjabiya fire; a fire has destroyed election materials in Libya, days ahead of the first elections since Colonel Muammar Al -Quadhafi was toppled as leader last year. Libyan officials said the fire had destroyed ballot boxes and papers at a depot in the eastern city of Adjabiya. A security source told the fire is being investigated as a suspected arson attack, according to Reuters. It comes less than a week after the ransacking of electoral commission offices in Benghazi, north of Adjabiya. An unnamed electoral official told the fire in Adjabiya happened before sunrise, according to AFP news. "The fire happened before sunrise. All the material, including ballot boxes and ballots, was destroyed," the official was quoted as saying. Meanwhile, the head of the electoral commission in Benghazi, Jamal Bugrin said voting may be delayed in that district if replacement materials could not be sourced, said AFP. Pro-autonomy leaders in eastern Libya earlier called for a boycott of the election. They said eastern Libya should be given a larger share of seats in the new 200-member legislature, the National Congress which is tasked with drawing up a constitution. The country's electoral law allows 60 seats to be taken by candidates in eastern Libya.

Side note;- Libyans have been voting in their first free national election for 60 years, which that heralded a new era of the country. They are selecting a temporary assembly which will have the task of picking a cabinet and a primte minister. Voting began late in some cities where gunmen disrupted voting, and one person was killed in a shooting close to a polling station in Ajdabiya. Nevertheless, overall turnout has been described as high, with voters choosing their first government since Col Gaddafi came to power in 1969. Few Libyans remember their last national vote in 1965, when no political parties were allowed. Even fewer took part in their country's first parliamentary elections in February 1952, shortly after independence. Libyans have been voting in their first free national election for 60 years. They are selecting a temporary assembly which will have the task of picking a cabinet and a prime minister. Voting began late in some cities where gunmen disrupted voting, and one person was killed in a shooting close to a polling station in Ajdabiya. Nevertheless, overall turnout has been described as high, with voters choosing their first government since Col Gaddafi came to power in 1969. Few Libyans remember their last national vote in 1965, when no political parties were allowed. Even fewer took part in their country's first parliamentary elections in February 1952, shortly after independence. In Tripoli's Martyr's Square, crowds started gathering before midday to wave flags, sing and honk their car horns as traffic came to a standstill. When the polls closed, the celebrations got bigger and louder. In the east of the country, where the revolution that ended the rule of Muammar Quadhafi started, the election has been marred by violence and the sacking of a polling station. With 2,600 individuals and 400 political organisations to choose from, some voters appeared bewildered by the choice on offer, but the heavy voting I saw in Tripoli was ordered and calm. One man, toothless and at least 80 years old, said he had never seen Libyans queue so quietly. Polls opened at 08:00 (06:00 GMT), with reports of queues forming outside polling stations in the capital Tripoli. "I feel free at last. It's a feeling I cannot describe: Like a human being," Asmaddin Arifi told the BBC. Many voters carried the black, red and green flag of the Libyan revolution as they went to the polls. Armed men stopped voters casting their ballots in the port town of Ras Lanuf. Voting was also disrupted in Brega and Ajdabiya. Details of the fatal shooting in Ajdabiya were unclear but Deputy Interior Minister Omar Al-Khadrawi told reporters in Tripoli that it took place as three men in a car tried to "threaten the voting process", Reuters news agency reported. The head of the election commission Nuri Al-Abbar said that 94% of polling stations across the country had opened normally. Officials said later that voting had taken place in all of Libya's electoral districts and that voting hours were being extended to allow everyone to cast their ballots. UN Libya envoy Ian Martin said the disruption in the east was unlikely to undermine the credibility of the election. Many people in eastern Libya are concerned that the oil -rich area will be under-represented in the assembly and marginalised as it was during Muammar Quadhafi's 42-year rule. The region has been allotted only 60 seats in the 200-seat assembly, while the west will have 100 seats and the south 40, under the system devised by the outgoing National Transitional Council (NTC). Election officials acknowledged that the election was imperfect but insisted it was crucial for the vote to go ahead.

The Historic Libyan National Elections of 7th July, 2012

2.8 million registered voters from around 3-3.5 million eligible (45% women)

2,639 individual candidates (competing for 120 seats in 69 constituencies

374 party lists from more than100 political entities (competing for 80 party seats in 20 constituencies)

599 men registered for party seats (44%)

88 women registered for individual seats (3%)

Source: The UN and the Libyan High National Electoral Commission (HNEC)

"It's important for the stability of the country," Salim Ben Tahir from the National Election Commission told the BBC. "We can do it better in the future but the NTC and the current government are losing legitimacy. People aren't respecting them any more and things are getting out of hand." Some former rebels have tried to derail the vote by targeting the oil industry, large parts of which are located in the east. They have shut down several oil terminals, including those at Brega, Ras Lanouf and Sidra, and a significant part of Libya's oil exporting capacity has been disrupted. In an attempt to defuse the situation, the NTC has said the new parliament will no longer be responsible for naming the panel that will draft Libya's new constitution. The 60-member committee will be elected in a separate vote at a later date. Around 2.9 million people are eligible to vote for the 2,600 candidates standing for the new General National Congress, less than a year after Colonel Quadhafi was toppled after an eight-month uprising. There are countless political parties taking part in the election but the biggest to emerge so far is the Justice and Construction Party, made up mostly of Muslim Brotherhood members. Libya has Africa’s largest reserve oil.

Side note;- Saif Al-Islam Quadhafi seeks Hague trial: Colonel Gaddafi's son has said he wants to be put on trial in The Hague, rather than in his home country, his lawyers have said. Saif al-Islam said if he was executed after a trial in Libya then it would be tantamount to murder, according to documents submitted to the International Criminal Court. The 40-year-old is being held by militia in the city of Zintan. He has been indicted by the ICC for crimes against humanity. Libya's interim government has so far refused to hand him over for trial in the Netherlands, where the international court is based, arguing that he should face justice in his own country. Colonel Gaddafi, whose autocratic rule lasted for 42 years, was killed in unclear circumstances after being captured by rebels in October, in an act criticised by rights groups. "I am not afraid to die but if you execute me after such a trial you should just call it murder and be done with it," Saif al-Islam was quoted by lawyers as saying. In June, a team sent by the ICC were arrested after meeting Saif al -Islam, and held for more than three weeks. The documents filed to the court said that during that meeting an official who had pretended to be an illiterate guard had stopped an ICC lawyer from taking a sworn statement from Saif al-Islam. "The 'guard', who is actually Mr Ahmed Amer - a councillor who speaks several languages - was planted in the room to deliberately trick the delegation," the filing said, according to Reuters. "He came back into the room and (in the presence of the ICC interpreter), started shouting that this statement was very dangerous, violated Libyan national security, and that the Defence could not have it back." The meeting was cut short after 45 minutes and their documents were confiscated, the lawyers said. The team were later detained. The actions of the authorities appeared to show they viewed it as "illegal, treason, or a violation of national security for either Mr Gaddafi or his Counsel to indicate that Mr Gaddafi does not wish to be tried before Libyan courts", the lawyers said in the filing. Libyan officials accused lawyer Melinda Taylor, who was leading the ICC delegation, of smuggling spying devices and a coded letter to Saif al-Islam during the meeting. Saif Al-Islam Quadhafi has been held by militiamen in Libya since November, 2011.

Side note;- Libya's former Quadhafi's critic Mahmoud Jibril calls for national unity. Libya's former Interim Prime Minister Mahmoud Jibril has called for national unity between political parties. Mr Jibril said political factions must work together to restore order, which the state was too weak to enforce."The most important priority right now for all political parties is to unite behind one objective, bringing back the state back to our life," Mr Jibril told the BBC. He is said to have done well in the first national post-Quadhafi elections. Mr Jibril, who was interim prime minister for seven months during the uprising against Colonel Muammar Quadhafi's last year, now leads a bloc of political parties called the National Forces Alliance. Local media reports have said Mr Jibril's alliance leads the Islamist Muslim Brotherhood in parliamentary elections but official results have not yet been announced. Mr. Jibril said he believed Libya needed a combination of both a presidential and parliamentary system. He stressed the need for Libya to establish army and police forces to ensure law and order across the country. "You need swiftness, because you need stability and order, but this should not be done at the expense of the democratic process," he said. Mr. Jibril, who was educated in the United States and whose bloc is seen by many as broadly liberal, called on parties to f orm a coalition government, something which rival politicians have tentatively welcomed. Regional differences and rivalries, which lubricated the uprising and conflict last year, have persisted after the removal of the Quadhafi regime. In the eastern city of Benghazi, the cradle of last year's uprising, protesters attacked polling stations, aggrieved at what they say is a disproportionately small number of assembly seats allocated to the region. On the eve of the vote, the National Transitional Council which has been running Libya since Colonel Muammar Quadhafi was ousted, said the new parliament will no longer be responsible for naming the panel that will draft Libya's new constitution. The 60-member committee will be elected in a separate vote at a later date.

In 8 July, 2012 Libya's NTC to handover power to newly-elected assembly' Libya's interim National Transitional Council is set to handover power to a newly-elected assembly, the General National Congress (GNC), almost a year after the ousting of Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi. NTC chief Mustapha Abdul Jalil will pass the reins to the oldest member of the legislative body at a late - night ceremony in the capital, Tripoli. The NTC, which was formed during last year's revolt, will then be dissolved. The change marks the first peaceful transition of power in Libya's modern history. The 200-member assembly will later appoint a government, which will rule until new elections following the drafting of a new constitution. The transfer of power to Mohammed Ali Salim, the assembly's oldest member, will take place at 23:00 (21:00 GMT) on Wednesday, 8th of August, 2012 scheduled late because of Ramadan, the Muslim month of fasting. Security is likely to be the biggest challenge for Libya's new rulers, as numerous militia groups continue to grapple for influence. The assembly was elected on 7 July in the country's first free and fair polls in decades and is a mixture of independent candidates and political parties. Out of the 80 seats reserved for parties, the broadly secular National Forces Alliance, led by ex-interim Prime Minister Mahmoud Jibril - gained 39 seats, more than any other grouping. Members of the assembly informally agreed on the need to select a head of the assembly and two deputy chiefs within a week, independent member Salah Jawooda told AFP news agency. Former Libyan leader Colonel Muammar Quadhafi came to power in September, 1969 and ruled autocratically for more than four decades, until he was toppled and killed last year. Prior to this year's polls, the last national vote was held in 1965, when no political parties were allowed. Former minister of Justice, Mustapha Abdul Jalil has been running Libya since the fall of Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi. The seed of democracy has taken root in Libya following handing over of power to the General National Congress (GNC) by the National Transitional Council (NTC). After more than 40 years of late Muammar Quadhafi's rule, the first peaceful transition of power has sufficed in Libya. "I handover the constitutional prerogatives to the General National Congress, which from now on is the legitimate representative of the Libyan people," NTC chief Mustapha Abdul Jalil said at a late -evening ceremony. According to Tarik Youssef, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institute, the NTC "has had a pretty patchy record of delivering on the ground of being transparent". The NTC was the political arm of the rebellion that toppled Quadhafi, and officially assumed power after the regime was overthrown. The ceremony was held in an upscale hotel in the Tripoli and all the roads near or leading to the conference were closed to bolster security. The newly empowered GNC is due to begin its work next week. Libya's GNC must now address ongoing violence in the eastern city of Benghazi and in Tripoli where a car exploded during a market place gun battle. "This General National Congress assumes power today while at the same time being expected to act, and act soon ... to deal with issues that Libyan people see as essential to the country," Yousef was quoted as saying. Salah Jawooda, an independent member from the eastern city of Benghazi told reporters that assembly members had agreed on the need to select a head of the GNC and two deputy chiefs within a week. The GNC will choose a new interim government to take over from the NTC, and lead the country until fresh elections can be held. A board will also be selected to write the GNCs internal procedural rules. The 200 seat GNC assembly includes 39 members of the liberal coalition of 2011 wartime premi er Mahmoud Jibril, 17 members of the Justice and Construction Party launched by Libya's Muslim Brotherhood, and the National Forces Alliance- a centrist party led by Ali Tarhuni, who held several key posts during last year's revolt. Libyans, in their first free election since the uprising, last year which escalated into a civil war that ousted the now-slain dictator, elected a legislative assembly of party and independent representatives.

Endnote;- New Libya parliament elects Mohammed Magarief as head' Libya's newly elected interim assembly has elected former opposition activist Mohammed Magarief as its president on 9th August, 2012, a day after it assumed power. Mr. Mohammed Magarief will lead the assembly in its task of appointing a prime minister and running the country until a constitution is drafted next year. He is considered a moderate Islamist and beat a liberal in the vote. The interim National Transitional Council handed power to the 200-member assembly on Thursday. The NTC, which was formed during last year's revolt that overthrew and killed Muammar Gaddafi, has now been dissolved. Crowds in central Tripoli celebrated after the handover, which was the first peaceful transition of power in Libya's modern history. The new assembly is tasked with electing a prime minister and passing laws until full parliamentary elections can be held under a new constitution. It was elected on 7 July, in the country's first free and fair polls in decades and is a mixture of independent candidates and political parties. Out of the 80 seats reserved for parties, the broadly secular National Forces Alliance, led by ex-interim Prime Minister Mahmoud Jibril - gained 39 seats, more than any other grouping. Mr Magarief is from Libya's second city, Benghazi, where the uprising against Gaddafi originated. He spent two decades in exile in the United States. He is thought to be on good terms with the Muslim Brotherhood, the BBC's Rana Jawad reports from Tripoli. She says his Benghazi roots will placate a lot of fears many in the east had that they would be marginalised by a centralised authority in the capital. The National Front party, which won three seats in the July vote for the assembly, is an offshoot of the National Front for the Salvation of Libya. Established in 1981, it unsuccessfully tried to overthrow Muammar Quadhafi several times. Meantime, Libya’s interior minister quits after Sufi shrine attacks' on 26th August, 2012’ Libya's interior minister has quit in the wake of a series of attacks on Sufi Muslim shrines and other violence that has rocked the country. Fawzi Abdelali resigned in protest at criticism from Congress over his handling of the violence, an aide said. The latest incidents include attacks on two Sufi shrines that were blamed on ultra-conservative Salafi Islamists.Attacks on shrines of sects have risen since the end of the eight-month civil war that toppled Col Muammar Gaddafi. There has also been a recent double car bombing in Tripoli and clashes between rival tribes in Zlitan.

LIBYA – Timeline Diaries updates and related key notes

7th century BC - Phoenicians settle in Tripolitania in western Libya, which was hitherto populated by Berbers.

6th century BC - Carthage conquers Tripolitania.

4th century BC - Greeks colonise Cyrenaica in the east of the country, which they call Libya.

Capital: Tripoli

Founded by the Phoenicians

645 AD: Conquered by

Arab warriors One of the three ancient cities Tripoli grew rapidly in the 1970s

Population: 1.7 million

(estimate)

74 BC - Romans conquer Libya.

AD 643 - Arabs under Amr Ibn al-As conquer Libya and spread Islam.

16th century - Libya becomes part of the Ottoman Empire, which joins the three provinces of Tripolitania, Cyrenaica and Fezzan into one regency in Tripoli.

1911-12 - Italy seizes Libya from the Ottomans. Omar al-Mukhtar begins 20-year insurgency against Italian rule.

1920s - Libyan resistance grows as Senussi dynasty joins in alongside the Umar Mukhtar campaign.

1931 - Italy breaks resistance through combination of major armed operations and concentration camps for rebel population. Umar al-Mukhtar is captured and executed.

1934 - Italy unites the provinces as the colony of Libya and steps up Italian migration as part of an eventual plan for the incorporation of Libya into a Greater Italy.

1942 - Allies oust Italians from Libya, which is then divided between the French, who administer Fezzan, and the British, who control Cyrenaica and Tripolitania.

1951 - Libya becomes independent under King Idris al-Sanusi.

1956 - Libya grants two American oil companies a concession of some 14 million acres.

1961 - King Idris opens a 104-mile pipeline, which links important oil fields in the interior to the Mediterranean Sea and makes it possible to export Libyan oil for the first time.

September 1969 - King Idris deposed in military coup led by young Captain Muammar Gaddafi, who pursues a pan-Arab agenda by attempting to form mergers with several Arab countries, and introduces state socialism by nationalising most economic activity, including the oil industry 1970 - Libya orders the closure of a British airbase in Tobruk and the giant US Wheelus air force base in Tripoli; property belonging to Italian settlers nationalised.

1971 - National referendum approves proposed Federation of Arab Republics (FAR) comprising Libya, Egypt and Syria. However, the FAR never takes off.

1973 – Captain muammar Gaddafi declares a "cultural revolution", which includes the formation of "people's committees" in schools, hospitals, universities, workplaces and administrative districts; Libyan forces occupy Aozou Strip in northern Chad.

1977 – Colonel Muammar Gaddafi declares a "people's revolution", changing the country's official name from the Libyan Arab Republic to the Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah and setting up "revolutionary committees" - heralding the start of institutionalised chaos, economic decline and general arbitrariness.

1980 - Libyan troops intervene in civil war in northern Chad.

1981 - US shoots down two Libyan aircraft which challenged its warplanes over the Gulf of Sidra, claimed by Libya as its territorial water.

1984 - UK breaks off diplomatic relations with Libya after a British policewoman is shot dead outside the Libyan embassy in London while anti-Gaddafi protests were taking place.

1986 - US bombs Libyan military facilities, residential areas of Tripoli and Benghazi, killing 101 people, and Muammar Gaddafi's house, killing his adopted daughter. US says raids were in response to alleged Libyan involvement in bombing of Berlin disco frequented by US military personnel.

1988 December - Lockerbie bombing - an airliner is blown up over the Scottish town of Lockerbie, allegely by Libyan agents.

1989 - Libya, Algeria, Morocco, Mauritania and Tunisia form the Arab Maghreb Union (AMU).

1992 - UN imposes sanctions on Libya in an effort to force it to hand over for trial two of its citizens suspected of involvement in the blowing up of a PanAm airliner over the Scottish town of Lockerbie in December 1988.

1994 - Libya returns the Aozou Strip to Chad as per the ICC ruling.

1995 – Muammar Gaddafi expels some 30,000 Palestinians in protest at the Oslo accords between the Palestine Liberation Organisation and Israel.

1999 - Lockerbie suspects handed over for trial in the Netherlands under Scottish law; UN sancti ons suspended; diplomatic relations with UK restored.

September 2000 - Dozens of African immigrants are killed by Libyan mobs in the west of Libya who were said to be angry at the large number of African labourers coming into their country.

January 31, 2001- Special Scottish court in the Netherlands finds one of the two Libyans accused of the Lockerbie bombing, Abdelbaset Ali Mohamed al-Megrahi, guilty and sentences him to life imprisonment. Megrahi's co-accused, Al-Amin Khalifa Fahimah, is found not guilty and freed.

May 2001 - Libyan troops help to quell a coup attempt against President Ange -Felix Patasse of the Central African Republic.

January 2002 - Libya and the US say they have held talks to mend relations after years of hostility over what the Americans termed Libya's sponsorship of terrorism.

March 14, 2002 - The Libyan man found guilty of the Lockerbie bombing, Abdelbaset Ali Mohmmed al-Megrahi, loses his appeal against the conviction and begins a life sentence of at least 20 years.

January 2003 - Libya is elected chairman of the UN Human Rights Commission despite opposition from the US and human rights groups.

August 2003 - Libya signs a deal worth $2.7bn to compensate families of the Lockerbie bombing victims. Libya takes responsibility for the bombing in a letter to the UN Security Council.

September 2003 - UN Security Council votes to lift sanctions over Libya.

December 2003 - Libya says will abandon programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction.

January 2004 - Libya agrees to compensate families of victims of 1989 bombing of French passenger aircraft over Sahara.

March 2004 - British Prime Minister Tony Blair visits, the first such visit since 1943.

May 2004 - Five Bulgarian nurses and a Palestinian doctor are sentenced to death having been accused of deliberately infecting some 400 children with HIV infection. They are eventually freed under a deal with the European union.

August 2004 - Libya agrees to pay $35m to compensate victims of the bombing of a Berlin nightclub in 1986.

January 2005 - Libya's first auction of oil and gas exploration licences heralds the return of US energy companies for the first time in more than 20 years.

February 2006 - At least 10 people are killed in clashes with police in Benghazi, part of a wave of international protests by Muslims who are angered by a Danish newspaper's cartoon depictions of the Prophet Muhammad.

May 2006 - The US announces it is restoring full diplomatic ties with Libya.

September 2006 - Human Rights Watch accuses Libya of abusing the human rights of African migrants trying to enter the EU by forcibly repatriating them. Some of the migrants face possible persecution or torture at home, according to the report.

January 2007 - Prime minister announces plan to make redundant 400,000 government workers more than a third of the total workforce - to stimulate the private sector and ease public spending.

January 2008 - Libya takes over one-month rotating presidency of the UN Security Council in a step back to respectability after decades as a pariah of the West.

August 2008 - Libya and US sign agreement committing each side to compensate all victims of bombing attacks on the other's citizens.

Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi apologises to Libya for damage inflicted by Italy during the colonial era and signs a five billion dollar investment deal by way of compensation.

September 2008 - US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice makes historic visit - the highest-level US visit to Libya since 1953. Ms Rice says relations between the US and Libya have entered a "new phase".

February 2009 - Gaddafi elected chairman of the African Union by leaders meeting in Ethiopia. Sets out ambition of "United States of Africa" even embracing the Caribbean.

June 2009 - Gaddafi pays first state visit to Italy, Libya's former colonial ruler and now its main trading partner.

August 2009 - Lockerbie bomber Abdelbaset Ali al-Megrahi is freed from gaol in Scotland on compassionate grounds and returned to Libya. His release and return to a hero's welcome causes a storm of controversy.

December 2009 - Diplomatic row with Switzerland and European Union after one of Gaddafi's sons is held in Switzerland on charges of mistreating domestic workers.

January 2010 - Russia agrees to sell Libya weapons in a deal worth $1.8bn. The deal is thought to include fighter jets, tanks and air defence systems

June 2010 - UN refugee agency UNHCR expelled.

July 2010 - US senators push for inquiry into claims that oil giant BP lobbied for Lockerbie bomber's release.

BP confirms it is about to begin drilling off Libyan coast.

October 2010 - European Union and Libya sign agreement designed to slow illegal migration.

December 2010 - US diplomatic cables published by WikiLeaks indicate that Gaddafi threatened to cut trade with Britain if Lockerbie bomber died in prison.

The anti-Muammar Quadhafi uprising

February, 2011 - Arrest of human rights campaigner sparks violent protests in eastern city of Benghazi that rapidly spread to other cities.

Following the recent uprisings, the delirious 42-year dictator of Libya jabbered, “Muammar Quadhafi is the leader of the revolution, I am not a president to step down… This is my country. Muammar is not a president to leave his post, Muammar is leader of the revolution until the end of time.” Simply stated: Muammar Quadhafi is president-for-life! He insists that he will not quit power, and remains in control of the whole Libya.

In first weeks of the uprising authorities use aircraft to attack protestors.

March 11, 2011: NATO AWACs aircraft are now monitoring aerial activity over coastal Libya. NATO warships are arriving as well.

March 17, 2011: The UN authorizes "all necessary means" to prevent the forces of Libyan dictator Muammar Quadhafi from killing Libyans. NATO navies had already been moving ships to the Libyan coast, and more are moving in. Italy has an aircraft carrier in the area and the French nuclear carrier the de Gaulle is on the way. Most warplanes are operating from bases in France, Italy and Britain.

March 19, 2011: The NATO attack on Kaddafi forces in Libya begin as twenty French warplanes (including an AWACs and several aerial tankers.) Two American destroyers and four nuclear subs (one British) launch 110 cruise missiles towards Libyan targets, mainly air defense radars and missile launchers. Some of these attacks take place after midnight, on the 20th.

March 20, 2011: Three American B-2 bombers (flying in from North America) drop concrete penetrating bombs on the fortified aircraft hangers at Libyan airbases. Fifteen U.S. F-15s and F-16s came in from European bases. The U.S. also sent over a dozen aerial refueling and electronic warfare aircraft. The growing NATO fleet offshore was coordinated by a U.S. command ship (designed and equipped for that task.) By the end of the day, NATO believed that Libyan air power and air defenses were largely (but not completely) destroyed. The only anti-aircraft missiles Kaddafi had left were SA-24's (with a max altitude of 3,500 meters/11,000 feet), Russian models similar to the U.S. Stinger.

March 21, 2011: More NATO warplanes turned their attention to Kaddafi's ground troops, who are laying siege to Ajdabiya in the east and Misarata in the west and advancing on Benghazi. The Libyan coast is largely devoid of cover for columns of trucks and armored vehicles. Despite infrequent contact with rebels forces below, American electronic monitoring aircraft have been able to identify who was below on the highway, and air attacks now go after the columns of Kaddafi troops outside these three cities. This destroys a large chunk of Kaddafi's assault troops.

March 22, 2011: A U.S. F-15E fighter-bomber crashes near Benghazi because of equipment failure. Both of the crew bail out safely and are soon picked up by a helicopter from an American carrier off the coast.

Over the last five days, the number NATO air sorties over Libya have increased from under a hundred a day to nearly 200. During that same period, the fraction of sorties flown by U.S. aircraft have come to be the majority. This is a problem in the United States, because continuing operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, and a large budget deficit, means it cannot afford to stay involved for long. So, although the U.S. organized the initial attacks, the Americans want someone else to take over command functions and, soon thereafter, provide most of the ships and aircraft. The other NATO nations, accustomed to having the Americans take the lead, and do most of the work, are unsure of how to proceed.

Quadhafi has time on his side, as the Arab League, after initially backing attacks on him, quickly changed its mind when it saw that this would not be a quick, painless, process. Moreover, most Arab League members are dictators or monarchs, and don't really like the idea of some outsiders (be they the U.S. or the UN), telling them what to do, under the threat of attack. The war may ultimately be decided by logistics. While the naval and air blockade keeps out new weapons for Kaddafi, that is not a problem for him. He has plenty of stuff already. More importantly, he holds hostage the populations of Tripoli and several other cities. NATO has to let through food and medical supplies, even though the Kaddafi troops and civilian supporters will be at the head of the line for this stuff. Unless NATO imposes a road blockade (no traffic between cities at all), Kaddafi can still move troops via sedan, SUV and van. NATO will not put troops into Libya (aside from the handful of special operations commandos already there), and dealing with the Libyan rebels is like herding cats. Kaddafi believes, with some justification, that he can wait out NATO, and work the sympathy angle via media manipulation.

The urban fighting does not benefit much from the NATO air support, mainly because there are few, if any, NATO air controllers down there to call in the extremely precise attacks required in built-up areas. While Kaddafi has thousands of men with military training, and has then formed them into well organized units, the rebels have neither. The rebels are not as united as the Kadaffi forces, and not nearly as effective when attacking (which is always more difficult than defending). Kaddafi troops still have some armored vehicles inside cities like Misarata, which are rolled out when thought safe (from attack) to attack rebel positions, or key sites like hospitals. Kaddafi has his secret police and street gangs in many cities in towns, who are able to harass the rebels, or even defeat them in some places. Kaddafi has cash and lots of promises to give out, and many Libyans with guns will listen.

March 24, 2011: Quadhafi's ground forces have quickly learned that safety from air attack comes in the form of human shields, or just getting into a residential area and some place to hide from the warplanes. But the U.S. sensors are numerous and effective. That, plus the smart bombs, keep the Quadhafi's forces vulnerable. The most effective defense is human shields, in the form of any local civilians that can be rounded up. Quadhafi's three most effective brigades are holding together under all this attack, but are shrinking each day from the casualties. Quadhafi's troops have, in effect, lost the use of their armored vehicles and artillery. But they can still move safely in the open if they drive civilian vehicles, not in large convoys, and do not communicate on any radio device.

March 25, 2011: A Canadian general has taken command of the NATO Libya force, and taken over control of the operation from the United States. However, U.S. forces tend to handle a disproportionate share of the military activities.

March 26, 2011: The U.S. has sent A-10 ground attack aircraft and AC-130 gunships to operate over Libya.

March 28, 2011: The NATO air effort has turned to Quadhafi's headquarters and munitions storage areas. His fighting forces appear to have disappeared, or gone into hiding. NATO is hoping that many of Quadhafi's troops have deserted, as there have been some reports of desertions.

March 29, 2011: Rebel forces quickly recapture Ajdabiya, Brega and Ras Lanuf, along the coast highway, and head for Kaddafi's birthplace of Sirte. NATO warplanes appear to have either destroyed all Quadhafi's armored vehicles, or forced their crews to flee.

Quadhafi insists that he will not quit, and remains in control of the capital, Tripoli.

March 30, 2011: Quadhafi's forces, using mostly machine-guns and assault rifles, ambush rebels approaching Sirte, causing a panicked retreat by the untrained and poorly led rebels. This retreat turned into a rout as rebels fled from two towns, as government forces organized an offensive that the no-fly force did not attack. Apparently, no one on the ground expected this move by Quadhafi forces. Apparently there was no coordination between the rebel forces and the NATO air force. This is what NATO leaders insist is, and will continue to be, the case. But behind the scenes, Western military leaders are pointing out that not working directly with the rebel forces will prolong the situation, aid Quadhafi's and generally do little good. Some NATO political leaders are beginning to change their minds about how to operate in Libya. So far, American aircraft have flown about sixty percent of the sorties, but only about half of the combat sorties. About 55 per-cent of the sorties are for support (reconnaissance, electronic eavesdropping, aerial refueling).

The no-fly force has been averaging 100-150 sorties a day, but demonstrated the ability to fly as many as 300 a day when such a surge is needed. About 700 missiles and smart bombs have been used so far, in addition to about 150 cruise missiles. Qatar has sent six Mirage 2000 fighters to join the UN mandated air patrol over Libya. But the Qataris are there for propaganda purposes only, The Qatari jets only patrol and don't fire at anyone. The UAE has also offered twelve warplanes to join this non-violent patrol activity. The U.S., and its allies, are reluctant to put ground forces into Libya, or supply the rebels with weapons. In short, no one wants to get really involved. But at the same time, no one wants Quadhafi to remain in power. But Quadhafi knows that many nations, e specially Russia, China and most African states, oppose this effort to remove a hated dictator. Most UN nations are run by absolute rulers who tend to identify with Quadhafi's plight, not with the rebels announced desire for a representative (or at least more representative) government. The media in these countries is already generating horror stories about imaginary air attacks on Libyan civilians. Given a few actual such attacks, and enough time, the Western and international media will pick up on all this and portray the UN approved air effort as the bad guys.

That's how it works, and Quadhafi knows it, as do Western leaders: The Quadhafi forces have military experience, better weapons and an incentive to succeed (or die). Thus, they have quickly adapted, by keeping armored vehicles off the coast road and hidden inside built-up areas. Truck have weapons and armed men kept hidden before they move into an area where the NATO surveillance can see them. The only vehicles that go on the coast road have to appear as non-military. This has enabled the government troops to ambush the disorganized rebels as they convoy of largely civilian vehicles came down the coast road to Quadhafi's hometown of Sirte (375 kilometers from Tripoli.). The rebels were then ambushed in several other towns along the highway, and pushed into a state of mass panic. The rebels fled back to Bin Jawad (626 kilometers from Tripoli.) American intel officials saw this coming. It didn't take a military genius to examine the chatter among Quadhafi forces and not notice the new tactics. But even communicating with the rebels is difficult, and convincing them to act in their own best interest is sometimes impossible. That's partly because of rebel bravado, and partly due to paranoia about these foreigners manipulating them. The U.S. and Britain are putting some more expert operatives into Libya, men who might be able to convince the rebel leaders more quickly what they must do. There are also more operatives, many of them former military, moving around in small teams to keep up with what the Quadhafi's forces are doing to avoid detection and attack from the air. These recon teams can call in air strikes, at least American ones. A major advantage Quadhafi has is the inability of the UN and NATO to come right out and say they are going to destroy his government, or even kill him. Most major political figures are coming right out and saying that the NATO massive military effort is all about protecting the Libyan people from Quadhafi, not helping the rebels put Quadhafi out of business. This, of course, is absurd. As long as Quadhafi has his armed followers, the Libyan people are at risk. But Quadhafi knows how to play the game of international politics and media spin. And Quadhafi knows he must win or die. The rebels have other options, and much less focus. Meanwhile, in areas Quadhafi still controls, his secret police have apparently been ordered to hunt down all known rebel supporters, and quietly, and secretly, kill them.

March 31, 2011: The U.S. has admitted that it has CIA operatives inside Libya. But this has been an open secret for over a week. The intel operatives from the United States, and other nations, have found that the rebel movement has a chaotic leadership. A wide range of groups (tribal, political, religious) are represented, and decisions are made in a haphazard way, often when one faction simply gets on the road and takes off (towards or away from the enemy) and, in effect, dares everyone else to follow. Some of the factions represent current and former-Islamic terrorists. You don't need CIA operatives on the ground to know this. Even before the first bombs fell, American electronic eavesdropping aircraft, and ground based data collection efforts (for Internet and other communications) were scooping up and sorting out the "chatter" being generated from Libya. The rebels were unorganized and unfocused, except for the desire to kill Kaddafi and his minions. But Kaddafi and his henchmen were much better organized and focused.

April 1, 2011: A rebel column was attacked by NATO warplanes after an anti-aircraft gun mounted on one of the rebel vehicles opened fire on a NATO aircraft overhead. The NATO pilot took that as proof that the column below was actually pro-Kaddafi and subject to attack. The anti-aircraft gunner was simply firing into the air to celebrate a recent rebel gain. Firing guns into the air is a common form of celebration throughout the Arab world. Once this was all sorted out, the rebels apologized to NATO and admonished its men to not fire in the air. The rebels avoided a violent split in their fighting forces when a dispute, over which of two military men would be leader of the rebel troops, was settled.

April 4, 2011: Rebels entered the outskirts of the oil port of Brega. U.S. warplanes cease operations over Libya. Support aircraft remain. NATO runs the show, and European nations supply most of the warplanes.

April 6, 2011: Rebels regained control of the oil port of Brega. Kaddafi has been sending representatives to European capitals, to try and work out peace deals. He prefers this to trying to negotiate with the rebels. Kaddafi considers the rebels to be ungrateful wretches, after all the Kaddafi family has done for Libya in the last four decades. Kaddafi is more comfortable dealing with foreign governments, who tend to be more polite than the ungrateful Libyans. Kaddafi troops still have some armored vehicles inside cities like Misarata, which are rolled out when thought safe (from attack) to attack rebel positions, or key sites like hospitals. Kaddafi has his secret police and street gangs in many cities in towns, who are able to harass the rebels, or even defeat them in some places. Kaddafi has cash and lots of promises to give out, and many Libyans with guns listen. The human shields are particularly useful in cities like Misarata, which is 210 kilometers east of Tripoli and has a population of 550,000. This is the third largest city (after 1.1 million Tripoli and 671,000 in Benghazi) in Libya.

Despite its proximity to Tripoli, government forces were never able to take Misarata. However, Misarata has been under siege for more than a month, and that includes many Quadhafi gunmen inside the city. Rebel leaders are now criticizing NATO for not doing enough to help defeat Quadhafi and protect the Libyan people. The U.S. was also criticized for withdrawing its warplanes. NATO is finding its bombing missions more difficult because Quadhafi forces are increasingly using civilians, especially women and children, as human shields for the movement of military vehicles, or to prevent military bases from being bombed. Some rebel leaders insist that the Quadhafi gunmen be attacked, despite the human shields. So far, NATO lawyers won't go along with that. Rebel efforts to ship oil were halted when warplanes bombed the pipeline that took the oil from the oil fields deep in the desert, to the coastal shipping facilities. Quadhafi said the warplanes were British, but they were probably Libyan. It's safer for the few remaining Libyan aircraft to fly inland, where the pipelines are, and possibly avoid being spotted by the AWACS (large radar aircraft) and fighter patrols used to enforce the no-fly zone. In Libya, having Special Forces and CIA personnel down there makes it possible to train Libyan rebels, as well as negotiate with the rebel leaders. The problem is that the rebels are divided into many factions, and have only been united (most of the time) the past few months because the Quadhafi forces were close to killing all of them several times.

But with NATO air power, and help organizing more effective military units, the immediate danger is gone. The factional differences will assert themselves. Many Libya experts believe that this is just the first stage of a multi-act civil war. Prospects for a quick and lasting peace are not good. The military ineptitude is a cultural thing. Arabs moving to the West, and joining the military there, perform as well as anyone. But back in the Old Country, putting together an effective fighting force (that needs discipline, lots of dill and training, and leaders who will lead, follow orders and do what has to be done) is very difficult. In Iraq and Afghanistan, it took years to find men who could handle the training and responsibilities. Eventually, combat units, that American troops felt confident to work with under fire, emerged. But in Libya, the locals and foreigners would like a solution within months, or less. Moreover, NATO is reluctant to put their people on the ground, although that is secretly happening more and more. Several nations have admitted they have intelligence operatives (CIA, MI6, etc) on the ground. However, when the CIA goes into situations like this, each group (usually a pair) of CIA people are accompanied by 6-12 U.S. Army Special Forces, often wearing civilian clothes. The Special Forces often have better local language and cultural knowledge skills than the CIA people (who are sometimes former/retired Special Forces) and operate more as equals than armed escorts. This kind of cooperation has been around since the CIA and Special Forces were both created, after World War II, from the same organization (the OSS, or Office of Strategic Services). The common origin created links that have remained strong ever since. It's useful for the army, giving the generals an edge when it comes to getting something out of the CIA. Helping the rebels defeat Quadhafi forces, and capture Tripoli, is very difficult. Even by Arab standards, Libyans are terrible soldiers. Heavily armed Libyan troops were once defeated by Chadian tribesmen riding around in pickup trucks, using light weapons against Libyan armored vehicles. What was most humiliating about this was that the Chadians were not considered Arabs, but sub-Saharan Africans (who are considered even less effective soldiers than Arabs.) But in this case, the Chadians were better organized and better at what they were doing, and sent the surviving Libyan troops fleeing north.

April 7, 2011: The Quadhafi clan have adapted to the presence of NATO air power, and belie ve that they can survive, and even defeat, the rebels. The initial shock of the uprising has also worn off, and the Quadhafi's now realize that exile will be difficult (too many countries want to nail them for past crimes), and that the Libyan rebels are not strong enough to take control of the western part of the country, or at least the country's largest city, Tripoli. However, long term, some kind of deal has to be worked out. That's because the rebels will gain control of the oil fields and pipelines, and the Quadhafi family has had most of its money declared stolen (from Libya) goods and foreign bank accounts have been frozen. The Quadhafi's, like tyrants everywhere, kept a lot of cash handy (as much as a few billion dollars worth). That would be sufficient to meet the payroll (for gunmen, torturers, bodyguards, servants and spies) needed to run Tripoli (and 1-2 million loyal, or simply trapped, Libyans) for a year or so. The way this works, the UN can be persuaded to send in humanitarian supplies (food and medicine) to take care of the majority of those in Tripoli, while the needed luxuries (to keep the leadership content) can be smuggled in from Algeria (which is also run by a dictatorship that is unsure of its longevity.) But, long term, Quadhafi needs cash to survive. Helping the rebels defeat Quadhafi forces, and capture Tripoli, is very difficult. Even by Arab standards, Libyans are terrible soldiers. Heavily armed Libyan troops were once defeated by Chadian tribesmen riding around in pickup trucks, using light weapons against Libyan armored vehicles.

What was most humiliating about this was that the Chadians were not considered Arabs, but sub-Saharan Africans (who are considered even less effective soldiers than Arabs.) But in this case, the Chadians were better organized and better at what they were doing, and sent the surviving Libyan troops fleeing north. The military ineptitude is a cultural thing. Arabs moving to the West, and joining the military there, perform as well as anyone. But back in the Old Country, putting together an effective fighting force (that needs discipline, lots of dill and training, and leaders who will lead, follow orders and do what has to be done) is very difficult. In Iraq and Afghanistan, it took years to find men who could handle the training and responsibilities. Eventually, combat units, that American troops felt confident to work with under fire, emerged. But in Libya, the locals and foreigners would like a solution within months, or less. Moreover, NATO is reluctant to put their people on the ground, although that is secretly happening more and more. Several nations have admitted they have intelligence operatives (CIA, MI6, etc) on the ground. However, when the CIA goes into situations like this, each group (usually a pair) of CIA people are accompanied by 6-12 U.S. Army Special Forces, often wearing civilian clothes. The Special Forces often have better local language and cultural knowledge skills than the CIA people (who are sometimes former/retired Special Forces) and operate more as equals than armed escorts. This kind of cooperation has been around since the CIA and Special Forces were both created, after World War II, from the same organization (the OSS, or Office of Strategic Services). The common origin created links that have remained strong ever since. It's useful for the army, giving the generals an edge when it comes to getting something out of the CIA. In Libya, having Special Forces and CIA personnel down there makes it possible to train Libyan rebels, as well as negotiate with the rebel leaders.

The problem is that the rebels are divided into many factions, and have only been united (most of the time) the past few months because the Kaddafi forces were close to killing all of them several times. But with NATO air power, and help organizing more effective military units, the immediate danger is gone. The factional differences will assert themselves. Many Libya experts believe that this is just the first stage of a multi-act civil war. Prospects for a quick and lasting peace are not good. Rebel efforts to ship oil were halted when warplanes bombed the pipeline that took the oil from the oil fields deep in the desert, to the coastal shipping facilities. Kaddafi said the warplanes were British, but they were probably Libyan. It's safer for the few remaining Libyan aircraft to fly inland, where the pipelines are, and possibly avoid being spotted by the AWACS (large radar aircraft) and fighter patrols used to enforce the no-fly zone. Rebel leaders are now criticizing NATO for not doing enough to help defeat Kaddafi and protect the Libyan people. The U.S. was also criticized for withdrawing its warplanes. NATO is finding its bombing missions more difficult because Kaddafi forces are increasingly using civilians, especially women and children, as human shields for the movement of military vehicles, or to prevent military bases from being bombed. Some rebel leaders insist that the Kaddafi gunmen be attacked, despite the human shields. So far, NATO lawyers won't go along with that. The human shields are particularly useful in cities like Misarata, which is 210 kilometers east of Tripoli and has a population of 550,000. This is the third largest city (after 1.1 million Tripoli and 671,000 in Benghazi) in Libya. Despite its proximity to Tripoli, government forces were never able to take Misarata. However, Misarata has been under siege for more than a month, and that includes many Quadhafi gunmen inside the city.

April 9, 2011: A rebel MiG-23 fighter took off from an airbase near Benghazi, but was quickly spotted by the no-fly patrol and approached by NATO fighters and forced to land. There is little, or, more often, no coordination between the rebels and the NATO aircraft. Efforts to establish some kind of air controller system among rebel combat units has been difficult. There is little coordination among the various armed rebel groups. Getting the rebels to organize their combat forces is like herding cats. It can be done, but it's taking a long time and is frustrating for all concerned. Kaddafi has become more aggressive in his use of human shields and hiding his weapons and troops in residential areas. In this area, U.S. intelligence experience comes in handy, as this sort of thing has been experienced often in Iraq and Afghanistan, and American analysts know most of the tricks, and the most effective countermeasures. Still, some civilians are getting killed, in order to prevent Kaddafi from moving weapons or troops close enough to cause more casualties among rebels or nearby civilians. But the American withdrawal from the lead role in the air campaign has, for the first time, forced the other NATO nations to run the kind of campaign they have long let the Americans, and they vast air power resources, take care of. But the U.S. insists that its forces have been worn down by heavy use in Iraq and Afghanistan, and that Libya is a European and Arab problem, and that those nations, in theory, have the resources to deal with it. While that is true, NATO misses the American experience and leadership in air campaigns. While the United States halted bombing missions in Libya on April 4th, there have been at least three instances since then when American warplanes, as part of their continuing electronic warfare efforts, bombed Libyan air defense systems that seemed to have survived earlier attacks. It just seemed simpler to have American F-16s follow up on the discovery of these Libyan targets by U.S. electronic warfare aircraft. Kaddafi has his secret police and street gangs in many cities and towns in western Libya, who are able to harass the rebels, or even defeat them in some places. Kaddafi has cash and lots of promises to give out, and many Libyans with guns listen.

Kaddafi does not have a lot of supporters inside Libya, but there are still many people who will take the money, and avoid Kaddafi's killers, and show some support for the dictator. For now, anyway. Kaddafi troops still have some armored vehicles inside cities like Misarata, which are rolled out when thought safe (from attack) to attack rebel positions, or key sites like hospitals. NATO has to assign a lot of its aircraft to monitor the situation around Misarata, and quickly attack any Kaddafi reinforcements approaching the city. There are still rebels active inside Tripoli and in Berber majority areas along the Tunisian border. The rebels in Misarata, a city 210 kilometers east of Tripoli, warn of growing civilian losses from Kaddafi artillery and snipers. Misarata has a population of 550,000 and is the third largest city (after 1.1 million Tripoli and 671,000 in Benghazi) in Libya. Despite its proximity to Tripoli, government forces were never able to take it. However, Misarata has been under siege for two months, and there are many Kaddafi gunmen inside the city. There have been several battles in and outside Misarata in the last week, with about a hundred rebels, government and civilian casualties a day. Kaddafi keeps trying to send more armored vehicles and troops to the city, but most of these are detected and attacked by NATO aircraft. Kaddafi has expressed some willingness to negotiate a ceasefire. But NATO quickly found that many members were very hostile to this sort of thing. There is a lot of consensus on the idea that Kaddafi must go, but not nearly as much agreement on how to make this happen. The Libyan rebels are very much opposed to any ceasefire with Kaddafi. Meanwhile, the Persian Gulf state of Qatar is believed to have already supplied some rebels groups with weapons (portable rocket launchers and Milan anti -tank guided missiles). Qatar (whose ruler founded al Jazeera) has long been aggressive in its foreign policy.

April 15, 2011: Several NATO nations have intel operatives on the ground in Libya, and the information coming back about the rebels is not encouraging. While most Libyans want Kaddafi gone, there is little unity beyond that. There are dozens of armed factions, and no unifying higher command. The good news is that the Islamic radical groups are a small part of the resistance groups. The bad news is that the Islamic radical groups (including some openly allied with al Qaeda) are in play at all. But Islamic radicals were always among those who continually resisted Kaddafi's tyranny. The worse news is that there is slow progress on rebel formation of a unified military (or political) command. This greatly complicates any efforts to supply weapons or training. Some of the rebel factions are for this, others oppose it. How do you decide who (among the willing groups) gets the weapons and training? Meanwhile, politicians of NATO countries are divided over how much aid to give the rebels. This makes NATO efforts along these lines difficult. NATO is an organization that only acts when there is a lot of consensus. Right now, there is not a lot of consensus within NATO about how far to go in supporting the Libyan rebels. At this point, it looks like individual NATO nations are likely to supply and train the more likely (to be successful) rebel factions. Since no good deeds go unpunished in this area, this support will be followed by accusations of favoritism and unwarranted intervention in Libyan affairs. But the only alternative is a long (perhaps years) of bloody stalemate between Kaddafi and the rebels. That would be accompanied by lots of stories about very bad behavior by Kaddafi's secret police, and accusations that NATO nations could have done more to aid the rebels.

April 16, 2011: Rebels leaders admit that they are receiving weapons and military equipment from NATO and Arab countries, but won't provide details (apparently on the advice of the donor nations.)

April 17, 2011: About 160 kilometers south of Benghazi, outside the town of Adjabiya, rebel fighters defeated an attack by pro-Kaddafi gunmen. This is part of a weeks long battle to clear pro-Kaddafi forces from the eastern oil fields. To the north, rebels forces continue to fight for control of the oil port of Brega.

April 18, 2011: NATO warships fired some more cruise missiles at targets in Kaddafi controlled parts of Libya.

April 19, 2011: After a month of operations, NATO has flown 2,800 sorties over Libya, 43 percent of them combat missions. In these, warplanes have used about 2,000 smart bombs and guided missiles.

April 20, 2011: Britain, France and other NATO countries have agreed to send teams of trainers to help turn rebel fighters into more capable soldiers. The trainers will also work with the senior commanders of the rebel forces, providing professional advice, and liaison with NATO leadership outside the country. Initially, each country will only send 20-30 troops. The U.S. announced that it was sending armed Predator UAVs to operate over Libya.

April 21, 2011: Near the Egyptian border, nine vehicles full of pro-Kaddafi gunmen attacked an oil pumping station 300 kilometers southwest of the port city of Tobruk. One of nine rebels guarding the station survived the attack, escaped and made it to Tobruk. Meanwhile, on the other end of the country, rebels seized the Wazin guard post on the Tunisian border and forced over 150 Libyan soldiers to flee into Tunisia. This border crossing is 200 kilometers south of the main one, that carries most of the traffic between Tripoli and Tunisia. American Predator UAVs have begun operating over Libya, and one fired its first Hellfire missile today (apparently at a government multiple-rocket launcher vehicle.) The U.S. also offered the rebels $25 million worth of protective vests and military radios. Other NATO nations made similar offers.

April 23, 2011: Government troops began withdrawing from the west Libyan city of Misarata. The retreating troops fired rockets at areas their gunmen had left, continuing the destruction of the third largest (550,000 population) city in the country. The government said this was not a retreat, but a redeployment to allow tribal gunmen to enter the city and drive the rebels out. At the moment, this is generally considered a fiction.

April 24, 2011: Kuwait gave the rebel Transitional National Council (TNC) $180 million, to pay salaries and other administrative expenses. No one outside Libya is sure of who all the members of the TNC are, or how united (or not) the key people are. There is also a risk that much of the Kuwaiti money will be stolen. Even with a revolution going on, the corruption the region is famous for continues to be a factor. Arab media continues to express dismay that it is Western, not Arab, air power that is assisting the rebels. Arab governments point out that NATO nations have more equipment and experience with modern warfare. But Arab critics point out that Egypt, Saudi Arabia and the other Gulf states have over a thousand modern jet fighters between them, and plenty of smart bombs. Here is an opportunity to use all this stuff, in a good cause. But many Arabs insist that Arab air forces aren't ready, and some even mention what many fear; that Arab pilots will reveal that they really are not ready. Arabs don't want to risk Iran finding that out.

For the last few weeks, there have been over a hundred dead and wounded a day in Misarata. Until the Libyan army forces began to withdraw, the Misarata rebels were getting increasingly desperate. They even began calling for NATO to send ground troops. This is generally opposed by most of the rebels, and the rebel leadership. Overnight, NATO warplanes bombed Kaddafi's compound in Tripoli, destroying office spaces and causing dozens of casualties. Kaddafi called it an assassination attempt. NATO estimates that the fighting in Libya has left about 10,000 dead, and over 50,000 wounded so far, most of them civilians. Kaddafi is believed to have 10-15,000 members of his security forces still in action, and about three times as many mercenaries. Most of these gunmen are used to maintain control over the two million people in western Libya. A few thousand troops and mercs are used to fight the rebels, mainly in and around Misarata. The Kaddafi forces are suffering casualties, and low morale, as a result of the continuing NATO air strikes.

Morale among government fighters is low. They know that the world, and most Libyans, are against them. That's why Kaddafi depends so much on mercenaries, who take their high pay (thousands of dollars a week) and send it home, hoping to get themselves out of Libya when the end finally comes. While Kaddafi is a proven survivor, he has never had to face this much opposition. But Kaddafi still has options. He controls much of Western Libya, and a third of the population (about two million people). He has some cash on hand (a few hundred million dollars, at least), but his overseas accounts are largely frozen by international sanctions. But Kaddafi knows he can hold the two million people he controls hostage, forcing the UN to allow "humanitarian" aid in. Kaddafi also has control of the western oil fields, but these produce only about a fifth of the nation's oil. Thus even if he is allowed to sell this oil, all he will end up with is the kind of "food for oil" deal that Saddam Hussein exploited in the 1990s. However, Kaddafi will be faced with an increasingly hostile population in Western Libya as income, and living standards, decline. Moreover, the rebels will probably succeed in halting shipments from the west Libyan oil fields. This would leave Kaddafi's two million hostages living on UN charity, meaning minimal food, medical and other aid. Thus Kaddafi's long term prospects are not good, and his most loyal followers have figured this out. The rebels insist that they have forced government troops back from Misarata through hard fighting, not some kind of deal with local tribes. Kaddafi's men have been taking a beating, especially from the NATO aircraft. But Kaddafi really can't afford to lose Misarata, because that makes the capital, Tripoli, the next rebel objective.

April 25, 2011: Kaddafi forces have warned the rebels that troops have been withdrawn from Misarata so that pro-Kaddafi tribesmen can come in and kill the rebels, and take control of the city. There are six tribes in the area which, in theory, could muster over 20,000 armed men of the desert (actually, many of them live in Misarata or in the suburbs). But some of these tribes (or large factions of them) are pro-rebel, and others are not united on the idea of some bloody urban warfare for their young men. The tribes (along with everyone else in the region) depend on the port of Misarata for many essential goods, but without cooperation from the NATO warships off the coast, the tribes will not be able to use the port for anything. The government says the rebels have until tomorrow to accept the tribal demands (to get out of Misarata) or face attack by the tribal militias. The rebels are apparently going to call Kaddafi's bluff.

April 27, 2011: NATO aircraft bombed a factory building, killing twelve rebels. It was another case of poor communications between rebels on the ground and NATO aircraft overhead. The rebels acknowledge that they have to solve the communications problem, and beef up their military leadership in general, if they are to defeat Kaddafi, and keep rebel casualties down. NATO estimates that over 20,000 people may have died in three months of Libyan violence. Most of the dead have been civilians, caught in the crossfire, or deliberately targeted by Kaddafi forces.

April 28, 2011: In the southeast, a column of Kaddafi gunmen seized the town of Kufrah, near the Chad border. In Tripoli, anti-Kaddafi demonstrations were held for the first time in several weeks. While most of Kaddafi's popular support is in western Libya, many, if not most, Libyans in Kaddafi controlled territory are anti-Kaddafi.

April 29, 2011: On the western border with Tunisia, Kaddafi forces recaptured the Dehiba-Wazin border crossing and pursued the rebels into Tunisia. This led to a brief battle with Tunisian forces. While the rebels have lost the recently captured border crossing post, they are still active in the hil l country along the Tunisian border, and the border post has changed hands several times already. Over 30,000 Libyans have fled into Tunisia to get away from the fighting along the border. Pro -

Quadhafi gunmen attacked the rebel held desert town of Jalo, south of Benghazi. At least five people were killed before the attackers fled. The column of vehicles carrying the Kaddafi forces are living off the few towns and villages in the southern desert. Most of these places have no armed rebel presence, and when the Quadhafi gunmen roll in, they can take what they want.

April 30, 2011: NATO aircraft bombed a military headquarters in Tripoli (and the bunker underneath it). Quadhafi forces immediately announced civilian casualties (a Quadhafi son and three grandchildren). NATO later called this a hoax, and that dispute has not yet been resolved. In response to the attack, Quadhafi called out his loyalists to attack and loot the empty embassies of Britain and Italy. These two countries had already withdrawn their diplomats from Libya. In the western, but rebel held, city of Misarata, Quadhafi forces fired artillery at the port, interrupting the unloading of aid ships. NATO and the rebels forces have been having a hard time finding and destroying these artillery weapons (mostly truck mounted rocket launchers). The Quadhafi forces keep them in garages and warehouses outside the city, only bringing them out to fire on the city, particularly the port area. The rockets are unguided, but accurate enough to hit populated areas, and large targets like the port facilities.

May 1, 2011: Growing unrest and lawlessness in Tripoli has persuaded the UN to remove its operations from the city. The UN will keep its staff in Benghazi, and maintain close ties with the rebels. Quadhafi appears to have a manpower shortage, and has been calling for volunteers, to take up arms, from among his civilian supporters. Quadhafi has not got a lot of civilian supporters, so teenagers, and kids as young as 11-12 are being armed and shown how to load and shoot the weapons. When it comes to controlling unarmed civilians, a 14 year old with an AK-47 can be very effective. Quadhafi also has to deal with the growing number of rebel attacks on towns between Misarata and Tripoli. The situation is fluid along the coast road, and, at different times, columns of rebel vehicles head west, and Quadhafi loyalists go east. Quadhafi has apparently ordered his supporters in other parts of the country to go out and "capture" towns and villages not occupied by armed rebels, to help reduce the pressure on Tripoli. Quadhafi keeps calling for a ceasefire, but is vague on its details. Quadhafi has so often lied in the past that he has little credibility now. Thus he is, as always, difficult to negotiate with. Meanwhile, NATO officials insist that their bombing attacks in Tripoli are not an effort to kill Muammar Quadhafi or members of his family. But these attacks do seek to kill the leaders of the Quadhafi forces, and that would be Quadhafi himself and his three sons (and other clan members). So the NATO denials are just for, well, political correctness. It's another way of saying, "we're fighting a war, but we really don't want to hurt anyone, and if we do, we are so sorry." But the trends, over time, will be a declining number of successful attacks by Quadhafi forces, and the increasing ability of the rebels to run their portion (over two-thirds) of Libya, and muster forces to take over the Quadhafi held western Libya. But getting from here to there will be messy. Quadhafi will use the civilians he controls as hostages, to extract food and other aid, and to use as human shields against NATO air power. The rebels will continue to screw up their military operations. Friendly fire casualties from NATO air strikes won’t go away for a while. Quadhafi's big edge is experience. He remained in power for so long by monopolizing security and government jobs, and only giving this work to loyal associates. Thus the rebels lack experience in many basic security and government administrative tasks. They have to put together a competent government and military command quickly, because the Quadhafi forces are taking advantage of the current rebel disorganization. The thinly populated interior, where the oil fields are, allows small columns of armed Quadhafi supporters to stage raids on isolated oil facilities (especially the pipelines and pumping stations.) Most of the oil field workforce was foreigners, who have fled. Most of the oil field management was Quadhafi loyalists, who have fled. That spotlights another problem. Like most Arab oil states, most of the dirty, or technical, work was done by foreigners, who are largely gone. This puts a lot of pressure on the few Libyans with the skills, or willingness, to take on the chores the departed foreigners took care of.

May 2, 2011: The war is a stalemate, although long term the Quadhafi forces are likely to lose. But in the meantime Quadhafi has long experience in playing the international media and foreign diplomats in general. Quadhafi has dwindling resources, and his only way out is to either make an amnesty deal (which allows him and his family to retire somewhere with some of their stolen fortune) or to re - conquer the country. Both outcomes are unlikely. Quadhafi has a bloody and well documented history as a tyrant and international troublemaker. So giving him amnesty to get him out of Libya is something a lot of diplomats, and public opinion, would vigorously resist. Defeating the rebels is possible, but only if the rebels screw up in multiple areas (don't get oil shipments going, don't use oil revenue to revive the economy, don't keep tribal and political rivalries in check, don't get their fighting forces trained, equipped and organized). The rebels could fail, and that is Quadhafi's biggest hope.

May 4, 2011: Qatar and Kuwait have pledged over $600 million in cash to help the rebels get needed suppliers to fight Quadhafi and sustain the civilian population. The rebels say they will run out of cash at the end of the month, and need $2-3 billion immediately to keep their government going. The UN is seeking war crime indictments against Quadhafi and his key aides, using the attacks on civilians as the main evidence. France has announced that it does not want to kill Muammar Quadhafi, just weaken is armed forces and halt the attacks on civilians in Libya.

May 5, 2011: Quadhafi forces are using Chinese made cluster bomb warhead on rockets fired in Misarata. The bomblets are anti-vehicle mines, which descend by parachute and just lie about waiting for a vehicle to run over them. If drivers don't watch out for these little nasties, they will have wheels blown off, and vehicles wrecked. Quadhafi gathered several hundred tribal elders in Tripoli, as a show of support from the tribes. This was mostly for show. The tribal leadership is being very cautious when it comes to openly supporting Quadhafi. Here is where the NATO air power becomes a major factor. NATO knows where the tribes are, and can bomb assets and cut roads from the air. The tribes want to come out of all this unrest with as little damage as possible, and if that means showing up in Tripoli for a photo-op, so be it.

May 6, 2011: In Misarata, Quadhafi forces set fire to fuel storage tanks, causing a huge, smoky, fire. NATO governments announced that they would seek to transfer Quadhafi's cash, currently frozen in accounts in foreign banks, to the Libyan rebels. There's believed to be up to $60 billion worth of this, money stolen from Libya by Quadhafi, his family and cronies. Quadhafi announced that he would fight this, with lawyers, and he will probably be able to delay use of this cash by the rebels (who say they need at least $6 billion a year to run the two-thirds of Libya they control). The U.S. says it will deal with the Quadhafi lawyers, but that remains to be seen

May 9, 2011: UK Collaborated With Muammar al-Quadhafi On Rendition of Libyan dissidents’

May 9, 2011: The government announced that some rebels had surrendered in Misarata, and some had also "confessed" to their crimes against the Quadhafi government. The rebels denied any surrenders, and later announced they had driven Quadhafi forces out of the city. This is seen as another effort by Quadhafi propagandists to portray the rebels as "evil pawns of Western infidels." Quadhafi wants to try and generate some street level support in the Arab world, because he has angered most Arab leaders over the last few decades. In Misarata, Quadhafi forces moved on the main airport, and this led to a large battle with rebel gunmen. But NATO is making improvements in rebel capabilities every day. Communications systems between NATO aircraft and rebel commanders on the ground have been improvised. The flow of information between NATO and the rebels is getting more reliable. This increases the accuracy of NATO bombing, and lessens friendly fire casualties among the rebels. NATO trainers and advisors are concentrating on the rebel leadership, improving communications with NATO, and rebel commanders ability to keep in touch with rebel troops. It's not just a matter of using existing radios, but showing the rebels how to use this stuff most effectively. Some Arab countries are being very helpful to the rebels. Kuwait has set up a refugee assistance operation in Tunisia, as thousands of Berber civilians flee Libya each day. Qatar is acting as a broker for oil the rebels can ship out of Libya. Quadhafi is forbidden to sell any oil he can ship. Warships block access to any ports Quadhafi controls.

Columns of armed Quadhafi supporters continue to operate in the southern desert, attacking rebel held towns, especially those containing oil facilities (pumping stations for the pipelines). The rebels have largely managed to keep the raiders out, but have been unable to track down and destroy them. These columns (a dozen or more vehicles full of armed men) are hard to find in the desert, and the NATO air force does not have enough aircraft to watch the desert and hit the targets along the coast, where most of the fighting is taking place.

Time would appear to be on Quadhafi's side, but it isn't. Quadhafi feels that if he can keep the rebels from expanding into western Libya, NATO support will wane (wars become more unpopular the longer they go on). But that support won't disappear quickly enough, as Quadhafi is under siege by NATO air and naval forces in Tripoli. Quadhafi has land access to Algeria (run by a pro-Quadhafi dictatorship) and, far to the south, Niger (which is not as pro-Quadhafi, but is not hostile either). The Algerian access is via desert roads, to the south of the Tunisian (run by anti-Quadhafi rebels) border. Quadhafi has control of Tripoli, and its million residents, but not much else. Even many people in Tripoli are hostile to Quadhafi and there are armed rebels operating in the suburbs. But Quadhafi has thousands of armed and ruthless followers, including many mercenaries who will keep killing as long as they get paid. These, Quadhafi apparently believes, can be used to persuade the rebels to accept a ceasefire. The rebels also have problems policing and supplying the five million or so Libyans they are responsible for. Who wins this war depends a lot on the ability to keep food on the table and the lights on. Too many unhappy civilians makes a peace deal with Quadhafi more likely, and that would lead to the partition of Libya, and the continuation of Quadhafi's power, and appetite for revenge and terrorist mayhem. Everyone wants Quadhafi gone, but Quadhafi and his followers are ruthless and clever survivors. There won't be any easy victories here.

As the old saying goes, "amateurs study tactics, professionals study logistics," the war in Libya will be won by the side that can best deal with obtaining and distributing goods to their civilian populations. Quadhafi, and Tripoli, are cut off by a NATO sea and air blockade. Already, there is growing tension in Tripoli between Quadhafi's supporters (who get more stuff, especially fuel) and everyone else.

Quadhafi always had enemies in Tripoli, and the worsening supply situation is creating more. Quadhafi is trying to use shortages to retake Misarata, as his gunmen in the city use rockets, artillery, machine-guns and mines to interfere with the movement of supplies into the port and through the city. This effort is causing growing misery in the city. The NATO aircraft overhead can bomb what they can see, but you can't see everything from way up there. The final battles are fought at ground level.

The reluctance to get involved has left the rebels at a disadvantage on the ground, despite the NATO air support. That's because there are a lot of rebel-held areas in western Libya, some quite close to Quadhafi held Tripoli. It's been difficult for the rebels to supply, reinforce, or even communicate with these many separate rebel groups. Outside Tripoli, in the mountains, Berbers hold out against Quadhafi troops. The Berbers have always been hostile to non-Berber Quadhafi and are currently taking most of the casualties in the battle against Quadhafi The Berber-held towns of Zintan and Yafran, southwest of Tripoli, are a messy battlefield, with lots of places for government artillery and rocket launchers to hide. It's a hit-and-run war up in the hills, and the rebels are able to get supplies from nearby Tunisia. But it's a war Quadhafi is winning, at least in terms of the number of rebel fighters and civilians he is killing. NATO has established radio contact with some of the Berber rebels, and is getting reports of where Quadhafi forces, especially their vehicles and ammo, are kept. NATO aircraft have begun hitting those targets. Air strikes on Quadhafi's military headquarters and other bases in Tripoli continue. While NATO insists it is not trying to kill Quadhafi, bombs constantly seem to hit places where Quadhafi has just been.

May 10, 2011: Although NATO countries have said they would support the Libyan rebels, there's been no rush to deliver weapons. Moreover, NATO says that it will only deliver weapons suitable for "self-defense." It's unclear what that means, but the rebels admit that they have not received any weapons yet. Moreover, there are apparently fewer than fifty NATO trainers and advisers actually in Libya. NATO countries are reluctant to be drawn into a ground war, and that means no one wants to send in a lot of trainers, or let them get anywhere near the fighting. NATO media advisors warn that video of NATO troops training Libyan rebels could be used by Quadhafi's propagandists to accuse the West of "invading an Arab state."

May 17, 2011: An increasing number of Quadhafi supporters, of all sorts, are reconsidering their allegiance. In short, there are far more people going over to the rebels than the other way around. The basic situation is that Quadhafi is cut off from the world and being pounded by NATO aircraft, as rebel ground forces keep pressing in. NATO lawyers are talking war crimes trials for Quadhafi, and many of those close to him don't want to be dragged into that. Another incentive to physically get away from Quadhafi is his threat to use his supporters as human shields outside buildings and military bases threatened by NATO air attack. Most Quadhafi supporters are in Tripoli and people there know that the NATO air strikes are very precise and cause few civilian casualties. They know that Quadhafi's Information War campaign to stop the bombing, by deceiving the world into believing that NATO is killing large number of civilians, will fail. The rebels smell victory, and will not agree to a ceasefire or truce. So the defections will continue and increase. And so will the bombing. There is another, less visible, war going on, where NATO (including U.S.) intelligence forces keep track of Quadhafi forces and supporters, to determine which of them will be missed the most, and bomb these key targets. This target selection process has been around since World War II, and has grown more powerful, and effective, as the decades rolled by. But for it to work best, it is done in secret. The decisions are only revealed when the bombs hit, and sometimes not even then (when some less valuable targets are hit to deceive the enemy). The new targets include oil supplies and government buildings. Some Quadhafi forces, that have moved outside Tripoli to escape the bombers, have been hunted down by intelligence collection aircraft and satellites, and bombed wherever they are. For example, the Berbers, living in the mountains to the south (that rise abruptly from the coastal plain that Tripoli sits on), are organized and hostile to Quadhafi. Efforts to control the Berbers have been a growing drain on Quadhafi's military forces. This is important, because the Benghazi based rebels, advancing along the coastal road are getting closer, partly because of Quadhafi forces being distracted by the armed and dangerous Berbers. The rebels have been putting together a new government (currently the TNC, or Transitional National Council), and this includes replacing the pro-Quadhafi civil servants who fled, or were ousted (for bad behavior like corruption or incompetence). But the rebels are a diverse and contentious collection. Some are Islamic radi cals who want a religious dictatorship. This scares away foreign nations who might otherwise provide more military and economic aid, as well as diplomatic recognition. The rebels have gotten organized enough to send representatives abroad to try and convince the world that Libya won't turn into another Iran or Afghanistan. But that danger is real, and a lot of Libyans are worried about this as well. The fighting has, so far, caused 800,000 Libyans (12 per-cent of the population) to flee their homes. Over 90 per-cent of those have fled the country. Libyans are very dependent on imports (paid for with oil revenue). The rebels have emphasized restoring the use of ports. Misarata is handling more ship traffic, despite Quadhafi forces trying to plant naval mines or send in speedboats loaded with explosives. But as long as Quadhafi isn't getting much economic help, and the rebels are, the rebels are going to win.

May 24, 2011: NATO forces have waged a massive, but largely unreported, intelligence campaign against the Quadhafi forces. Using agents on the ground, and data collecting aircraft, satellites and ships, key information is assembled. This includes the identities of locations, individuals and groups that make the Quadhafi combat forces work. Increasingly, these targets are being bombed, and then hit again if BDA (Bomb Damage Assessment) reveals that total destruction was not achieved. These attacks have increased in frequency and accuracy in the last few days, and are hitting mobiles units as well as bases (especially those containing vehicles, warships or fuel and maintenance facilities). Since taking over (from the U.S.) on March 31st, NATO controlled aircraft have flown 7,585 sorties (38 percent by armed aircraft sent to attack Quadhafi forces or facilities.) The rest of the sorties were for support, mostly intelligence (collecting information) or logistics (aerial refueling or moving supplies). All this averages over 150 sorties per day. Estimates are that over 20,000 have died so far (in the last three months), most of them civilians killed by Quadhafi forces. Quadhafi secret police still has members secretly operating in rebel held territory. The phone system is still functioning in most of the country, and this enables these agents to get orders from, and report to, their headquarters in Quadhafi-held Tripoli. The rebels are increasingly effective in hunting down these agents, possibly because of Western intelligence collecting and analysis assistance. Quadhafi loyalists monopolized intelligence work for decades, and the rebels have few people with skills in this area. But the rebels are getting better, as they have access to NATO experts, training and communications and intelligence resources. Quadhafi, on the other hand, is seeing his communications under constant attack. Despite proclamations to the contrary, NATO airstrikes are targeting Quadhafi and his key aides. So Quadhafi has to spend more time just finding a safe place to be. Outside supporters are encountering more dissention within the rebel movement. This is fairly common during rebellions, as the government side has forged an alliance to get into power in the first place. The rebels are usually numerous factions and interest groups. These were often purposely kept divided by the government to keep the opposition weak. Uniting, while fighting, is always a difficult process, and has been for thousands of years.

Libya is still exporting oil, but only about 20 percent of what it normally ships. Only the rebels are getting oil out of the country, and are having trouble with UN sanctions interfering with the sale (as the UN lawyers did not draw up sanctions that recognized the possibility of a civil war.) Quadhafi's oil minister defected about ten days ago, fleeing to Tunisia and reaching out to his contacts in OPEC and the UN. This exposes more of Quadhafi's overseas assets to detection and seizure. Quadhafi's effort to portray the fighting as a Western crusade against Islam has been largely dispelled by increasingly vocal rebel support from Moslem states. Turkey has become very active in supporting the rebels and urging Quadhafi to give up. Quiet efforts continue to convince Quadhafi to make a deal, and surrender. Quadhafi wants immunity, which many nations and pressure groups are not willing to allow. Meanwhile, the rebels get closer to Tripoli each day, and shortages of everything increase in Quadhafi held territory. Ultimately, Quadhafi is going to lose. France and Britain are sending attack helicopters, about a dozen from each nation, and apparently to operate off aircraft carriers and amphibious assault ships (that look, and operate, like small aircraft carriers). This will enable more accurate attacks to be made, but also imply better communications with rebel fighters on the ground.

The rebellion has split the population, with many Libyans sticking with Quadhafi for purely practical (usually economic) reasons. Quadhafi had created an informant system decades ago, that established Quadhafi loyalists at the lowest levels throughout the country. Many of those paid (not always with cash) informants fled the rebels, or changed sides, but in western Libya, this network of Quadhafi loyalists remained largely intact. In the rest of the country, there are pockets of Quadhafi supporters. Rebels are seeking these government loyalists, as many are killers, as well as informers. Some captured Quadhafi soldiers say they were ordered to rape women as a part of their effort to terrorize the rebels, particularly in the western (but largely rebel-held) city of Misarata. The cell phones of dead and captured Quadhafi soldiers also shows more evidence of widespread rape of women believed connected with the rebels.

May 27, 2011: Russia has withdrawn its support for Quadhafi, the last major power to do so.
Quadhafi now has no one in the UN, or any other major diplomatic forum, to defend his interests.

May 30, 2011: The president of South Africa Jacob Zuma, who has long been on good terms with the Libyan leadership, has arrived in Tripoli to help arrange peace talks, to give Quadhafi an opportunity to give up the fight. But Quadhafi said he was only interested in a ceasefire. The bombing, which keeps hitting targets where Quadhafi is believed to be, is something Quadhafi wants to stop. The NTC (National Transitional Council) controls most rebel activities, but its 31 unelected members are under growing pressure to hold elections and restore peacetime conditions to rebel held areas (which is now most of the country). Most NTC members, however, refuse to hold elections as long as Quadhafi is alive, or still in the country. The longer the civil war goes on, the more resistance there is to NTC rule in rebel-controlled areas. The oil fields controlled by the rebels are still not pumping oil. This is because columns of pro-Quadhafi gunmen are still roaming around, threatening to kill any rebel civilians they encounter. This means that rebel oil workers fear to man isolated facilities, especially along the pipelines. There is also a shortage of skilled oil workers, as most of those, as is common in Arab countries, were foreigners, and nearly all foreigners fled once the fighting began. The rebels must bring enough law and order to the oil facilities before foreign workers can be brought back. The legal obstacles to selling rebel controlled oil appear to have been solved. At least one cargo was bought by an American firm. The search for Libyan assets overseas has found over $50 billion so far, most of it in accounts controlled by the Quadhafi family. The rebels have to deal with some legal obstacles before they can take possession of this money. The rebels need cash, because Libya has long run on oil money, and the food and other goods it could buy abroad and import. Westerners have been seen working with rebel fighters in combat areas. The foreigners are giving tactical advice, and apparently directing air strikes by NATO aircraft overhead. This prompt and accurate availability of air support has caused Quadhafi forces to avoid direct combat with the rebels. Instead, the Quadhafi forces use their artillery and tank cannon to fire on rebel-held areas, and small groups of Quadhafi gunmen make raids (riding in civilian vehicles to avoid being identified from the air.) The rebels have sent their own columns of armed men to seek out and destroy the Quadhafi raiders. So far, those encountered appeared to be mostly African mercenaries. NATO aircraft have begun making daytime bombing raids on Tripoli, especially on targets that are symbolic of Quadhaf's power. An example of this was smart bombs bringing down the guard towers on the walls of the large fortress in the middle of Tripoli. This is where Quadhafi lives, and many of his key aides come to work. Despite defections, Quadhafi's forces are still formidable. The mercenaries will fight as long as they are paid, and Quadhafi has enough cash to keep that going for months, if not longer. The rebels are still basically civilians with guns. But more of these rebel fighters are getting a few weeks of real military training from Libyan army veterans, and foreign "civilians" (either veterans working as contractors, or special operations troops in civilian clothes). The rebel fighters are gaining more combat experience, and that is producing effective combat leaders as well. But the rebels still face a long and bloody fight to take Tripoli, unless Quadhafi, or most of his henchmen, can be persuaded to make peace.

May 31, 2011: Increasing numbers (hundreds so far) members of the armed forces are defecting to the rebels. This has included at least five generals. The defectors believe that Quadhafi is doomed in the long run and that most Libyan soldiers are hostile to Quadhafi's attacks on civilians. The use of mercenaries for a lot of this dirty work has been unpopular among Libyan troops, and helped turn many of Quadhafi's civilian supporters against him. There are more protests in Tripoli, indicating that Quadhafi is losing popular support in the city that was always his main source of power and trusted personnel. There is also apparently a lot more accurate, and reliable, target information coming from inside Tripoli. A lot more targets inside Tripoli are being hit, and they are nearly all things valuable (in a military or personal sense) to Quadhafi.

June 4, 2011: British and French helicopter gunships have begun hitting targets along the coast. The gunship pilots are more accustomed to dealing with commanders on the ground and, of course, the helicopters can hover. But not for long. The helicopters are operating from carriers offshore and that means they can linger over the battlefield for about half an hour, before returning to refuel and rearm. Fixed wing warplanes can refuel in the air and stick around longer.

June 5, 2011: Rebel forces in the western mountains (inland from Tripoli and its 2.5 million people) have driven pro-Quadhafi forces from these highlands, especially the few towns the Quadhafi forces held. These mountains are largely inhabited by Berbers, the original inhabitants of the region. Berbers don't like Arabs in general, and Quadhafi in particular.

June 6, 2011: Quadhafi TV broadcasting facilities were bombed and shut down. This had been called for since the beginning of the violence. An official pro-Quadhafi website is still operating. The NATO blockade force off Libya has been ordered to increase restrictions on what ships can enter or leave Quadhafi controlled ports (there are six of them in western Libya). There is an air blockade as well, and Algeria has agreed to join Tunisia and discourage overland smuggling of whatever Quadhafi might want. Egypt (and the Niger, Chad and Sudan to the south) officially forbid aid to Quadhafi, but the smugglers in those nations have huge, unguarded, borders they can cross. These smugglers move truckloads of goods, going more than a thousand kilometers over deserts. So stuff is still getting in, but not a lot of it, and not quickly.

June 7, 2011: NATO launched its largest number of daylight bombing attacks on Tripoli. This caused the streets to empty of traffic and pedestrians, but the only damage was of government and military compounds. The rebels are having a serious, but largely unseen, battle with lawyers and diplomats trying to get access to Libyan government money and other assets. While foreign nations have frozen most of these assets (a lot of it cash), this was done largely to keep Quadhafi from it, not allow the rebels access. The legal procedures needed to get the rebel NTC (National Transitional Council) recognized as the official owner of these assets, takes time. Meanwhile, the rebels are having increasing difficulties covering their costs. Some of these expenses include hiring contractors, most of whom are involved in support functions. British and French firms are supplying most of these personnel. Quadhafi on the other hand, has been caught freeing and arming criminals to fight (not very well) for him. Many of Quadhafi closest aides are defecting. Many of his low level supporters are fleeing as well, especially when Quadhafi is unable to supply food or other necessities. But NATO is concerned about the rebel NTC, and whether it will produce a democracy, another dictatorship, or an extended civil war. The rebels are also rounding up pro-Quadhafi people, and often treating them harshly. In part, this is because these men have been setting off bombs and killing people in rebel territory. There's not been a lot of this violence, but enough to be noticed, and that has led to more efforts to find Quadhafi supporters. There are also "red lines" in Tripoli, protecting most of the city, especially neighborhoods known to be anti-Quadhafi. It's believed that NATO is receiving some target information from these neighborhoods. The increased strikes on Quadhafi targets in Tripoli has made anti-Quadhafi forces in Tripoli bolder, and much more optimistic that the dictator will soon be gone. The rebel supporters in Tripoli need all the encouragement they can get, because Quadhafi's secret police have arrested thousands of people, tortured hundreds and apparently executed many of these. This is all an effort to find rebel spies, and discourage anti-Quadhafi demonstrations. But the spies and demonstrators are still at it. Currently, some rebel columns are within 70 kilometers of Tripoli, and the "Battle for Tripoli" is expected to start soon. Quadhafi has been recently talking about "fighting to the death" and "never surrendering." This has encouraged the rebels, as it indicates that even Quadhafi knows the end is near, and that he does not expect to survive it. NATO has established a safety system with rebel troops. In effect, there is a "red line" that, on one side, NATO aircraft will attack any armed men. On the other (rebel) side, they will not. The only exceptions are the few NATO air controllers on the ground, who can identify an enemy target anywhere, and call in a missile or smart bomb attack. Rebel troops are frustrated by the new system, which requires that they constantly call back to Benghazi to report their current position and their next objective. The growing number of rebel units (columns of dozens of vehicles carrying hundreds of fighters and supplies) means that there is not always a NATO warplane available before the rebel unit wants to advance, and move the "red line" west a bit. Once rebel headquarters calls in to confirm that the red line has been moved west, the rebels can attack. If the Quadhafi forces quickly retreat, which often happens, the rebels must halt when they hit the red line. By now, the rebels know that if they cross the red line, a NATO aircraft might show up unexpectedly (perhaps because its primary target in Tripoli was destroyed earlier than expected) and bomb them. The Quadhafi forces, out of necessity, are much more skilled at staying out of sight. So the rebel units halt at the "red line" and complain, but at least there are far fewer friendly fire losses.

June 8, 2011: In the last week, NATO air strikes have concentrated on targets in and around Tripoli. It appears that the NATO goal is to destroy Kaddafi's key assets (communications, weapons and ammo supplies) and, unofficially, kill Kaddafi and his key aides (including his sons). NATO aircraft have flown over 4,000 sorties in the last 12 weeks. At least a fifth of these missions are for collecting visual and electronic information on what Kaddafi forces are up to. The primary, and very unofficial, target is Kaddafi himself. But anyone expressing any degree of control is being identified, located and bombed. This tells Kaddafi that the smart bombs are closing in.

June 14, 2011: Government forces fired five 107mm rockets into Tunisia, causing no damage. Tunisia responded by sending an F-5 jet fighter to fly along the border, along with a military helicopter. NATO has agreed to keep the Libyan campaign going another three months. The first three months end March 18th. More nations are recognizing the NTC (National Transitional Council) at the legitimate government of Libya. Sort of. The NTC controls most rebel activities, but its 31 unelected members are recognized only because it is understood that there will be elections as soon as the pro-Kaddafi forces are defeated. That may take a few more months, or longer. The defection of senior Kaddafi officials has not worked out well. The officials demanded the usual goodies (immunity, money and sanctuary), but refused to publically denounce their old boss. NATO is now inclined to nail them all with prosecution and prison for crimes committed while in Kaddafi's service. Meanwhile, Kaddafi is trying to work out a deal. The rebels are closing in and, from Kaddafi's perspective, the end is near. Cut off by a land, sea and air blockade, and with nearly every nation on the planet against him, Kaddafi can either die fighting, or make the best surrender deal he can. Kaddafi has always been resourceful and unpredictable, so it's unclear what he will do ne xt. In the east, government troops holding parts of Brega, a port for oil shipments in the east (160 kilometers south of Benghazi) refuse to surrender, and killed 21 rebels when they pretended to surrender, then opened fire. The rebels are quite angry about this. The coast road passes through the dozens cities and large towns that contain over 80 percent of the country's population. Most Libyans live and work along the coastal highway. That's where most of the war is being fought. The war is also being negotiated. As each new town is approached by the rebels, negotiators have to meet with local tribal leaders, to work out how damage to tribal member's property will be avoided and what help, if any, the tribesmen will give the rebels. Many of the west Libyan tribes have long been Kaddafi allies. But Kaddafi was an unreliable patron, and often turned on his tribal clients. So many tribal leaders are willing to negotiate a new deal with the rebels. The offensive along the coast road isn't just one force pushing another along the 1,822 kilometer coastal highway. There are pockets of rebel and government troops all along the highway, although most of the road is controlled by rebels. The government stronghold is in the west, in and around the capitol, Tripoli. Rebels are advancing on Tripoli from the east, west and the south. Off the coast are NATO warships. The mainly Berber rebels are coming from the mountains south of the capital. These rebels have taken the town of Kikla, which is 150 kilometers southwest of Tripoli. Along the coast road, rebels are fighting to take Zlitan, which is 160 kilometers east of Tripoli. But rebels are also fighting in Zawiyah, which is only 40 kilometers west of Tripoli. This town has been fought over for weeks, and the rebels are winning. There is a debate within NATO over whether the bombers should concentrate on getting Kaddafi (a "decapitation" strategy) or provide maximum support for rebel troops. The latter strategy minimizes rebel losses, but the war will continue as long as Kaddafi is alive. But decapitation doesn't always work, because Kaddafi isn't running things all by himself. He has family (especially his sons) and many henchmen. All of these guys are guilty in the eyes of the rebels, and could still keep the fight going. What is most likely to bring rebel victory is the blockade, which stops everything except food and medicine from getting to the population under Kaddafi's control. The fighting interrupts the distribution of these essential supplies, and most Libyans blame Kaddafi for the resulting privation. That anger, more than rebel bullets or NATO bombs, could be the end of Kaddafi. After a three day lull, NATO aircraft are again hitting targets in Tripoli. Despite the NATO nations involved with the Libya operation owning thousands of warplanes, various logistical and support shortages means only about 150 sorties a day can be put over Libya. And only about half of these are bombers. NATO originally planned to deliver 300 sorties a day. They might have done that if the better prepared Americans had stayed, but the U.S. is angry at NATO for coming up short in Afghanistan and always expecting America to come in and do most of the work and handle most of the criticism. While American aircraft are still supplying dozens of sorties a day

(most of them aerial refueling to electronic warfare), it's up to the other NATO states to supply the bombers. As more rebels get organized and go to war, they all demand air support. There isn't enough to go around. The United States will eventually get blamed for that, but for the moment, NATO is taking the heat.

June 15, 2011: Government forces have been pushed back from the western city of Misarata (which is 200 kilometers east of Tripoli). Depending on how determined government troops and mercenaries are along the coast road, the rebels could be fighting in Tripoli in a few weeks. As government forces are pushed back from Misarata, they are firing their artillery and rockets at the city while they still can. NATO aircraft are dropping leaflets on government troops holding towns along the coast road between Misarata and Tripoli. The leaflets urge the troops to surrender or flee, otherwise they are likely to be killed by NATO smart bombs or rebel fighters. The rebels have more enthusiasm than skill, but the smart bombs have a scary reputation. The leaflets also mention French and British helicopter gunships. These have been around for about a week, and they are also scary, what with their autocannon and guided missiles.

June 22, 2011: Rebels have turned their attention towards clearing out pro-Kaddafi forces outside of Tripoli. These gunmen are still outside Misarata, holding the eastern city of Sirte and operating in the desert south. Rebel forces are fighting in Zliten, which is 60 kilometers west of Misarata and 130 kilometers from Tripoli. Berber rebels are holding onto the mountains south of Tripoli, and ready to advance on the city 150 kilometers to the north. NATO air strikes are chewing up the Kaddafi forces coming from Tripoli, across the coastal plain, to the mountains. Depending on how numerous the Berber rebels become, and how weak the Kaddafi forces get, the Berber advance could happen within a week, or more than a month. Dealing with the largely amateur Berber force, it's hard to make precise plans. In Tripoli, the rebels are organizing and reinforcing their armed followers. These rebels harass Kaddafi forces and provide target information for NATO bombers. Kaddafi's supporters in Tripoli are numerous enough to organize some demonstrations for the media. But in most neighborhoods, the talk is of when Kaddafi will be gone. Kaddafi is trying to hang on and play world public opinion. Kaddafi apparently seeks to partition Libya, keeping control of Tripoli and the west Libyan oil fields. But the oil is far to the south of Tripoli, and the area is largely inhabited by Berbers, who are hostile to Kaddafi. The Berbers are armed and organized and have chased most Kaddafi gunmen to the edge of the mountains. Kaddafi has ordered his troops to keep the Berbers in the mountains south of Tripoli, and the fighting has been vicious. The Kaddafi forces have been accused of using landmines, and firing rockets on civilians. The rebels and Kaddafi forces are stalemated between Misarata and Tripoli. But each day the Kaddafi forces get weaker (from NATO bombings, declining morale and the NATO blockade), while the rebels, who can export oil and import whatever they want, get stronger. Most importantly, the rebel forces continue to receive more training, and gain experience in combat. The rebel government is having problems with its finances. Partly this is inexperience, partly it is having to build a government from scratch. Some rebel leaders blame NATO, but more observant rebel leaders understand that the problems are internal, and that's where the solutions will have to come from. NATO and Arab nations have offered financial and economic aid, but with an eye towards insuring that the cash does not disappear into a secret overseas bank account. Those precautions slow things down a bit. So far, there have been about 13,000 air missions flown over Libya, although only about 40 percent were air strikes against Kaddafi forces. The rest were reconnaissance, air refueling and transport. This intense recon operation is necessary to track down Kaddafi forces. These guys have learned to adapt to all that aerial oversight. Recently, for example, rockets were fired into Misarata for the first time in several weeks. This was mainly for harassment, and a way to make it clear that Kaddafi troops could go just about anywhere. But there is a cost, as NATO warplanes destroy dozens of Kaddafi targets daily, some of which are vehicles sneaking around in the night. This sort of thing is dangerous for the rebels, who must keep NATO informed of where the good guys are at all times, otherwise, they will get attacked. For the first time in three months, a NATO aircraft has been lost over Libya.

NATO admitted that it lost contact with a MQ-8 Fire Scout helicopter UAV recently. Back in March, an F-15E had a mechanical problem and crash landed in the desert. The two man crew was quickly picked up by helicopter. While the NATO pilots get combat pay, the losses have been more similar to an extended training mission than to a combat zone. But there is danger. Not all of Kaddafi's major anti-aircraft missile systems have been accounted for. NATO electronic recon aircraft constantly monitor the area for signs that a Kaddafi air defense radar has gone back into action. These radars would be quickly destroyed in that case, but until the NATO anti-radar missiles hit, aircraft would be at risk. NATO airstrikes are split between aiding rebel forces in contact with Kaddafi troops, and attacking Kaddafi bases (headquarters, vehicle parks, ammo and fuel storage sites). Kaddafi has responded by moving his headquarters, vehicles and military supplies into mosques, hospitals and residential neighborhoods. NATO can still use smart bombs (especially laser guided ones) to hit the military targets without harming civilians. But occasionally the smart bombs miss their targets, and surrounded by human shields, Kaddafi is getting the civilian deaths he seeks. Kaddafi's media specialists make the most out of the handful of civilian deaths in Tripoli, and distracted foreign media from the far larger number of civilians killed by Kaddafi forces (via artillery fire into cities and ground fire against civilians). Over 95 percent of the civilian deaths have been caused by Kaddafi's troops, while NATO bombings so rarely injure civilians that any such incident is big news. Defecting Kaddafi fighters, and those captured, confirm that Kaddafi had ordered terrorism to be used to persuade rebellious populations to give up the fight. The terror attacks included deliberately firing arti llery into residential neighborhoods and raping any rebel civilian women encountered.

June 25, 2011: In a major morale boost for the rebels, 17 football (soccer) stars denounced Kaddafi and joined the rebels. This included four members of the national team. Football is a big deal in Libya, and the best players now back the rebels. Kaddafi had long lavished money and other goodies on the star football players, which is why these guys stood by the dictator for so long.

June 27, 2011: The ICC issued arrest warrants for Moamar Kaddafi, his son (Saif al Islam Kaddafi, who has acted as chief-of-staff over the last few months) and intelligence chief Abdullah al Senussi, for war crimes. This makes it difficult to end the fighting by offering Kaddafi safe passage to exile (Venezuela and North Korea might accept him, but getting there could be a problem). While the ICC has arrested, and even tried, some people in its eight years of existence, it has never actually convicted anyone. NATO announced that it would not execute the arrest warrant the ICC (International Criminal Court) had issued for Moamar Kaddafi. The NATO UN mandate is to protect civilians from Kaddafi's killers, but their unofficial goal is to kill Kaddafi and force his followers to stop fighting.

June 28, 2011: Rebels advanced out of the western mountains onto the plains near the Algerian and Tunisian borders, southwest of Tripoli, and captured a major military base at Ghaaa. This was where Kaddafi stored much of the munitions he had bought over the last four decades. Most of this stuff was too old to safely use. The base had been bombed by NATO aircraft, but the munitions are stored in concrete bunkers, thus limiting the spread of fires and explosions. Lots of useful munitions, and some weapons, were still available. The rebels also captured nearly a hundred vehicles with which to haul the stuff away. There were only about a hundred Kaddafi troops guarding the base, and they fled to another base when the rebels attacked at night. Nearby Kaddafi bases reorganized their nighttime security, and defeated similar rebel attacks. The rebels have a big advantage with NATO airpower. This means several hundred smart bombs or missiles are available each day, to hit Kaddafi forces. This has been going on for over three months, and the pro-Kaddafi fighters and mercenaries will often retreat rather than face the deadly accuracy of the NATO bombs. Kaddafi has handed out over a million weapons (rifles, pistols, machine-guns, mortars and RPGs) to followers in western Libya. Some of those people have switched sides, but there are still many who support Kaddafi (for tribal or economic reasons). In urban areas, these gunmen can leave one neighborhood, to evade NATO bombs, and show up in another within hours. Thus the seemingly endless fighting in western towns like Misarata and Zawiya. It will be the same once the rebels enter Tripoli, the biggest city in the country. The number of Libyan refugees in Tunisian refugee camps is now over 22,000. The number coming across the border has declined as local rebels push Kaddafi troops away from the border.

June 29, 2011: Given the rate at which rebels are pushing back Kaddafi troops, and the effects of the air and sea blockade of Kaddafi controlled western Libya, Kaddafi is not expected to last more than three months. Kaddafi now has a goal. If he can hang on into October, the coalition fighting him might fall apart, enabling some kind of peace deal that would partition the country. But with the embargo and war crimes indictments, that is unlikely. Kaddafi is a fugitive in his own capital, constantly moving to avoid NATO bomb attacks. U.S. and NATO intelligence, using rebel sympathizers, is constantly updating their map of who is where in Tripoli. While military targets have priority, a suspected Kaddafi sighting will always get at least one smart bomb. NATO military planners keep score of Kaddafi's military strength (which is kept secret, lest it provide useful information to Kaddafi military or intelligence forces), and the trend has been down, more sharply of late. That, plus the difficulty supplying millions of civilians under his control, is why NATO believes Kaddafi won't last another hundred days. It's been about a hundred days since NATO began its military operations in Libya. Meanwhile, the rebels have gotten better on the battlefield, and behind the lines. The rebel coalition is holding together, and each day, rebel fighters gain more combat experience, and more of them come out of NATO training programs. Some NATO troops are on the ground in rebel-held Libya, to conduct training or assist with coordinating the bombing.

July 1, 2011: Moamar Kaddafi has threatened terrorist attacks on Europe. He has carried out such attacks in the past. But now, his reputation and resources are in tatters, and few take his threats seriously.

July 3, 2011: Turkey has stopped criticizing NATO support for the rebels (as a "war on Islam" thing) and backed the rebels themselves. This came about because there was not a lot of popular support for Kaddafi in Turkey, and the other NATO allies were questioning Turkey's continued presence in NATO. Turkey has promised over $200 million in aid for the rebels.

July 4, 2011: In Benghazi, a car bomb was found, and disabled, outside a hotel used by foreign journalists. The vehicle has been in a parking lot for weeks, indicating that those who put it there had fled, or been killed, before they could use it. There had been at least five similar bombs found around the city in the last two months. Kaddafi might still have a few terrorist supporters in Benghazi, and these are being sought. Kaddafi still has loyalists (over ten percent of the population), and several active groups of armed men, all over the country. Some are members of the secret police, some are simply getting paid and others fear retribution if Kaddafi is overthrown. There are even a few true - believers in Kaddafi's version of the "Arab revolution." But mostly there are a lot of armed Kaddafi supporters who fear payback for their barbaric behavior before the rebellion that began in February. The Kaddafi supporters were more savage once the armed rebellion began. Murdering and raping civilians has been a common tactic with Kaddafi forces, and that sort of activity is well known to most Libyans. Many of the rebels want the Kaddafi thugs brought to justice. Some of the thugs are already fleeing, but that is difficult to do as Kaddafi and his killers are surrounded. Kaddafi has been calling in favors from foreign politicians he has lavished money and other favors on in the past. This includes many African governments, and Russia (who has sold Kaddafi billions of dollars in weapons over the decades). Kaddafi has his foreign allies applying pressure on the rebels to accept a peace deal that leaves Kaddafi in Libya and exonerated for all his crimes. The rebels have refused this and, at most, will allow Kaddafi to flee the country. Since Kaddafi is now (since June 27th) under indictment as a war criminal, there are few places he could go. Russia has mentioned a willingness to accept Kaddafi, if NATO will hold its fire as he is flown out. At least this is what the Russians are reporting. Officially, Kaddafi is fighting on and is confident of ultimate victory. After a few days of diplomatic pressure, most African states backed away from supporting Kaddafi. The NATO fleet has eliminated Kaddafi's navy and the coastal waters are safe enough for regular supply shipments, and the movement of personnel. Tripoli, and other western coastal towns held by Kaddafi forces, are still blockaded. Only food and medicine goes in. NATO warships have been ordered to be on the lookout for Iranian attempts to get Iranian weapons and terrorist specialists (Quds force) into Kaddafi held territory. Iran is believed to have promised Kaddafi aid. Inside Tripoli, Kaddafi loyalists try, with increasing difficulty, to suppress open support for the rebels. Despite this, more anti -Kaddafi graffiti appears, and even some small pro-rebel demonstrations. There is also a lot of anger at the growing shortages of everything. Food is getting in, but not much of anything else. Kaddafi still pays wages to the huge civil service, as he still controls the banking system, But there is less and less to buy. The Red Cross can get around the country with food and medicine, and the Kaddafi thugs have been leaving these convoys alone. NATO runs 150-200 air sorties a day, a third of them bombers or gunships. Most of the rest are recon and intelligence aircraft. The rebel groups are getting better at reporting their positions to NATO, and avoiding friendly fire incidents. There have been fewer of these every month. NATO is playing hide-and-seek with pro-Kaddafi forces. Using a combination of reports from rebels and pro-rebel civilians, plus UAV and satellite photos and electronic eavesdropping, intelligence analysts seek to keep NATO warplanes and helicopter gunships supplied with targets. The Kaddafi forces know that contact with rebels can quickly bring a smart bomb, so this is avoided. Kaddafi forces depend on ambush, artillery (including mortars and rockets) as well as land mines to slow down the rebel advance and inflict casualties. But the rebels get closer and closer to Tripoli. At the current rate of advance, the rebels will be in Tripoli by the end of the month. That will be a big blow to the morale of the pro-Kaddafi forces, and might cause a sharp increase in desertions. Already, more and more government officers and troops are simply giving up, often before rebel fighters even get close.

July 6, 2011: Rebels are now 80 kilometers from Tripoli on the coast road. Berber rebels, advancing out of the mountains south of the city, are a little closer. But there are still active groups of pro - Kaddafi troops in Misarata, 200 kilometers east of Tripoli, and to the south, in the desert. There are pro-Kaddafi terrorists in the rebel capital of Benghazi, over a thousand kilometers east of Tripoli. While the rebels get better organized and professional each week, they are still far from being a professional military force. The rebels are still several separate armed groups, with widely varying (in terms of quality) leadership, and only united in their desire to drive out or kill Kaddafi supporters.

July 8, 2011: Kaddafi has threatened to unleash terrorist attacks on Europe if NATO does not halt operations against him. In response, NATO counter-terror agencies and national police rounded up some of the usual suspects and checked their threat reports. Kaddafi appeared to be just talking, and not actually doing any terrorist activity. Many terrorists who have been hiding in Libya for a long time, are reported to be on the move. But these bad boys appear to be seeking new sanctuary, not fresh targets. In any event, most of these killers are retired, and their former support networks gone or much degraded.

July 10, 2011: Rebels advanced on a town southwest of Tripoli, and cut an oil pipeline providing most of the fuel for Kaddafi forces.

July 11, 2011: An Egyptian court finally agreed to take 14 Libyan TV channels off an Egyptian owned satellite. This cut Kaddafi's main propaganda outlet. Kaddafi is calling in favors from foreign journalists (who have been bribed, or otherwise treated well over the years) to get certain stories published (usually in Arab or African media, where some are picked up by Western editors). The main thrust is that NATO bombs are killing too many Libyan civilians (over a thousand, compared to over 15,000 by Kaddafi's armed supporters) and that the rebels are looting captured town and hurting, or even killing, Kaddafi supporters. In the Moslem world, any time you have infidels (non-Moslems) killing the faithful, there's a media headline that must be used (even if the Moslem victims are supporters of a tyrant). It's just the way things are in the Islamic world. There are still over a thousand casualties a week, most of them among Kaddafi supporters. The rebels keep advancing, despite an occasional setback. The advance is slower, but it is still an advance. Amidst all this, France is leading an effort to arrange for a peace deal that will send Kaddafi and his family into a safe (prosecution free) exile and get amnesty for his armed followers (to get them to stop fighting). But many of the rebels, including some of the leaders, are insistent on getting revenge for the decades of Kaddafi oppression. So far, the French have not been able to conjure any diplomatic magic to solve this dispute. Another post-war problem, both for the rebels and their foreign supporters, is whether democracy will take hold. Already, the Berbers are talking about demanding recognition of their cultural identity (which Arabs have been trying to suppress for over a thousand years). Various rebel factions have lists of things they want, to add up to far more than what is available. The war won't be over when Kaddafi is defeated. While Kaddafi supporters, although only a minority of the population, are united and capable, the NTC (National Transitional Council) that leads the rebels is full of dissent and demands for more help (money, weapons, food, and stuff in general). Two generations of Libyans have lived in a welfare state, where most everyone was poor, but kept alive by government subsidized food and other goodies. This is all gone now because the fighting has halted most of the oil exports. Most of the administrators who ran the Kaddafi welfare state have fled, and the rebel replacements are learning on the job. But there is no money and foreign nations are reluctant to send any because of the incompetence and corruption. Over 20 nations have now recognized the NTC as the true government, but far fewer are willing to write checks. Despite this, the rebels know that time is on their side. Kaddafi is blockaded, and short of food (even though that is allowed in), cash (which has been cut off) and fuel (ditto). But letting the fight go to the end would get very ugly. Many Kaddafi supporters would fight to the end (when they are killed, many in family compounds, surrounded by dead and dying kin.) Rebels, who have long suffered under Kaddafi, and recently seen friends and family killed, are not bothered by this ending. But the more media-conscious among the rebel leadership are. And the NATO nations are horrified by the prospect.

July 14, 2011: Berber rebels are advancing from the south of Tripoli, but more slowly because Kaddafi has sent more gunmen to oppose them. Moreover, the Berber rebels suffer the same disorganization, lack of training and general inability to work with the NATO bombers above as their Arab allies advancing along the coast road. The big problem here is not what most people realize, but it is simple. Kaddafi has more effective troops, especially the closer you get to Tripoli. In addition, Kaddafi has no trouble getting determined new recruits. Many individuals, families and tribes that have long been associated with Kaddafi live in and around Tripoli. They know there will be retribution if the rebels win. While the wealthiest Kaddafi supporters can flee (and an increasing number are doing just that) many cannot. So the young men of these families feel obliged to join up, even if they have no military experience. But most of the male Kaddafi supporters and beneficiaries do have military training. That was one of the reasons Kaddafi has stayed in power for over 40 years. If you got economic benefits from Kaddafi, the men in your family were expected to serve at least a few years in the military, if not make a career of it. Kaddafi has many retired military officers he can call back into service, if only to protect their pensions. This loyalty and ability also provides some effective countermeasures against smart bombs and NATO reconnaissance. The Kaddafi loyalists have studied how to deal with hostile air power and the many techniques of deceiving and avoiding those warplanes. This keeps the NATO intel analysts jumping, the rebel fighters stalled and Kaddafi in play. The result is the rebels advance is slower the closer they get to Tripoli. Rebels leaders are discussing some kind of amnesty announcement to take the enthusiasm out of Kaddafi's armed followers.

July 20, 2011: French diplomats are trying to persuade the NTC to accept a peace deal that would allow Kaddafi to surrender, but go "into exile" within Libya. But so many Libyans want Kaddafi dead that this sort of peace deal is considered very unlikely. While Russia refuses to recognize the NTC, it has also made it clear that it will no longer supply weapons to Kaddafi (a good customer for Russian arms since the 1970s). The head of Libya's National Oil Corporation has fled to Italy (because of the violence, not Kaddafi.) While the rebels control most of the oil facilities, they do not have the trained manpower and equipment needed to make repairs and get full (or even much partial) oil production going. Most of the manpower, working in the oil fields, consisted of foreigners (who all fled when the fighting began months ago). Getting any of the foreigners back is complicated by the fact that the NTC has very little money. By now, most major countries have recognized the NTC, and most Libyan banks have as well. But Kaddafi's lawyers can still delay NTC access to Libyan money held overseas (usually in Kaddafi's name). Once Kaddafi surrenders, and the fighting stops, it would take a few months to get oil production back to a million barrels a day (less than half what Libya used to ship). Government troops holding parts of Brega, a port for oil shipments in the east (160 kilometers south of Benghazi) refuse to surrender. Kaddafi troops have been driven out of most of the city, but left lots of land mines and booby traps behind. This is delaying the rebel occupation of many areas. The rebels don't have much experience or mine clearing equipment to deal with this sort of thing, although they eventually manage to cope (and lose some people in the process). Another complication is that about 200 diehard Kaddafi troops are inside a Brega refinery complex, and the rebels don't want to damage this facility, because it would be very expensive and time consuming to replace, and destruction of it would be bad for rebel morale. So the Kaddafi fighters are being talked to, in an attempt to reach a peace deal. But supplies and NATO trainers are getting through, mainly in the east, but also in the West.

In the Berber held towns of Zintan, southwest of Tripoli, uniformed and trained (marching in formation at least) rebel fighters have been seen. Many more of these uniformed rebels are showing up along the coast road. The uniforms mean the rebel fighters have gone through the few weeks of combat training being offered by NATO trainers and, increasingly, rebels with military experience (more and more of Kaddafi soldiers are defecting). Rebel forces are 80 kilometers east of Tripoli, while Berber groups are about the same distance south of Tripoli. The NTC (National Transitional Council) has tried to represent all rebel factions, but is barely in touch with many Berber factions south of Tripoli. The NTC is more of a shaky coalition than a unified government. This is particularly harmful when it comes to distributing medical and ammunition supplies, as well as basic weapons (assault rifles, pistols, grenades, machine-guns) and radios. Some NATO nations have put some people on the ground to coordinate the distribution of this equipment, and discovered that most factions will not share. Thus many armed factions are difficult to contact, and are constantly running out of ammo and medical supplies. Despite that, the rebels know that time is on their side, not Kaddafi's. Although rebels took the city of Zawiyah in March, they were pushed out a month later and have been fighting a guerilla war there ever since. Zawiyah is only 40 kilometers west of Tripoli (between the capital and the Tunisian border), so close that Kaddafi is unwilling to let it go without a big fight. Kaddafi forces have destroyed much of Zawiyah in expelling the rebels, and during the continuing guerilla fighting. This battle is forcing Kaddafi to keep some his best (and most reliable) troops tied down in Zawiyah, which motivates the rebels there to keep up the violence.

July 21, 2011: Fighting is expected to slow down for a month, starting August 1st, as Ramadan begins. During that month, Moslems are expected to eat or drink nothing during daylight. This is a major restriction for those fighting during the torrid Libyan Summer (which, in itself, is slowing down the pace of combat a bit). As a practical matter, Kaddafi will make a big deal about observing Ramadan, as a way to slow down the rebels. But the rebels are likely to point out that Moslem custom allows soldiers to eat and drink in daylight during Ramadan. Rebels also expect Kaddafi to increase his use of civilians as human shields, the closer rebels get to Tripoli. Using human shields will often stop NATO bombers from hitting Kaddafi troops, and will slow down the rebels as well. While casualties (for both sides) are running at about a hundred a day (dead and wounded), that is expected more than double if the rebels make a pre-Ramadan push in the next ten days. NATO appears to be preparing for a rebel ground offensive, as more explosions are being hear in and around Tripoli. The rebels apparently have a growing informant network inside Tripoli, because Kaddafi forces are being hit even if they are hiding ammo and armored vehicles in civilian facilities.

July 27, 2011: Britain officially recognized the rebels, by establishing formal diplomatic links with the NTC. Similar recognition by the 30 nations (including the United States and most NATO nations) has made it possible to transfer Libyan government funds, in those countries, to the rebels. Sometimes, the money is actually a loan against Libyan government funds held in foreign banks, pending the conclusion of legal proceedings. Either war, the rebels get badly needed cash. There are also shortages in rebel territory. That's because armed Kaddafi supporters are still wandering around the desert area where the oil fields and pipelines are. Although these small groups of men are acting mainly as bandits, they are dangerous enough to scare off the foreign workers who make up the bulk of the technical staff for Libyan oil operations. Meanwhile, the NTC is obtaining more cash and credit with which to buy and import fuel. It will take time to pacify the desert territory containing the oil fields, and to persuade the foreign workers to return. Rebel leaders are split on the subject of amnesty and leniency for Kaddafi and his supporters. Not offering some kind of amnesty simply encourages Kaddafi and his key aides to fight on. But amnesty offends many rebel leaders who have long suffered at the hands of Kaddafi police.

Moreover, Kaddafi continues to behave badly. The latest atrocities involve setting up headquarters and bases for his troops in hospitals and other clearly civilian structures. NATO has warned Kaddafi to stop doing this. Kaddafi ignores these threats. Meanwhile, the pro-amnesty rebels leaders are gaining ground as the war grinds on. Many Libyans are even willing to support Kaddafi going "into exile" inside Libya. Meanwhile, Kaddafi refuses to negotiate directly with the NTC (National Transitional Council). But if the NTC simply announces amnesty or leniency, such direct talks won't be necessary. Many Kaddafi officials have already defected. Meanwhile, Kaddafi needs all the help he can get. Kaddafi only controls is the territory (shrinking daily) around Tripoli, plus a few small areas throughout the country where he has armed supporters who are still fighting. Captured Kaddafi troops continue to report declining morale. NATO electronic intelligence reports frequent desperate calls from Kaddafi commanders complaining about shortages (especially of fuel and ammo) and poor morale. The food, fuel and ammo shortages are common throughout the Tripoli area. While the NATO naval blockade is allowing food imports, ammo and fuel is kept out. The naval blockade is pretty tight, and all fuel and ammo Kaddafi is getting comes in via truck from Tunisia and Algeria. NATO has criticized both nations for that smuggling. Tunisia has increased patrols on its borders, but Algeria (whose government is still on good terms with Kaddafi) has simply pled an inability to close its huge border with Libya. Abdul Fatah Younis was always suspect. He defected from the Kaddafi government (where he had been Interior Minister) last February and was soon appointed military leader of the rebels. Younis called on military personnel to defect to the rebels. But at the time he was reported killed, there were also rumors Younis had been arrested and accused to aiding Kaddafi forces. Kaddafi associates have long hinted at this, which was always dismissed as an attempt to create divisions within the rebel movement. All this could get ugly. Younis belonged to the Obeidi tribe, one of the largest and most powerful in eastern Libya. Some Obeidi tribal leaders are demanding to know exactly what happened.

July 28, 2011: Rebel military commander, General Abdul Fattah Younis was shot dead, along with two of his aides. This happened after Younis was ordered back to Benghazi to discuss the military situation with the rebel leadership. The rebels say that Younis was killed by pro-Kaddafi gunmen. Younis was also reported killed on the 24th, but this proved false, and was mocked by Younis himself. But now he is really dead, and no one is sure why. The NATO air effort has flown some 17,000 sorties since March. Coordination with rebel ground forces gets better every week. This has made it possible for rebel units to quickly call for NATO airstrikes against the occasional attempt by government forces to push the rebels back. This has happened several times in the last week. Meanwhile, NATO warplanes continue to seek out and destroy Kaddafi ammo dumps and bases in Tripoli and anywhere else they can be found. Thus Kaddafi suffers irreplaceable losses every day.

July 29, 2011: Rebel fighters are advancing from Misarata to Ziltan, along the coast road. Further to the east, rebels are clearing government troops out of the port town of Brega. South of Tripoli are advancing on Bir Ghanam and Garyan. On the Tunisian border, rebels captured the town of Ghazaya, opening up a supply route to Tunisia, and denying one to Kaddafi.

July 30, 2011: NATO bombers attacked transmitters for government TV. NATO and the rebels believe that Kaddafi is using his control of the national TV network to encourage, and communicate with, his supporters.

July 31, 2011: In Benghazi, the NTC discovered that one of the many rebel militias was actually a pro - Kaddafi outfit, waiting for an opportunity to strike. But the true loyalty of this outfit was discovered, and fighting broke out. This led to dozens of casualties, mostly among the pro-Kaddafi gunmen, and nearly a hundred of them were arrested. The pro-Kaddafi group was found to be planning terror bombings in the city.

August 2, 2011: Rebels entered the coastal town of Zlitan, but encountered strong resistance. Far to the west, rebels are having similar problems in the city of Brega. Rebel leaders revealed that they have, for some weeks, been holding very unofficial talks with former members of the Kaddafi government. The rebels are negotiating with former senior government officials who have no "blood on their hands" and are seeking to ease the transition once Kaddafi's gunmen are defeated. The rebels need experienced administrators to get the government, and economy, running again.

August 3, 2011: Off the coast, a British frigate was fired on by government rocket launchers. The inaccurate fire came nowhere close to the ship, which used its 115mm gun to fire back. Elsewhere off the coast, an Italian warship noted a missile or rocket hitting the water some 1,200 meters from the ship. It was unclear where along the coast, the projectile was fired from. In Misarata, a large air transport from the Persian Gulf city-state of Qatar landed, and off-loaded six pickup trucks full of ammunition, which promptly drove off. Qatar, and other Gulf states, has been enthusiastic supporters of the Libyan rebels.

August 6, 2011: South of Tripoli, rebel units left the mountains and moved onto the coastal plain. Two villages, 80 kilometers south of Tripoli, were captured as some 2,000 rebel fighters moved in. One of the rebel units, called the "Tripoli Battalion" is largely composed of men from Tripoli, who got out of the city and joined the rebels. In one day of fighting, these rebel units suffered over fifty casualties (including eight dead). This 2-3 percent casualty rate per day is pretty high by modern standards. This is because the rebels are poorly trained and few are equipped with body armor.

August 7, 2011: Government forces have counterattacked south of Tripoli, where advancing rebels threaten to cut the main road bringing in smuggled supplies from the western borders. This is Kaddafi's main supply line, since the NATO blockade keeping sea and air supply lines shut down. While all this fighting is going on, the economy is a mess. The NTC says it needs $3.5 billion a year to run a minimal government. Foreign nations are loaning the NTC lots of money, and hoping these funds are not plundered by corrupt officials. As the weeks pass, Kaddafi has more problems in Tripoli, where shortages of fuel and consumer goods cause more unrest. At the same time, the rebel fighters gain more combat experience each day, and Kaddafi's troops lose more men to casualties and desertion (especially the mercenaries, who sense they are on the losing side, and seek to get out with what they have earned so far). Kaddafi has been reaching out for allies, and not had much luck. Venezuelan strongman Hugo Chavez has sent words of encouragement, but little else. Someone helped Kaddafi buy a tanker load of petrol (gasoline). But the ship and its 30,000 tons of fuel was seized before it could reach Tripoli and diverted to a rebel controlled port. One of Kaddafi's sons announced negotiations with Islamic radical groups (who had long been persecuted by Kaddafi), but nothing came of that. The Kaddafi forces are more mobile, despite the damage from NATO air power, and rebels are still fighting for control of towns and cities along the coastal highway. Rebel fighters have advanced from Misarata to Zlitan, along the coast road. Zlitan is 100 kilometers east of Tripoli, and government forces have fought hard to keep the rebels out. NATO air power gives rebels the edge, causing most of the government casualties and forcing Kaddafi forces to restrict their movement. Many Libyans in the western part of the country are turning against Kaddafi, but these rebels are outnumbered and poorly armed compared to the government forces. The coastal city of Zawiya (population 290,000), 50 kilometers west of Tripoli, has been out-of-control for months. But no one was really in charge, yet. The rebels grow stronger there each week, although the pro -Kaddafi forces are desperate to hold on, knowing that they will lose everything if Kaddafi is defeated. NATO air strikes are more frequently being concentrated for specific operations. These usually involve a rebel effort to take a town of city, or to destroy government forces and resources in Tripoli. Kaddafi has learned to keep moving his armored vehicles and troops around, because the rebel's informant network in Tripoli is getting more and more effective. NTC efforts to form a unified army have largely failed. Most of the militia groups want to continue as part of a military coalition, not a formal army. This, of course, makes it easier to go from rebellion to civil war, once Kaddafi is defeated. This brought to light a major problem with the NTC, that it is a very loose coalition of anti -Kaddafi groups. Many, if not most, of the rebel gunmen are not out fighting government troops, but have instead taken control of towns, cities and villages all over the country, mainly in the east. The NTC has some control over rebel militia coalitions in major cities and around the key oil facilities. But in many other areas, guys with guns are doing whatever they want. Some of these "rebels" are operating like bandits, taking what they want, "in the name of the revolution."

August 8, 2011: The July 28 killing of general Abdel Fatah Younis has caused unrest within the rebel coalition. Younis belonged to the Obeidi tribe, which is from the eastern city of Tobruk (150 kilometers from Egypt with a population of 115,000). The Obeidi want to know what really happened with Younis. It's now been revealed that an arrest warrant for Younis had been signed by members of the NTC (National Transitional Council). The Obeidi want to know if there's a connection between this arrest warrant and the killing, and who did the shooting. The NTC is blaming a pro-Kaddafi militia in Benghazi, which had been pretending to be rebels.

August 8, 2011: The NTC fired all its government ministers and is searching for new, and more effective, ones.

August 14, 2011: Kaddafi forces fired a SCUD ballistic missile from outside Sirte to rebel held Brega. The missile missed, and landed in the desert outside the town, injuring no one. This was the first time Kaddafi forces had fired one of their hundreds of SCUD missiles. This is not surprising, as the missiles require at least half an hour to get fueled and otherwise prepared for launch. Trained crews are needed to do this, and there's always the risk that NATO surveillance will stop you before you fire the missile. Libyan Interior Minister Nassr al Mabrouk Abdullah fled to Egypt this day, using his private aircraft, and taking nine family members with him. He arrived on a tourist visa, but Mabrouk is apparently seeking political asylum.

August 15, 2011: Berber led rebels advancing from the mountains south of Tripoli, captured the town of Garyan (population 85,000 and 75 kilometers south of Tripoli). NTC representatives have reopened the Libyan embassy in the United States. Kaddafi has apparently lost his effort to maintain the morale of his combat forces. The daily attacks from NATO aircraft, and the growing competence of the rebel fighters has led most government troops to reconsider their loyalties. Desertions are more frequent, and the growing number of casualties is a constant reminder of how bad things are. Food and medical supplies can enter Tripoli, so Kaddafi troops have more wounded to contemplate, and less ammo and weapons to fight with. NATO bombers have concentrated on army vehicles and supplies (especially fuel and ammo). Troops still loyal to Kaddafi now have a much harder time moving, and have to watch their ammo expenditure, lest they run out at a critical moment. More rebels speak confidently of capturing Tripoli within a month. There are growing food, energy and consumer goods shortages in Tripoli, especially compared to the rebel capital in the eastern city of Benghazi. There, food is abundant, and much cheaper than in Tripoli. There is no violence or threat of attack. People in Tripoli know all about this, and Kaddafi has to cope with a growing morale problem among his supporters, and the many Tripoli residents who are neutral (a shrinking group), or back the rebels. There are about a million people in Tripoli, and most of them are angry at someone (either Kaddafi or the rebels). After rebels took control of the center of the coastal city of Zawiya (population 290,000, 50 kilometers west of Tripoli) two days ago, government reinforcements arrived and pushed the rebels back to the outskirts. Zawiya controls the road from Tripoli to Tunisia. This is a key supply line for Kaddafi, and the rebels have made it largely unusable. But more cars and small trucks are seen leaving Tripoli and heading west, for Tunisia. These the NATO bombers leave alone, as they are generally full of civilians fleeing, either to Tunisia, or to rebel held territory.

August 16, 2011: The rebel NTC (National Transitional Council) is gaining more recognition overseas, but less at home. The NTC is trying to reorganize itself, in order to avoid a civil war after Kaddafi is defeated. The NTC faces many problems beyond the many tribal, political and religious divisions. For one thing, there has been no party politics in Libya for over 40 years. Lots of inexperienced people seeking power is not a good thing. There has been no free economy either, which can also cause lots of problems. Add to that an expected three years of poverty (as the economy is rebuilt), and you have a recipe for all sorts of trouble. A basic problem here is that the oil industry has been damaged. Currently, only about 100,000 barrels a day are being pumped. Normally, it's 1.6 million barrels a day, and industry experts believed it will take up to three years to regain that level of production. In the meantime, lots of Libyans will see their standard of living decline, and they won't be happy about that.

August 17, 2011: Rebel forces have broken out of Misarata, the major city west of Tripoli, and are heading for Tripoli.

August 18, 2011: Numerous large explosions were heard in Tripoli, as NATO smart bombs hit military targets, and buildings being used as headquarters. NATO was apparently getting more and better target information, and it appeared to be timely and accurate. Government troops appear more distressed, and prominent pro-Kaddafi families are fleeing the city. Mercenary troops Kaddafi had hired are also leaving, apparently suspecting that there is little more money to be made fighting for the Libyan dictator. Rebels have entered the main oil shipment port, Zawiya, which is west of Tripoli. With this, rebels have largely isolated Tripoli from resupply, and shortages are rapidly growing in the city of two million (about 30 percent of Libya's population.) In response, Kaddafi called for an immediate ceasefire and peace negotiations. The rebels ignored this.

August 19, 2011: Heavy fighting led to the capture of Zlitan (160 kilometers east of Tripoli), and Zawiya (30km to the west). Meanwhile, another major Kaddafi supporter, former prime minister Abdessalam Jalloud, fled Tripoli and surrendered to rebels outside the city.

August 20, 2011: Rebels and pro-rebel civilians began fighting government forces inside Tripoli. This was generally successful, forcing government troops back to key locations (military barracks, media centers and so on.) Late in the day, the government controlled cell phone company broadcast a text message to all its customers, urging them to go out and fight the rebels. This had no apparent effect.

August 21, 2011: Rebel convoys entered Tripoli from several directions and were cheered by civilians in most neighborhoods. The rebels had been stalled 30-40 kilometers outside the city, but the soldiers facing them suddenly broke (fleeing or surrendering), allowing the rebels to head right into the city. Most government security forces inside the city fled at the sight of the rebels. But some troops kept fighting, the most lethal being individual snipers. This was apparently all part of a plan developed by NATO and rebels inside and outside the city. All these forces coordinated their efforts to trigger a collapse of government resistance inside the city. A key achievement was the help of pro-rebel officers and troops in the base of the 32nd Brigade, 25 kilometers outside Tripoli. Rebels quickly captured the base, and destroyed the brigade (commanded by one of Kaddafi's sons). The 32nd Brigade had been very active in killing civilians in Misarata.

August 22, 2011: Tanks and trucks mounting heavy machine-guns came out Kaddafi's compound and fired on approaching rebel fighters, forcing the rebels to pull back. Kaddafi's eldest son (chief aide and heir), Seif al Islam, who was reported captured yesterday, appeared in front of foreign journalists, obviously not a prisoner. Mohammed Kaddafi was also reported captured yesterday, but has also apparently escaped. NATO bombers have been hitting about twenty targets a day in the last few days. With the end in sight, people have been more willing to talk about foreign advisors on the ground. There are apparently several hundred of them. In addition to some special operations troops, there are personnel from intelligence agencies, diplomats and civilian contractors. Everyone entered (by land from Egypt or by air from Europe) as civilians, and kept a low profile. Most of the foreigners were in Benghazi, to advise the rebel high command and coordinate economic and military aid. Others were with rebel combat units, helping to control air power and provide some professional military advice. Over the half the air support was non-combat. The most important aspect of this was aerial surveillance of government and rebel forces. Keeping an eye on the government troops was necessary to provide targets for the bombers. Tracking the rebels was essential to prevent rebels from firing on each other and giving the rebel high command an idea of what they had, where it was and what was possible. Rebel commanders have brought over 4,000 fighters into Tripoli so far, including some who sneaked in before the city fell. There are also hundreds of armed, pro-rebel civilians in Tripoli. But there are also thousands of pro-Kaddafi civilians who were armed by the government over the last five months. While many of these guns are being hidden, to be sold later, a lot of them are being used. Many families and neighborhoods are known to be pro-Kaddafi, and to have benefitted by decades of Kaddafi rule. Dealing with surrenders and restoring public order will be a major problem in Tripoli. There are a lot of scared, and armed, Kaddafi supporters here. The more notorious ones (usually the wealthiest as well) are getting out, fleeing to Tunisia, Algeria and beyond.

August 23, 2011: Many Kaddafi backers continue to fight. Rebels driving from Misarata to Tripoli have been fired on by artillery in Zlitan (100 kilometers east of Triploi). Government forces have fought hard to keep the rebels out of Zlitan, but now rebels control most of it. Kaddafi's green flag can still be seen flying over several Tripoli neighborhoods, but the rebels seem to control about 90 percent of the city. Kaddafi's flag still flies in the town of Shaba, south of Tripoli (a stronghold of the Kaddafi tribe) and Sirte (east of Misarata, and another Kaddafi tribe stronghold). About ten percent of the Libyan population benefitted from helping Kaddafi run his dictatorship. Most of these people are wives and children of the men who actually terrorized the population. These guys are generally known, and have a lot of lose if taken alive by the rebels. A lot of Libyans are out for revenge, but many of their targets are heavily armed, and very dangerous when cornered. Deals will have to be made, and many lower ranking Kaddafi thugs will probably get off via an amnesty deal. But several dozen senior officials face prosecution, or worse.

August 24, 2011: The NTC has offered a reward of $1.6 million for the capture (or information leading to it) of Moamar Kaddafi (dead or alive.)

August 25, 2011: NATO fighter bombers made their last large scale bombing in Tripoli, hitting targets in the last neighborhood held by Kaddafi loyalists. Over the next day, rebel troops went in and cleaned the area out.

August 26, 2011: Rebel forces in Tripoli agreed to unify under one command (the NTC). The commander of the government 32nd brigade, Moamar Kaddafi's bloodthirsty son Khamis, was again reported killed. This time it was by a missile by a British Apache helicopter gunship, some 60 kilometers south of Tripoli. His body was found, identified and buried. Moamar Kaddafi's wife, three children and several grandchildren have shown up in Algeria seeking asylum. The new rebel government in Libya demanded that these refugees be returned.

August 29, 2011: Rebels are massing forces outside Sirte, the last city that is loyal to the Kaddafis. Sirte (population 100,000) is the controlled by the Kaddafi tribe, but rebels hope to negotiate a surrender. Meanwhile, in Tripoli, rebels are busy searching the many secret compounds and bunkers Kaddafi had built over the decades. They have found much decadence, but no Kaddafis. The U.S. has negotiated a deal that would allow two civilian teams to enter Libya and search for any Kaddafi anti - aircraft weapons (especially portable missiles) that are unaccounted for. The rebels have agreed to secure or destroy anything found. The U.S. is already confident that Kaddafi's chemical weapons are secure, as well as some other weapons of mass destruction. Rebel forces are finding hundreds of recently killed civilians, many of them apparently rebel fighters who had surrendered. Soldiers and secret police apparently had orders to kill all rebels, including prisoners. Some Kaddafi supporters are still out there killing. Rebels are searching for any artillery or rockets in the hands of Kaddafi loyalists. Some of this stuff is still being fired at roads and rebel held areas. There is still the problem of Kaddafi loyalists wandering around the vast desert interior of Libya. Meanwhile, rebel commanders believe that Kaddafi, two of his sons and some loyal soldiers, are seeking a hideout in the outskirts of Tripoli. Rebel forces are energetically seeking all members of the Kaddafi clan, lest they become a rally point for remaining loyalists. Kaddafi has long cultivated the image of himself as a simple man, who often lived in tents and ate traditional nomad fare (dates and camel milk). Since his government fell, rebels have gotten into many formerly tightly guarded areas, and found that Kaddafi actually lived quite luxuriously, as did members of his family and senior members of the government. Kaddafi simply kept all these gated communities a tightly guarded secret. Now people are wondering what other secrets Kaddafi had. While the European communist nations did not have armed resistance after their dictatorships fell, this is not the case in Arab nations. Unlike Europe, tribalism is still a strong force in most Arab states. Libya is one of them, and Kaddafi's tribe (the Kaddafi) has been the center of power in Libya since the late 1960s. But there are over a hundred tribes and major clans in the country, and the Kaddafi tribe (an Arab one, centered on Sirte, and thence south into the desert) is one of the smaller ones. This was complicated by the fact that about 60 percent of the population is Berber (mostly) and Tuareg (nomadic Berbers far to the south).

The Berbers have always been hostile to the Arab invaders (represented by Kaddafi and most of the other coastal tribes) for over a thousand years. Kaddafi didn't trust the Berbers, although he tried to buy off the Tuareg (with mixed success). So Kaddafi's main supporters are 10-20 percent of the Arab Libyans (less than ten percent of the total population). Many of these Kaddafi supporters are talking tough right now, but few are actually shooting, or planning terror attacks. The rebel leadership is hustling to form a government that will help prevent a guerilla war by those who have lost so much power (political and economic). Everyone knows what happened in Iraq, where the Sunni Arab minority carried out a horrendous terror campaign (mostly against the majority Shia Arabs) in a failed attempt to regain power and prosperity. What's important to note here is that GDP helps, but does not guarantee a higher QOL. Indonesia, just below, Libya, had about a third the GDP per capita of Libya, and much less oil. Jamaica had higher QOL, and a GPD per capita similar to Indonesia (as did many other nations, with Costa Rica, with ten percent less GDP per capita, having a QOL rank of 36). Libya was in trouble because it was a dictatorship, with Kaddafi and his cronies running a command (they make all the decisions) economy. This does not work, and causes political and economic complaints that grow worse by decade after decade. This brought about the collapse of the communist states in Eastern Europe in the late 1980s (including the Soviet Union.) This economic and political decline caught up with Libya this year. The rebels still have not taken the city of Sirte (Kaddafi's birthplace and full of people still loyal to him). Tripoli is still full of Kaddafi loyalists. These people are the ones who Kaddafi favored for decades. Because of the oil income (which accounted for half the GDP) Libya was, on paper, well off. But the reality was otherwise. An international ranking of "quality-of-life" (QOL) listed Libya as 70 out of 111 nations. For comparison purposes, note the ranking from 62nd to 83rd place; Bahrain (62nd place), Lithuania, Jamaica, Morocco, Latvia, Oman, Estonia, United Arab Emirates, Libya, Indonesia, Saudi Arabia, India, Paraguay, Jordan, Nicaragua, Bangladesh, Albania, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Algeria, Bolivia and Tunisia.

August 30, 2011: The rebel NTC (National Transitional Council) has become the de-facto government of Libya. But the country is actually controlled by dozens of separate rebel groups, each offering varying degrees of cooperation with the NTC. Despite that, the NTC has control of most of the oil, and is getting frozen Kaddafi assets (over $100 billion with). So the various rebel factions are making agreements with the NTC, most on the condition that elections for a new government are held soon. It's also implied that the NTC will have some success in restoring essential servi ces (power, water, sanitation, transportation, security). This the NTC is hustling to do, and today they convinced the Kaddafi era police force in Tripoli to go back to work.

August 31, 2011: Kaddafi's son Saif-al-Islam announced that he was mobilizing forces to retake Tripoli. No one believes him and this sort of talk is believed intended more for Kaddafi loyalists who are tempted to flee.

September 3, 2011: Over the past few days, several UN agencies have returned to Tripoli, which again has a functioning police force. Efforts are still underway to restore essential services (electricity, water and sanitation.) The new government is negotiating with European nations to gain control of over $100 billion the Kaddafi clan has stashed overseas, and to hire help in restoring oil shipments.

September 5, 2011: In Niger, to the south, a convoy of several dozen Libyan military vehicles crossed the border. The convoy apparently contained members of Kaddafi's internal security service, escorted by Tuaregs (nomadic tribes in southern Libya) still loyal to Kaddafi. Rebels captured the headquarters of Libyan intelligence intact. There they found written instructions to destroy all documents if the rebels seemed likely to capture the place. But the Kaddafi supporters fled at the approach of the rebels, and left the paper record of Kaddafi's 42 year rule intact. It shows a dictator that got sloppy, and an intelligence organization that began to believe its own propaganda, and misread the signs of coming revolution. The documents also show decades of deal s made with Russia, China and Western nations, as well as Kaddafi's neighbors, and his meddling in other African nations. NATO warplanes are still in action, attacking obvious military targets in and around Sirte. In addition to bombs, surrender leaflets are also being dropped. More valuable are NATO air reconnaissance and electronic eavesdropping capabilities. Trying to track down remaining Kaddafi supporters in a country as large as Libya would take years without NATO assistance. Kaddafi loyalists also control Sabha (in the center of western Libya, 800 kilometers from the coast, deep in the desert). This town of 130,000 was favored by Kaddafi, but still contains many rebel supporters. Kaddafi loyalists still hold the major air base of al Jafra, 600 kilometers south of Sirte. There are still more Kaddafi men driving around the interior, heading for a border and an escape from justice. The rebels don't want to burn down either town just to get at the armed hard-liners within. But in both towns, the Kaddafi loyalists fear retribution, and the negotiations have made it clear that the rebels are in no mood to discuss any amnesty deals. That's because over 40,000 people died in six months of fighting, most of them civilians killed by Kaddafi gunmen. Many of these killers are trapped in Sirte and Bani Walid. Sirte is on the coast and is Kaddafis birthplace. Bani Walid is 150 kilometers southeast of Tripoli and most of the inhabitants belong to the Warfala tribe (which accounts for 15 percent of Libya's population). Kaddafi treated key members of the Warfala tribe well and many of those pro-Warfala men are trapped in Bani Walid. The rebels have the town surrounded, and want to avoid a battle (which would get a lot of Warfala killed and cause a hostile relationship between the new government and the nation's largest tribe). In Sirte, the Kaddafi tribe is in charge, but is not the majority of the population in Sirte. The Kaddafi tribe is less than two percent of the Libyan population and widely reviled. Moamar Kaddafi has disappeared. He may either be with one of his sons, or in a convoy of vehicles crossing the desert, headed for a border. One son (Seif) is in Sirte, threatening to fight to the death. Another son, Saadi, is trying to negotiate surrender (allegedly with his father's consent). The other two sons have fled to Algeria, with their sister, and received asylum.

September 6, 2011: Kaddafi loyalists still hold two towns (Bani Walid, population 50,000, and Sirte, population 100,000) near the coast. The rebels have given Kaddafi loyalists until September 10th to surrender. The rebels are hoping that their supporters in these towns can persuade the rebels to give up, or simply change into civilian clothes and flee. The rebels only have names and pictures of a few hundred key Kaddafi supporters, thus most Kaddafi men can just change clothes and make a run for it. The black African mercenaries from the south are having a harder time of it. Rebels have been arresting most black Africans, even though most of them are illegal migrants or legal foreign workers in Libya. Black Africans caught with weapons are usually killed.

September 7, 2011: The NTC has formed special intelligence and combat units to hunt down former dictator Moamar Kaddafi and his senior aides. Kaddafi is believed to still be in Libya. This special force is apparently working with NATO intelligence forces, which have special aircraft monitoring most of the country, and some special operations troops on the ground. The U.S. has warned African nations not to offer Kaddafi sanctuary, as he is being sought by war-crimes investigators and subject to international sanctions.

September 11, 2011: The NTC has moved to Tripoli, and announced that there would soon be elections. No date was given.

September 12, 2011: There was a big explosion at an ammunition storage site near the main airport outside Tripoli. People working at the site report that a lot of the ammo has been stored in the open. Thus the hot sun makes the munitions unstable and liable to detonation. Egypt reports increased seizures of Libyan weapons being smuggled across the border. It's long been reported that many of the numerous Kaddafi era weapons storage sites were looted. Now Libyan smugglers are trying to get these weapons into neighboring countries (Egypt is the closest) and sell them. There are Islamic radical groups in Egypt (and throughout North Africa) who are willing to pay. Egypt does not want these Libyan weapons on the loose, because there are Islamic radical groups in Egypt who have no problem attacking Egyptian targets. The best customers for these weapons are Hamas, in Gaza. For that reason, Egypt has tightened border security on the Gaza border. But some of this stuff, particularly the portable anti-aircraft missile systems, are going to make it through. In the last week, over 30 senior members of the Kaddafi government have arrived, via several armed convoys, in Niger. There, the government has not given these refugees any special status, but has not limited their movement. Thus these Kaddafi associates (including one son, Saadi) can move on, and some probably will. Some sub-Saharan African nations have offered Kaddafi and his henchmen refuge.

Some senior Kaddafi officials have been captured, and they are generally unapologetic and defiant. During his decades in power, Kaddafi was very good to a minority (10-20 percent) of the population, and many of these people will remain loyal to their benefactor for a long time. The rebels have still not organized many artillery units, and depend on NATO smart bombs (which are much more likely to avoid civilian casualties.) Thus the remaining Kaddafi forces are using civilians (or women and teenage fighters who are not holding weapons) as human shields. This works against NATO, but not so much with the rebels. Now that most of the country is free of fighting, more people can get around and report what they see. Moreover, the rebels are no longer the anointed (by the media) valiant underdogs. Thus you can report nasty things rebel forces did. This is a common pattern, both the style of reporting and the things that are now being reported. While much was always made of how Kaddafi's forces attacked civilians and basically murdered a lot of people, the media ignored rebels executing most of the Kaddafi fighters they captured. It will eventually be reported that the executions were the result of the rebels not being prepared (as untrained and poorly led as they were) to deal with prisoners. There was also the anger at mercenaries, who were hired in part because these foreigners had fewer problems with killing Libyan civilians. After a few months, stories will appear giving more accurate numbers on actual deaths. Given that the Kaddafi men had more artillery and, for the early months of the rebellion, armed men in action, they killed more people, most of them civilians. Kaddafi's use of black mercenaries from the south has led to many rebel units going after all black Africans in the country. Blacks have long been looked down upon and discriminated against in Libya (as is common throughout Arab North Africa), and the hostility has increased because of the growing number of illegal migrants from Black Africa, passing through Libya on their way to Europe. Kaddafi still has a satellite TV station in Syria (Arrai television) that broadcasts his messages. Via Arrai, Kaddafi regularly calls for his followers to keep fighting. Recent messages have not been video or audio media of Kaddafi himself, but rather written messages read by political supporters in Syria.

September 13, 2011: Moamar Kaddafi is believed to have a few thousand armed followers left in the country. They are concentrated in Sirte and Qasr bu Hadi. But there are several towns in western Libya that have a few dozen, or a few hundred armed Kaddafi supporters each. In these places, the armed men generally remain hidden, and stay that way because most residents were always Kaddafi supporters. Rebels are rolling into these places and seeking to negotiate long-term peace with the locals. This approach may unravel as the factions in the NTC (National Transitional Council) battle each other. The democratic factions want elections and a free society. Islamic conservative factions, who are a minority, want a religious dictatorship and are willing to fight for it. This could get ugly. There are still Kaddafi loyalists who are willing to grab their hidden weapons and fight again, perhaps even alongside one of the NTC factions. Achieving long-term law and order will not be easy. Rebel fighters expect the fighting in Sirte and Qasr bu Hadi to last another week, at least.

September 15, 2011: Kaddafi's son Saadi, and three generals who once served Kaddafi, have requested asylum in Niger. The four, and their bodyguards, has driven 1,600 kilometers to reach Niger. Such convoys have been arriving since about a week ago, and continue to. The Niger government has been taking good care of the Kaddafi officials who have shown up, but have not granted asylum to anyone yet.

September 16, 2011: The UN has transferred Libya's UN seat to the NTC, and lifted most of the sanctions on Libya. This made it easier for the NTC to get control of over $100 billion worth of frozen Libyan assets.

September 19, 2011: NTC fighters captured Sabha, which is 770 kilometers south of Tripoli and astride the main road going to the Niger border. Many NTC backers hoped the overthrow of the dictatorship would be an opportunity to curb the massive corruption that flourished during the Kaddafi era. But anti-corruption efforts are already running into resistance. The crooks are still out there, even within the NTC, and they are eager to steal. The NTC (National Transitional Council) has not been able to form a new government, with the various tribal, religious (Islamic radical) and political factions not able to agree on who gets what ministry. The original coalition fell apart last month in the wake of the murder of the NTC military leader. It's still unclear what was going on there. Ministries controlling defense, oil and the interior (national police) are most contentious. But all 36 ministries have some political value. Meanwhile, the NTC has a bigger problem with the stalled economy and millions of Libyans without income, or electricity or, in some cases, no clean water. Some of these folks are beginning to hold demonstrations, especially in Tripoli. On the plus side, the oil fields were generally protected (less than 15 percent were damaged) by the oil company employees during six months of violence, and production is expected to increase to 500,000 barrels a day (worth $50 million a day) within a month or so. Kaddafi had ordered the oil fields and facilities destroyed, but the oil field employees delayed and sabotaged the placement of explosives, and the rebels managed to capture (quite by chance) the colonel in charge of destroying the oil fields. The men planting the explosives were thrown into confusion, and never received the order to set off the explosives. Kaddafi is believed to be in Sirte or Bani Walid and is still in touch with his supporters in Libya via a Syrian satellite TV network that continues to broadcast Kaddafi audio or video messages. The French company that provides satellite broadcast services for the Syrian network refuses to cut the Syrians off.

September 20, 2011: Bani Walid, Sirte and several smaller places remain under the control of Kaddafi supporters. Actually, there is a corridor of land, south from the coastal town of Sirte that is pro - Kaddafi. The remaining Kaddafi troops are determined, and more skilled than their NTC opponents. Crushing this last bit of Kaddafi resistance may take weeks, or longer. Sirte is under attack by some 5,000 NTC fighters, and some of the suburbs have already been captured. Several thousand are besieging Bani Walid, and moving on smaller towns in the far south. While the NTC has more gunmen than the Kaddafi forces, and the benefit of NATO air power, the NTC men are not trained for effectively fighting in urban areas. The only military tactics these guys know they picked up from TV shows or movies. As any military trainer will tell you, that kind of tactical knowledge is worse than none at all. So the NTC forces will have to use NATO bombs, or captured artillery, to destroy or demoralize the enemy, or cut off food and water and wait them out. A week of this fighting has caused several hundred NTC casualties.

September 21, 2011: Tunisia arrested Kaddafi's former prime minister (Al Baghdadi Ali al Mahmoudi), who had fled to Tunisia and hoped to get asylum. Al Mahmoudi was sentenced to six months in jail for entering the country illegally. NATO has extended its Libya operations for another 90 days, and hopes this is enough to finish things off. NATO countries are spending over $5 million a day to support their Libya operations.

September 23, 2011: A French firm revived production on an offshore oil platform. This facility produces about 40,000 barrels a day. That's worth over $40 million a month to the NTC.

September 24, 2011: NTC gunmen fought their way into the outskirts of Sirte. For the last few days, civilians have been fleeing Sirte, fearing retribution for their decades of enthusiastic support for Kaddafi (which includes joining the secret police and security forces.)

September 25, 2011: At a Tripoli prison, NTC fighters found a mass grave, containing over 1,200 bodies. This confirmed the long rumored massacre of over two thousand prisoners in 1998, as Kaddafi faced an uprising. That massacre remained a rallying point for anti -Kaddafi Libyans ever since.

September 27, 2011: Outside Bani Walid, senior NTC commander Daou al-Salhine al Jadak was killed by a barrage of rocket fire from the pro-Kaddafi defenders of the town. NTC fighters took dozens of casualties that day, and were repulsed by the town's defenders.

September 28, 2011: NTC gunmen captured the port area of Sirte. But the pro-Kaddafi forces are holding other parts of the town, and are refusing to surrender. The NTC is having a hard time getting the economy and public services going again. The economy was propped up by oil revenue, and extensive government payments to nearly all Libyans. Oil income has been cut sharply over these last few months, and finding and getting possession of the Kaddafi family billions has taken time. So, at this point, people are going hungry and losing access to medical care and basic services like electricity and clean water. There is also a problem with the thousands of NTC gunmen who came to Tripoli, and are just hanging out, taking whatever they need. The NTC also has a problem with the dozens of militias that comprise their armed forces. The commanders of these militias do not always obey orders, or simply see an order as something to be debated. There is still no agreement about who is going to run Libya, and how. Already, Islamic conservative groups are demanding religious lifestyle restrictions, which most Libyans oppose. The Islamic conservatives have to be careful, since most Libyan men (and many women) now have firearms and are determined to not be bossed around anymore. Actually, Kaddafi spread the money around during his decades of rule. But if he could not buy your obedience, he would use force, and it's the secret police, and other security forces, that became so hated. Anyone who worked for these outfits, or is related to someone who did, is in danger these days. In many parts of the country, the NTC victory has ugly side -effects. Areas known to be pro-Kaddafi (especially if they benefitted economically) are subject to looting or worse (rapes have occurred). As a result, many Kaddafi supporters have fled their homes, creating another wave of refugees. Thus as anti-Kaddafi refugees leave camps in adjacent countries, they are replaced by pro-Kaddafi refugees. Kaddafi spent over $100 billion on weapons during his decades of rule, and much of this stuff is simply being carted away by NTC men, or anyone that can get to it.

For the NTC, many of the weapons are distributed to new recruits. But for most people, the weapons are loot, to be sold or, if you are a criminal, or someone living in a rough neighborhood, kept for later use. Smugglers are buying a lot of this stuff, and moving it out of the country. For the last few months, the U.S. has had small (but growing recently) teams of weapons experts helping to find, identify and secure the most dangerous of these weapons (mainly chemical weapons and portable anti-aircraft missiles). Egypt has been making a major effort to catch the smugglers, because one of the most lucrative markets for these buyers is among the many Islamic radical groups based in Gaza. Moamar Kaddafi has disappeared, and is believed to have taken refuge with one of the Tuareg tribes living along the Algerian border. Kaddafi has long treated the Tuareg well, and those who benefitted are obliged by tribal tradition to provide refuge for their patron. Kaddafi is still getting messages out via the Internet, urging resistance to the NTC to continue. NTC fighters are increasingly heading for the southern desert, to hunt down Kaddafi forces there. Kaddafi gunmen are believed to still hold some small towns in the south, but no one is sure. Communications are difficult, and it's all very wild west/outback down there. The NTC has brought up tanks and artillery for the battles of Bani Walid and Sirte. But these have not been decisive and NTC has called on NATO warplanes to break the resistance. NATO aircraft are still flying about a hundred sorties a day, but only about half of them can be used against the two towns. The rest are for support (mostly refueling and intelligence). The NTC forces are still basically an armed rabble, that cannot stand up to determined resistance. On the coast, Kaddafi hometown Sirte (population 100,000, 360 kilometers east of Tripoli) has been the scene of even more intense fighting. One of Kaddafi's sons, Mutassim, commands the defenders in Sirte, which is considered the center of the remaining resistance. NTC forces have fought their way into Sirte, but the defenders keep fighting. The Kaddafi tribe runs Sirte, but is not the majority there. The Kaddafi tribe is less than two percent of the Libyan population and widely reviled. Once Sirte and Bani Walid fall, Kaddafi's supporters will simply be scattered groups of armed criminals, to be hunted down and killed or captured.

September 29, 2011: NTC fighters have been stalled outside Bani Walid (population 50,000, 170 kilometers southeast of Tripoli) for most of the month. This town is dominated by the Warfala tribe (which accounts for 15 percent of Libya's population). Kaddafi treated key members of the Warfala tribe well and many of those pro-Warfala men are trapped in Bani Walid. The NTC tried to avoid a battle for the town, but that failed. Now a lot of Warfala are getting killed and this will cause a hostile relationship between the new government and the nation's largest tribe. One of Kaddafi's sons, Seif al Islam, commands the defenders in Bani Walid.

September 30, 2011: The NTC brokered a truce and prisoner exchange at an oasis some 600 km (370 miles) southwest of Tripoli. Here, pro-Kaddafi Tuareg and pro-NTC Arabs have been skirmishing.

October 2, 2011: After being warned by the NTC about the coming attack, over a thousand civilians fled Sirte. In the last few weeks, over 10,000 people have fled Sirte. The pro-Kaddafi forces are believed to have 5,000 armed men in the city. About 15,000 NTC fighters surround Sirte, backed by dozens of NATO fighter-bomber sorties per day.

October 3, 2011: Another "final assault" was launched on Sirte. This one also failed, as Kaddafi loyalists shot up and repulsed the advancing NTC gunmen. Skirmishing then resumed, and NTC forces continued to capture (and often loot) villages and neighborhoods on the outskirts of Sirte. The NTC brought up more artillery (cannon and rocket launchers), to be used in bombarding Sirte. These shells and rockets tended to hit random non-military targets, as the NTC men manning the artillery had little idea of exactly where the pro-Kaddafi fighters were. NATO aircraft were still overhead, but information about what those aircraft could see on the ground, only got through to some NTC commanders. The other major Kaddafi stronghold is Bani Walid (a town of 50,000, some 150 kilometers southeast of Tripoli). Most of the inhabitants belong to the Warfala tribe (which accounts for 15 percent of Libya's population). Kaddafi treated key members of the Warfala tribe well and many of those pro-Warfala men are trapped in Bani Walid. The rebels have the town surrounded, and want to avoid a battle (which would get a lot of Warfala killed and cause a hostile relationship between the new government and the nation's largest tribe). But the NTC fighters have been slowly clearing pro-Kaddafi gunmen out of Bani Walid, and expect to capture it shortly. Kaddafi spent over $100 billion on weapons during his decades of rule, and much of this stuff is simply being carted away by NTC men, or anyone that can get to it. Criminal gangs have been trying to smuggle these weapons out of the country, with mixed success. Egypt has been making a major effort to catch the smugglers, because one of the most lucrative markets for these buyers is among the many Islamic radical groups based in Gaza. So now the Libyan arms are showing up in Sudan, where Darfur (western Sudan) rebels are working with Libyan smugglers to get the weapons into Sudan. In response to the chaos in Tripoli, a former Islamic radical leader (Abdullah Ahmed Naker) announced that he had formed the Tripoli Revolutionists Council, backed by 73 militias and over 20,000 gunmen. This new force would police the city and impose law and order. It is unclear how much of that announcement is puffery, and how much is real. The lack of discipline among NTC gunmen could be seen in the outskirts of Sirte, where homes of Kaddafi supporters were spontaneously looted, despite calls from some pro-NTC militia leaders to not do so. Even in Tripoli, there are hundreds of armed men, from one militia or another, who roam the city, setting up checkpoints, firing their weapons in the air and indulging in some light looting. Intimidated locals often just give the gunmen stuff, or do not present a bill, in the hope that these guys will move on.

October 7, 2011: NTC (National Transitional Council) fighters began yet another attempt to take the coastal town of Sirte (population 100,000, 360 kilometers east of Tripoli). This is Kaddafi's birthplace and the home of many of his core supporters (including many members of the Kaddafi tribe). One of Kaddafi's sons, Mutassim, commands the defenders in Sirte, which is considered the center of the remaining resistance. Thus the NTC has announced that the new government will not be formed until Sirte is conquered. This is not a well thought out policy (although it was presented as such), but a practical move by an NTC that isn't in charge and lurching towards a second round of civil war. In this conflict, the various anti-Kaddafi factions will battle it out to see who the new Libyan dictator will be. Moammar Kaddafi, hiding out somewhere in Libya, is calling for his supporters to get ready for the next round of fighting, and the possibility of the Kaddafis regaining power, or at least a place at the table.

October 10, 2011: The NTC has recognized their Syrian counterpart (the Syrian National Council, or SNC). Many UN members (especially non-democracies) opposed the NATO bombing campaign in Libya, and don't want the same sort of thing to happen in Syria. Such a trend would threaten the leaders of the many non-democracies on the planet. China is still a communist police state. Russia, while officially a democracy, has turned into an oligarchy run by former members of the KGB (secret police). Neither of these countries wants democracy to spread. Many countries have still not recognized the NTC as the rulers of Libya. In Sirte, NTC gunmen seized key sites (like the university and some commercial areas) and Kaddafi supporters retreated towards residential neighborhoods where they kept their families.

October 12, 2011: The NTC announced the capture of Kaddafi son Mutassim in Sirte. But there has been no confirmation, and by Friday, some NTC brigade leaders in Sirte said a few of Mutassim's bodyguards were captured, but not Mutassim himself. Today, NTC fighters spread into most parts of Sirte, using truck mounted anti-aircraft guns to kill or drive away snipers operating from buildings. Islamic conservative groups have damaged Sufi shrines in Tripoli. The Sufi, like the Shia (and many similar groups) are minority Islamic sects that conservative factions among the majority Sunni consider heretical. This often leads to violence, as it has for decades in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Al Qaeda, and similar groups, are particularly active in going after "heretical" Moslems. The heretics often fight back, and most Moslems do not back the radicals. The NTC is trying to avoid a battle between Islamic radicals and the rest of the population, lest Libya suffer what Iraq, Pakistan and Iran are going through. The problem is that the Islamic radicals can often obtain enough popular support to sustain the Islamic terrorists for months or years of violence. Egypt revealed that it had recently captured men from five different smuggling gangs, who were bringing in weapons from Libya and trying to get them into Gaza (where Hamas, and other terrorists, will pay the best price.) Kaddafi had millions of small, and very portable weapons (assault rifles, machine-guns, mortars and anti-aircraft missiles) in warehouses (usually in military bases) that lost their security over the last few months and were plundered. These weapons will end up being sold throughout North Africa and to the south, causing an increase in violence and deaths. The U.S. has sent in dozens of civilian (but former military) arms experts, to track the weapons, get an accurate count of how many there are and seek ways to regain control of them (by persuasion, purchase or force.) The NTC is still having a lot of trouble organizing a government. There are several problems. For one thing, Libya has never had a democracy, so this form of government is largely foreign to Libyans. They have heard of it, but never done it. Second, Libya is an artificial country. For thousands of years it was three or more separate entities. Unification came, via Italian colonial administrators, a century ago. That lasted until 1947, followed by two decades of monarchy, then Kaddafi's dictatorship. Kaddafi himself is believed to be hiding in the mountains and desert in the south, with the aid of Tuareg tribes that had long benefitted from Kaddafi generosity. Kaddafi considered himself a "man of the desert" (he actually was not, his family and tribe lived along the coast) and supported the Tuareg because they were religiously and socially conservative and were quick to rebel against authority. Kaddafi encouraged such rebellious behavior among Tuareg tribes in neighboring countries. Kaddafi loved to stir things up, except in his own country. Despite all this, there is a Tuareg faction in the NTC. The other major Kaddafi stronghold is Bani Walid (a town of 50,000, some 150 kilometers southeast of Tripoli). Here, the NTC fighters are proceeding more slowly. The capture of Sirte (population 100,000, 360 kilometers east of Tripoli) is seen as the key to "defeating Kaddafi." Once Sirte falls, defeating other pro-Kaddafi groups is seen as mopping up. Maybe, maybe not.

October 14, 2011: In Sirte (Kaddafi's birthplace), NTC gunmen retreated two kilometers from two residential neighborhoods in the northwest part of the city. These areas are held by several hundred determined Kaddafi soldiers who launched a counterattack. The NTC men had not bombed and shelled these two neighborhoods because of the civilians believed to be there. But now these residential areas will be reduced to rubble, like most of Sirte. NTC hopes to crush the Sirte resistance within a week, but many hardcore Kaddafi supporters believe they must fight or die. Some captured Kaddafi supporters have been tortured or executed, and this makes the remaining Kaddafi gunmen reluctant to give up.

HISTORY: The last of Muammar Al-Quadhafi's Address to Libyans'

In the name of Allah, the ...beneficent, the merciful...

For 40 years, or was it longer, I can't remember, I did all I could to give pe...ople houses, hospitals, schools, and when they were hungry, I gave them food. I even made Benghazi into farmland from the desert, I stood up to attacks from that cowboy Ronald Reagan, when he killed my adopted orphaned daughter, he was trying to kill me, instead he killed that poor innocent child. Then I helped my brothers and sisters from Africa with money for the African Union.

Idid all I could to help people Understand the concept of real democracy, where people's committees ran our country. But that was never enough, as some told me, even people who had 10 room homes, new suits and furniture, were never satisfied, as selfish as they were they wanted more. They told Americans and other visitors, that they needed "democracy" and "freedom" never realizing it was a cut throat system, where the biggest dog eats the rest, but they were enchanted with those words, never realizing that in America, there was no free medicine, no free hospitals, no free housing, no free education and no free food, except when people had to beg or go to long lines to get soup.

No, no matter what I did, it was never enough for some, but for others, they knew I was the son of Gamal Abdel Nasser, the only true Arab and Muslim leader we've had since Salah-al-Deen, when he claimed the Suez Canal for his people, as I claimed Libya, for my people, it was his footsteps I tried to follow, to keep my people free from colonial domination - from thieves who would steal from us.

Now, I am under attack by the biggest force in military history, my little African son, Obama wants to kill me, to take away the freedom of our country, to take away our free housing, our free medicine, our free education, our free food, and replace it with American style thievery, called "capitalism" ,but all of us in the Third World know what that means, it means corporations run the countries, run the world, and the people suffer.

So, there is no alternative for me, I must make my stand, and if Allah wishes, I shall die by following His path, the path that has made our country rich with farmland, with food and health, and even allowed us to help our African and Arab brothers and sisters.

Ido not wish to die, but if it comes to that, to save this land, my people, all the thousands who are all my children, then so be it.

Let this testament be my voice to the world, that I stood up to crusader attacks of NATO, stood up to cruelty, stoop up to betrayal, stood up to the West and its colonialist ambitions, and that I stood with my African brothers, my true Arab and Muslim brothers, as a beacon of light.

When others were building castles, I lived in a modest house, and in a tent. I never forgot my youth in Sirte, I did not spend our national treasury foolishly, and like Salah-al-Deen, our great Muslim leader, who rescued Jerusalem for Islam, I took little for myself...

In the West, some have called me "mad", "crazy", but they know the truth yet continue to lie, they know that our land is independent and free, not in the colonial grip, that my vision, my path, is, and has been clear and for my people and that I will fight to my last breath to keep us free, may Allah almighty help us to remain faithful and free. -Mu'ummar Al- Quadhafi. May Allah 4give and grant you with Jannatul firdaus. Ameeen

October 14, 2011: In Tripoli, a few dozen Kaddafi supporters marched in support of the dictator. NTC militiamen sought to disperse the crowd, and gunfire broke out.

October 15, 2011: Fighting with Kaddafi supporters continued in Tripoli. There was also tension between militia coalitions over who had police authority in Tripoli. It was believed that less than a dozen armed Kaddafi supporters were involved, and affluent neighborhoods housing Kaddafi supporters were being searched by NTC gunmen.

October 17, 2011: The other major Kaddafi stronghold, Bani Walid (a town of 50,000, some 150 kilometers southeast of Tripoli), has been captured. The remaining Kaddafi supporters fled, but NTC gunmen are searching the town for any armed Kaddafi supporters who have gone into hiding.

October 19, 2011: In Sirte, NTC gunmen launched another major assault on Kaddafi supporters. This time, thanks to precision NATO bombing, and a dwindling number of Kaddafi fighters, the only remaining neighborhood seemed likely to be cleared.

October 20, 2011: Attempting to flee Sirte in a convoy, Kaddafi was forced out of his vehicle by a NATO bomb and took cover. But soon NTC gunmen found and captured him. About fifty Kaddafi followers were killed or captured (and then usually killed) during the failed escape attempt.

Moammar Kaddafi and his son Motassim were declared dead in Sirte. The cell phone camera, which had proved so valuable in getting the news of Kaddafi brutality to the rest of the world, now documented how Kaddafi and his son, and several supporters, were also murdered after their capture. A video was broadcast, on a pro-Kaddafi Syrian TV station, showing Moammar Kaddafi's son Motassim captured and alive. The next day, the NTC denied that they had Motassim. Now it appears that he was captured and executed. Many factions have gone to Tripoli, or sent part of their forces there. For the rebels, Tripoli is the prize. Not only is it the capital, but it contains the homes and assets of many Kaddafi supporters. What these people own is considered loot for the rebel fighters, and the looting has been going on for several weeks now. Efforts to establish law and order have been weak. Last month, a former Islamic radical leader (Abdullah Ahmed Naker) announced that he had formed the Tripoli Revolutionists Council, backed by 73 militias and over 20,000 gunmen. This new force would police the city and impose law and order. It is unclear how much of that announcement is puffery, and how much is real. Naker claims he is operating under the authority of the NTC, but other militia groups claim they have authority in Tripoli. There have been threats and some heated arguments between the rival militias, but no large-scale fighting, yet.

October 20, 2011: The al-Quadhafi Family Tree’

The whereabouts, relationships and former roles of the family of ousted leader Colonel Muammar Al-Quadhafi after his capture and death in his Libyan hometown of Sirte is unknown.

October 23, 2011: Interim National Transitional Council leader Mustafa Abdel Jalil announced that the new Libya would be a democracy based on Islamic law. This was said during a ceremony officially recognizing the liberation of Libya from Kaddafi. The problem now is to determine what Libya will become. Establishing law and order is only one of many urgent tasks facing the NTC. While the oil is flowing again, and in every increasing quantity there is an acute labor shortage. Many of the management and technical people who made things work have fled. Many of these key people were foreigners. While it is common for oil rich Arab states to import foreigners to run their economies, Kaddafi preferred foreigners for many government jobs, apparently because he found the foreigners more trustworthy (or easier to get rid of). Now the NTC finds itself with a big shortage of skilled managers and techies. Nothing happens if you give orders and there's no one able to carry them out. Just getting electricity and water supply working again has been difficult. There's an even more poignant problem with thousands of wounded NTC fighters, who have not been able to get the medical care they need. The NTC has gotten a lot of cash, weapons and advice from Qatar, and oil rich Kuwait. The Arab Gulf States are flooding Tripoli with advisors, people who speak the language, understand the culture and want to help establish a new Libya that is peaceful, not another threat to Arab nations and the rest of the world. This may be the most crucial foreign aid effort in post -Kaddafi Libya. It's not just the desire for revenge that is a problem, but how it plays out. You don't appreciate how valuable law and order is until you don't have it. The NTC has already had problems with some of the dozens of militias refusing to take orders from anyone. If some form of order is not established, that's how the new war will begin; with warlords and their armed followers fighting over plunder and power. There is a widespread desire for vengeance against the ten percent of the population that formed Kaddafi's core supporters. These families grew prosperous in Kaddafi's service, and now they face economic and social ruin. But who will get what from the unprotected Kaddafi followers? In addition to civil war, there is retribution, which has been occurring more frequently as the Kaddafi forces lost ground. The revenge attacks were particularly evident in Sirte, the coastal town of 100,000 that was Kaddafi's birthplace and was full of his well -cared for supporters. Sirte was heavily damaged, and looted, during the final battle. Most of the population fled the fighting, and when they return they will find a much less prosperous lifestyle. This is what will motivate a lot of people to oppose the new government, and that will cause lasting bitterness. This will be prolonged by the fact that clans and tribes supported Kaddafi, and these groups often occupy specific areas. Here, armed opponents of the government can find shelter and support.

October 24, 2011: With Kaddafi dead, the next battles involve organizing a functional government, deciding what type of government, and avoiding a civil war between dozens of armed, and independent minded factions. Foreign supporters, especially in the West, have suddenly, and not surprisingly, turned hostile. Libyans who apparently executed Kaddafi, and his followers, after capture are being threatened with prosecution for war crimes. Western and Moslem nations who supported the NTC are fearful that better organized and more fanatic Islamic radical factions will take over the government, and establish another dictatorship, this time one based just on religion, not one man's megalomania. Another feared option is civil war, because regional loyalties are seen as more potent than religious ones. The major splits are between the east (centered on Benghazi) and west (Tripoli) along the coast (where most of the population has always lived). The third region is the dry, but oil-rich interior. Here the population is largely Berber and Tuareg (nomadic tribes in southern Libya). There are people from the coast, who comprise most of the Libyan work force in the oil fields. The people of the interior are further split by past loyalties. The Berbers hated Kaddafi, while the Tuaregs were better treated and remained loyal to the end.

October 25, 2011: Muammar Kaddafi and his son Motassim were buried in a secret, unmarked desert grave.

October 27, 2011: In neighboring Tunisia, a moderate Islamist party won control of parliament and will form a government. The Islamic groups in Libya are also maneuvering to gain control of the new Libyan government. Elections are to be held within the year. So far, the Islamic groups have not made any overt move to take control. While prominent among the rebel militias, the Islamic radicals are not particularly popular in Libya.

November 4, 2011: NATO weapons inspectors have found Kaddafi-era chemical weapons (mustard gas), some of which were being destroyed according to international treaty. These weapons, which were invented during World War I (1914-18) were never used by Libya, and no seems to have tried to steal any of them during the chaos of the revolution. However, it's unclear if all the chemical weapons being found had previously been "declared" by Kaddafi (in 2004) and scheduled for destruction (by May 15th of this year). If there are undeclared chemical weapons, there may be a lot of them, and some of them may be still hidden.

October 31, 2011: NATO ended their air campaign over Libya, after seven months. Some 26,000 sorties were flown, nearly 40 percent of them combat missions. The NTC wanted the mission extended a few more weeks, but NATO refused.

November 6, 2011: A convoy of vehicles from Libya was intercepted in northern Niger, near the Algerian border. A gun battle ensued, leaving 13 people from the convoy dead and one soldier wounded. Thirteen people were captured and it was confirmed that the several dozen people in the convoy were Libyans being guided by Tuareg tribesmen from Mali. Thousands of pro-Kaddafi Libyans have followed this route, and Niger is turning back those who cannot pay their own way. Niger does not want to host a lot of broke and angry Libyans. Niger also wants to avoid becoming a base for a pro-Kaddafi guerilla war in Libya. Niger is already taking a lot of diplomatic heat for granting asylum to Kaddafi officials.

November 12, 2011: Niger has decided to give asylum to Kaddafi son Saadi. Another son, Seif al Islam is believed to be somewhere out in the southern Libya desert, trying to make his way to the Niger border. Both sons are wanted for war crimes. The cash shortage means the NTC cannot pay for armed men to be sent to the many weapons depots, to guard them and prevent arms smugglers from carting off the stuff for resale. Foreign governments are demanding better security, and the NTC is hinting that some foreign aid for this specific problem would be appropriate. Oil production is up to about 35 percent of its pre-war level of 1.7 million barrels a day. About ten percent of the oil facilities were damaged during the rebellion, and repairs won't be complete for another 6-8 months. Oil shipments are expected to pass 50 percent of the pre-war level before the end of the year. Local refineries are going again, reducing fuel shortages. Exports are bringing in over $40 million a day, which is going to reconstruction and the generous social welfare payments that Kaddafi believed would keep him in power indefinitely. The NTC has announced that it will disarm (or at least disband) the dozens of rebel militias and create security forces (police and military). But actually doing this is complicated by the tribal militias and growing number of "payback" attacks on real or imagined Kaddafi supporters. Restoring law and order is going to be very difficult, especially since Kaddafi maintained order largely with secret police and deals with tribal leaders. There have been several other disputes between armed groups, but most are resolved, or at least delayed, without gunfire. There are thousands of rebel gunmen who lost family or friends in the fighting, along with economic loss (home, business or vehicle destroyed) and are looking for revenge and restitution. For the last month, rebels have often sought bloody revenge from Kaddafi supporters, some of whom are still armed. The Kaddafi fans have fallen back on their tribal organizations, and there is a tradition of calling up large numbers of armed men to defend the tribe. The town of Zawiya was a rebel stronghold in the midst of a region that was largely pro-Kaddafi. The rebels held all or part of Zawiya throughout the war. Zawiya controls the road from Tripoli to Tunisia. This was a key supply line for Kaddafi, and the rebels made it largely unusable. The rebel defenders of Zawiya suffered a lot and some of them want payback from their former foes. The Zawiya rebels are going into neighborhoods they know (or believe) Wershifanna live and stealing vehicles, and anything else that strikes their fancy. The local armed Wershifanna resisted and the battles began. A more immediate source of dispute is possession of a major military base. The rebels believe it is theirs by right of conquest, while the Wershifanna point out that it is in their tribal territory. It is believed that there are rebel fighters on both sides of this one.

November 14, 2011: For the last week or so, young rebels from the port city of Zawiya (50 kilometers west of Tripoli) have been fighting groups of men from the local Wershifanna tribe. There have been over a hundred casualties. The rebel fighters accuse the Wershifanna men of having fought for Kaddafi (some did, as the Wershifanna benefitted from living in the Tripoli area and serving Kaddafi). But some Wershifanna were rebels, and there are Wershifanna representatives on the NTC (National Transitional Council) that now (sort of) runs the country. While the representatives of the Zawiya rebels and the Wershifanna on the NTC can agree on a peace deal, they are having a hard time selling it to the young guys out on the coast road who have been shooting at each other.

November 15, 2011: Several hundred uniformed soldiers of the new Libyan Army were sent to the city of Zawiya to halt renewed fighting between rival tribal militias.

November 19, 2011: The last Kaddafi son at large, Saif al Islam Kaddafi, was captured in the south while trying to sneak across the border into Niger.

November 20, 2011: Abdullah al Senussi, the head of intelligence for the Kaddafi government, was captured in the south. NATO intelligence experts will want to interrogate Senussi for what he knows about terror groups Kaddafi supported.

November 24, 2011: The senior officials of the new government were announced and many tribal leaders complained that the tribes were being ignored.

November 26, 2011: The government held a conference of tribal leaders to address the demands of the tribes. Many tribes believe that the new government does not adequately address the interests of the tribes. Many of the rebel militias are based on tribal membership and the tribes are reluctant to disband their tribal armies.

November 28, 2011: A meeting of 250 religious leaders called for disarming civilians and instituting Islamic (Sharia) law. There is popular support for collecting lots of weapons, but not as much for Islamic law. People don't want a religious dictatorship to replace Kaddafi's.

December 1, 2011: The government announced that 50,000 rebel fighters would be trained to be professional soldiers, while another 150,000 rebel gunmen would receive other benefits. All this is part of an effort to disband the dozens of rebel militias that appeared in the seven months before the Kaddafi government fell in August.

December 2, 2011: The UN has extended its work "mandate" in Libya for another three months, to help the new government get organized. The UN is also trying to ensure that the 7,000 prisoners the new government is holding are not mistreated. Many of these prisoners committed atrocities for Kaddafi. In Tripoli, rival militias began shooting at each other. One man was killed and several buildings destroyed.

December 4, 2011: The government has set up a committee to investigate corruption in the oil industry during the Kaddafi years. Billions of dollars in oil profits were believed to be stolen and the new government wants to find who took what, so the guilty can be punished and the money can be recovered. This effort is also meant to discourage new oil corruption problems.

December 5, 2011: In Central Libya, ten people were killed when someone lit a cigarette in a ammunition storage facility. Seven of those killed were African migrants hired as laborers. The government, with NATO help, is still hustling to secure Kaddafi era military bases.

December 6, 2011: Al Qaeda openly urged Libyans to hold on to their weapons, and resist government attempts to collect illegal weapons. Al Qaeda is not popular in Libya, but holding on to an assault rifle or pistol is. Residents of Tripoli have until the end of the month to turn in illegal weapons. This mostly means heavy weapons (mortars, machine-guns and RPGs, but also grenades and explosives). The new government has agreed to crack down on the smuggling of Africans and Arabs to Italy. There's an Italian island 100 kilometers from Libya that the smugglers head for. Once on Italian territory, EU law requires that the illegal migrants be taken care of and often allowed to stay in Europe. This is very unpopular in Europe. NATO asked for the new Libyan government to show some gratitude by helping to halt the flood of illegal migrants. The unruly militias have also caused problems on the Tunisian border, where undisciplined militiamen have gotten into gun battles with Tunisian border guards.

December 7, 2011: The government has given militias from outside the city until December 20th to leave Tripoli. If these militias do not leave the government will close Tripoli to outside traffic and take additional unspecified actions. Several militias are still roaming the city, doing pretty much whatever they want. Militias from places like Zintan and Misarata have taken control of parts of the city and refuse to go. They set up their own checkpoints and take bribes to allow people to pass. Eleven local militias have been organized as the new police for the city, taking control of areas they come from. The national government wants to avoid battles between the local and outside militias.

December 8, 2011: The NTC announced that it would provide amnesty to most of the men who fought for dead dictator Kaddafi.

December 9, 2011: Britain announced that its Libyan military operations had cost about $300 million.
A third of that was for munitions (mostly smart bombs and missiles).
The total cost of NATO operations in Libya was probably less than $5 billion.

December 10, 2011: There was gunfire in Tripoli, as one of the rebel brigades got into a gunfight with one of the new army units. At least two people were killed and several others wounded. The troops are trying to shut down all the rebel brigade checkpoints, which are often used to extort money and goods from travelers. In one incident, rebels tried to kill the head of the new Libyan Army.

December 16, 2011: The U.S. has lifted most economic sanctions on Libya, enabling the new government to gain access to billions of dollars the Kaddafi government has stashed overseas. But many Libyans fear that many of the unelected members of the NTC will try, and succeed in stealing, a lot of this money. The NTC is not being very open about how it operates and this is usually a sign that bad things are going on behind the bureaucratic smokescreen. The most dangerous of these mi ssiles are the recently (2004) introduced Igla-S models. Also known as the SA-24, this one is a post-Cold War upgrade of a design that was introduced the same time as the American Stinger. The Igla-S in the hands of terrorists could bring down helicopters and airliners taking off. The exact number of these missiles Russia sold to Libya has not been made public (estimates vary from hundreds to thousands). Nor is it known how many of these missiles Libya still had when the rebellion broke out earlier this year. The U.S. has offered to help disarm the rebel brigades by offering cash for the surrender of shoulder fired anti-aircraft missiles. Over the last three decades some 20,000 of these weapons were bought by Libya. During the 2011 rebellion, thousands of these missiles were believed to have been stolen. Many older Sa-7Bs were seized by the rebels early on and some were used against Kadaffi's aircraft. But it was soon found that some had been taken by criminals or Islamic radicals and moved out of the country. NATO forces teams have seized 5,000 of the Libyan missiles, and at least as many were destroyed from the air. But about half of Kaddafi's missiles are unaccounted for. Most are older, and now, useless models. But some of them are of a more recent vintage. The government has prioritized its security efforts. Taking control of border crossings, providing security for oil facilities, and seeking to maintain controls in the largest city (Tripoli) are all under way. But that means rebel brigades operate unhindered in many parts of the country. Meanwhile, the majority of the rebel brigades has apparently organized themselves into the "Union of Rebels in Libya" and is demanding 40 percent of the seats on the NTC (National Transitional Council) that now tries to run the country. It's a common problem that the armed men who did most of the fighting during the revolution tend to demand a large reward, often in the form of political power, after victory is won. If these privileges are obtained, they often last for generations, usually until the next revolution. Giving into the rebels guarantees continuing unrest because the rebel factions disproportionately represent some tribal, ethnic, or political groups and this generates continuing friction. Elections are supposed to take place in June and this rebel demand will have to be settled by then.

December 30, 2011: The year ends with over a hundred rebel "brigades" refusing to disband. These rebels act like the war is still on and sustain themselves by taking what they want. This makes the brigades increasingly unpopular. The new government is trying to recruit the rebels into government jobs (including the army, but preferably a job that does not require weapons) or at least get the "brigades" (each with anywhere from a few dozen to a few hundred armed men) to surrender the heavy weapons (armored vehicles, mortars, missiles, and heavy machine -guns) they took from Kaddafi era troops and military bases. The government does not want to use force to disarm the brigades, but for many of these rebels that will eventually have to be done, with some violence and residual bad feelings. Meanwhile, the government has all that oil money and, as Kaddafi discovered, you can calm down a lot of people with steady, and well paid, employment.

Was Arab Spring a proceed of the 1979 Iranian Revolution?

No. The Arab Spring cannot be considered as a continuation of the Iranian revolution. Because the Arab Spring (read winter) happened a long way from the Iranian revolution.

The Arab Spring started in Tunisia and excited the disgruntled people of other Arab countries so that they too could work towards achieving their dreams. He needed more than dissatisfaction and protest.

The Iranian revolution in 1979 had a promising message to dissatisfied people around the world, and that message was: Revolution and overthrow of superpowers and dictators is not impossible.

Perhaps the impact of the Iranian revolution on the Arab Spring is just as great.

Related Links

What caused the Iranian Revolution in 1979?

Would Iran be doing much better now if the Islamic Revolution never happened in 1979?

Do modern day Iranian people regret the 1979 revolution?

Why did the Iran revolution happen in 1979 and not earlier?

How would history be different if the Iranian Revolution of 1979 had not happened?

How great was CIA involvement in the 1979 Iranian revolution?

June 16, 2012: For the second time in the last four months, Islamic radicals have desecrated World War II era graves of Western soldiers in eastern Libya. This is a major embarrassment for the NTC, which knows it needs to work with the West (to sell the oil and import goods and services). At the same time the NTC does not want the local Islamic radicals to declare war on the NTC. The new government may eventually have to go to war with these Islamic terror groups and trigger a round of terrorist violence.

June 20, 2012: Fighting between black African and Arab tribes around the southeastern town of Kufra has left over a hundred dead.

June 24, 2012: Tunisia agreed to a Libyan request and extradited the former prime minister (Al Baghdadi Ali al Mahmoudi) for the Kaddafi government. Mahmoudi fled to Tunisia about a year ago.

June 27, 2012: A Tunisian fishing ship, with a crew of 19, entered Libyan waters and was spotted by a Libyan patrol boat. The Tunisian ship ignored calls to halt and was fired on. The Tunisian captain was killed and two sailors were wounded. The rest of the crew was arrested and the fishing ship brought to a Libyan port.

June 29, 2012: Near the Libyan border Egyptian police seized 138 122mm rockets (with a range of about 20 kilometers), and some other weapons, that were smuggled in from Libya and apparently headed for a buyer in Gaza. Police are seizing an increasing number of weapons that Libyans have stolen from abandoned (during the rebellion last year) military bases. Smugglers are now trying to get the weapons into neighboring countries where the stuff can be sold.

More fighting between black African and Arab tribes around the southeastern town of Kufra has left about fifty dead in the last few days. This violence has been going on for months and has left nearly 400 dead so far. The fighting has been getting worse in the last month. The disputes are largely about control of water and land and are part of centuries old animosity between the Arabs and black Africans. The two tribes involved have a long history of conflict.

July 1, 2012: Separatist groups in the east attacked election headquarters in Benghazi. Pro-separatist militias are the most violent, and determined, in the east (the ancient province of Cyrenaica).

July 2, 2012: ICC (International Criminal Court) members were released from jail. On June 7th two members of an ICC team (an Australian lawyer and Lebanese interpreter) were arrested when they showed up in Zintan to discuss having the ICC prosecute Seif al Islam Kaddafi, the son of the former dictator. The local militias want to prosecute Seif, not trusting anyone else to do it right. The ICC has not made itself popular in Libya by claiming superior authority to prosecute Seif. The ICC personnel were accused of spying and were not released until senior ICC officials came to Libya and apologized.

July 7, 2012: For the first time in over 40 years, Libya held national elections. Meanwhile, groups demanding more autonomy for eastern Libya have shut down half of Libyan oil exports.

Western intelligence officials have revealed that there is increasing chatter, and planning, among Islamic radical groups, to try and take advantage of the unsettled situation in places like Libya. The goal remains the same: taking control of the Moslem nation and using that as a springboard for world conquest.

Islamic conservatives appeal to about 20 percent of the population, and this would be enough to sustain an Islamic terrorist campaign. This is what Libyans fear the most, a replay of the Islamic terror that has already occurred in Egypt and Algeria in the 1990s, and Iraq a decade later. Al Qaeda and their ilk may only appeal to a minority, but the fact that these groups even exist in Libya is alarming to nearly all Libyans. Most of the Islamic conservatives openly denounce terrorism, but some groups do not. The appeal of Islamic conservatism is that they will be less corrupt than more secular rulers. However, the experience is that the Islamic conservatives quickly become corrupt once they gain power and are more inclined to oppose elections and retain power indefinitely.

About 85 percent of Libya's six million people live along the coast. About five percent are still nomadic. About 90 percent are Arabic-speakers of mixed Arab-Berber ancestry. Berbers who retain their ancient language and culture, comprise only four percent and most of them live in small villages in the western hill country south of Tripoli. Other minorities comprise about six percent of the population. Nearly 100 percent of the population speaks at least some Arabic and 97 percent are Sunni Moslems.

This development spotlights some fundamental truths about the country. Libya has three distinct physical regions: the northwest coast, the northeast coast, and the Sahara Desert southern region that covers more than 90 percent of the nation. The northwest coastal region (the old Roman province of Tripolitania) consists of the narrow coastal plain and the Jaffara Plain inland. The northeastern Libyan coastal region (roughly the old Roman province of Cyrenaica) lies to the east of the Gulf of Sidra.

The main opponents of the new government will be Islamic radicals and the separatists. Also out there are Kaddafi fans but they will likely keep their heads down because they are still violently hated by most Libyans. The major divisions in the country are ancient. For example, some Libyans still refer to the east by its ancient name, Cyrenaica. Before Kaddafi took over in the 1960s, the monarchy ruled the country as three provinces, each with more autonomy than Kaddafi ever allowed. Many Libyans want a return to this. The eastern group calling for autonomy is led by a great-nephew of the last king of Libya. Compared to Kaddafi, old timers remember royal rule as much kinder and gentler.

In addition to the voters, there are also over 100,000 armed members of over 200 local militias. Some of these are vigilante groups intent on keeping the peace, but many are led by men promising large rewards from the government in return for their men disarming. Some militias have announced that they will never disband and that their demands (Islamic law, autonomy for an area, a guaranteed share of oil revenue) are non-negotiable. The NTC (National Transitional Council) has concentrated on short-term solutions to these militias. Jobs and cash have been handed out freely for temporary peace but this will stop when the elected government assumes power. The new government will have to decide which militias to negotiate with and which to fight. Kaddafi stayed in power for as long as he did by using a combination of rewards and violence against his allies and opponents. This is all most Libyans have known and is likely to return as the primary governing strategy.

July 9, 2012: The voting that began on the 7th is over and results are starting to come in. The Islamic parties have admitted that they lost to the secularist parties in the cities. This is where most Libyans live. But the Islamic groups hope to pick up some seats in the south, where the tribes there are more traditional and religiously conservative. The new parliament will form a government and write a new constitution before the next national elections. The new legislature will have 200 members. While 80 seats are reserved for political parties, 120 seats are contested by individuals. There are 142 political parties and 3,700 individual candidates going after those 200 seats. About 1.7 million of 2.8 million registered voters participated.

July 13, 2012: In Jordan 150 Libyans who had just completed police training rioted when told that the Libyan airline that was to fly them home had delayed their flight. The riots led to buildings being burned down and the use of Jordanian riot police to end the violence.

The program was soon corrupted (not unusual in Libya). Local militia and tribal authorities were allowed to decide who was eligible to go abroad for treatment and the NTC provided cash for that purpose. But soon anyone with the right connections, or a large enough bribe, got a trip to a European or Moslem country for "medical treatment." Many of those going abroad on this program were not ill but they got to take family members as well and expected the NTC to pay them a stipend (several hundred dollars a month) while they were abroad. But many of these travelers were actually migrating and the NTC cut off the stipends and cracked down on who was going. The NTC had to do this because the "medical treatment abroad" program was draining huge amounts of cash from what little the NTC had and making most Libyans (who were not in on the boondoggle) angry.

July 15, 2012: Attempts to crack down on corruption have caused more problems. For example, over 200 Libyans staged a violent demonstration outside the Libyan embassy in Jordan. The demonstrators want the Libyan government to provide them with lots of money for medical, travel, and living expenses. The Libyan government had halted these payments because most of the expense claims were false. All this was because of a program last year to provide medical treatment abroad for wounded rebels.

July 16, 2012: In the southwestern town of Ghadames (on the Algerian border) tribal raiders attacked and killed seven people and wounded over twenty. The raiders were from one of several black African tribes that fled the cities after Kaddafi was defeated. Black Libyans were seen as Kaddafi loyalists (although most were not) and generally persecuted by the rebel militias.

There are still towns and villages in the interior that are dominated by pro-Kaddafi militias. The government has been too busy trying to keep the peace on the coast (where most Libyans, and independent minded militias, live). But eventually the thousands of armed Kaddafi diehards will have to be dealt with.

The newly elected government is encountering resistance from over a hundred armed militias who refuse to hand over 5,000 prisoners. Most of those held are considered Kaddafi loyalists or "war criminals" (for killing civilians during last year's revolution). The government has been able to prevent mass executions of these militia prisoners but there is no judicial system to try them or functioning prisons to hold those convicted. The government has taken control of over two dozen jails throughout the country but has not been able to put all of them back into operation. The NTC itself holds about 4,000 prisoners.

The majority of Libyans are not shy letting anyone know that they do not want Islamic radicals or, as they call them, "Taliban" running the country. Al Qaeda's murderous policies in Iraq, and elsewhere, have turned most Moslems against Islamic terrorism. That sort of thing obviously kills more Moslems than kaffirs (non-Moslems) and is thus unacceptable. But local opposition does not always stop the Islamic terror groups from trying to impose their will anyway, after all, they are on a Mission From God.

Speaking of law, most Libyans indicated they want law based on Sharia (Islamic law) but not Sharia itself. Women want equal (or at least more equal) rights and everyone wants a modern (rather than medieval) version of Sharia.

The NFA and its allies captured nearly half the seats in parliament and will be able to form a coalition government with some smaller reform-minded groups, or maybe not. Inexperience in running a democracy is causing lots of unexpected problems. One of the more ominous ones is accusations by some Islamic conservative parties that they were cheated in the election and righteous violence might be the right response to such mistreatment. That would be a mistake and most Islamic conservatives know it.

July 25, 2012: The July 7th elections put non-Islamic conservatives into power. But the majority party, the National Forces Alliance (NFA) contains many leaders who were active in the NTC (National Transitional Council) that exercised shaky control over the country since the Kaddafi government lost power a year ago. There are still dozens of major tribes and warlords with armed militias and unwillingness to obey all orders from the NTC or, apparently, the newly elected NFA government. The major challenge is to restore rule of law and government without triggering armed resistance from the independent minded militias.

July 29, 2012: In Benghazi someone murdered a former senior intelligence officer, who had joined the rebels early on. There are no suspects, other than families of those who may have lost kin to the Kaddafi intelligence services. That would be a long list of suspects.

Outside the city the convoy of a top military commander was fired on.

July 31, 2012: In Benghazi militia gunmen kidnapped seven Iranian aid workers. There were no ransom or any other demands made for the release of the Iranians. The militiamen only said that they were questioning the captives to see if they were in Libya to try and spread Shia Islam. Iran has the largest Shia population on the planet, but most Sunni Islamic radicals consider Shia heretics and often kill them. Iran has appealed to the UN to get its aid workers released.

Someone raided a jail in Benghazi overnight and released an Islamic terrorist.

August 1, 2012: In Benghazi someone threw a bomb out of a car in an attack on military headquarters. This time the explosion did not hurt anyone. This is the third such attack on this location this year.

South of Tripoli police tracked down some of the men responsible for seven recent bombing attempts. The three would not surrender and were killed. Police captured weapons and bomb components.

In Tripoli there was a brief battle in a market place as two groups fought to see who would get a prime location. One person was wounded.

August 5, 2012: For the fifth time in three months a Red Cross compound (this one in Misrata) was attacked. There were no injuries but the Red Cross halted its operations in Misrata and Benghazi (where earlier attacks had occurred). Islamic radicals are suspected as they object to the Red Cross (which is from non-Moslem countries) on religious grounds.

August 6, 2012: Mauritania refused a request to extradite Moamar Kaddafi's former intelligence chief, Abdullah al Senoussi back to Libya. Senoussi has been jailed in Mauritania, since last May, for trying to enter the country in disguise (as a Tuareg). Senoussi is wanted in Libya and France for various crimes. He is also a potential source of insider information on the Kaddafi government. It is believed that Mauritanian officials want a payoff to either extradite Senoussi or let him go free.

August 7, 2012: Libya is offering to allow over half a million Egyptians to return to their jobs in Libya if Egypr will give up assets former Libyan dictator Kaddafi and his cronies stashed in Egypt. This is a tempting offer. Like all oil-rich Arab states, Libya depended on skilled foreigners for key technical jobs (especially medicine and running the oil operations) and unskilled foreigners for the dirty jobs no Libyan wanted to do (garbage collection and unskilled labor tasks). Some foreign workers have already returned, relying for safety on the assurances of the company or local government they are working for.

At least 30 Libyan rebel fighters have made their way to Syria and joined the rebels there. Videos of the armed Libyans in Syria have been released on the Internet.

A major reason no one can get the government going is corruption. This bribery and theft was somewhat organized under Kaddafi, but now it's a free-for-all and too much money just disappears before it can be spent on needed goods or services. NTC officials found that local leaders could not be trusted and they would often steal much of the money they have been given for distribution to individuals and families. This lack of "civil society" (enough people willing to work for the public good without stealing or engaging in other forms of corruption) is causing widespread anger and resistance to any new national government. While tribal leaders are more trustworthy, they will also steal. But not as much as strangers and at least you know who the tribal leaders are and who they are related to. Thus the resurgence of tribal politics, for the tribe is an ancient form of government that, in chaotic times, is often the only viable alternative.

August 8, 2012: As agreed, the NTC (National Transitional Council) has handed control of the government over to the recently elected parliament. Forming a new government and running the country won't be easy. There are still dozens of major militias that refuse to cooperate and many more armed groups that will be troublesome if they don't get their way. Attempts to disarm these groups have largely failed, as many militias are feuding with each other and have to contend with armed criminal gangs as well. Kaddafi is now fondly remembered as a bad person who at least kept the peace.

August 10, 2012: In the capital a group of armed men attacked a prison, driving off the guards and freeing eight prisoners. Another inmate was killed, apparently by accident.

In Benghazi a former Kaddafi army general (Mohamed Hadia al Feitouri) was assassinated. Feitouri was one of the first senior officers to join the rebellion and was rewarded with a senior job in the Defense Ministry. There were no suspects in this killing.

August 15, 2012: The Red Cross has suspended relief work in Benghazi and Misrata because of attacks by Islamic conservative groups who believe the Red Cross is trying to convert Libyans to Christianity.

August 18, 2012: In the capital a mob of Libyans attacked the Egyptian consulate and caused property damage. The Libyans were angry at having to wait too long to get visas to enter Egypt.

August 19, 2012: In the capital two car bombs went off, killing two and wounding four. The investigation that followed concentrated on known Kaddafi loyalists. This led to some people connected with a previously unknown pro-Kaddafi in a city 60 kilometers southeast of the capital.

August 20, 2012: In Benghazi someone threw a bomb at the car of an Egyptian diplomat. No one was injured and pro-Kaddafi groups were suspected.

August 22, 2012: In Tarhuna (60 kilometers southeast of the capital) troops arrested the leader of a pro-Kaddafi militia (Katibat al Awfiya) that was pretending to be an anti-Kaddafi group. Over a hundred armored vehicles and many other weapons were seized. During the operation one rebel was killed and eight soldiers and rebels were wounded. Another 13 rebels were arrested, while at least three escaped. Many more of these rebels were believed to be elsewhere. This group was believed responsible for the car bombings in the capital on the 19th.

In Ziltan (160 kilometers east of the capital) a tribal feud turned violent over the last two days, leaving at least 12 dead and dozens wounded. Battles like this are becoming more frequent because of the survival of armed militias and the continued lack of functioning courts in most of the country. Many militias are reluctant to disarm, mainly because of the lack of a judicial system for settling disputes. Tribal councils fill some of the need but there is no supreme authority, as in a formal judicial system. Often the tribal elders are not able to settle disputes which then frequently escalate into violence.

Libya also has to deal with geographic as well as political differences. Libya has three distinct physical regions: the northwest coast, the northeast coast, and the Sahara Desert southern region that covers more than 90 percent of the nation. The northwest coastal region (the old Roman province of Tripolitania) consists of the narrow coastal plain and the Jaffara Plain inland. The northeastern Libyan coastal region (roughly the old Roman province of Cyrenaica) lies to the east of the Gulf of Sidra. Many people in each of these regions feel more loyalty to their region than they do to Libya. The biggest differences are between the capital (Tripoli) in the west and Benghazi in the east.

Another reason for the persistence of warlords is the corruption, which makes government unreliable for those unable to pay the biggest bribe. The new government makes a lot of noise about dealing with corruption but there is a lot less action. This is compounded by the difficulty in creating a nationwide judicial system. There is a shortage of Libyans with legal training. The Kaddafi era judges were mostly for show and most have fled, or are not trusted if they remained.

Kaddafi suppressed those differences, with bribes and force, via a police state type government. The bribery is still around but the police state tactics are gone. In its place are over a hundred local militias, formed over a year ago to overthrow, and then replace, the Kaddafi officials. Unimpressed with the competence, or intentions, of the new government, most militias kept their guns, their organization, and an attitude that they could make rules as they saw fit. This has not led to general chaos but it has led to a lot of tense situations as the new government tries to deal with all these new warlords. Bribes are preferred over bullets and since the government has control over the oil income, there is cash available for buying peace. The major task is turning these temporary peace deals into long term arrangements. That means disarming the militias and persuading them to turn into political parties, rather than remaining private armies.

August 24, 2012: The four decades of Kaddafi dictatorship ended a year ago. Libya recently had its first ever peaceful, and democratic, transfer of power. But there still isn't unity or peace. Libya has, until recently, never been a country but rather a patchwork of tribal territories and city states. For the last few centuries Libya was ruled as three separate provinces of an Arab or Turkish empire.

August 27, 2012: The United States resumed full services at its embassy in Tripoli but warned Americans to avoid travel to Libya because of the uncertain security situation. The national police force is still being rebuilt and dozens of the hundred plus armed militias are considered dangerous. This is especially true of the Islamic radical groups, who are often very hostile to non -Moslems.

August 28, 2012: The interior minister admitted that the government would not confront Sunni Islamic terror groups that are attacking, and increasingly destroying Sufi facilities and holy places. The government justified this policy by pointing out the risk of widespread violence if the Islamic radicals were held accountable for their actions.

September 2, 2012: In Benghazi a car bombing killed one army intelligence commander and wounded another. There have been a growing number of such attacks, which appear to be carried out by Islamic terror groups seeking to cripple government efforts to obtain information about exactly who the Islamic radicals are and what their plans are.

September 5, 2012: Mauritania finally agreed to turn over Kaddafi's secret police chief'

The government has been negotiating this for six months. While Mauritania had arrested Senussi for entering the country (from Morocco) on a false passport last March, they said they were under no obligation to honor a Libyan extradition request. Senussi sought to muster enough cash and friends so that he could escape to whichever sanctuary he was headed for. That effort apparently failed. Libya and many Western and Arab intelligence agencies want to talk to Senussi, who was the keeper of Kaddafis most embarrassing and explosive secrets (involving torture, terror and dirty deeds in general). Mauritania was under pressure from many nations to turn over Senussi. One of the things foreigners want to discuss with Senussi was a recently discovered Kaddafi program to store weapons and bomb making materials at many Libyan embassies around the world. These weapons were to be used to kill Libyan expatriates who were causing Kaddafi problems, and support local terrorists who were working for Kaddafi. Senussi is believed to have been involved with this embassy terrorism support program, which has been in place for decades.

Facts about Abdullah al-Senussi

Former Libyan intelligence chief Abdullah al-Senussi was one of the closest confidants of Libya's former leader Col Muammar Gaddafi.

Wanted by both the French authorities and the International Criminal Court, he fled Libya after Gaddafi's downfall and was arrested as he flew into Mauritania from Morocco in March on a false passport.

Mauritania's decision to return the former spy-chief to face Libyan justice raises the prospect of some of the closest secrets of the Gaddafi regime being laid bare.

Brig Gen Senussi rose from relatively lowly origins to become one of Libya's most powerful individuals. It was his marriage to Gaddafi's wife's sister in the 1970s that brought him into the ruling inner circle and he took up various roles including deputy chief of the external security organisation.

He was also said to be a close adviser to Gaddafi's son Saif al-Islam, according to leaked US embassy documents.

In June 2011 the International Criminal Court issued arrest warrants for Gen Senussi, along with Muammar and Saif Gaddafi, for crimes against humanity alleged to have been committed particularly against demonstrators in the eastern city of Benghazi at the start of the Libyan uprising in February 2011.

Observers considered him more of an executor than a mastermind behind the activities of the Gaddafi regime. He was nicknamed "the butcher" because of his reputation for brutal behaviour.

September 5, 2012: Mauritania deports former Libya spy chief’

Updated: Abdullah al-Senussi deposed Libyan leader Muammar Quadhaf's former intelligence chief is being held in Tripoli after being deported from Mauritania. Pictures on social media appeared to show Abdullah al-Senussi stepping down from a helicopter in the capital. Libya has promised a fair trial for Mr Senussi, accused of crimes allegedly committed during Col Quadhafi's rule. He fled Libya after last year's uprising. He is also wanted by France and the International Criminal Court. "Abdullah al-Senussi will have a fair trial according to international standards for human rights, the rights from which Libyans were deprived," Prime Minister Abdurrahim el -Keib told reporters in Tripoli. A spokesman for Libya's attorney general said Mr Senussi had undergone a routine medical check -up and was in good health. He added that the prosecutors would begin questioning him as soon as possible.

BBC Middle East editor Jeremy Bowen says a key question is what he might reveal about extraordinary rendition - the process under which jihadist enemies of Colonel Quadhafi’s Libya were sent back to Libya by the US and Britain. Mr Senussi was arrested on his arrival in Mauritania in March, sparking repeated requests to the west African nation from the Libyan government for his return. "He was extradited to Libya on the basis of guarantees given by Libyan authorities," a Mauritanian government source told Reuters news agency, without giving details. According to reports, Mr Senussi was delivered to an official Libyan delegation headed by the minister of justice. The BBC's correspondent in Cairo says Mr Senussi's extradition to Libya is a blow for the ICC. Not only has the court been trying to win custody of Mr Senussi, he says, it is also arguing that Col Quadhafi's son Seif al-Islam should also be brought to justice at the court. In March, Mr Senussi was arrested at Nouakchott airport in Mauritania after flying in from Morocco. He was disguised as a Tuareg chieftain and was carrying a fake passport. He was later charged with illegally entering the country and using forged documents, and transferred to the civilian prison in Nouakchott. However, it is believed he has spent most of his time in Mauritania under house arrest at a private villa. Abdullah al -Senussi is accused of ordering the killing of protesters in the eastern city of Benghazi

September 6, 2012: Sunni Islamic radicals fought with Sufi villagers 50 kilometers southeast of Benghazi as the Sunni gunmen attempted to destroy a Sufi shrine in the village of Rajma. There were about ten casualties and the Islamic radicals retreated. The villagers called on the national government for help. But the government has been reluctant to confront the Islamic radicals, despite the growing number of attacks on Sufi shrines, schools and mosques in the last two weeks. For a year now Islamic radical militis have been attacking Sufi shrines, first in Tripoli and now in eastern Libya. The Sufi, like the Shia (and many similar groups) are minority Islamic sects that conservative factions among the majority Sunni consider heretical. This often leads to violence, as it has for decades in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Al Qaeda, and similar groups, are particularly active in going after "heretical" Moslems. The heretics often fight back, and most Moslems do not back the radicals. The government is trying to avoid a battle between Islamic radicals and the rest of the population, lest Libya suffer what Iraq, Pakistan and Iran are going through.

September 7, 2012: The government informed Lebanon that it has arrested, and will prosecute, ten former Kaddafi officials believed involved in the kidnapping and murder of a senior Shia cleric (Musa Sadr) during an official visit to Libya in 1978. The mysterious death of this senior Lebanese Shia cleric has long been a source of friction between Lebanon and Libya. It is believed that Sadr was killed by Kaddafi at the request of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, as the Sunni Palestinians were then fighting Shia militias in Lebanon (which was in the midst of a civil war that did not end until 1990.)

September 11, 2012: In Benghazi, Islamic radicals attacked a U.S. State Department compound, killing the American ambassador to Libya, another diplomat and two former SEALs acting as bodyguards.

September 13, 2012: Police in Benghazi arrested four men and charged them with involvement in the killing of four Americans on the 11th.

September 14, 2012: The airport in Benghazi was closed for a few hours until police could get Islamic radical groups to stop firing into the air, trying to hit

American UAVs (which are flying out of range of the heavy machine-guns used) circling the city in support of the search for those responsible for killing the U.S. ambassador on the 11th.

September 15, 2012: Al Qaeda took credit for the September 11 attack in Benghazi and called for more American diplomats to be attacked wherever possible. No Islamic radical group in Libya has taken credit for the recent attack, apparently because it is obvious that most Libyans are angry about killing the U.S. ambassador and the Americans are determined to find and punish the killers. The Islamic terrorists in general are very afraid of UAV attacks, which have killed hundreds of key terrorist leaders and technicians (bomb builders, publicists, intel specialists).

Oil production is running at 1.4 million barrels a day and oil income for the first seven months of the year was $30.5 billion. This is near pre-revolution levels (1.6 million barrels a day). So there is plenty of money, but there is also lots of corruption and a widespread dependency on oil income. Kaddafi ran a low-budget welfare state, that diverted a lot of the oil money to the Kaddafi family and closest associates. Libyans want a more equitable distribution of the oil money, but the rampant corruption is getting in the way. The basic security problem in Libya is the presence of over a hundred local militias, formed over a year ago to overthrow, and then replace, the Kaddafi government. Unimpressed with the competence, or intentions, of the new government, most militias kept their guns, their organization and an attitude that they could make rules as they saw fit. This has not led to general chaos, but it has led to a lot of tense situations as the new government tries to deal with all these new warlords. Bribes are preferred over bullets and since the government has control over the oil income, there is cash available for buying peace.

The major task is turning these temporary peace deals into long-term arrangements. That means disarming the militias and persuading them to turn into political parties, rather than remaining private armies. This approach does not work with the hard-core Islamic militias, who are angry that they did not get many votes in the July elections and are still determined to turn Libya into an Islamic dictatorship. The government does not want to go to war with the Islamic radical groups, at least not yet. Until the September 11th attack in Benghazi the government thought it had an unwritten agreement for the Islamic radicals to leave foreign diplomats alone. Now the government has to worry about the Islamic radical groups uniting to oppose any government effort to capture and punish those responsible for killing the American ambassador (which is being hailed by Islamic radicals everywhere as a great victory.) Despite the known presence of al Qaeda affiliated groups in Libya, and Benghazi, the ambassador did not request U.S. Maine Corps embassy guards and preferred to travel around with light security. There were plenty of pro-U.S. Libyan militias around, but apparently no effective security plan for dealing with a well-coordinated attack. Several dozen heavily armed (with assault rifles, RPGs and heavy machine-guns) terrorists attacked the compound the U.S. ambassador was staying in on the 11th. Libyan officials had warned American embassy personnel on September 8th about the increasing danger from Islamic radical groups in Benghazi. Since the attack the U.S. has sent 50 marines and more intelligence personnel to Libya. Finding qualified intel personnel for this was difficult because so many Arab speaking intel specialists are working on the Syria situation (mainly in Turkey and Jordan.) Meanwhile American intel analysts back in the U.S. are going over video (from satellites and UAVs) and electronic intercepts from Libya. American UAVs have been seen over Benghazi since the 11th. All this is being coordinated with Libya's new intelligence service, which is only a year old and spread thin by the need to track all the militias and Islamic radical groups inside Libya. An FBI investigation team has also arrived and is helping the Libyan police collect and analyze evidence.

September 16, 2012: The government has arrested four people believed involved in the September 11 attack in Benghazi that left the U.S. ambassador and three other Americans dead. The government says it has the names of fifty people involved in the attack and is searching for them. The attack force involved foreign as well as Libyan Islamic radicals. Some of the suspects are believed to have already fled the country and some are believed to be hiding in Egypt. The government believes that the attack was planned in advance to commemorate the 2001 terror attacks in the U.S. and avenge the deaths of Osama bin Laden last year and the current number two al Qaeda leader (Sheikh Abu Yahya al Libi) in Pakistan three months ago. Clips from a new film critical of Islam appearing on the Internet was coincidental and had nothing to do with the attack except to make it easier to stage a demonstration to distract the guards around the house where the four American victims were staying in Benghazi.

September 17, 2012: The government replaced the two officials responsible for security in Benghazi and vowed to do something about all the militias in Benghazi and throughout the country.

September 21, 2012: In Benghazi large (over 20,000 people) crowds forced two Islamic radical militias to abandon their bases which were then looted. The second base attacked was actually held by a pro-government Islamic radical militia that had permission to be there. In trying to defend the base (and its large supply of weapons) at least 11 were killed and 60 wounded before the militiamen fled. Six of the dead were bodyguards of an army colonel, who was apparently kidnapped.

In Benghazi large crowds continued to march on Islamic radical militia compounds and demand that the groups flee and disband. The crowds were basically pro-democracy and angry that the Islamic radical groups have kept insisting that democracy was un-Islamic and illegitimate (especially after the Islamic radicals did so poorly in recent elections).

September 22, 2012: The government ordered the disbanding of "illegitimate" militias. Who is illegitimate is subject to debate but apparently means any militia that has been openly defying the government, especially the pro-Kaddafi ones controlling some towns in the interior.

September 23, 2012: The government managed to replace the leaders of two of the largest militias in Benghazi with military officers. These new leaders will try to demobilize the militias. Several smaller Islamic radical militias have been persuaded (or compelled) to disband. The government has also ordered all militias to leave military and police bases unless they have explicit government permission to be there.

Meanwhile, outside a government building in Tripoli, two groups of militiamen, demanding more money and privileges from the government, got into a fight with each other that escalated to a gun battle. There were some injuries before police could break it up.

September 25, 2012: A Libyan rebel (Omran Shaaban) who helped seize Muammar Kaddafi last year has died in a Paris hospital. Shaaban and three companions were kidnapped by a militia two months ago and, although eventually freed (via direct intervention by the Libyan president), received injuries that he eventually died from. Because Shaaban had received so much publicity for his role in taking Kaddafi, and had subsequently gone to work for the new government, his death was seen as another example of how the militias were out of control.

NATO has offered advisors and trainers to assist the Libyan security forces in getting organized, so that they can deal with the militia problem once and for all. The Libyans have not yet responded to this offer. The government still lacks the trained manpower in its security forces to remove and replace over a hundred militias. Some of these militias are pro-Kaddafi and rule towns in the interior that always backed Kaddafi. The armed men in those towns agreed to stop fighting in support of Kaddafi (after Kaddafi was killed last year) but, in practice, have not surrendered. Putting these groups out of action and replacing them with government administration could be messy. In the coastal cities many militias have turned into criminal gangs and will remain as such even if they are forced to cease operating in the open as militias. One of the most contentious issues is ownership of property (land, businesses, vehicles, valuables) belonging to Kaddafi, his family, and cronies. Some militias have taken over these properties and are reluctant to let go.

American FBI investigators are still waiting in Tripoli for permission to go to Benghazi to investigate the compound where the American ambassador was killed on the 11th. Libyan police didn't do much investigating at the scene but journalists were all over it, picking up all sorts of stuff (like the ambassadors personal journal). The FBI is stuck in Tripoli because the government believes it isn't safe in Benghazi. The U.S. has withdrawn some staff from the embassy in Tripoli but says these people will be returning soon. American intelligence agencies, using data from a wide variety of sources, believe the attack on the American ambassador was planned in advance to commemorate September 11th , avenge the death of Osama bin Laden, and generally enhance the prestige of al Qaeda and other Islamic radical groups in Libya. That backfired and the Libyans have a list of the usual suspects. While some of these people fled Benghazi, the Libyans did arrest several dozen and have interrogated them. It's unclear how much cooperation is going on between the Libyans and American intelligence agencies. The U.S. government is now extremely reluctant to have any more personnel killed or wounded in Benghazi. This is partially because the American government initially tried to explain away the September 11th attack as a response to an American anti -Islam film, even though Libyan officials early on advised that this was not the case. There were plenty of Libyan witnesses to the attack to confirm that the attack was planned and carried out like a military operation. One thing U.S. intelligence officials and their Libyan counterparts agree on was that the attack was the work of Libyan Islamic radical group. The Libyans are insistent on the attack having been organized by Libyan radicals, not foreigners. This won't be known for sure until there is some kind of trial.

The main problem with the militias is that most of them have turned into profitable businesses. The militias establish a form of law and order in an area and then extort "protection" money from businesses and "fees" (ransom payments) from the families of people they arrest. There is also some outright theft. When the government tries to move in there are some tense stand-offs and sometimes gunfire. The government forces, usually outnumbered, retreat. But now the government often has the aid of many local civilians, willing to come out in large numbers to defy the militia. This only works if the government has security personnel available to take over a town or neighborhood. The government often does not have the personnel available.

September 28, 2012: The September 11th Islamic terrorist attack on American diplomats (and the death of the American ambassador) mobilized a lot of public anger against the militias and Islamic radicals. While some militias have been disbanded and new pro-government men have taken over control of other militias, there are still plenty of these groups around and beyond government control. But most of the militias are still there. The government now has more popular backing to shut down militias but there is still local support, especially in the interior (where Kaddafi was popular). There are still tribal militias (pro and anti-Kaddafi) fighting in the southeast, with government officials not having much success in persuading anyone to make peace. Then there is the corruption, which is rampant and the single biggest problem in the country. It is the corruption and greed that are at the root of most government problems. There is not a lot of trust but there is a big sense of entitlement.

September 28, 2012: In Benghazi several hundred people demonstrated in favor of Islamic radical militia Ansar al Shariah. Police prevented the demonstrators from getting violent or killing anyone. Ansar al Shariah is suspected of participating in the September 11 attack that killed the American ambassador and denies any involvement. The popular anger to the ambassador's death led to many Islamic radical militias being attacked by mobs and the police. This included Ansar al Shariah and this group is trying to resist.

After more than month of negotiations the government secured the release of seven Iranian aid workers who were kidnapped by radicals on July 31st.

October 1, 2012: Someone threw a grenade at a police patrol in Benghazi, wounding two policemen.

October 2, 2012: Pro-government have surrounded the West Libyan town of Bani Walid (170 kilometers southeast of Tripoli). With a population of about 100,000, this town was always pro-Kaddafi and is the last refuge of pro-Kaddafi militias (who have been misbehaving even after the Kaddafi government was overthrown last year). The pro-Kaddafi forces have been ordered to surrender, or face an attack on the town.

In Turkey, security officials arrested two Tunisian Islamic radicals on suspicion that they were involved with the September attack that killed the U.S. ambassador in Libya. The two were on an American watch list and were travelling using false passports.

October 3, 2012: Islamic terrorists are believed responsible for killing three policemen at a checkpoint 260 kilometers east of Benghazi.

October 4, 2012: American FBI investigators arrived in Benghazi (in armored vehicles, guarded by American commandos) to examine the consular building where Islamic terrorists killed the U.S. ambassador on September 11th. Foreign (including American) journalists have already picked through the ruins and found that many documents were still there, including the ambassador's journal (parts of which were published in U.S. media) and classified material. The U.S. State Department delayed the arrival of the FBI for three weeks because of security concerns. These were legitimate, but did not dissuade numerous foreign journalists, aid workers or business people from operating in the city. This delay has become a political issue in the United States, where a presidential election campaign is underway. In Benghazi the FBI investigators stayed only about 12 hours and then left, leaving much investigating (like interviewing witnesses) undone.

October 7, 2012: The newly elected parliament voted to reject the new prime minister because of an inability (over the last four weeks) to put together a satisfactory selection of ministers and thus form a government. The problem is the inability of the many factions (based on tribe, ethnicity, town, neighborhood or Islamic radical groups) to agree on who should get what.

The Libyan government is cooperating with American intelligence agencies in the search for those who killed the American ambassador. Little is being said about this investigation, in order to keep down the risk of damaging leaks. Apparently the U.S. CIA and other intel agencies had a lot of information on Benghazi Islamic radicals and what they were up to. But publication of how that information was collected could jeopardize the methods and sources.

In Benghazi a government program to disarm the militias has managed to take over a thousand rifles and rocket launchers out of circulation as people respond to a call for surrendering weapons. So far about two dozen militias have disbanded, but most resist calls to shut down. The situation is still volatile.

October 8, 2012: The September 11th Islamic terrorist attack on American diplomats (and the death of the American ambassador) has become a contentious issue in the United States, mainly because of the upcoming November 6 presidential elections (for the president and most members of the national legislature). The current government is being accused of ignoring the terrorist threat in Libya despite the media coverage of the threat beforehand and subsequent leaks of American intelligence alerts about potential attacks on American diplomats there. While an embarrassing, and fatal, lapse in judgment and administration of security, the nearness of elections makes the issue a political crisis with all manner of accusations being tossed around. The U.S.

government did admit a week ago that it was indeed a terrorist attack, but the weeks of delay in getting the American (FBI) investigators to Benghazi and apparent disputes between the intelligence agencies and presidential political advisors is apparently hindering the pursuit of the attackers. Some of the leaked documents indicate the American ambassador had requested increased security, but was turned down by the State Department. That said, it's still unclear why the ambassador chose to spend September 11th (a day many Islamic terror groups liked to attack Americans on) in such a vulnerable place (Benghazi, noted for its many Islamic radical groups and in a lightly guarded consular compound, rather than the heavily guarded embassy back in Tripoli.)

October 13, 2012: Someone tried to kill a senior intelligence official in Benghazi. The bomb was placed under the official's car but he got out of the car after starting it to go back into his home, where he was when the car blew up. There have been similar attacks recently, apparently in an effort to reduce the effectiveness of government intelligence efforts

October 14, 2012: The newly elected legislature has selected a new prime minister. The previous one was dismissed for being unable to form a government after 25 days. The problem there was the inability to pass out ministry control in a way that satisfied most political factions. The new prime minister will have the same difficulties. The main problem is the tribalism and the lack of willingness to do anything for the greater good.

October 14, 2012: Ali Zidan elected Libya's new prime ministerLibya's national congress has elected a new prime minister, Ali Zidan.Mr Zidan, an independent, won 93 votes - a majority among those present. He beat a candidate favoured by the Justice and Construction party - which is linked to the Muslim Brotherhood.The president of the national assembly, announcing his victory, asked Mr Zidan to propose a cabinet within two weeks.The previous PM, Mustafa Abu Shagur, was dismissed a week ago after failing to form a government.Mr Zidan was a career diplomat for Colonel Muammar Gaddafi before defecting in 1980 and joining the opposition in exile.Local observers see him as a liberal with a strong personality, says the BBC's Rana Jawad in Tripoli.He served the former transitional government as its Europe envoy, and was seen as a key player in convincing the ex-French President, Nicolas Sarkozy, to support the uprising against Colonel Gaddafi. His election comes at a critical time, with security still not established across the country and western Libya seeing outbreaks of renewed violence, our correspondent adds. Source: BBC News Africa

October 15, 2012: The U.S. has agreed to help organize and train a counter-terrorism commando force. This would enable the government to quickly shut down any outbreaks of Islamic terror group fighting.

October 15, 2012: Tripoli prison suffers mass breakout'

More than 100 inmates have escaped from the al-Judaida prison in the Libyan capital, Tripoli. The prisoners are said to be of various nationalities and officials say about 60 have so far been recaptured. It is not clear how the breakout happened. Al-Judaida is one of Tripoli's largest jails. Human rights groups accuse officials of abusing inmates. The mass escape comes less than a week before the first anniversary of Col Muammar Gaddafi's death. The head of Libya's national guard, Khaled al-Sharif, told the BBC that out of the 120 inmates that escaped at least half have so far been captured. He said that some were illegal African migrants imprisoned for immigration violations and others were Libyans with criminal convictions. Circumstances surrounding the prison break are unclear and officials say an investigation is under way. The national guard says it has set up checkpoints in the area to try to hunt down the escaped prisoners. Libyan jails are currently under the control of an array of different military councils and brigades. The BBC's Rana Jawad in Tripoli says prisons in the capital fall under the authority of the justice ministry and are guarded, in theory, by the ministry's police force. However, Libya still lacks a comprehensive and organised public security force following the conflict last year, she adds. Earlier this year an attempted breakout from another prison in the capital saw parts of that facility burned down. Amnesty International de scribed "widespread" abuses at the al-Judaida after the ousting of Colonel Gaddafi. The former Libyan leader was killed after being captured in his birthplace of Sirte on 20 October last year. BBC News Africa

October 20, 2012: The youngest son of Moamar Kaddafi (Khamis) was killed during the fighting in Bani Walid. Khamis commanded a brigade last year and fought against the rebels. He disappeared and was reported killed several times. This time he appears to be really dead. The town has been surrounded all month and government forces are now advancing to the center of town and fighting street by street.

Stolen Libyan weapons (Russian anti-aircraft and French anti-tank missiles) have been seen in Gaza and at least one anti-aircraft missile was used recently, without success. Thousands of weapons (mostly rifles, pistols, and machine-guns) were stolen by smugglers last year and taken out of the country. They are showing up throughout the region.

The investigation of the murder of the American ambassador (and three other State Department employees) on September 11th has come up with the names of several Libyan Islamic radical group leaders but few arrests. Most Libyans are upset about the September 11 attack, but there's not a lot of enthusiasm for starting a war with Islamic radical groups. In the United States, the September 11 attack has become a political controversy because of upcoming (November 6) elections. It appears that the U.S. government did not increase diplomatic security in Libya to the level that the local American diplomats there requested. The September attack led to the withdrawal of American security officials (mainly the CIA) from Benghazi. It will take a while to rebuild the American intelligence operation in Benghazi.

Libya clashes in ex-Kaddafi bastion Bani Walid' Pro-government forces have been fighting for control of the West Libyan town of Bani Walid (170 kilometers southeast of Tripoli) for most of the month. With a population of about 100,000, this town was always pro-Kaddafi and the last refuge of pro-Kaddafi militias (who had been misbehaving even after the Kaddafi government was overthrown last year). The pro-Kaddafi forces recaptured the town late last year, after the rebels seized it. The town became a sanctuary for anti-government groups and the government finally organized another effort to take control of the town. This led to over a week of shelling followed by a ground attack which is just about over. There have been over 300 casualties, most of them civilians hurt during the shelling.

The basic problem is that the new government has not been able to organize a national police force yet and has depended on local militias to maintain law and order. The militias are often run by tribal leaders or local warlords, and this causes problems if you send them to help maintain order somewhere else (where they are often seen as tribal invaders). Kaddafi recognized and supported tribal affiliations and these loyalties (to divide potential enemies) and this makes it difficult to establish a workable national government. One asset the government does have is lots of oil revenue. But the widespread corruption cripples efforts to use that money to build national unity.

October 22, 2012: Long-time Libyan dictator Moamar Kaddafi was deposed and killed a year ago but his legacy fights on. Kaddafi used tribal loyalties to maintain power and favored certain tribes, and some of the pro-Kaddafi tribes are still fighting. The violence is not so much about putting Kaddafi followers back into power but holding on to Kaddafi era privileges and avoiding punishment for crimes committed to support Kaddafi's rule. One example is on the southern border, where the pro-rebel Tabu tribe has been put in charge of the border (with Sudan, Chad, and Niger) security. There they constantly skirmish with the pro-Kaddafi Zwai. Another element of this rivalry is that the Tabu are black African in orientation while the Zwai are Arab. Kaddafi supported Arab domination over black Arabs, something many Arabs still support.

October 31, 2012: Libyan parliaments approves new government'

Libya's General National Congress equivalent to Parliament has approved the new government led by Prime Minister Ali Zidan. The vote comes a day after protesters unhappy at the make -up of the proposed cabinet disrupted proceedings. Mr Zidan's list includes a mixture of liberal figures and Islamists as he tries to build a coalition acceptable to all parties. The previous Prime Minister, Mustafa Abu Shagur, was dismissed after Congress voted down his cabinet. Only two-thirds of the assembly's 200 members attended the session on Wednesday and after the vote, the session abruptly adjourned for prayers. The head of Congress and Libya's interim leader, Mohammed Magarief, said he had been advised by security guards to end the session early. About 100 protesters stood outside the Congress building, but there was no repeat of Tuesday's disturbances. Inclusive cabinet: The new government has representatives from the two biggest blocs in the Congress - the Alliance of National Forces, led by liberal former Prime Minister Mahmoud Jibril, and the Muslim Brotherhood's Justice and Construction Party. Mr Zidan said he had tried to strike a balance between Libya's different regions in making the appointments. According to his list, the defence and interior ministries would be headed by ministers from the eastern city of Benghazi, considered to be the cradle of last year's revolution that ended Muammar Gaddafi's rule. Two women are also among the ministers proposed by Mr Zidan. The protesters reportedly said some of the proposed ministers had links to Col Gaddafi. Despite largely peaceful elections in July, Libya's transition continues to be affected by instability. Reining in the different militia and trying to integrate them into a single national army will be one of the biggest challenges for any new government, analysts say.

November 1, 2012: In Tripoli a new government was accepted by the legislature. This was the second attempt, as the first government selected was turned down and armed threats were made. There are still some militias threatening violence, but not enough of them this time to stop the government selection process.

November 3, 2012: In Tripoli dozens of armed men, identifying themselves as former rebels against Kaddafi, blocked access to the national assembly building. The situation was defused without violence after a day or two when representatives of the armed men met with government leaders.

November 4, 2012: In Benghazi a car bomb went off outside a police station wounding three policemen. In Tripoli rival militias fought each other, leaving at least five dead.

November 16, 2012: Egyptian border guards caught Libyan smugglers trying to bring 35 anti -tank guided missiles into Egypt. There are still a lot of Kaddafi era weapons lying about, often hidden by looters waiting to find a buyer, or someone to use the stuff on.

The 42 years of Kaddafi rule left its mark. Kaddafi was a clever and manipulative dictator. He portrayed himself as a populist servant of the people but he was a dictator, and in the end that’s what got him overthrown and killed. Most Libyans grew up under Kaddafi’s erratic and autocratic rule and have little knowledge or experience with democracy. To many Libyans, being a self - righteous bully seems like a proper way to conduct yourself. After all, it worked for Kaddafi. Old habits are hard to get away from.

The government is still dealing with about 100,000 internal refugees, driven from their homes by factional fighting. Some 40 percent of the refugees are from Bani Walid, the last town to openly support Kaddafi. Bani Walid was taken by pro-government militias late last month and is still a lawless and dangerous place. Anti-Kaddafi militiamen still roam the town looking for Kaddafi supporters and stuff to steal. This West Libyan town (170 kilometers southeast of Tripoli) originally had a population of about 100,000. This town was always pro-Kaddafi and the last refuge of pro-Kaddafi militias (who had been misbehaving even after the Kaddafi government was overthrown last year). There are still some small groups of armed Kaddafi supporters around Bani Walid and the unrest down there is expected to last for a while, although this chaos should be gone by the end of the year. This may change if some of the other pro-Kaddafi towns in the interior try to defy the new government.

November 19, 2012: The government admits that it has not yet arrested anyone responsible for the September 11th attack in Benghazi that killed the American ambassador. Some suspects are known but remain unquestioned by the security forces. Despite popular protests after the attack that drove some Islamic terrorists from the city, those responsible for killing the ambassador are protected by powerful Islamic radical militias and the Libyan government has more pressing problems with feuding pro-government militias and armed anti-government groups (mostly supporters of the late dictator Kaddafi). Meanwhile a team of American special operations troops are recruiting Libyans to be part of a government counter-terrorism commando force. The Arab speaking Americans will select and train several hundred suitable candidates. It's unclear if the training will take place in Libya or somewhere else. The government needs some way to deal with a possible coup attempt by Islamic radicals. These groups, which include some al Qaeda affiliates are angry and mystified at not receiving a majority of the votes in recent elections. They blame America and Israel and, as usual, accuse Libyans who oppose them of not being proper Moslems. This could get ugly and most Libyans know it.

November 21, 2012: Benghazi police chief shotdead by three gunmen.

November 29, 2012: Protestors representing wounded veterans of last year's rebellion lifted their two day blockade of the country's largest refinery. The government agreed to resume sending wounded rebels overseas for medical treatment. The problem is that the government wants to do this without allowing another huge bout of corruption. This all began six months ago when an anti - corruption effort caused problems with wounded rebels. This was because the government halted automatic payments for medical, travel and living expenses of many wounded rebels sent overseas for medical treatment. All this was the result of a program, started last year, to provide medical treatment abroad for wounded rebels. The program was soon corrupted (not unusual in Libya). Local militia and tribal authorities were allowed to decide who was eligible to go abroad for treatment, and the government automatically provided cash for that purpose. But soon anyone with the right connections, or a large enough bribe, got a trip to a European or Moslem country for "medical treatment." Many of those going abroad on this program were not ill, but they got to take family members as well and expected the government to pay them a stipend (several hundred dollars a month) while they were abroad. Many of these travelers were actually migrating, and the government cut off the stipends and cracked down on who was going. The government had to do this, because the "medical treatment abroad" program was draining huge amounts of cash from what little was available at the time, and making most Libyans (who were not in on the boondoggle) angry. Some legitimate medical care cases were cut off as well and they have been demonstrating for justice, or at least more money. The government still has a problem with the wounded veterans program because of the corruption so rampant in the country.

December 4, 2012: Muhammed Jamal Abu Ahmad, an Islamic terrorist leader believed responsible for attack that killed the American ambassador to Libya and three others last September was captured in Egypt. U.S. intelligence agencies cooperated with Egyptian police to grab Ahmad, who was establishing al Qaeda bases in Egypt and Libya and spent most of his time in both countries.

December 5, 2012: In the southern town of Sabha 196 convicts escaped from a prison, after overwhelming their guards. Most of the escapees were common criminals, but some were political or Islamic radicals.

December 8, 2012: Tunisian police arrested two armed men, apparently from Libya as they tried to sneak into Algeria. The two were armed and contained maps (of potential targets in Algeria) as well as Islamic radical literature and other incriminating documents. Tunisian border police have been seeing more Libyan Islamic radicals of late.

The judicial system, which had atrophied during decades of Kaddafi rule is overwhelmed with cases demanding justice for crimes that occurred while Kaddafi ran the country or during the revolution last year. If there is no justice in the courts, many of the plaintiffs are threatening to seek help from their tribes, which often means a blood feud. The tribal councils have already handled a lot of disputes and have replaced the ineffective courts for a lot of routine business (contract and family disputes). The new courts have to prioritize their efforts and first in line are cases that impact the economy, especially the flow of goods that keep the population fed and otherwise cared for.

For the moment the government just wants to keep the several dozen major militias from interfering with the economy. But down the line (in a year, or several) the government will try to disband these private armies. The U.S. is providing some help in the form of sharing intelligence collected on Libyan militias as part of an American effort to identify Islamic terror groups. The government has quietly allowed American intel operations in the country although the U.S. is asking for more freedom to operate (including the use of UAVs for photo and electronic reconnaissance.) Many government officials, especially those in the security services, are eager for the American help. That's because Islamic terror groups have been sending death squads after senior police and intelligence officials, killing about twenty so far this year. This is part of an intimidation program intended to keep police pressure off Islamic radical groups. The Islamic terrorists want to take control of the government but know that the majority of Libyans are opposed to that. So the Islamic terrorists are trying to defend themselves by persuading the police to back off.

The government is under pressure to suppress the Islamic radical militias, and especially those allied with al Qaeda. But there are too many of these armed Islamic terror groups around for the security forces to deal with. The newly (since November 14) organized government is scrambling to rebuild the welfare state Kaddafi had built to keep most Libyans quiet for decades. This has proved difficult because so many Kaddafi era bureaucrats fled the country and left records and government organizations in a disorganized state. This halted payment to a lot of foreign suppliers, some of whom are now refusing to deliver needed goods or services without additional or even advance, payments. This distrust of Libya has slowed expansion of oil production as well, meaning a vicious circle of less money and more fear.

December 16, 2012: Al Qaeda has established a presence in the southwest, especially in the town of Ghat on the Niger border. The Algerian border is also nearby. Niger has been hostile to Islamic terrorists, but cannot stop the smugglers who take weapons from Libya, via Niger to northern Mali. Arms dealers and smugglers, who have thousands of weapons looted from government storage areas last year, have concentrated in Ghat, to move weapons to Mali and other points south, and also to supply local Islamic terror groups who have set up shop in Ghat. The Libyan government has little control over Ghat and can't spare the resources to change that any time soon. Al Qaeda sanctuary has been created in Ghat. This is part of an al Qaeda plan to establish sanctuaries in Libya and northern Mali and form a coalition of the various Islamic terrorist groups in those two places. While there has been some progress, al Qaeda continues to find Islamic terror groups willing to fight each other as well as the more traditional foes (the West and most governments in Moslem nations). This factionalism played a role in the collapse of Islamic terrorist sanctuaries in Somalia, Pakistan and Yemen. Libya will probably be no different because some of the Islamic radical militias are already on bad terms with each other.

January 28, 2013: Britain announced that it has detected a threat to their embassy in Tripoli. Four days earlier Britain urged its citizens to leave Benghazi. Germany and Netherlands followed suit, claiming the same reason (fear of Islamic terrorist attack).

January 30, 2013: In the aftermath of the Islamic terror attack on an Algerian natural gas facility just across the border, the government has increased security around its own oil and gas operations. Islamic radicals in Libya have not attacked these assets because the cash generated by oil and gas sales still benefits most Libyans. Thus an attack on this source of cash would be very unpopular. Foreign Islamic radical groups would be less concerned about losing popularity inside Libya. Being on a Mission From God does that to you.

January 31, 2013: The government now demands that all foreigners wishing to enter Libya must get a visa. This is meant to keep out gangsters and Islamic radicals. It does keep some out, but most can get into Egypt and sneak across the border.

February 6, 2013: An Algerian army base just across the border was attacked by about 50 Islamic terrorists from Libya. With the assistance of Algerian warplanes and attack helicopters the attack was defeated and at least two of the attackers were killed. The army pursued the attackers to the border and captured one of them alive.

February 9, 2013: The government sharply reduced the number of visas issued to Lebanese and is seeking to keep pro-Iran and Islamic radical Lebanese out of the country.

On the Egyptian border police continue to seize shipments of weapons (stolen from government warehouses during the revolution) being smuggled out. The Libyan border police can be bribed, not so for most of the Egyptians. Most of the smuggled weapons are getting through to Gaza and onto ships where the smugglers can reach even more distant markets.

The government has tried to channel some of the Islamic radical violence in a useful direction. The government in Tripoli hired an Islamic radical militia to eliminate the illegal drugs that are increasingly common. The Islamic radicals went at it but also sought to enforce all the other lifestyle rules they favored. This produced armed confrontations with secular militias. Another problem with all these militias is the growth in crime. Murder, rape, theft, and kidnapping are all more common. Often the crooks are militia members, going gangster on the side to augment their small (or non - existent) militia wage. The warlords who often lead these militias are sometimes running criminal enterprises as well. Many militias are basically local self-defense groups, but even some of these see no problem in plundering nearby areas they don't control. The murder rate has increased five times over the last three years and most other crime has shown similar jumps.

A favorite target of the Islamic radical militias has been the small Christian community. Most of the 100,000 Christians who were in Libya two years ago are gone, fleeing growing crime and persecution. The Islamic radical groups feel it is their duty to persecute non-Moslems and drive them out of the country. The government is officially against this sort of thing but has neither the forces nor the will to take on the Islamic radical militias over this issue.

Then there is the Mali problem. Libya's southern border is 4,600 kilometers long and largely desert. Anyone with enough fuel, water, and a GPS can sneak across. Libya has officially closed this border since late December but military patrols have sighted vehicles and camel caravans crossing in both directions.

The recent defeat of al Qaeda in Mali is believed to have sent some of the surviving Islamic terrorists into Libya but information is scant and no one really knows.

Western intelligence agencies have told Algeria and Libya that there are a lot of Islamic terrorists operating in southern Libya and it will be from there that more attacks will be launched on Algerian, Libyan, and Tunisian gas and oil facilities. American intelligence also found some Islamic terrorists who were involved in both last month's attack in southern Algeria and the one in Libya (Benghazi) last September, that killed the U.S. ambassador to Libya. There is so little government control in Benghazi that there has been no effective police action to find and arrest any of these suspects.

February 11, 2013: Libya To Shut Egypt, Tunisia Borders For 1st year Anniversary'

Libya will shut its borders with Tunis and Egypt for five days as a security measure ahead of the country's two-year anniversary marking the ouster of Muammar Gaddafi, the prime minister said. Ali Zeidan announced the closure during a news conference as part of list of security measures following concerns about potential militia violence surrounding the celebrations. "As of midnight on February 14th until the 18th, no one will be allowed to cross the Libyan borders between Egypt or Tunis as a security precaution," he told reporters on. On February 17, Libyans will mark two years since an armed revolt ended Gaddafi's rule and celebrations are planned to begin on February 15. But many Libyans, particularly those in the east, are urging citizens to take to the streets to protest the government's inability to so far provide security by disarming militias or moving towards writing a constitution. Security is particularly a concern in the east of the country where violence towards foreigners and police assassinations have become a regular occurrence by unknown extremist militias. On January 25, the United Kingdom urged their nationals to leave Benghazi citing a "specific and imminent" threat to Westerners days after a deadly attack by Islamist militants in neighbouring Algeria. Flights to Libya were suspended by Lufthansa and Austrian Airlines until after the February 17 citing "tensions on the ground" in the country. Many international organisations, including the United Nations mission in Libya and Western embassy staff will be on lockdown starting on February 14 as a safety measure. Security in Tripoli and Benghazi have been increased in the past week, with several random check points by Libyan police and militias affiliated with the interior ministry popping up on all major roads. "We will focus on tightening security at airports also in order to avoid any issues that will derail the celebrations," Zeidan said.

February 12, 2013: The second anniversary of the revolution is being memorialized on the 15th but there is not much cause for celebration. Disunity, corruption, warlords, and an inability to provide law and order has stalled the economy and the return of government services. The oil income allows the government to delay another major rebellion but if the current conditions persist, the country will fall back into another period of open war. There are still over 200,000 gunmen in illegal militias and the government is moving slowly to organize police forces capable of shutting down these groups. The militias are a major reason why it has been so difficult to get the economy and government going again.

March 11, 2013: Over a hundred local men blockaded an oil field south of Benghazi and halted production of 120,000 barrels of oil (and lots of natural gas) a day until the government hired more local men to work at the field. A deal was finally worked out on March 28th and production resumed. The job disputes are usually over who will be hired to provide security. Foreigners handle most of the technical jobs because few Libyans are qualified for this work. But security is another matter and rival militias battle each other and whoever the current oil field security people are to obtain these jobs.

March 14, 2013: A Christian (Egyptian Coptic) church in Benghazi was attacked again by Islamic radicals. The first attack occurred last month.

March 17, 2013: One of the men (Faraj al Shibli) believed responsible for leading (or planning) the Benghazi attack last September that killed the American ambassador was arrested and charged with that crime. The attack was planned and carried out by one of the Islamic terrorist militias, and since then the government has been trying to muster the determination and firepower necessary to go after those responsible for the attack.

March 21, 2013: Member of parliament Hassan El Amin has fled the country (for Britain) because of growing threats from Islamic radical militias. Amin was the head of the human rights committee in parliament and had criticized the Islamic radical militias for using violence against political and religious opponents. While other outspoken members of parliament have a lot of bodyguards and often the backing of a tribal or political militia, Amin had neither.

March 26, 2013: In the south fifty men escaped from a prison after a riot there distracted the guards.
One prisoner was shot dead during the escape and 13 others were quickly captured.

March 27, 2013: Three British women accused Libyan militiamen of briefly kidnapping and raping (or fondling, it's unclear which) them. The three were British citizens but of Pakistani ancestry, so both the British and Pakistani ambassadors demanded that the Libyan government do something. This all began when a convoy of ten trucks from Britain, carrying medical supplies for Gaza, was stopped at the Egyptian border by Egyptian police. Egypt does not like the foreign activists coming in like this to support the Islamic terrorist group Hamas that runs Gaza. The three women had left the convoy (with two male companions) and headed for the Benghazi airport to fly back to Britain when they were attacked. The militiamen often do what they like but it only becomes a big news story when foreigners are involved.

March 28, 2013: In Tripoli Sunni extremists bombed a Sufi shrine. Sunni Islamic radicals have been attacking local Sufi Moslems with increasing ferocity for over a year. In some cases Sunni gunmen attempting to destroy Sufi shrines are repulsed by armed Sufis. So now the Sunni Islamic terrorists sneak around at night planting bombs. The Sufis have called on the national government for help. But the government has been reluctant to confront the Islamic radicals, despite the growing number of attacks on Sufi shrines, schools, and mosques in the last year. Ever since the fall of Kaddafi two years ago, the Islamic radical militias have been attacking Sufi shrines, first in Tripoli and then in eastern Libya. The Sufi, like the Shia (and many similar groups), are minority Islamic sects that conservative factions among the majority Sunni consider heretical. This often leads to violence, as it has for decades in Pakistan and Afghanistan. Al Qaeda, and similar groups, are particularly active in going after "heretical" Moslems. The heretics often fight back, and most Moslems do not back the radicals. The government is trying to avoid a battle between Islamic radicals and the rest of the population, lest Libya suffer what Iraq, Pakistan, and Iran are going through.

March 30, 2013: A military camp 800 kilometers south of the capital was attacked by several dozen armed men (travelling in eight vehicles). Two soldiers were killed and the attack was repulsed. It's unclear what this was all about, although the camp still contains warehouses full of Kaddafi era weapons and ammo.

Over the last two years the government has been expelling hundreds of thousands of black African migrants, some who have lived and worked in Libya for years. New migrants are being forced back as well, even though these people are seeking to pass through and get to Europe and jobs. This animosity towards black Africans is the result of former dictator Kaddafi hiring thousands of black African mercenaries to help fight the rebels. Add this to the usual racist attitudes of Arab and Berber Libyans (who are most of the population) towards black Africans and you get some nasty immigration policies.

While many Libyans oppose the militias, these gangs often do things that are popular with most civilians. For example, militiamen hunt down and torture or kill Kaddafi supporters. This sometimes gets very violent, as in the case of Tawergha, a pro-Kaddafi town outside the port city of Misarata that Kaddafi forces fought hard to conquer. In the process thousands of rebels and civilians were killed and much of the city damaged by artillery and street fighting. The Kaddafi forces used Tawergha as their main base and over the last two years militiamen have been destroying that town and forcing its 40,000 largely pro-Kaddafi residents to flee.

Kaddafi recognized and supported tribal affiliations and these loyalties (to divide potential enemies) and this makes it difficult to establish a workable national government. One asset the government does have is a lot of oil revenue. But the widespread corruption cripples efforts to use that money to build national unity. As the old saying goes, “all politics is local” and is what the government still lacks in the web of tribal connections that Kaddafi used for so long to keep things quiet. This technique eventually failed and the Kaddafi-era ability to keep the tribal leaders quiet is missed.

The basic problem is that the new government has not been able to organize a national police force yet and has depended on local militias to maintain law and order. The government pays some 200,000 militiamen (about eight percent of the total workforce), and being one of these gunmen is an attractive proposition for a young man without much education. The militias are often run by tribal leaders or local warlords, and this causes problems if you send them to help maintain order somewhere else (where they are often seen as tribal invaders). The militia leaders also cause problems, with some of them not passing on all the payroll the government provides. The leaders blame the pay shortfall on the government. Not all the militias are on the government payroll and they operate like criminal gangs to meet their expenses. The Islamic radical militias are causing a lot of popular anger because of efforts to impose restrictive lifestyle rules and attacks on non-Moslems (especially Christians who have lived in Libya for generations). Most of these Christians are Egyptian Copts, and the Egyptian government is angry that their Libyan counterparts have not been able to stop this abuse.

The government still does not control its southern borders. This is because former (and deceased) Libyan dictator Moammar Kaddafi used tribal loyalties to maintain power and favored certain tribes down there. Although Kaddafi was deposed two years ago, many of the pro-Kaddafi tribes in the south are still fighting. The violence is not so much about putting Kaddafi followers back into power but holding on to Kaddafi era privileges and avoiding punishment for crimes committed to support Kaddafi's rule. Then there is the racial angle. In the far south the pro-rebel Tabu tribe has been put in charge of border (with Sudan, Chad, and Niger) security. There they constantly skirmish with the pro - Kaddafi Zwai. Another element of this rivalry is that the Tabu are black African while the Zwai are Arab. Kaddafi supported Arab domination over black Arabs, something many Arabs still support and black Africans resent. Add to the mix corruption and politics within the tribes and you get a southern border which is only sporadically guarded. Smugglers, illegal migrants, and terrorists can cross pretty much at will. On the better roads there are often multiple checkpoints, usually with one controlled by Tabu tribesmen, another run by some Zwai, and a third run by soldiers or police from the north. All will accept cash gratuities from travelers and turn away those they don't like (for any number of reasons).

March 31, 2013: The military has been given $4.7 billion to rebuild the armed forces. Kaddafi spent a lot of money on the military but most of it was wasted because Kaddafi preferred to have incompetent and compliant men running the armed forces. A lot of high tech gear was purchased and never used. There was no one trained to maintain or, in some cases, even operate all these aircraft, ships, and tanks. The new government aims to change that, but first it must replace all the rusting Cold War era relics that Kaddafi used to arm the troops with. Military officials made it clear that they prefer Western equipment, not the Russian stuff that Kaddafi bought so much of.

April 1, 2013: An aide to the prime minister was kidnapped outside the capital. He was released eight days later and little has been revealed about the who and why.

April 2, 2013: Ten armed men stormed into a police station in the capital, tied up the five policemen on duty and freed three prisoners. The attackers were member of a local gang out to free three of their number who had been arrested. Criminal gangs like this are a growing problem that will have to be addressed after the militias are dealt with.

April 3, 2013: An explosion in an oil pipeline in the east was apparently sabotage and was quickly repaired. The culprit is still being sought.

April 15, 2013: In the east (near Derna, 200 kilometers east of Benghazi) the convoy of the leader of a local Islamic radical militia was ambushed. The militia leader was wounded. The Islamic radical militias in the area are under pressure from most of the locals to disband or get out.

April 17, 2013: A B-737 passenger jet was hit by gunfire (in the forward lavatory) as it landed in Tripoli airport. There were no injuries and it was later determined that the incident was accidental as it is customary to fire rifles in the air when celebrating something and the aircraft was over a neighborhood where there is a lot of that when the incident occurred.

April 20, 2013: After months of effort, negotiators got two feuding tribes in the deep south to agree on and sign a peace deal. This may end the fighting down there, but will not end ancient animosities. Kaddafi used tribal loyalties to maintain power and favored certain tribes and some of the pro - Kaddafi tribes kept fighting after Kaddafi died in 2011. The violence is not so much about putting Kaddafi followers back into power, but holding on to Kaddafi era privileges and avoiding punishment for crimes committed to support Kaddafi's rule. In this case violence continued on the southern border where the pro-rebel Tabu tribesmen were put in charge of border (with Sudan, Chad and Niger) security. There they constantly skirmished with the pro-Kaddafi Zwai. Another element of this rivalry was that the Tabu are black African while the Zwai are Arab. Kaddafi supported Arab domination over black African Arabs, something many Arabs still support.

April 23, 2013: In the capital a car bomb went off near the French embassy and three people were injured. This was the first such attack since the assault on American diplomats in Benghazi last September.

April 26, 2013: In the east (Derna, 200 kilometers east of Benghazi) Islamic radicals attacked the headquarters of a pro-government militia, killing one man. A car bomb was found nearby and defused.

April 27, 2013: In the east (Benghazi) a bomb went off next to a police station, but there were no injuries.

April 28, 2013: Several hundred armed militiamen surrounded the foreign ministry compound in Tripoli and demanded that a law be passed barring anyone who worked for Kaddafi from holding a long list of government jobs. Such a law was proposed last December but has been stalled over the issue of what to do about Kaddafi officials who changed sides during the civil war and people who worked for Kaddafi but were not supporters of Kaddafi. The foreign ministry, like many other ministries, has some senior officials who changed sides during the war. There is an element of class, family and tribal envy here since during decades of Kaddafi rule educated or ambitious Libyans could either go into exile (which many did) or work for the government. Some supported Kaddafi's ideas about a benevolent (in theory) dictatorship, most did not. Now Libyans are split on the issue of barring everyone who ever worked for Kaddafi (including those who quit and fled the country) from government employment. For many Libyans it's all black and whi te and no compromise will be tolerated. But many of Libyans who could be banned are just the sort of educated and skilled people the country needs in government right now.

Weapons stolen from government warehouses two years ago are still being smuggled out of Libya and have shown up in at least twelve other countries so far. Most of the stuff gets out to the east (Egypt) or the south (the lightly guarded borders with Niger, Chad and Sudan). A lot of these weapons remain hidden inside Libya, where they are considered a valuable commodity that can be used for family defense or sold to other Libyans or smugglers to raise quick cash. Illegal weapons are common and the security forces won't come after you about it unless you are using those weapons to commit another crime.

The government has given the new government of Egypt two billion dollars. As far as anyone can tell this is something of a gift, to a government desperate for cash because their economy has sharply declined since the Mubarak dictatorship was overthrown. It is believed the gift was intended to ensure that the Egyptian government remained cooperative. This includes making it difficult for weapons to be smuggled out of Libya and for opponents of the new Libyan government to set up shop in Egypt.

April 29, 2013: The government admits security remains a major problem in the country. Progress is being made but it is slow because the government wants to disarm or otherwise disable militias without triggering another civil war. The dozens of major militias know they are unpopular and are government and popular under pressure to disband. Most of these militias don't agree with other groups but are united by the desire to stay in business (be it just stealing or Islamic terrorism). If the government comes on too strong many of these militias could unite and put up some serious resistance. More civil war is very unpopular among nearly all Libyans, especially now that the economy is reviving.

May 2, 2013: The U.S. revealed that their investigation into Libyan nuclear weapons efforts revealed evidence that North Korea supplied key materials and technology. This was made possible by Pakistani nuclear weapons developer A Q Khan, who originally stole technology from the West that enabled him to create Pakistan's nuclear bombs. In 2004, Khan admitted that he had then sold that technology (as a private venture) to other nations (like Libya and North Korea). Outrage from the West over this led Khan to be placed under house arrest. But he was kept away from journalists and spared any prosecution. That was because he was a national hero in Pakistan for creating the "Islamic Bomb." Popular demand eventually led to Khan being released from house arrest four years ago. North Korea continued aiding Libya until 2007. After that the Kadaffi government made a deal with the UN and many Western nations to halt its nuclear and chemical weapons programs and get sanctions lifted. But many details of North Korean and Pakistani cooperation were withheld.

May 3, 2013: In Tripoli several hundred anti-militia protestors demonstrated. This attracted some militiamen, who attacked the demonstrators.

May 5, 2013: Responding to weeks of pressure from Islamic radicals and militias, the legislature passed a law banning anyone who worked for Kaddafi from holding political office for the next ten years. Such a law was proposed last December but stalled over the issue of what to do about Kaddafi officials who changed sides during the civil war and people who worked for Kaddafi but were not supporters of Kaddafi. The foreign ministry, like many other ministries, has some senior officials who changed sides during the war. There is an element of class, family, and tribal envy here since during decades of Kaddafi rule educated or ambitious Libyans could either go into exile (which many did) or work for the government. Some supported Kaddafi's ideas about a benevolent (in theory) dictatorship, most did not. After Kaddafi fell two years ago Libyans were split on the issue of barring everyone who ever worked for Kaddafi (including those who quit and fled the country) from government employment. For many Libyans it's all black and white and no compromise will be tolerated. But many of Libyans who could be banned are just the sort of educated and skilled people the country needs in government right now. The group hardest hit by this is the National Forces Alliance, the coalition that controls the most seats in the legislature. The many officials forced out of office will not disappear and many will continue to influence national affairs as unofficial advisors to their successors.

May 8, 2013: Tunisia arrested a Libyan man at a southern port and seized 150 kg (330 pounds) of explosives on his fishing boat. This is the latest such incident as individuals from Libya continue trying to smuggle weapons into Tunisia. Islamic radicals and gangsters are the customers for this stuff and so far the government has not found evidence of any organization behind the smuggling.

The U.S. announced it was withdrawing some of its diplomatic staff because of the growing threat of terrorist violence. This came a day after the U.S. warned it citizens to not visit Libya because of the terrorist threat. Other Western nations have taken similar precautions.

May 10, 2013: There were two attacks on police stations in Benghazi early today. There were no casualties, just property damage. Later in the day there were anti -militia demonstrations in three cities.

May 11, 2013: A police station was attacked in Benghazi and damaged. One of the attackers was killed and the incident was apparently an act of revenge by someone angry at the police.

In neighboring Tunisia police broke up a large demonstration by Islamic radicals.

May 12, 2013: The militias besieging several ministries in the capital have finally withdrawn, several days after their main demand (a law barring Kaddafi era people from serving in government) was met. This allowed employees to return to work at the Foreign and Interior ministries.

May 13, 2013: A car exploded near a hospital in Benghazi, killing three people. Thought at first to be a car bomb, further investigation revealed that it was an accident, when explosives used for fishing accidentally detonated.

May 15, 2013: For the second time in the last six months, the Zueitina oil terminal (180 kilometers southwest of Benghazi) was shut down because demonstrators (demanding jobs or more money from the government) blocked access.

The U.S. FBI has identified 25 of the 45 people it has photos of attacking the American diplomatic compound in Benghazi last September. This left the U.S. ambassador and three other Americans dead. The FBI is seeking more information on three of the 45, apparently in the belief that they are leaders.

In neighboring Tunisia police and soldiers have been searching for about fifty Islamic terrorists who are operating in the Atlas Mountains near the Kasserine Pass. The search concentrated on a hundred square kilometers of sparsely populated forests and mountains without much success. Algerian border security in that area has been increased, in case the terrorists try to flee that way, and none are expected to head for Libya. This is the first time Tunisia has had to deal with armed Islamic terrorists since 2007. The armed men in the Atlas Mountains have been active in the area for at least six months. Some of these terrorists recently fled Mali and others are from Algeria. These were joined by a smaller group (a dozen or so) of Tunisian Islamic terrorists who had apparently not been active until joined by all these new men and a few local recruits. Because of this increase in violence, the moderate Islamic government of Tunisia has declared war on Islamic radicals, and these groups have responded by accepting the challenge and promising a lot more violence. Eleven of the 32 terrorists killed nearby in an attack on an Algerian natural gas field in January, were Tunisian, which provided a hint that there were a lot more Islamic terrorists in Tunisia than the government wanted to admit. That group had travelled through Libya to reach their target.

On the Egyptian border security personnel strive to keep weapons smugglers from getting into Egypt and Egyptians from illegally entering Libya looking for work. Some 4,000 Egyptians have tried that so far this year and they come by land and sea. It's unknown how many weapons (stolen from government warehouses or troops during the revolution) have made it into Egypt. Every month several shipments are detected and seized.

May 17, 2013: Security remains a major problem in the country. Progress is being made but it is slow because the government wants to disarm or otherwise disable militias without triggering another civil war. The dozens of major militias know they are unpopular and are under government and popular pressure to disband. The growing number of anti-militia demonstrations is evidence of that. Most of these militias don't agree with each other but are united by the desire to stay in business (be it just stealing or Islamic terrorism). If the government comes on too strong many of these militias could unite and put up some serious resistance. More civil war is very unpopular among nearly all Libyans, especially now that the economy is reviving. The government is training more police and some areas are organizing anti-militia defense volunteers. These could be called militias, except that they are led and staffed by people who are very hostile to the militia concept. Such local volunteer groups are common around the world when organized armed groups become intolerable.

May 18, 2013: In Tripoli a bomb went off near the Algerian, Greek, and Saudi embassies, causing only light damage to a car. In Benghazi another bomb went off, wounding a soldier.

May 19, 2013: In Benghazi officials have determined that an explosion outside a hospital last week was an accident, not a bomb.

May 20, 2013: The U.S. has identified five men involved in the attack in Benghazi last September that left the American ambassador and three other Americans dead. The Libyan government refuses to arrest the five because they are protected by powerful Islamic radical militias.

The Interior Minister resigned, largely because of his failure to get a new national police force organized and reduce the growing lawlessness.

May 21, 2013: In Benghazi soldiers arrested several men and seized over 200 anti-tank mines and bomb making materials. One soldier was wounded during the operation.

May 26, 2013: Niger is demanding that Libya do something about Islamic terrorist groups who have established bases in southern Libya. Niger believes that the men who carried out two recent terror attacks in Niger came from Libya. The Tuareg tribes in southern Libya are not particularly into Islamic radicalism but have been known to harbor Islamic terrorists if the money was right. It is believed that some of the Islamic terrorists from Mali eventually made their way to southern Libya because sanctuary was assured by tribes who stayed bought once you paid them.

The head of the national legislature (Mohammed Magarief) is resigning because of the new law that bans any officials who once worked for the Kaddafi government. Magarief was very popular and had been opposed to Kaddafi for over two decades before the 2011 revolution.

May 28, 2013: The government has agreed (after much pressure from groups in eastern Libya) to move most operations of the national oil company from Tripoli to Benghazi. That will mean thousands of jobs for the east.

May 29, 2013: In Benghazi a roadside bomb killed three soldiers.

May 30, 2013: At an oilfield 1,000 kilometers southwest of the capital 45 security guards went on strike and halted pumping operations. The dispute was over late pay and poor living conditions. The oil field produces about five percent of Libya's oil.

June 2, 2013: In the south ancient animosities between tribes left at least five dead and dozens wounded. Kaddafi used tribal loyalties to maintain power and favored certain tribes and some of the pro-Kaddafi tribes kept fighting after Kaddafi died in 2011. The violence is not so much about putting Kaddafi followers back into power but holding on to Kaddafi era privileges and avoiding punishment for crimes committed to support Kaddafi's rule. In this case violence continued on the southern border where the pro-rebel Tabu tribesmen were put in charge of border (with Sudan, Chad, and Niger) security. There they constantly skirmished with the pro-Kaddafi Zwai. Another element of this rivalry was that the Tabu are black African, while the Zwai are Arabs. Kaddafi supported Arab domination over black African Arabs, something many Arabs still support.

June 8, 2013: In Benghazi a large crowd of civilians, many of them armed, surrounded a compound used by a militia and demanded that the militiamen get out of the neighborhood (where they had been acting like thugs). The militiamen resisted and a battle broke out. Nearly 150 people were killed or wounded and the surviving militiamen fled. The compound they were using was set on fire.

The head of the Libyan Army (Yusef al Mangoush) resigned, in response to yesterday's battle against a militia in Benghazi. Mangoush was criticized for delays in forming a new army and for not intervening in yesterday's Benghazi battle and refusing (because of government orders) to send any troops he did have to deal with the many instances of militia misbehavior.

June 9, 2013: On the Egyptian border eight Egyptians were wounded by Libyan border guards. It began when the Libyans caught four Egyptian merchants trying to sneak goods across (without paying the customs fee). The guards burned the truck and its cargo, and Egyptian police arrived and tried to intervene. That resulted in a gun battle that left four Egyptian smugglers and four Egyptian policemen wounded.

The Libyan Air Force is buying two American C-130J transporters.

Protests at various oil facilities have reduced daily production by 16 percent. Many of the tribes living near the oil facilities in the sparsely populated south have come to depend on oil industry jobs. In effect, having one of these jobs makes you a rich man because more traditional forms of employment pay far less. Thus, those without oil related jobs are becoming increasingly aggressive about demanding a piece of the pie. The government does not want to encourage tribesmen to think they can get a do-nothing (but high paying) job just by making threats. This makes many poor but ambitious tribesmen angry, more determined, and sometimes violent. There is some good news. The economy doubled in 2012 and is on track to grow another 20 percent this year. The growth is due to getting oil production going again, as oil is 90 percent of GDP and 97 percent of exports.

June 11, 2013: The recent militia-related violence in Benghazi has forced the government to agree to use force, when necessary, to disband illegal militias and to punish authorized militias that misbehave. For two years now the government has tolerated the militias because there were no organized police or military to deal with any violent opposition from these private armies. The recent upsurge in resistance, often instigated by armed civilians who were simply fed up with the gangster habits of many militias, has forced the government to act.

June 11, 2013: In the capital someone attached a bomb to the car of Italian diplomats. The bomb was spotted and people moved away before it exploded (wounding two children). Islamic terrorists were believed responsible.

June 14, 2013: South of the capital (near the town of Kira) pro-Kaddafi gunmen ambushed an army convoy and killed a colonel. Three of the attackers were killed by return fire.

June 15, 2013: In Benghazi six soldiers were killed during a battle with hostile militiamen.

In the eastern city of Derna a judge was shot dead by an assassin. The courts resumed operation in many parts of the country recently and anti-government and other criminal groups are trying to avoid prosecution by intimidating judges and prosecutors.

June 16, 2013: In southern Tunisia police arrested a Libyan Islamic terrorist leader who was part of a group of Islamic radicals operating in the Atlas Mountains near the Kasserine Pass since late last year.

June 19, 2013: A 3 AM bomb destroyed a police station in Benghazi. This was likely carried out by militiamen or gangsters trying to halt the growth of police capabilities (which are mainly directed at shutting down criminal gangs and anti-government militias).

The loss of oil income has nationwide implications because most Libyans rely on the oil revenue to support their living standards. Most Libyans want their Kaddafi -era welfare state back but bigger and better. Kaddafi held power for so long, despite his bizarre behavior and mismanagement, by spending over half the oil income on a shabby, but effective enough, welfare state. Anyone who misbehaved had their benefits cut off. Kaddafi would also cut benefits for the extended family of those who opposed him. This was a remarkably effective way to run a police state. With Kaddafi and his secret police gone, people still want their welfare state and not a shabby one either. But without control of the entire country and full oil production, the new government has no way to deliver the expected goodies. Then there's the corruption, with many militia leaders inclined to grab local welfare funds for themselves. The new Libya is a work in progress and will probably continue to be one for some time.

Several demonstrations have blockaded oil fields and export terminals and cut oil production by a third. The demonstrators go after the oil facilities because that is sure to get the attention of the government and some action on their grievances. The complaints are usually economic and the solution is usually the government hiring more local men to work at the oil facilities. Deals are usually worked out and production resumed. The job disputes are often over who will be hired to provide security. Foreigners handle most of the technical jobs because few Libyans are qualified for this work. But security is another matter and rival militias battle each other and whoever the current oil field security people are to obtain these jobs.

The rebel militias are also attacking media outlets that disagree with them. While many of these rogue militias are turning into criminal gangs (a common historical phenomena worldwide) some are becoming allies with Islamic terror groups. A small number of the rebel militias were run by Islamic radicals and these have since become increasingly dangerous because these groups want to turn Libya into a religious dictatorship. Since Kaddafi was overthrown in 2011, Libya has turned into something of a sanctuary for Islamic terrorists. Not so much because the government allowed it, but more because the government could not prevent it. Benghazi was the largest urban area that was hospitable to Islamic terrorists, mainly because it was the last large city to have law and order restored by government security forces (and pro-government armed groups).

That battle is still going on. Meanwhile in the south (away from the narrow "green" coastal area) the vast and thinly populated semi-desert and desert areas will not come under any government control for some time. In these badlands the Islamic terror groups can operate more freely. The terrorists are not invisible down there, they need supplies and visit nearby settlements to obtain what they require. Overhead the terrorists are vulnerable to air reconnaissance (via vidcams and electronic monitoring). The south is the next big battleground for a much longer war.

A month ago the government launched an offensive against dozens of troublesome militias and, not surprisingly, the main battleground has been Benghazi. There the militias are fighting back and the government has sent additional troops in to help police and pro-government militias maintain law and order. In reaction to this many militias with known anti-government attitudes have abandoned their compounds, gone underground, and begun fighting as terrorists against government security forces (police, soldiers, and pro-government militias and vigilantes). Some of the rebel militiamen believe that the new government is too close to members of the old Kaddafi government. This is largely paranoia, but it is a popular delusion, especially when it justifies the increasingly criminal behavior (larceny and extortion) practiced by many militiamen. The militias now fear the population in general, which has become very hostile to the misbehaving former rebels. Many Libyan families have obtained weapons (assault rifles and pistols) during the rebellion two years ago and have recently shown a willingness to grab those weapons and turn on the hated militias. The government has called on neighborhoods to organize local defense units and cooperate with the security forces in halting the militia violence.

After the revolution two years ago, many of these weapons were stolen and ended up on the black market. These are showing up all over the region as smugglers get them out of Libya and to buyers who can pay. Most of the Kaddafi weapons hoard was seized by the new Libyan government (or pro - government militias that did not hand them over to the black market) and many of these are being sold to Gulf Arab states that are supplying them to Syrian rebels. The weapons shipments are technically illegal because of sanctions against Syria, but Turkey looks the other way as the arms are flown in or come by ship mixed in with relief supplies. Libyan arms dealers approved by the Libyan government are allowed to broker sales of weapons to approved buyers (mainly wealthy Arab oil states who back the Syrian rebels).

June 23, 2013: The late dictator Moamar Kaddafi loved to buy military equipment, and he did so constantly and in far larger quantities than Libya required or could even operate. Most of this stuff was never used. For decades there were thousands of armored vehicles and warplanes sitting around in remote bases with no one to maintain them. There were dozens of military bases with locked warehouses full of assault rifles, machine-guns, mortars, and portable missiles that were never issued or touched. Some of this stuff was shipped to other African countries, to arm local rebels that Kaddafi supported (usually against local leaders Kaddafi did not get along with).

June 25, 2013: South of Sirte unidentified gunmen attacked an army checkpoint and killed six soldiers. The coastal town of Sirte has a population of 100,000 and was Kaddafi's birthplace. Before 2011, it was full of his well-cared for Kaddafi supporters. Sirte was heavily damaged, and looted, during the rebellion. Most of the population fled the fighting, and when they returned they found a much less prosperous lifestyle. This caused some of the locals to arm themselves and misbehave.

June 27, 2013: The Defense Minister was dismissed, after troops under his command were unable to halt three days of terrorist and militia violence in the capital. The fighting and bombings left ten dead and dozens wounded.

July 5, 2013: In Benghazi someone fired on the car of the French consul, who was uninjured.

July 7, 2013: In Libya there were more anti-militia demonstrations. In the east the ports of Es Sider and Ras Lanuf were reopened, after security guards there halted their strike (for better working conditions) that had shut down the two oil shipping facilities for three days.

July 10, 2013: Security forces have regained control of the Interior Ministry compound in Tripoli. For a week (since July 2nd) angry militiamen had occupied the compound. The occupiers had objected to the disbanding of SSCs (Special Security Committees) at the end of last year. The first post Kaddafi government (the NTC) formed a national police called the SSC a year ago. Soon some 60,000-strong former militiamen (and some who fought for Kaddafi) joined SSCs. The pay was high and regular, but leadership was largely amateur. The SSC was not welcome in Misrata and Zintan and had its hands full dealing with independent militias in Tripoli and Benghazi. The SSCs were also trying to arrange an end to fighting between black African and Arab tribes around the southeastern town of Kufra. This had been going on for months and had left over 200 dead by mid-2012. Another source of violence, which the SSC has been less successful against, were Islamic radical groups in eastern Libya. Some of these groups want to turn Libya into a religious dictatorship and declare war against the non -Moslem world. These Islamic radicals had already attacked Westerners in the area and were responsible for desecrating World War II era graves of Western soldiers. All this is a big embarrassment for the NTC, which knew it needed to work with the West (to sell the oil and import goods and services). At the same time, the NTC did not want the local Islamic radicals to declare war on the NTC. The SSC turned out to be incapable of dealing with the Islamic terror groups, and many SSC members were out for themselves, not the common good. In many parts of the country the SSC men were seen as government supported bandits, and by late 2012, the government decided to shut down SSC and move the most reliable SSC members over to the newly formed police force. This put many SSC members out of work and some of those men took over the Interior Ministry in an effort to get paid.

July 15, 2013: Oil production and shipping has resumed, after having been largely shut down since June 25th. There had been many disruptions in oil fields and export facilities last month, which cut average production to 1.3 million barrels a day. The disruptions were mainly caused by men demanding jobs or more money for their area of the country. These groups blocked oil facilities until they got what they wanted. Oil accounts for 70 percent of Libyan GDP and the government is eager to resume full production (3 million barrels a day).

July 16, 2013: The government is now fully committed to disbanding and disarming the remaining militias. The problem remains having the trained soldiers and police to actually make this happen. Meanwhile, the government is deadlocked over creating a new constitution. The government is forced to expend most of its energy on keeping the population (most of them dependent on government handouts) happy and non-violent. Many Libyans are more into entitlement than joining together for the common good. Decades of Kaddafi's dictatorial welfare state had left many people incapable of forming and running a democratic government. This is what most Libyans want, but there is disagreement and uncertainty about how to go about it.

August 1, 2013: In the capital 18 prisoners escaped when the convoy taking them from a courthouse to prison was attacked.

In Benghazi a senior police commander was wounded when a bomb planted in his car went off.

August 2, 2013: In Benghazi a bomb was thrown at a police station, wounding five policemen.

August 3, 2013: The deputy prime minister resigned, citing lack of cooperation from senior government officials and rampant corruption that interfered with efforts to solve the security and economic problems.

August 4, 2013: The U.S. ordered its Middle Eastern embassies closed because of the threat of al Qaeda attack. This closure lasted until the 10th.

August 7, 2013: The U.S. government finally indicted someone (Ahmed Khattalah) for the attack on an American diplomatic facility in Benghazi last September 11. This killed the U.S. ambassador and three other Americans. Khattalah, an Islamic radical and militia leader, denied the charges. Khattalah has long been a suspect but Libyan security forces have not been able to arrest him.

August 13, 2013: Several thousand angry Berbers stormed the parliament demanding recognition and autonomy for them in the new constitution. About 90 percent of Libyans are Arabic-speakers of mixed Arab-Berber ancestry. Berbers who retain their ancient language and culture (and use the original name for Berbers, Amazigh) comprise only four percent and most of them live in small villages in the western hill country south of Tripoli. But about ten percent of Libyans consider themselves Berber and many of these live in the cities. While about 85 percent of Libya's six million people live along the coast, some five percent are still nomadic. Other minorities comprise about six percent of the population. Nearly 100 percent of the population speaks at least some Arabic and 97 percent are Sunni Moslems. The Berber are Sunni but were never big on Islamic radicalism. Kaddafi saw the Berbers as a threat because they were not Arab but had, for over a thousand years, resisted Arab domination. The Berber nationalists have also been holding demonstrations outside oil facilities in the West, interfering with oil production.

Shipments from the refinery at Ras Lanouf resumed. While the crude oil terminal is still held by strikers, the refinery terminal was shut down by its workers on July 29th and that strike was settled.

August 17, 2013: In Benghazi a bomb went off outside the Egyptian consulate, wounding a security guard and five children playing nearby.

August 18, 2013: The Interior Minister resigned, complaining of interference by the prime minister and other senior politicians. The Interior Minister, a former colonel in the Tripoli police, took the job last May after his predecessor was forced to resign, largely because of his failure to get a new national police force organized and reduce the growing lawlessness.

There has still been a lot of street violence in the last month, mostly between militias fighting each other and the security forces. Public opinion is decidedly anti -militia and that translates into support for the security forces or local vigilantes who will violently eject militiamen from the neighborhood. The government is deploying more army units, as they become available, to help keep the peace in the cities. The militia leaders know that their time is coming to an end and many are willing to go down fighting.

There's been less Islamic terrorist activity this year, in large part because of popular anger (and often violent action) against the Islamic radical groups. But there are many (perhaps thousands) of these guys still around. There is less terrorist activity because many of the terrorists have gone into the countryside, which has led to persistent rumors (and some videos) showing terrorist training camps and operational bases in the far south. Many of the Islamic radicals who showed up two years ago for the revolution have since moved on to other battlefields (like Syria). Even many Libyan Islamic radicals have gone to Syria, while others have moved to neighboring Tunisia and especially Egypt. The government is recruiting and training new soldiers and police as quickly as it can, and nearly all these are sent to the cities, where most Libyans and unruly militias live.

Crime has increased since the 2011 revolution, in part because 14,000 convicts were able to flee their prisons during the fighting and have not been recaptured. Many of these men were in prison for serious offenses (murder, rape, kidnapping, grand theft, assault, fraud) and have gone back to doing what got them jailed in the first place. It is believed that the several dozen attacks on government officials and security personnel in the last few months were contract killings using some of the convicted killers who escaped in 2011.

The strikers get some sympathy for their anti-corruption demands. Libya is one of most corrupt nations in the world. International corruption surveys put Libya among the twenty most corrupt countries (out of 176 surveyed). Most Libyans agree with this but the corruption has been around for centuries and even Kaddafi had to live with it. So far, there have not been enough Libyans willing to step up and halt the practices.

August 19, 2013: The government has threatened the striking security personnel at the Brega, Zueitina, Ras Lanouf, and Sedra oil export terminals with army intervention if they do not surrender control of the facilities they have been occupying since July 25 th . This has cost the country over $1.6 billion in lost oil sales. Other shutdowns this year have cost another $400 million in losses. The government also issued a warning to all oil tanker companies that if any unauthorized (by the Libyan government) tankers tried to enter any of the terminals held by the strikers that ship would be fired on. This warning was necessary because the strikers were trying to sell some of the oil stored at the terminals to replace lost wages of the strikers and other workers there. The strikers are demanding higher pay and investigations into corruption (particularly how oil sales are being handled). The government has been reluctant to use force because of the risk that the strikers would damage the facilities, further delaying the resumption of shipments. In the meantime, there is less money for government benefits nearly all Libyans depend on. Those strikers don't seem to realize that they are hurting all Libyans by interfering with the oil sales and that eventually creates a powerful public outcry demanding that the strikers be punished.

September 2, 2013: Daughter of Libya's former spy chief al-Senussi kidnapped'

BBC News: The daughter of Libya's former intelligence chief has been abducted after leaving a prison in Tripoli. Justice Minister Salah al-Marghani said police had been escorting Anoud Abdullah al-Senussi from al-Rayoumi prison on Monday afternoon when they were ambushed by heavily armed gunmen. The kidnappers opened fire on them before seizing Ms Senussi, he added. Ms Senussi had just finished a 10-month prison sentence for entering Libya with a forged passport in October 2012. She was arrested after reportedly flying back to Libya to visit her father, Abdullah al -Senussi, in jail. Her father is being detained for his alleged role in crimes committed during the rule of Muammar Gaddafi. He is also wanted by the International Criminal Court (ICC), which has accused him of responsibility for crimes against humanity during the uprising that ousted Gaddafi in 2011. Judicial police officers were escorting Ms Senussi to Tripoli's airport to board a flight with relatives to the southern city of Sebha when their convoy was ambushed, Mr Mirghani said. "The convoy was ambushed by five vehicles. [The gunmen] were armed to the teeth and started firing their weapons, but it quickly became clear that they wanted to take her. No-one was injured. "The incident took place about 50m away from the gate of the prison." Mr Marghani appealed for "hints" about the incident, and said he expected everyone, particularly "revolutionaries" to help find Ms Senussi. In recent months, she was granted a visit to her father. The BBC's correspondent in Tripoli says the latest kidnapping may well reinforce the ICC's argument that Libya is not ready to prosecute high - profile cases like that of Abdullah al-Senussi and Saif Gaddafi, both wanted by The Hague. The central government's lack of control over various armed groups driven by a myriad of agendas has contributed to lax security, our correspondent adds.

September 5, 2013: Updated - The SSC (Supreme Security Committee) admitted that its own police had ambushed a police convoy taking the recently freed Anoud al Senussi (daughter of Kaddafi's chief of intelligence and currently being prosecuted for war crimes). The 22 year old Anoud al Senussi issued a statement that she was under the protection of the SSC, which was keeping her safe from enemies of her father. Anoud al Senussi had originally been imprisoned nearly a year ago for entering the country illegally (apparently to see her father). In neighboring Tunisia, police cornered 4 Islamic terrorists in the capital. There was a gun battle that left 2 terrorists dead and 2 arrested. The 4 terrorists were believed involved in recent assassinations of politicians and in touch with a group of Islamic terrorists hiding out in the Atlas Mountains near the Algerian border.

September 8, 2013: Police have broken up a terrorist organization that was recruiting young men to be Islamic terrorists and smuggling them to training camps in neighboring Tunisia. The police arrested 21 people involved with this effort, all but 1 of them Libyans.

September 11, 2013: In Benghazi a bomb exploded outside the abandoned (since an attack last September that killed the U.S. ambassador) American consulate. There were no fatalities from the explosion, which blew a hole in the compound wall.

September 12, 2013: The government is sending 8,000 soldiers to be trained by the U.S. in a Bulgarian military facility. These will be sent in batches of about 200 troops and the process will take up to 8 years.

Tunisian forces have been searching for a group of at least 30 Islamic terrorists but have only encountered them a few times since January in the Atlas Mountains near the Algerian border. The terrorists have staged some bombings and ambushes but have apparently devoted most of their efforts to not getting found. Algeria fears that if the Tunisian forces get too close the Islamic terrorists will try to escape via Algeria. Some of the Tunisian terrorists are believed to have been men who were in northern Mali and fled the French-led January offensive. On Tunisia's Algerian border 12,000 additional Algerian troops have appeared over the last four months. Sixty new outposts and small bases were established on the Algerian side and have apparently succeeded in preventing any of the Islamic terrorists active just across the border from entering Algeria. Libya has no such improved security and there is still a lot of smuggling (especially of weapons and Islamic terrorists) in and out of Tunisia.

Next door Tunisia is suffering a popular backlash by the moderate majority against a government controlled by Islamic parties (who were better organized for the post revolutions than their more numerous secular opponents). Unlike Egypt, where the Islamic parties tried to rule alone (and created fear that religious was going to be imposed), the Tunisian religious parties created a coalition with secular parties, shared power, and did not threaten to impose religious rule. But there have still been lots of anti-government demonstrations, triggered by the assassination of several popular secular politicians this year and the sense that the Islamic government was not as enthusiastic as it should be in going after the few hundred Islamic terrorists active in the country. In response, the government has turned up the heat on Islamic radicals and found that many of them did support Islamic terrorists. Many Islamic conservatives still want a constitution that emphasizes Islamic values and customs. Unlike many other Arab countries, many Tunisian Islamic conservatives have been willing to compromise, which may prevent violent conflict, as in Egypt, between religious and secular groups. Tunisians are not yet convinced that Tunisian religious conservatives will compromise enough, but both sides are still negotiating.

The government has issued a warning to all oil tanker that if any companies unauthorized (by the Libyan government) tankers tried to enter any of the terminals held by the strikers they will be fired on. This is to prevent strikers from selling oil stored at the terminals to replace lost wages. Even the strikers realize you can't eat oil. The strikers have numerous demands, including higher pay, more control over the oil industry for local tribes and investigations into corruption (particularly how oil sales are being handled) as well as autonomy for some parts of the country (especially the east, centered on Benghazi). In the meantime there is less money for government benefits nearly all Libyans depend on. Those strikers don't seem to care that they are hurting all Libyans by interfering with the oil sales and that eventually creates a powerful public outcry demanding that the strikers be punished. The strikers get some sympathy for their anti-corruption demands. Libya is one of the most corrupt nations in the world. International corruption surveys put Libya among the twenty most corrupt countries (out of 176 surveyed). Most Libyans agree with this, but the corruption has been around for centuries and even Kaddafi had to live with it. So far, there have not been enough Libyans willing to step up and halt the practices.

Various tribes and militias are still blocking the eastern oil terminals, halting over 60 percent of oil exports. Normally Libya sells about 1.5 million barrels a day. But most oil export terminals have been occupied since July 25th and that has reduced shipments to about 200,000 barrels a day. With the western oil terminals now open again that should rise to about 500,000 barrels a day by the end of the month. But all this is costing the government nearly a billion dollars a week in lost revenue. Eventually the government will not be able to pay security personnel and the oil supported government welfare system will collapse. This will cause chaos and the government resists calls for the use of force because that could result in major damage to oil facilities that could take months, or longer, to repair. All this was largely unexpected because at the start of the year oil production was at 1.4 million barrels a day and nearly back to normal. Then some of the militias the government had hired to provide security at oil facilities decided their loyalties were more to themselves than the national government. Oil production accounts for over 70 percent of GDP and the government is running out of credit and will soon have no way to pay for essential imports, like food. Because the refineries that provide fuel for Libyans are also shut down, the government has to spend scarce cash to import fuel. That won't last long because the government will have run out of cash and credit by the end of the year. After that the economy will collapse and with that food and other essentials will not be available for most Libyans. Before that happens, force will be the only option, as starvation is the last thing anyone wants.

Although there is a national government, that government is not united or coordinated. For example, the Defense Ministry has its own program to disband militias which is separate from a similar effort run by the Interior Ministry (which controls the national police). There is a plan for the two ministries to coordinate their efforts but it has not been implemented yet. There are many other examples of government organizations operating independently, which is why the many weapons stockpiled by the Kaddafi government are still being flown to Syria to supply rebel groups. These weapons are apparently being paid for (by pro-rebel Arab governments) but it is unclear who is getting the money. Technically, such exports are illegal by Libyan and international law but they continue. Meanwhile, the effort to destroy Libya's chemical weapons stockpiles, begun in 2003 by Kaddafi, is stalled. That destruction was originally planned to take until 2016.

September 18, 2013: In the southwest a week of fighting between Zintan and Garamna tribal militias have left at least a dozen dead and over twenty wounded. There are similar tensions all over the country, but they usually don't get past shouting, threats, and weapons fired into the air. Many parts of the country depend on local militias for law and order. These militias often cooperate with local governments or tribal leaders and have some legitimacy. Militias are less likely to cooperate with each other.

September 19, 2013: Saif al-Islam Quadhafi transfer for Tripoli hearing blocked'

The militia holding Saif al-Islam, the son of late Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi, has refused to transfer him to the capital for a pre-trial hearing. "The security situation does not permit his transfer," Zintan militia head Ajami al-Ateri told. Libya's attorney general said he had ordered that Saif al-Islam be present at the Tripoli hearing.

September 26, 2013: Hot on the trail of Muammar Quadhafi’s loot'

The American firm Command Global Services (CGS) that Tripoli has retained to trace the foreign assets of Muammar Quadhafi has set up its operations in the Tremoille hotel in the 8th district of Paris. CGS’ investigators, headed by Charles Seidel, a former Central Intelligence Agency operative, will be collecting evidence in the French capital until September.

September 29, 2013: In Benghazi three soldiers and three policemen were killed in separate incidents.

September 30, 2013: In the west armed Berbers shut down a major natural gas pipeline to publicize Berber fears that they would remain a persecuted minority when the new constitution goes into force. Specifically, the protestors wanted Berber included as one of the official languages.

October 2, 2013: An armed mob attacked the Russian embassy. At least one of the attackers were killed but all embassy staff got away safely. The mob attacked because a Russian woman (a 26 year old professional weight lifter who came to Libya in 2011, to help defend the dictatorship) had murdered a Libyan pilot and his mother. The mob believed she was hiding out in the embassy. She wasn't. The Libyan government apologized for the attack and promised to improve security around all embassies.

October 3, 2013: Russian embassy staff left the country.

October 3, 2013: LIBYA- Oil falls victim to tribal quarrels'

MC - The blockade of Libya's oil facilities, initially driven by "wage" demands by former rebels in charge of protecting them, is now complicated by tribal factors. The government's powerles sness in responding to Ibrahim Al-Jadhran whose men have been blocking the Es Sider, Ras Lanuf, Zuweitina and Marsa Al Hariga oil terminals since the end of July, can be explained by the fact he belongs to the Mgharba tribe.

Southeast of Tripoli (Bani Walid) gunmen attacked a checkpoint and killed 16 soldiers. The next day police arrested two men and accused them of participating in the attack.

October 5, 2013: In Tripoli American Delta Force commandos covertly came ashore and arrested an al Qaeda leader (Nazih Abdul Hamed al Ruqai) long sought for his role in planning two terrorist attacks on American embassies in East Africa in 1998. Ruqai is a Libyan who returned in 2011, to take part in the revolution and has since lived openly, but quietly, in Tripoli. The Libyan government complained to the United States about this "kidnapping," but the U.S. did not believe the Libyan government would, or even could, extradite Ruqai for his terrorist crimes. Ruqai is believed to have hidden out in Iran for over a decade. He is one of the few senior al Qaeda people still on the loose. Ruqai was noted for his technical skills (especially with computers) and ability to plan major terrorist operations. He is being interrogated aboard a U.S. Navy ship off the Libyan coast and will eventually be sent back to the United States for trial. He was indicted for mass murder and other crimes over a decade ago. Since then more unfavorable evidence against him has appeared. Many Libyans are glad to see men like Ruqai taken away, but the government is making a show of anger in an effort to appease Islamic radical groups angry over the inability of the Libyan government to prevent American commandos from just coming in and taking wanted (in the West) terrorists. The Libyan government hopes there are not more of these visits because many Islamic radicals are calling for attacks on government officials, if only to encourage the government to keep the Americans out.

About 600 people a day are illegally crossing the southern border in an effort to make it to Europe. This is more of a problem for Europeans than Libyans, who see the largely black African illegals as a nuisance, mainly because the migrants are just passing through. These travelers don't want to stay in Libya, which is generally very hostile to these unwanted visitors. The illegals are easy to spot and the locals will sometimes murder migrants who cause any problems.

Libya still has not destroyed all the chemical weapons it began getting rid of 9 years ago. At least these weapons are now guarded, and many of them are so old and decrepit that any terrorists trying to move them would probably die while doing so (as the corroded containers broke and released the poisonous substances).

An example of the rampant crime is the recent admission that dozens of American armored vehicles and hundreds of weapons brought in as part of a training operation have been stolen. Most Libyans just want peace and safety so they can enjoy their oil wealth. That simple goal is proving harder to achieve than originally thought.

There is no quick solution to the warlord problem. The government has to build its military and police forces as quickly as it can and then take down the hundreds of armed gangs one at a time. At the current rate this could take 5 years or more. There is also the risk that many of these groups will unite to halt the pacification efforts and that would create another civil war.

October 7, 2013: Oil production is slowly resuming and is believed at 40 percent of full (1.6 million barrels a day) production. There are still many armed groups determined to interrupt oil production in order to obtain one concession or another from the government. The inability of the government to control all these armed groups has left the country generally lawless and suffering from a high crime rate. Vigilante groups are becoming more common. This has resulted in more private jails and summary punishment of those accused of crimes. The UN is complaining about illegal prisoners held by militias and being mistreated. There are 8,000 prisoners in government prisons. Illegal prisons are a minor problem compared to the general lack of law and order in most of the country. There is general support for this informal justice system, but Libyans would prefer government control of the streets and a proper judicial system.

October 7, 2013: US raids in Africa show the United States is pressuring al Qaeda, officials'

TRIPOLI (Reuters) - US Navy SEALS stormed ashore into the al Shabaab stronghold of Barawe but, a U.S. official told, they failed to capture or kill the target among the Somali allies of al Qaeda. U.S. officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, told Reuters the target was a Kenyan of Somali origin known by the name Ikrima, described as a foreign fighter commander for al-Shabaab in Somalia. One of the officials said it was not known if Ikrima was connected to last month's attack on Westgate mall in Nairobi by al Shabaab gunmen in which at least 67 people were killed.

October 9, 2013: The government admitted that it has given the U.S. permission to go after suspects in last years' attack on the Benghazi compound, where the American ambassador was staying. The attackers killed the ambassador and the Libyan government has been unable to arrest the men who are in Libya and are known to have participated. It is believed that similar unofficial permission was given to go after Nazih Abdul Hamed al Ruqai (also known as Abu Anas al Libi) on the 5th, using American commandos to grab Ruqai in front of his house and take him back to the U.S. for prosecution.

October 10, 2013: Libyan PM has been seized for hours by armed men in the capital, Tripoli' In the capital some armed militiamen kidnapped the prime minister from the hotel he is living in. A few hours later militiamen loyal to the government forced the kidnappers to free the prime minister (who accused his kidnappers of trying to stage a coup).

Side note: The BBC News reports that Mr Zeidan Ali was taken from his hotel before dawn "by gunmen to an unknown place for unknown reasons", said a government statement. A former rebel group loosely allied to the government said it had arrested him following a prosecutor's warrant. The government has denied this. The government has been under pressure after US commandos seized senior al-Qaeda suspect Anas al-Liby in Libya. Mr Liby was snatched on Saturday in Tripoli. He is wanted in the US over the 1998 bombings of US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. On Monday, Libya demanded an explanation from the US ambassador over the incident. The government is also struggling to contain rival tribal militias and Islamist militants who control parts of the country, two years after the revolt which overthrew Muammar Gaddafi.

Cabinet summoned - The BBC's Rana Jawad, in Tripoli, says the details of Mr Zeidan's capture remain unclear, but that he was taken by armed men from a hotel he resides in the early hours of the morning. Al-Arabiya TV station broadcast images which showed Mr Zeidan looking dishevelled and being escorted by what the station said were armed men. The government website said he had been taken "to an unknown place for unknown reasons by a group thought to be from the Tripoli Revolutionaries Control Room and the Committee for Fighting Crime". The government statement did not name the hotel, but a woman at the Corinthia Hotel - where the prime minister lives - confirmed the incident happened there when armed men entered the building. She said no -one had been killed. Our correspondent says there are a number of militia groups operating in Libya which are nominally attached to government ministries but often act independently. One of them - the Operations Cell of Revolutionaries - said it was acting on the orders of the prosecutor general in accordance with Libya's penal code. However, state-run National Libyan TV quoted Justice Minister Salah al-Marghani as saying that the prosecutor general had issued no such order. Libya's cabinet has been summoned for an immediate meeting under the leadership of the deputy prime minister. UK Foreign Secretary William Hague condemned the capture and called for Mr Zeidan's immediate release. "It is vital that the process of political transition in Libya is maintained. The government and people of Libya have our full support at this concerning time," he said.

Act of sabotage - In an interview with the BBC on Monday, Mr Zeidan had said Libya was being used as a base to export weapons throughout the region, and called on the West to help stop militancy in Libya. Last month Mr Zeidan visited the UK and appealed for British help to remove weapons from the country amid fears of increased arms smuggling to Syria. In April he urged Libyans to back their government in the face of "people who want to destabilise the country". He also complained at that time of other attacks and "acts of sabotage" carried out by separate groups, against the interior ministry and national TV headquarters. Prime Minister Ali Zeidan was released by his militia kidnappers after a few hours. Ali Zeidan was elected as Libyan prime minister in October 2012, just weeks after failing to secure the chairmanship of the Libyan parliament, the General National Congress (GNC).

October 11, 2013: In Benghazi a car bomb went off near the Swedish and Finnish consulates, but there were no casualties.

October 11, 2013: LIBYA - PM Zeidan's brief kidnap was 'attempted coup'

Libyan Prime Minister Ali Zeidan has said his brief kidnap this week was an "attempted coup", blaming his political opponents for the attack. In a TV address to the nation, he said an unname d political party in the congress was behind the abduction. Ali Zeidan was seized from a Tripoli hotel on Thursday and held for several hours by armed militiamen. He praised the armed groups that came to rescue him and later called for calm in the increasingly lawless country.

October 11, 2013: LIBYA - Quadhafi era spy chief al-Senussi to be tried in Libya’

The International Criminal Court (ICC) has ruled that Libya's Gaddafi-era intelligence chief, Abdullah al-Senussi, can be tried in Libya. The decision means that the ICC will no longer demand that Mr Senussi be sent to The Hague to stand trial. The former military intelligence boss was indicted by the ICC in 2011 for war crimes allegedly committed during the uprising against Colonel Gaddafi. Mr Senussi was extradited to Libya from Mauritania last year. The ICC does not carry out proceedings against a suspect if it deems they are receiving a fair trial in a domestic court. A pre -trial chamber at the ICC decided that "Libya is willing and able genuinely to carry out" investigations into Mr Senussi, the court said in a statement.

October 13, 2013: In Benghazi gunmen killed a Libyan air force officer, while a commander of a police anti-drug operation was badly wounded when a bomb in his car went off.

October 14, 2013: In the coastal city of Sirte (midway between Tripoli and Benghazi) 7 Islamic terrorists died in an explosion. It's unclear if someone killed them or they died while building a bomb.

October 18, 2013: In Benghazi gunmen killed Ahmed al Barghathi, the head of the military police. Barghathi had been supervising operations against rebel militias and the militias are responding by assassinating the leaders of efforts to disband them.

October 20, 2013: A militia near the Egyptian border agreed to release 70 Egyptian trucks and 200 Egyptians that they had seized a week earlier. Some militia members had kin jailed in Egypt for smuggling and thought kidnapping Egyptians would force the Egyptian government to set free the smugglers. Egypt refused and negotiated with tribal leaders to get the trucks and Egyptians released.

October 21, 2013: NATO has agreed to set up a small (fewer than 10 personnel) advisory team in Libya. The Libyan government first asked for this in May, but NATO is a bureaucracy and things take time.

October 22, 2013: Some former rebels, crippled during the fighting two years ago, broke into parliament and caused some damage. The vandals had been demonstrating outside parliament for more benefits. Demanding more from the government (which controls all the oil income) is a popular activity with many groups.

October 23, 2013: In neighboring Tunisia 6 policemen were killed while fighting Islamic terrorists south of the capital. Tunisia blames some of its Islamic terrorist problems on a lack of law and order in Libya and the ability of the Islamic terrorists to bring in weapons stolen from Kaddafi era armories. Islamic terrorists also maintain bases in the south, especially the southeast near the Niger border. These are the bases that can send terrorists into neighboring Algeria or straight north to Tunisia. The Algerian border is well guarded so many terrorists head for Tunisia where they have established bases in the Atlas Mountains near the Mediterranean coast. Tunisian soldiers and police have been searching for these bases all this year, without much success.

In Benghazi the air force officer in charge of air traffic control at the local air base was murdered as he left his home.

The Algerian government revealed that its troops had discovered a huge arms cache near the Libyan border. The cache contained hundreds of portable anti-aircraft missiles, rockets, and landmines.

October 25, 2013: In the east a coalition of warlord and tribal militias has declared independence from Libya and established a new country called Barqa. It has four provinces (Benghazi, Tobruk, Adjabiya, and Jebel Akhdar) but does not have loyal gunmen in most of the region claimed and has many armed opponents. In effect, a number of the eastern militias have dared the government to come and disarm them or tolerate these easterners running their own government and selling oil. At present the government controls a naval force that can blockade the oil export terminals and prevent andy rebel militias from selling oil by sea. The government still has control of the border crossings, or can contest it with militias. This limits how much oil can be smuggled out via truck. Oil is valuable but bulky. A ton of oil sells for about $700 and oil tanker trucks can carry 10-30 tons of it. The larger trucks are tractor trailers and not very good at cross country travel. Thus the rebellions eastern tribes can control the oil but they can’t sell much of it themselves as long as the navy remains loyal.

Oil production is still only about 40 percent of the normal 1.4 million barrels a day. That is because local militias are still blocking shipment of oil produced in eastern Libya.

Under pressure from European countries the government has said it will try to halt the large number of African migrants coming to Libya then paying smugglers to get them to Europe, where they can claim asylum and greatly improve their economic situation. Over 500 people a day are illegally crossing the southern border in an effort to make it to Europe. This is more of a problem for Europeans than Libyans, who see the largely black African illegals as a nuisance, mainly because the migrants are just passing through. These travelers don't want to stay in Libya, which is generally very hostile to these unwanted visitors. The illegals are easy to spot and the locals will sometimes murder migrants who cause any problems. Stopping them from getting into Libya is not easily done because the southern border is largely desert that smugglers have been getting across easily for generations. Checkpoints on the few roads headed north are subject to bribes or simply going around.

Worse, many of the tribes that long supported the dead dictator Kaddafi still oppose the new government and want the Kaddafi family back in charge. These tribes prospered under Kaddafi rule because the dictator favored these tribes when it came to jobs and economic opportunities. That is all gone now, and the pro-Kaddafi tribes are not happy about it. The tribes in eastern Libya were always the most hostile to Kaddafi and they want "compensation" for that in the form of a large share of the oil income. How to divide this oil income is a sensitive topic for everyone. The rampant corruption (which Kaddafi tolerated, as long as he was obeyed) was never popular and has proven difficult to bring under control. It's hard to be fair dispensing the oil income if so many people are trying to steal it.

October 26, 2013: The government admits that it still does not have sufficient security forces to control the entire country and progress disarming the armed militias is very slow. There are over 220,000 armed Libyans who have registered with the government and receive a salary but largely answer to local militia leaders and not the central government. There is no quick solution to the warlord problem. The government has to build its military and police forces as quickly as it can and then take down the hundreds of armed gangs one at a time. At the current rate, this could take five years or more. There is also the risk that many of these groups will unite to halt the pacification efforts and that would create another civil war. That is already happening in eastern Libya.

November 13, 2013: Berber protestors who halted operations in a gas and oil exporting facility 100 kilometers west of the capital have also halted gas for electrical power plants, and the government is trying to deal with that before there are widespread blackouts.

November 14, 2013: In Benghazi an army officer and a retired air force officer were killed in two separate incidents.

The U.S. revealed that since January it has been quietly offering a $10 million reward for information about who was involved in the September 11, 2012 attack on American diplomats in Benghazi.

November 15, 2013: In the capital several thousand protestors marched on a military base occupied by a militia from Misrata. Some of the militiamen fired on the unarmed demonstrators. Police and soldiers got involved, and before it was all over two days later at least 47 were dead and more than 500 wounded. Public anger towards the militias has been on the increase this month because, since November 5th, there has been almost daily fighting between rival militias.

November 16, 2013: A general strike was declared in the capital and most businesses, with the exception of bakeries, pharmacies, hospitals, and gas stations, are closed. This strike is to continue until the militias are all out of Tripoli. Meanwhile, soldiers and pro-government militiamen attacked a militia base. While most of the defending militiamen fled, four were killed and over a dozen wounded during the fighting. Elsewhere in the city members of the Misrata militia attacked an army base and looted it.

November 17, 2013: A senior intelligence officer was kidnapped in the capital .

November 18, 2013: Thousands of soldiers entered the capital to help persuade the militias to leave Tripoli. Crowds cheered the entry of the troops and the public is now openly hostile to the militias.

November 19, 2013: The government said it was going to move all the militias out of the capital, and this time it appears the effort may succeed. The militias are increasingly unpopular and now the government has sufficient troops and police to destroy any single militia that dares to resist. The militias have never cooperated with each other much and now is no different. The government is taking a census of the militias in Tripoli and plans to move them all so none are closer than 30 kilometers from the city. By offering to move, rather than disband, the militias, the government is getting cooperation from many of the militias. Those few that refuse to cooperate will be attacked.

November 20, 2013: In the southern city of Sabha gunmen stole $1,260,000 from a truck transporting the cash to a local bank. Meanwhile, police have identified who stole $54 million on October 28th (near the eastern city of Sirte) and are negotiating to get it back.

November 21, 2013: Several militias, under growing pressure, packed their gear and left the capital. The public pressure, the presence of more soldiers, and a general strike in the capital is forcing the militias to get out.

November 22, 2013: In the capital over 7,000 people turned out to continue protesting against the remaining militias.

November 23, 2013: In the eastern town of Derna, two gunmen shot dead a former member of the Kaddafi era secret police. Elsewhere a visiting Iraqi professor in the town was kidnapped, and later a video appeared on the Internet announcing his death because he was Shia. Sunni Islamic terrorists in Derna have been increasingly violent lately.

November 25, 2013: In Benghazi troops launched an attack on the base of the Islamic terrorist Ansar Al Sharia militia. This fighting left seven dead and over 60 wounded. This was the first time the army had attacked Ansar Al Sharia and that was largely because most people in Benghazi want the militias gone.

November 26, 2013: The bodies of two soldiers were found outside the eastern town of Derna.

In Benghazi someone fired on a checkpoint and wounded three soldiers. Earlier in the day three soldiers were killed when troops clashed with Islamic terrorist militiamen. Another soldier was shot dead as he left a café.

November 28, 2013: Over 40 people were killed or wounded in the south (640 kilometers from the capital at an airbase outside Sabha) as some 50 looters swarmed into an ammunition storage area. Someone mishandled something that exploded and the subsequent fire caused more explosions.

Most of the militias have been forced or persuaded to leave the capital. Over the last six months the government disbanded (or at least neutralized) the 40,000 armed militia men who fought in the 2011 revolution and became the local government after the Kaddafi era administration was destroyed.

There were about 250 militias, usually based on clan, tribe, or neighborhood ties and led by local leaders. Many were simply local defense units that continued in that function in the lawless and sometimes chaotic months after Kaddafi era soldiers, police, and secret police were killed or driven away (or just went into hiding). Some of the militias had other agendas and some of them were pro - Kaddafi. Many were led by Islamic radicals and had many foreign terrorists in their ranks. Others were led by men who wanted to form a new Libyan government, but these were outnumbered. In the cities, especially Tripoli, Benghazi, Misrata, and Ziltan, a brutal competition took place over the last two years, as the more powerful militias destroyed or absorbed the weaker ones and either joined the security forces of the new national government or continued to be hostile to outside control and sought to maintain their independence. This was especially true of tribal militias in remote areas and those in the east (especially Benghazi). It has been increasingly common for men who had not fought in the revolution to join militias to replace rebel fighters who have found work or gotten tired of the militia life. This meant that the militias were increasingly becoming criminal gangs, and that made the public even more hostile to these groups.

November 30, 2013: As predicted, for several months the government is warning the population that government pay and benefits will soon sharply decrease because disruption to oil exports has cut government income by 80 percent. That's because 96 percent of government income comes from the export of oil. The government is short some $55 billion and is unable to borrow any more to cover the missing income. Most of the population depends on government payments to live and nearly everyone gets something. This was how the Kaddafi dictatorship remained in power for so long, by sharing the wealth. Post revolution efforts to grab control of oil facilities to extort more money from the government has shut down most oil exports. The government refuses to give in to the extortion demands and is reluctant to attack the occupiers lest the facilities be damaged severely. It could take months or, in some cases, years to repair the damage.

November 30, 2013: In the southern city of Sabha at least 40 escaped from a prison that was attacked by dozens of armed men.

December 1, 2013: In Benghazi (eastern Libya) an air force officer was shot dead.

December 2, 2013: In Benghazi and Derna (eastern Libya) Islamic terrorists fired on demonstrators calling for the Islamic terrorists to disband or leave the cities. Several dozen civilians were wounded. Security forces have put more pressure on Islamic terrorists in both cities over the last week, and that has led to over 60 casualties including at least nine dead.

December 5, 2013: An American teacher was shot dead while out jogging. Local Islamic terrorists accused the teacher of being a CIA spy but his students and Libyan colleagues thought highly of him. The government increased security for foreigners as a result of this killing.

December 7, 2013: In Benghazi (eastern Libya) a police colonel was killed by a bomb planted in his car by Islamic terrorists. The colonel was also a preacher at a local mosque and spoke out against Islamic terrorists.

December 8, 2013: In Benghazi (eastern Libya) a suicide car bomber attacked the funeral of an army officer assassinated by terrorists and wounded two people.

December 10, 2013: In Derna (eastern Libya) a colonel in security forces was shot dead outside his home. Elsewhere in the city a bomb destroyed a school. Islamic terrorists are hostile to non -religious schools and are active in Derna.

December 15, 2013: In Benghazi (eastern Libya) an army colonel was shot dead. Elsewhere in the city three soldiers were wounded by a roadside bomb.

December 16, 2013: Army special operations troops attacked the homes of known Islamic terrorists in retaliation for the recent death of a fellow soldier by a terrorist bomb. The fighting between Islamic terrorists and the growing number of army units sent in is increasing.

December 17, 2013: The UN is threatening to pull out of Libya because the government changed its mind and now refuses to allow the UN to bring in 235 foreign troops to guard the 200 UN staff in Libya. Some Libyan politicians denounced the UN request as outside interference. It was the lack of professional security forces that got the U.S. ambassador and three other Americans killed last September and terrorist attacks since then have killed and injured more foreigners.

December 20, 2013: In Derna (eastern Libya) the colonel in charge of military intelligence for Benghazi was murdered while in town to visit family.

International corruption surveys (Transparency International) show that corruption has increased in Libya since the Kaddafi government (which was infamous for its corruption) was overthrown. Corruption is measured on a 1 (most corrupt) to 100 (not corrupt scale). The three most corrupt nations have a rating of 8 and the least corrupt is 91. In the last year Libya has gone from 21 to 15. The Middle East averages 37 against the world average (for 177 countries) of 43. Corruption tends to increase during revolutions and civil wars.

The money shortage means a lot of rebuilding is not being done because there is no money to pay for construction materials and other supplies. There is also no money to rebuild the coast guard, so smugglers have an easier time moving people and goods in and out of the country. This includes drugs, Islamic terrorists, cash and Africans trying to get into Europe illegally.

The oil blockade has cost the government $7.5 billion so far and cash reserves and borrowing ability are running out. In addition to food and other essential imports, the government also has to import oil and refined petroleum products to supply its refineries and civilian demand. Even Islamic terrorist militias are calling for an end to the oil export blockades. But the Islamic terrorists also want the elected government eliminated and replaced with a religious dictatorship. That is not likely to happen because there are several major Islamic terrorist militias that do not agree with each other on how a religious dictatorship would work. This is a common problem with Islamic terrorists and their desire to replace government.

In the east (Benghazi and Derna) some Islamic terrorist groups still operate openly and others have established bases and training facilities out in the countryside. These Islamic terrorist groups are training foreigners, including men from Syria and poor security at the border and the airport makes it possible for known Islamic terrorists to enter and leave Libya without interference.

The government effort to neutralize the militias has not worked out as planned. While popular opposition to the militias and a growth in the number of trained and reliable army and police personnel have gotten most of the anti-government militias out of the major cities, these militias have not been destroyed. Most have simply moved to the countryside and still have members operating in the cities. This means continuing attacks on government officials and terrorism attacks in general.

December 21, 2013: The leader of the militia blockading the eastern oil export terminals now refuses to lift the blockage until the government recognizes the autonomy of eastern Libua and the right to take most of the income from oil in the east (where most of the oil is). The national parliament is calling on the government to stop trying to negotiate a settlement and use the security forces to take back control of the oil export terminals. But this is certain to damage the terminals and further delay the resumption of exports (by weeks, months or longer depending on the degree of damage). There is also doubt that the security forces are up to the job. The army and police are still outnumbered by militia gunmen nationwide and a major battle for the oil export terminals would reduce operations against hostile militias elsewhere.

December 21, 2013: Some 150 protestors occupied a building used by the state owned company that operates the local Internet access. For much of the day Internet was shut down but was restored before the end of the day.

December 22, 2013: In the east (50 kilometers outside Benghazi) a suicide truck bomber attacked a checkpoint and killed 13 people.

December 24, 2013: In the east (Benghazi) a soldier was shot dead.

December 26, 2013: In the east (Benghazi) another army officer was shot dead.

December 27, 2013: In the east (Benghazi) an army officer was shot dead.

In the southwest production resumed at the Sarir and Msala oilfields.

Four American military personnel from the embassy, out scouting travel routes 65 kilometers west of the capital were briefly arrested at a checkpoint. The Americans apparently suspected it was a false checkpoint and that they were in danger. That led to a confrontation and their brief detention.

December 29, 2013: Agreements were signed with Algeria to increase economic and security cooperation. Both nations will send more troops and police to their mutual border and the forces on both sides will coordinate operations more closely.

December 30, 2013: In the Libyan city of Misrata Libyan security forces arrested Saifallah Ben Hassine, the leader of Tunisian terror group Ansar Sharia. Ansar Sharia claimed that their leader was not captured and it's still uncertain if he was.

Today was the deadline for unauthorized militias to disband. Most militias ignored the order.

December 31, 2013: The GNC (General National Congress), formed to create a new constitution for the country to vote on and rule until that is done, has extended its power for another year. The separatist activity has prevented any national vote and that must be dealt with before a constitution can be approved. The various factions in the GNC cannot agree on much, although there is a consensus that the new constitution would use Islamic (Sharia) law in an effort to placate the many Islamic conservative groups. This makes local Christians (native Copts, who have been Christian and present for 2,000 years and are five percent of the population).

January 2, 2014: The Libyan rebellion, partly in reaction to high levels of corruption has made corruption worse in Libya and other Arab countries that underwent government change. Corruption is measured on a 1 (most corrupt) to 100 (not corrupt) scale. The three most corrupt nations have a rating of 8 (Afghanistan, North Korea and Somalia) and the least corrupt is 91 (New Zealand and Denmark). In the last year Libya has gone from 21 to 15 in the corruption index while Yemen went from 18 to 15 and Iraq from 18 to 16. The Middle East average is 37 against the world average (for 177 countries) of 43. Egypt, which is still suffering unrest, is unchanged at 32. The U.S. is 73, Canada is 81 (as is Australia) and Mexico 34. There are bright spots in the Middle East, with the UAE at 69.

January 5, 2014: The navy fired on two tankers trying to dock in the eastern port of Sedra to take on a cargo of oil. The self-proclaimed independent Cyrenaica (eastern Libya) holds Sedra and wants to sell oil to sustain their rebellion. Meanwhile the Cyrenaica leaders hired a Canadian firm to help sell their oil, preferably to someone who was willing to defy the blockade by the Libyan Navy.

In the south production resumed at the southwestern El Sharara oilfield. Operations had been halted since October.

January 6, 2014: The government has begun withholding salaries to militias that refuse to obey government orders.

January 8, 2014: The self-proclaimed independent Cyrenaica (eastern Libya) in effect declared war on Libya by announcing that it would use force to prevent the navy from stopping tankers docking and taking on oil. Cyrenaica wants to sell the oil from the oil fields and export facilities it has held since July.

January 10, 2014: The U.S. declared two Libyan Islamic terrorist groups and a Tunisian one, all called Ansar Sharia, to be international Islamic terrorists. Also designated were the leaders of these groups (Ahmed Abu Khattalah and Sufian bin Qumu in Libya and Seifallah Ben Hassine in Tunisia). The Libyan groups are believed responsible for the attack in September 11, 2012 that killed the U.S. ambassador and three other Americans in Benghazi. Hassine was released from a Tunisian prison in 2011. This was after the revolution and part of an amnesty for “political prisoners”. He was serving a 43 year sentence for Islamic terrorism. Hassine was a collaborator with Osama Bin Laden even before September 11, 2001 and he promptly resumed those activities by organizing Ansar Sharia and making attacks on politicians that opposed his goal of turning Tunisia into a religious dictatorship. Ansar Sharia is responsible for most of the Islamic terrorism in Tunisia and has openly claimed allegiance with al Qaeda. The Libyan branches operate in Benghazi and Derma and their leaders also have a history with al Qaeda. One of the leaders had been held in Guantánamo Bay, the U.S. detention facility in Cuba.

January 11, 2014: Near the eastern city of Sirte gunmen shot dead the Deputy Industry Minister. Police found a defective bomb hidden in the minister’s car and the shooters were apparently the backup plan. This violence is related to Islamic terrorists trying to take control of Sirte.

January 12, 2014: Tribal violence down south over the last few days has caused about a hundred casualties (27 of them dead). The violence is near the town of Sabha, which is 770 kilometers south of Tripoli and astride the main road going to the Niger border. The fighting is a continuation of ancient animosities between tribes divided by ethnicity as well as loyalty to the former dictator Kaddafi, who used tribal loyalties to maintain power and favored certain tribes. Some of the pro - Kaddafi tribes kept fighting after Kaddafi died in 2011. The violence is not so much about putting Kaddafi followers back into power, but holding on to Kaddafi era privileges and avoiding punishment for crimes committed to support Kaddafi’s rule. In this case violence continued on the southern border where the pro-rebel Tabu tribesmen were put in charge of border (with Sudan, Chad and Niger) security. There they constantly skirmished with the pro-Kaddafi tribes. Another element of this rivalry was that the Tabu are black African while the pro-Kaddafi tribes are Arab. Kaddafi tended to support Arab domination over black Africans, something many Arabs still support. However, in some cases Kaddafi favored black tribes in the north, and used them to keep the population in line.

Greed for a larger share of the oil revenue is tearing the country apart. The problem is a classic one in Arab countries where tribalism, along with political and religious factionalism makes governing difficult when there is oil wealth to be had. In this case there is a country called Libya but there are too few Libyans. That is, there are not enough people in Libya willing to cooperate with each other for the common good. There is no quick fix. The cure is messy and time - consuming. Libyans fear they will have to suffer through another round of civil war before any progress in achieving national unity is achieved.

The blockades had cut the normal 1.5 million barrels a day in exports by 80-90 percent. Oil production has doubled in the last few weeks, but many of the angry tribes and militias that began blocking production last July are still armed, around and unhappy. In January the government managed to restart about a third of that. Unless the government can get the oil flowing quickly in 2014, the entire country will begin to suffer major shortages of food and other essentials. Libya imports most of its food and much else. All is paid for by oil. Already officials in charge of buying food are warning that shipments will halt soon because of lack of cash. The government has called for the population to rise up (peacefully) against the factions that are shutting down oil production. That may actually happen once the shortages become widespread and severe. The government is also trying to negotiate with the various factions, but that is proving difficult because the faction leaders tend to maintain the loyalty of their followers by promising more than they, or the government, can deliver.

The months of oil export blockades means the government is running out of money. The blockades have cost the government $10 billion so far and cash reserves and borrowing ability are running out. Even some Islamic terrorist militias are calling for an end to the oil export blockades. But the Islamic terrorists also want the elected government eliminated and replaced with a religious dictatorship. That is not likely to happen if only because there are several major Islamic terrorist militias that do not agree with each other on how a religious dictatorship would work. This is a common problem with Islamic terrorists and their desire to replace government.

The government still has warships and patrol boats off shore preventing any unauthorized oil shipments but the eastern rebels are threatening to use force against the navy. The eastern rebels want a return to the form of government Libya had before Kaddafi took over in 1969. Back then Libya consisted of three large provinces, each with a lot of autonomy. The one in the east was called Cyrenaica. Meanwhile Islamic terrorist groups in the east appear to behind the growing number of attacks against security personnel in general and intelligence experts in particular. These Islamic terrorists are also a threat to this newly declared regional government.

January 13, 2014: The 2011 revolution overthrew longtime dictator Moamar Kaddafi but it did not change the tribalism that Kaddafi used for decades to keep potential threats from replacing him. It was only when most of the tribes (and two-thirds of the population) united to overthrow Kaddafi that his divide and rule technique failed. Now the tribes are all out to grab what they can for themselves, no matter what the cost to the rest of the country. Nearly three years later you have the tribes and militias in eastern Libya forming a separate state called Cyrenaica and continuing to shut down most oil exports. Other tribes throughout the country are following equally selfish and greedy strategies.

January 17, 2014: In the east (between Derna and Tobruk) two Italian telecommunications engineers were kidnapped, apparently for ransom.

January 18, 2014: In the south (Sabha) the government declared a state of emergency to deal with the tribal fighting. The immediate reason for this was the seizure of an air force base outside Sabha by pro-Kaddafi tribal rebels. The government sent more troops to Sabha and the air force has attacked the rebels from the air.

January 21, 2014: In Tripoli fighting with pro-Kaddafi groups left five dead and 20 wounded. Elsewhere in the capital five cabinet ministers belonging to the second most powerful political party quit the government. The five former ministers are Islamic conservatives who were frustrated at the governments' opposition to adopting more Islamic lifestyle rules for the population. Such rules are widely unpopular but the Islamic conservative groups are on a Mission from God and will not negotiate.

January 23, 2014: In Tripoli a South Korean government trade official was freed by a police raid. The South Korean had been kidnapped three days earlier, apparently just for ransom. Four of his kidnappers were arrested.

January 26, 2014: Egypt warned that recent kidnapping of Egyptian diplomats, in order to get a Libyan militia leader freed from an Egyptian jail, will have unfavorable ramifications for Libya. Five Egyptian embassy personnel were kidnapped on the 24th and 25th causing Egypt to release the militia leader to get their diplomats freed. At the same time Egypt pulled all of its embassy personnel out of Libya. The kidnappings began shortly after the militia leader was arrested in Egypt (apparently for his Moslem Brotherhood connections).

In Tripoli the Interior Minister escaped an assassination attempt as his car was fired on.

January 27, 2014: In the southeast (Kefre) a clash with militiamen who refused to disarm left four soldiers dead and seven wounded. Schools in the area have been closed for a week because of the frequent gunfire between soldiers and militiamen.

January 29, 2014: In the south (Sabha) troops drove tribal rebels out of an air force base outside the city. The rebels had held the base for about two weeks. Tribal violence down south since January 11th has caused about a 300 casualties (about a third dead). The violence is near the town of Sabha, which is 770 kilometers south of Tripoli and astride the main road going to the Niger border. The fighting is a continuation of ancient animosities between tribes divided by ethnicity as well as loyalty to the former dictator Kaddafi, who used tribal loyalties to maintain power and favored certain tribes. Some of the pro-Kaddafi tribes (in this case Awled Sleiman) kept fighting after Kaddafi died in 2011. The violence is not so much about putting Kaddafi followers back into power, but holding on to Kaddafi era privileges and avoiding punishment for crimes committed to support Kaddafi's rule. In this case violence continued on the southern border where the pro-rebel Tabu tribesmen were put in charge of border (with Sudan, Chad and Niger) security. There they constantly skirmished with the pro-Kaddafi tribes. Another element of this rivalry was that the Tabu are black African while the pro-Kaddafi tribes are Arab. Kaddafi tended to support Arab domination over black Africans, something many Arabs still support. However, in some cases Kaddafi favored black tribes in the north, and used them to keep the population in line. Driving the pro-Kaddafi tribal rebels out of the air base will probably end the current round of fighting. This ethnic violence is not over, however.

In Benghazi the college-age son of the Special Forces commander was kidnapped, apparently by Islamic terrorists from groups under attack by the Special Forces. The Special Forces commander responded by increasing pressure on Islamic terrorist militias, especially those suspected to taking his son. This meant more raids and arrests.

January 30, 2014: The interim parliament set February 20th as the date to elect the 60 delegates who would create the new constitution.

Economists point out that not only is Libya running out of cash and credit (because rebel militias have blocked the export of $10 billion worth of oil in the last six months) but the long-term prospects are even grimmer. Because Kaddafi stifled economic growth during his four decades of rule the country is too dependent on oil income. Half the labor force has government jobs, a lot of them unneeded. Without quick development of non-oil enterprises the country will be unable to pay all the salaries and benefits within four or five years.

Once these militias are disbanded the next security problem is in the largely desert southwest, where several large Islamic terrorist groups have been free to establish bases and go about their business. The best the government can do is block the main roads out of the area and try to collect intelligence on what these groups are up to.

In addition to the dead, there are over 5,000 people held captive by over twenty major militias. These groups have captured, or created, jails. The government holds 3,000 prisoners and these are treated much better than many of those held by the militias. Reports of torture, abuse and "arresting" people as a form of kidnapping are common among the militias. Many of the militias, who were seen as freedom fighters in 2011 are now regarded as bandits and government efforts to disband these groups is popular.

The death toll was up in January, to 154 dead (and 463 wounded). This is largely because the government security forces have grown large (and effective) enough to take on more of the militias that have refused to disarm. Many of these militias still believe they remain strong enough to maintain their independence and are willing to fight. The death toll from this sort of violence for all of 2013 was 643.

February 1, 2014: The tribal rebels still blocking the use of the eastern oil export terminals are under growing pressure from their own tribal leaders to lift the blockade. This is because the government has made it clear that over $10 billion in lost oil revenue has consequences and one of them will be cutting government salaries and benefits and this would make the leaders believed responsible very unpopular, even among their own people. The big problem with these rebels is that they are younger men (generally under 40) who do not pay much attention to tribal leaders. But the tribal elders do still have a lot of influence and prestige. Now that the grand promises of the young leaders have turned out to be unworkable and counterproductive desperate Libyans, including many of the younger ones, are turning to the tribal elders and leaders for help. In turn, the tribal leaders have become more amenable to compromise and cooperation at the national level. Many of the senior government leaders are tribal leaders or from families with influence in tribal affairs. The tribes may turn out to be the solution. Up until now the tribes have been a large part of the problem.

February 1, 2014: In Tripoli 54 inmates escaped from a prison because of incompetence by the guards and lack of effective supervision of security of the prison.

In the east (Benghazi) a retired police colonel was shot dead as were two sons of police officials. Islamic terrorists, or criminal gangs, have been killing police and intelligence commanders for over a year now.

February 2, 2014: The government revealed that the last of Kaddafis chemical weapons was destroyed on January 26th. Kaddafi had agreed to destroy his chemical weapons stockpiles in 2003 but that effort was stalled by the 2011 revolution. The Kaddafi destruction was originally planned to take until 2016. After 2011 NATO agreed to provide money and training for Tunisians to finish the destruction sooner, which is what was done.

February 3, 2014: In neighboring Tunisia police raided an Islamic terrorist camp outside the capital (Tunis) and killed seven Islamic terrorists, including a local leader. Like Libya, Tunisia initially released a lot of Islamic terrorists from jail after their 2011 revolution and let them organize. But soon the Islamic terrorists were trying to overthrow the newly elected government and, unlike in Libya, the Tunisians united against the Islamic terrorist groups and have killed or arrested most of them in the last year.

February 5, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) someone fired an RPG and the warhead landed in a primary school playground and wounded twelve children. Two militias were engaged in a battle nearby.

February 6, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) gunmen attacked the studios of two TV stations. In Tripoli gunmen tried to attack the army headquarters compound but were repulsed.

February 8, 2014: In the east (Darna) a former prosecutor was assassinated. The dead man was an Islamic hardliner and resigned in March 2013 for health reasons.

February 9, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) two bombs went off early in the day, causing some property damage but no casualties.

February 13, 2014: In Tripoli a RPG was fired at a TV station, wounding a watchman. There has been growing violence against journalists who publicize crimes some militias are committing, or sometimes for just criticizing the political opinions of someone who has gunmen on the payroll.

February 14, 2014: In the west (Ziltan) 92 prisoners escaped from a prison. Only four guards were on duty for 220 inmates. Reinforcements were called and 19 of the escapees were quickly recaptured.

The last head of internal intelligence under Kaddafi, Abdullah Mansur, was finally given up by Niger and extradited to Libya. Niger was finally convinced that Mansur was still involved in stirring up trouble in Libya, especially with the tribes along the Niger border with Libya.

February 15, 2014: The former head of the military (Khalifa Haftar) called for parliament to resign and for the army to take over. Haftar was arrested and charged with calling for a coup.

February 17, 2014: Oil production dropped 70,000 barrels to 390,000 barrels a day because of yet another militia taking over an export facility.

February 18, 2014: Two major militias in Tripoli (Al Qaaqaa and Al Sawaaq) gave the parliament 72 hours to turn over power to the Islamic groups or else force would be used. The government called in more troops to prevent that, but the two militias still have their weapons and ambitions. The government called this an attempted cou

February 19, 2014: A national election was held to select 60 delegates (out of 692 candidates) to the panel that will create a new constitution. Turnout was poor, with only 15 percent of those eligible actually voting. Only 29 percent of the 3.4 million eligible voters bothered to resister and even fewer actually voted. The last election (19 months ago) saw 79 percent register. People are discouraged because of all the corruption, chaos and poverty. Islamic terrorist groups also threatened voters at some polling stations, because they believe democracy is un-Islamic.

A recent study concluded that Islamic terrorist activity in North Africa and the Sahel (the semi-desert region below the Sahara Desert and north of the forests of Central Africa) increased 60 percent in 2013. This was a result of the aftermath of the Arab Spring uprisings that overthrew the governments of Libya and Tunisia. That contributed to the rebellion in northern Mali in 2012. Eliminating the police state governments of Tunisia and Libya, and freeing many Islamic terrorists from prison, was a huge boost to these terrorist organizations and it's going to take a while to undo the damage.

Sporadic fighting continues in many parts of the country, especially outside the capital (Tripoli) where pro-Kaddafi militias are still active and along the southern border where pro-Kaddafi tribes resent the loss of cash and goods Kaddafi would regularly send them. In the east (Benghazi) Islamic terrorist groups often fight with each other and anyone else who openly disagrees with them.

Many Libyans are justifiably angry at the interim parliament they elected in July 2012 for a term of just 18 months. This interim group was to arrange a constitutional rewrite and run the country in the meantime. The interim group was unable to do either task and voted to extend its power in January, for the rest of the year. This was very unpopular. But as angry as many Libyans are they have only themselves to blame. Too many Libyans support factions that cannot or will not agree with enough other factions to create a working government. It's another case of, "we have met the enemy and it is us."

February 21, 2014: What divides Libyans more than anything else is their oil wealth. The tribes living where the oil comes from want a larger share. Actually, everyone wants more, for one reason or another. No agreement has been reached and many groups near the oil fields and export terminals have seized oil facilities had halted most (over 70 percent by the end of 2013) oil exports. All this was largely unexpected because at the start of 2013 oil production was at 1.4 million barrels a day and nearly back to normal. Then some of the militias the government had hired to provide security at oil facilities decided their loyalties were more to themselves than the national government. Before the 2011 revolution oil accounted for over 90 percent of government revenue and over 70 percent of GDP. With over $12 billion in oil revenue lost so far the government is running out of credit and will soon have no way to pay for essential imports, like food. Because the refineries that provide fuel for Libyans are also shut down the government has to spend scarce cash to import fuel. That won't last long because the government will have run out of cash and credit sometime in 2014. After that the economy will collapse and with that food and other essentials will not be available for most Libyans. Before that happens, force will be the only option, as starvation is the last thing anyone wants. The economy is already in decline because many payments have not been made for things that can be delayed (infrastructure and replacements for old or destroyed equipment).

February 22, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) someone planted a bomb in the car of an army commando and that killed the soldier when he got in the vehicle.

February 24, 2014: Seven Christians were found dead on a beach after being kidnapped from their homes in Benghazi by an Islamic militia. This is the second such incident in Benghazi this year.

February 25, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) gunmen murdered a policeman. In the south (Sarir) days of fighting between rival pro-government militias damaged a power plant and put it out of action. The government wants to make repairs but has no money for that. This means there will probably be a severe lack of electricity in the region around Sarir until the plant can be fixed.

February 26, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) gunmen murdered two policemen.

March 1, 2014: In the capital armed belong to a pro-government militia dispersed protestors holding a sit-in protest outside parliament. The large crowd was there to try and force parliament to make the country work. No one seems able to do that, but protesting and using force to get your way are very popular.

March 2, 2014: In the capital armed protestors broke into the parliament building and beat some members of parliament. The protestors want new elections. In the east (Benghazi) a French engineer was found shot dead. Much of Libya is lawless and robberies and murders, especially of government employees or foreigners, is increasingly common.

March 4, 2014: In the capital a militia attacked the state controlled TV station. The culprit was believed to be a militia that had been driven out of another TV facility recently by government forces. In the east (Benghazi) an air force colonel was assassinated.

March 5, 2014: A 37,000 ton oil tanker flying the flag of North Korea approached the oil export port of Es Sider. The government warned this ship to go away, as the rebels holding Es Sider have been trying to sell the oil stored at the port all year and a government gunboat chased away a Maltese tanker in January. The North Korean ship did not dock because the workers at the port are still loyal to the government and refused to assist in loading oil. The rebels required several days to find someone who would take care of doing the loading for them.

March 9, 2014: A North Korean tanker docked at the militia held oil export of Es Sider and has begun loading oil. The government sent a gunboat and threatened to fire on the North Korean ship if it tried to leave with the oil.

March 11, 2014: Parliament dismissed the prime minister because the government failed to stop a North Korean tanker from loading $30 million worth of oil at the militia held oil export port of Es Sider and escaping to international waters despite the presence of a navy gunboat. The parliament also ordered the new prime minister (the former defense minister) to send a military force, within a week, to the three oil export port militias have seized and restore government control. The government has resisted taking this approach because of a shortage of troops, fear of damaging the ports and uncertainty that such an effort would even work.

The UN accused recently Libya of being a major source of illegal weapons exports. Various criminal gangs, Islamic terrorist groups and militias are shipping out small arms and other portable weapons stolen from government warehouses during the 2011 civil war. UN investigators have found Libyan weapons illegally exported to at least 14 countries, mostly in Africa and the Middle East.

Sporadic fighting continues in many parts of the country, especially outside the capital (Tripoli) where pro-Kaddafi militias are still active and along the southern border where pro-Kaddafi tribes resent the loss of cash and goods Kaddafi would regularly send them. In the east (Benghazi) Islamic terrorist groups often fight with each other and anyone else who openly disagrees with them.

In most parts of the country there is no law other than what the local militia provides. This isn’t a lot different from what Libya has been used to for thousands of years. Even under four decades of Kaddafi the country was feudal, with Kaddafi giving control of parts of the country to trusted subordinates who could do what they liked as long as there was no unrest and no defiance of the national government. The monarchy before that operated the same way as did the Italian colonial government before that and a long series of feudal and warlord rulers stretching back into antiquity. Democracy is something new for Libya and the voting is done more with guns rather than ballots. The election results are ignored by the militia, tribal and terrorist and gang leaders. While many Libyans seem to understand that they must either act together or endure endless armed chaos it is unclear if this majority will, or can, act together and restore peace and prosperity. If Libya does slide into complete chaos the international community will find itself with another Somalia, but one with oil. Turning that oil into cash is difficult because the oil production and export facilities are vulnerable to attack and difficult to rebuild in a combat zone.

Because the refineries that provide fuel for Libyans are also shut down the government has to spend scarce cash to import fuel. That won't last long because the government will have run out of cash and credit sometime in 2014. After that the economy will collapse and with that food and other essentials will not be available for most Libyans. Before that happens, force will be the only option, as starvation is the last thing anyone wants. The economy is already in decline because many payments have not been made for things that can be delayed (infrastructure and replacements for old or destroyed equipment). The government ordering the troops in does not sound so crazy in light of the dire financial situation. The absence of law in most of the country is crippling the economy, which is still trying to recover from the 2011 revolution. Kaddafi tightly controlled the economy and his overthrow was supposed to allow economic activity to flourish. But the widespread presence of armed men taking what they want and kidnapping for ransom has made entrepreneurs and investors unwilling to do much.

Before the 2011 revolution oil accounted for over 90 percent of government revnue and over 70 percent of GDP. With over $14 billion in oil revenue lost so far the government is running out of credit and will soon have no way to pay for essential imports, like food. These shortages have begun to appear and that is driving many people to either back the government or use more desperate measures to grab whatever they can.

The basic problem is that Libyans have proved unable to agree on how to handle their oil wealth. The tribes living where the oil comes from want a larger share. Actually, everyone wants more, for one reason or another. In the last year various local militias near the oil fields and export terminals have seized these facilities halted most (over 70 percent by the end of 2013 and over 80 percent now) oil exports. All this was largely unexpected because at the start of 2013 oil production was at 1.4 million barrels a day and nearly back to normal. Then greed got the best of many factions who decided their loyalties were more to themselves than to Libya as a whole. It’s been downhill since then.

Meanwhile the oil exports continue to decline. A permanent replacement for the deposed prime minister will be selected by parliament by the end of the month and he will face a growing mess. Parliament is still divided with about half the members supporting the establishment of a religious dictatorship while the other half backs an ongoing democracy. Neither group has had sufficient clout to make their version of Libya work. The pro-religion block is divided into many factions, most of them armed and many willing to kill to get their way. The democrats argue more than they act and have more problems with corruption. While the religious groups are less corrupt they are also less willing to accept orders from anyone who does not agree with their particular version of Islam.

March 12, 2014: The North Korean registered ship that fled Es Sider with $30 million worth of oil is actually owned by a Saudi company and the owners will now try to sell the oil on the black market and share the proceeds with the rebel militia that controls Es Sider. That militia was originally the security guards hired to protect the port. But a local militia leader persuaded the guards to seize control of the port last August. The government stopped paying the rebel guards and their leader has been trying to sell the oil stored at the port ever since to keep his scam going. The government threatened to use force to stop that and after three months of success has failed. Parliament then fired the prime minister, began investigating him for corruption and appointed the defense minister as temporary prime minister. The new prime minister, at the urging of parliament, ordered the military to move on the ports within a week and this may fail as well. This latest chapter in the Libyan Follies should be played out by April 1st .

March 13, 2014: North Korea denied any involvement with the North Korean registered tanker that carried off Libyan oil illegally. North Korea pointed out that the ship was registered in North Korea in February for six months with the understanding that there would be no illegality involved. The ship i s actually owned by a Saudi company and currently controlled by an Egyptian shipping company that is apparently helping to sell the oil. North Korea has long been involved with shady deals like this and is apparently trying to distance itself from one that went off the rails.

March 14, 2014: The UN agreed to extend its support effort in Libya until March 13, 2015.

March 15, 2014: The parliament gave the interim prime minister another 15 days in power.
Parliament is, as usual, deadlocked. This time it is over who the new prime minister should be.
Parliament is split into many factions, most of them either secular or Islamic.

March 16, 2014: The rebel militias in the east that are holding three oil export ports now say they are willing to negotiate. Up until now the militias asserted that they were representing the new government of an independent country called Cyrenaica. The rebels have been trying to make this stick since the beginning of the year but without cash (from selling oil) they got no traction.

In the east (Benghazi) a car bomb went off outside a military school killing seven soldiers and wounding twelve.

March 17, 2014: Some 32 kilometers off the coast of Cyprus two dozen U.S. Navy SEAL commandos used power boats to go from a U.S. Navy destroyer to a nearby North Korean tanker. Once aboard the tanker the SEALs quickly took control and arrested three Libyans the crew of 21 said had, in effect, hijacked the tanker and its $30 million cargo of stolen Libyan oil. There were no casualties and the tanker was taken back to Libya. Libya had asked the United States to help retrieve the tanker, which had fled Libya with the oil. The North Korean registered tanker fled the Libyan oil loading port of Es Sider early on March 11th and made it to international waters before Libyan Navy gunboats could catch up. The Libyan sailors were within their rights to board the tanker and retake it, but they were not trained to do so and there were apparently some armed men on the tanker. The tanker then moved towards Cyprus and Libya asked the Americans for some help. The U.S. dispatched a destroyer with SEALs on board and the American warship was soon following the tanker. The U.S. government agreed on the 16th to use SEALs to get the tanker back and the raid was carried out before dawn on the 17th.

March 18, 2014: In the southwest the local Tuareg tribes warned the government not to use force to remove the militias occupying oil facilities in the area.

March 19, 2014: The success of recent joint operations around Lake Chad has led the nations bordering Lake Chad (Chad, Cameroon, Libya, Niger, Nigeria and the Central African Republic/CAR) to form a permanent task force to patrol the lake region and coordinate operations against smugglers, Islamic terrorists and bandits. The initial emphasis will be on containing the Islamic terrorists, mainly the Nigerian Boko Haram, in the area. The new task force will have its headquarters in the Nigerian town of Baga, which is on the lake. Baga is large enough to accommodate a new military base. The goal is to have the new task force up and running before the end of the year. Increased coordination will start immediately.

March 20, 2014: In a first, the Libyan government finally admitted that it has an Islamic terrorism problem and called for international help to deal with it. The government now wants to form a dedicated counter-terrorism force and knows that will require outside help. NATO, which has many members just across the Mediterranean, is expected to be the main source of assistance .

Countries like Italy and France have many Arab speaking counter-terrorism operatives and many expatriate Libyans live over there. Then there are the Americans, with all their useful gadgets, technical magic and unique specialists (like the SEAL commandos who took back the tanker full of stolen Libyan oil).

March 21, 2014: In the capital a Tunisian diplomat was apparently kidnapped for ransom. Earlier in the day (before dawn) someone got past the tight security at the main airport and placed a bomb on the main runway. A timer detonated the bomb, causing little damage but closing down flight operations for several hours.

March 22, 2014: The army began fighting rebel militias in the east that are holding three oil export ports. The rebels apparently hoped to interfere with the arrival of more troops but were driven off. The troops are better trained than the militiamen and that is apparently making a difference. On March 12rh the government gave the rebel militias until the 26th to relinquish control of the oil ports. The rebels do not appear to be making preparations to leave.

March 23, 2014: In the east (Derna) gunmen ambushed a van carrying $600,000 from a telecommunications company to a bank and made off with the money. The thieves were probably members of one the militias that dominate the city (to the east of Benghazi). There is no law in places like Derna but the local militias still need cash.

March 24, 2014: The government said it is releasing the 21 man crew (consisting of six Pakistanis, six Indians, three Sri Lankans, two Syrians, two Sudanese and two Eritreans) of the oil tanker captured by American SEALs and returned to Libya on the 23rd and its cargo of 350,000 barrels of oil will be unloaded there. The U.S. handed control of the tanker to Libya in international waters some 30 kilometers off Tripoli and removed the American sailors who had supervised the return of the ship.

March 26, 2014: The U.S. has sent a team of American soldiers to Libya to work out details of a training program being set up in Bulgaria for the new Libyan Army. In late 2013 the U.S. agreed to establish a training facility in Bulgaria where 500 American soldiers would serve as instructors at a camp that would train 8,000 (or more) Libyan recruits in basic military skills.

March 27, 2014: Another militia composed of personnel hired to provide oil facility security has gone rogue and blocked a pipeline from a southwestern oil field. The former guards want lots of money. The main source of exported oil now are two offshore fields.

March 31, 2014: As a goodwill gesture to get negotiations going the government has released the three militiamen who were arrested off Cyprus by U.S. SEALs on the tanker carrying $30 million in stolen Libyan oil. The rebels are also demanding the return of the tanker and the stolen oil but the government is apparently not willing to go that far. The three militiamen were quickly pointed out by the crew of the tanker after the SEALs seized control. The ship captain said the three were armed and tasked with ensuring that the tanker went to wherever the oil brokers (who were going to sell the stolen oil) instructed. The three Libyan militiamen were armed and the crew was not, so they just went along, having been assured that they would be paid and not harmed if they did. The crew were not so sure they would be safe as it appeared the Libyan militiamen were dealing with some pretty shady characters.

France Guards The South: The continued success of the French-led counter-terrorism effort in northern Mali and the equally determined efforts by Islamic terrorists to maintain a presence there anyway has led France to set up a permanent base in the north. This would be similar to the base it has long maintained on the other end of Africa in Djibouti. Since September 11, 2001 that base has been shared with the Americans and the Mali base is expected to see a lot of Americans helping out. France currently has about 1,600 troops in northern Mali and that appears to be about what it will take to staff the permanent base. France is particularly concerned about the continuing unrest in Libya and the ability of Islamic terrorists to establish bases and training facilities there. Because of all that, this year there have been several incidents of Islamic terrorists moving into northern Mali from Libya and until the Libyan government establishes some control over the many Islamic terrorists roaming Libya, more will show up in northern Mali.

The Shortages: Another unresolved problem is that while there is a Libya there are not enough true (patriotic and loyal to a central government) Libyans. There are many countries suffering from this problem with tribal, ethnic, regional and other loyalties that create lots of corruption and little national unity. In these conditions a lot of the corruption is not seen as stealing, but simply taking care of your own group. In a place like Libya, where decades of oil wealth have created a population largely dependent on oil income for basic survival, this lack of unity has become a matter of life or death.

Another source of unrest is brewing on the Tunisian border. There the smugglers are having more problems with the security forces on both sides of the frontier. It's all about money of course as the smuggling deprives the governments of over half a billion dollars a year in revenue. But the smuggling, especially of cheap Libyan into Tunisia, has become the primary livelihood for thousands of Libyan families. Locals believe the Libyan and Tunisian security forces are simply seeking a bigger cut of the smuggler profits. That's how things work in this part of the world. The smugglers also have to find a patron, a "boss of all bosses" to negotiate deals with local army and police commanders. Everybody wants to get paid.

Let's Make A Deal: The rebel militias holding east Libyan oil facilities now say they are ready to work out a deal over control of these facilities. What changed their minds was the March 17th U.S. Navy SEAL raid to capture the rebel controlled tanker full of Libyan oil. Apparently over the last two weeks the rebels have learned that the foreign criminal gangs who were once willing to broker sales of stolen Libyan oil have backed away. The oil smuggling gangs see the American warships and commandoes as a deal breaker. With no way to sell the oil they control, the rebel militias must quickly make the best deal they can with the government because these militia leaders are broke and their armed followers expected great things to come from occupying the oil facilities. Government troops are closing in and apparently it comes down to working out a price to avoid a battle and get the militias out of the oil export facilities.

The militias holding the eastern oil facilities have also lose some of their Robin Hood glow. They now stand accused of working with former officials of the Kaddafi government to smuggle oil out of the country and sell it. There are still a lot of Kaddafi era officials in Libya and even more overseas. Some of these Kaddafi henchmen are still wealthy, having gotten a lot of money (usually obtained by corrupt means) out of the country before the 2011 revolution. These guys still have contacts and fans inside Libya (among the tribes that Kaddafi favored) as well as a taste for obtaining more Libyan cash. The pro-Kaddafi exiles are open for business and smuggling is more attractive to them than subsidizing terrorism. The war is over, Kaddafi is gone and life goes on.

Because the refineries that provide fuel for Libyans are also shut down the government has to spend scarce cash to import fuel. Even the greedy militias are now aware that what they are doing means the economy will collapse and with that food and other essentials will not be available for most Libyans. To avoid that catastrophe there is compromise or force, or a combination of the two. Ultimately force will prevail as starvation is the last thing anyone wants. The economy is already in decline because many payments have not been made for things that can be delayed (infrastructure and replacements for old or destroyed equipment). The government ordering the troops in does not sound so crazy in light of the dire financial situation. The absence of law in most of the country is crippling the economy, which is still trying to recover from the 2011 revolution. Kaddafi tightly controlled the economy and his overthrow was supposed to allow economic activity to flourish. But the widespread presence of armed men taking what they want and kidnapping for ransom has made entrepreneurs and investors unwilling to do much.

The basic problem is that Libyans have proved unable to agree on how to handle their oil wealth. The tribes living where the oil comes from want a larger share. Actually, everyone wants more, for one reason or another. In the last year various local militias near the oil fields and export terminals have seized these facilities halted most (over 70 percent by the end of 2013 and over 90 percent now) oil exports. All this was largely unexpected because at the start of 2013 oil production was at 1.4 million barrels a day and nearly back to normal. Then greed got the best of many factions who decided their loyalties were more to themselves than to Libya as a whole. It’s been downhill since then. Before the 2011 revolution oil accounted for over 90 percent of government revenue and over 70 percent of GDP. With over $20 billion in oil revenue lost so far the government is running out of credit and will soon have no way to pay for essential imports, like food. These shortages have become more widespread and severe and that is driving many people to either back the government or use more desperate measures to grab whatever they can.

April 3, 2014: The predicted (last Summer when the rebel militias cut off oil exports) cash crises has arrived and it has everyone's attention. Despite the rebels blocking oil exports now expressing willingness to deal, oil exports are still at an all-time low of 100,000 barrels a day. The government has only $116 billion left and little credit. Government banking officials insist that can be made to last for at least two years but Libyans are seeing growing cutbacks in government spending. Most Libyans depend on the government for jobs, food and other essentials. Without oil income the government cannot deliver. About two thirds of the $53 billion annual government budget is for salaries and benefits. A growing number of government workers are having their pay or benefits delayed so that more essential issues (like food imports) can be attended to. The government reserves are not all cash and it takes time to convert some of those assets into cash. The government is also warning people that a lot of Kaddafi era subsidies will have to go in order to keep the economy going. Such a move would be very unpopular. Kaddafi provided a lot of stuff at very low prices. Like loaves of bread for a few pennies. Fuel and electricity was also sold far below cost as were airline, bus and train tickets. Another problem is the many people who collect a government paycheck don't do any work, or even show up for work. Thus there are 22,000 soldiers in Benghazi, according to payroll records, but few of them are on the job. Some of that is because some government or military official is pocketing the payroll, but in other cases there are real people getting paid but they only show up on payday, if that (because direct-deposit is available). Changing all these bad habits is very difficult. The greed, Islamic terrorism and sense of entitlement that is so widespread in Libya also means that foreign investors are not interested because Libyans make inefficient and troublesome employees. Libya is no place to create wealth but it is an ideal place to squander it.

April 5, 2014: In the northeast (near the Egyptian border) a militia released fifty Egyptian trucks and their drivers and passengers. The militias are demanding that Libya and Egypt stop prosecuting.

In Benghazi thousands of government and commercial workers went on strike to demand better security.

April 6, 2014: The government negotiated a deal to reopen the four oil export ports seized by local militias last June-August. The turnover will be completed by the end of April.

April 7, 2014: Libya and Tunisia have reopened their main border crossing after it had been closed for a month. Both countries say they have resolved issues. The closure was officially about the safety of Libyans in Tunisia but an unspoken issue was smuggling. After paying bribes trucks roll freely across the border. Most of the illicit trade involves cheap (because it's subsidized) Libyan fuel going to Tunisia. Smuggling is a big business here, with up to a fifth of the population depending on it. Closing border crossings was only a part of the smuggling problem. The smugglers are having more problems with the security forces on both sides of the frontier. It's all about money of course as the smuggling deprives the governments of over half a billion dollars a year in revenue. But the smuggling, especially of cheap Libyan oil into Tunisia has become the primary livelihood for thousands of Libyan families. Locals believe the Libyan and Tunisian security forces are simply seeking a bigger cut of the smuggler profits. That's how things work in this part of the world. The smugglers also have to find a patron, a "boss of all bosses" to negotiate deals with local army and police commanders. Everybody wants to get paid.

In Benghazi an air force officer died when a bomb placed under his car exploded. In nearby Derna an Islamic terrorist leader was killed by an unidentified assailant.

April 9, 2014: The oil port of Herega was handed over to government control. A local militia had controlled the port since June 2013.

April 10, 2014: In Tripoli gunmen intercepted a vehicle transporting prisoners and freed ten of them.

April 11, 2014: In Tripoli two prisoners died during an attempt to break out of jail.

Security officials in Mali and Niger confirmed what many had suspected, that Islamic terrorist leader Mokhtar Belmokhtar (the planner of the January 2013 natural gas facility attack in southern Algeria that got 37 workers killed) of Islamic terrorist group Al Mourabitoun was alive and operating from a base in southern Libya. Al Mourabitoun was formed in August 2013 when two Islamic terrorist factions merged. The new group had already been detected operating in northern Mali and Niger (where it had carried out several daring attacks, including a prison break in June and twin bombings in May 2013). One faction was an al Qaeda splinter group led by Belmokhtar who had a reputation for always escaping the many efforts to kill or capture him. Belmokhtar was number two or three in the North African al Qaeda organization (Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb or AQIM) but formed his own splinter group in late 2012. In November 2013 France announced that it had killed the second - in-command of Al Mourabitoun near the northern town of Tessalit and was still searching for Belmokhtar, despite reports that he might have died during an air attack in 2013. The appearance of these reports of Belmokhtar being alive and where he is may be part of an operation to get him to move and possibly confirm his location so an attack can be carried out. The U.S. is offering a $5 million reward for information that would lead to the capture of Belmokhtar.

April 13, 2014: The interim prime minister resigned because of fears for the safety of his family. This was the result of a recent attack on members of his family. Parliament fired the regular prime minister on March 12th because of the botched effort to prevent militias from exporting oil. That prime minister was also being investig ated for corruption . T he defense minister was installed as temporary prime minister was urged to use whatever means necessary to retake the eastern oil ports. Force was threatened and that helped negotiators work out a deal. The GNC (General National Congress), formed to create a new constitutio n, is considering which of seven candidates to be the new interim prime minister.

April 15, 2014: In the capital the Jordanian ambassador was kidnapped by gunmen in civilian clothes. The kidnappers demanded the release of an Islamic terrorist from a Jordanian jail but the Jordanian government said it would not do that.

April 19, 2014: Kidnappers holding two Tunisians are demanding the release of two Islamic terrorists held in Tunisia in return for the release of a Tunisian diplomat taken on April 17th and an embassy employee seized on March 21st.

April 23, 2014: An army base 27 kilometers outside Tripoli that was used in 2012 by American Special Forces personnel to train Libyan counter-terrorism forces is now occupied by an Islamic terrorist group affiliated with al Qaeda. There are lots of abandoned military bases in Libya and the security forces are not yet large enough to maintain control of all of them.

April 26, 2014: In Benghazi a 15 year old Egyptian girl was kidnapped, apparently for ransom. The militias and criminal gangs are increasingly turning to kidnapping for ransom for raise cash and stay in business.

The security forces are more and more active shutting down blatant instances of illegal behavior. For example markets that allow weapons and drugs to be sold are being raided and militiamen openly committing crimes have to watch out for nearby police or soldiers, who will often interfere.

The U.S. has publically pledged to help Libya improve its security situation. Only the training for the army was mentioned, but it was implied that other assistance was being supplied to deal with Islamic terrorism and renegade militias in general. One area of technical assistance might be help in controlling the proliferation of unregulated radio and TV stations since 2011. Many of these are run by various Islamic terrorist militias and used for propaganda and to incite devote (or simply concerned) Moslems to come out and support one religious issue or another. The government could use some technical assistance and advice as it strives to regain control of the airwaves.

The eastern oil export ports are not functioning yet because of the need to check for damage and do some maintenance. Only one of the four oil parts is ready for use right now. The government is also starting an investigation of corruption in the oil industry, which was one of the key demands of the militias that had closed these ports for up to eight months. Meanwhile only about 200,000 barrels a day are being exported. This number has to get over a million barrels a day to prevent economic collapse and social chaos in Libya. It was this prospect that persuaded the eastern militias to give up the oil-export facilities.

Under pressure from European countries the Libyan government has said it will try to halt the large number of African migrants coming to Libya then paying Libyan smugglers to get them to Europe, where they can claim asylum and greatly improve their economic situation. The problem is that the Libyan smugglers are doing so much business that they can afford to bribe (or hire a militia to intimidate) Libyan officials to back off. Over 500 people a day are illegally crossing the southern border in an effort to make it to Europe. This is more of a problem for Europeans than Libyans who see the largely black African illegals as a nuisance, mainly because the migrants are just passing through. These travelers don’t want to stay in Libya, which is generally very hostile to these unwanted visitors. The illegals are easy to spot and the locals will sometimes murder migrants who cause any problems. Stopping them from getting into Libya is not easily done because the southern border is largely desert that smugglers have been getting across easily for generations. Checkpoints on the few roads headed north are subject to bribes or simply going around.

Libya has another unpleasant side effect, the reluctance of Western powers to get too involved with seemingly well-meaning rebels. Western nations saw what happened in Libya in 2011 when NATO provided air support and after the quick rebel victory the rebels could not unite and form a government. The Libyan rebels are still fighting each other there and tolerating Islamic terrorist groups. Syria looks to be more of the same and the West does not want to support it. To Iran, this is all an opportunity that cannot be passed up. The Arab oil states are also undismayed and freely arm and subsidize Islamic radical rebel groups.

France is particularly concerned about the continuing unrest in Libya and the ability of Islamic terrorists to establish bases and training facilities there. Because of all that, this year there have been several incidents of Islamic terrorists moving into northern Mali from Libya and until the Libyan government establishes some control over the many Islamic terrorists roaming Libya, more will show up. There are also some terrorist bases in Niger, but the government there is more eager than their Libyan counterparts to do something about it. The Libyan government is more concerned about “foreign interference” (in getting rid of Islamic terrorist groups). This is in large part because many Islamic radicals got elected to parliament in Libya and they interfere with any efforts to deal with Islamic terrorist groups in Libya. Yet it's not just the Western nations that are complaining about this, but all of Libya's neighbors as well. This is expected to result in some "direct action" (commando or missile attacks) in Libya, with or without government permission. When and if that happens the French counter-terrorism forces in Mali have to be prepared for some Libyan based Islamic terror groups seeking to find refuge in northern Mali.

April 28, 2014: What makes the many militias in Libya so difficult to eliminate or control is the fact that many of them are led by Islamic conservatives who use the threat of exposing misbehavior by politicians (use of alcohol, prostitutes or anything considered "un-Islamic") to bully the government into leaving the militia alone. Thus militias led by guys who do not misbehave (according to the Koran) are difficult to control. Fortunately many militias are led by men who talk the talk but do not walk the walk and are vulnerable. At the same time Islamic radical politicians have a lot of popular support because many Libyans believe devout politicians are the best chance to deal with the corruption that cripples the government and the economy. Unfortunately this is a case of "hope springs eternal" because the track record of pious politicians in Moslem countries shows that these fellows have a short shelf live and eventually, often quite quickly succumb to the temptations of easy money and sinful pleasures.

May 17, 2014: The industrialized nations (especially in the West) saw a record number (over 600,000) of illegal migrants seeking asylum in 2013. That number looks likely to be even higher in 2014. It's estimated that over 600,000 of these migrants are now in Libya, on the coast and waiting for a smuggler to take them across to Italy. Libya is the favorite country for getting smuggled into Europe because Libya is the most lawless state in North Africa at the moment. It also provides the shortest distance to reach Europe by boat. Once there the migrants seek to reach Germany, France or Britain but if caught in Italy they ask for asylum in Italy. While the war in Syria is currently providing over 100,000 illegal migrants in Europe, most of all such refugees come from Africa, Afghanistan or other areas a lot of people want to leave.

Despite the fact that more than half these migrants are Moslem, very few of them are terrorists. Nevertheless some are the families of terrorists or are related to one but nearly all of them are simply trying to escape difficult situations (war, abject poverty, tyranny). Many of these Moslem migrants do eventually become terrorists or supporters of that sort of thing and for that reason Moslem migrants are less welcome in the West. But because Western nations still have generous asylum laws, and religious profiling is generally frowned on, resistance to the Moslem refugees tends to be informal and illegal. This does discourage Islamic terrorists from trying to get in with the general migrant population and instead they use more expensive and skilled smugglers who know how to move people who might not pass intense police scrutiny.

April 29, 2014: In Tripoli gunmen invaded the parliament building and fired shots. This delayed efforts to select a new prime minister. The old one quit because of Islamic terrorist death threats. In Benghazi a suicide car bomb went off outside an army base, killing two people and wounding two others.

April 30, 2014: In Benghazi a cat bomb went off outside a compound used by army commandos, killing two soldiers and wounding three.

May 2, 2014: In Benghazi Islamic terrorists attacked a police station before dawn, killing nine of the soldiers and police there.

May 3, 2014: In Benghazi a senior military officer escaped an assassination attempt by Islamic terrorists.

May 4, 2014: In Tripoli the parliament selected Ahmed Maiteeq as the new prime minister. Many members of parliament were bitterly opposed to Ahmed Maiteeq, a businessman with close ties to many Islamic radical groups. Members of parliament opposed to Maiteeq accuse him and other pro-Islamic radical members of rigging the vote in parliament that made Maiteeq the new prime minister. The previous prime minister had resigned because of Islamic terrorist threats against his life and those of his family.

May 7, 2014: In the east tribal militia leaders are refusing to deal with the newly selected prime minister. These tribal militias made a deal with the previous prime minister to get closed (by separatist tribal militias) oil export ports reopened. These closures, since mid-2013, have cut Libyan oil exports this year to 250,000 barrels a day. Normal flow is 1.4 million a day.

May 8, 2014: In Tripoli gunmen, in a stolen government car, killed five policemen as they escaped with the stolen vehicle.

May 9, 2014: In Benghazi the head of intelligence for Eastern Libya was murdered by gunmen (probably from one of the many Islamic terrorist groups in the city.)

May 11, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) four people were killed and twenty wounded when armed anti - Islamic terrorist protestors (in a crowd of angry locals demonstrating outside a compound used by an Islamic terrorist group) returned fire at men inside the compound firing at the largely unarmed civilians. The Islamic terrorists do not tolerate criticism well. The demonstrators wanted the Islamic terrorists to leave the city and stop abusing people (usually for not being Islamic enough or to coerce “donations” for their group.)

The government warned Europe that if they did not assist Libya (give billions of dollars) then the flood of Africans using Libya to get to Europe illegally would continue. So far this year ten times as many illegal migrants (over 22,000) have reached Italy from Libya compared to last year. In 2010 deceased dictator Kaddafi has made a similar demand to Europe and had asked for $7 billion.

May 12, 2014: The government reached an agreement with eastern separatists to allow oil fields at el Sharara (340,000 barrels a day), el Feel (35,000 barrels a day) and Wafa (natural gas).

May 13, 2014: Jordan revealed that it had freed an Islamic terrorist it was holding in order to obtain the freedom of one of its diplomats (ambassador Fawaz Aitan) who had been kidnapped in Libya.

The U.S. SOCOM (Special Operations Command) aircraft and 200 marines to Sicily in case they are needed to rescue Americans in Libya.

May 14, 2014: The el Feel oilfield resumed production after being shut down by anti -GNC militias for months.

May 16, 2014: In Benghazi pro-Hiftar forces battled Islamic terrorist militias, leaving at least 79 dead and over 140 wounded. The Islamic terrorists soon realized they were in trouble against the pro - Hiftar forces and fled the city. Hiftar had already gained the allegiance of several army and air force units, who assisted in attacking the Islamic terrorist groups. A large number of army and air force units had been sent to Benghazi over the last year to confront the Islamic terrorists there and now, with the Hiftar forces they were making major progress. Meanwhile the GNC controlled government in Tripoli called Hiftar's actions a coup. It all began when the Hiftar forces rolled into Benghazi, surrounded the compounds of some of the largest Islamic terrorist militias and demanded that those inside surrender.

Near the border angry (at not getting paid) militiamen freed 250 Egyptian truck drivers who were detained the day before in an attempt get their late wages. The militia men apparently received convincing assurances that the money was on the way. It is common for senior officials to steal wages for subordinates (and blame it on someone, or something else.)

May 18, 2014: In Tripoli pro-Hiftar gunmen entered the parliament building and declared the GNC controlled parliament dissolved.

May 19, 2014: More army and police units are joining the pro-Hiftar forces. There was some fighting in Tripoli between pro and anti-Hiftar militias, leaving two dead and fifty wounded. The UAE and Saudi Arabia ordered some of their diplomatic personnel out of Tripoli as a precaution.

May 21, 2014: Hiftar called for the formation of a Presidential Council to take over from the GNC controlled parliament and organize new elections. Hiftar is apparently in Abyar, an inland town 50 kilometers east of Benghazi. Meanwhile the GNC is calling for new elections for the GNC controlled parliament on June 25th. That is unlikely to happen as pro-Hiftar forces gain control of more and more of the country. Many senior government officials are openly backing Hiftar. That can be dangerous. For example, the pro-Hiftar chief of staff of the navy was wounded in an assassination attempt today. Assassination is a popular weapon for Islamic terrorists.

In neighboring Tunisia police arrested eight men who had recently arrived from Libya and accused them of being Islamic terrorists, trained in Libya and come to Tunisia to assassinate government officials and aid the Islamic terrorist groups there. Tunisia has been successful in suppressing (but not completely eliminating) Islamic terrorist groups (especially Ansar al Sharia) trying to exist and expand in Tunisia.

May 22, 2014: Pro-GNC militiamen from Misrata were seen entering the capital and taking up positions to defend GNC and the parliament building. There are already pro-Hiftar groups inside Tripoli and they are awaiting reinforcements before making a major move.

The U.S., and some other Western countries, have taken the position that Hiftar is not carrying out a coup but is merely trying to get a working democracy established. This is something the GNC has obviously failed at. If Hiftar does get new elections and does not seek dictatorial power for himself, he will continue to have foreign support. But for the moment Hiftar has to worry about surviving the wrath of the many Islamic terrorist groups in Libya. Hiftar is now a primary target for assassi nation.

Hiftar has struck a chord with most Libyans, who are still divided by tribal loyalty, religious beliefs and political views. What all Libyans now want is peace and prosperity, especially after witnessing both slip away over the last year. There is general agreement that the Islamic radical and terrorist groups are one of the main reasons for this, although tribal loyalties are a close second. While tribal loyalties are flexible enough to support a nationalist like Hiftar, religious beliefs tend to be absolute and unchanging. That is the problem with all the Islamic groups. Not only are they inflexible but there no agreement about exactly what “true Islam” is. So the Islamic groups, as has been the case for over a thousand years, are not really unified except by their general acceptance of Islam. That belief is not concerned with Libya as much as it is with larger issues, like forcibly converting the entire world to Islam. Hiftar is taking advantage of this weakness to get new national elections held (that will legitimize the current desire for peace and prosperity) and finally get a new constitution created. Many Libyans fear, however, that Hiftar may turn out to be a new dictator, for the late Kaddafi started out as the leader of a populist revolution that turned into a bizarre dictatorship that lasted more than four decades.

The GNC is now being defended by Islamic radical and terrorist militias and some tribal and more secular groups. In Tripoli the GNC has long depended on the LROR (Libyan Revolutionary Operations Room) militia coalition to defend it against hostile militias. The GNC also has the support of most Islamic radical groups, the largest of which is Ansar al Sharia in Benghazi. This group was responsible for the 2012 attack that killed the American ambassador. Many of the militias in Misrata (east of Tripoli) militias support GNC, but many back Hiftar or are neutral.

One motivation for Hiftar was the growing strength of Islamic terrorist groups. Islamic conservatives, radicals and terrorists were well enough organized to prevent the GNC (General National Congress) from creating a new government that controlled the entire country. The Islamic politicians were a minority in the GNC but very active and disruptive. The GNC was originally formed in mid-2012 to create a new constitution for the country to vote on and rule until that was done. At the end of 2013 the deadlocked GNC extended its power for another year. The separatist activity in the east prevented any national vote and that had to be dealt with before a constitution could be completed and approved. The various factions in the GNC could not agree on much, although there was a consensus that the new constitution would use Islamic (Sharia) law. This was an effort to placate the many Islamic conservative groups. This made local Christians (native Copts, who have been Christian and present for 2,000 years and are five percent of the population) nervous.

Hiftar was once a general in Kaddafi's army, but disagreed with the dictatorship and fle d to the United States in 1990 with the help of the CIA. When the Libyan revolution broke out in 2011 Hiftar returned to Libya and joined the rebels. is opposed by a coalition of largely Islamic radical militias and politicians. Hiftar remained on the sidelines after Kaddafi was defeated and various attempts (culminating in the GNC) were made to form a workable government. Sometime in 2013 Hiftar apparently began planning a new revolution.

May 23, 2014: Over the last week a new civil war has broken out. The leader of the rebels is Khalifa Hiftar a retired army general who seeks to destroy the Islamic militias and Islamic terrorist groups that have prevented the establishment of law and order and blocked rebuilding and economic progress. Over the past year Hiftar organized like-minded militias and former soldiers and moved into Benghazi on the 16 th . He immediately gained the loyalty of regular army units deployed there and soon controlled Benghazi. The Islamic terrorist groups fled the better trained and determined Hiftar Forces and most non-Islamic militias (especially nationalists but also tribal groups) pledged to follow Hiftar. The attraction here was that Hiftar opposed Islamic radical efforts to establish a religious dictatorship in Libya and an end to the anarchy created by the fact that the many Islamic terrorist groups could not agree on which of them should be in charge.

May 24, 2014: Across the border in Tunisia the government says it detected and foiled a plot by Islamic terrorists from Libya and Algeria to attack tourist and industrial sites in Tunisia.

May 25, 2014: Militia leaders occupying oil facilities in eastern Libya said they would not recognize the new pro-Islamic terrorist prime minister Maiteg. These militia leaders recently made deals with the previous (or, according to some, the current) prime minister to end their blockade of oil exports and did not trust Maiteg to carry out those agreements.

May 26, 2014: In Benghazi a prominent anti-Islamic terrorist journalist was shot dead. He had appeared on TV the day before criticizing the misbehavior of Islamic terrorist militias.

May 27, 2014: Gunmen fired on the home of the new pro-Islamic terrorist prime minister Maiteg.

May 28, 2014: The U.S. has moved an amphibious task force, containing a helicopter carrier and a thousand marines, off the Libyan coast. This is to help in the evacuation of Americans and other foreigners if the situation ashore gets a lot worse.

May 29, 2014: The Chad government complained that ten of its citizens, travelling from Tripoli to Chad were shot dead by men in military uniforms near the Chad border.

May 30, 2014: Algeria sent more troops to guard the borders with Libya, Mali and Tunisia. These three countries have seen an increase in unrest or Islamic terrorist activity recently and it is feared that this will send more Islamic terrorists fleeing to Algeria for sanctuary. As inhospitable as Algeria is for Islamic terrorists the situations in Libya, Mali and Tunisia are becoming even more unpleasant. Algeria has always had problems with its land borders, which are 6,343 kilometers long and include frontiers with seven countries. Moreover most of these borderlands are in the thinly occupied desert. Before aircraft were invented it was impossible to secure these borders. But even with aircraft a tightly sealed border remains impossible. Libya, Mali and Tunisia comprise 52 percent of Algeria's borders and the 1.376 kilometer long Mali border is particularly troublesome since it is all desert and very popular with smugglers and other outlaws from the regions to the south. The smugglers, not the Islamic terrorists crossing borders are becoming a major problem. The smugglers tend to move a lot of counterfeit stuff, to the point that nearly a third of the goods offered for sale in Algeria are counterfeits. Most of these come from East Asia (mainly China) as well as a number of Arab countries. These counterfeits are often defective and, in the cases of food, medicine and spare parts for vehicles or machinery, downright dangerous. The governments of all North African countries have been ineffective at dealing with the counterfeits, in part because a lot of officials at the ports and major border crossings take bribes to allow in large shipments of counterfeit goods.

On the Egyptian border six Egyptian border guards were killed when they intercepted some armed and quite aggressive Libyan smugglers. Egyptian police believe this was a deliberate attack by a large smuggling gang upset about several recent border police actions against smuggler convoys trying to get into Egypt. Bribes don't work as well as they used to because the smugglers are often bringing in weapons which are sold to gangs and Islamic terrorists who are fighting the security forces on a regular basis.

June 1, 2014: T he North African al Qaeda organization (Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb or AQIM) has come out against the Hiftar rebels and called on all Libyans to oppose Hiftar. This announcement simply confirms the belief most Libyans now hold about Islamic terrorist groups trying to take control of Libya. Most Libyans support Hiftar.

June 2, 2014: Abdulaslam Jadallah Obeidi, the pro-Hiftar commander of the Libyan Army survived an assassination attempt outside the capital. Obeidi has been head of the army for 11 months and has been frustrated by the bickering and indecisiveness in parliament and growing support for Islamic terrorist militias among the politicians. Obeidi went over to Hiftar soon after the pro-Hiftar forces began fighting on May 16th. The Libyan Army has been rebuilding since the Kaddafi era army was destroyed in 2011. That new army is now split and many units demoralized by the appearance of the Hiftar rebels and the defection to the rebels of many of their leaders and elite units.

In the capital the newly selected (by a pro-Islamic parliament) prime minister (Ahmed Maiteg) seized some government offices with the help of an Islamic terrorist militia.

June 3, 2014: On the Egyptian border the crossing at Saloum was partially reopened. The crossing was closed 13 days ago because of the Hiftar offensive.

Earlier in the day a Red Cross official was shot dead in the coastal city of Sirte.

June 4, 2014: Outside Benghazi a suicide car bomb exploded near a placed where rebel leader Khalifa Hiftar was meeting with some commanders. Three of his security guards were killed and he was slightly injured by some flying debris.

In the capital the head of intelligence resigned, saying he could not function as long as the Islamic radicals controlling Parliament feuded with the non-Islamic prime minister.

June 5, 2014: The Red Cross is suspending operations in Libya because of the recent killing of a Swiss Red Cross official in the coastal city of Sirte. The victim was in a vehicle clearly marked as Red Cross but the gunmen opened fire anyway.

June 6, 2014: The head of the Central Bank reported that the government had lost $30 billion because of ten months of interference with oil exports. Oil exports are still largely blocked by local militias demanding special favors before they will let the oil flow. Currently only about 200,000 barrels a day are being exported. The government still has about $1oo billion left but there is little credit because foreign suppliers and lenders take a dim view of the ability of the current government to turn things around. Government banking officials insist that the remaining $100 billion can be made to last for at least two years. What the government does not like to dwell on is that to make existing cash reserves last spending will have to be sharply reduced. Already Libyans are seeing more and more cutbacks in government spending. Most Libyans depend on the government for jobs, food and other essentials. Without oil income the government cannot deliver. About two thirds of the $53 billion annual government budget is for salaries and benefits. A growing number of government workers are having their pay or benefits delayed so that more essential issues (like food imports) can be attended to. The government reserves are not all cash and it takes time to convert some of those assets into cash. The government is also warning people that a lot of Kaddafi era subsidies will have to go in order to keep the economy going. Such a move would be very unpopular. Kaddafi provided a lot of stuff at very low prices. Like loaves of bread for a few pennies. Fuel and electricity was also sold far below cost as were airline, bus and train tickets. Another problem is the many people who collect a government paycheck who don't do any work, or even show up for work. Changing all these bad habits is very difficult. The greed, Islamic terrorism and sense of entitlement that is so widespread in Libya also means that foreign investors are not interested because Libyans make inefficient and troublesome employees. Libya is no place to create wealth but it is an ideal place to squander it. The basic problem is that Libyans have proved unable to agree on how to handle their oil wealth. The tribes living where the oil comes from want a larger share. Actually, everyone wants more, for one reason or another. In the last year various local militias near the oil fields and export terminals have seized these facilities halted most (over 70 percent by the end of 2013 and over 85 percent now) oil exports. All this was largely unexpected because at the start of 2013 oil production was at 1.4 million barrels a day and nearly back to normal. Then greed got the best of many factions who decided their loyalties were more to themselves than to Libya as a whole. It's been downhill since then. Before the 2011 revolution oil accounted for over 90 percent of government revenue and over 70 percent of GDP. With over $30 billion in oil revenue lost so far, eventually there will be no way to pay for essential imports, like food. These shortages have become more widespread and severe and that is driving many people to either back the government or use more desperate measures to grab whatever they can.

June 8, 2014: The three week offensive by rebel leader Khalifa Hiftar continues. In the capital pro and anti Hiftar mobs clashed while armed Hiftar supporters in Benghazi continued fighting Islamic terrorists groups that support the existing government. Hiftar is trying to get organized all the militias and armed forces units that have joined his cause. Unified command is one big advantage he has over the many Islamic and tribal militias that oppose unity and peace. Hiftar is representing the majority of Libyans who want peace and prosperity, not endless bickering and lack of national unity.

In Benghazi the Islamic terrorist militias have lost control of the streets and are on the defensive. Much of the city is again a war zone because for all their faults the Islamic terrorist groups imposed a form of law (Islamic law) and order (the Islamic terrorist gunmen were less likely to rob, rape and generally misbehave) in the neighborhoods they controlled. A major challenge for the pro-Hiftar groups is to restore order, which is one thing all Libyans can agree on.

The most important goal is control of the oil facilities, the central bank and the network of government offices that pay government employees and import goods for distribution to most Libyans. While not all Libyans support Hiftar, most do support restoration of the Kaddafi era welfare system and the oil revenues that pay for it. This was an efficient way to distribute most of the oil income so that most Libyans benefitted from it. Most Libyans became dependent on these benefits and are angry at anyone who is harming this system. The Islamic terrorist militias sense they are facing a real threat because of the widespread hostility they now face. The Islamic terrorists are quickly making alliances with each other. Before this most Islamic terrorist groups were feuding with one other. One of the things that annoys most Libyans is the lack of unity among the Islamic terrorist groups, each of whom considers themselves the anointed (by God) leader of an Islamic renaissance. This is a common pattern and the resulting feuds and outright wars between Islamic terrorist factions is a major reason why these groups rarely achieve much success.

One motivation for Hiftar was the growing strength of Islamic terrorist groups in politics. For three years the Islamic conservatives, radicals and terrorists were well enough organized to prevent the parliament (the GNC or General National Congress) from creating a new government that controlled the entire country. Increasingly Islamic radicals were intimidating secular or moderate Islamic politicians into either being silent to supporting the establishment of an Islamic state (in effect, a religious dictatorship). The big problem with that is that Kaddafi always pretended that his decades' long dictatorship was an Islamic state. Libyans don't want another Kaddafi. The Islamic politicians were a minority in the GNC but very active and disruptive. The Islamic politicians persuaded the parliament to hold new elections on June 25th. Hiftar wants to eliminate the power of Islamic terrorist groups to rig elections before another national election is held. Thus the June 25th elections will probably not take place. Meanwhile since May 18th Islamic terrorist militiamen have prevented parliament from meeting.

The GNC was originally formed in mid-2012 to create a new constitution for the country to vote on and rule until that was done. At the end of 2013 the deadlocked GNC extended its power for another year. This was seen by many Libyans as an illegal act. The GNC pointed out that separatist activity in the east prevented any national vote and that had to be dealt with before a constitution could be completed and approved. This was an impossible situation for the GNC and the Islamic radicals were hoping to take advantage of it. The various factions in the GNC could not agree on much, although there was a consensus that the new constitution would use Islamic (Sharia) law. This was an effort to placate the many Islamic conservative groups. This made local Christians (native Copts, who have been Christian and present for 2,000 years and are five percent of the population) nervous. The GNC, now that it has been persuaded to be more Islamic, is now being defended by Islamic radical and terrorist militias and some tribal and more secular groups. The GNC also has the support of most Islamic radical groups, the largest of which is Ansar al Sharia in Benghazi. This group was responsible for the 2012 attack that killed the American ambassador. Many of the militias in Misrata (east of Tripoli) militias support GNC, but many back Hiftar or are neutral. Because the GNC has been hijacked by the Islamic radicals Hiftar sees it as illegitimate. Even the Islamic terrorists don't trust the parliament/GNC. In short, there is no government, just chaos.

In the capital the parliament, the politicians sense that Hiftar wants to force new elections that would be free of meddling by Islamic terrorist militias and this would cost most members of parliament their jobs. To get around this parliament is trying to force the acceptance of a new prime minister who would openly back the Islamic terrorist militias. Many members of parliament are "Islamic" to one degree or another and the prospect of losing their jobs has caused many of them to back the minority of pro-Islamic terrorist members offering to back a new prime minister (Ahmed Maiteg) who would be able to mobilize some government forces and most Islamic terrorist groups against the upstart Hiftar rebels. However the April 28 vote to make Maiteg prime minister succeeded in part because of threats against Maiteg opponents. This was accompanied by armed Islamic terrorist militiamen prominently moving around the parliament compound. Many members of parliament insist this vote for Maetig was rigged and invalid.

The basic problem here is that most Libyans are fed up with all the Islamic terrorist and tribal militias who are out for themselves and don't really care what happens to the country as a whole. General Hiftar promises to change all that and has a growing number of armed supporters to help him impose law and order and unity on the country.

Hiftar called for the formation of a Presidential Council to take over from the pro-Islamic parliament and organize new elections. The current interim prime minister refuses to accept the authority of the new prime minister (Maiteg) parliament has selected and called on the courts to decide which prime minister actually was in control. The court said it would make a ruling by June 9th. Neither side is likely to accept whatever the ruling is and the pro-Islamic groups are growing despondent and desperate. Pro-Hiftar forces continue to gain control of more and more of the country. Many senior government officials are openly backing Hiftar. That can be dangerous. Assassination is a popular weapon for Islamic terrorists and they are using it against pro-Hiftar officials and militia leader with increasing frequency.

Hiftar supporters in Benghazi have discovered a Sudanese operation to supply some Islamic terrorist groups in the city with weapons and ammo. Sudanese transports secretly flew the stuff into Benghazi airport. The staff at the airport were bribed or intimidated into keeping quiet about the operation.
Some Sudanese officials also flew in to meet with Islamic terrorist militia leaders.

June 9, 2014: The supreme court ruled the recent election of Ahmed Miitig as prime minister to be unconstitutional. Miitig promptly resigned.

Former army general Khalifa Hiftar agreed to have him men observe a ceasefire on the 25th, the day national parliamentary elections are to be held. None of the Islamic terrorist militias Hiftar is fighting have agreed to halt operations for the elections and many Islamic terrorist groups oppose the elections because they believe democracy is un-Islamic.

June 10, 2014: Outside Benghazi a suicide car bomber killed himself when unable to get through a checkpoint manned by men loyal to Hifter. Three of the Hifter gunmen were wounded.

June 11, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) a suicide car bomb went off outside a police station wounding five policemen. Fifty kilometers east of Benghazi another suicide car bomb went off at an army checkpoint, wounding six soldiers.

June 12, 2014: Across the border in Tunisia border guards fought a group of armed men coming from Libya.

Turkey has pulled its diplomats out of Benghazi and warned Turkish citizens in eastern Libya to leave the region until things calm down.

June 15, 2014: In the east the El Feel oilfield resumed production (80,000 barrels a day). El Feel had been shut down several months by a militia protesting abuses like not being paid on time.

In Benghazi officials banned car traffic at night in an effort to reduce the violence that has made life, and doing business, so difficult.

June 16, 2014: For the second time in less than a year American commandos visited Libya and seized a wanted Islamic terrorist off the street. The latest incident occurred "somewhere near Benghazi" and involved some FBI agents and local operatives in addition to the team of SOCOM (Special Operations Command) operatives (SEALs). The man taken, Ahmed Abu Khattala, is a leader in local Islamic terrorist group Ansar al Sharia and has openly bragged about his role in the September 11, 2012 attack on a U.S. diplomatic facility in Benghazi that led to the death of the U.S. ambassador to Libya and three other Americans. Khattala later changed his story and insisted he was only on the scene to help rescue the ambassador. Libya, which was not given advance warning of this arrest, protested that the operation was a violation of their sovereignty. The U.S. replied that the mission was a legitimate act of self-defense in that Libya has been providing many Islamic terrorists de facto sanctuary because of the Libyan governments' inability to crack down on the activities of the Islamic terrorist groups. The U.S. was able to pull off the operation despite the Libyan government still being upset about one in October, 2013 that grabbed another wanted terrorist. This time around the Americans had the benefit of former army general Khalifa Hiftar and his coalition of tribal militias and army units fighting against Islamic terrorists groups (like Ansar al Sharia) in and around Benghazi. Not all Libyans consider attacks on leaders of Islamic terrorist groups an illegal act. Ansar al Sharia is apparently still trying to figure out how the Americans tracked down Khattala. Recently Khattala has split his time between running a construction business and leading Ansar al Sharia gunmen in fighting Hiftars men.

June 20, 2014: In Benghazi 70 Egyptian trucks and their drivers were released after having been seized at gunpoint several days earlier. The trucks were taken by a militia that was demanding Egypt release one of their associates who was prosecuted in Egypt for smuggling and sentenced to 20 years in prison.

In Benghazi a group of gunmen attacked the port area for several hours. The attackers were driven off and six people were wounded. The attackers were believed to be Islamic terrorists angry at the continued attacks organized by general Hiftar, who is seeking to shut down all Islamic terrorist groups in Libya. The latest Hiftar move was to fire on boats smuggling in weapons for Islamic terrorist groups. Some Islamic terrorists apparently believe port personnel were cooperating with Hiftar, which may be true as most Benghazi residents back Hiftar, not the Islamic terrorists.

Parliament approved a 2014 budget of $48 billion. This is based on oil selling for an average $100 a barrel and Libyan shipments averaging 800,000 barrels a day. So far this year shipments have been less than a third of that, but the government expects to settle the disputes with groups blockading ports and oilfields and average 800,000 barrels a day for the entire year. The budget assumes a deficit of $8 billion. The government had already lost $32 billion because of 11 months of interference with oil exports. Oil exports are still largely blocked by local militias demanding special favors before they will let the oil flow. Currently only about 100,000 barrels a day are being exported. The government still has about $1oo billion left but there is little credit because foreign suppliers and lenders take a dim view of the ability of the current government to turn things around. Government banking officials insist that the remaining $100 billion can be made to last for at least two years.

What the government does not like to dwell on is that to make existing cash reserves last spending will have to be sharply reduced. This year the overall cuts are about ten percent. Already Libyans are seeing more and more cutbacks in government spending. Most Libyans depend on the government for jobs, food and other essentials. Without oil income the government cannot deliver and most Libyans will experience a sharply reduced standard of living. About two thirds of the annual government budget is for salaries and benefits. A growing number of government workers are having their pay or benefits delayed so that more essential issues (like food imports) can be attended to. The government reserves are not all cash and it takes time to convert some of those assets into cash. The government is also warning people that a lot of Kaddafi era subsidies will have to go in order to keep the economy alive. Eliminating subsidies would be very unpopular. Kaddafi provided a lot of stuff at very low prices. Like loaves of bread for a few pennies. Fuel and electricity was also sold far below cost as were airline, bus and train tickets. Another problem is the many people who collect a government paycheck who don't do any work, or even show up for work. Changing all these bad habits is very difficult. The greed, Islamic terrorism and sense of entitlement that is so widespread in Libya also means that foreign investors are not interested because Libyans make inefficient and troublesome employees. Libya is no place to create wealth but it is an ideal place to squander it. The basic problem is that Libyans have proved unable to agree on how to handle their oil wealth. The tribes living where the oil comes from want a larger share. Actually, everyone wants more, for one reason or another. In the last year various local militias near the oil fields and export terminals have seized these facilities halted most (over 70 percent by the end of 2013 and over 85 percent now) oil exports. All this was largely unexpected because at the start of 2013 oil production was at 1.4 million barrels a day and nearly back to normal. Then greed got the best of many factions who decided their loyalties were more to themselves than to Libya as a whole. It's been downhill since then. Before the 2011 revolution oil accounted for over 90 percent of government revenue and over 70 percent of GDP. With over $32 billion in oil revenue lost so far, eventually there will be no way to pay for essential imports, like food. These shortages have become more widespread and severe and that is driving many people to either back the government or use more desperate measures to grab whatever they can.

June 21, 2014: In the east (Hariga) oil export operations were resumed after a two month halt because security personnel shut the place down and demanded back pay. Once this port is in full operation daily oil shipments will rise to 270,000 barrels.

June 22, 2014: Rebel general Khalifa Hiftar accused foreign workers from Turkey and Qatar of spying and ordered those in eastern Libya (east of Sirte) out of the country within 48 hours or risk arrest. Turkey and Qatar denied the charge or that they were supporting Islamic terrorists but began arranging to get hundreds of their citizens (most of them working as specialists) as a precaution.

June 25, 2014: Only 19 percent of eligible voters and 27 percent of registered voters showed up for the second parliamentary elections since Kaddafi was overthrown in 2011. It seems that voters were discouraged by all the violence, factionalism and poor performance of those elected the first time around. While security was good in most of the country, there was violence in Benghazi. There Islamic terrorists ambushed an army convoy, killing four and wounding twenty. Elsewhere in the city a prominent lawyer and opponent of Kaddafi was murdered, apparently by five heavily armed Islamic terrorists upset with her views on women and criticism of Islamic radicalism. The attackers shot their way into a guarded residential compound. In many areas where Islamic terrorists were active there was no voting at all. It was simply too dangerous. There was voting in most of Benghazi although three soldiers guarding polling places were killed.

June 26, 2014: The government announced that the newly elected parliament will meet August 1st in Benghazi. Despite the violence in Benghazi the government believes that by having many major government operations there will contribute to pacifying the city.

Despite agreements with protestors at shut down oilfields and export ports oil shipments this month are running at a record low of only 100,000 barrels a day. In western Libya protestors demanding more government benefits have been shutting down the refineries on and off for nearly a year now. This has caused growing problems for consumers because all sorts of fuels are frequently in short supply. While over 70 percent of refined petroleum products are imported criminals and militias often seize shipments sent to gas stations and fuel distributors. These problems with fuel are causing a lot of public anger.

June 27, 2014: The five week offensive by rebel leader Khalifa Hiftar has moved into Benghazi itself with militias and troops loyal to Hiftar making air and ground attacks on militia controlled neighborhoods in the city. Many army units have joined Hiftar, providing him with eight fighter bombers and four helicopter gunships plus numerous artillery weapons and armored vehicles. Hiftar spends a lot of time organizing all the militias and armed forces units that have joined his cause. Unified command is one big advantage he has over the many Islamic and tribal militias that oppose unity and peace. Hiftar is representing the majority of Libyans who want peace and prosperity, not endless bickering and lack of national unity. Hiftar says it will take until the end of the year to complete his plan to destroy the Islamic terror and tribal militias. He points to the steady advance of his forces and the sharp decline in assassinations of government officials and those who oppose the Islamic terrorists. At the same time there has been an increase in the number of Islamic terrorist leaders being killed and people in Benghazi not that the Islamic terrorist gunmen have been less active in harassing ordinary citizens. Hiftar is popular with his armed followers because he uses tactics that minimize friendly casualties.

June 29, 2014: Two Tunisian diplomats were freed by an Islamic terrorist militia after being held for three months. Their captors had demanded the release of Islamic terrorists from Tunisian prison in return for the two diplomats but the Tunisian government refused to do this. Other arrangements, the details of which were not made public, were made. Apparently this involved cash payments to tribal and militia leaders to make the release happen.

July 10, 2014: The UN announced it was shutting down many of its operations in Libya because of the worsening security situation. This is the tip of the iceberg as in the coastal cities, especially Tripoli and Benghazi, criminals and militia members (it's often hard to tell them apart) are increasingly acting with impunity and threatening even senior, and well-guarded people (like government officials, militia leaders and powerful crime bosses, not to mention foreign aid workers and foreign workers in general). This dramatic drop in security is a primary recruiting tool for general Hiftar's forces.

July 13, 2014: In Tripoli the pro-Islamic terrorist Misrata militia attacked the main airport, which has been controlled by the Zintan militia since 2011. Over the next few days Misrata fired dozens of rockets at the airport, damaging 20 of the 31 airliners stuck at the airport when flight operations were suspended on the 13th. At least one of the damaged airliners was a total loss and five or six others were heavily damaged and probably out of action for months. The control tower was also hit and before the airport can resume operations replacement equipment for the tower has to be imported, to replace gear damaged by the fighting. There is still a major airport in Benghazi and several smaller ones along the coast that can handle large airliners.

July 14, 2014: Libya and Tunisia agreed to operate joint border patrols to inhibit the movement of Islamic terrorists between the two countries. Tunisia has its Islamic terrorists largely under control and the biggest problem is Libyan Islamic terrorist entering Tunisia to reinforce their much depleted Tunisian brethren.

July 15, 2014: Oil production has increased to 588,000 barrels a day, 42 percent of normal output. This is a high for 2014 and is threatened by various militias talking about blocking production in order to get a larger share of oil money. A month ago production was closer to 100,000 barrels a day but government negotiators have had a lot of success in the last few weeks getting various militias to stop blockading production and shipping facilities. Unfortunately these deals often collapse later and new pressure groups decide to try and blockade something and succeed at it.

July 17, 2014: The government has asked the UN to provide peacekeepers to help protect Libyan oil production and exporting facilities. Currently most of these are controlled by tribal militias demanding a larger share of the oil income. Nearly all the tribes are demanding more oil income for themselves than is available. Negotiating a compromise has proved impossible so far. The government, which is now controlled by anti-Islamic terrorists parties, fears that without UN intervention Libya will cease to function. The government also wants UN help training soldiers and police. Such training has already been under way by the U.S. and other Western countries since 2013. But many of the trained troops return the Libya and then go join a militia (usually a tribal one) instead of the army or police. For too many Libyans tribe or religion takes precedence over nati onal loyalty.

The Misrata and Zintan militias fighting over control of the Tripoli airport agreed to a ceasefire.

While the UN can't do much to help out here, NATO and especially the U.S. can. But American help enrages the Islamic terrorist militias as it's a core part of Islamic terrorist beliefs that the U.S. in particular and the West in general is at war with Islam and must be destroyed. The government may have to bite the bullet on this one because only the Western powers have the resources to stabilize Libyan. However, even the West, which sees Libya as in danger or turning into a major Islamic terrorist sanctuary, may lack the popular and political will to step in.

July 18, 2014: The ceasefire between the two major militias in the capital (the Islamic terrorist Misrata militia and the anti-Islamic terrorist Zintan militia) fell apart because the Misrata leaders insisted the ceasefire only covered fighting at the airport, not in the rest of the city. The Zintan militia is actually a coalition of two dozen militias from western Libya. The Misrata militia is also a coalition and is loosely allied with several smaller Islamic terrorist militias from all over the country. These smaller Islamic terrorist groups are mainly what is fighting the Hiftar Libyan National Army in eastern Libya. Some pro-government militias are also opposing Hiftar in Benghazi and losing. Some of these militias have already switched sides and accepted control by Hiftar.

Many army units have joined Hiftar, providing him with some fighter bombers and helicopter gunships plus numerous artillery weapons and armored vehicles. Hiftar spends a lot of time organizing all the militias and armed forces units that have joined his cause or at least become allied with it (like Zintan). Unified command is one big advantage he has over the many Islamic and tribal militias that oppose unity and peace. Hiftar is representing the majority of Libyans who want peace and prosperity, not endless bickering and lack of national unity. Hiftar says it will take until the end of the year to complete his plan to destroy the Islamic terror and tribal militias. He points to the steady advance of his forces and the sharp decline in assassinations of government officials and those who oppose the Islamic terrorists. At the same time there has been an increase in the number of Islamic terrorist leaders being killed and people in Benghazi note that the Islamic terrorist gunmen have been less active in harassing ordinary citizens. Hiftar is popular with his armed followers because he uses tactics that minimize friendly casualties.

Defeating the Islamic terrorist groups is only half the battle. Once the terrorists are gone there is still the problem of Libyan tribes not getting along with each other. Each tribe demands more than other tribes will agree to. Compromise does not come easily and tribal leaders have to deal with followers driven by a well-developed sense of entitlement. There is not enough oil wealth to satisfy the demands of all Libyans and that may prove to be a more difficult problem than the Islamic terrorists.

The Islamic terrorists are seen as a threat to tribal leadership, not just because the Islamic terrorist leaders have been disdainful of tribal leaders but because the Islamic terrorists often threatene d tribal leaders with violence unless the tribes submit to Islamic rule. This was reflected in the June 25th parliament elections, which saw the pro-Islamic terrorist groups lose their majority (something the Islamic terrorists are not willing to accept). While the Islamic terrorist groups are more fanatic and ruthless, Hiftar has provided tribal militias with military training and professional leadership. The only edge Islamic terrorists have is their ability to call on foreign Islamic terrorists to come help. This just increases the violence and number of casualties. As was seen in neighboring Algeria and Egypt, when faced with Islamic terrorists as a foe there is no negotiation option; only a fight to the death. This is going to get messy before it gets better.

One response to this looming disaster is the Libyan National Army. This militia coalition was organized by former general Khalifa Hiftar earlier this year and has grown in strength and area controlled since it began fighting Islamic terrorist militias last May. Hiftar first moved into Benghazi itself with militias and troops loyal to Hiftar making air and ground attacks on militia controlled neighborhoods in the city. This has cleared most Islamic terrorist groups out of the city. Now Hiftar is building up his forces (especially his alliance with the Zintan militias) in Tripoli. Tripoli is where Islamic terrorist militias are concentrating forces in preparation for an effort to take control of the national capital and halt Hiftar. Libyan Islamic terrorists fighting in Syria have been called home to fight and asked to bring any foreign volunteers with them to the Hiftar forces. The Islamic terrorists need all the help they can get because Hiftar is working in cooperation with many powerful tribal leaders, who have always been hostile to the Islamic terrorists (who tend to operate like warlords and despise tribal leaders as “part of the problem”). Hiftar also has some support from Libyan militias, especially the Zintan coalition in the west. Hiftar also appeals to the Libyan military and many troops and their commanders have already defected to Hiftar.

July 19, 2014: The inability to compromise and cooperate has crippled the economy and the ability to govern the country. With various militias holding oilfields and export terminals hostage the main source of national income has, so far this year, averaged less than a third of normal. Thus essential imports (especially food and medical supplies) are being paid for with cash reserves. These reserves will only last a year or two before most of the population becomes destitute and faces starvation. More Libyans are coming to accept this possibility but there is still no widespread willingness to compromise and work out a solution to this deadlock. The final results of the June 25 th election are being released on the 20 th and this is expected to generate more violence as the Islamic terrorist militias oppose the expected result (that the Islamic radical parties have lost their majority).

August 4, 2014: The newly elected parliament met in Tobruk for the first time and swore in members and began the process of electing leaders. Over 80 percent of the 188 members of the new parliament have shown up in Tobruk. The new parliament is recognized by the UN and most major nations, even though these countries have shut down their embassies in Tripoli and withdrawn their diplomats.

August 10, 2014: UK's previously collaboration with Muammar al-Quadhafi on 'Rendition of Libyan dissidents disclosed. This makes liars of Tony Blair, David Milliband, Jack Straw, Brown and all the other prominent New labour hypocrites: On Sunday, one of the victims, Abdul Hakim Belhaj, now commander of the anti-Gaddafi militia in Tripoli demanded an apology from London and Washington and said he was considering suing over his rendition to Tripoli and subsequent torture. For several years, senior MI5 and MI6 officers have sought to deny that their agencies have been guilty even of complicity in the rendition operations mounted by the US after 9/11, and the subsequent torture of the victims.

The discovery of the papers suggests that on one occasion, at least, the British ran their own "rendition to torture" operation. The victim was named by the CIA as Abu Munthir. He is thought to have been a man who used this nom de guerre while living in the UK, where he is said to have encouraged a group of British Muslims to mount a bomb attack on an unspecified target in the south-east of England. The plotters were under surveillance by MI5 and counterterrorism detectives at the time that Abu Munthir was detained in Hong Kong in March 2004 before being.

August 11, 2014: In Egypt several thousand additional soldiers and dozens of armored vehicles have been sent to the Libyan border in the last week. This is all to deal with the growing smuggling activity there, much of it involving Islamic terrorist groups bringing in weapons stolen from army warehouses left unguarded during the 2011 revolution. Those weapons have been selling briskly on the black market in Egypt. The customers are gangsters, Islamic terrorists and people seeking some illegal protection.

August 12, 2014: The newly elected parliament agreed that the next president would be chosen by direct election rather than by parliament. There was no agreement when this election would be held or on how to deal with the growing militia violence. In Tripoli unidentified gunmen murdered the police chief.

August 13, 2014: The newly elected parliament, meeting in Tobruk, called on the UN or NATO to intervene. Parliament also voted for all militias to disband and withdrew all official recognition for militias. No one has expressed any interest in intervening and the militias are not paying attention to the new parliament either.

August 16, 2014: A ship hired by the Filipino government evacuated 449 Filipinos from Libya. This ship will pick up another 610 Filipinos at another Libyan port and take them all to Malta, where they can fly home. The government ordered a mandatory evacuation of Filipinos from war torn Libya on July 20th and has hired enough ships to get out the 3,000 who have agreed to leave. Some 13,000 Filipinos work in Libya and the fighting is most acute in the two largest cities (Tripoli and Benghazi). This is where most Filipino workers are fleeing from. The loss of some 3,000 departing Filipinos has crippled the Libyan health care system. That's because most of the medical professionals in the hospitals are from the Philippines (60 percent) and India (20 percent) and most of them are leaving. Both countries have ordered all their citizens out because of the growing chaos and violence. Without the foreign doctors, nurses and technicians most hospitals would have only a few such essential staff and would not be able to handle current patients much less new ones from the fighting. Despite the evacuation order most (over 75 percent) of the Filipino workers in Libya are staying, for now. These workers are in places where there is little, or no, violence.

August 18, 2014: Unidentified jets again bombed Islamic terrorist positions in Tripoli.

August 19, 2014: In the eastern city of Derna an Islamic terrorist group used a sports stadium for a public execution. The victim was an Egyptian accused of killing a Libyan. The execution was videoed and posted on the Internet. In Tripoli rockets were fired into an affluent residential neighborhood, killing three people. Elsewhere in Tripoli government forces shut down two TV stations that had been supporting Islamic terrorist groups since July.

August 21, 2014: LIBYA: Tunisia, Egypt close airspace to planes from Libya.

Tunisia and Egypt banned flights to or from Libya, except for Tobruk.
There is fear that all major airports in Libya, except the one at Tobruk, are subject to attack by Islamic terrorist militias.

Tunisia and Egypt have decided to close their airspace to aircraft coming from Libya, the Libyan Press Agency, LANA, Thursday quoted airport sources as saying. Though no reason has been given for the action, it is not unconnected with fears over the security situation in Libya, which has been in turmoil since the 2011 uprising that toppled long-time dictator Mouammar Khadafi. The Tripoli Airport has been closed since 13 July following ongoing clashes between rival militias who are fighting for the control of the facility. Only three major airports in Libya - Maitigua in Tripoli, Misrata, 220 km to the east of the capital and Tobruk - are currently operating. However, the decision by Egypt and Tunisia to close their airspace to flights from Libya has also affected flights to the functioning airports.

August 22, 2014: Unidentified jets again bombed Islamic terrorist positions in Tripoli. Islamic terrorists accused the UAE (United Arab Emirates) and Egypt of being behind these air raids but offered no proof.

August 23, 2014: Islamic terrorist group Fajr Libya, from Misrata) seized control of most of the airport and over the next two days most of the key airport buildings could be seen burning. Insurance companies fear that the airport damage will be more than a billion dollars (to structures and airliners stranded there). Zintan militias had long controlled the Tripoli airport, which they are trying to defend from Islamic terrorist militias. The government has been trying for over a year to get the militias out of the airport, where the militiamen are more interested in extortion and stealing than in providing any security. Fajr Libya also controls most of Benghazi, along with Ansar al Sharia.

August 24, 2014: Unidentified jets again bombed Islamic terrorist positions in Tripoli. General Hiftar, who has long had the support of what’s left of the Libyan Air Force, claimed responsibility for these attacks. No one else (NATO or Arab) has taken responsibility. Foreign aviation experts doubt that the Libyan air force could have made these quite accurate night attacks. The Libyan Air Force never demonstrated this degree of competence when it was fighting the rebels who overthrew Kaddafi in 2011.

Islamic terrorists attacked and destroyed TV station in Tripoli that opposed Islamic terrorists.

All the fighting in the last month has left up to a 500 dead, many of them civilians caught in the crossfire. This is not as violent as Syria or Iraq, but more like what is going on in Nigeria and Somali a, which also suffer from Islamic terrorist violence (Boko Haram and al Shabaab respectively). Over a million Libyans and foreign workers have fled their homes (and often the country) so far, to escape the violence in Tripoli and Benghazi.

Despite all the chaos in Tripoli and Benghazi the government has managed to get oil exports going again. Oil production has increased to over 500,000 barrels a day which is about 40 percent of normal output. This is a high for 2014 and is threatened by various militias talking about blocking production in order to get a larger share of oil money. In June production was closer to 100,000 barrels a day but government negotiators have had a lot of success since then getting various militias to stop blockading production and shipping facilities. Unfortunately these deals often collapse later and new pressure groups decide to try and blockade something and succeed at it.

The main problem in Libya is many armed groups that cannot agree with each other. There appear to be over 1,500 different armed groups in Libya. Most are local and exist mainly for self - defense. Only a minority (under ten percent) of these militias are involved in the current violence in Tripoli and Benghazi. Most of the militias are organized into coalitions, mainly for mutual support and because of some shared beliefs. The largest of these is the Misrata Union of Revolutionaries. This group has over 30,000 armed members and about 200 different militias in and around the city of Misrata. Then there is Ansar al Sharia, the largest Islamic terrorist group in Benghazi. This group was responsible for the 2012 attack that killed the American ambassador and has most of its strength in the east (around Benghazi). The al Zintan Revolutionaries Military Council is based in the mountains southwest of Tripoli in and around the Berber town of Zintan. The LROR (Libyan Revolutionary Operations Room) is a pro-government militia that has been trying to maintain control in Tripoli and Benghazi. The February 17 Martyrs Brigade it the largest and most dangerous Islamic terrorist coalition in and around Benghazi. In theory February 17 Martyrs Brigade works for the government as they are on the government payroll. At the moment this coalition has divided loyalties. Most militias are not associated with a coalition and primarily involved with local matters.

Fajr Libya has asked the Islamic terrorist dominated GNC (originally formed in mid-2012 to create a new constitution for the country to vote on and rule until that was done) to reform and meet in Tripoli to run the country. The revived GNC is supposed to have its first meeting today. The GNC was replaced in June by a new parliament. At the end of 2013 the deadlocked GNC extended its power for another year. This was seen by many Libyans as an illegal act. The GNC pointed out that separatist activity in the east prevented any national vote and that had to be dealt with before a constitution could be completed and approved. This was an impossible situation for the GNC and the Islamic radicals were hoping to take advantage of it. The various factions in the GNC could not agree on much, although there was a consensus that the new constitution would use Islamic (Sharia) law. This was an effort to placate the many Islamic conservative groups. This made local Christians (native Copts, who have been Christian and present for 2,000 years and are five percent of the population) nervous. The GNC has become popular with Islamic terrorist militias and some tribal and more secular groups. The GNC has long had the support of most Islamic radical groups, especially Ansar al Sharia in Benghazi. This group was responsible for the 2012 attack that killed the American ambassador. Many of the militias from Misrata (east of Tripoli) support GNC, but many also back rebel general Hiftar or are neutral. Because the GNC has been hijacked by the Islamic radicals Hiftar sees it as illegitimate. Even many Islamic terrorists don't trust the parliament or the GNC. The Hiftar coalition of tribal militias and army units is not large enough to take on all the Islamic terrorist militias but continues to make progress in Benghazi. Hiftar supports the new parliament and rule of law.

August 25, 2014: In Egypt the foreign ministers of Libya, Egypt, Algeria, Tunisia, Sudan, Chad and Niger met to discuss what to do about the growing chaos (and apparent civil war) in Libya. About the only thing everyone could agree on was to not get involved. Egypt proposed forming an armed intervention force and soon discovered that no one else was interested.

August 25, 2014: The newly elected (and much more anti-Islamic terrorist) parliament is now operating in Tobruk, far away from the violence in the two largest cities; Tripoli (the capital and 1,600 kilometers west of Tobruk) and Benghazi (in the east and long dominated by Islamic terrorist groups.) Parliament has condemned the militias, especially the Islamic terrorist ones and called for NATO (or any international body, like the UN) to come back and help impose peace. The parliament has singled out Islamic terrorist groups Fajr Libya (based in Misrata as the Misrata Union of Revolutionaries) and Ansar al Sharia (based in Benghazi) as most responsible for the current violence. Most government officials have moved from Tripoli to Tobruk. Only 19 percent of eligible voters and 27 percent of registered voters showed up for the June 25 th parliamentary elections (the since Kaddafi was overthrown in 2011). Voters were discouraged by all the violence, factionalism and poor performance of those elected the first time around.

August 26, 2014: Those behind the mysterious nighttime air strikes against Islamic terrorists in Libya were finally revealed (by the U.S.) as coming from Egypt, using American built UAE F-16Es. The last of these attacks occurred on August 24th as "unidentified" jets again bombed Islamic terrorist positions in Tripoli. A local leader, general Hiftar, who has long had the support of what's left of the Libyan Air Force, claimed responsibility for these attacks. No one else (NATO or Arab) had taken responsibility. Foreign aviation experts doubted that the Libyan air force could have made these quite accurate night attacks. The Libyan Air Force never demonstrated this degree of competence when it was fighting the rebels who overthrew Kaddafi in 2011. This may have prompted the U.S. to reveal, two days later, who was behind the attacks, which began on August 21st. This was not the first time UAE F-16Es had flown over Libya. They did so in 2011, but did not drop bombs. The West has long pressed Arab states to use their extensive air power resources to attack Islamic terrorists in the region, rather than keep asking Western countries to do it for them. The problem here was always that the idea of "Arabs bombing Arabs" was very unpopular. Apparently fear of Islamic terrorism in the neighborhood has changed a lot of minds. Even so the UAE and Egypt kept insisting they were not behind the air attacks.

August 28, 2014: Prime Minister Abdullah al Thinni and his cabinet resigned. This was in accordance with the constitution and allowed the new parliament to select new ministers and form a new government. Thinni was the leading candidate to be the next prime minister and was reappointed to that position after a few days discussion with the new parliament. Thinni has the support of the UN and most foreign nations.

August 29, 2014: In the east (Baida) a Libyan warplane crashed. Islamic terrorists took credit but the government said the aircraft came down because of a technical problem. The warplane was supporting the forces of general Hiftar in Benghazi.

August 30, 2014: Niger has allowed the United States to establish a surveillance base in the north, where Niger has borders with Algeria, Libya and Chad. This area has long been a key transit route through the Sahara Desert and is heavily used by smugglers and Islamic terrorists. The United States has been operating UAVs out of Niger for several years now and some of these are now believed operating over Libya.

August 31, 2014: The U.S. denied reports that militiamen had taken over the abandoned American embassy in Tripoli. Photos showing up allegedly showing such a takeover were misleading and were of the adjacent residential compound, not the embassy compound itself. The U.S. says the embassy is being guarded and so far is secure.

September 1, 2014: The government admitted that it had lost control of the capital (Tripoli). Efforts are still being made to get government employees and records out of Tripoli to Tobruk. The situation in Tripoli is chaotic with no one group in control of the entire city, or even major parts. There is no law and very little order.

September 2, 2014: A warplane crashed outside Tobruk, killing three and wounding nine. Most of the injuries were on the ground. The crash occurred during a ceremony to honor an air force pilot killed in a crash last week.

The Algerian border remains closed and despite that Libyan Islamic terrorists and smugglers are still trying to move people and goods in and out. The increased Algerian border security recently led to the discovery of a Libyan Islamic terrorist group that had turned to people smuggling. Some 200 Syrians were arrested near the Libyan border, along with the Libyans they had paid to get them to the Algerian coast and onto a boat that would take them to Europe and salvation via refugee status. This smuggling has become big business and most of it was coming via Libya because there the border security was the weakest in North Africa. But now the Libyan coast is more heavily patrolled and many Libyan coastal towns are unsafe because of the militia violence. So Algeria becomes an attractive conduit for the smuggling, despite better border security and policing in general. Algerian police have also discovered another people smuggling operation, apparently related to the one that gets economic refugees to Europe. This one involved recruiting young men fighting for ISIL in Syria and moving them to Libya for more terrorist training and then through Algeria to southern Europe (as refugees) to carry out terror attacks. In some cases the terrorists are accompanied by wives and children. Police arrested 160 Syrians believed associated with this network.

September 6, 2014: In the southeast (Kufra) police seized a Sudanese transport when the cargo was found to be weapons and ammo. The aircraft had landed to refuel before it continued on to Tripoli. The government accused Sudan of backing the Islamic terrorists in Tripoli. Sudan has supported many Islamic terrorist groups in the region, but always denies it when caught.

September 8, 2014: In Tripoli the reconvened GNC formed its own government led by Omar al Hassi.
Now the country has two prime ministers.

September 9, 2014: The Tobruk parliament passed an anti-terrorism law which basically made the militias currently fighting the government illegal. The parliament is debating whether to do the same with the rival GNC parliament.

September 11, 2014: The government denied that the UAE had carried out air attacks in Libya during August. There were no more such attacks and the UAE supports the new Libyan parliament and has arrested Libyans in the UAE who support Islamic terrorist groups in Libya.

September 12, 2014: In Benghazi general Hiftar warned the Islamic terrorist militias to disarm or face destruction as the Hiftar forces are readying a major offensive. Hiftar does have some better armed, trained and led fighters, as well as a number of militias. Hiftar also has some helicopters and warplanes. It is unclear if Hiftar has enough to really defeat the Benghazi militias. Most of the fighting recently has been around the Benghazi airport, which some Islamic terrorist militias are trying to seize.

September 13, 2014: Libya is falling apart as a nation. The key element now is the oil money, which pays for most everything. The cash from oil sales is going into the Central bank, which has not said which of the two parliaments it will answer to and is waiting for a court order. The various factions are pressuring the Central Bank and courts to favor them. All this is complicated by the fact that most of the armed groups cannot agree with each other. Most fight for their tribe or hometown. Some, especially in Benghazi, are Islamic radicals seeking a religious dictatorship that few Libyans want. There are Islamic radical groups all over the country, but mainly in Benghazi (and nearby towns) as well as (to a lesser extent) Tripoli. Many militias say they are fighting to prevent pro-Kaddafi (largely Arab) groups from taking back power. There are some pro-Kaddafi militias but they are very much a minority.

It is generally believed that Libya is becoming a failed state, similar to what happened to Somalia after the 1990 anti-government rebellion and in Afghanistan after the Russians left in 1987 and cut off support (in 1991) for the Afghan government they left behind. In Somalia Islamic terrorist groups (mainly al Shabaab) eventually tried to take over, but failed. In Afghanistan it was the Taliban, which took over most of the country in the late 1990s, but was overthrown in late 2001 when the U.S. came to the aid of the tribes that were still fighting the Taliban. The clear lesson here is that someone will have to intervene to prevent the Islamic terrorists from gaining too much control over the country, or simply to stop the violence before the economy (oil industry) is destroyed. Somalia and Afghanistan did not have oil, or much of anything else worth exporting (except goats in Somalia and heroin in Afghanistan). At the moment no one is stepping forward to intervene, mainly because it is an expensive and thankless job. Someone may still intervene to back the government and that is what the government is hoping for.

The main cause of this is disunity is the inability of the various factions to cooperate in forming and running a national government. The GNC (General National Congress, originally formed in mid-2012 to create a new constitution for the country to vote on and rule until that was done) became popular with Islamic terrorist militias and some tribal and more secular groups. The GNC has long had the support of most Islamic radical groups, especially Ansar al Sharia in Benghazi. The radicals believed they could manipulate the GNC to form a religious dictatorship. Many of the militias from Misrata (east of Tripoli) support GNC, but many also back rebel general Hiftar or are neutral. Because the GNC has been hijacked by the Islamic radicals Hiftar sees it as illegitimate. Even many Islamic terrorists don’t trust the new parliament or the GNC either. The Hiftar coalition of tribal militias and army units is not large enough to take on all the Islamic terrorist militias but continues to battle Islamic terrorist groups in Benghazi. Hiftar supports the new parliament and rule of law.

The two largest cities (Tripoli and Benghazi) are still being fought over, but the real prize is the oil. At the moment the new parliament controls the oil fields and the oil export terminals. Production is growing and is expected to reach a million barrels a day by the end of the month and 1.5 mill ion by the end of the year. If the oil facilities are damaged in the fighting it could take a year or more to restore production. Oil revenue is what keeps the economy going, which is one reason the oil industry has not suffered much battle damage since the original 2011 revolution. But if the oil income is interrupted because of combat damage most Libyans would be dependent on foreign charity to just survive until the repairs were made and the oil was flowing again. That could take years. All over the country local militias and tribal leaders are deciding which parliament to support. It is believed that most will follow the money, the oil money.

The main problem in Libya is many (over 1,500) armed groups that formed during the 2011 rebellion and refused to disband later. Most are local and exist mainly for self- defense. Only a minority (under ten percent) of these militias are involved in the current violence in Tripoli and Benghazi. Most of the militias are organized into coalitions, mainly for mutual support and because of some shared beliefs. The largest of these is the Fajr Libya Misrata militias. This group has over 30,000 armed members and about 200 different militias in and around the city of Misrata. Many of these men are now fighting in Tripoli. Then there is Ansar al Sharia, the largest Islamic terrorist group in Benghazi. This group was responsible for the 2012 attack that killed the American ambassador and has most of its strength in the east. The al Zintan Revolutionaries Military Council is based in the mountains southwest of Tripoli in and around the Berber town of Zintan. The LROR (Libyan Revolutionary Operations Room) is a pro - government militia that has been trying to maintain control in Tripoli and Benghazi. The February 17 Martyrs Brigade it the largest and most dangerous Islamic terrorist coalition in and around Benghazi. In theory February 17 Martyrs Brigade works for the government as they are on the government payroll. At the moment this coalition has divided loyalties. Most militias are not associated with a coalition and primarily involved with local matters.

The recently (June) elected (and much more anti-Islamic terrorist) parliament is now operating in Tobruk, far away from the violence in the two largest cities; Tripoli (the capital and 1,600 kilometers west of Tobruk) and Benghazi (470 kilometers to the east and long dominated by Islamic terrorist groups.) Parliament has condemned the militias, especially the Islamic terrorist ones and called for NATO (or any international body, like the UN) to come back and help impose peace. The parliament has singled out Islamic terrorist groups Fajr Libya and Ansar al Sharia as most responsible for the current violence. In August Fajr Libya took control of most of Tripoli. However the situation i n Tripoli chaotic with dozens of militias seeking just to defend parts of the city. Fajr Libya is using terror and intimidation to get their way and this approach is turning a lot of potential allies into enemies. Many militias are "living off the land" because so many Tripoli residents have fled since 2011. This left a lot of property behind and available for looting.

Fajr Libya also asked the Islamic terrorist dominated GNC to reform and meet in Tripoli to run the country. The revived GNC has declared itself the legitimate parliament, insisting that the June vote was invalid. Only 19 percent of eligible voters and 27 percent of registered voters showed up for the June 25th parliamentary elections (the first since Kaddafi was overthrown in 2011). Voters were discouraged by all the violence, factionalism and poor performance of those elected the first time around for the GNC. But the June vote was accepted by most Libyans and the GNC was officially replaced by a new parliament. This was largely because at the end of 2013 the deadlocked GNC extended its power for another year. This was seen by many Libyans as an illegal act. The GNC pointed out that separatist activity in the east prevented any national vote and that had to be dealt with before a constitution could be completed and approved. This was an impossible situation for the GNC and the Islamic radicals were hoping to take advantage of it.

Meanwhile the commission established to create a new constitution continues to work from the eastern city of Bayda (still controlled by the new parliament) and still plans to complete their work in December and the government plans a national vote on the new constitution in March 2015. All this assumes that the Islamic terrorists and separatist tribal, ethnic and regional militias can be brought under control by then.

The fighting in Benghazi is stalemated with Ansar al Sharia unable to defeat the various anti -Islamic terrorist groups. The fighting is largely confined to Tripoli and Benghazi, and has forced over 100,000 people to flee their homes in the last few months to escape the shooting and shelling. Benghazi is in some ways more important than Tripoli because it contains the headquarters of the state owned oil operations. The government still controls this but that could change quickly.

Since 2011 over 30 percent of the population has fled Libya, most of them to neighboring Tunisia. That was easy to do because about 85 percent of Libya's six million people live along the coast. All the fighting in the last two months has left at least a thousand dead, many of them civilians caught in the crossfire. This is not as violent as Syria or Iraq, but more like what is going on in Nigeria and Somalia, which also suffer from Islamic terrorist violence (Boko Haram and al Shabaab respectively).

Most large militias have a lot of Kaddafi era mortars, artillery and rocket launchers and like to use this stuff to fire in the general direction of whoever they are fighting. This poorly aimed fire often lands on nearby residential areas forcing civilians to flee. The fighting is not conventional, as in “front lines”, clearly identified (by uniforms and symbols) fighters (especially with the militias) and a sense of an overall plan. Most militias act like criminal gangs and their main motivations are controlling their territory and extracting cash and goods from others to sustain the militia members. Turf defense is a major source of fighting. It is all rather primitive and chaotic. The government, such as it is, at least tries to address the needs of all the people. This includes many of the militia members. The Islamic terrorist militias doing the fighting have largely (as in not always) been cut off from their government benefits (like regular pay). In most of the country the local militias are what passe s for police and their government pay is what keeps most of the militiamen on the job and quiet.

The inability of the Islamic terrorist militias to run a government (in Libya and elsewhere) limits their popularity. But there are enough young men with guns who believe, at least for the moment, in Islamic radicalism to keep the Islamic terrorist militias a threat to the country. In Tripoli and Benghazi the Islamic terrorist militias still favor ambushes, assassinations and kidnappings as opposed to attacks on organized forces (the military or some of the better run militias).

Joining the civilian refugees are (so far) over 150,000 foreign workers, who do a lot of the technical work (especially medical or oil related) and some of the harshest manual jobs. This has caused the government to become even more unresponsive.

What remains of the pre-June government has moved from Tripoli to Tobruk. The parliament is meeting on a 17,000 ton Greek ferry tied up in the port. Only 52 percent of the parliament members are in Tobruk. Most of the missing are either on their way or boycotting the new parliament for one reason or another. Other government offices are finding space where they can.

Despite all the chaos in Tripoli and Benghazi the government has managed to get oil exports going again. Oil production has increased to over 700,000 barrels a day which is about half normal output. This is a high for 2014 and is threatened by various militias talking about blocking production in order to get a larger share of oil money. In June production was closer to 100,000 barrels a day but government negotiators have had a lot of success since then getting various militias to stop blockading production and shipping facilities. Unfortunately these deals often collapse later and new pressure groups decide to try and blockade something and succeed at it.

A widely circulated rumor that Islamic terrorists had seized and removed eleven airliners at Tripoli airport proved to be false. The story speculated that the Islamic terrorists could use the airliners for suicide attacks somewhere, somehow.

September 14, 2014: The government of Libya once again accused Sudan of providing extremist Islamist militias and terror groups in Libya with weapons. Libya’s prime minister rejected Sudan’s claim that it is not supplying these groups. Libya claimed that the Sudanese transport plane which entered Libyan air space on September 7 and landed at Tripoli, was loaded with weapons at an airfield in Sudan.

September 16, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) fighting between Islamic terrorists and government forces (now including those of the former rebel general Hiftar) left at least nine dead and over twenty wounded.

September 17, 2014: Britain recently revealed that in August they had to deal with a mutiny among 300 Libyan soldiers being trained at a British base. The Libyans were selected to receive combat and leadership training so they could better train and command Libyan soldiers back in Libya. The mutiny occurred when British officers in charge of the training put three of the trainees under guard after police picked them up for being off base without permission. Then twenty other trainees went and threatened the British soldier guarding the three Libyan trainees. The British guard let the three go free rather than risk violence. Senior officers were uncertain about how to handle this insubordination given the nature of Arab military trainees.

What happened with these Libyans was not uncommon when Westerners are assigned to train Arabs to be military leaders. What these trainers run into is a collection of problems that have long made it difficult for Arab, and many other poor (and often Moslem) nations to establish democratic governments or prosperous economies. A lot of the problem has to do with culture, especially culture influenced by Islam. There are a number of reasons for this and the most important problems are;

Most Arab countries are a patchwork of different tribes and groups, and Arab leaders survive by playing one group off against another. Loyalty is to one's group, not the nation. Most countries are dominated by a single group that is usually a minority (Bedouins in Jordan, Alawites in Syria, Sunnis in Iraq, Nejdis in Saudi Arabia). All of which means that officers are assigned not by merit but by loyalty and tribal affiliation.

September 18, 2014: Egypt has advised trucking companies to carefully choose which areas in Libya they allow their vehicles to operate. These trucks, bringing in legal goods, are subject to extortion, theft or kidnapping from the many militias operating in eastern Libya.

September 19, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) a series of assassinations in the last two days left at least ten journalists and peace group leaders dead, apparently an attempt by Islamic terrorists to silence opposition.

September 24, 2014: One of general Hiftar's warplanes dropped a bomb near a dock in Benghazi harbor to convince the port operator that Hiftar could destroy the port facilities if the port continued to bring in weapons and other supplies for Islamic terrorist militias there.

September 26, 2014: Just across the border in Tunisia four soldiers were wounded during a clash with smugglers trying to get 30 truckloads of goods into Libya.

September 27, 2014: The Libya parliament called on the world to allow them to import weapons and to supply more military assistance, including troops and air power, to make it possible to suppress the rebel militias that control most of the country.

September 28, 2014: The Tobruk parliament swore in the prime minister and other ministers that were finally selected after weeks of negotiations.

September 29, 2014: In the east (south of Benghazi) a militia kidnapped 70 Egyptian truck drivers and demanded that the Egyptian government release one of the militia leaders who had been arrested in Egypt for smuggling and other crimes.

October 1, 2014: The army, which is loyal to the Tobruk parliament, said it would halt military operations in response to a UN call for a ceasefire. Some rebel militias agreed but the ceasefire effort quickly fell apart because most militias refused to participate and kept on fighting.

October 2, 2014: In Benghazi general Hiftar's forces suffered over 80 casualties (including at least 13 dead) as they fought with Islamic terrorist militias. Hiftar does have some better armed, trained and led fighters, as well as a number of militia allies. It is unclear if Hiftar has enough to really defeat the Benghazi militias. Most of the fighting recently has been around the Benghazi airport, which some Islamic terrorist militias are trying to seize. Today's violence was in part around the airport, which the Islamic terrorists continue to attack.

October 3, 2014: Libya has come apart as a nation. What matters most now is the oil money, which pays for everything. The cash from oil sales is going into the Central bank, which tends to answer to the Tobruk parliaments because that is the one with international recognition and that provides access to the international banking system. The various factions are pressuring the Central Bank and courts to favor them but it is the international community that controls the ability of Libya to buy essential (most of the food and everything else) needed to keep Libyans alive. The internationally recognized government has set up shop in the small port city of Tobruk (1,600 kilometers east of Tripoli). What remains of the pre-June government has moved from Tripoli to Tobruk. Many other government offices moved as well and are finding space where they can. One government agency that did not move is the central bank and the rebel government and the Tobruk one are fighting over who controls more than $100 billion held by the central bank. A lot of that cash is overseas and since Tobruk has international and UN support the Tripoli rebels will have a hard time maintaining control of oil income.

The UN has also been trying, without much success, to get the major militias from Tripoli and Benghazi to join peace negotiations. This has not worked because so many of the militia leaders are unwilling to compromise and many refuse to even enter negotiations. All this was made clear as the UN sought to hold peace negotiations on September 29th in the southwestern city of Ghadames. With the failure of those talks the UN is now threatening economic sanctions against the major rebel militias and, more importantly, the leaders of those militias. Many of those leaders have moved assets and family members out of Libya. Nearly a third of the Libyan population has left the country because of the continued chaos and uncertainty.

All this is complicated by the fact that most of the armed groups cannot agree with each other. Most fight for their tribe or hometown. Some, especially in Benghazi, are Islamic radicals seeking a religious dictatorship that few Libyans want. There are radical groups all over the country, but mainly in Benghazi (and nearby towns) as well as (to a lesser extent) Tripoli. Many militias say they are fighting to prevent pro-Kaddafi (largely Arab) groups from taking back power. There are some pro-Kaddafi militias but they are very much a minority. Libya is becoming a failed state, similar to what happened to Somalia after the 1990 anti-government rebellion and in Afghanistan after the Russians left in 1987. In Somalia Islamic terrorist groups (mainly al Shabaab) eventually tried to take over, but failed. In Afghanistan it was the Taliban, which took over most of the country in the late 1990s, but was overthrown in late 2001 when the U.S. came to the aid of the tribes that were still fighting the Taliban. The clear lesson here is that someone will have to intervene to prevent the Islamic terrorists from gaining too much control over the country, or simply to stop the violence before the economy (oil industry) is destroyed. At the moment no one is stepping forward to intervene, mainly because it is an expensive and thankless job. Someone may still intervene to back the government and that is what the government is hoping for.

The main cause of this is disunity is that the various factions cannot agree on much The GNC (originally formed in mid-2012 to create a new constitution for the country to vote on and rule until that was done) became popular with Islamic terrorist militias and some tribal and more secular groups. The GNC has long had the support of most Islamic radical groups, especially Ansar al Sharia in Benghazi. This group was responsible for the 2012 attack that killed the American ambassador. Many of the militias from Misrata (east of Tripoli) support GNC, but many also back rebel general Hiftar or are neutral. Because the GNC has been hijacked by the Islamic radicals Hiftar sees it as illegitimate. Even many Islamic terrorists don't trust the new parliament or the GNC. The Hiftar coalition of tribal militias and army units is not large enough to take on all the Islamic terrorist militias but continues to battle Islamic terrorist groups in Benghazi. Hiftar supports the new parliament and rule of law and is no longer considered a rebel. In turn Hiftar is believed to have active support from Egypt and the UAE (United Arab Emirates) while some of the militias are receiving support from Sudan and Qatar.

The two largest cities (Tripoli and Benghazi) are still being fought over, but the real prize is the oil. At the moment the new parliament controls many oil fields and the oil export terminals. Production is growing and is expected to reach a million barrels a day by the end of the month and 1.5 million by the end of the year. If the oil facilities are damaged in the fighting it could take a year or more to restore production. Oil revenue is what keeps the economy going, which is one reason the oil industry has not suffered much battle damage since the original 2011 revolution. But if the oil income is interrupted because of battle damage most Libyans would be dependent on foreign charity to just survive. All over the country local militias and tribal leaders are deciding which parliament to support. It is believed that most will follow the money, the oil money.

The main problem in Libya is many (over 1,500) armed groups. Most are local and exist mainly for self- defense. Only a minority (under ten percent) of these militias are involved in the current violence in Tripoli and Benghazi. Most of the militias are organized into coalitions, mainly for mutual support and because of some shared beliefs. The largest of these is the Fajr Libya Misrata militias. Then there is Ansar al Sharia, the largest Islamic terrorist group in Benghazi. This group was responsible for the 2012 attack that killed the American ambassador and has most of its strength in the east (around Benghazi). The al Zintan Revolutionaries Military Council is based in the mountains southwest of Tripoli in and around the Berber town of Zintan.

Fajr Libya also asked the Islamic terrorist dominated GNC to reform and meet in Tripoli to run the country. The revived GNC has declared itself the legitimate parliament, insisting that the June vote was invalid. Only 19 percent of eligible voters and 27 percent of registered voters showed up for the June 25th parliamentary elections (the first since Kaddafi was overthrown in 2011). Voters were discouraged by all the violence, factionalism and poor performance of those elected the first time around for the GNC. But the June vote was accepted by most Libyans and the GNC was officially replaced by a new parliament. This was largely because at the end of 2013 the deadlocked GNC extended its power for another year. This was seen by many Libyans as an illegal act. The GNC pointed out that separatist activity in the east prevented any national vote and that had to be dealt with before a constitution could be completed and approved. This was an impossible situation for the GNC and the Islamic radicals were hoping to take advantage of it.

Despite all the chaos in Tripoli and Benghazi the government has managed to get oil exports going again. By mid-September 0il production has increased to over 900,000 barrels a day which is about 60 percent of normal output. This was a high for 2014 and has since been cut over 20 percent as various local groups shut down production in as effort to get a larger share of oil money. In June production was closer to 100,000 barrels a day but government negotiators have had a lot of success since then getting various militias to stop blockading production and shipping facilities. Unfortunately these deals often collapse later and new pressure groups decide to try and blockade something and succeed at it. Getting the oil production back to normal is essential because Libya imports nearly all its food and much else besides. Oil income pays for 95 percent of the government budget and is 65 percent of GDP. Oil is what pays for it and without oil money most Libyans would literally starve. This possibility is getting more attention from militia leaders, who are in turn hearing from their own followers about it. The militias also feed, indirectly, off the oil income because most militias maintain their armed strength by stealing and extorting cash and goods from locals to pay their people and supply them with essentials. Without that most militias would melt away to a few hardcore members and become irrelevant. Another problem with oil is the declining price (now about $96 a barrel). Lower world demand and rapidly growing supplies of North American oil and gas obtained with the new fracking technology is driving down (over 14 percent this year) the price of oil.

All the fighting in the last three months has left over 1,500 dead, many of them civilians caught in the crossfire. This is not as violent as Syria or Iraq, but more like what is going on in Nigeria and Somalia, which also suffer from Islamic terrorist violence (Boko Haram and al Shabaab respectively). Most large militia have a lot of Kaddafi era mortars, artillery and rocket launchers and like to use this stuff to fire in the general direction of whoever they are fighting with. This poorly aimed fire often lands on nearby residential areas forcing civilians to flee. The fighting is not conventional, as in “front lines”, clearly identified (by uniforms and symbols) fighters (especially with the militias) and a sense of an overall plan. The Islamic terrorist militias doing the fighting have largely (as in not always) been cut off from their government benefits (like regular pay). In most of the countries the local militias are what passes for police and their government pay is what keeps most of the militiamen quiet. The inability of the Islamic terrorist militias to run a government (in Libya and elsewhere) limits their popularity. But there are enough young men with guns who believe, at least for the moment, in Islamic radicalism to keep the Islamic terrorist militias a threat to the country. In Tripoli and Benghazi the Islamic terrorist militias still favor ambushes, assassinations and kidnappings as opposed to attacks on organized forces (the military or some of the better run militias).

Since August some 5,000 members of parliament, their families, bodyguards and various other staff have arrived in Tobruk and set up show in a seaside resort complex. Currently only about 60 percent of the 200 members of parliament are in attendance. Some have refused to attend, others were called back to their constituencies temporarily or permanently/ If the Tobruk parliament demonstrates continued control over the oil money and imports, more elected members of parliament will show up for work. One of the anti-Islamic terrorists warlords, general Hiftar, has set up bases in Tobruk, including an air base. This contains some of the warplanes and helicopters Hiftar controls. The Tobruk parliament is calling on foreign nations for help in defeating the rebel militias in Tripoli and Benghazi. At the same time many Libyans blame NATO for all their problems. The logic of this is that NATO air support for the rebels in 2011 allowed the many militias to defeat Kaddafi and then create chaos. More thoughtful Libyans, although a minority, understand that the lack of willingness by most Libyans to negotiate and compromise is the real cause of the current mess and a major part of any solution is recognizing what is really going on rather than blaming the mess on foreigners.

Egypt has offered to train Libyan Army soldiers, something which several NATO nations have already been doing. Egypt has the advantage of using Arab trainers who speak fluent Arabic and have a cultural affinity for what Libyans are going through. Egypt also offered to share intelligence it has on Libyan militias, especially those in the east (Benghazi) because some of these groups threaten Egypt and Egypt would like to see all the Islamic terrorist groups gone from Benghazi and Libya in general. That would help reduce the weapons smuggling activity which mainly goes through Egypt.

This cultural affinity is important. That was seen as Britain recently revealed that in August they had to deal with a mutiny among 300 Libyan soldiers being trained at a British base. The Libyans were selected to receive combat and leadership training so they could better train and command Libyan soldiers back in Libya. The mutiny occurred when British officers in charge of the training put three of the trainees under guard after police picked them up for being off base without permission. Then twenty other trainees went and threatened the British soldier guarding the three Libyan trainees. The British guard let the three go free rather than risk violence. Senior officers were uncertain about how to handle this insubordination given the nature of Arab military trainees. What happened with these Libyans was not uncommon when Westerners are assigned to train Arabs to be military leaders. What these trainers run into is a collection of problems that have long made it difficult for Arab, and many other poor (and often Moslem) nations to establish democratic governments or prosperous economies. A lot of the problem has to do with culture, especially culture influenced by Islam. There are a number of reasons for this and the most important problems are tribalism, different attitudes towards learning, leading and training.

Since 2011 over 30 percent of the population has fled Libya, most of them to neighboring Tunisia. That was easy to do because about 85 percent of Libya's six million people live along the coast. Some five percent are still nomadic. Other minorities comprise about six percent of the population. Nearly 100 percent of the population speaks at least some Arabic and 97 percent are Sunni Moslems. The Berber are Sunni but were never big on Islamic radicalism. Kaddafi saw the Berbers as a threat because they were not Arab but had, for over a thousand years, resisted Arab domination. The Berber nationalists have also been holding demonstrations outside oil facilities in the West, interfering with oil production.

Joining the civilian refugees are (so far) over 150,000 foreign workers, who do a lot of the technical work (especially medical or oil related) and some of the harshest manual jobs. This has caused the government to become even more unresponsive.

October 4, 2014: A British school teacher who was kidnapped in May was released after payment of a ransom. This is discouraged because it encourages more kidnappings of foreigners. In the last few months most foreigners from Western countries that pay ransoms have fled the country.

October 5, 2014: In the eastern city of Derna an Islamic terrorist group (Shura Council of Islamic Youth) declared their support for ISIL (Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant). This is good news for the government because any ISIL affiliated Islamic terrorist militias will now suffer more international pressure as well as the need to attack other Islamic terrorist groups that have not declared for ISIL.

October 9, 2014: In neighboring Niger French troops, in cooperation with local forces, intercepted and destroyed an AQIM (Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb) convoy carrying weapons and ammunition from Libya to Mali. Some of the Islamic terrorists involved were captured.

October 10, 2014: In an effort to halt the attacks on them, the Ansar al Sharia Islamic terrorist militia (the largest in the city) in Benghazi declared that they had no intention of spreading their rule beyond Benghazi. This pledge did not work and the army, tribal and Hiftar forces kept attacking.

October 12, 2014: Egypt warned its citizens, especially the many truck drivers operating in Libya, to not venture beyond Tobruk because of the risk of being kidnapped or robbed by Islamic terrorist rebels.

October 19, 2014: The internationally recognized government in Tobruk has openly allied itself with general Hiftar, who has always declared his support for a government.

October 22, 2014: The Tobruk government announced that its forces had driven Islamic terrorist groups out of Benghazi. While that is true, most of these groups retreated in an orderly fashion taking many weapons and supplies with them. Now the government forces (mainly the army and the Hiftar coalition) must pursue the retreating Islamic terrorists to towns and smaller cities where some of these groups already have some presence. At the same time the government said it was gathering forces to retake Tripoli. That probably means a coalition of pro-government militias in the west. The army and Hiftar forces are all tied up chasing down Islamic terrorists in the east.

While the fighting in Benghazi got most of the headlines over the last month hostilities continued on the outskirts of Tripoli and these militias are apparently the ones the government expects to retake Tripoli. The fighting in Benghazi had died down by the 21st after three weeks of increasingly intense fighting that caused over a thousand casualties (and more than several hundred dead). The government used its artillery and air power to good effect and that made it difficult for the Islamic terrorist militias to mass men to take ground. That's why several major efforts to take the Benghazi airport failed. This use of firepower drove out the Islamic terrorists but also caused extensive damage to buildings and led to over 100,000 civilians fleeing Benghazi and Tripoli (where there was less artillery and air attacks). In Benghazi it got so bad that senior leaders of the Islamic terrorist militias had to show up at the front lines to rally their gunmen, many of whom were quietly slipping away and going home. This led to several of these senior leaders getting killed.

While Libya has come apart as a nation in the political sense, the Tripoli and Tobruk governments have agreed to not interfere with oil operations. The understanding here is that the oil income, which the Tobruk government largely controls, buys essentials (like food) that will continue to be distributed to all Libyans. So far that seems to be working. This is what always mattered most because the oil money pays for everything. The cash from oil sales is going into the Central Bank, which tends to answer to the Tobruk parliament because that is the one with international recognition and that provides access to the international banking system. The various factions are pressuring the Central Bank and courts to favor them but it is the international community that controls the ability of Libya to buy essential (most of the food and everything else) needed to keep Libyans alive recognizes the Tobruck officials. That internationally recognized government set up shop in the small port city of Tobruk (1,600 kilometers east of Tripoli) after encountering hostility from militias loyal to the pre-June government. Many other government offices moved as well and are finding space where they can. The rebel governments in Tripoli and the Tobruk are fighting over who controls more than $100 billion held by the Central Bank. A lot of that cash is overseas and since Tobruk has international and UN support the Tripoli rebels are having a hard time maintaining control of any oil income. If the Tripoli government tries to sell oil on the black market they will have most of the world going after them with bank account shutdowns and seizure of the tankers they use (either in port or on the high seas). In the end, it’s the oil money that will bring peace, or abject poverty for all. The government is running out of cash and credit. Another year or two of this and life gets very miserable for Libyans.

Egypt is hosting a three day conference of Libyan tribal leaders in Cairo. The meeting includes tribal chiefs from all over Libya. While often at odds with each other, all the tribes suffer if the country descends into anarchy and the oil money stops. If that happens the tribes starve and lose much else besides. It’s not just religious extremism that divides Libyans, it’s also tribalism. The tribe angle is even more important than religion but is often mixed up with religious attitudes and the charisma of a local leader to keep the divisions fresh and violent. Most of the tribes oppose the Islamic terrorist groups but getting them to cooperate in opposing the Islamic terrorists has been difficult. It was a major chore just getting so many tribal chiefs to come to Cairo and discuss the matter. Meanwhile Egypt keeps denying that its warplanes were responsible for another several air strikes in Benghazi. So far there have not been any compelling cell phone photos or videos to back up the eyewitness reports. Egypt is very eager to have peace in Libya, if only to avoid having an Islamic terrorist sanctuary as a neighbor. Most of the armed men guarding the border are on the Egyptian side. The Libyans have thousands of armed men assigned to border security but these personnel are poorly trained, led and equipped. Smugglers have more to worry about once they get on the other side of the Libyan border.

The Mali peacekeeping force, composed of 11,000 French and (mainly) African troops has been suffering more casualties in the last month as Islamic terrorists from Mali settle into bases in southern Libya and are now regularly moving south to carry out operations in northern Mali. All this is possible because of the Libya n civil war . That is mainly up north along the coast and no one bothers with Islamic terrorists who only kill across the border in Mali. There is a similar problem in Afghanistan with Islamic terrorists operations from several sanctuary areas in neighboring Pakistan and Iran.

October 30, 2014: Libya has asked for foreign assistance in destroying its remaining stockpile of raw materials for making nerve gas. Although facilities for the destruction of this stuff have been built in Libya and Libyans trained to do it, the chaos in Libya since the Kaddafi government was overthrown in 2011 have prevented the work from being done. So the Libyans are asking for the 850 tons of chemicals to be shipped out and destroyed overseas as was recently done with a similar Syrian stockpile.

In 2012 foreign nations agreed to provide experts and equipment to help destroy Libyan chemical weapons. Moamar Kaddafi stockpiled nerve, mustard, and several other types of poisons over the decades. Some of these chemicals are so old that they are dangerous to handle.

In 2004 Libya handed over to international disarmament officials details about Libya's chemical weapons program. Libya described one chemical weapons production facility and stockpiles containing thousands of tons of raw materials needed to manufacture sarin nerve gas as well as two large stockpiles containing 22 tons of mustard gas.

At the same time Libya announced it would begin destroying more than 3,300 unfilled chemical bombs, with the help of foreign experts. This process was still incomplete when the Kaddafi dictatorship was overthrown in 2011.

November 14, 2014: In early November Britain sent 300 Libyan officer trainees home before their 24 week training was completed. Five of the Libyans did not leave as they are being held on rape charges. Three of these Libyans are charged with raping women and two of raping a man. The Libyans had arrived in June and within a month locals were complaining of Libyans coming into the nearby village and behaving badly. This was not supposed to happen as the Libyans were selected to receive combat and leadership training so they could better train and command troops back in Libya. British authorities were surprised by the bad behavior and responded by ordering the Libyans were restricted to the 80 hectare (200 acre) base where they lived and trained. In August this led to a mutiny among the Libyans.

The August mutiny occurred when British officers in charge of the training put three of the trainees under guard after police picked them up for being off base without permission. Then twenty other trainees went and threatened the British soldier guarding the three Libyan trainees. The British guard let the three go free rather than risk violence. Senior officers were uncertain about how to handle this insubordination given the nature of Arab military trainees. The situation went downhill from there. The Libyans were not only undisciplined but also unreliable. They would agree to certain conditions (as in how they behaved towards civilians on and off the base, especially women) and then ignore those agreements. When confronted they would plead ignorance of British customs and refuse to accept responsibility. The Libyans also constantly fought among themselves. Although depicting themselves as devout Moslems many of them would go to the village, get drunk and behave badly. Some blamed the British for making alcohol too easy to obtain. The British tried to cope with all this by stationing hundreds of armed soldiers in the village (population 3,500) and on the base to prevent the Libyans from getting out of hand. This did not work either. Some of the Libyans tried to apply for political asylum. This was denied after the rape incidents in late October and the decision was made to send all the Libyans home.

What happened with these Libyans was not uncommon when Westerners are assigned to train Arabs to be military leaders. What these trainers run into is a collection of problems that have long made it difficult for Arab, and many other poor (and often Moslem) nations to establish democratic governments or prosperous economies. A lot of the problem has to do with culture, especially culture influenced by Islam. There are a number of reasons for this and the most important problems are;

Most Arab countries are a patchwork of different tribes and ethnic or religious groups, and Arab leaders survive by playing one group off against another. Loyalty is to one's group, not the nation. Most countries are dominated by a single group that is usually a minority (Bedouins in Jordan, Alawites in Syria, Sunnis in Iraq, Nejdis in Saudi Arabia). All of which means that officers are selected not by merit but by loyalty and tribal affiliation.

Islamic schools favor rote memorization, especially of scripture. Most Islamic scholars are hostile to the concept of interpreting the Koran (considered the word of God as given to His prophet Mohammed). This has resulted in looking down on Western troops that will look something up that they don't know. Arabs prefer to fake it, and pretend it's all in their head. Despite that improvisation and innovation is generally discouraged. Arab armies go by the book, Western armies rewrite the book as needed and thus usually win.

There is no real use of NCOs (sergeants or petty officers). Officers and enlisted troops are treated like two different social castes and there is no effort to bridge the gap using career NCOs. Enlisted personnel are treated harshly. Training accidents that would end the careers of US officers are commonplace in Arab armies, and nobody cares. The troops do not appreciate this and that dislike often manifests itself in unpleasant ways.

Officers tend to be despised by their troops, and this does not bother the officers much it all . Many Arab officers simply cannot understand how treating the troops decently will make them better soldiers. Westerners have a hard time convincing Arab leaders on this point and those that do understand and implement these ideas risk ridicule for not being authentic (as an Arab).

Paranoia prevents adequate training. Arab tyrants insist that their military units have little contact with each other, thus insuring that no general can became powerful enough to overthrow the government. Units are purposely kept from working together or training on a large scale. Arab generals don't have as broad a knowledge of their armed forces as do their Western counterparts. Even at the most senior levels promotions are based more on political reliability than combat proficiency. Arab leaders prefer to be feared, rather than respected, by their soldiers. This approach leads to poorly trained armies and low morale. A few rousing speeches about "Moslem brotherhood" before a war starts does little to repair the damage.

Arab officers often do not trust each other. While an American infantry officer can be reasonably confident that the artillery officers will conduct their bombardment on time and on target, Arab infantry officers seriously doubt that their artillery will do its job on time or on target. This is a fatal attitude in combat.

Arab military leaders consider it acceptable to lie to subordinates and allies in order to further their personal agenda. This had catastrophic consequences during all of the Arab-Israeli wars and continues to make peace difficult between Israelis and Palestinians. When called out on this behavior, Arabs will assert that they were "misunderstood."

While Western officers and NCOs are only too happy to impart their wisdom and skill to others (teaching is the ultimate expression of prestige), Arab officers try to keep any technical information and manuals secret. To Arabs, the value and prestige of an individual is based not on what he can teach, but on what he knows that no one else knows.

While Western officers thrive on competition among themselves, Arab officers avoid this as the loser would be humiliated. Better for everyone to fail together than for competition to be allowed, even if it eventually benefits everyone.

Westerners are taught leadership and technology; Arab officers are taught only technology. Leadership is given little attention as officers are assumed to know this by virtue of their social status as officers.

Initiative is considered a dangerous trait. So subordinates prefer to fail rather than make an independent decision. Battles are micromanaged by senior generals, who prefer to suffer defeat rather than lose control of their subordinates. Even worse, an Arab officer will not tell a U.S. ally why he cannot make the decision (or even that he cannot make it), leaving Western officers angry and frustrated because the Arabs won't make a decision. The Arab officers simply will not admit that they do not have that authority.

Lack of initiative makes it difficult for Arab armies to maintain modern weapons. Complex modern weapons require on the spot maintenance, and that means delegating authority, information, and tools. Arab armies avoid doing this and prefer to use easier to control central repair shops. This makes the timely maintenance of weapons difficult.

Security is maniacal. Everything even vaguely military is top secret. While Western promotion lists are routinely published, this rarely happens in Arab armies. Officers are suddenly transferred without warning to keep them from forging alliances or networks. Any team spirit among officers is discouraged.

All these traits were reinforced, from the 1950s to the 1990s, by Soviet advisors. To the Russians, anything military was secret, enlisted personnel were scum, they had no use for NCOs and everyone was paranoid about everyone else. These were not "communist" traits, but Russian customs that had existed for centuries and were adopted by the communists to make their dictatorship more secure from rebellion. Arab dictators avidly accepted this kind of advice, but are still concerned about how rapidly the communist dictatorships all came tumbling down between 1989 and 1991.

Arab states can produce fearsome looking armies, at least on paper. But these troops cannot survive an encounter with well trained and led soldiers. Even fanatical Islamic terrorists are often too much to handle. This is still happening throughout the Arab world as can be seen recently in Libya and Iraq.

October 24, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) pro-government forces seized the largest Islamic terrorist base in the city.

October 25, 2014: Libya has asked for foreign assistance in destroying its remaining stockpile of raw materials for making nerve gas. Although facilities for the destruction of this stuff have been built in Libya and Libyans trained to do it, the chaos in Libya since the Kaddafi government was overthrown in 2011 have prevented the work from being done. So the Libyans are asking for the 850 tons of chemicals to be shipped out and destroyed overseas as was recently done with a similar Syrian stockpile.

October 31, 2014: Pro-government forces claim to control 80 percent of Benghazi but the remaining Islamic terrorists are fighting to the death and will require another few weeks of effort to clear out. Meanwhile many of the Islamic terrorists who quickly got out of the city when the offensive began over a month ago have set up operations outside the city and throughout eastern Libya. These groups will have to be taken down one at a time.

The Hiftar forces also say they have proof that Qatar was sending weapons and military equipment to Islamic terrorist groups in Libya. The proof comes in the form of an aircraft from Qatar that landed in an airport controlled by Hiftar forces and was seized and searched

November 1, 2014: The pro-government Labraq airport east of Benghazi has been temporarily closed until security forces can shut down the groups who have been firing rockets into the airport area.

November 3, 2014: In Benghazi an RPG fired from a high rise building (apparently by an Islamic terrorist) hit a ship in the government controlled port area and caused a fire on board.

November 5, 2014: Britain has begun flying home nearly 300 Libyan officer trainees before their 24 week training was completed. Five of the Libyans did not leave as they are being held on rape charges. Three of these Libyans are charged with raping women and two of raping a man. The Libyans had arrived in June and within a month locals were complaining of Libyans coming into nearby communities and behaving badly. This was not supposed to happen as the Libyans were selected to receive combat and leadership training so they could better train and command troops back in Libya. British authorities were surprised by the bad behavior and responded by ordering the Libyans restricted to the 80 hectare (200 acre) base where they lived and trained. In August this led to a mutiny among some of the Libyans after British officers in charge of the training put three of the trainees under guard after police picked them up for being off base without permission. Then twenty other trainees went and threatened the British soldier guarding the three Libyan trainees. The British guard let the three go free rather than risk violence. Senior officers were uncertain about how to handle this insubordination. The situation went downhill from there. The Libyans were not only undisciplined but also unreliable. They would agree to certain conditions (as in how they behaved towards civilians on and off the base, especially women) and then ignore those agreements. When confronted they would plead ignorance of British customs and refused to accept responsibility. The Libyans also constantly fought among themselves. Although depicting themselves as devout Moslems many of them would go to the village, get drunk and commit crimes. Some blamed the British for making alcohol too easy to obtain. The British tried to cope with all this by stationing hundreds of armed soldiers in nearby communities and on the base to prevent the Libyans from getting out of hand. This did not work either. At least twenty of the Libyans tried to apply for political asylum. This was denied after the rape incidents in late October and the decision was made to send all the Libyans home. The five in jail will face trial early next year. Not all the trainees misbehaved and some of them were hastily given a graduation ceremony even though the training was a few weeks short of completion. This group of Libyans, selected from many pro-government factions, gave Britons an up-close exposure to the kind of thinking and behavior that is tearing Libya apart.

November 6, 2014: In Tripoli the constitutional court declared invalid the June 25th vote that elected the parliament that currently operates in Tobruk. The Tobruk government rejected this and accused the judges of succumbing to pressure from Islamic terrorist militias that control Tripoli and often use intimidation to get their way.

November 9, 2014: In the east (Shahat) a bomb went off in the town near where the UN was hosting talks with officials from the Tobruk government. There were no injuries. In the west (Tripoli) a group of gunmen attacked a bank and stole $1.3 million.

November 12, 2014: In Tobruk two car bombs went off near the Oil Institute, killing three and wounding more than twenty. Another large explosion occurred at an air base near the eastern city of Bayda (controlled by the Tobruk government). This has disrupted commercial flights that now operate from that air base.

November 13, 2014: In Tripoli two car bombs went off near Egyptian and United Arab Emirates embassies. There were apparently no casualties. The embassies were boarded up and closed earlier this year.

November 14, 2014: Hiftar forces in Benghazi handed over nine Turks they had arrested in Benghazi two weeks ago. The Hiftar forces determined that the Turks were innocent of any crimes and were just in the wrong place at the wrong time. The Tobruk government was in the process of turning the Turks over to the Turkish government via the UN.

November 15, 2014: Despite the continued fighting in the east and attacks on some oil fields, oil shipments have continued. There have been some interruptions recently, but the national oil company has managed to cope and is still on schedule to get oil shipments up to a million barrels a day by the end of the year. That goal is threated by undisciplined factions technically allied with the Tripoli government who continue to fight over control of oil facilities even though this is counterproductive (these factions have no way to selling any oil they seize). Oil shipments peaked at 800,000 barrels a day in September but have since dropped to 500,000 a day. Pre -2011 shipments were three time that.

The battle for Benghazi continues. For over a month there has been heavy fighting as some Islamic terror groups refuse to leave the city and fight to the death. The pro-government forces of general Hiftar are using artillery, air power and armored vehicles to methodically kill the remaining Islamic terrorists in the city. A month of this sort of thing has created several thousand casualties, including over 400 dead. One the major side effects of all this fighting was the disruption of the normal activities in the city. As the largest city in Eastern Libya, Benghazi contained essential administrative and logistical (warehouses with key items like medical supplies) operations. The disruption caused by the fighting created shortages of medical supplies and interrupted administrative support for many oil facilities in the east. Everyone concerned had to scramble to make alternate arrangements.

In the southeast the army has another problem with the growing number of Islamic terrorist camps being set up in southwest Libya (where the borders of Libya, Algeria and Niger meet). Algeria and Niger are hard pressed to prevent all illegal crossings. As many Islamic terrorists are caught doing so, many more make it through. Malian Islamic terrorists from bases in southern Libya are now regularly moving south to carry out operations in northern Mali. All this is possible because of the Libyan civil war. That conflict is mainly up north along the coast and no one bothers with Islamic terrorists who only kill across the border in Mali. There is a similar problem in Afghanistan with Islamic terrorists operations from several sanctuary areas in neighboring Pakistan and Iran. French and American intelligence know a lot about all the illegal activity in southern Libya. UAVs and satellites reveal details of Islamic terrorist camps and convoys sneaking across the southern borders. Local spies and informants are used to obtain more detailed information and from that it is known that most of the armed men in the south are more intent on making money (usually smuggling guns, drugs or people) than Islamic terrorism. The big problem in southern Libya is that there is no law, aside from what little local tribal elders will hand out concerning tribal matters. The Libyan government has some security forces down there, but they are largely confined to the few towns in the desert area. The Tobruk government says it will deal with the lawless south as soon as it deals with a rival Islamic terrorist backed government in Tripoli.

Libya continues to come apart as a nation. The Tripoli and Tobruk governments have agreed to not interfere with oil operations, but the Tripoli government does not control all the Islamic terrorist groups that are technically under its command. Despite that there is a general understanding that the oil income, which the Tobruk government largely controls, buys essentials (like food) that will continue to be distributed to all Libyans. So far that seems to be working. This is what always mattered most because the oil money pays for everything. The cash from oil sales is going into the Central Bank, which tends to answer to the Tobruk parliament because that is the one with international recognition and that provides access to the international banking system. The various factions are pressuring the Central Bank and courts to favor them but it is the international community that controls the ability of Libya to buy essential (most of the food and everything else) needed to keep Libyans alive recognizes the Tobruck officials. That internationally recognized government set up shop in the small port city of Tobruk (1,600 kilometers east of Tripoli) after encountering hostility from militias loyal to the pre-June government. Many other government offices moved as well and are finding space where they can. The rebel governments in Tripoli and the Tobruk are fighting over who controls more than $100 billion held by the Central Bank. A lot of that cash is overseas and since Tobruk has international and UN support the Tripoli rebels are having a hard time maintaining control of any oil income. If the Tripoli government tries to sell oil on the black market they will have most of the world going after them with bank account shutdowns and seizure of the tankers they use (either in port or on the high seas). In the end, it's the oil money that will bring peace, or abject poverty for all. The government is running out of cash and credit. Another year or two of this and life gets very miserable for Libyans. The UN speaks of Libya has sliding into a state of anarchy. No one is willing to intervene militarily and the UN has constant problems with gangsters and Islamic terrorists attacking air efforts. This could end very badly.

The Tripoli government has support from Turkey, Sudan and Qatar while the Tobruk government has most of the world recognizing it, along with most of the Islamic world. This is especially true with neighboring Egypt and most of the Arab oil states. Egypt has proclaimed that it will not intervene militarily. While that is the official position Egypt is apparently providing substantial, and secret, support to the Hiftar forces. This comes in the form of air support, weapons and other military supplies and even some Egyptian special operations troops. A major concern of the Egyptians is the movement of weapons and Islamic terrorists into Egypt and there are a lot more Egyptian troops and police on the Libyan border in the past few months. What the Egyptians need is pro-Egypt forces controlling the Libyan side of the frontier. Thus the support for the Hiftar coalition, which arose in Eastern Libya as a coalition of Libyan Army units, tribal militias and anti-Islamic terrorist groups. Hiftar is now officially part of the Tobruk government armed forces.

Most Libyans are fed up with the continuing violence. The 2011 rebellion against Kadaffi left ove r 30,000 dead but the infighting since then has killed nearly as many. Most major factions agree on peace but Islamic terrorist groups in Tripoli and Benghazi, aided by tribal factions that want more power and money, continue to fight.

November 20, 2014: The UN negotiated a 12 hour ceasefire in Benghazi. This is mainly to allow remaining civilians to flee and for bodies to be collected for burial. The Islamic terrorist groups agree to this because they feel a religious obligation to give their dead comrades a proper Islamic funeral. Such ceasefires have been rare in Benghazi.

The UN added the major Islamic terrorist group in Libya (Ansar al Sharia) to its blacklist of international terrorists. All major nations (including Turkey, which supports some Islamic terrorist groups) agreed over the next week or so to enforce the UN ban. Being on the blacklist makes it more difficult for a group to operate internationally.

November 23, 2014: Malta joins the growing list of countries that have pulled their diplomats from Tripoli because of the growing violence.

December 1, 2014: The recent OPEC (Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries) meeting in Austria reaffirmed OPEC recognition of the Tobruk government. OPEC data also showed that Libyan oil income fell from $32 billion in 2013 to about $12 billion this year. This decline is a combination of less oil shipped (because of the growing violence) and the plunging (from $110 to under $70 per barrel) price of oil. Libya is currently producing 700,000 barrels a day, down from the pre-war 1.5 million. The official OPEC recognition of the Tobruk government makes it much more difficult for the Tripoli government to sell any oil it manages to get to a port.

There is still fighting in Tripoli, despite the Misrata militia taking control of the city after months of fighting. It was this control that made possible the establishment of a rival government in Tripoli. Many factions in the Misrata coalition believe this rival government is a mistake but so far the Misrata groups is sticking with it. Some of these factions are resorting to violence.

Elsewhere in the east (the coastal city of Derna) a local Islamic terrorist group (SCIY or Shura Council of Islamic Youth) that declared support for ISIL (Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant) in October is apparently now the official Libyan ISIL franchise. SCIY is not the only armed group in Derna (a city of about 150,000) but is trying to assert its authority and expand the territory it controls. This is good news for the Tobruk government because any ISIL affiliated Islamic terrorist militias will now suffer more international pressure as well as the need to attack other Islamic terrorist groups that have not declared for ISIL. SCIY has become a magnet for the most fanatic Islamic terrorist minded men in Libya and is gaining strength daily. There are now nearly a thousand SCIY men in the city and eventually there will have to be a deadly confrontation with them. Meanwhile the most dangerous aspect of SCIY is that ISIL level fanaticism means lots of suicide bombers are available and until SCIY is crushed there were be more of these types of attacks.

December 3, 2014: Libya continues to be divided. There are currently two governments and dozens of major tribal and Islamic terrorists factions that are largely autonomous. The Tripoli and Tobruk governments are far apart and represent different groups. The Tobruk government has international recognition and won the last (this year) national elections. The Tobruk government is backed by many tribal organizations (and their militias) and most of the more secular Libyans (who tend to live in cities or along the coast).

The Tripoli government is backed by groups with more of a religious motivation as well as tribes and cities in the west that feel they deserve to run the country (as they long did under Kaddafi). The Tripoli government does not control all the Islamic terrorist groups that are technically under its command.

The only thing the two governments will sometimes agree on is the use of oil income, which the Tobruk government largely controls, buys essentials (like food) that will continue to be distributed to all Libyans. This is what always mattered most because the oil money pays for everything. The cash from oil sales is going into the Central Bank, which tends to answer to the Tobruk parliament because that is the one with international recognition and that provides access to the international banking system. The various factions are pressuring the Central Bank and courts to favor them but it is the international community that controls the ability of Libya to buy essentials (most of the food and everything else) needed to keep Libyans alive and the international community recognizes the Tobruk officials. Because of the violent response by Tripoli based Islamic terrorist militias, the legitimate government set up shop in the small port city of Tobruk (1,600 kilometers east of Tripoli) after encountering hostility from militias loyal to the pre-June government that refused to recognize the results of the June elections. Many other government offices moved to Tobruk but many stayed or could not get out in time.

The rival governments in Tripoli and the Tobruk are also fighting over who controls more than $100 billion held by the Central Bank. A lot of that cash is overseas and since Tobruk has international and UN support the Tripoli rebels are having a hard time maintaining control of any oil income. If the Tripoli government tries to sell oil on the black market they will have most of the world going after them with bank account shutdowns and seizure of the tankers they use (either in port or on the high seas). In the end, it's the oil money that will bring peace, or abject poverty for all. The government is running out of cash and credit. Another year or two of this and life gets very miserable for Libyans. The UN speaks of Libya of sliding into a state of anarchy. No one is willing to intervene militarily and the UN has constant problems with gangsters and Islamic terrorists attacking aid efforts. This could end very badly.

The Tripoli government has support from Turkey, Sudan and Qatar while the Tobruk government has most of the world recognizing it, along with most of the Islamic world. This is especially true with neighboring Egypt and most of the Arab oil states. Egypt has proclaimed that it will not intervene militarily. While that is the official position Egypt is apparently providing substantial, and secret, support to the pro-Tobruk Hiftar coalition. This comes in the form of air support, weapons and other military supplies and even some Egyptian special operations troops. A major concern of the Egyptians is the movement of weapons and Islamic terrorists into Egypt and there are a lot more Egyptian troops and police on the Libyan border since the June elections. What the Egyptians need is pro-Egypt forces controlling the Libyan side of the frontier. Thus the support for the Hiftar forces, which arose in Eastern Libya as a coalition of Libyan Army units, tribal militias and anti -Islamic terrorist groups. General Hiftar and his coalition of tribal militias and army units is now officially part of the Tobruk government armed forces but still operates independently because the Tobruk is short of military experts and specialists capable of managing a military campaign. So is the Tripoli government and resulting lack of coordination among their armed components is another advantage the Tobruk government has.

Warplanes loyal to the Tobruk government bombed targets west of Tripoli that were believed involved with importing weapons and ammunition for forces loyal to the Tripoli government. At least four were killed and nearly twenty wounded. The Tobruk government has taken responsibility for all the recent air attacks on Tripoli. This was done in part to deal with rumors that foreign aircraft (from Egypt) were involved. Some of the air attacks have been on the Tripoli airport, which the Tobruk government believes is being used for military purposes.

Fighting continues in Benghazi with Hiftar forces continuing to slowly push Islamic terrorist groups out of the city. Nearly 500 have died and more than 2,000 wounded in eight weeks of fighting. Tobruk government forces continue to advance to the west along the coast and expand their control in the interior. Hiftar is a military professional and realizes that by keeping casualties low among his own forces he maintains an edge in morale and overall effectiveness.

The opposition continues to suffer heavy desertions and lack of coordination, which the Hiftar forces take advantage of.

The international recognition and anti-Islamic terrorist attitude appeals to most Libyans. Unfortunately many Libyans, especially the tribes in the south (where the oil is) want autonomy as well as more of the oil money. At the moment the various tribes rule the south and deals have to be made with each of them to keep oil operations going. Along the coast the Islamic terrorist groups have often made deals with local militias that are more interested in local autonomy than religious fanaticism. The problem with Libya is that most residents consider themselves Libyans but too many of them are not willing to cooperate to make the country work. More and more Libyans are realizing and accepting the fact that compromise and cooperation is necessary for all to prosper (or even survive) but widespread acceptance of this reality is happening very slowly. Most Libyans are fed up with the continuing violence. The 2011 rebellion against Kadaffi left over 30,000 dead but the infighting since then has killed nearly as many. Most major factions agree on peace but Islamic terrorist groups in Tripoli and Benghazi, aided by tribal factions that want more power and money, continue to fight.

December 3, 2014: Algeria is taking in seriously wounded Libyans. Since November 91 seriously wounded Libyans have been allowed to cross the border and receive medical treatment. Algeria has allowed thousands of Libyan refugees in as well. Taking the wounded is done in cooperation with Libyan medical organizations. Algeria has sealed itself off from the current civil war in Libya.

December 11, 2014: The EU (European Union) banned the seven Libyan airlines from operating in any of the 28 EU nations. This is in recognition of the chaos in Libya and the ability of Islamic terrorist groups to operate wherever they want in the country. Egypt imposed curbs on men age 18-40 travelling to Libya or Turkey. This is an effort to reduce the number of Egyptians from joining ISIL and other Islamic terrorist groups.

December 14, 2014: In the east (Benghazi) fighting against Islamic terrorists in that city led to the death of a well-known AQIM (Al Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb) leader and several of his followers. The presence of this AQIM leader in Benghazi apparently has to do with the recent split in AQIM as some factions broke away to support the more radical ISIL (Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant).

December 19, 2014: In Tripoli gunmen broke into the unoccupied residence compound of the Swiss ambassador but fled when police arrived in response to the alarm system. The Swiss closed their embassy in August. Police were aware of the gang that carried out the break in and soon caught up with them killing one of the criminals and wounding two others. The car and electronic devices stolen were recovered.

December 21, 2014: In Tripoli eight gunmen robbed a bank of $5 million in Libyan currency.

December 22, 2014: Egypt closed the Salloum border crossing, which is the main entry point for truck traffic from Egypt. The closing was at the request of the Tobruk government, which controls the Libyan side of the border at Salloum. The crossing was opened the next day and both countries have worked to increase scrutiny of those entering Libya. Many of those crossing who are not Libyan or Egyptian tend to be members (or those seeking to be) of Islamic terrorists groups. By denying the Islamic terrorists access to the major border crossing they must resort to the smuggling routes, which are more expensive, dangerous and time consuming.

December 22, 2014: Near the coastal city of Sirte (500 kilometers east of Tripoli and midway between Tripoli and Benghazi) militias from Tripoli have been trying to take two oil export ports (Ras Lanuf and Es Sider) since December

13th. Within a few days the invaders were a few kilometers from the oil ports but were stopped by defenders supported by artillery and air strikes. The attackers have refrained from using artillery or rocket launchers to damage these ports. Troops and militias loyal to the Tobruk government have so far kept the ports safe. The two export ports can ship 300,000 barrels a day but have been closed for a week and will remain shut down until the Tripoli force is defeated. The Tripoli government is backed by Islamic terrorist militias and is not recognized by the UN while the Tobruk government is. The Tripoli group apparently wants to take control of oil resources and thus have something to bargain with. Tripoli represents the minority of Libyans who want a religious dictatorship. The opposition, which won the last election (in June) have the backing of the international community but must win a civil war to really run the country. The oil is essential as is control over Libyan financial assets. Thus the rival governments in Tripoli and the Tobruk are also fighting over who controls more than $100 billion held (but rapidly dwindling) by the Central Bank. A lot of that cash is overseas and since Tobruk has international and UN support the Tripoli rebels are having a hard time gaining control of any oil income. If the Tripoli government tries to sell oil on the black market they will have most of the world going after them with bank account shutdowns and seizure of the tankers they use (either in port or on the high seas). In the end, it's the oil money that will bring peace, or abject poverty for all.

The government is running out of cash and credit. In the first eleven months of 2014 the government received only $15 billion (almost all of it from oil sales) versus $45 billion for the same period last year. The major problem here was the sharp drop in the sales price of oil (from $110 a barrel to $55) since 2013. Another year or two of this and life gets very miserable for Libyans. The UN speaks of Libya of sliding into a state of anarchy. No one is willing to intervene militarily. The Tripoli government is controlled by people who will not accept defeat and are willing to destroy the oil facilities to deny the Tobruk government victory. Some Tripoli leaders believe this threat may coerce the Tobruk government and their international supporters to support a compromise that will give the Islamic radicals more power than their numbers justify. That angers most Libyans who do not want to live in a country that, in effect, is forced to pay a portion of their national income to a bunch of terrorists. This could end very badly.

The Tripoli government has support from Turkey, Sudan and Qatar while the Tobruk government has most of the world recognizing it, along with most of the Islamic world. Turkey is under growing international pressure to support the Tobruk government and has so far responded by accusing its foreign critics of conspiring against Turkey. Turkey is also facing pressure from Egypt and most of the Arab oil states. Meanwhile no one is willing to intervene. While Egypt has proclaimed that it will not intervene militarily it is apparently providing substantial, and secret, support to the pro-Tobruk Hiftar coalition. This comes in the form of air support, weapons and other military supplies and even some Egyptian special operations troops. A major concern of the Egyptians is the movement of weapons and Islamic terrorists into Egypt and there are a lot more Egyptian troops and police on the Libyan border since the June elections. What the Egyptians need is pro-Egypt forces controlling the Libyan side of the frontier. Thus the support for the Hiftar forces, which arose in Eastern Libya as a coalition of Libyan Army units, tribal militias and anti -Islamic terrorist groups. General Hiftar and his coalition of tribal militias and army units is now officially part of the Tobruk government armed forces but still operates independently because the Tobruk is short of military experts and specialists capable of managing a military campaign. So is the Tripoli government and resulting lack of coordination among their armed components is another advantage the Tobruk government has.

The United States and the UN are trying to persuade Egypt, the UAE (United Arab Emirates) and Qatar to drop their support for more secular (and non-terrorist) pro-Tobruk factions fighting in Libya. The UN is sponsoring peace talks in Libya but Egypt sees this as futile and counterproductive because the Islamic terrorist factions really have no interest in compromising. Nevertheless Algeria and most Western nations (especially the EU) see a negotiated settlement as the best way to deal with the Libya civil war. The Tobruk government is going along with this, mainly because they cannot afford to annoy the UN. The Tripoli government is less eager to negotiate, in part because some of their factions are hard core Islamic terrorists and not inclined to compromise.

The countries who are most concerned about the chaos in Libya are the African ones to the south (the semi-desert Sahel region). They are threatened by Islamic terrorists groups who have been free to establish bases and training camps in southern Libya. From there Islamic terrorists move men and material in and out of neighboring countries. While Algeria, Tunisia and Egypt have large and effective security forces to deal with this, the African nations to the south (especially Mali, Niger and Chad) are much less well equipped to handle the Islamic terrorists coming in from Libya. In response France and the U.S. have sent several thousand troops and lots of cash to the endangered African nations, but this does not stop the invasion of Libya based Islamic terrorists, it simply helps to limit the damage they do. Meanwhile Islamic terrorist supported and protected smugglers move cocaine (flown into West Africa from South America) and other drugs into Libya and eventually to Europe while weapons (at least 20,000 assault rifles, machine-guns, RPG launchers, mortars) stolen from Kaddafi era warehouses have gone south so far and more continue doing so.

The international recognition and anti-Islamic terrorist attitude of the Tobruk government appeals to most Libyans. Unfortunately many Libyans, especially the tribes in the south (where the oil is) want autonomy as well as more of the oil money. At the moment the various tribes rule the south and deals have to be made with each of them to keep oil operations going. Along the coast the Islamic terrorist groups have often made deals with local militias that are more interested in local autonomy than religious fanaticism. The problem with Libya is that most residents consider themselves Libyans but too many of them are not willing to cooperate to make the country work. More and more Libyans are realizing and accepting the fact that compromise and cooperation is necessary for all to prosper (or even survive) but widespread acceptance of this reality is happening very slowly. Most Libyans are fed up with the continuing violence. The 2011 rebellion against Kadaffi left over 30,000 dead but the infighting since then has killed nearly as many. Most major factions agree on peace but Islamic terrorist groups in Tripoli and Benghazi, aided by tribal factions that want more power and money, continue to fight.

Fighting continues in Benghazi with Hiftar forces continuing to slowly push Islamic terrorist groups out of the city. Some Islamic terrorist groups are fighting to the death in the few Benghazi neighborhoods they still hold, including areas near the port. This has forced aid shipments to unload at the port of Tobruk until the one in Benghazi is safe again. Over 500 have died and more than 2,000 wounded in three months of fighting.

Tobruk government forces continue to advance to the west along the coast and expand their control in the interior. Many tribal militias and nearly all army units are willing to work with Hiftar, who is a military professional and realizes that by keeping casualties low among his own forces he maintains an edge in morale and overall effectiveness. So during the last week or two casualties in Benghazi have been low (10-20 a day). The opposition continues to suffer heavy desertions and lack of coordination, which the Hiftar forces take advantage of. This reduction in Islamic terrorist presence in Benghazi led to the reopening of police stations and government offices in Benghazi over the last two weeks. As the Hiftar forces clear a neighborhood and people move back in one of the first things done is to establish a self-defense force (if only to call for armed help) and a police presence. The Tobruk forces, in part because of their UN recognition, work more closely and effectively with foreign aid organizations.

While Tripoli forces are attacking oil facilities in the east, Tobruk forces, controlled by general Hiftar, have seized portions of the Tunisian border including the key crossing at Ras Ajdir.

Not only is Libya losing oil income it is losing the people who can use it most efficiently. For example India has gotten some 3,000 of its citizens out of Libya so far. This is important because many of those Indians are highly trained medical and other technical personnel. So far over 200,000 foreign workers, who do a lot of the technical work and some of the harshest manual jobs have left. After 2011 it was difficult to restore government services and the economy because of corruption and a shortage of skilled foreign workers. Like all oil-rich Arab states, Libya depended on skilled foreigners for key technical jobs and unskilled foreigners for the dirty jobs no Libyan wanted to do (garbage collection and hard labor in general). Countries are unwilling to allow their citizens to return until the Libyans can assure the safety of the foreign workers. Some foreign workers hold. At the moment, foreign companies have to make deals with local militias and keep lots of cash returned after 2012 relying for safety on the assurances of the company or local government they are working for. That changed this year when the civil war broke out in August. Plans to change Kaddafi-era banking and business laws to allow foreign companies to invest in and set up operations in Libya are also on handy for bribes and "security" thus there is very little foreign investment, or foreigners themselves.

In the south (Jufra) a convoy of Islamic terrorists attacked an army checkpoint and killed 17 soldiers. The Islamic terrorist bases in the south are turning out more armed and trained (often minimally) men who are being sent out to drive the army and pro-government tribal militias away from the few roads, so the Islamic terrorists can freely move to and from the coast.

December 25, 2014: Islamic terrorists in speedboats attacked the oil storage tanks at the port of Es Sider, setting several of them on fire with RPG rockets. The attack also left 22 soldiers dead. It would eventually take nine days to bring the fires under control. Tobruk officials accused Sudan of backing the Islamic terrorist group the made the attack.

In the west (Sirte, 500 kilometers east of Tripoli), the 13 year old daughter of two Egyptian Christians (both doctors) was found dead. She had been taken on the 23rd when gunmen invaded her home, killed her parents and kidnapped her. Two younger sisters were left behind. The attackers were believed to be Islamic terrorists, who have been increasingly violent against everyone, especially non-Moslems. Many skilled Egyptians go to Libya for work, but that is less of an option now that Islamic terrorists have turned the country into a sanctuary for all manner of outlaw behavior

December 27, 2014: In Tripoli a car bomb went off outside the headquarters of the force assigned to protect the few foreign diplomats still stationed in the city. ISIL claimed responsibility for the attack, meant to discourage any non-Moslem foreigners from remaining in Libya. There aren’t many, most of them working for the UN. ISIL considers the UN an enemy of Islam.

December 29, 2014: The Libyan Air Force began daily air attacks on militias based in Misrata.

December 30, 2014: A Libyan Air Force jet shot down a pro-Tripoli helicopter that was being used to attack oil facilities in Es Sider. This was the second such helicopter shoot down recently.

In Tobruk a suicide car bomb went off outside parliament, wounding a few people. This attack was believed to have been planned in the ISIL controlled town of Derna.

In the south (Jufra) a convoy of Islamic terrorists attacked an army checkpoint and killed 17 soldiers. The Islamic terrorist bases in the south are turning out more armed and trained (often minimally) men who are being sent out to drive the army and pro-government tribal militias away from the few roads, so the Islamic terrorists can freely move to and from the coast.

How Bad Was Libyan Leader Muammar Muammar Al-Quadhafi?

(AFRICAN LEADERSHIP MAGAZINE BLOG September 16, 2015)

While the world celebrates Al-Quadhafi's downfall and removal, the response across Africa is more muted. Could that be because we always saw through the Western media's propaganda, even while acknowledging the man's deep flaws?

This is one of those cases where the Western view is slightly at odds with the African view, and I write this aware of the dangers of making sweeping generalisations. It's hard to believe now, but Libya in the 1950s and early 60s was pro-Western, and the Western media absolutely loved it. Then Al-Quadhafi seized power in September 1969, shut the American and British bases and partly nationalised the foreign oil and commercial interests.

He then made a point of praising and supporting anyone the Americans and Brits didn't approve of: Japanese Red army, the IRA, Palestinian groups, Idi Amin, the Soviet Union, and so on. American and British media reacted by demonising and ridiculing Al-Quadhafi every chance it got, and helped people in the West form their opinions of him as this camel-riding lunatic in the desert.

The United States of Africa

But, while Quadhafi was ruling Libya with an iron fist, eliminating all political opposition and restricting the lives of Libyans, he was also doing more for the country than many African leaders (democratically-elected or otherwise) ever did for theirs. Sure, we in Africa know, too, that it's time for the dude to go — even while dreaming of a United States of Africa he was quite divisive in his relations with the rest of the continent, and from time to time he expelled black Africans en masse from Libya and encouraged xenophobia against them — but we're also very aware that the average Libyan has had it better than the average citizens of most other African countries due to his leadership.

He always supported SWAPO in Namibia and the ANC in the dark days of South Africa [Mandela visited Libya to thank him almost as soon as he came out of prison]. And, it has to be said, you will not be hated in Africa if, as a leader, you have the guts to say up yours to America, the UK or France, and that's what Quadhafi did for 4 decades. For these reasons the feelings of many of us towards him are nowhere near as strong as those people in the West have been encouraged to develop by their media.

Here's the BBC on what he also did:

During Muammar Al-Quadhafi's 42-year rule, Libya has made great strides socially and economically thanks to its vast oil income, but tribes and clans continue to be part of the demographic landscape.

Women in Libya are free to work and to dress as they like, subject to family constraints. Life expectancy is in the seventies. And per capita income – while not as high as could be expected given Libya's oil wealth and relatively small population of 6.5m – is estimated at $12,000 (£9,000), according to the World Bank.

You have the guts to say 'up yours' to America

Illiteracy has been almost wiped out, as has homelessness – a chronic problem in the pre-Quadhafi era, where corrugated iron shacks dotted many urban centres around the country. – Libya crisis: what role do tribal loyalties play? BBC

Monitoring, 21st February, 2011Compare Libya's country profile with any other in sub-Saharan Africa and you'll see that this guy, unlike too many of the crap leaders the continent has endured in the last few decades, didn't just say "fuck you" to his people.

Compare Libya's GDP per capita ($12K+) with countries like Nigeria ($1K+) or Botswana, probably the most stable "democracy" in Africa at $6K+. Democracy

Did the reign of Muammar Gaddafi have any benefits?

Paul G. Kingsley General Secretary Updated May 10

Actually, yes. He did greatly develop Libya, and he did provide many things for ordinary Libyans.

Gaddafi was not perfect (I have my criticisms of him), but whatever excuse of a government that replaced it is terrible for ordinary Libyans. Of course, American imperialist monopolists and bankers think otherwise, since the fall of Gaddafi benefited them.

Edit: This is not a “left/right” issue. I have seen “leftists” (i.e. “radical” liberals) who defended the imperialist ousting of Qaddafi, and I have seen rightists (usually either libertarians or paleoconservatives) who have opposed the overthrow of that leader. This issue is an interventionist/non-interventionist issue.

Eric Arbib former Customs Specialist (1992-2016) Answered March 18

MUAMMAR GADDAFI WAS NOT A KING. HE WAS A JOUNG MAJOR IN THE

LIBYAN ARMY WHO ROSE TO POWER AFTER THE LIBYAN REVOLUTION OF

THE 1ST OF SEPTEMBER 1969. I WE BASE OURSELVES TO THE NORMAL

HISTORY, IT IS TO EARLY TO STRICK A PROPER JUDGMENT ABOUT THE

SO CALLED “JAMAHIRYA” OF GADDAFI. THE RULE OF THE MASSES BECAME A

CONFUSED SORT OF GOVERNMENT THAT MADE THE LIBYAN PEOPLE HATE THE COLONEL.THE PLAIN TRUTH IS ANOTHER: THE COLONEL GOVERNED LIBYA

UNDER AN IRON FIST FOR 42 YEARS,WHEN HE CAME TO POWER THERE WERE

LESS THAN 40% OF PEOPLE THAT KNEW TO READ AND WRITE. THE LIFE

EXPECTANCY WAS LESS THAN 65 YEARS. WHEN HE WAS KILLED THERE WERE ALREADY MORE THAN HALF A MILLION OF LIBYANS WHO HAD ACADEMIC DEGREE OF VARIOUS TYPE, THE LIFE EXPECTANCY ROSE TO 73 YEARS, HE BUILT

THOUSANDS OF KILOMETERS OF GOOD ROADS, A LOT OF HOSPITALS,

FULL OF APARTMENTS.IN THE POEM “IL 5 MAGGIO” BY ALESSANDRO MANZONI

SPEAKING ABOUT THE LIFE OF NAPOLEON THE 1ST BONAPARTE HE CONCLUDES

BY ASKING, WAS IT REAL GLORY?THE FUTURE GENERATIONS WILL GIVE THE HARD ANSWER.I THINK THAT THE MOST HONEST ANSWER ABOUT GADDAFI CAN ONLY

BE THE SAME, AND BELIEVE ME, I, AS A FORMER JEW OF LIBYA, WAS A VICTIM OF HIM AND OF THE FORMER KING, THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THEM WAS VERY.

TOUCHABLE. THE KING WAS A MAN OF BIG RELIGION , BUT HAVING NO SIGHT OF THE FUTURE. THE REAL PROBLEM IS THAT TODAY, 10 YEARS AFTER THE ARAB SPRING, LIBYA WENT BACK NOT TO 1969, BUT MAYBE 1945.THE COUNTRY IS IN COMPLETE SHAMBLES.

Dong-Yoon Lee Interested in international relations for 30 years
Answered March 21

Gaddafi was a very good leader for his country. When the wealth he brought created middle class pubic of some size, according the common pattern of democracy, middle class public demanded more political freedom. But into old age, Gaddafi’s judgment was blurred and he made the wrong choice. If he had to raise a more democratic heir earlier, prepared for his abdication, and retired at the time of the demands of the middle class, he would have remained an immortal hero. However, he rejected the demand for democratization, fired at his own people and attacked them with fighter aircraft.

In response, the UN intervened in accordance with the R2P principle established in 2005. The R2P principle is the principle of disregarding sovereignty and intervening by another when a civilian dies unjustly in one country. This is probably the principle achieved by seeing the situation where the government collapsed in Somalia when it was neglected and it became a place of pirates and a hell of the inhabitants. At that time, military intervention in Libya was mainly carried out by nearby European countries.

However, the European nations took the direction of completely disintegrating the tyranny Gaddafi forces through rebels rather than intervening into the situation with their ground forces. As a result, the central government to maintain order in Libya disappeared, and a state of quasi-civil war was established.

The lesson to be learned from this is that when a tyranny government kills its people in order to protect its interests, it must restrain or punish only the leading people as much as possible, and maintain the central government's function of maintaining order. To do this, the UN peacekeepers must deploy a considerable amount of ground forces and never get the help of their rebels. The solution to the problem should be to stop the slaughter and not be the complete collapse of the state's order-keeping ability.

Related Links

Was Libya better under the rule of Gaddafi?
Why was Muammar Gaddafi hated?
What crimes did Muammar Gaddafi actually commit?
Do Libyans regret killing Muammar Gaddafi?
What were some good things that the libyan dictator Muammar Gaddafi did?
How did Muammar Gaddafi come to power?

is not always the solution; sometimes it's nothing more than a money-wasting farce.

Al-Quadhafi was a dictator, he supported many questionable cause and held on to power for too long, and it is best that he goes now, but while we celebrate his removal let's not completely erase our memories of what else he did, or forget why many of us were also, from time to time, rather proud of him, frustrating as he may have been.
Source: This Africa

LEADERSHIP:
Top 10 Good Things About Muammar Gaddafi They Don't Want You to Know

What do you think of when you hear the name Colonel Gaddafi? Tyrant? Dictator? Terrorist? Well, a national citizen of Libya may disagree but we want you to decide.

For 41 years until his demise in October 2011, Muammar Gaddafi did some truly amazing things for his country and repeatedly tried to unite and empower the whole of Africa.

So despite what you've heard on the radio, seen in the media or on the TV, Gaddafi did some powerful things that are not characteristic of a "vicious dictator" as portrayed by the western media.

Here are ten things Gaddafi did for Libya that you may not know about… In Libya a home is considered a natural human right

In Gaddafi's Green Book it states: "The house is a basic need of both the individual and the family, therefore it should not be owned by others". Gaddafi's Green Book is the formal leader's political philosophy, it was first published in 1975 and was intended reading for all Libyans even being included in the national curriculum.

2. Education and medical treatment were all free for all Libyans

Under Gaddafi, Libya could boast one of the best healthcare services in the Middle East and Africa. Also if a Libyan citizen could not access the desired educational course or correct medical treatment in Libya they were funded to go abroad.

3. He carried out the world's largest man made River & irrigation project

The largest irrigation system in the world also known as the great manmade river was designed to make water readily available to all Libyan's across the entire country. It was funded by the Gaddafi

The gold dinar: a groundbreaking initiative: The Real Reason Behind Gaddafi's Murder

May 3, 2019

In 2009, Colonel Gaddafi, then President of the African Union, suggested to the States of the African continent to switch to a new currency, independent of the American dollar: the gold dinar.

The objective of this new currency was to divert oil revenues towards state-controlled funds rather than American banks. In other words, to stop using the dollar for oil transactions. Countries such as Nigeria, Tunisia, Egypt and Angola were ready to change their currencies. Unfortunately in March 2011, the NATO-led coalition began a military intervention in Libya in the name of freedom….

Free water, almost free gasoline, free health system and free education were commonplace for Libyans under Gaddafi's dictatorship.

The leader, who has been in power for 41 years, has managed to gain the support of all the major tribes and buy social peace through radical measures and a policy of shared oil revenues.

Jihadism, the number one enemy of the West, Gaddafi eliminated it with Napalm in the 1990s. Although he financed many armed groups in the Sahel, Libya itself was a stable country where the risk of being kidnapped or even murdered by an armed militia was non-existent.

With an excellent management of oil revenues, the Libyan state had managed to store hundreds of tons of gold (143 tons according to WikiLeaks) and the same amount in silver. All these resources were going to make Libya the most influential country in Africa, supplanting France for example.

Gaddafi wanted to avoid American influence in his oil transactions by using this gold. He launched the gold dinar project, and other major African governments were ready to support him in this project. It was both an African dream and a nightmare for the West's financial system.

The end of the African dream

This information was discovered through Hillary Clinton's electronic mailbox. One of the 3000 emails showed NATO's willingness to overthrow Gaddafi's government. NATO mainly wanted to to neutralize the African gold currency supported by Libyan oil reserves.

At the beginning of March, the Libyan army and the many militias loyal to the government had already crushed the rebellion, thanks to their numbers and equipment. However, with Western intervention, the dream of a unified monetary system based on gold and independent of the dollar

Who is the most misunderstood historical figure?

Anthony Anderson Student

Muammar Gaddafi

perished…Come and check our website Millenium State !

government and it said that Gaddafi himself called it ”the eighth wonder of the world”.

4. It was free to start a farming business

If any Libyan wanted to start a farm they were given a house, farm land and livestock and seeds all free of charge.

5. A bursary was given to mothers with newborn babies

When a Libyan woman gave birth she was given 5000 (US dollars) for herself and the child.

6. Electricity was free

Electricity was free in Libya meaning absolutely no electric bills!

7. Cheap petrol

During Gaddafi’s reign the price of petrol in Libya was as low as 0.14 (US dollars) per-litre.

8. Gaddafi raised the level of education

Before Gaddafi only 25% of Libyans were literate. This figure was brought up to 87% with 25% earning university degrees.

9. Libya had its own state bank

10. The West Planned it all

There is a clear growing conspiracy theory and belief that America planned all these, now Africans are starting to believe this.

Bonus: The gold dinar

Before the fall of Tripoli and his untimely demise, Gaddafi was trying to introduce a single African currency linked to gold. Following in the footsteps of the late great pioneer Marcus Garvey who first coined the term ”United States of Africa”. Gaddafi wanted to introduce and only t rade in the African gold Dinar – a move which would have thrown the world economy into chaos.

The Dinar was widely opposed by the ‘elite’ of today’s society and who could blame them. African nations would have finally had the power to bring itself out of debt and poverty and only trade in this precious commodity. They would have been able to finally say ‘no’ to external exploitation and charge whatever they felt suitable for precious resources. It has been said that the gold Dinar was the real reason for the NATO led rebellion, in a bid to oust the outspoken leader.

So, was Muammar Gaddafi a Terrorist?

Few can answer this question fairly, but if anyone can, it’s a Libyan citizen who has lived under his reign? Whatever the case, it seems rather apparent that he did some positive things for his country despite the infamous notoriety surrounding his name. And that’s something you should try to remember when judging in future. (Text ends)

He was the second leader of libya and was a pan africanist. He is the most misunderstood figure as he was called a terrorist and a murderer but in reality, he wasn't a terrorist and a murderer. The western media portrayed him in a negative way.

The west used to call Gaddafi a murderer and a terrorist.

In reality, Gaddafi was a pan Africanist and he was loved by the majority of the Libyan population. The majority of the Africans loved him because of his pan Africanist ambition to unite Africa into one country.

Here are the good things what Gaddafi did and the all whole was surprised about:

He implemented free healthcare, education and electricity in Libya.
He built the largest irrigation system in the world. He wanted to introduce the gold dinar as the currency for all of Africa.
He implemented free housing, especially those who graduated from college or university.

He made Libya into one of the prosperous and richest countries in Africa.
He had a pan Africanist ambition and wanted to create the united states of Africa.

Made Libya into a self-sufficient country.

Related Links

Which famous person in history who is idolized, was actually a horrible person?
Who are some of the most unjustly hated historical figures?
Which historical figure is overrated?
Which historical figures died the best?
Who are some of the most morally complex historical figures?
What historical figure has an unjustified reputation?

What is the most disturbing thing you have ever seen?
Anthony Anderson Writes about life experiences Oct 24

Warning ⚠️! This answer contains graphic images

The most disturbing thing that I have seen is the brutal killing of Muammar Gaddafi

This makes me angry everytime. Muammar Gaddafi was a second leader of Libya from 1 September 1969 until his death in 20 October 2011 during the first Libyan civil war. He was a pan Africanist icon during his rule as he wanted to unite all of Africa and introduce a gold dinar as the new currency for the continent.

Muammar Gaddafi was killed by the National Transitional Council rebels in Sirte on 20 October 2011. It is known that France, America and most of its allies took part in the assassination of Gaddafi as they knew that he might create a united Africa where western powers would no longer meddle and plunder Africa's natural resources. They also had killed Gaddafi killed as he wanted to introduce a gold dinar as the new currency for Africa.

The Killing of Muammar Gaddafi makes me very upset and it was a war crime. Africa in fact shouldn't be used as a proxy arena between the west and the east particularly Russia.

Gaddafi died on the same day when he was captured and his body was taken in Misurata for the Libyan population to view it

On 25 October 2011, his body was buried in an unmarked grave in the desert.

The killing of Muammar Gaddafi makes me feel like I want to cry everytime I think about him. I cried about it in June this year and I couldn't tell my parents about it. May he rest in peace Gaddafi.

Related Links

What is the most horrifying death ever caught on camera?
What are the creepiest pictures you have seen?
What is the most disturbing thing you have allowed someone to do to you?
Who was the most disturbed child you have ever seen?
As a psychologist, who is the most disturbing individual you have ever met?

Why do Africans love brutal dictators like Muammar Gaddafi and Thomas Sankara?

Yihun Endeshaw Lives in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia

It is really inaccurate and bad judgment to consider Muammar Gaddafi and Thomas Sankara as "Brutal Dictators" in the first place.

Ask yourself the question why Libya is now in absolute chaos ?

The intervention to overthrow Gaddafi was a long-term regional destabilization strategy for the whole group in the Middle East.

Throughout Gaddafi's tenure, ambitious social programs were launched in the areas of education, health, housing, public works and subsidies for electricity and basic foodstuffs.

By the time of his killing, Libya had the highest GDP per capita and life expectancy on the continent. Fewer people lived below the poverty line than in the Netherlands.

Check out Famous Politician Michael Parenti's testimony about Col. Gaddafi.

Related Links
Why do some Africans celebrate, and see Gaddafi as a good man? That man was a tyrant and dictator, who refused to leave power. Shouldn't Africa be thanking the West for helping remove one of their dictators?
Why was Muammar Gaddafi hated?
What do African people think about Thomas Sankara?
Was Muammar Gaddafi a dictator?
Why was Thomas Sankara killed?
Why is Thomas Sankara considered a hero today?
What did do and would Burkinafaso be different had he been alive today?
Do Libyans miss Muammar Gaddafi?
Do Libyans regret killing Muammar Gaddafi?
What were some good things that the libyan dictator Muammar Gaddafi did?
Was Muammar Gaddafi a hero?

How are Sub-Saharan Africans treated in Libya?

By Nasir Ben Marley

Well , they treat some people really badly . Usually people who want to go to Europe and they go through from Libya , so passing from Libya some Libyans take advantage of them . They basically do anything they want to they rape them , treat them like their slaves , and they take all their money by telling them they are helping them to go to Europe with their ships . I know some kind of discriminations are everywhere on this planet and these Africans who go looking for a better life don't really know this discrimination in Libya until they reached there they see hell . Many people went Europe through Libya in Gaddafi's days but since kadhafi's gone in chaos in Libya. Some Libyans sell people on contract as slaves to work for 2 years or 4 years etc … without any payment. Lots of them end up committed suicide and some run away . This country is really crazy these days. The country was so good and the people were the nicest people I've ever met . But these day they are really frustrated and sad , sometimes they don't even know what they are doing because they never ever know their country like that from so damn rich people to so poor people , before they didn't buy anything even medicin or house or car etc… at 18yo government will give you a job and anything you want now they are paying everything they own. They never know that lifestyle . I think Libyans are not handling the dramatic change so they do a lot of bad stuff . I know it doesn't cover this discrimination of course , but before it wasn't like that !

Related Links

How does Nigeria experience an increase in GDP and there is still inflation?

What is it like to have a Nigerian passport?

What do you know about Nigeria and Nigerians?

What are the available jobs in Sango Otta, Nigeria?

What factor limits the size of indigenous firms in West Africa?

What is really the issue with Igbos and other Nigerian tribes?

What are the best political solutions to the problem happening in Nigeria currently?

Similarities and differences between Lagos and Abuja?

What are the various roles of the Nigerian associate of craftsmen?

How can Nigeria overcome insecurities?

What are the pros and cons of military interventions in any African state?

How do I advertise my solar business?

What surprising discovery about a famous person completely changed the way you saw them?

Chukwuebuka Sunday

Updated July 12, 2020 Originally Answered: What surprising discovery about a famous person completely changed the way you saw him/her?

Muammar Gaddafi

He had been called a tyrant, a dictator, a terrorist and some other terrible names.

He was that popular and controversial African leader that was killed in a drainage canal in 2011.

Colonel Gaddafi led the country of Libya over four decades.

He may have been a terrible leader but some articles I stumbled upon changed my perspective about this man. Under his reign :

The GDP per capita of Libya in 2010 was 12064.8 USD . It was 7529 USD in 2018.
Nursing mother was given 5000 (US dollars) for herself and the child.
There were no electric bills as it was completely free.
A house, farm land, livestock and seeds were given free of charge to those who wanted to start farming . Education and medical treatment were absolutely free.
Generous subsidies were given for weddings, housing and car purchase.
Now Libyans have to pay full price for everything.
He built the largest irrigation system in the world recognized as “the eighth wonder of the world” its purpose was to supply water to all Libyans across the country.
His last words to his killers were “ what did I do to you?”

Was he really a terrible leader or were the people tired of him?
I created a closely knit space , ONLY for pet lovers and animal enthusiasts.
Follow only if you have such interests Pets and animals' world

Related Links

What does it feel like to date a famous person?

Have you ever dated a famous person and discovered they were completely opposite of what you thought?

Are celebrities friendlier when you pretend not to know them?

What is the most up close and personal you've gotten with a famous person?

What is the stingiest thing that you have seen a celebrity do?

Have you ever met a celebrity for second time and been surprised that they remembered/recognized you?

For holidays in Africa, which country would you prefer and why?

At the mention of a Country, I have lost many poetry jobs and many works because I am a Nigerian and no one wants to work with me because I am a Nigerian, what can I do so I won't drop out of school since I lost many jobs?

Which bank is the first bank in Nigeria?

Who has been the strangest world leader of the last five decades?

Pavel Fekula Interested in History July 14

Originally Answered: Who has been the most bizarre world leader of the last five decades?

I know the US government obviously didn't like Libyan strongman Muammar Gadaffi, but he was really one of the most colorful leaders of the last half century. I don't have the time to do a full write up on the guy, but the long and short of it is that throughout the latter part of the Cold War, he advocated a 3rd road between the US and Soviet Union that really pissed off the US government. Even after he took over ruling Libya, he continued to eschew the luxuries of the palace, preferring to spend his nights in a Bedouin tent in the palace compound.

Related Links

Who is the worst leader in the world right now, and why?

What is the strangest act carried out by a world leader?

Who is the most overrated world leader?

Academically speaking, who is the most qualified political leader in the world at the moment?

Who is/was the most incompetent world leader in history?

Who was the best ruler/leader of your country and why?

What surprising discovery about a famous person completely changed the way you saw them?

Former Strategic analyst and Planner at Freelancers (2007–2019) Updated June 8

Although I never liked him, Muammar Gaddafi was BLACK PANTHER OF AFRICA. He could have rolled the entire continent in riches. Whites would have been serving African people. Alas, Africa will never be the same again.

His personal space was quite obnoxious but he did many many many good things for his people and for his country. For example, take a look at the largest artificial water canal that supplied water to the arid region of Libya.

The Great Man-Made River (GMMR, الـ صـ ناعي رهنلا fo krowten a si (الـ عظ يم pipes that supplies fresh water obtained from the Nubian Sandstone Aquifer System fossil aquifer across Libya. It is the world's largest irrigation project.[1] The project utilizes a pipeline system that pumps water from the Nubian Sandstone Aquifer System from down south in Libya to cities in the populous Libyan northern Mediterranean coast including Tripoli and Benghazi. The water covers a distance of up to 1,600 kilometers and provides 70% of all freshwater used in Libya.

What makes Libya worse now than before when Gaddafi was in power?

Yiannis Papadopoulos

Following Global Politics Updated December 16, 2019

You mean besides living in a state of anarchy without a government of any type, without any sort of investment to create (legal) jobs?

Besides not being able to travel from one city to the next without armed escort?

Besides living (mostly) without any type of "luxury" utilities like electricity, running water and waste disposal?

Besides being in a position where you may catch a stray bullet or a bomb fragment through no personal action or inaction?

Besides illegal arms trade and slave trade and people smuggling?

Source: Libya Slave Trade, a Heinous Modern Day Slave Auction - Los Angeles Sentinel

Gee… I really wonder too…
Related Links

Why do some Africans celebrate, and see Gaddafi as a good man? That man was a tyrant and dictator, who refused to leave power. Shouldn't Africa be thanking the West for helping remove one of their dictators?

Are there any Libyans here? I would like to ask whether electricity was really free in Gaddafi's regime?

Why do so many people believe that Gaddafi did good for Libya?

Was Libya better under the rule of Gaddafi?

Do you think Mummar Gaddafi's socialism worked?

When and why did the West turn on Muammar Gadaffi?

Did Muammar Gaddafi speak Italian?

Salwa Halabia Syrian-American Nov 17

Born to Arabized Berbers, Mu'ammar Mohammed Abu Minyar al-Gaddafi belonged to the semi-nomadic small al-Gadafa clan from the central Libyan coast near Qasr Abu Hadi, a rural area outside the town of Sirte in the deserts of Tripolitania, western Libya. He attended schools in Sirte, Sabha, Misrata, and the Benghazi military academy, where he met and joined would-be revolutionaries as their leader.

File: Muammar al-Gaddafi at the AU summit.jpg - Wikipedia

Italians in colonial Libya were concentrated on the coast around Tripoli where they constituted 37% of the city's population, and Benghazi at 31% of the population. In 1938, the Italian colonial Governor Balbo brought 20,000 Italian farmers to colonize Libya, and 26 new villages were founded for them, mainly in Cyrenaica.

Mu’ammar Gaddafi spoke Libyan Arabic and English certainly. I find no information stating whether he spoke or understood Italian although it’s very likely he may have because the Italian language was a popular language in Libya and served as the language of commerce along with English and French. He went to school near many Italian areas being on the coast, and he visited Italy as a monarch, therefore one might hypothesize it is possible. He may have also understood some Berber languages also but they were not recognized by his government as he felt these languages divided Libya.

Interestingly enough, Libya's former Head of State Mu’ammar Gaddafi denied the existence of Berbers as a separate ethnicity and called Berbers a "product of colonialism" created by the West to divide Libya. The Berber languages (Awjilah, Tamasheq, Nafusi, Ghadamès, and others) were not recognized or taught in schools, and for years it was forbidden in Libya to give children Berber names.

Domari, Turkish, and Tedaga are also spoken to a lesser extent in Libya.

By CIA map [1], traced by xyzzynThis W3C-unspecified vector image was created with Inkscape . - Traced from Map No. 501564., Public Domain
File: Libya ethnic.svg - Wikimedia Commons

Related Links

Why was Muammar Gaddafi hated?

What made Gaddafi a great leader of Libya?

What crimes did Muammar Gaddafi actually commit?

What are some insane facts about Muammar Gaddafi?

Do Libyans regret killing Muammar Gaddafi?

Did the reign of Muammar Gaddafi have any benefits?

Is there any Libyan here? I would like to ask whether electricity was really free in Gaddafi's regime?

Why did Gaddafi never promote himself above the rank of colonel?

Why do so many Italians view Muammar Gaddafi as a great leader?

Was Muammar Gaddafi a dictator?

What happened to the Italians in Libya during the rise of Gaddafi?

What do Libyans think about Gaddafi?

What are some facts about Muammar Gaddafi known by very less people?

Lahore's cricket stadium is named after Muammar Gaddafi. Why?

Do Libyans miss Muammar Gaddafi?

That most Africans are poor, not because they really are poor, but because someone decides to describe them as such.

Innocent Masengo

, Lecturer Language and Communication at Makerere University (2008-present)

Updated Aug 23, 2020 · Upvoted by

Abhiishek Suresh

, former Engineering Intern at Facts and Trivia (2010) and Satheeshkumar. D

, Master of Science Geography & General Knowledge, University of Madras (2014)
My grandfather is ‘poor’. He certainly lives on “less than a dollar a day”. He is now 95 years old. In his nine and a half decades on earth, he has never lacked, and he has never begged. He only attended one year at a mission school in the 1930s and learnt how to read and write. This is how he pulls it off:

When he wants food, he goes to the banana plantation, looks at tens of bunches of matooke (banana) and decides which to harvest for the day’s dinner. Adjacent to the plantation is a sweet potato garden, cassava garden, yams and finger millet. To the south of the banana plantation are beans, cow peas or peanuts gardens. Down the valley is grazing land with tens of Frisian and cross-breed cattle. They provide him with milk daily, 365 days a year.

He also has about 20 goats. In Uganda, goat milk was generally not considered palatable, possibly due to the abundance of cow milk, so we never milked goats. He would sell a couple of them to supplement income from other produce to send his children to school. He also reared a couple of chickens, more as a hobby.

The farm produces more than he can consume. He sells the surplus to afford such essential services as kerosene (recently upgraded to solar), soap, sugar (at his age he no longer takes sugar, he uses honey — doctor’s orders).

Scattered across the farm are sugarcane (for eating, not for making sugar) and fruit trees (guava, mango, pawpaw, avocado, orange, passion fruit, pineapple). He drinks fresh juice from mangoes and passion fruit. As is evident, everything here is on a subsistence basis, but very organic. He has done this for the past 75 years.

He had eleven children, my mother being his first born. He sent all of them to school, saw eight of them through college. He sold at least two cows, some goats and some produce each school term to send his children to school.

I went to live at my grandfather's place when I was 5 years old. I left when I was 14 (my family lived in an urban area). I learnt how to farm, milk cows, tether goats, harvest fruits (by climbing the fruit tree) and harvesting honey (at night using smoke).

Why the long story?

My grandfather, just like millions of other Africans that live like him, is considered poor. He rarely holds money, and he rarely needs it. He produces most of what he needs. But using the standard World Bank/IMF description of ‘poor’, my grandfather is poor. I live in the city and earn about USD 12,000 a year after tax, which in Uganda is a decent salary. But I can hardly match my grandfather in terms of providing for my family with fresh milk, fresh food and fresh fruits.

This is one thing most people that watch International media do not know about Africa: not all Africans are poor, many simply live differently than you.

(Image source: Wikimedia Commons)

Ugandan farmer riding bananas from his farm to the market. Most people from other backgrounds would pity him, and consider him ‘poor’.

Edit 1: Thank you John Kim for the edit suggestions. Much appreciated.

Edit 2: I have added a picture I took with my grandfather and grandmother on 2/6/2020. I visited them as soon as the Covid-19 lockdown was eased in my country. They live 350km from the city where I live. I enjoyed tons of stories and experiences from as far back as the late 1930s. They are such a loving and jolly couple.

Picture taken with my HTC M10 phone.

1.6M views
View 88,167 upvotes
View 841 shares
88.1K
841
1.2K
1,297 comments from Claire Jordan
and more

Tebay Hiba

, knows Arabic
Updated Jul 29, 2020
Being African does not mean being black.

Moroccans,

Sisouka28

Algerians,

these are just some examples of what an average north African person looks like.

And lastly a picture of me, a proud young African lady.

… (more)
20.6K
82
334
334 comments from Chris Cox
and more

Sponsored by Aspose
Process text documents easily using our advanced Java library.

Full-featured API to create, update, convert, and render all your word docs. 40+ file formats supported.
Learn More
Related Questions
More Answers Below

What are some amazing facts about Africa?

Why do some people call Africa a country not continent?

What are some of the most mind-blowing facts about Africa? What are some things that would surprise even people who live there?

Naomi Navec

, studied Psychology & Philosophy at The Modern Mystery School Updated Mar 8, 2020 · Upvoted by

Anna Benson

, lives in The World (2006-present)
-First of all most people think Africa is a COUNTRY when it's actually a CONTINENT

-Most people think that everyone in Africa is poor, NO! A lot of people in Africa are rich and are living BETTER lives than those in America. By better I mean, they buy their own propeties, build their homes, no mortgages, no taxes.

-Most people think that everyone in Africa is uneducated and uncivilized. NO!

There's uneducated people for sure but that's not everywhere in Africa!

What I hear the most, is when people think everyone in Africa is black lol and looks like this

AFRICANS COME IN DIFFERENT SHADES AND COLOUR

… (more)

15.8K

225

370

370 comments from

Zipho Tefu

and more

Colin Riegels

, Lived in five different countries

Updated Nov 2, 2020

The two things that I find people most commonly overlook about Africa are:

- How big it is. It is massive. Madagascar alone (the island off the East Coast) would stretch from London to Rome if it was placed in Europe. And it is tiny compared to the mainland.
- That its population is diverse. People think “African” means “black person”. But significant swathes of Africa have predominantly Arab populations, and there are also a significant number of people from the Indian subcontinent who have lived there for many generations.

343.9K views
View 6,373 upvotes
View 80 shares

6.3K
80
131
131 comments from Duke Ganote
and more

Jamie Quan

, Videography and video editor (2010-present)
Updated Feb 20
Africa is a beautiful place. i know most foreigners outside the continent see this anytime the word Africa pops up. thats true but Africa is not entirely this. villages are developing into towns and towns are growing to cities.

this is what the CNN and BBC dont show you and they have succeeded in creating this wretched impression about Africa to the world.

this is my neighborhood

similar to the first image but looks improved.

this is the city

i use the lane on the right to work everyday.too much traffic in the morning tho.

an evening shot of the same city.

Accra,Ghana.

i love my country, and for sure t
… (more)
2.4K
100
91
91 comments from Ygor Coelho
and more

Chiamaka Amadi

, Crew Member at McDonald's (2017-present)
Updated May 15, 2017
My sister told me a story once, it happened at the Ivy League school she goes to.

Girl: “Oh, you grew up in Africa? It must’ve been so tough for you!”

Boy: “My parents can buy your parents.”

Then he walked away.

Contrary to popular belief, Africans are not all poor. And they’re not all uneducated. Matter of fact, when given the opportunity to get an education and make something of themselves, they can run circles around most people from the Western world.

226.5K views
View 8,947 upvotes
View 3 shares
8.9K
3
16
16 comments from Aslan Khan
and more

Fiona Chandler

, Manager (2003-present)
Updated Apr 11, 2019

That Africa is in no way the same as it is portrayed in the media.

I have seen so many movies where a person says they are going to Africa to help poverty or orphans or something. When they get there, this is how they make it seem.

(This photo is literally what I found after googling 'Africa')

And while I love the fact that Africa has such a vast amount of animals and has such beautiful terrains, not all of it is jungle.

My brother has literally been asked by a girl if he rides lions as a legitimate question. No trace of sarcasm on their face. It's that bad. (We don't by the way, we've never even
… (more)
6.8K
11
137
137 comments from Richard Lee
and more

Anthony M Anderson

, Student
Updated Nov 22
Libya was the only country in the world to have one colour on the flag

This is the true fact! Libya during the reign of muammar gaddafi had one colour on the flag. It was called the green flag.

The green flag was the official flag of libya from 1977 until the overthrow of muammar gaddafi in 2011 during the first libyan civil war.

Therefore the green flag was replaced by the pre 1969 flag of libya which was used during the monarchical rule from 1951 until the libyan revolution in 1969 led by muammar gaddafi.

4.4K views
View 41 upvotes
View 2 shares
Answer requested by

Ahmadhussien Ahmadhussien

41
2
4
4 comments from
Mehmet Fatih Yüksel
and more

Stefan Pociask

, Veteran. Wildlife researcher. Raptor rehabber. Engineer.
Updated Apr 12, 2017
That size DOES matter. Because of the distortion of typical maps, most people are unaware of how GIGANTIC Africa is. I promise you'll be surprised. Many of you are not as big as you think you are. To demonstrate… and enlighten, we will look at country sizes as they appear on globes, instead of on maps. So, if we look at the continent of Africa, and just slide other countries of the globe, on top of Africa, we find that we can fit all these other countries into Africa.

Let’s start with the continental United States. That fills up just a small part of Africa. Next, let’s slide all of China into t
… (more)
6.8K
24
239
239 comments from Wendi Tibbets
and more

Jammie

, studied at New York University
Answered Sat
My grandfather is ‘poor’. He certainly lives on “less than a dollar a day”. He is now 95 years old. In his nine and a half decades on earth, he has never lacked, and he has never begged. He only attended one year at a mission school in the 1930s and learned how to read and write. This is how he pulls it off:

When he wants food, he goes to the banana plantation, looks at tens of bunches of matooke (banana), and decides which to harvest for the day’s dinner. Adjacent to the plantation is a sweet potato garden, cassava garden, yams, and finger millet. To the south of the banana plantation are bean
… (more)
5

Add Comment

Lucas Cutrim

, lives in Rio de Janeiro
Updated Apr 15, 2017
Africans are not only black.

When you think of Africans, you probably think of those people:

First image after typing "Africans" on Google.

However, what most people are not aware of, is that these people are also Africans.

North Africans are mostly of Arab and Berber influence, they're not black. South Africa, and to some extent Angola, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, have sizable European white populations.

This is why I dislike the term "African American" as a synonym to black. Charlize Theron and Candice Swanepoel are Africans as much as white Americans are from the Americas.

What also bothers me is when people are called African Americans when they have absolutely no link to America, but due to their color. This happened to her:

Naomi Harris is not African American. She's British.

92.1K views
View 5,049 upvotes
View 2 shares
5K
2
69
69 comments from Nuralia Mazlan
and more

Erness Mou

, studied at High Schools
Updated Sep 2, 2017 · Upvoted by

Rui Xin Oh

, B.S. from Northwestern University (2021)

It's not a steaming-hot warzone full of black malnourished poor people.

Not everyone is black. In fact, Africa is the most diverse when it comes to skin colors: We have white people in the South all the way to black people in the center and light-skinned people in the north.

It's not always hot. Yes, some countries do have high temperatures but it's not like what you think - it gets cold during the winter in some countries, and in some, it even snows!

Not everyone's poor. Of course there are many poor people in Africa, but not everyone is as poor as you think. Here are some images to change how y
… (more)
4.6K
7
90
90 comments from Olisa Efobi
and more

Tiny Nair

, Cardiologist at PRS Hospital, Trivandrum
Answered Nov 12, 2017
He considered himself lucky to have got the job; as a gardener. At age 18, Hamilton Naki left his home at the impoverished region of Transkei, and came to Cape Town in search of a job. His education got truncated after 6 years in school because lack of money.

The young 'black' energetic gardener at the University of Cape Town (UCT) somehow got transferred to the animal research lab, may be because the stench did not attract the 'fair skin' administrators. He started his career cleaning the animal cages, learnt to anesthetize them and later help in dissection of the carcass. The trainee surgeons
… (more)
1.8K
6
47
47 comments from
Ken Saladin
and more

Teth Grey

, studied Biochemistry at Sokoto State University

Updated Jan 11, 2018
Owh Sweet Africa, where should I start?

1. Do you know that Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

2. And talking about taking it a little too far, in South Africa you are legally allowed to attach flamethrowers to your car in order to deter car jacking, or so I've heard ;)

3. Mali is home of one of the oldest universities in the world, established in 982 CE.

Apparently the place was so dope it was referred to as “the Paris of the medieval world” (please excuse the English)

4. Also the world’s biggest frog up and decided

… (more)
1.6K
3
23
23 comments from
Hari Sanil
and more

Silas O. Abayomi

, 35 years of practicing journalist, editor, and proofreader.
Updated Jul 29, 2020
There are so many things people do NOT KNOW ABOUT AFRICA; though, Africa has been around for thousands of years-from the days of ancient Egypt-where civilization spread into the world. Africa has come a long way, witnessed and survived all yesterday's powers-Assyria, Babylon (modern-day Iraq); Persia later Media and Persia (modern-day Iran); Greece, Rome, and more recently, European seven colonial brothers-British, French, German, Portuguese, Spanish, Italian, and Belgian.

Africa has been in the news and world history for ages; unfortunately, only a little is known about Africa by peoples who are not Africans.

Because of what Euro-American media continue to push into global markets for immediate and international audience to know, which IS NOT DIFFERENT from what European scholars from pre-colonial days through many eras of occupation and annexation of Africa informed their home audience.

Unfortunately, we have lived with what might have been half-truths; or stories far from the truth for centuries.

Work like this, mostly from Africans will however, correct some of the past misrepresentations and present Africa exactly as it is with all supporting evidence and available facts, previous histories and news failed to take into consideration.

Here are some Things People do not Know about Africa.

The Twenty Things People Do Not Know About Africa:

First, Africa is A CONTINENT NOT A COUNTRY. Africa has fifty-two independent countries, hundreds of islands on Atlantic and Indian Oceans, also around Mediterranean Sea in the north. Besides, it has eight territories, these countries are located within the six geographical regions on Africa continent. North Africa-Morocco, Algeria Tunisia, Libya and Egypt; in West Africa are sixteen countries-Nigeria, Benin Republic, Togo, Ghana, Cote d' Ivoire, Sierra Leone, Liberia, Guinea, Gambia, Senegal, Mali, Mauritania, Western Sahara/Polisario, Burkina Faso, Niger and Chad; Horn of Africa- are Ethiopia, Eritrea, Somalia, North and Southern Sudan; in Central Africa-are-Democratic Republic of Congo, Cameroon, Republic of Congo, Central African Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Angola, Rwanda and Burundi; in East Africa are-Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, and Malawi. In South Africa-are-Zambia, Zimbabwe, Mozambique, Botswana, Namibia, Lesotho, Swaziland, and South Africa.

Second, Africa is the third largest continent after Asia, the Americas; Africa has a landmass of over 30 million square kilometers or 11.7 million square miles. However, if Americas are taken into two separate continents-North America and South America, Africa becomes the second largest-and its largest city is Lagos, Nigeria with over 18 million residents.

[49 Amazing Facts About Africa | The 7 Continents of the World]

Third, Africa true size-twice the size of Russia; about four times bigger than United States. Africa can hold-Mexico, China, India, United States, Western and Eastern Europe, Japan, many more Islands and territories.

The True Size of Africa

A small contribution in the fight against rampant Innumpancy, by Kai Krause

Graphic layout for visualization only (some countries are cut and rotated)
But the conclusions are very accurate: refer to table below for exact data

COUNTRY	AREA x 1000 km²
China	9.597
USA	9.629
India	3.287
Mexico	1.964
Peru	1.285
France	633
Spain	506
Papua New Guinea	462
Sweden	441
Japan	378
Germany	357
Norway	324
Italy	301
New Zealand	270
United Kingdom	243
Nepal	147
Bangladesh	144
Greece	132
TOTAL	30.102
AFRICA	30.221

In addition to the well known social issues of illiteracy and innumeracy, there also should be such a concept as "innumpancy", meaning insufficient geographical knowledge.

A survey with random American schoolkids let them guess the population and land area of their country. Not entirely unexpected, but still rather unsettling, the majority chose "1-2 billion" and "largest in the world", respectively.

Even with Asian and European college students, geographical estimates were often off by factors of 2-3. This is partly due to the highly distorted nature of the predominantly used mapping projections (such as Mercator).

A particularly extreme example is the worldwide misjudgement of the true size of Africa. This single image tries to embody the massive scale, which is larger than the USA, China, India, Japan and all of Europe..... combined!

creative commons No Rights Reserved This work is placed in the Public Domain

Netherlands
Belgium
Portugal
Spain
France
Germany
Switzerland
Italy
USA
Eastern Europe
India part 2
India
China
China part 2
Great Britain
Japan

Fourth, Africa has the largest and second hottest desert on earth-the SAHARA DESERT. Sahara Desert covers approximately the entire size of United States of about 9,200,000 square kilometers. The desert covers an extensive landmass from Atlas Mountains in Morocco through Nile Valley in Egypt, but ends in Sudan. The desert is bordered on the southern fringe by Sahel; on the west, Ahaggar Mountains in Algeria; in the north, Tiberti Mountains in Chad, Air Mountains in Niger; Tenere in Libya.

Fifth, Africa has Atlas Mountains-these are series of mountains from Morocco through Algeria to Tunisia; stretching 2,500 kilometers or 1,600 miles. These mountains are similar to Andes of South America and Alps of Europe. The range's highest peak is the Toubkal with 4,167 meters or 13,671 ft in Southern Morocco. The Atlas Mountains separate Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean Sea coastline from Sahara Desert.

Sixth, Africa has the second largest rainforest in the world after the Amazon in Brazil. It is located in equator, which run through Congo Basin on the Atlantic side of the great continent. It has precipitation of 60–160 inches or 152- 402cm; has eight or nine months of continuous rainfall all-year round. The region- Central Africa- is poetically and geographically referred to as the JEWEL OR GEOLOGICAL GARDEN OF AFRICA. It is famous for different wildlife: the mountain gorilla, chimpanzees, elephants, okapi, hippos, white rhino, black mamba, king cobra, zebra, pangolin, monkeys, leopards, lions. The African "Amazon" or rainforest represents 18% of world's remaining rainforest of 50 million hectares; Democratic Republic of Congo (DCR) accounts for 20 million hectares or 40%. In the region are: 11,000 species of birds; home to 10,000 plants; 400 species of animals; 700 types of fish. The Africa rainforest holds 36 billion tons of carbon-dioxide in its vegetation, second after the Amazon of Brazil of 100 billion tons carbon dioxide in the world.

[Inside one of the oldest primary rainforests in Africa - CNN Video]

The OKAPI FROM CENTRAL AFRICA.

African Grey Parrot.

Picture Credits: Species Profile: African Grey Parrot

Cameroon Pangolin.

Seventh, Africa is the home to the world second longest river, The AGELESS NILE. A river of great historical importance, it meanders from the great lake region of East Africa-from Lake Victoria- through several Africa nations to Egypt, before discharging into Mediterranean Sea. A river of two colors, blue in Ethiopia-from silt deposit that makes the water turn dark brown or black; white in Southern Sudan, Rwanda, Democratic Republic of Congo. Nile River supports more than three hundred million lives on daily basis; from seafoods provision to navigation, eco protection, irrigation needs, electricity generation from dams it powers. Nile River is one of African heritages of unquantifiable or priceless value.

Lower Egypt
Nile River
Upper Egypt
Meroe
Blue Nile
Simian Mountains
Lake Tana
Ethiopia
White Nile
Rwenzori Mountains
Lake Victoria
City of Rhapta?

The Nile

HoboTraveler.com 2009

The Nile River
©2008 HowStuffWorks
Mediteranean sea
Nile River Delta
Rosetta & Damietta branches
EGYPT
SAUDI ARABIA
The Great Bend
Red Sea
City of Khartoum
White Nile & Blue Nile intersection
SUDAN
ETHIOPIA
Lake Victoria
UGANDA
DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF THE CONGO
KENYA
Indian Ocean

The Nile Route or Course.

Eighth, Africa's Congo River is the second largest river in the world by DISCHARGE OR WATER FLOW RATES AND VOLUME; after Amazon River with a phenomenal discharge of 100,000 m3/per second, Congo River discharges 41,200 cubit meter per second. More than two-thirds of the river lies in Democratic Republic of Congo; this river support other regional waters before empty self into Atlantic Ocean.

Congo River
Au-delà des ténèbres
un film de Thierry Michel réalisateur de "Mobutu, roi du Zaïre" rfi
fidh
JEUNE AFRIQUE

Courtesy of tyscaac / panoramio.com

The mighty Congo: River of life and power/The mighty Congo: River of life and power

Ninth, Africa has the largest wildlife in the world- from the open grassland in Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, Rwanda, Burundi to bushveld Southern Africa.

Between five to seven million square kilometers, millions of animals of different makes and designs roam the open grassland. The carnivores, herbivores, amphibians, marine lives, insects, birds, reptiles, have continued to co-habit with man for millennials in Africa. However, the most popular among the animals are BIG FIVE-elephants, lions, leopards, buffalo, and rhino; they have lived in Africa for countless centuries.

Africa's Big Five Safari Animals
Leopard
Elephant
Black & White Rhino
Cape Buffalo
Lion
tripsavvy

Moreover, African bushveld (South Africa) and savannah region on East African corridor continue to play a vital role of home to small and big, wild and moderate animals. The big cats-lions-king of the jungle; leopards-the jewel of the jungle-and their cousin-cheetah, regardless of physiological and anatomical differences, these animals will always make Africa their permanent home.

Tenth, the Great Migration: every year, over three to five million animals-in a multiple large formations leave Serengeti in Tanzania to Maasai Mara in Kenya in an eighth month trip that has become a ritual without equal ANYWHERE IN THE WORLD. From Serengeti Plains in Tanzania, wildebeest, zebras, deer, begin a 2,000-mile-journey-of-eight-month-round-trip.

GRUMETI GAME RESERVE
JUNE
NOVEMBER
LOLIONDO GAME CONTROLLED AREA
LAKE NATRON
GRUMETI RIVER
MBALAGETI RIVER
SERENGETI
NATIONAL PARK
NGORONGORO CONSERVATION AREA
DECEMBER
APRIL
MASWA GAME RESERVE
TANZANIA
MARCH
JANUARY - FEBRUARY
ARUSHA

Kenya
AUG
TO OCT
Mara River
MASAI MARA
NATIONAL RESERVE
NORTHERN
SERENGETI
JUL
Grumeti River
APR
to JUN
NOV
to DEC
Tanzania
SERENGETI
NATIONAL PARK
Mbalageti River
JAN
to MAR
LAKE NDUTU
NGORONGORO
CONSERVATION AREA
MASAWA
GAME RESERVE

THE GREAT MIGRATION
Lake Victoria
Musoma
MASAI MARA
Lemala Mara
Kliens Camp
Simiyu
Sayari Camp
Serengeti Bushtops
SERENGETI
Kirawira Tented Camp
Grumeti Serengeti
Simiyu
Sasakwa Hill
Olakira Camp
Serengeti Serena
Kati Kati
Lemala Ewanjan
Serengeti Migration Camp
Nduara Loliondo Camp
Simiyu
Lake Natron
Lemala Ngorongoro
Lake Masek Camp
Ngorongoro Wildlife Lodge
Ngorongoro Crater Lodge
Ngorongoro Sopa
Crater Forest Camp
Gibbs Farm
Ngorongoro Farm
Hatari Lodge
Arusha Safari Lodge
Kigongoni Lodge
Ngorongoro Serena
Lake Manyara Serena
Lake Manyara Tree Lodge
Tloma
Arusha Coffee Lodge
Maramboi
Tarangire Treetops
Tarangire Sopa
Lemala Tarangire
Sanctuary Swala Burunge
Olivers Camp
TARANGIRE
Kambi Ya Tembo
Mt. Kilimanjaro
Olasiti
Arusha
Mount Meru Lodge
Serena Mountain Village
Shinyanga
L. Eyasi
L. Kitangiri
Babati
Same
Season Key
WET
DRY
March
April
May June
July
August
September
October
November
December

Eleventh, Africa has the largest number of spoken languages in the world; Africa languages are classified into six different groups, with several thousands-sub-divisions.

Afroasiatic
Nilo-Saharan
Niger–Congo
Bantu
Khoisan
Indo-European Austronesian

Español
Português
English
Français
Nederlands
Español y Guaraní
Español y lenguas nativas

Empire in Africa 1914
British Territory
French Territory
Belgian Territory
Portuguese Territory
Spanish Territory
Italian Territory
German Territory

LANGUAGE FAMILIES AND LANGUAGES OF AFRICA
Niger-Congo-Kordofanian
Bantu: Ganda, Kongo, Luba, Rwanda, Shona, Swahili, Tswana, Xhosa, Zulu
Non-Bantu: Fulani, Ibo, Mandingo, Mende, Mossi, Twi, Wolof, Yoruba
Nilo-Saharan
Kanuri, Masai, Nandi, Nubian, Nuer, and others
Hamito-Semitic (Afro-Asiatic)
Amharic, Arabic, Hausa, Oromo (Galla), Somali, Tamazight, and others
Khoisan
!Khung, Kxoe, Nama, and others
Austronesian (Malay-Polynesian)
Malagasy
Indo-European
Afrikaans, English, and others
The language families and languages shown are not the only ones in a particular area and are not confined to that area.
Arabic
Arabic
Tamazight
Wolof
Mandingo
Mende
Mossi
Fulani
Twi
Yoruba
Ibo
Kanuri
Hausa
Nubian
Amharic
Somali
Nuer
Nandi
Oromo
Ganda
Masai
Rwanda
Luba
Kongo
Swahili
!Khung
Kxoe
Shona
Tswana
Zulu
Nama
Xhosa
Afrikaans
Malagasy
© 2010 EB, Inc.

Shona
Kirundi
Tshiluba
IciBemba
Wolof
Creole
Mauritian
Luo
Igbo
Oromo
Afrikaans
Chinyanja
Isizulu
Kinyarwanda
Somali
Malagasy
Runyakitara
Setswana
Chichewa
Sindebele
Kikongo
Yoruba
Hausa
Sesotho
Ewegbe
Tigrinya
Luganda
IsiXhosa
Amharic
Kreol
Kiswahili
Sesotwa
Lingala
Leboa
Akan

[South African Languages | Statistics and graphs]

Besides, Africa has one of the oldest and most ancient languages in the world; even though, Latin, Greek and Sanskrit-the three languages-that make up Indo-European languages have been around for millennials; it may interest you to know that some of African languages are as old as these three languages, perhaps, older. These languages are:

1. Ancient Egypt

2. Ancient Meroitic

3. Old Nubian

4. Tifinagh:

5. Ge’ez

6. Nsibidi:

[6 most ancient African languages that shaped the world - Face2Face Africa]

Twelfth, Africa is a home to the tallest and shortest humans in the world. The Dinka people are the tallest ethnic group in Africa domicile in the East and West Banks of Nile River, principally found in Abyei area of Angok Dinka in Southern Kordofan of Sudan. The Dinka people call themselves MOINJAANG, meaning "People of the Peoples." Average Male Height in 1953/1954 Height survey was: 182.6 cm (5ft 11.9inc); in 1995 survey, average male height was 176.4cm (5ft 9.4 inc).

Apart from Dinka people, the Tutsi of Rwanda and Burundi are very tall averaging between 5ft and 6ft. Also, the Maasai people in Kenya, average height is 6ft.

14

Collectionjfm www.delcampe.net

Thirteenth, Africa is a home to the shortest people on earth; the Pygmies of Congo or “Central African Foragers”; the Pygmies of Congo are classified into three groups: The Bambenga, live in Cameroon, Gabon, Democratic Republic of Congo; the Bambuti, found in Democratic Republic of Congo; and the Batwa or Twa in Rwanda, Burundi, Angola, Namibia, Zambia, Uganda, Tanzania, and Democratic Republic of Congo.

Fourteenth, the oldest university in the world is in Fez, Morocco; Al-Qarawwiyyin University was established in AD 859 by a woman, Fatimah al-Fihri, her family migrated from Qayrawan in Tunisia some 1,200 years ago. When her father, Mohammed al-Fihris died, Fatimah and her sister, Mariam, inherited enormous wealth; she decided to build a mosque for her community and a Madrasa. The Madrasa soon became a global center of learning, which offered courses in calligraphy, Arabic grammar, Sufism, medicine, music, and astronomy.

Fifteenth, the oldest library is located in Fez, Morocco at al-Qarawiyyin's University; the library has over 4,000 manuscripts, Rare and Ancient book date back to 9th century. Among the rare collection in the library is the 9th century AD Hadith, which record says is the oldest in Muslim world.

There are so many things on the continent of Africa, most people do not know, just because, Africa and Africans for a long period have been wrongly misrepresented.

ALL PICTURES SOURCED FROM GOOGLE .

Uche Metuh , Wonder (Nigerian) Woman Answered Feb 10, 2018

Many foreigners are ignorant of the fact that there are: Rich & Middle class families in Africa. Africans who are actually richer & have better lives than some foreigners. Africans who live normal westernized lifestyles in Africa. I'll quote @David Dasa again from 1 of my previous answers.

"Thank you very much for this answer. I know a lot of middle class people here in Nigeria who grew up richer than a lot of Americans. I mean sure on average people in the West have a better standard of living but a lot of us live pretty decent lives here"
Yes! Many foreigners can't reconcile any form of progression or wealth with anyone from the African continent.

However, this is partly Africa's problem. We've been sold the western culture so much that we buy it, know it intimately while they remain clueless about the African culture.

I'm Nigerian.

I grew up in a pretty pricey neighbourhood where houses go for $350,000 and above. Compared to places in bigger Nigerian cities like Abuja or Lagos, this price is just pocket change to many.

Yes. Real estate is the shit in Nigeria. It defies the law of, "Whatever goes up, must come down". Rental prices keep going up regardless of any recession.

When that neighbourhood I grew up in was 1st developed, it attracted many successful businessmen who craved the quiet & grandeur of the area.

*I guess this reality isn't what many foreigners would usually associate with Africans; love of finer things winks.

There's also the general assumption from the international community that any rich African is a thief or a politician. No! Back in the day, people like my father had what we know as old money. They were revered & respected. They had wealth they didn't waste nor show off.

They had businesses stretching from the northern part of the country to its southern end.

They worked hard, made a good living for themselves, & gave their children the best they could.

I was chauffeur-driven to school every day until I got older.

I went to a public school for my primary education. I knew some of my classmates who were scraping what they could to get by. Some were going for vacations in exotic places in the world. It was an interesting assortment mix of social classes.

We had about 4 cars in the house. The Nigerian society had (probably still has) zero credit culture back then so all 4 cars were bought brand new. They were Peugeot 505 & 504, I think. My father loved those cars. Eventually, he bought a Mercedes because his friends kind of succeeded in making him to but he still loved his Peugeot cars.

1 thing of surprise would be that even back then, I didn't even think of my family as moderately rich in any way. My mom beat me like crap when I misbehaved. My dad told me he was broke any chance he got until I believed him & started feeling bad for him.

My father was in a business partnership with 2 other families.

He invested heavily in various company stocks (like the big breweries, oil companies & banks) & real estate properties.

Food was never a problem. With 8 kids, our dining table at mealtimes would be the envy of many kings.

My mother always had paid hands to help in the house.

Cereal, milk, eggs & bread etc. for breakfast. Lunch was another variety of food-laden table.

From about age 8 or so, I read books from the Mills & Boon to James Patterson. My brother introduced me to Robert Ludlum. I regularly swapped books with friends at school.

I grew up watching tennis on the TV with my father in the time of Pete Sampras.

I watched many Hollywood blockbusters, the Oscars, Grammys etc. I watched The Oprah Winfrey Show on TV. I watched WWE with my brothers. I remember The Undertaker, Andrew the Giant, The Ultimate Warrior, Hulk Hogan etc. I played Play Station games & moved on to the X-Box.

It's actually silly for me to tell this story but I have to because the world knows 1 single story for Africa, The danger of a single story.

I had a colleague who wanted to tell me something which happened at the Grammys 3 years ago & she started by explaining to me what the Grammy is.

Another thing of surprise would be that we weren't even in the exceptionally rich category of Nigerians. I wanna think we were middle class. My dad just took great business risks which paid off.

Of course, my dad is long gone now, life is a bit different & there's also quite the cultural shift in Nigeria now but that was my African experience.

So when I relocated to Canada & I hear from some of my Canadian friends their stories of receiving government cheques, grants, loans, being on welfare, filing for bankruptcy, accessing community services centers & the Food Bank for food, clothes etc, it's a surprise to me.

Funny, I had assumed all white people were rich because the Hollywood movies I saw depicted them so.

What's more surprising is that many North Americans view Africans like me like I just jumped out from the jungle, & have no idea what even an electric plug is.

This assumption is what irritates me.

That just because I'm African, it's assumed that many things are beyond the scope of my understanding & very unattainable.

I've written an answer about this here What are you tired of explaining to people?

It was the same issue renowned Nigerian writer, Chimamanda Adichie experienced a few weeks ago when a French journalist asked her if Nigeria has libraries.

BUSTLE

A French Journalist Asked Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie If Nigeria Has Bookstores, And Her Response Is Everything

SOURCE: Leigh Vogel/Getty Images Entertainment/Getty Images

Her reply,

I think it reflects very poorly on French people that you have to ask me that question.
What? Our politicians are thieves but they haven't stolen so bad that Nigerians don't even have any chairs to sit on.

When I relocated to Canada, a lot of interactions I had with Canadians about Africa (Nigeria) were always negative. But lately, I've learned to move away from that sort of story to tell mine rather than that of desolation, corruption & depravity.

I went to Nigeria for my sister's wedding in 2014. When I shared the wedding pictures with my Canadian friends, their reaction had me do a double take. They didn't expect pictures like these.

Sister's wedding

Niece & nephew visit for the weekend

Nigeria has a really confusing social system.

You can build a luxury villa for yourself but you won't have the proper infrastructure (good roads, electric power, recreational parks or community centres, malls etc) around to have a complete decent lifestyle.

Many people give up & get used to it, & if they can afford it, they'd pay 10s or 100s of thousands of dollars to send their kids overseas to have a chance at a better future.

But somehow, the western world loves focusing their lenses on the negative parts of Africa. Show the world a story about extremely intelligent Nigerians & they assume those are special examples. Show them images of impoverishment or Boko Haram & they agree that's the real Africa.

54 countries & 1.2 billion people! Surely, we aren't all the same. We aren't all wealthy but we aren't all poor or miserable.

What am I saying? I'm saying I'm Nigerian. My story isn't unique & it's 1 many don't know about Africa **:).

Péter Tamas studied at California State University, Northridge Answered May 26, 2017

I had four friends from Africa in my first year of college. One was from Nigeria, one from Uganda, one from Ethiopia and one from Ghana.

One common characteristic that striked me the most was that they were always happy.

No matter it rained, no matter it was cold (which is very unusual for them), no matter they get a bad grade or failed an exam, no matter they struggled. They were always happy.

This happened in Hungary, a highly racist country.

I wonder how happy then people are actually in Africa. :)

Annapurna Krishjeev A Reader of Humanity, Society and Politics Answered Jul 27, 2018

Africa is splitting apart.
Literally.

I learnt this just yesterday.

A large crack stretching several kilometers appeared in Kenya, extending to Ethiopia in the month of March, and it has widened in April.

It is believed that it is due to the movement of tectonic plates. There is a probability of the continent breaking apart as it is based on two plates. The major part is on the African or the Nubian plate. The eastern part is on the Somalian plate, which is moving apart.
See the pictures below to know more.

Image Credits: Google

Red Sea
Arabian Plate
African Plate
(Nubian)
Indian
-Aust.
Plate
Afar Triple
Junction
Gulf of Aden
East
African Rift
African Plate
(Somali)
Indian
Ridge
Antarctic Plate

© Twitter.

I spent 3 weeks in East Africa (Ethiopia, Kenya, Tanzania, Uganda and Rwanda) last september. There are so many wonderful stories to tell but I want to share this special one. A conversation with a local Kenyan.

Me: I need different coffee. American version coffee like cappucino or latte. Something like that.

Her: I know a place.

Me: Really, I have been in Africa for 2 week now and have not had a proper latte!

(She takes me to a coffee place)

Her: It's on me.

Me: No, you can't do that. (Thinking that I am American and I earn more thus I will have to pay for it).

Her: We Kenyans believe that we are all brothers and sisters. It’s on me. Please.

Everytime, I think about my travels, I am always struck by the kindness and generosity of people even when I have met them for the first time.

P.s. The best coffee ‘buna’ is found in Ethiopia from kaffa region.

Brian White former Worked at Intel Answered Mar 23, 2020

Owh Sweet Africa, where should I start?
1. Do you know that Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

2. And talking about taking it a little too far, in South Africa you are legally allowed to attach flamethrowers to your car in order to deter car jacking, or so I've heard ;)

3. Mali is home of one of the oldest universities in the world, established in 982 CE.

Apparently the place was so dope it was referred to as “the Paris of the medieval world” (please excuse the English)

It is not the war-torn, disease ridden backwater place that most Western media outlets make it out to be.
Unlike popular belief in the west, South Africa is not the only developed, peaceful and safe country in Africa. Most African countries boast of peaceful societies, cosmopolitan cities and marked developmental growth.
There are more educated Africans in Africa than most people think. Yes, even grandmother can read and write.
Africans do not speak one Continental language, neither do they have a single uniform culture.
Swahili is predominantly an East African language spoken in Tanzania, Uganda,

Kevin D. Aslan , Entrepreneur, Author, Podcaster Answered Jun 3, 2017

Nollywood!
I'm surprised no one has mentioned that Africa (and specifically, Nigeria) happens to have the world's second largest film industry. Now granted, that's by volume of movies produced, but the result is no less extraordinary.

...an industry that's worth over $3.3 BILLION!

It all started in 1992, with the now cult-classic Living in Bondage, shot straight to video in less than a month, and which went on to sell over a MILLION copies - mostly from street vendors. And just like that, Nollywood was born.

Since then, Nollywood has gone on to produce an insane number of movies (over 1,300 in 2013
… (more)
457
19
19 comments from Chijioke Ezeh
and more

Nasim Chowdhury

, Did pro bono medical work in Eastern Africa
Answered Dec 25, 2017

This is a picture I took of the back of a Chinese restaurant next to Lake Victoria in Mwanza, Tanzania.

I post it here for illustrative purposes.

Africa is not the war ravaged, drought filled, “country” commonly portrayed in the West.

Sure, one can find large pockets of poverty and strife but Africa is a continent filled with diverse cultures and languages with a multitude of climates ranging from the deserts of Libya to the beaches of Cape Town.
6.7K views
View 364 upvotes
364
4
4 comments from Faan Louw
and more

Ray Thabiso

, The 3rd ambassador of black youths.
Updated May 3, 2019
Africa is ignorantly summarised as just a country of black people, This is how big africa is. You can fit India, China, USA, France, Spain, partial Eastern Europe, Mexico, Belgium, Switzerland all into Africa, its freaking Gigantic!

Okay, now come behold this

For context sake, the Africa above has fitted just about 4 billion people from those countries. The real Africa has 1.2 billion people (about 2 thirds are black)

NOW don't be fooled, this is not huge, poor infertile barren land, all those areas are literally littered (pun or not?) with resources, which everyone has been and is still scrambli
… (more)
222
20 24
24 comments from
Paul Chen
and more

Diram Wako

, Manager at The Grind Cafe (2018-present)
Answered Dec 15, 2017
Africa is a continent full of abundant natural resources, but due to corruption, which runs deep, high illiteracy rate, the tribal/military conflict(genocides), this, along with other causes, leave our continent poor.

But, did you know..

1. Egypt is Africa's most popular tourist destination. The country receives over 10 million visitors every year. Cairo, Egypt's capital city, is also one of Africa's largest cities.
2. A single tribe in Kenya-called the "Kalenjin"-produces most of the world's fastest long-distance runners.
3. Both the world's tallest and largest land animals both come from Africa. They are

… (more)
305
13
13 comments from David Muya
and more

Mayank Rishu

, Former Intern in a Venture Capital Firm
Answered Jan 11, 2018
Let's start with it's beautiful name.

The name 'Africa' came into Western use through the Romans. The word has its roots in two different languages – in Latin ("Aprica") it means 'Sunny', and in Greek ("Aphrike") it means 'Without cold'.

Some Interesting facts listed below-

- Africa is home to over 1 billion people who speak over 1,500 different languages. One in every four of the world's language are spoken only in Africa.

- Africa’s total size is roughly 30.37 million square kilometres, representing about a fifth of the earth’s total landmass. This makes it larger than India, China, Mexico and USA a

… (more)
254

Add Comment

Bhuvi Jain

, Been to Africa
Answered May 27, 2018
Africa conjures up an image of backwardness and people would expect, rather not expect even basic amenities there.

Surprisingly during our trip to Kenya while we were going by road to Masai Mara, I was really impressed with the quality of the highway (rest of the roads were nothing to write home about at all though) and the fact that there were free to use good quality restrooms along the way which were dotted along the way which were maintained by curio shops.

Shop and pee in comfort!
India sure can take a leaf from that book.
I stopped calling India more advanced after that.

Sahil Vaidya Co-Founder at The Minimalist (2015-present) Answered Apr 20, 2018

Which country has the highest share of female politicians in its parliament?
I'm sure you won't be able to guess this one.

It is Rwanda!

It's the same country that witnessed 1 million deaths (20% population) in 1994.

Even though the catastrophe almost sounded their death knell, the nation has risen from the ashes and paved the way towards phenomenal growth.

Some HIGHLY inspiring facts about this beautiful nation:

The president made it mandatory for all citizens to go out once a month and clean the streets- and Kigali (capital) is now Africa's cleanest city!

The government has heavily focussed on ease

Korede Wise Akinleye , lives in Lagos, Nigeria Answered Aug 3, 2017

I can tell you a few.

1. Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

In South Africa you are legally allowed to attach flamethrowers to your car in order to deter car jacking.

Timbuktu, Mali is home of one of the oldest universities in the world, established in 982 CE.

The official title of Idi Amin, the Ugandan dictator, was "His Excellency, President for Life, Field Marshal Al Hadji Doctor Idi Amin Dada, VC, DSO, MC, Lord of All the Beasts of the Earth and Fishes of the Seas and Conqueror of the British Empire in A

Efuare Okougbo Africa's growth depends on Africans Answered Mar 25, 2017

The Richest black man and woman in the world are from Africa.

Most people don't know that there are 12 black billionaires in the world.

Three of them are women. Nine are men.

The Richest black man and woman in the world are from Africa.

Nigeria and Angola respectively.

Out of the nine male black billionaires two are American one is Saudi Arabian the remaining six are African.

Out of the three black female billionaires in the world two are African. The other is American.

Tom Kratman former Regular Army Infantry Enlisted, NCO, and Officer at U.S. Army (1974-2006) Answered Aug 21, 2019

A. That aid to Africa does a lot more harm than good. B. That, in Kenyan economist James Shikwati's words, if the aid stopped the average African wouldn't even notice (because something north of 95% of it is syphoned off and deposited in overseas accounts by Africa's almost unbelievably corrupt rulers). C. That if trends for the last few decades continue unabated eventually the entire population will be in refugee camps. Continue with Quora+ Unlock this answer and browse ad-free by joining Quora+
Ronnie Otieno I live in Africa so I know a thing or 10,000 about it
Answered Jun 4, 2017

The richest man in History Mansa Musa was from Africa. He had a net worth of approximately 400 billion dollars in today's money. He was the tenth king of Mali empire of West Africa.At the time of Musa's rise to the throne, the Malian Empire consisted of territory formerly belonging to the Ghana Empire in present-day southern Mauritania and in Melle (Mali) and the immediate surrounding areas. Musa held many titles, including Emir of Melle, Lord of the Mines of Wangara, Conqueror of Ghanata, and at least a dozen others. It is said that Mansa Musa had conquered 24 cities, each with surrounding dist
Chayan Das , studies at R. V. M (2022) Answered Feb 21
Myth #17: There is no technical progress in Africa.

We've been taught that Africa is made up of developing countries. But this does not mean that this continent lives in the Middle Ages. 90% of Africans have cell phones and there are programmers who create their own applications and gadgets. For example, local developers have created a service for farmers with recommendations on cattle breeding and information on natural disasters. In addition, production is well developed in Africa and in some countries, large machinery, such as automobiles, is produced.

Myth #16: Africa is a hot desert.

Often,

Patrick Crosset worked at Africa Answered Feb 8, 2018

There are thousands of things that people do not know about Africa and I describe some of them in my blog quora Africa is back.

For example :In 2018, 6 of the 10 fastest growing countries are in… Africa

African Design

African Airports, you will be surprised!

Botswana, a Democratic, Economic and Ecological Example

Ubuntu : "I am because We are"

The Kalahari Desert, the place where water is gold

African Women

Supernatural Sahara's Rock Paintings in Sefar (Algeria)

- The Man Who Stopped the Desert the Farmer Yacouba Sawadogo

- Tree climbing goats (Morocco)

- "Funny" African Transport

Afandri Adya , studied at Greater Jakarta Answered Jun 13, 2018

I guess most people don't realize that many of the greatest sportsmen/sportswomen are African descent.
Besides the citizens of African countries, most of them are American, French, British, Portuguese, Dutch, Italian, Brazilian, Jamaican, etc.

Most of the sprinters who run less than 10 seconds are of West African descent, with the majority being of Afro-Caribbean and African-American descent. While, many East African groups excel in long and middle distance running.

Usain Bolt, Jamaican of West African descent, the world record holder in 100 m and 200 m sprints

Rui Zhang , works at Soochow University, Suzhou Answered Apr 9, 2020

More than 2 million Chinese have already lived on the African continent. When Chinese people who went through reform and opening up came to Africa, they found it was like China 30 years ago. More and more Chinese people are going to Africa to participate in engineering construction, mine mining, selling shoes and tobacco leaves, hoping to find a pot of gold on land full of business opportunities. The picture shows that Chinese construction workers walked in front of Congolese workers in a white shirt in Kinshasa, the capital of Zaire, ready to welcome the arrival of the delegation of China Rai

Pankaj Gautam Technical Consultant at Tech Mahindra (2016-present) Answered Nov 14, 2017

I would love to answer this out of my experiences. Africa - I feel, is one of the most Generous geography. Having visited Tanzania, Ghana, Kenya and recently Cape Town I have some simple, basic yet life changing experiences to share specifically from Accra(Ghana) as I had spent a year over there.Traffic Sense - Far better than India, exactly like this. Moreover, a driver lets the other driver pass first driving in from left direction as a matter of traffic sense/ rule I believe and in return the latter driver waves hand to the former driver before he drives away as a matter of respect to have b

Arunanjali Singh former Advocate Answered Nov 9, 2017

The Kalenjin tribe of Kenya produces most of the world's fastest long-distance runners.

The Ghost- marriage practised by Neur tribe where a woman marries a deceased man is nearly as common as marrying a living person.
Nelson Mandela is known by six different names in South-Africa.
Kenya's highland forests are home to many animals found nowhere else in the world.
The largest permanent desert lake, lake Turkana is in Kenya. It is Africa's fourth largest lake, fondly called the Jade Sea because of its breathtaking color.
Sources:

1. National geographic channel
2. Lake Turkana National Parks

3. Wikipedia

Angus Marjoribanks lives in Uganda (2014-present) Answered May 9, 2017

I think a more interesting question would be to ask what most people do know about Africa. The image of Africa that people in the West have is often formed exclusively by news reports of war, famine, poverty, disease, corruption, political coups, dictators etc. Often these reports are accurate, many places in Africa have serious, serious problems - problems that are incredibly complex and nuanced and that have been going on for decades. Africa is often pigeon holed as a continent in desperate need of help from the developed world, be it in the form of financial aid, food aid or development aid.
Davide Mirabella , lives in Switzerland Answered Apr 25, 2017

That it is made up of a whopping 54 sovereign nation states.
Ever looked at a map of Europe and said to yourself: woah, that place is pretty fragemented! So many political territories, some as small as Andorra, San Marino or the Vatican (110 acres)! Wikipedia lists 50 sovereign states for Europe…but Africa has even more of them, even though a quick glance at the map might just make you notice big and chunky ones such as Algeria, the Democratic republic of the Congo…or South Africa, sitting prominently in…well…Southern Africa. Running through a list of sovereign states in Africa [1] might give yo

Yashwant Palisetty former Section Engineer at Indian Railways (2013-2014) Answered Jan 3, 2018

When you take a look at the below image, the size of the African continent looks same as that of the United States of America(including Alaska) and is half the size of Russia.

But, it is not.

The African continent is very huge than believed.

1. It is 3 times the size of United States.
2. It is twice the size of Russia.
3. It is larger than India, China and USA combined.
4. It is larger than South America and Europe combined.

The continent looks small because of the skewing of the longitudes of the globe into a 2-D image(Mercator projection). The places close to equator undergo minute distortions. While the farth I guess most of us have seen pictures of cities in Asia (Dubai, Shanghai) comparing how the city skyline was in 1987 vs 2017 and such. Well what would have happened if back when the city wasn't really worth much, you decided to invest in it with a belief in it's growth potential, imagine what it would be worth right now after China's meteoric rise. I also read once that the Dutch purchased Manhattan for trinkets and today it's worth trillions, though I guess the great length of time involved in this example is not practical but you get .

Add Comment

Smriti Iyer , Top Writer 2015 Answered Dec 10, 2018

We all love Chocolate don't we? Do you know where chocolate comes from? It comes from the seeds of the cacao fruit which grows on the Theobroma Cacao Tree.

You know where most of the cacao in the World comes from?

AFRICA!!

More than 70% of the World's cacao come from Africa. More precisely West Africa - Ghana, Côte d'Ivoire, Nigeria and Camaroon.

When you think about it, what comes to mind when we think, fine / good quality /Chocolate? Europe? America?

That is because most of the major commercial chocolate companies are based in Europe and some in America. Be it Cadbury or Neste or Callebaut or Val

Comm

Siddalinga Koudi Software Engineer Updated Nov 19, 2017

Well, Everyone commonly knows and tells when it comes to Africa. i.e it's a poor continent. But it's not the real fact. Not every country in the world is complete, each one or other country has some pros as well as cons so we can't simply say this country is poor or this country is rich. (I think, I don't have to give some example or explain about this) I was in Africa for 5 months, if I mention the place it was Nairobi. What a beautiful place and such an awesome weather it was simply amazing. The people who says Africa is poor country I kindly request them to visit nairobi once then they will com

Dawit Nebiyou former Senior MRT at Addis Abeba University (2012-2015)
Answered Jan 11, 2018

1.The first Olympian marathoner to win two consecutive gold medals in the marathon is from Africa.

Abebe Bikila

2.The oldest hominid discovered is the 4.2 million year old Ardipithicus ramidus (Ardi) fossil is found in Africa.

3.A monolithic church or rock-hewn church is a church made from a single block of stone is found in Africa.

Lalibela, Ethiopia.

4. Africa(The Kingdom of Aksum)was one of the first countries after Armenia to accept Christianity.

5.Africa is the birthplace of the Rastafarian movement, not Jamaica.

source: courtesy

[These Are the Oldest Countries and Nations in the World]

It is much bigger than most people think it is. The misperception is due to a common map projection. For instance, Algeria, Dem Republic of the Congo, Sudan, Libya, Chad, Niger, Angola, Mali, South Africa, Ethiopia, Mauritania, Egypt, Tanzania, Nigeria, Namibia, Mozambique and South Sudan are all bigger than any country in western Europe except Denmark; and the only other exception in the rest of Europe is Russia, a lot of which is in Asia.
Source: List of countries and dependencies by area - Wikipedia

Nick Lewis

Updated Mar 30, 2017
To be human is to be African.

If every human outside of Africa were to suddenly die, 80% of human genetic diversity would still be preserved in the survivors in Africa.

In other words, modern homo sapiens have been evolving in Africa for close to 1 million years, but have been outside of Africa for less than 200,000 years.

Africa is the ancestral home of all of us.

Pragya Bajpayee
Writer at Medium (2018-present) Answered May 7, 2018

Africa is a huge continent made up of 54 countries and over a billion people. But did you know that in Ethiopia, clocks are upside down with our 6:00 at their 12:00? Here are some amazing things about Africa.

Africa is not a Country.

Okay. You do know this, but people frequently refer to Africa as though it were a country. Sometimes, people will actually say, “Countries like India and Africa…”, but more often they simply refer to Africa as though the entire continent faced similar problems or had similar cultures or histories. There are, however, 54 sovereign states in Africa plus the dispute

Sammy Ngari Business Operations Manager at Netpad Holdings Limited
Answered May 18, 2017

Africa had great empires and civilizations before Europe did. Ethiopia, Songhay and Egypt are some of them. The wealthiest man in history was African. Mansa Musa once travelled from Timbuktu to Mecca through Egypt. The convoy carried so much gold that the Egytpian currency was crippled due to his visit. Africa is by far the most culturally diverse continent in the world. I live in Kenya. We have 42 native tribes here. If I cross the border over to Uganda, I won't understand any of their native languages. South Africa has 11 official national languages. None of which a Nigerian is familiar with.

Over 25% of the world's languages are spoken only in Africa

There are thought to be around 2,000 languages in use on the continent. All are considered official languages of the African Union. Nigeria alone has over 500 living languages.

Africa is the only continent to extend from the northern temperate zone to the southern temperate zone

It is the world's hottest continent and the second driest after Australia. Despite being nearly four times the size of Europe, its straighter shores mean it has a shorter overall coastline. The African population is much younger than the rest of the world

Over 50%

Mark Majeira Love, life and everything... Updated Nov 19, 2017

The presence of lighter-skinned, non-stereotypical Africans

“Africa has light-skinned people? No way!”—(To quote a stereotypical American response). But…yes way, they do exist. This article may focus on European-descendants, but it also showcases other non-stereotypical African people (where stereotypical is pictured as dark-skinned individuals,with Afro-type hair texture). I may be biased towards focusing on the South African situation more often, as that is where I hail from (and thus it is what I know). So, the politico-economic thought of the world in the ……

Mandawarya Manase , BBA Economics & Marketing, The Open University (2017) Updated Dec 6, 2020

Africa has massive wealth than what is known and talked on medias, I’ll explain Africa through targeting my marketing and business niche first.

If you are an investor, i’ll assure you that Africa is worth investing.

For example a company named CDC Group plc, UK. Invested in Africa for more than 60 years, What do you think they see in Africa that you don't know? [1]I believe they saw the future.

Africa has most kind of raw materials that are in high demand in the world market right now such as diamond, sugar, salt, gold, iron, cobalt, uranium, copper, bauxite, silver, petroleum and cocoa beans.

Footnotes

[1] http://Investors in Africa - DFIs - www.thinkafrica.net (https://thinkafrica.net/investors-africa-development-financial-institutions/)

Lairumbe K. Silangei

Jannatul Ferdaus Answered Jan 25

The human race is of African origin. The oldest known skeletal remains of anatomically modern humans (or homo sapiens sapiens) were excavated at sites in East Africa. Human remains were discovered at Omo in Ethiopia that was dated at 195,000 years old, the oldest known in the world.

Skeletons of pre-humans have been found in Africa that date back between 4 and 5 million years. The oldest known ancestral type of humanity is thought to have been the Australopithecus ramidus, who lived at least 4.4 million years ago. Africans were the first to organise fishing expeditions 90,000 years ago.
Nancy Johnson studied at University of Cambridge (2012)

Africa is a huge continent made up of 54 countries and over a billion people. But did you know that in Ethiopia, clocks are upside down with our 6:00 at their 12:00? This, and the 12 other incredible facts we're about to impart are sure to turn you into the captain at your next trivia tournament…

Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

The two countries are discussing constructing an undersea rail tunnel to connect the rail systems on the two continents.

2. In South Africa

Laura Sands lives in California Answered Dec 12, 2017

Africa is not poor! The Motherland is merely being plundered while the rest of the world profits from it. Foreign aid is but one way this is hidden from the average person's radar. For example, the continent receives an average of $134 billion in loans and foreign aid, but $192 billion in resources like gold, diamonds, cobalt, petroleum, iron, silver, copper and uranium are extracted from Africa at the same time. So Africa gives out $59 billion more than what it receives!
Tribal conflicts, destabilized governments and violent uprisings are often deliberately created to cause distraction while s
…

Kofoworola George-Taylor

Customer Relationship Manager
Answered Sep 2, 2018
Most African countries want an educated population. They set the school fees at a reasonable price their people can afford. Unlike western countries that a person must take a loan to go through school. Africa has different languages and Afrikaan is not the general language of Africa. The different nations have different languages. Food is the cheapest thing in Africa. We are not the starving African children we are portrayed to be. Poor is relative. For instance if $60 is the minimum wage per month in Nigeria, someone living $1 a day doesn't seem so unreasonable. African Nations have different climate.

Sara Ahmed lives in Egypt Answered May 21, 2017

There are over 50 countries or "fully recognized sovereign states" in Africa. Because Africa is a continent. Not a country. It's a continent, with a lot of countries, and a ton of people living on it. And they're all very, very different. Africa is not one homogenous entity. It's extremely irritating when people say stuff like "people in Africa" or "children of Africa" or "African culture". Um… Which people? Which children? Which culture? Do you have any idea how vague that is?
Or even worse, when they are listing countries and one of those countries is apparently Africa? "Yeah, I wanna travel t

Salim Hemed

Countless hours on hours of gaming Answered Nov 23, 2017

They have electricity.
A lot have access to clean water.
There is Wifi in some places.
For god's sake, not everyone lives in a mud hut.
There are people with actual JOBS.
Not everyone is poor, many are stable financially.
I understand that there are many people struggling with life in Africa, but there are people that have good LIVES. So if you go to Africa, don't be surprised if your hotel runs on electricity and not cow dung.

Fred Gekara Answered Dec 3, 2017 IT Support at The Tamarind Group

We rarely make reservations when we want to visit neighbors (mostly when visiting the countryside). You just show up. When someone does visit, the first thing we do is offer them a plate of whatever is available to eat, or some tea. Depending on the side of Africa you are, some will let you eat first then tell them the purpose of your visit, while others will have you discuss this during the meal. The latter is the least common as this space often goes to catch-up talk. I learnt to appreciate these when friends who've left the continent enlightened me that it's not common practice.

Dara Olaniyan LL.B from University of Ibadan, Nigeria Answered Nov 18, 2017

It's not so much what people don't know as it is what they don't realise. Africa is not a country. Africa is not some homogeneous entity, it is not a place with uniform people, cultures and languages. It is actually the most diverse continent in the world both culturally and genetically. Even in a single country, you will find several tribes that are as different fron each other as the British are different from the Chinese. That is why I find it extremely ignorant and annoying when people say things like "African man", " African culture", "Are you from Africa?", " A place in Africa" and many

Carol Gebert Business Development (2005-present) Answered Nov 24, 2017

Most people do not realize that very little of African land is hospitable. The Sahara is enormous, the Kalahari big, too. The east coast is dry at least seasonally. Meanwhile, the jungle of central Africa is difficult to cultivate, and full of parasites. That leaves just a thin strip of land in the Sahel, a patch in the south and a strip in the central highlands to call hospitable. Put all together, the good land would be smaller in size than the agricultural land of the USA, even though the African continent is huge.

Edwin Osas Former KND operative Answered May 27, 2018

Pardon me if you as an African find this offensive, you have no right to anyway, I'm African too! What most people don't know about Africa is that we lack drive and motivation. We lack the capacity to create and be creative; yes we do, don't tell me Africa has art and music and all that. We lack the faculty to be innovative. We lack law and order. When I say what I say, I mean Africa has neither developed nor beautified her environment. Save for South-Africa, no other African nation has made impressive advancements in infrastructure and similar aspects.
African nations have had roughly 50years f

Wassim Soltani Developer at AlmavivA S.p.A. (2019-present) Answered Apr 13, 2018
North and South Africans actually aren't that poor. I live in north Africa and my country and the neighboring countries actually have a European-inspired lifestyle.
Also, African doesn't mean dark-skinned.

Odilon Rwibutso studied Architecture at Samara State Technical University (2021) Answered Mar 27, 2017

Since I am African these are the things i think people should really know about Africa. Those are the answers to many questions which people keep asking me here in Russia.

All Africans are not the same and they have different cultures so they are not supposed to know each other or like each other.
Africa is not a country. Countries in Africa have different weather. Wars don't happen in every country. Africans are different to black Americans
All Africans don't know how to dance. All African men don't have a big p*nis
There countries richer than even European countries. All countries don't have oil or any

Adedayo Laketu Answered Aug 26, 2018

The African millennials in the UK, US are different from millennials here in Africa, in Nigeria, building from ground zero. In simple terms, this translates to cultural discrepancies because your reality is not the same as every other, and somewhat gives a small group of people the power to define our culture, our way of life. We all form a crucial part of the culture we clamour for, it's a lot of subcultures here in Nigeria man, the New Age is one trying to highlight them all, so we can properly understand what this culture truly stands for. It's not about putting people in a box or defining

Caroline Brann BA.LLB from University of KwaZulu-Natal Updated Jan 8

The truth for me is that…it really is fabulous living here in Africa. South Africa is my home so my answer will mainly focus on that country but the other African countries will be similar, although South Africa is the most developed and with a strong economy. So why do I say this?

Climate: We have a great outdoor all year round lifestyle because we have a great climate. If you like sunshine and an outdoor lifestyle, then Africa is the place for you.

Ease of access: We can do things more easily here, because to do them is often financially cheaper than other places. You want to skydive, swim with

Sihle Phiri studied Mathematics Answered Nov 9, 2017

That we are not a country.We are a continent! Like…Really, most Africans don't know where Djibouti is. We have no united believe system(Colonization). We have not one race(All races exist here). We kind of don't like each other(Russia vs America).Most countries' culture is closer to Europeans or Americans than whatever your mind has developed to represent Africa. We hardly ever see animals, excepts cockroaches and other insects. Sorry guys, this is not Hollywood:)
Women get attracted to us guys not because there are no other options(We prove love is natural).

Africa is not a country

Okay. You do know this, but people frequently refer to Africa as though it were a country. Sometimes, people will actually say, “Countries like India and Africa…”, but more often they simply refer to Africa as though the entire continent faced similar problems or had similar cultures or histories. There are, however, 54 sovereign states in Africa plus the disputed territory of Western Sahara.

Africa is not all poor, rural, or overpopulated

Africa is an incredibly diverse continent politically, socially, and economically. To get an idea of how people’s lives and opportuniti

Vilmos Shepard former Captain at U.S. Air Force (1981-1987) Originally Answered: What are 10 things that the world doesn’t know about Africa? Where it is. Who lives there? What the weather is like? How many people live there? What animals live there? What people do there? What is made there? What food people eat there ? What music they listen to there ? And what currencies are used there? Essentially, “the world" knows very little about Africa.
William Hunter Knowledge Seeker Answered Dec 22, 2020

Somethings that you might not know about Africa:There are thought to be around 2,000 languages in use on the continent.

Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

More than 50% of the world's French-speaking population lives here on the continent.

Africa has around 30% of the earth's remaining mineral resources

The Sahara desert is currently larger than the entire United States.And it continues to grow each year!

Africa has 54 sovereign countries, the most of any continent.

The United States, China, India, New Zealand, Argentine

[Farhan lives in Earth Answered Jun 7, 2017]

By most people here, I mean those living outside of Africa.

Alot of non Africans, when they hear the name Africa, picture a jungle, they asume it is a jungle with no electricity, with alot of animals, and uneducated people. They sometimes ask dumb questions but i can't blame them, it's just lack of knowledge.

I will agree that Africa has alot of jungles, forests and deserts, but it also has alot of developing countries, some of the major cities in Africa have characteristics of developing counties.

Mogadishu:

A country in crisis, it is facing alot of economic problems, but it hasn't given up yet.

Adrian Marshall studied at University of North Texas Answered Aug 6, 2015

1. It's a continent and not a single country.
2. It's the second largest continent.
3. It actually snows in South Africa.
4. It's more developed than most people think.
5. Actual kingdoms and civilizations existed there prior to European colonization.
6. Egypt , Morocco, Libya etc...all of North Africa is actually the same continent.
7. There is more than one race of indigenous sub -Saharan African. Bushmen, Khoisan, Negro.
8. There are pyramids in the Sudan (much smaller than at Giza)
9. In East Africa a form of Judaism is practiced that still includes the Old Testament practices of ani

Jade Wilson studied at Roodepoort College Answered Apr 8, 2017

I will speak from a South African perspective because that's where I stay:
South Africa performed the first successful heart transplant.
South Africa makes bogies (the frame railway wheels fit in) for many companies in the world.

South Africa has advanced military technology

1. A lot of your diamonds and gold come from South Africa
2. We don't have lions in the back yard
3. No, I don't know your friend who is from Nigeria or Kenya

Steve Ogbujah Updated May 31, 2017

Most people don't know that:

Africa is also a continent. And the second largest at that. Wow.., so you're from Africa??? Woow I've heard so much about Africa!

Africans are also as human as the people who often label them as monkeys.

Africa is the most multiethnic, the most multilingual and the most multicultural continent on earth.

Africa is the most genetically diverse society.
Africa is the potentially richest continent.
Africans are also among the most educated and most influential people.
Africa is the root of human history.
Elon Musk, among others (in his class), is of African Descent.

Cynthia 'Tasha' Osajibenedict , Proud African Woman Answered Aug 8, 2020

The Africa the has been portrayed in movies, music videos and stories for years is not the totality of Africa. Images like the one below are some of the things you see once you google Africa which truly doesn't represent what Africa is.

I'm a Nigerian and I've lived here all my life and never have I seen any other animal except dogs, cats, monkeys, and snakes. Foreigners assume that we wake up and right outside our window, is a giraffe or a zebra.

Another thing people don't know about Africa is its vast rich culture that transcends beyond time. Africa has been in existence since the beginning of

Aliyan Sheikh Bachelors of Business finance Answered Jul 19, 2020

I would like to answer this question my way. Many people think that Africa means ‘black’. No, it doesn't. Not everyone in Africa is black. There are many other people with different complexions. Even if we search google, this is what it shows:

Google

african models

ALL IMAGES VIDEOS NEWS MAPS

Latest GIF HD Product Colour

fashion

plus size

traditi

3 African models that domina...
onchek.com

7 TOP AFRICAN FEMALE MO... afrizar.com

TOP-10 African female models
nice-women-facts.com

Why bro? Why all black? There are fair people too in Africa. It is a misconception about Africa that the people there are black. The word ‘african’ has now become a metaphor to symbolize a person whose complexion is dark. People need to know that Africa doesn't mean black people
Darryn Seymour lives in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia Answered Mar 30, 2017

This is probably going to be the most interesting question to answer. First obvious fact Africa is not a war-torn, disease ridden, poverty stricken place where people live without food, water and etc. There are many countries in Africa that are pretty well off with development that is very good, it’s just that there are a few countries that are poverty stricken unfortunately and because the media comments mostly on them, Africa has the appearance of a poor continent. That and the fact that we have almost no lights seen in space during night doesn’t help either.

The dark continent is not as dark as you would think it is.

Number 2 black people are not the only race in Africa. Many people love to think that there is only one type of black person in Africa and that there is no such thing as diversity in the continent. Funny enough every black person in Africa is distinctly different from each other. You have the Masai, Xhosa, Ngundi, Swazi to name a few who are extremely different from each other and are not related closely. Then you have the Berbers in the north and white people who dot the continent all over with Asian people and coloureds in the continent as well. In short Africa is a melting pot of cultures and races.

This is pretty much all you can find in the continent.

The third thing which actually surprised me was the association that the continent is a huge country where people speak African, which is not a language by the way. This baffled me as this is what the difference is between a continent and a country.

Country is a small piece of land, continent is a large land mass consisting of countries.

Emma Jhons Travel Consultant at Aero Travels (2019-present) Answered Jan 20

In my never ending quest to educate I've assembled some of the most interesting and lesser known facts about my home continent. Enjoy.

There are more than 2,000 languages spoken in Africa. Bear in mind that there are only 54 countries.

It is almost impossible to hold a small wedding. The idea of a private wedding is unknown and is greatly frowned upon. Friends and relatives expect to be invited to a wedding and to play a role in the ceremony.

In South Africa you are legally allowed to attach flamethrowers to your car in order to deter car jacking

Almost half of the gold ever mined on Earth has com

Carol Gardner Engineer, park ranger, private chef. Top Writer 2018
Answered Jul 3, 2017

African hospitality. The warmth, welcoming, and friendship is heartwarming, humbling, and absolutely beautiful. My experience has been limited to visiting people in the US who originally hailed from the African continent. I hope someday I can visit and experience more. I don’t think I’ll meet too many strangers.

Mark Paul Answered Dec 31, 2020

I think that there are lots of people out there who think that Africa is country. They think they Africa is a poor place, full of black people who don't drink clean water and are always ill.

When really, there are 54 countries in Africa, and in northern Africa there are more people from an Arab ethnicity, rather than black like many people think.

As you can see Africa has got many countries and is actually quite big. It is the 2nd most populated continent and 2nd biggest continent.

And of course not everyone in Africa is ill and sick all the time. Many people in western countries think that everyone is like the African people off the UNICEF and water aid adverts.

[Dimitri Vallette Co-founder & CEO at Red Marble Esports (2020-present) Answered Feb 9, 2018]

I'm not African so my answers below may not be accurate. My sincere apologies if I make any mistake. Feel free to correct me. The Sahara desert is almost as big as the United States of America. Almost 1/5 of the population comes from Nigeria.

The Nile River is supposedly the longest in the world, though recent studies seem to show that the Amazon is longer.

Surprisingly, the hippopotamus is the deadliest animal in Africa.

The deadliest war after World War II was the Second Congo War.
There are more French speakers in Africa than France itself.

Tanzania's official language is Swahili, and I believe that since 2015 (?), it became Africa's official language.

The necklace that Rose (Kate Winslet) wore during the Titanic is supposedly made of Tanzanite, a diamond that can only be found at the base of the Kilimandjaro. It's supposedly 1,000 times rater than diamonds.

Kenya and Ethiopia have the world's best long distance runners.
Coffee was supposedly discovered in Ethiopia.

Everything written above was taught to me during my trip to Kenya and Tanzania. It may not be accurate.

Wiandry Adi Surprise one person a day in almost everything conceivable
Answered Jan 30, 2018

Perhaps you might know that African countries are stereotypically less exposed to modern technologies than any other countries in the world, esp. developing countries. Turns out they're not really that exposed; some are well informed and now, they're rising.

The youths are changing the countries progressively, as the Internet access is easier to get, as well as scholarships.

It’s at sub-Saharan region (Rwanda, Kenya, South Africa, Nigeria, etc.), and it’s quite notable for the numbers of poverty and unemployed people. However, unlike what people outside Africa see at mainstream media, this region

Anonimous from Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire Answered Apr 1, 2020

Welcome to Africa 101. Grab your books and pen!

Africa is way bigger than you think

The size of Africa is something that is more often than not underestimated. A quick google search of a map will show you a world in which Africa is smaller than Russia, Canada or the United States. The truth is, Africa is the second-largest continent. It is large enough to fit in the United States, China, India, Japan, Mexico, and many European nations, combined.

The reason for this misconception regarding the relative size of Africa is the template of maps we commonly use: the Mercator map projection. This map projection was created in the 16th century with the aim of helping with sea navigation. It did its job back then and is still quite helpful in accurately representing the world.

It is, however, not perfect. One of its major flaws is that it "attempts to place the spherical shape of the world onto a cylinder, causing areas closest to the poles to be stretched. Africa, which straddles the Equator, barely changes in size — meanwhile, the countries furthest from the Equator become inflated from their true sizes on this type of map."

This misconception not only considerably shapes how Africa is viewed by the world but also how Africans view their place in the global scene.

Mapped: Visualizing the True Size of Africa

Lee Mwangi B.A Psychology & Sociology, Kenyatta University
Answered Dec 17, 2017

There is so much to tell about Africa. For starters, Africa is a continent with 54 independent countries. There are more than 2000 tribes, each with their own language and culture. Hence more languages are spoken in Africa than anywhere else in the world. There are many Africans who have international recognition for their achievements.
Elon Musk a South-African, is famous for Tesla and SpaceX.
John Gitau Wairimu a Kenyan, is one of only four people in the world to graduate with a masters degree in Nuclear Medicine Technology.
Hasheem Thabeet a Tanzanian, who was once the tallest player in the NBA

Naima Noora Writer Updated Oct 12, 2020
There are a lot of things that most people don't know about Africa.
Africa is the world's second largest and second most populous continent after asia. Africa is home to over 1.3 billion people who speak over 1,500 different languages, one in every four of the world's languages are spoken only in Africa.

Africa is the source of the world's longest river ‘ NILE.

The world's largest dessert is in africa.

Africa's largest country is sudan it has a total area of 967,940 square miles(2.5 million km2). The smallest country on the continent is Seychelles which is an island nation covering onl

Mike Smith South Africa Enthusiast Answered May 7, 2017

Africa is not as poor as people think it is. Although it has its problems, it also has incredible wealth and a lot of people that live lifestyles similar to people in North America and Europe.
This is Africa:

Sandton, Gauteng, South Africa

So is this:

Cape Town, Western Cape, South Africa

This is an exclusive area with extremely expensive real estate:

Clifton Beach, Cape Town

This is one of the wealthiest cities on the continent:

Lagos, Nigeria

You can also see some nice cars around too:

That it is Not "Black" nor "White" but rather a home to a lot of complex groups of people with different backgrounds and stories:

And it is Very Hard to define it or explain what it is without looking at it from different angles e.g: Languages, Ethnicities, History, Countries, Politics…etc.

Paa Grant B.A Computer Science, Ghana Institute of Management and Public Administration (2021)
Africa is a continent. Not a country
We don't live on trees
It snows in Africa too
We are not all blacks. There are whites and other races too
We have billionaires too
We don't have supernatural abilities. We don't turn to wolves in the night.
We know about Western Civilization more than most Westerners because we can read too.
The average English speaking African has a better grammar expression than the average American.
We know most Hollywood celebrities. I'm saying this because an American friend of mine asked me who Paul Walker was.
We love Taylor Swift. Does she even have haters?
We hate Nicki Mina

James Mbuthia lived in Africa Answered Feb 18

Just how beautiful and how unexplored Africa is. Everbody knows about Europe, Asia, the US. It's all well documented, visited, photographed. Africa on the other hand, not so much. Apart from the safari circuit with beaches and game parks there's not really that much info out there. Infrastructure isn't good in most African countries(it's improving though) so doing road trips requires a tough 4x4 in most places. But if you're ready to go off the beaten track Africa is amazing.
My dream is to buy a decent reliable 4x4, probably a Toyota, and spend months visiting and documenting this untouched Afr

Brad Slavin Technology Officer at DuoCircle (2014-present) Answered Sep 12, 2019

I am from Africa so this is a question that is dear to me, but Africa is HUGE. If you look at it on a map, it seems like it's just a bit larger than the United States or maybe the size of China and certainly smaller than Greenland. But the map is not the terrain, and Africa is enormous. Last time that I took a trip home the flight time just over Africa to South Africa was about 10 hours.

[How Big is Africa? As big as the USA, China, India and Europe, together!]

Here is a fun site that lets you compare sizes of different countries. [Compare Countries With This Simple Tool]

I hope that this puts things

[Jacob Joel , Affiliate at Shopify (2016-present) Answered Dec 13, 2018]

If you were ever to sit with your grandmother in the village and ask to learn about you culture and history, you would reach a point filled with bitterness. I know this is cliche, but when the colonials came and took an entire generation, those people, were the future. Those left were either too old to impact knowledge or too young to learn anything.

Hence all the techniques (of the few taken, because come one, you can't tell me that every single tribe suffered this), all the fighting styles, our weapons, medicines, traditional attires, culture, everything, were lost with all those children.

[Jeewen Zhung , working for National Strategic FooYou Agency (2008) Answered Jan 22, 2018]

Only a few countries in Africa now have a slightly better crop, taking Nigeria, the most populous country in Africa as an example.

Nigeria has a land area of 920,000 square kilometers, roughly equivalent to four areas in Shandong Province. The share of arable land is roughly 65%, which means that the amount of arable land in Nigeria is at least 600,000 square kilometers. Remove the cities, rivers, roads and other factors, according to our understanding of Chinese people, roughly 600 million mu of arable land. And we China have been saying ..... Our arable land red line is 1.8 billion mu of r

Alan McArthur Dargie lives in Curently Live in Gabon, Have Travelled Around a Lot of West, Central Amd Northern Africa over the La… Answered May 28, 2017

Here's something only a few people know but for me it illustrates the kindness and generosity of Africans. It's a brief incident but very poignant for me and I will never forget it. Around 25 years ago I was visiting a client's office in Pointe Noire, Congo. International oil company with the usual security - sign in at gate house, leave passport there and pick it up on leaving. Anyway at that time Congo had just introduced a new national flag, their current one. One of the guards had a lapel badge (called a "pin" in French, all the rage at the time) which was the new flag design.. I said I lik
…

Add Comment

Most people outside Africa, who are not Africans, and have not been in Africa, have a very depleted and downgraded view of the continent.

There are so many things you may not know about Africa or have a distorted impression of, and I will love to clear the air about a few of them which are rampant.

Africa is not a "country", but a "continent" with 54 sovereign countries.
Yes, it may sound funny and unbelievable that some people can refer to Africa as a country, but it is common among average foreigners in other continents.

They may not refer directly to Africa as a country, but you can hear statem
…

Phillip Ekuwem Footballer and Freelance Football Writer Answered May 16, 2017

I'm Nigerian and I get pissed each time people keep talking about Africa like it's some impoverished country (it's a fucking continent) with all kind of bugs crawling on kids faces while they go out to hunt. People talk about Africa like it's a huge desert where you can find all kinds of animals, especially Big cats (lions, Cheetahs et al). I have never seen a real lion before and that's because Africa is a continent and all these wild animals are only found in some countries and regions, not everywhere, plus I don't fancy visiting a zoo.

Mark Welsh 15 years as a claims professional Answered Feb 4, 2020

The starving African children you see in those ads are photo ops. They are sick children and nothing can save them since those are incurable illnesses. That is unfortunate but these children are only a small few in number, very few, and are not starving due to lack of food but due to incurable illnesses. Your money/donation goes to the corrupt governments of those countries, anyway, not to the children. Anyone in America or Europe knows that food is plentiful there in Africa or else those governments would be supplying it from all the excess food in Canada, America and European countries.

Sudan has more than 200 pyramids, double the number found in Egypt.

Mark Albert former Businessman Answered Dec 20, 2017

The Meroe pyramids were part of the Nubian Kingdom of Kush and are up to 4,600 years old.

Martha Okadigbo African, studied the ups and downs of Africa. Educated Answered Nov 13, 2020

I've read what everyone has to say about Africa and would like to add few more things.

Asides the genetic diversity spanning across countries in the continent, there is also huge diversity within countries. In Nigeria, there are over 200 tribes with vast cultural differences and this is similar in some countries too. Several tribes have peculiar features unique to just them.

Accents - I've always seen a monolithic representation of africanised English accents on TV shows and I'd like to say that that's like 1/2% of representation (of course they can not represent every African accent but it woul

Poonam Patel Designer Answered Nov 11, 2020

1. Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

The view of Morocco from Spain across the Strait of Gibraltar.

The two countries are discussing constructing an undersea rail tunnel to connect the rail systems on the two continents.

2. In South Africa you are legally allowed to attach flamethrowers to your car in order to deter car jacking.

Seriously. Can we just say, we've got no stats on the success rate of this technique and definitely wouldn't recommend trying it!

3. Timbuktu, Mali is home of one of the oldest universities

Soikat Bhuiyan Flincher at Search Engine Optimization (2010-present)
Answered Nov 11, 2020

Africa is a huge continent made up of 54 countries and over a billion people. But did you know that in Ethiopia, clocks are upside down with our 6:00 at their 12:00? This and the 12 other incredible facts we're about to impart are sure to turn you into the captain at your next trivia tournament…

1. Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

The view of Morocco from Spain across the Strait of Gibraltar.

The two countries are discussing constructing an undersea rail tunnel to connect the rail systems on the two continents.

What is something most people don't know about Africa? Libya was the only country in the world to have one colour on the flag.

Anthony M Anderson Student Updated Nov 22

This is the true fact! Libya during the reign of muammar Gaddafi had one colour on the flag. It was called the green flag.

The green flag was the official flag of libya from 1977 until the overthrow of muammar gaddafi in 2011 during the first libyan civil war.

Therefore the green flag was replaced by the pre 1969 flag of libya which was used during the monarchical rule from 1951 until the libyan revolution in 1969 led by muammar gaddafi.

Africans are not only black.

Lucas Cutrim lives in Rio de Janeiro Updated Apr 15, 2017

When you think of Africans, you probably think of those people:

First image after typing "Africans" on Google.

However, what most people are not aware of, is that these people are also Africans.

North Africans are mostly of Arab and Berber influence, they're not black. South Africa, and to some extent Angola, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, have sizable European white populations.

This is why I dislike the term "African American" as a synonym to black. Charlize Theron and Candice Swanepoel are Africans as much as white Americans are from the Americas.

What also bothers me is when people are called African Americans when they have absolutely no link to America, but due to their color. This happened to her:

Naomi Harris is not African American. She's British.

That Africa is in no way the same as it is portrayed in the media.
Fiona Chandler Manager (2003-present)
Updated Apr 11, 2019

I have seen so many movies where a person says they are going to Africa to help poverty or orphans or something. When they get there, this is how they make it seem.

(This photo is literally what I found after googling 'Africa')

And while I love the fact that Africa has such a vast amount of animals and has such beautiful terrains, not all of it is jungle.

My brother has literally been asked by a girl if he rides lions as a legitimate question. No trace of sarcasm on their face. It's that bad. (We don't by the way, we've never even seen a lion before)

Take Nigeria for instance, Nigeria has been so urbanized that I, who's lived there for a long time, have literally never seen a giraffe, elephant or rhino, all of which are depicted in that photo.

(These are pictures of Lagos city, Nigeria.)

Believe it or not, Africa does have quite a lot of cities, Cape Town, Lagos, Cairo, all of these places have beautiful architecture and creations. So you can't actually tell me that Africa is all jungle and forest.

And then the stereotype that all Africans are poor and dumb.

It is true that a lot of Africans are poverty stricken, but some of that poverty in quite a few countries, is caused by corruption.

The leaders thus take the money for themselves and fellow politicians, leaving none for the citizens. That creates a wide gap between the poor and the rich. So therefore, those who are rich are extremely rich, and those who are poor are extremely poor.

In some countries that is not the case, and poverty is due to the environment (they have really bad droughts at times, causing there to be no food), or outbreaks of violence and war. It's true that some countries in Africa have it very bad.

But in spite of that, we do have resources. The richest African man currently is Aliko Dangote, a Nigerian. He has a net worth of 12.7 billion dollars. That is far more than Donald Trump's Net worth of 3.2 Billion dollars, not nearly as much as Bill Gate's 90 billion, but still enough to top charts.

The misconception that we are all stupid fazes me completely. Race doesn't equate to IQ.

Take Ufot Ekong for example, he solved a 30 year old math equation.

He also received the highest grades at a university in Japan in 50 years.

The only reasons not as many Africans are listed as smart, is because many don't get the opportunity. When the slave trade began, African development was greatly stunted. That stunt still affects us today.

Well I hope I answered your question! :p

Edit: Sorry to all the people who saw the first picture I set as Lagos, I got it from Google and thought it was authentic, I changed it by the way!

Edit: Oh my God! Thank you so much for 1,000 upvotes!

Related Links

What are the biggest misconceptions about Africa?

What misconceptions do Americans have about Africa?

What are some of the biggest misconceptions people in developed countries have about Africa and Africans?

How do people view European countries?

Why does Spain look like an African country?

Why are many countries in Africa poor?

What are the biggest misconceptions about Russia?

What percentage of Africa's population is white?

Which existing European country is the unluckiest?

Are the African people actually poor?

What country is considered to be African but it actually isn't directly in Africa?

What are the reasons why people migrate from Africa to Europe?

What are some misconceptions about British people?

Is South Africa the most developed country in Africa?

Why do some people call Africa a country not continent?

Quel dictateur a été tué de la manière la plus cruelle ?

Laurent Richard Writer 5 mars

Si l'on se limite à l'histoire contemporaine, il me semble que le dictateur qui a été exécuté avec une violence et une cruauté à la mesure de ses propres méthodes est Mouammar Kadhafi.

Le 20 octobre 2011, Kadhafi est capturé par les forces de la rébellion.

Il est battu et pratiquement lynché par la foule.

On le sodomise avec une baïonnette.

Il est abattu peu après, de plusieurs balles tirées à bout portant.

Le sort de Kadhafi est différent de celui des autres grands dictateurs récents, qui sont morts de maladies, suicidé ou exécutés sans torture, sans jamais endurer dans leur chair la douleur qu'ils avaient infligées à tant de gens:

Hitler (suicide)

Saddam Hussein (pendu)

Kim Jong-il (crise cardiaque)

Mussolini (fusillé)

Staline (attaque cérébrale)

Franco (Parkinson)

Mao Zedong (coma suite à une crise cardiaque)

François Duvalier (diabète)

Kim II Sung (crise cardiaque)

Pinochet (crise cardiaque)

Ceausescu (fusillé)

Amin Dada (coma suite à insuffisance rénale)

Pol Pot (crise cardiaque)

Questions similaires

Quelles étaient les manies qu'avaient certains dictateurs ?

Quels descendants de dictateurs ont eu une vie intéressante et/ou inattendue ?

Quels sont les moments surprenants où un dictateur était humain ?

A-t-il existé des dictateurs éclairés qui ont réellement fait le bien de leur pays ?

Quelle était la punition la plus cruelle de l'histoire ?

Y a-t-il un dictateur qui a exterminé son propre peuple ?

La dictature est-elle toujours mauvaise ? L'histoire n'a-t-elle pas d'exemples de bonnes dictatures / dictateurs ?

Quel a été le dirigeant de France le plus cruel et qu'a-t-il fait ?

Qui est le dictateur le plus sadique de l'Histoire ?

À quel point les Japonais ont-ils été cruels pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale ?

Y a-t-il eu des dictateurs pauvres ?

Quels sont les signes de la folie d'un dictateur ?

Qui est le dictateur le plus fou encore en vie ?

Quelle dictature est encore d'actualité ?

Y a-t-il déjà eu des dictateurs qui reconnaissaient sans détour qu'ils étaient des dictateurs ?

Quelle découverte surprenante sur une personne célèbre a complètement changé votre façon de la voir ? (What surprising discovery about a famous person completely changed the way you saw them?)

Hamid Sam Souvent conseillerTraducteur · 7 janv.

Chukwuebuka Sunday MBBS de University of Nigeria, Nsukka (Diplôme obtenu en 2019)
Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Chukwuebuka Sunday dans Quora en anglais :

Muammar Kadhafi

Il avait été traité de tyran, de dictateur, de terroriste et d'autres noms terribles.

Il était ce leader africain populaire et controversé qui a été tué dans un canal de drainage en 2011.

Le colonel Kadhafi a dirigé le pays libyen pendant quatre décennies.

Il a peut-être été un terrible leader, mais certains articles sur lesquels je suis tombé par hasard ont changé ma perspective sur cet homme. Sous son règne:

Le PIB par habitant de la Libye en 2010 était de 12064,8 USD. Il était de 7529 USD en 2018.

La mère qui allaite a reçu 5000 (dollars américains) pour elle-même et l'enfant.

Il n'y avait pas de factures d'électricité car c'était totalement gratuit.

Une maison, des terres agricoles, du bétail et des semences ont été donnés gratuitement à ceux qui voulaient se lancer dans l'agriculture.

L'éducation et les soins médicaux étaient absolument gratuits.

De généreuses subventions ont été accordées pour les mariages, le logement et l'achat de voitures. Maintenant, les Libyens doivent payer le prix fort pour tout.

Il a construit le plus grand système d'irrigation au monde reconnu comme «la huitième merveille du monde» dont le but était de fournir de l'eau à tous les Libyens à travers le pays.

Ses derniers mots à ses assassins furent "Qu'est-ce que je t'ai fait?"

Était-il vraiment un chef terrible ou les gens étaient-ils fatigués de lui?

Suivez moi pour plus de contenus inédits: Hamid Sam

Pourquoi Mouammar Kadhafi a-t-il été tué, et qui a fourni des aides aux rebelles pour y parvenir ?

Abdelwaheb Hammam Anciennement Ancien enseignant d'histoire 5 nov.

KADDHAFI a été assassiné par les pays occidentaux parce qu'il constituait une menace pour leurs interets dans le monde arabe et en Afrique . Et c'est SARKOZY qui a fourni l'aide aux rebelles en dépechant BHL pour les contacter. Ce sont les avions français qui les premiers ont commencer le bombardement de la Libye à la suite de la décision de l'ONU d'instaurer sur la Libye une zone d'exclusion aérienne. Sarkosy ;en criminel (envers la france et la libye car grace à l'argent de KADDHAFI qu'il est devenu président des français en 2007)en a fait une zone de bombardement aérien.

BHL avec des insurgés libyens

BHL avec des chefs de tribus libyens

Ca résume tout

Cette vidéo résume toute l'histoire de KADDHAFI avec l'occident belliqueux

Des sociétés pharmaceutiques créent des virus, ensuite des vaccins qu'elles vendent prix d'or. Il l'avait dit en 2009 .Trois ans plus tard il a été assassiné

Il etait contre l'intervention américaine en irak….

CECI EST UN RESUME DES RAISONS QUI ONT POUSSE L'OCCIDENT A L'ASSASSINER ET METTRE FIN A UN ETAT UNIFIE JADIS APPELE LA LIBYE

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les gens pensent-ils désormais que Kadhafi n'était pas un si mauvais chef d'Etat ?

Pourquoi les Britanniques n'ont-ils pas simplement pendu Napoléon Bonaparte, au lieu de lui permettre une vie de luxe en exil à Sainte-Hélène ?

Pourquoi kadhafi a été abattu plutôt que se faire arrêter et juger pour ses crimes ?

Le policier qui a tué George Floyd avait déjà fait l'objet de 18 plaintes. Pourquoi a-t-il été autorisé à rester dans les forces de police ?

Pourquoi tant de gens pensent-ils que le régime de Kadhafi était une bonne chose pour la Libye ?

Pensez-vous que Zineb el Rhazoui devrait encore avoir accès aux plateaux après qu'elle a déclaré qu'il fallait ouvrir le feu sur les émeutiers ?

Pourquoi le président du Tchad Idriss Déby participait-il à des actions militaires ?

Qui a vraiment tué Khadafi et pourquoi ?

Pourquoi n'y a-t-il aucune statue de l'homme qui a tué Hitler ?

Pourquoi on a tué Mouammar Kadhafi ?

Qui sont les partisans des rebelles en Libye qui ont renversé Kadhafi ? Sont-ils les mêmes qui soutiennent et financent également les rebelles en Syrie ?

Que devient le clan Kadhafi, dix ans après la révolution en Libye ?

Comment Mouammar Kadhafi a-t-il gouverné pendant 50 ans ?

Qu'est-il arrivé aux célèbres gardes du corps féminins de Kadhafi après sa mort ?

Quelqu'un peut-il m'expliquer ce qui se passe en Libye ; Haftar, c'est bien, ou ce n'est pas bien ?

What surprising discovery about a famous person completely changed the way you saw them?

Rachad Alabi Adekambi , Développeur web Traducteur Traduit le 9 juin

Bien que je ne l'ai jamais aimé, Mouammar Kadhafi était le BLACK PANTHER d'Afrique. Il aurait pu rendre le continent entier riche. Les Blancs seraient en train de servir les Africains. Hélas, l'Afrique ne sera plus jamais la même.

Son espace personnel était assez odieux, mais il a fait beaucoup de bonnes choses pour son peuple et pour son pays. Par exemple, jetez un œil au plus grand canal d'eau artificiel qui alimentait en eau la région aride de la Libye.

Le "Great Man-Made River" (GMMR, الـ صـ ناعي رهنلا ed uaesér nu tse (الـ عظ يم canalisations qui fournit de l'eau douce obtenue à partir de l'aquifère fossile du système aquifère de grès nubien à travers la Libye. C'est le plus grand projet d'irrigation au monde.[1] Le projet utilise un système de canalisation qui pompe l'eau du système aquifère de grès nubien du sud de la Libye vers les villes de la côte nord-méditerranéenne peuplée de la Libye, notamment Tripoli et Benghazi. L'eau couvre une distance allant jusqu'à 1 600 kilomètres et fournit 70 % de toute l'eau douce utilisée en Libye.

Il a tout donné aux Libyens. Il a fait le paradis sur terre dans une terre africaine.

Mais les Libyens sont le groupe le plus ingrat du monde.

Peu importe s'il aimait les femmes. Qui ne les aime pas ? (sauf les gays, peut-être). Peu importait qu'il ait des tendances de tyran mais qui ne les aurait pas eues ?, surtout quand on a le pouvoir de gouverner un pays entier pendant des décennies !!

Palais royal de Tripoli

C'EST CE QUE LA JUSTICE OCCIDENTALE ET LES DROITS DE L'HOMME ONT FAIT À LA LIBYE.

Saluons tous le sens occidental de la justice et la soif d'argent !

Questions similaires

Avez-vous déjà été complètement surpris de voir à quel point une certaine célébrité est agréable dans la vie réelle ?

Quelle célébrité devrait réaliser qu'elle n'est plus célèbre ?

Quelle personne décédée, si elle etait ramenée à la vie, serait la plus surprise d'apprendre qu'elle est devenue célèbre à titre posthume ?

Quelle personne célèbre dans l'histoire, idolâtrée, était en fait une personne horrible ?

Quel produit, qui vous a coûté 10€ ou moins, a complètement changé votre vie ?

Une personne célèbre a-t-elle déjà frappé à votre porte de manière inattendue ?

Quel regard de célébrité vous donne envie d'y plonger ?

Quelle est la célébrité que vous n’arrivez pas à prendre au sérieux ?

De quelle manière une personne célèbre a-t-elle ruiné sa carrière en quelques secondes ?

Quelles photos de personnes célèbres sont méconnaissables ?

Quelle personne célèbre avait la vie secrète la plus terrifiante?

Quelle est la personne la plus célèbre de votre famille ?

Quelle personnalité célèbre est née le même jour que vous ?

Comment avez-vous découvert votre zébritude ?

Quelle célébrité vous a un jour surpris par sa grossièreté ?

That most Africans are poor, not because they really are poor, but because someone decides to describe them as such.

Innocent Masengo , Lecturer Language and Communication at Makerere University (2008-present) Updated Aug 23, 2020 · Upvoted by Abhiishek Suresh , former Engineering Intern at Facts and Trivia (2010) and Satheeshkumar. D , Master of Science Geography & General Knowledge, University of Madras (2014)

My grandfather is ‘poor’. He certainly lives on “less than a dollar a day”. He is now 95 years old. In his nine and a half decades on earth, he has never lacked, and he has never begged. He only attended one year at a mission school in the 1930s and learnt how to read and write. This is how he pulls it off: When he wants food, he goes to the banana plantation, looks at tens of bunches of matooke (banana) and decides which to harvest for the day’s dinner. Adjacent to the plantation is a sweet potato garden, cassava garden, yams and finger millet. To the south of the banana plantation are beans, cow peas or peanuts gardens. Down the valley is grazing land with tens of Frisian and cross-breed cattle. They provide him with milk daily, 365 days a year.

He also has about 20 goats. In Uganda, goat milk was generally not considered palatable, possibly due to the abundance of cow milk, so we never milked goats. He would sell a couple of them to supplement income from other produce to send his children to school. He also reared a couple of chickens, more as a hobby.

The farm produces more than he can consume. He sells the surplus to afford such essential services as kerosene (recently upgraded to solar), soap, sugar (at his age he no longer takes sugar, he uses honey — doctor’s orders).

Scattered across the farm are sugarcane (for eating, not for making sugar) and fruit trees (guava, mango, pawpaw, avocado, orange, passion fruit, pineapple).

He drinks fresh juice from mangoes and passion fruit. As is evident, everything here is on a subsistence basis, but very organic. He has done this for the past 75 years.

He had eleven children, my mother being his first born. He sent all of them to school, saw eight of them through college. He sold at least two cows, some goats and some produce each school term to send his children to school.

I went to live at my grandfather's place when I was 5 years old. I left when I was 14 (my family lived in an urban area). I learnt how to farm, milk cows, tether goats, harvest fruits (by climbing the fruit tree) and harvesting honey (at night using smoke).

Why the long story?

My grandfather, just like millions of other Africans that live like him, is considered poor. He rarely holds money, and he rarely needs it. He produces most of what he needs. But using the standard World Bank/IMF description of ‘poor’, my grandfather is poor. I live in the city and earn about USD 12,000 a year after tax, which in Uganda is a decent salary. But I can hardly match my grandfather in terms of providing for my family with fresh milk, fresh food and fresh fruits.

This is one thing most people that watch International media do not know about Africa: not all Africans are poor, many simply live differently than you.

(Image source: Wikimedia Commons)

Ugandan farmer riding bananas from his farm to the market. Most people from other backgrounds would pity him, and consider him 'poor'.

Edit 1: Thank you John Kim for the edit suggestions. Much appreciated.

Edit 2: I have added a picture I took with my grandfather and grandmother on 2/6/2020. I visited them as soon as the Covid-19 lockdown was eased in my country. They live 350km from the city where I live. I enjoyed tons of stories and experiences from as far back as the late 1930s. They are such a loving and jolly couple.

Picture taken with my HTC M10 phone.

Tebay Hiba , knows Arabic Updated Jul 29, 2020

Being African does not mean being black.

Moroccans,

Sisouka28

Algerians,

these are just some examples of what an average north African person looks like.

And lastly a picture of me, a proud young African lady.

Process text documents easily using our advanced Java library.
Full-featured API to create, update, convert, and render all your word docs. 40+ file formats supported.

More Answers Below

[What are some amazing facts about Africa?]

Why do some people call Africa a country not continent?

What are some of the most mind-blowing facts about Africa? What are some things that would surprise even people who live there?

Naomi Navec studied Psychology & Philosophy at The Modern Mystery School Updated Mar 8, 2020 Upvoted by Anna Benson lives in The World (2006-present)

First of all most people think Africa is a COUNTRY when it's actually a CONTINENT

Most people think that everyone in Africa is poor, NO! A lot of people in Africa are rich and are living BETTER lives than those in America. By better I mean, they buy their own propeties, build their homes, no mortgages, no taxes.

Most people think that everyone in Africa is uneducated and uncivilized. NO!

There's uneducated people for sure but that's not everywhere in Africa!

What I hear the most, is when people think everyone in Africa is black lol and looks like this

AFRICANS COME IN DIFFERENT SHADES AND COLOUR

Colin Riegels , Lived in five different countries Updated Nov 2, 2020

The two things that I find people most commonly overlook about Africa are: How big it is. It is massive. Madagascar alone (the island off the East Coast) would stretch from London to Rome if it was placed in Europe. And it is tiny compared to the mainland.

That its population is diverse. People think “African” means “black person”. But significant swathes of Africa have predominantly Arab populations, and there are also a significant number of people from the Indian subcontinent who have lived there for many generations.

Jamie Quan , Videography and video editor (2010-present) Updated Feb 20

Africa is a beautiful place. i know most foreigners outside the continent see this anytime the word Africa pops up. thats true but Africa is not entirely this. villages are developing into towns and towns are growing to cities.

this is what the CNN and BBC dont show you and they have succeeded in creating this wretched impression about Africa to the world.

this is my neighborhood

similar to the first image but looks improved.

this is the city

i use the lane on the right to work everyday.too much traffic in the morning tho.

an evening shot of the same city.

Accra,Ghana.I love my country, and for sure the …
Chiamaka Amadi , Crew Member at McDonald's (2017-present) Updated May 15, 2017

My sister told me a story once, it happened at the Ivy League school she goes to.
Girl: “Oh, you grew up in Africa? It must’ve been so tough for you!”

Boy: “My parents can buy your parents.”

Then he walked away.

Contrary to popular belief, Africans are not all poor. And they’re not all uneducated. Matter of fact, when given the opportunity to get an education and make something of themselves, they can run circles around most people from the Western world.

Fiona Chandler , Manager (2003-present) Updated Apr 11, 2019

That Africa is in no way the same as it is portrayed in the media.
I have seen so many movies where a person says they are going to Africa to help poverty or orphans or something. When they get there, this is how they make it seem.

(This photo is literally what I found after googling 'Africa')

And while I love the fact that Africa has such a vast amount of animals and has such beautiful terrains, not all of it is jungle.

My brother has literally been asked by a girl if he rides lions as a legitimate question. No trace of sarcasm on their face. It's that bad. (We don't by the way, we've never even

Anthony M Anderson , Student Updated Nov 22

Libya was the only country in the world to have one colour on the flag
This is the true fact! Libya during the reign of muammar gaddafi had one colour on the flag. It was called the green flag.
Guillaume Bonnet L'histoire est une chance pour les vivantsTraducteur · 2 ans Quel est l'acte le plus étrange réalisé par un leader mondial?

(What is the strangest act carried out by a world leader?)

Il y en a beaucoup, mais le discours de Mouammar Kadhafi à l'ONU était épique. Il devait parler pendant 15 minutes mais a continué pendant plus d'une heure et demie. Certains des faits saillants sont ci-dessous:

1 - "Notre fils" Obama

Kadhafi a adressé ses félicitations à "notre fils Obama" à l'occasion de son premier discours à l'ONU.

"Obama est une lueur dans l'obscurité pendant quatre ou huit ans", a déclaré Kadhafi. "Nous sommes contents et heureux si Obama peut rester pour toujours en tant que président des États-Unis."

2 - Conseil terroriste ou Conseil de sécurité des Nations Unies

"Nous ne sommes pas déterminés à obéir ou à adhérer aux résolutions du Conseil de sécurité dans sa composition en ce moment", a déclaré Kadhafi. "Il ne devrait pas être appelé le Conseil de sécurité, il devrait être appelé le conseil terroriste.

Il a même déchiré la charte de l'ONU.

3 - Grippe porcine: les capitalistes l'ont fait

"Le virus porcin est peut-être sorti en plein air après s'être échappé d'un laboratoire. Il a peut-être été assemblé dans un laboratoire par les militaires…. Nous fabriquons parfois des virus dans un laboratoire, puis ils fabriquent des virus pour des sociétés capitalistes qui feront des vaccinations et gagneront de l'argent."

4 - La guerre en Irak, "mère de tous les maux"

"Soixante-cinq guerres offensives se sont déroulées sans aucune action collective des Nations Unies pour les empêcher", a déclaré Kadhafi. Il a noté la guerre en Irak, en particulier, comme étant "la mère de tous les maux".

5 - JFK tué parce qu'il voulait enquêter sur les Israéliens

"Pourquoi cet Israélien a-t-il tué le tueur de J Kennedy ?", a demandé Kadhafi, après avoir noté que Jack Ruby, "un Israélien", avait tué l'assassin de Kennedy, Lee Harvey Oswald. "Le monde entier devrait savoir que Kennedy voulait enquêter sur le réacteur nucléaire du démon israélien", a déclaré Kadhafi.

Kadhafi a également appelé à une nouvelle enquête sur l'assassinat du Martin Luther King Jr. "Son assassinat était un complot, et nous devrions savoir pourquoi il a été tué et qui l'a tué", a déclaré Qaddafi.

6 - L'ONU devrait déménager en Libye

"Vous me remercierez de ne pas avoir voyagé pendant 20 heures à cet endroit."

La vidéo complète ici:

The green flag was the official flag of Libya from 1977 until the overthrow of Muammar Gaddafi in 2011 during the first Libyan civil war.

Therefore the green flag was replaced by the pre 1969 flag of Libya which was used during the monarchical rule from 1951 until the Libyan revolution in 1969 led by Muammar Gaddafi.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les gens pensent-ils désormais que Kadhafi n'était pas un si mauvais chef d'Etat ?

Pourquoi les Britanniques n'ont-ils pas simplement pendu Napoléon Bonaparte, au lieu de lui permettre une vie de luxe en exil à Sainte-Hélène ?

Pourquoi kadhafi a été abattu plutôt que se faire arrêter et juger pour ses crimes ?

Le policier qui a tué George Floyd avait déjà fait l'objet de 18 plaintes. Pourquoi a-t-il été autorisé à rester dans les forces de police ?

Pourquoi tant de gens pensent-ils que le régime de Kadhafi était une bonne chose pour la Libye ?

Pensez-vous que Zineb el Rhazoui devrait encore avoir accès aux plateaux après qu'elle a déclaré qu'il fallait ouvrir le feu sur les émeutiers ?

Pourquoi le président du Tchad Idriss Déby participait-il à des actions militaires ?

Qui a vraiment tué Khadafi et pourquoi ?

Pourquoi n'y a-t-il aucune statue de l'homme qui a tué Hitler ?

Pourquoi on a tué Mouammar Kadhafi ?

Qui sont les partisans des rebelles en Libye qui ont renversé Kadhafi ? Sont-ils les mêmes qui soutiennent et financent également les rebelles en Syrie ?

Que devient le clan Kadhafi, dix ans après la révolution en Libye ?

Comment Mouammar Kadhafi a-t-il gouverné pendant 50 ans ?

Qu'est-il arrivé aux célèbres gardes du corps féminins de Kadhafi après sa mort ?

Quelqu'un peut-il m'expliquer ce qui se passe en Libye ; Haftar, c'est bien, ou ce n'est pas bien ?

Stefan Pociask Veteran. Wildlife researcher. Raptor rehabber. Engineer.
Updated Apr 12, 2017

That size DOES matter. Because of the distortion of typical maps, most people are unaware of how GIGANTIC Africa is. I promise you'll be surprised. Many of you are not as big as you think you are. To demonstrate… and enlighten, we will look at country sizes as they appear on globes, instead of on maps. So, if we look at the continent of Africa, and just slide other countries of the globe, on top of Africa, we find that we can fit all these other countries into Africa.

Let's start with the continental United States. That fills up just a small part of Africa. Next, let's slide all of China into …

Jammie , studied at New York University Answered Sat

My grandfather is ‘poor’. He certainly lives on “less than a dollar a day”. He is now 95 years old. In his nine and a half decades on earth, he has never lacked, and he has never begged. He only attended one year at a mission school in the 1930s and learned how to read and write. This is how he pulls it off: When he wants food, he goes to the banana plantation, looks at tens of bunches of matooke (banana), and decides which to harvest for the day’s dinner. Adjacent to the plantation is a sweet potato garden, cassava garden, yams, and finger millet. To the south of the banana plantation are bean

Lucas Cutrim , lives in Rio de Janeiro Updated Apr 15, 2017

Africans are not only black.
When you think of Africans, you probably think of those people:

First image after typing “Africans” on Google.

However, what most people are not aware of, is that these people are also Africans.

North Africans are mostly of Arab and Berber influence, they're not black. South Africa, and to some extent Angola, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, have sizable European white populations.

This is why I dislike the term "African American" as a synonym to black. Charlize Theron and Candice Swanepoel are Africans as much as white Americans are from the Americas.

What also bothers me is when people are called African Americans when they have absolutely no link to America, but due to their color. This happened to her:

Naomi Harris is not African American. She's British.

Erness Mou , studied at High Schools Updated Sep 2, 2017 · Upvoted by Rui Xin Oh , B.S. from Northwestern University (2021)

It's not a steaming-hot warzone full of black malnourished poor people. Not everyone is black. In fact, Africa is the most diverse when it comes to skin colors: We have white people in the South all the way to black people in the center and light-skinned people in the north.

It's not always hot. Yes, some countries do have high temperatures but it's not like what you think - it gets cold during the winter in some countries, and in some, it even snows!

Not everyone's poor. Of course there are many poor people in Africa, but not everyone is as poor as you think. Here are some images to change how y

Tiny Nair , Cardiologist at PRS Hospital, Trivandrum
Answered Nov 12, 2017

He considered himself lucky to have got the job; as a gardener. At age 18, Hamilton Naki left his home at the impoverished region of Transkei, and came to Cape Town in search of a job. His education got truncated after 6 years in school because lack of money.

The young 'black' energetic gardener at the University of Cape Town (UCT) somehow got transferred to the animal research lab, may be because the stench did not attract the 'fair skin' administrators. He started his career cleaning the animal cages, learnt to anesthetize them and later help in dissection of the carcass. The trainee surgeons

Teth Grey , studied Biochemistry at Sokoto State University
Updated Jan 11, 2018

Owh Sweet Africa, where should I start?
1. Do you know that Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

2. And talking about taking it a little too far, in South Africa you are legally allowed to attach flamethrowers to your car in order to deter car jacking, or so I've heard ;)

3. Mali is home of one of the oldest universities in the world, established in 982 CE.

Apparently the place was so dope it was referred to as “the Paris of the medieval world” (please excuse the English)

4. Also the world’s biggest frog up and decided.

Silas O. Abayomi , 35 years of practicing journalist, editor, and proofreader. Updated Jul 29, 2020

There are so many things people do NOT KNOW ABOUT AFRICA; though, Africa has been around for thousands of years-from the days of ancient Egypt-where civilization spread into the world. Africa has come a long way, witnessed and survived all yesterday's powers-Assyria, Babylon (modern-day Iraq); Persia later Media and Persia (modern-day Iran); Greece, Rome, and more recently, European seven colonial brothers-British, French, German, Portuguese, Spanish, Italian, and Belgian.
Africa has been in the news and world history for ages; unfortunately, only a little is known about Africa by peoples who are not Africans.

Because of what Euro-American media continue to push into global markets for immediate and international audience to know, which IS NOT DIFFERENT from what European scholars from pre-colonial days through many eras of occupation and annexation of Africa informed their home audience.

Unfortunately, we have lived with what might have been half-truths; or stories far from the truth for centuries.

Work like this, mostly from Africans will however, correct some of the past misrepresentations and present Africa exactly as it is with all supporting evidence and available facts, previous histories and news failed to take into consideration.

Here are some Things People do not Know about Africa.

The Twenty Things People Do Not Know About Africa:

First, Africa is A CONTINENT NOT A COUNTRY. Africa has fifty-two independent countries, hundreds of islands on Atlantic and Indian Oceans, also around Mediterranean Sea in the north. Besides, it has eight territories, these countries are located within the six geographical regions on Africa continent. North Africa-Morocco, Algeria Tunisia, Libya and Egypt; in West Africa are sixteen countries-Nigeria, Benin Republic, Togo, Ghana, Cote d' Ivoire, Sierra Leone, Liberia, Guinea, Gambia, Senegal, Mali, Mauritania, Western Sahara/Polisario, Burkina Faso, Niger and Chad; Horn of Africa- are Ethiopia, Eritrea, Somalia, North and Southern Sudan; in Central Africa-are-Democratic Republic of Congo, Cameroon, Republic of Congo, Central African Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Angola, Rwanda and Burundi; in East Africa are-Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, and Malawi. In South Africa-are-Zambia, Zimbabwe, Mozambique, Botswana, Namibia, Lesotho, Swaziland, and South Africa.

Azores (Portugal)
Portugal
Spain
EUROPE
Turkey ASIA
15° W
Madeira Is. (Portugal)
Tunisia
Mediterranean Sea
Syria
Israel
Iran
Iraq
MIDDLE EAST
30°N
Morocco
Jordan
Persian Gulf
Canary Is. (Spain)
Algeria
Libya
Egypt
Kuwait
Western Sahara
TROPIC OF CANCER
Qatar
Atlantic Ocean
U.A.E.
Oman
Saudi Arabia
Mauritania
Niger
Nile River
Red Sea
Cape Verde
Senegal
Mali
Eritrea
Arabian Sea
15° N
Chad
Yemen
Burkina Faso
Benin
Lake Chad
Sudan
Gulf of Aden
Gambia
Guinea-Bissau
Guinea
Togo
Djibouti
Socotra (Yemen)
Cote D'Ivoire
Nigeria
South Sudan
Ethiopia
Somalia
Sierra Leone
Central African Rep.
Liberia
Ghana
Gulf of Guinea
Cameroon
Uganda
Indian Ocean
0° EQUATOR
Eq. Guinea
Rwanda
Kenya
Sao Tome & Principe
Dem. Rep. of the Congo
Lake Victoria
Zanzibar (Tanzania)
800 mi
Congo
Gabon
Burundi
Tanzania
800 km
Cabinda (Angola)
Malawi
Seychelles
AFRICA
Angola
Lake Malawi
Comoros
15° S
PRIME MERIDIAN
Zambia
Mozambique Channel
Namibia
Zimbabwe
Mauritius
TROPIC OF CAPRICORN
Botswana
Reunion (France)
Atlantic Ocean
Madagascar
Mozambique
30° S
South Africa
Swaziland
worldatlas
Indian Ocean
Lesotho
60° E
30° W
15° W
0°
15° E
30° E
45° E
©GraphicMaps.com

Second, Africa is the third largest continent after Asia, the Americas; Africa has a landmass of over 30 million square kilometers or 11.7 million square miles. However, if Americas are taken into two separate continents-North America and South America, Africa becomes the second largest-and its largest city is Lagos, Nigeria with over 18 million residents.

[49 Amazing Facts About Africa | The 7 Continents of the World]

Third, Africa true size-twice the size of Russia; about four times bigger than United States. Africa can hold-Mexico, China, India, United States, Western and Eastern Europe, Japan, many more Islands and territories.

The True Size of Africa

A small contribution in the fight against rampant Innumpancy, by Kai Krause

Graphic layout for visualization only (some countries are cut and rotated)
But the conclusions are very accurate: refer to table below for exact data

COUNTRY	AREA x 1000 km²
China	9.597
USA	9.629
India	3.287
Mexico	1.964
Peru	1.285
France	633
Spain	506
Papua New Guinea	462
Sweden	441
Japan	378
Germany	357
Norway	324
Italy	301
New Zealand	270
United Kingdom	243
Nepal	147
Bangladesh	144
Greece	132
TOTAL	30.102
AFRICA	30.221

In addition to the well known social issues of illiteracy and innumeracy, there also should be such a concept as "innumpancy", meaning insufficient geographical knowledge.

A survey with random American schoolkids let them guess the population and land area of their country. Not entirely unexpected, but still rather unsettling, the majority chose "1-2 billion" and "largest in the world", respectively.

Even with Asian and European college students, geographical estimates were often off by factors of 2-3. This is partly due to the highly distorted nature of the predominantly used mapping projections (such as Mercator).

A particularly extreme example is the worldwide misjudgement of the true size of Africa. This single image tries to embody the massive scale, which is larger than the USA, China, India, Japan and all of Europe..... combined!

creative commons No Rights Reserved This work is placed in the Public Domain

Netherlands
Belgium
Portugal
Spain
France
Germany
Switzerland
Italy
USA
Eastern Europe
India part 2
India
China
China part 2
Great Britain
Japan

Fourth, Africa has the largest and second hottest desert on earth-the SAHARA DESERT. Sahara Desert covers approximately the entire size of United States of about 9,200,000 square kilometers. The desert covers an extensive landmass from Atlas Mountains in Morocco through Nile Valley in Egypt, but ends in Sudan. The desert is bordered on the southern fringe by Sahel; on the west, Ahaggar Mountains in Algeria; in the north, Tiberti Mountains in Chad, Air Mountains in Niger; Tenere in Libya.

Fifth, Africa has Atlas Mountains-these are series of mountains from Morocco through Algeria to Tunisia; stretching 2,500 kilometers or 1,600 miles. These mountains are similar to Andes of South America and Alps of Europe. The range's highest peak is the Toubkal with 4,167 meters or 13,671 ft in Southern Morocco. The Atlas Mountains separate Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean Sea coastline from Sahara Desert.

Sixth, Africa has the second largest rainforest in the world after the Amazon in Brazil. It is located in equator, which run through Congo Basin on the Atlantic side of the great continent. It has precipitation of 60–160 inches or 152- 402cm; has eight or nine months of continuous rainfall all-year round. The region- Central Africa- is poetically and geographically referred to as the JEWEL OR GEOLOGICAL GARDEN OF AFRICA. It is famous for different wildlife: the mountain gorilla, chimpanzees, elephants, okapi, hippos, white rhino, black mamba, king cobra, zebra, pangolin, monkeys, leopards, lions. The African "Amazon" or rainforest represents 18% of world's remaining rainforest of 50 million hectares; Democratic Republic of Congo (DCR) accounts for 20 million hectares or 40%. In the region are: 11,000 species of birds; home to 10,000 plants; 400 species of animals; 700 types of fish. The Africa rainforest holds 36 billion tons of carbon-dioxide in its vegetation, second after the Amazon of Brazil of 100 billion tons carbon dioxide in the world.

Inside one of the oldest primary rainforests in Africa - CNN Video

The OKAPI FROM CENTRAL AFRICA.

African Grey Parrot.

Picture Credits: Species Profile: African Grey Parrot

Cameroon Pangolin.

Seventh, Africa is the home to the world second longest river, The AGELESS NILE. A river of great historical importance, it meanders from the great lake region of East Africa-from Lake Victoria- through several Africa nations to Egypt, before discharging into Mediterranean Sea. A river of two colors, blue in Ethiopia-from silt deposit that makes the water turn dark brown or black; white in Southern Sudan, Rwanda, Democratic Republic of Congo. Nile River supports more than three hundred million lives on daily basis; from seafoods provision to navigation, eco protection, irrigation needs, electricity generation from dams it powers. Nile River is one of African heritages of unquantifiable or priceless value.

Lower Egypt
Nile River
Upper Egypt
Meroe
Blue Nile
Simian Mountains
Lake Tana
Ethiopia
White Nile
Rwenzori Mountains
Lake Victoria
City of Rhapta?

The Nile

HoboTraveler.com 2009

The Nile River
©2008 HowStuffWorks
Mediteranean sea
Nile River Delta
Rosetta & Damietta branches
EGYPT
SAUDI ARABIA
The Great Bend
Red Sea
City of Khartoum
White Nile & Blue Nile intersection
SUDAN
ETHIOPIA
Lake Victoria
UGANDA
DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF THE CONGO
KENYA
Indian Ocean

The Nile Route or Course.

Eighth, Africa's Congo River is the second largest river in the world by DISCHARGE OR WATER FLOW RATES AND VOLUME; after Amazon River with a phenomenal discharge of 100,000 m3/per second, Congo River discharges 41,200 cubit meter per second. More than two-thirds of the river lies in Democratic Republic of Congo; this river support other regional waters before empty self into Atlantic Ocean.

Congo River
Au-delà des ténèbres
un film de Thierry Michel
réalisateur de "Mobutu, roi du Zaïre"
rfi
fidh
JEUNE AFRIQUE

Courtesy of tyscaac / panoramio.com

The mighty Congo: River of life and power/The mighty Congo: River of life and power

Ninth, Africa has the largest wildlife in the world- from the open grassland in Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania, Rwanda, Burundi to bushveld Southern Africa.

Between five to seven million square kilometers, millions of animals of different makes and designs roam the open grassland. The carnivores, herbivores, amphibians, marine lives, insects, birds, reptiles, have continued to co-habit with man for millennials in Africa. However, the most popular among the animals are BIG FIVE-elephants, lions, leopards, buffalo, and rhino; they have lived in Africa for countless centuries.

Africa's Big Five Safari Animals
Leopard
Elephant
Black & White Rhino
Cape Buffalo
Lion
tripsavvy

Moreover, African bushveld (South Africa) and savannah region on East African corridor continue to play a vital role of home to small and big, wild and moderate animals. The big cats-lions-king of the jungle; leopards-the jewel of the jungle-and their cousin-cheetah, regardless of physiological and anatomical differences, these animals will always make Africa their permanent home.

Tenth, the Great Migration: every year, over three to five million animals-in a multiple large formations leave Serengeti in Tanzania to Maasai Mara in Kenya in an eighth month trip that has become a ritual without equal ANYWHERE IN THE WORLD. From Serengeti Plains in Tanzania, wildebeest, zebras, deer, begin a 2,000-mile-journey-of-eight-month-round-trip.

GRUMETI GAME RESERVE
JUNE
NOVEMBER
LOLIONDO GAME CONTROLLED AREA
LAKE NATRON
GRUMETI RIVER
MBALAGETI RIVER
SERENGETI
NATIONAL PARK
NGORONGORO CONSERVATION AREA
DECEMBER
APRIL
MASWA GAME RESERVE
TANZANIA
MARCH
JANUARY - FEBRUARY
ARUSHA

Kenya
AUG
TO OCT
Mara River
MASAI MARA
NATIONAL RESERVE
NORTHERN
SERENGETI
JUL
Grumeti River
APR
to JUN
NOV
to DEC
Tanzania
SERENGETI
NATIONAL PARK
Mbalageti River
JAN
to MAR
LAKE NDUTU
NGORONGORO
CONSERVATION AREA
MASAWA
GAME RESERVE

THE GREAT MIGRATION
Lake Victoria
Musoma
MASAI MARA
Lemala Mara
Kliens Camp
Simiyu
Sayari Camp
Serengeti Bushtops
SERENGETI
Kirawira Tented Camp
Grumeti Serengeti
Simiyu
Sasakwa Hill
Olakira Camp
Serengeti Serena
Kati Kati
Lemala Ewanjan
Serengeti Migration Camp
Nduara Loliondo Camp
Simiyu
Lake Natron
Lemala Ngorongoro
Lake Masek Camp
Ngorongoro Wildlife Lodge
Ngorongoro Crater Lodge
Ngorongoro Sopa
Crater Forest Camp
Gibbs Farm
Ngorongoro Farm
Hatari Lodge
Arusha Safari Lodge
Kigongoni Lodge
Ngorongoro Serena
Lake Manyara Serena
Lake Manyara Tree Lodge
Tloma
Arusha Coffee Lodge
Maramboi
Tarangire Treetops
Tarangire Sopa
Lemala Tarangire
Sanctuary Swala Burunge
Olivers Camp
TARANGIRE
Kambi Ya Tembo
Mt. Kilimanjaro
Olasiti
Arusha
Mount Meru Lodge
Serena Mountain Village
Shinyanga
L. Eyasi
L. Kitangiri
Babati
Same
Season Key
WET
DRY
March
April
May June
July
August
September
October
November
December

Eleventh, Africa has the largest number of spoken languages in the world; Africa languages are classified into six different groups, with several thousands-sub-divisions.

Afroasiatic
Nilo-Saharan
Niger–Congo
Bantu
Khoisan
Indo-European Austronesian

Español
Português
English
Français
Nederlands
Español y Guaraní
Español y lenguas nativas

Empire in Africa 1914
British Territory
French Territory
Belgian Territory
Portuguese Territory
Spanish Territory
Italian Territory
German Territory

LANGUAGE FAMILIES AND LANGUAGES OF AFRICA
Niger-Congo-Kordofanian
Bantu: Ganda, Kongo, Luba, Rwanda, Shona, Swahili, Tswana, Xhosa, Zulu
Non-Bantu: Fulani, Ibo, Mandingo, Mende, Mossi, Twi, Wolof, Yoruba
Nilo-Saharan
Kanuri, Masai, Nandi, Nubian, Nuer, and others
Hamito-Semitic (Afro-Asiatic)
Amharic, Arabic, Hausa, Oromo (Galla), Somali, Tamazight, and others
Khoisan
!Khung, Kxoe, Nama, and others
Austronesian (Malay-Polynesian)
Malagasy
Indo-European
Afrikaans, English, and others
The language families and languages shown are not the only ones in a particular area and are not confined to that area.
Arabic
Arabic
Tamazight
Wolof
Mandingo
Mende
Mossi
Fulani
Twi
Yoruba
Ibo
Kanuri
Hausa
Nubian
Amharic
Somali
Nuer
Nandi
Oromo
Ganda
Masai
Rwanda
Luba
Kongo
Swahili
!Khung
Kxoe
Shona
Tswana
Zulu
Nama
Xhosa
Afrikaans
Malagasy
© 2010 EB, Inc.

Shona
Kirundi
Tshiluba
IciBemba
Wolof
Creole
Mauritian
Luo
Igbo
Oromo
Afrikaans
Chinyanja
Isizulu
Kinyarwanda
Somali
Malagasy
Runyakitara
Setswana
Chichewa
Sindebele
Kikongo
Yoruba
Hausa
Sesotho
Ewegbe
Tigrinya
Luganda
IsiXhosa
Amharic
Kreol
Kiswahili
Sesotwa
Lingala
Leboa
Akan

[South African Languages | Statistics and graphs]

Besides, Africa has one of the oldest and most ancient languages in the world; even though, Latin, Greek and Sanskrit-the three languages-that make up Indo-European languages have been around for millennials; it may interest you to know that some of African languages are as old as these three languages, perhaps, older. These languages are:

1. Ancient Egypt

2. Ancient Meroitic

3. Old Nubian

4. Tifinagh:

5. Ge’ez

6. Nsibidi:

[6 most ancient African languages that shaped the world - Face2Face Africa]

Twelfth, Africa is a home to the tallest and shortest humans in the world. The Dinka people are the tallest ethnic group in Africa domicile in the East and West Banks of Nile River, principally found in Abyei area of Angok Dinka in Southern Kordofan of Sudan. The Dinka people call themselves MOINJAANG, meaning "People of the Peoples." Average Male Height in 1953/1954 Height survey was: 182.6 cm (5ft 11.9inc); in 1995 survey, average male height was 176.4cm (5ft 9.4 inc).

Apart from Dinka people, the Tutsi of Rwanda and Burundi are very tall averaging between 5ft and 6ft. Also, the Maasai people in Kenya, average height is 6ft.

14

Collectionjfm www.delcampe.net

Thirteenth, Africa is a home to the shortest people on earth; the Pygmies of Congo or “Central African Foragers”; the Pygmies of Congo are classified into three groups: The Bambenga, live in Cameroon, Gabon, Democratic Republic of Congo; the Bambuti, found in Democratic Republic of Congo; and the Batwa or Twa in Rwanda, Burundi, Angola, Namibia, Zambia, Uganda, Tanzania, and Democratic Republic of Congo.

Fourteenth, the oldest university in the world is in Fez, Morocco; Al-Qarawwiyyin University was established in AD 859 by a woman, Fatimah al-Fihri, her family migrated from Qayrawan in Tunisia some 1,200 years ago. When her father, Mohammed al-Fihris died, Fatimah and her sister, Mariam, inherited enormous wealth; she decided to build a mosque for her community and a Madrasa. The Madrasa soon became a global center of learning, which offered courses in calligraphy, Arabic grammar, Sufism, medicine, music, and astronomy.

Fifteenth, the oldest library is located in Fez, Morocco at al-Qarawiyyin's University; the library has over 4,000 manuscripts, Rare and Ancient book date back to 9th century. Among the rare collection in the library is the 9th century AD Hadith, which record says is the oldest in Muslim world.

There are so many things on the continent of Africa, most people do not know, just because, Africa and Africans for a long period have been wrongly misrepresented.

ALL PICTURES SOURCED FROM GOOGLE .

Uche Metuh Wonder (Nigerian) Woman Answered Feb 10, 2018

Many foreigners are ignorant of the fact that there are:

Rich & Middle class families in Africa.
Africans who are actually richer & have better lives than some foreigners.
Africans who live normal westernized lifestyles in Africa.
I'll quote @David Dasa again from 1 of my previous answers.

"Thank you very much for this answer. I know a lot of middle class people here in Nigeria who grew up richer than a lot of Americans. I mean sure on average people in the West have a better standard of living but a lot of us live pretty decent lives here"
Yes! Many foreigners can't reconcile any form of progression or wealth with anyone from the African continent.

However, this is partly Africa's problem. We've been sold the western culture so much that we buy it, know it intimately while they remain clueless about the African culture.

I'm Nigerian.

I grew up in a pretty pricey neighbourhood where houses go for $350,000 and above. Compared to places in bigger Nigerian cities like Abuja or Lagos, this price is just pocket change to many.

Yes. Real estate is the shit in Nigeria. It defies the law of, "Whatever goes up, must come down". Rental prices keep going up regardless of any recession.

When that neighbourhood I grew up in was 1st developed, it attracted many successful businessmen who craved the quiet & grandeur of the area.

*I guess this reality isn't what many foreigners would usually associate with Africans; love of finer things winks.

There's also the general assumption from the international community that any rich African is a thief or a politician. No! Back in the day, people like my father had what we know as old money. They were revered & respected. They had wealth they didn't waste nor show off.

They had businesses stretching from the northern part of the country to its southern end.

They worked hard, made a good living for themselves, & gave their children the best they could.

I was chauffeur-driven to school every day until I got older.

I went to a public school for my primary education. I knew some of my classmates who were scraping what they could to get by. Some were going for vacations in exotic places in the world. It was an interesting assortment mix of social classes.

We had about 4 cars in the house. The Nigerian society had (probably still has) zero credit culture back then so all 4 cars were bought brand new. They were Peugeot 505 & 504, I think. My father loved those cars. Eventually, he bought a Mercedes because his friends kind of succeeded in making him to but he still loved his Peugeot cars.

1 thing of surprise would be that even back then, I didn't even think of my family as moderately rich in any way. My mom beat me like crap when I misbehaved. My dad told me he was broke any chance he got until I believed him & started feeling bad for him.

My father was in a business partnership with 2 other families.

He invested heavily in various company stocks (like the big breweries, oil companies & banks) & real estate properties.

Food was never a problem. With 8 kids, our dining table at mealtimes would be the envy of many kings.

My mother always had paid hands to help in the house.

Cereal, milk, eggs & bread etc. for breakfast. Lunch was another variety of food-laden table.

From about age 8 or so, I read books from the Mills & Boon to James Patterson. My brother introduced me to Robert Ludlum. I regularly swapped books with friends at school.

I grew up watching tennis on the TV with my father in the time of Pete Sampras.

I watched many Hollywood blockbusters, the Oscars, Grammys etc. I watched The Oprah Winfrey Show on TV. I watched WWE with my brothers. I remember The Undertaker, Andrew the Giant, The Ultimate Warrior, Hulk Hogan etc. I played Play Station games & moved on to the X-Box.

It's actually silly for me to tell this story but I have to because the world knows 1 single story for Africa, The danger of a single story.

I had a colleague who wanted to tell me something which happened at the Grammys 3 years ago & she started by explaining to me what the Grammy is.

Another thing of surprise would be that we weren't even in the exceptionally rich category of Nigerians. I wanna think we were middle class. My dad just took great business risks which paid off.

Of course, my dad is long gone now, life is a bit different & there's also quite the cultural shift in Nigeria now but that was my African experience.

So when I relocated to Canada & I hear from some of my Canadian friends their stories of receiving government cheques, grants, loans, being on welfare, filing for bankruptcy, accessing community services centers & the Food Bank for food, clothes etc, it's a surprise to me.

Funny, I had assumed all white people were rich because the Hollywood movies I saw depicted them so.

What's more surprising is that many North Americans view Africans like me like I just jumped out from the jungle, & have no idea what even an electric plug is.

This assumption is what irritates me.

That just because I'm African, it's assumed that many things are beyond the scope of my understanding & very unattainable.

I've written an answer about this here What are you tired of explaining to people?

It was the same issue renowned Nigerian writer, Chimamanda Adichie experienced a few weeks ago when a French journalist asked her if Nigeria has libraries.

BUSTLE

A French Journalist Asked Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie If Nigeria Has Bookstores, And Her Response Is Everything

SOURCE: Leigh Vogel/Getty Images Entertainment/Getty Images

Her reply,

I think it reflects very poorly on French people that you have to ask me that question.
What? Our politicians are thieves but they haven't stolen so bad that Nigerians don't even have any chairs to sit on.

When I relocated to Canada, a lot of interactions I had with Canadians about Africa (Nigeria) were always negative. But lately, I've learned to move away from that sort of story to tell mine rather than that of desolation, corruption & depravity.

I went to Nigeria for my sister's wedding in 2014. When I shared the wedding pictures with my Canadian friends, their reaction had me do a double take. They didn't expect pictures like these.

Sister's wedding

Niece & nephew visit for the weekend

Nigeria has a really confusing social system.

You can build a luxury villa for yourself but you won't have the proper infrastructure (good roads, electric power, recreational parks or community centres, malls etc) around to have a complete decent lifestyle.

Many people give up & get used to it, & if they can afford it, they'd pay 10s or 100s of thousands of dollars to send their kids overseas to have a chance at a better future.

But somehow, the western world loves focusing their lenses on the negative parts of Africa. Show the world a story about extremely intelligent Nigerians & they assume those are special examples. Show them images of impoverishment or Boko Haram & they agree that's the real Africa.

54 countries & 1.2 billion people! Surely, we aren't all the same. We aren't all wealthy but we aren't all poor or miserable.

What am I saying? I'm saying I'm Nigerian. My story isn't unique & it's 1 many don't know about Africa **:).

Péter Tamas , studied at California State University, Northridge
Answered May 26, 2017

I had four friends from Africa in my first year of college. One was from Nigeria, one from Uganda, one from Ethiopia and one from Ghana.
One common characteristic that striked me the most was that they were always happy.

No matter it rained, no matter it was cold (which is very unusual for them), no matter they get a bad grade or failed an exam, no matter they struggled. They were always happy.

This happened in Hungary, a highly racist country.

I wonder how happy then people are actually in Africa. :)

Annapurna Krishjeev , A Reader of Humanity, Society and Politics.
Answered Jul 27, 2018

Africa is splitting apart.
Literally.

I learnt this just yesterday.

A large crack stretching several kilometers appeared in Kenya, extending to Ethiopia in the month of March, and it has widened in April.

It is believed that it is due to the movement of tectonic plates.

There is a probability of the continent breaking apart as it is based on two plates.

The major part is on the African or the Nubian plate. The eastern part is on the Somalian plate, which is moving apart.

See the pictures below to know more.
Image Credits: Google

Red Sea
Arabian Plate
African Plate
(Nubian)
Afar Triple
Junction
Gulf of Aden
Indian
-Aust.
Plate
East African Rift
African Plate
(Somali)
Indian
Ridge
Antarctic Plate

Rose Cruz , M.D. from Medicine and Healthcare Answered May 27, 2018

I spent 3 weeks in East Africa (Ethiopia, Kenya, Tanzania, Uganda and Rwanda) last september. There are so many wonderful stories to tell but I want to share this special one. A conversation with a local Kenyan.

Me: I need different coffee. American version coffee like cappucino or latte. Something like that.

Her: I know a place.

Me: Really, I have been in Africa for 2 week now and have not had a proper latte!

(She takes me to a coffee place)

Her: It's on me.

Me: No, you can't do that. (Thinking that I am American and I earn more thus I will have to pay for it).

Her: We Kenyans believe that we are all brothers and sisters. It’s on me. Please.

Everytime, I think about my travels, I am always struck by the kindness and generosity of people even when I have met them for the first time.

P.s. The best coffee ‘buna’ is found in Ethiopia from kaffa region.

Brian White , former Worked at Intel Answered Mar 23, 2020

Owh Sweet Africa, where should I start?
1. Do you know that Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

2. And talking about taking it a little too far, in South Africa you are legally allowed to attach flamethrowers to your car in order to deter car jacking, or so I've heard ;)

3. Mali is home of one of the oldest universities in the world, established in 982 CE.

Apparently the place was so dope it was referred to as “the Paris of the medieval world” (please excuse the English)

4. Also the world’s biggest frog up and decided ..

C. Nthenya , lives in Africa Updated Apr 28, 2017

It is not the war-torn, disease ridden backwater place that most Western media outlets make it out to be. Unlike popular belief in the west, South Africa is not the only developed, peaceful and safe country in Africa. Most African countries boast of peaceful societies, cosmopolitan cities and marked developmental growth.
There are more educated Africans in Africa than most people think. Yes, even grandmother can read and write.

Africans do not speak one Continental language, neither do they have a single uniform culture.

Swahili is predominantly an East African language spoken in Tanzania, Uganda,

Kevin D. Aslan , Entrepreneur, Author, Podcaster Answered Jun 3, 2017

Nollywood!
I'm surprised no one has mentioned that Africa (and specifically, Nigeria) happens to have the world's second largest film industry. Now granted, that's by volume of movies produced, but the result is no less extraordinary.

...an industry that's worth over $3.3 BILLION!

It all started in 1992, with the now cult-classic Living in Bondage, shot straight to video in less than a month, and which went on to sell over a MILLION copies - mostly from street vendors. And just like that, Nollywood was born.

Since then, Nollywood has gone on to produce an insane number of movies (over 1,300 in 2013

Nasim Chowdhury , Did pro bono medical work in Eastern Africa
Answered Dec 25, 2017

This is a picture I took of the back of a Chinese restaurant next to Lake Victoria in Mwanza, Tanzania.

I post it here for illustrative purposes.

Africa is not the war ravaged, drought filled, “country” commonly portrayed in the West.

Sure, one can find large pockets of poverty and strife but Africa is a continent filled with diverse cultures and languages with a multitude of climates ranging from the deserts of Libya to the beaches of Cape Town.

Ray Thabiso , The 3rd ambassador of black youths. Updated May 3, 2019

Africa is ignorantly summarised as just a country of black people, This is how big africa is. You can fit India, China, USA, France, Spain, partial Eastern Europe, Mexico, Belgium, Switzerland all into Africa, its freaking Gigantic! Okay, now come behold this

For context sake, the Africa above has fitted just about 4 billion people from those countries. The real Africa has 1.2 billion people (about 2 thirds are black)

NOW don't be fooled, this is not huge, poor infertile barren land, all those areas are literally littered (pun or not?) with resources, which everyone has been and is still scrambling.

Diram Wako Manager at The Grind Cafe (2018-present) Answered Dec 15, 2017

Africa is a continent full of abundant natural resources, but due to corruption, which runs deep, high illiteracy rate, the tribal/military conflict(genocides), this, along with other causes, leave our continent poor.

But, did you know..
Egypt is Africa's most popular tourist destination. The country receives over 10 million visitors every year. Cairo, Egypt's capital city, is also one of Africa's largest cities.

A single tribe in Kenya-called the "Kalenjin"-produces most of the world's fastest long-distance runners.

Both the world's tallest and largest land animals both come from Africa. They are

Mayank Rishu Former Intern in a Venture Capital Firm
Answered Jan 11, 2018

Let's start with it's beautiful name.

The name 'Africa' came into Western use through the Romans. The word has its roots in two different languages – in Latin ("Aprica") it means 'Sunny', and in Greek ("Aphrike") it means 'Without cold'.

Some Interesting facts listed below-

Africa is home to over 1 billion people who speak over 1,500 different languages. One in every four of the world's language are spoken only in Africa.

Africa's total size is roughly 30.37 million square kilometres, representing about a fifth of the earth's total landmass. This makes it larger than India, China, Mexico and USA.

Bhuvi Jain , Been to Africa Answered May 27, 2018

Africa conjures up an image of backwardness and people would expect, rather not expect even basic amenities there. Surprisingly during our trip to Kenya while we were going by road to Masai Mara, I was really impressed with the quality of the highway (rest of the roads were nothing to write home about at all though) and the fact that there were free to use good quality restrooms along the way which were dotted along the way which were maintained by curio shops. Shop and pee in comfort!

India sure can take a leaf from that book.

I stopped calling India more advanced after that.

Sahil Vaidya , Co-Founder at The Minimalist (2015-present) Answered Apr 20, 2018

Which country has the highest share of female politicians in its parliament? I'm sure you won't be able to guess this one.

It is Rwanda!

It’s the same country that witnessed 1 million deaths (20% population) in 1994.

Even though the catastrophe almost sounded their death knell, the nation has risen from the ashes and paved the way towards phenomenal growth.

Some HIGHLY inspiring facts about this beautiful nation:

The president made it mandatory for all citizens to go out once a month and clean the streets- and Kigali (capital) is now Africa’s cleanest city!
The government has heavily focussed on ease

Korede Wise Akinleye , lives in Lagos, Nigeria Answered Aug 3, 2017

I can tell you a few.
1. Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

2. In South Africa you are legally allowed to attach flamethrowers to your car in order to deter car jacking.

3. Timbuktu, Mali is home of one of the oldest universities in the world, established in 982 CE.

6. The official title of Idi Amin, the Ugandan dictator, was "His Excellency, President for Life, Field Marshal Al Hadji Doctor Idi Amin Dada, VC, DSO, MC, Lord of All the Beasts of the Earth and Fishes of the Seas and Conqueror of the British Empire in A

Efuare Okougbo Africa's growth depends on Africans Answered Mar 25, 2017

The Richest black man and woman in the world are from Africa.

Most people don't know that there are 12 black billionaires in the world.

Three of them are women. Nine are men.

The Richest black man and woman in the world are from Africa.

Nigeria and Angola respectively.

Out of the nine male black billionaires two are American one is Saudi Arabian the remaining six are African.

Out of the three black female billionaires in the world two are African. The other is American.

Tom Kratman , former Regular Army Infantry Enlisted, NCO, and Officer at U.S. Army (1974-2006) Answered Aug 21, 2019

A. That aid to Africa does a lot more harm than good
B. That, in Kenyan economist James Shikwati's words, if the aid stopped the average African wouldn't even notice (because something north of 95% of it is syphoned off and deposited in overseas accounts by Africa's almost unbelievably corrupt rulers).

C. That if trends for the last few decades continue unabated eventually the entire population will be in refugee camps. Continue with Quora+ Unlock this answer and browse ad-free by joining Quora+

Ronnie Otieno , I live in Africa so I know a thing or 10,000 about it Answered Jun 4, 2017

The richest man in History Mansa Musa was from Africa.
He had a net worth of approximately 400 billion dollars in today's money.

He was the tenth king of Mali empire of West Africa.

At the time of Musa's rise to the throne, the Malian Empire consisted of territory formerly belonging to the Ghana Empire in present-day southern Mauritania and in Melle (Mali) and the immediate surrounding areas. Musa held many titles, including Emir of Melle, Lord of the Mines of Wangara, Conqueror of Ghanata, and at least a dozen others. It is said that Mansa Musa had conquered 24 cities, each with surrounding distance.

Chayan Das , studies at R. V. M (2022)

Myth #17: There is no technical progress in Africa.

We've been taught that Africa is made up of developing countries. But this does not mean that this continent lives in the Middle Ages. 90% of Africans have cell phones and there are programmers who create their own applications and gadgets. For example, local developers have created a service for farmers with recommendations on cattle breeding and information on natural disasters. In addition, production is well developed in Africa and in some countries, large machinery, such as automobiles, is produced.

Myth #16: Africa is a hot desert.

Often,

Patrick Crosset , worked at Africa Answered Feb 8, 2018

There are thousands of things that people do not know about Africa and I describe some of them in my blog quora Africa is back.
For example :

In 2018, 6 of the 10 fastest growing countries are in… Africa

African Design

African Airports, you will be surprised!

Botswana, a Democratic, Economic and Ecological Example

Ubuntu : "I am because We are"

The Kalahari Desert, the place where water is gold

African Women

Supernatural Sahara's Rock Paintings in Sefar (Algeria)

The Man Who Stopped the Desert the Farmer Yacouba Sawadogo

Tree climbing goats (Morocco)

"Funny" African Transport

First Hollywood, then Bollywoo

Afandri Adya , studied at Greater Jakarta

Answered Jun 13, 2018

I guess most people don't realize that many of the greatest sportsmen/sportswomen are African descent.

Besides the citizens of African countries, most of them are American, French, British, Portuguese, Dutch, Italian, Brazilian, Jamaican, etc.

Most of the sprinters who run less than 10 seconds are of West African descent, with the majority being of Afro-Caribbean and African-American descent. While, many East African groups excel in long and middle distance running.

Usain Bolt, Jamaican of West African descent, the world record holder in 100 m and 200 m sprints

In the United States, African Americ

Rui Zhang , works at Soochow University, Suzhou
Answered Apr 9, 2020

More than 2 million Chinese have already lived on the African continent. When Chinese people who went through reform and opening up came to Africa, they found it was like China 30 years ago. More and more Chinese people are going to Africa to participate in engineering construction, mine mining, selling shoes and tobacco leaves, hoping to find a pot of gold on land full of business opportunities. The picture shows that Chinese construction workers walked in front of Congolese workers in a white shirt in Kinshasa, the capital of Zaire, ready to welcome the arrival of the delegation of China Rai

Pankaj Gautam Answered Nov 14, 2017 , Technical Consultant at Tech Mahindra (2016-present)

I would love to answer this out of my experiences.
Africa - I feel, is one of the most Generous geography. Having visited Tanzania, Ghana, Kenya and recently Cape Town I have some simple, basic yet life changing experiences to share specifically from Accra(Ghana) as I had spent a year over there.

Traffic Sense - Far better than India, exactly like this. Moreover, a driver lets the other driver pass first driving in from left direction as a matter of traffic sense/ rule I believe and in return the latter driver waves hand to the former driver before he drives away as a matter of respect to have b

Arunanjali Singh former Advocate

Answered Nov 9, 2017 The Kalenjin tribe of Kenya produces most of the world's fastest long-distance runners.

The Ghost- marriage practised by Neur tribe where a woman marries a deceased man is nearly as common as marrying a living person.

Nelson Mandela is known by six different names in South-Africa.
Kenya's highland forests are home to many animals found nowhere else in the world.

The largest permanent desert lake, lake Turkana is in Kenya. It is Africa's fourth largest lake, fondly called the Jade Sea because of its breathtaking color.

Sources:

1. National geographic channel
2. Lake Turkana National Parks
3. Wikipedia

Angus Marjoribanks , lives in Uganda (2014-present) Answered May 9, 2017

I think a more interesting question would be to ask what most people do know about Africa.

The image of Africa that people in the West have is often formed exclusively by news reports of war, famine, poverty, disease, corruption, political coups, dictators etc. Often these reports are accurate, many places in Africa have serious, serious problems - problems that are incredibly complex and nuanced and that have been going on for decades.

Africa is often pigeon holed as a continent in desperate need of help from the developed world, be it in the form of financial aid, food aid or development aid .

Davide Mirabella , lives in Switzerland Answered Apr 25, 2017

That it is made up of a whopping 54 sovereign nation states.
Ever looked at a map of Europe and said to yourself: woah, that place is pretty fragemented! So many political territories, some as small as Andorra, San Marino or the Vatican (110 acres)! Wikipedia lists 50 sovereign states for Europe…but Africa has even more of them, even though a quick glance at the map might just make you notice big and chunky ones such as Algeria, the Democratic republic of the Congo…or South Africa, sitting prominently in…well…Southern Africa.

Running through a list of sovereign states in Africa [1] might give you.

Yashwant Palisetty , former Section Engineer at Indian Railways (2013-2014) Answered Jan 3, 2018.

When you take a look at the below image, the size of the African continent looks same as that of the United States of America(including Alaska) and is half the size of Russia.

But, it is not.

The African continent is very huge than believed.

1. It is 3 times the size of United States.
2. It is twice the size of Russia.
3. It is larger than India, China and USA combined.
4. It is larger than South America and Europe combined.

The continent looks small because of the skewing of the longitudes of the globe into a 2-D image(Mercator projection). The places close to equator undergo minute distortions. While the farth

David Dasa , lives in Sokoto, Nigeria Answered Nov 8, 2017

That it is about to take OFF!
The last investment frontier.

I guess most of us have seen pictures of cities in Asia (Dubai, Shanghai) comparing how the city skyline was in 1987 vs 2017 and such. Well what would have happened if back when the city wasn't really worth much, you decided to invest in it with a belief in it's growth potential, imagine what it would be worth right now after China's meteoric rise.

I also read once that the Dutch purchased Manhattan for trinkets and today it's worth trillions, though I guess the great length of time involved in this example is not practical but you get

Smriti Iyer , Top Writer 2015 Answered Dec 10, 2018

We all love Chocolate don't we? Do you know where chocolate comes from? It comes from the seeds of the cacao fruit which grows on the Theobroma Cacao Tree.

You know where most of the cacao in the World comes from?

AFRICA!!

More than 70% of the World's cacao come from Africa. More precisely West Africa - Ghana, Côte d'Ivoire, Nigeria and Camaroon.

When you think about it, what comes to mind when we think, fine / good quality /Chocolate? Europe? America?

That is because most of the major commercial chocolate companies are based in Europe and some in America. Be it Cadbury or Neste or Callebaut or Val

Siddalinga Koudi , Software Engineer Updated Nov 19, 2017

Well, Everyone commonly knows and tells when it comes to Africa. i.e it's a poor continent. But it's not the real fact. Not every country in the world is complete, each one or other country has some pros as well as cons so we can't simply say this country is poor or this country is rich. (I think, I don't have to give some example or explain about this)

I was in Africa for 5 months, if I mention the place it was Nairobi.

What a beautiful place and such an awesome weather it was simply amazing.

The people who says Africa is poor country I kindly request them to visit nairobi once then they will com

2.The oldest hominid discovered is the 4.2 million year old Ardipithicus ramidus (Ardi) fossil is found in Africa.

3.A monolithic church or rock-hewn church is a church made from a single block of stone is found in Africa.

Lalibela, Ethiopia.

4. Africa(The Kingdom of Aksum)was one of the first countries after Armenia to accept Christianity.

5.Africa is the birthplace of the Rastafarian movement, not Jamaica.

source: courtesy

These Are the Oldest Countries and Nations in the World, Retired statistical consultant Answered Mar 10, 2019

Add Comment

It is much bigger than most people think it is.

The misperception is due to a common map projection.

For instance, Algeria, Dem Republic of the Congo, Sudan, Libya, Chad, Niger, Angola, Mali, South Africa, Ethiopia, Mauritania, Egypt, Tanzania, Nigeria, Namibia, Mozambique and South Sudan are all bigger than any country in western Europe except Denmark; and the only other exception in the rest of Europe is Russia, a lot of which is in Asia.

Source: List of countries and dependencies by area - Wikipedia

To be human is to be African.

If every human outside of Africa were to suddenly die, 80% of human genetic diversity would still be preserved in the survivors in Africa.

In other words, modern homo sapiens have been evolving in Africa for close to 1 million years, but have been outside of Africa for less than 200,000 years.

Africa is the ancestral home of all of us.

Africa is a huge continent made up of 54 countries and over a billion people. But did you know that in Ethiopia, clocks are upside down with our 6:00 at their 12:00? Here are some amazing things about Africa.

1. Africa is not a Country.

Okay. You do know this, but people frequently refer to Africa as though it were a country. Sometimes, people will actually say, “Countries like India and Africa…", but more often they simply refer to Africa as though the entire continent faced similar problems or had similar cultures or histories. There are, however, 54 sovereign states in Africa plus the dispute

Sammy Ngari , Business Operations Manager at Netpad Holdings Limited
Answered May 18, 2017

Africa had great empires and civilizations before Europe did. Ethiopia, Songhay and Egypt are some of them.

The wealthiest man in history was African. Mansa Musa once travelled from Timbuktu to Mecca through Egypt. The convoy carried so much gold that the Egytpian currency was crippled due to his visit.

Africa is by far the most culturally diverse continent in the world. I live in Kenya. We have 42 native tribes here. If I cross the border over to Uganda, I won't understand any of their native languages. South Africa has 11 official national languages. None of which a Nigerian is familiar with.

Varun Dhiman , Full Stack Developer at Capgemini India (2016-present)
Answered Sep 11, 2017

Over 25% of the world's languages are spoken only in Africa

There are thought to be around 2,000 languages in use on the continent. All are considered official languages of the African Union. Nigeria alone has over 500 living languages.

Africa is the only continent to extend from the northern temperate zone to the southern temperate zone

It is the world's hottest continent and the second driest after Australia. Despite being nearly four times the size of Europe, its straighter shores mean it has a shorter overall coastline.

The African population is much younger than the rest of the world

Over 50%

Mark Majeira , Love, life and everything... Updated Nov 19, 2017

The presence of lighter-skinned, non-stereotypical Africans
♤■■■■■♤■■■■■♤■■■■■♤■■■■■♤■■■■■♤■■■■■♤

"Africa has light-skinned people? No way!"

—(To quote a stereotypical American response).

But…yes way, they do exist.

This article may focus on European-descendants, but it also showcases other non-stereotypical African people (where stereotypical is pictured as dark-skinned individuals,with Afro-type hair texture). I may be biased towards focusing on the South African situation more often, as that is where I hail from (and thus it is what I know).

So, the politico-economic thought of the world in the 1

Mandawarya Manase , BBA Economics & Marketing, The Open University (2017) Updated Dec 6, 2020

Africa has massive wealth than what is known and talked on medias, I'll explain Africa through targeting my marketing and business niche first.

If you are an investor, i'll assure you that Africa is worth investing.

For example a company named CDC Group plc, UK. Invested in Africa for more than 60 years, What do you think they see in Africa that you don't know? [1]I believe they saw the future.

Africa has most kind of raw materials that are in high demand in the world market right now such as diamond, sugar, salt, gold, iron, cobalt, uranium, copper, bauxite, silver, petroleum and cocoa beans.

Footnotes

[1] http://Investors in Africa - DFIs - www.thinkafrica.net (https://thinkafrica.net/investors-africa-development-financial-institutions/)

Jannatul Ferdaus Answered Jan 25

1. The human race is of African origin. The oldest known skeletal remains of anatomically modern humans (or homo sapiens sapiens) were excavated at sites in East Africa. Human remains were discovered at Omo in Ethiopia that was dated at 195,000 years old, the oldest known in the world.

2. Skeletons of pre-humans have been found in Africa that date back between 4 and 5 million years. The oldest known ancestral type of humanity is thought to have been the Australopithecus ramidus, who lived at least 4.4 million years ago.

3. Africans were the first to organise fishing expeditions 90,000 years ago.

Nancy Johnson, studied at University of Cambridge (2012) Answered Apr 9, 2020

12 things you probably don't know about Africa

Africa is a huge continent made up of 54 countries and over a billion people. But did you know that in Ethiopia, clocks are upside down with our 6:00 at their 12:00? This, and the 12 other incredible facts we're about to impart are sure to turn you into the captain at your next trivia tournament…

1. Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

The two countries are discussing constructing an undersea rail tunnel to connect the rail systems on the two continents.

2. In South Africa

Laura Sands, lives in California Answered Dec 12, 2017

Africa is not poor! The Motherland is merely being plundered while the rest of the world profits from it. Foreign aid is but one way this is hidden from the average person's radar. For example, the continent receives an average of $134 billion in loans and foreign aid, but $192 billion in resources like gold, diamonds, cobalt, petroleum, iron, silver, copper and uranium are extracted from Africa at the same time. So Africa gives out $59 billion more than what it receives!
Tribal conflicts, destabilized governments and violent uprisings are often deliberately created to cause distraction while s

Kofoworola George-Taylor , Customer Relationship Manager Answered Sep 2, 2018

Most African countries want an educated population. They set the school fees at a reasonable price their people can afford. Unlike western countries that a person must take a loan to go through school.
Africa has different languages and Afrikaan is not the general language of Africa. The different nations have different languages.
Food is the cheapest thing in Africa. We are not the starving African children we are portrayed to be. Poor is relative. For instance if $60 is the minimum wage per month in Nigeria, someone living $1 a day doesn't seem so unreasonable.
African Nations have different cl

Sara Ahmed lives in Egypt Answered May 21, 2017

There are over 50 countries or "fully recognized sovereign states" in Africa. Because Africa is a continent. Not a country. It's a continent, with a lot of countries, and a ton of people living on it. And they're all very, very different. Africa is not one homogenous entity.

It's extremely irritating when people say stuff like "people in Africa" or "children of Africa" or "African culture". Um… Which people? Which children? Which culture? Do you have any idea how vague that is? Or even worse, when they are listing countries and one of those countries is apparently Africa? "Yeah, I wanna travel to …

Salim Hemed , Countless hours on hours of gaming. Answered Nov 23, 2017

1. They have electricity.
2. A lot have access to clean water.
3. There is Wifi in some places.

4. For god's sake, not everyone lives in a mud hut.
5. There are people with actual JOBS.

Not everyone is poor, many are stable financially.

I understand that there are many people struggling with life in Africa, but there are people that have good LIVES. So if you go to Africa, don't be surprised if your hotel runs on electricity and not cow dung.

Fred Gekara , IT Support at The Tamarind Group Answered Dec 3, 2017

We rarely make reservations when we want to visit neighbors (mostly when visiting the countryside). You just show up. When someone does visit, the first thing we do is offer them a plate of whatever is available to eat, or some tea. Depending on the side of Africa you are, some will let you eat first then tell them the purpose of your visit, while others will have you discuss this during the meal. The latter is the least common as this space often goes to catch-up talk. I learnt to appreciate these when friends who've left the continent enlightened me that it's not common practice.

Dara Olaniyan , LL.B from University of Ibadan, Nigeria Answered Nov 18, 2017

It's not so much what people don't know as it is what they don't realise. Africa is not a country. Africa is not some homogeneous entity, it is not a place with uniform people, cultures and languages. It is actually the most diverse continent in the world both culturally and genetically. Even in a single country, you will find several tribes that are as different fron each other as the British are different from the Chinese. That is why I find it extremely ignorant and annoying when people say things like "African man", " African culture", "Are you from Africa?", " A place in Africa" and many.

Carol Gebert , Business Development (2005-present) Answered Nov 24, 2017

Most people do not realize that very little of African land is hospitable. The Sahara is enormous, the Kalahari big, too. The east coast is dry at least seasonally. Meanwhile, the jungle of central Africa is difficult to cultivate, and full of parasites. That leaves just a thin strip of land in the Sahel, a patch in the south and a strip in the central highlands to call hospitable. Put all together, the good land would be smaller in size than the agricultural land of the USA, even though the African continent is huge.

Edwin Osas , Former KND operative Answered May 27, 2018

Pardon me if you as an African find this offensive, you have no right to anyway, I'm African too!

What most people don’t know about Africa is that we lack drive and motivation. We lack the capacity to create and be creative; yes we do, don’t tell me Africa has art and music and all that. We lack the faculty to be innovative. We lack law and order. When I say what I say, I mean Africa has neither developed nor beautified her environment. Save for South-Africa, no other African nation has made impressive advancements in infrastructure and similar aspects.

African nations have had roughly 50years of freedom.

Wassim Soltani Developer at AlmavivA S.p.A. (2019-present)
Answered Apr 13, 2018

North and South Africans actually aren't that poor.
I live in north Africa and my country and the neighboring countries actually have a European-inspired lifestyle.

Also, African doesn't mean dark-skinned.

Odilon Rwibutso,studied Architecture at Samara State Technical University (2021) Answered Mar 27, 2017

Since I am African these are the things i think people should really know about Africa. Those are the answers to many questions which people keep asking me here in Russia.
All Africans are not the same and they have different cultures so they are not supposed to know each other or like each other.
Africa is not a country.
Countries in Africa have different weather .
Wars don't happen in every country.
Africans are different to black Americans.
All Africans don't know how to dance.
All African men don't have a big p*nis.
There countries richer than even European countries.
All countries don't have oil or any other …

Adedayo Laketu Answered Aug 26, 2018

The African millennials in the UK, US are different from millennials here in Africa, in Nigeria, building from ground zero. In simple terms, this translates to cultural discrepancies because your reality is not the same as every other, and somewhat gives a small group of people the power to define our culture, our way of life. We all form a crucial part of the culture we clamour for, it's a lot of subcultures here in Nigeria man, the New Age is one trying to highlight them all, so we can properly understand what this culture truly stands for. It's not about putting people in a box or defining

Caroline Brann , BA.LLB from University of KwaZulu-Natal Updated Jan 8

The truth for me is that…it really is fabulous living here in Africa. South Africa is my home so my answer will mainly focus on that country but the other African countries will be similar, although South Africa is the most developed and with a strong economy.
So why do I say this?

Climate: We have a great outdoor all year round lifestyle because we have a great climate. If you like sunshine and an outdoor lifestyle, then Africa is the place for you.

Ease of access: We can do things more easily here, because to do them is often financially cheaper than other places. You want to skydive, swim with

Sihle Phiri , studied Mathematics Answered Nov 9, 2017

That we are not a country.We are a continent! Like…Really, most Africans don't know where Djibouti is. We have no united believe system(Colonization). We have not one race(All races exist here). We kind of don't like each other(Russia vs America).Most countries' culture is closer to Europeans or Americans than whatever your mind has developed to represent Africa.
We hardly ever see animals, excepts cockroaches and other insects. Sorry guys, this is not Hollywood:)

Women get attracted to us guys not because there are no other options(We prove love is natural). We are so materialistic(Thanks to E

Africa is not a country

Okay. You do know this, but people frequently refer to Africa as though it were a country. Sometimes, people will actually say, “Countries like India and Africa…”, but more often they simply refer to Africa as though the entire continent faced similar problems or had similar cultures or histories. There are, however, 54 sovereign states in Africa plus the disputed territory of Western Sahara.

Africa is not all poor, rural, or overpopulated

Africa is an incredibly diverse continent politically, socially, and economically. To get an idea of how people’s lives and opportuniti

Vilmos Shepard, former Captain at U.S. Air Force (1981-1987) Originally Answered: What are 10 things that the world doesn’t know about Africa?Answered Jul 20

Where it is. Who lives there. What the weather is like. How many people live there. What animals live there. What people do there. What is made there. What food people eat there. What music they listen to there. And what currencies are used there.

Essentially, “the world" knows very little about africa.

William Hunter , Knowledge Seeker Answered Dec 22, 2020

Somethings that you might not know about Africa:
There are thought to be around 2,000 languages in use on the continent.

Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

More than 50% of the world's French-speaking population lives here on the continent.

Africa has around 30% of the earth’s remaining mineral resources

The Sahara desert is currently larger than the entire United States.And it continues to grow each year!

Africa has 54 sovereign countries, the most of any continent.

The United States, China, India, New Zealand, Argenti

[Farhan , lives in Earth Answered Jun 7, 2017]

By most people here, I mean those living outside of Africa.

Alot of non Africans, when they hear the name Africa, picture a jungle, they asume it is a jungle with no electricity, with alot of animals, and uneducated people. They sometimes ask dumb questions but i can't blame them, it's just lack of knowledge.

I will agree that Africa has alot of jungles, forests and deserts, but it also has alot of developing countries, some of the major cities in Africa have characteristics of developing counties.

Mogadishu:

A country in crisis, it is facing alot of economic problems, but it hasn't given up and t

Adrian Marshall , studied at University of North Texas Answered Aug 6, 2015

1. It's a continent and not a single country.
2. It's the second largest continent.
3. It actually snows in South Africa.
4. It's more developed than most people think.
5. Actual kingdoms and civilizations existed there prior to European colonization.
6. Egypt , Morocco, Libya etc...all of North Africa is actually the same continent.
7. There is more than one race of indigenous sub -Saharan African. Bushmen, Khoisan, Negro.
8. There are pyramids in the Sudan (much smaller than at Giza)
9. In East Africa a form of Judaism is practiced that still includes the Old Testament practices of ani

Jade Wilson , studied at Roodepoort College Answered Apr 8, 2017

I will speak from a South African perspective because that's where I stay:
South Africa performed the first successful heart transplant.
South Africa makes bogies (the frame railway wheels fit in) for many companies in the world.
South Africa has advanced military technology
A lot of your diamonds and gold come from South Africa
We don't have lions in the back yard
No, I don't know your friend who is from Nigeria or Kenya

Steve Ogbujah Updated May 31, 2017

Most people don't know that:
Africa is also a continent. And the second largest at that.
Wow.., so you're from Africa??? Woow I've heard so much about Africa!

Africans are also as human as the people who often label them as monkeys.
Africa is the most multiethnic, the most multilingual and the most multicultural continent on earth.
Africa is the most genetically diverse society.
Africa is the potentially richest continent.
Africans are also among the most educated and most influential people.
Africa is the root of human history.
Elon Musk, among others (in his class), is of African Descent.

Cynthia 'Tasha' Osajibenedict , Proud African Woman Answered Aug 8, 2020

The Africa the has been portrayed in movies, music videos and stories for years is not the totality of Africa. Images like the one below are some of the things you see once you google Africa which truly doesn't represent what Africa is.

I'm a Nigerian and I've lived here all my life and never have I seen any other animal except dogs, cats, monkeys, and snakes. Foreigners assume that we wake up and right outside our window, is a giraffe or a zebra.

Another thing people don't know about Africa is its vast rich culture that transcends beyond time. Africa has been in existence since the beginning of

Aliyan Sheikh , Bachelors of Business finance Answered Jul 19, 2020

I would like to answer this question my way. Many people think that Africa means 'black'. No, it doesn't. Not everyone in Africa is black. There are many other people with different complexions. Even if we search google, this is what it shows:

Why bro? Why all black? There are fair people too in Africa.

It is a misconception about Africa that the people there are black. The word ‘african’ has now become a metaphor to symbolize a person whose complexion is dark. People need to know that Africa doesn't mean black people

Darryn Seymour , lives in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia Answered Mar 30, 2017

This is probably going to be the most interesting question to answer. First obvious fact Africa is not a war-torn, disease ridden, poverty stricken place where people live without food, water and etc. There are many countries in Africa that are pretty well off with development that is very good, it’s just that there are a few countries that are poverty stricken unfortunately and because the media comments mostly on them, Africa has the appearance of a poor continent. That and the fact that we have almost no lights seen in space during night doesn’t help either.

The dark continent is not as dark as you would think it is.

Number 2 black people are not the only race in Africa. Many people love to think that there is only one type of black person in Africa and that there is no such thing as diversity in the continent. Funny enough every black person in Africa is distinctly different from each other. You have the Masai, Xhosa, Ngundi, Swazi to name a few who are extremely different from each other and are not related closely. Then you have the Berbers in the north and white people who dot the continent all over with Asian people and coloureds in the continent as well. In short Africa is a melting pot of cultures and races.

This is pretty much all you can find in the continent.

The third thing which actually surprised me was the association that the continent is a huge country where people speak African, which is not a language by the way. This baffled me as this is what the difference is between a continent and a country.

Country is a small piece of land, continent is a large land mass consisting of countries.

Emma Jhons , Travel Consultant at Aero Travels (2019-present) Answered Jan 20

In my never ending quest to educate I've assembled some of the most interesting and lesser known facts about my home continent. Enjoy.

There are more than 2,000 languages spoken in Africa. Bear in mind that there are only 54 countries.

It is almost impossible to hold a small wedding. The idea of a private wedding is unknown and is greatly frowned upon. Friends and relatives expect to be invited to a wedding and to play a role in the ceremony.

In South Africa you are legally allowed to attach flamethrowers to your car in order to deter car jacking

Almost half of the gold ever mined on Earth has com

Carol Gardner Engineer, park ranger, private chef. Top Writer 2018
Answered Jul 3, 2017

African hospitality.
The warmth, welcoming, and friendship is heartwarming, humbling, and absolutely beautiful.

My experience has been limited to visiting people in the US who originally hailed from the African continent. I hope someday I can visit and experience more. I don't think I'll meet too many strangers.

Mark Paul Answered Dec 31, 2020

I think that there are lots of people out there who think that Africa is country.

They think they Africa is a poor place, full of black people who don't drink clean water and are always ill.

When really, there are 54 countries in Africa, and in northern Africa there are more people from an Arab ethnicity, rather than black like many people think.

As you can see Africa has got many countries and is actually quite big. It is the 2nd most populated continent and 2nd biggest continent.

And of course not everyone in Africa is ill and sick all the time. Many people in western countries think that everyone is like the African people off the UNICEF and water aid adverts.

[Dimitri Vallette , Co-founder & CEO at Red Marble Esports (2020-present) Answered Feb 9, 2018]

I'm not African so my answers below may not be accurate. My sincere apologies if I make any mistake. Feel free to correct me.

The Sahara desert is almost as big as the United States of America.

Almost 1/5 of the population comes from Nigeria.

The Nile River is supposedly the longest in the world, though recent studies seem to show that the Amazon is longer.

Surprisingly, the hippopotamus is the deadliest animal in Africa. The deadliest war after World War II was the Second Congo War.There are more French speakers in Africa than France itself.

Tanzania's official language is Swahili, and I believe that since 2015 (?), it became Africa's official language.

The necklace that Rose (Kate Winslet) wore during the Titanic is supposedly made of Tanzanite, a diamond that can only be found at the base of the Kilimandjaro. It's supposedly 1,000 times rater than diamonds.

Kenya and Ethiopia have the world's best long distance runners.

Coffee was supposedly discovered in Ethiopia. Everything written above was taught to me during my trip to Kenya and Tanzania. It may not be accurate.

Wiandry Adi , Surprise one person a day in almost everything conceivable
Answered Jan 30, 2018

Perhaps you might know that African countries are stereotypically less exposed to modern technologies than any other countries in the world, esp. developing countries. Turns out they're not really that exposed; some are well informed and now, they're rising.

The youths are changing the countries progressively, as the Internet access is easier to get, as well as scholarships.

It’s at sub-Saharan region (Rwanda, Kenya, South Africa, Nigeria, etc.), and it’s quite notable for the numbers of poverty and unemployed people. However, unlike what people outside Africa see at mainstream media, this regio

Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire Answered Apr 1, 2020

Welcome to Africa 101. Grab your books and pen!

Africa is way bigger than you think

The size of Africa is something that is more often than not underestimated. A quick google search of a map will show you a world in which Africa is smaller than Russia, Canada or the United States. The truth is, Africa is the second-largest continent. It is large enough to fit in the United States, China, India, Japan, Mexico, and many European nations, combined.

The reason for this misconception regarding the relative size of Africa is the template of maps we commonly use: the Mercator map projection. This map projection was created in the 16th century with the aim of helping with sea navigation. It did its job back then and is still quite helpful in accurately representing the world.

It is, however, not perfect. One of its major flaws is that it "attempts to place the spherical shape of the world onto a cylinder, causing areas closest to the poles to be stretched. Africa, which straddles the Equator, barely changes in size — meanwhile, the countries furthest from the Equator become inflated from their true sizes on this type of map."

This misconception not only considerably shapes how Africa is viewed by the world but also how Africans view their place in the global scene.

Lee Mwangi B.A Psychology & Sociology, Kenyatta University Answered Dec 17, 2017

There is so much to tell about Africa.
For starters, Africa is a continent with 54 independent countries. There are more than 2000 tribes, each with their own language and culture. Hence more languages are spoken in Africa than anywhere else in the world.

There are many Africans who have international recognition for their achievements.

Elon Musk a South-African, is famous for Tesla and SpaceX.
John Gitau Wairimu a Kenyan, is one of only four people in the world to graduate with a masters degree in Nuclear Medicine Technology.
Hasheem Thabeet a Tanzanian, who was once the tallest player in the NBA

Naima Noora, Writer Updated Oct 12, 2020

There are a lot of things that most people don't know about Africa.

Africa is the world's second largest and second most populous continent after asia. Africa is home to over 1.3 billion people who speak over 1,500 different languages, one in every four of the world's languages are spoken only in Africa.

Africa is the source of the world's longest river ‘ NILE.

The world's largest dessert is in africa.

Africa's largest country is sudan it has a total area of 967,940 square miles(2.5 million km2). The smallest country on the continent is Seychelles which is an island nation covering onl

Mike Smith, South Africa Enthusiast Answered May 7, 2017

Africa is not as poor as people think it is. Although it has its problems, it also has incredible wealth and a lot of people that live lifestyles similar to people in North America and Europe. This is Africa:
Sandton, Gauteng, South Africa

So is this:

Cape Town, Western Cape, South Africa

This is an exclusive area with extremely expensive real estate:

Clifton Beach, Cape Town

This is one of the wealthiest cities on the continent:

Lagos, Nigeria

You can also see some nice cars around too:

Dele Atunwa, studied at Oau Ile Ife Answered Jun 19, 2017

If there is one misconception the ‘West’ has about Africa that I would love to go away, it's the way Africa is treated and mentioned like its a country. It actually is a continent (surprise!) made up of very very diverse and sovereign nations. Referring to anyone from the continent as an African rather than identifying the person with his or her country robs us of our national ‘individuality’.

The countries have vastly different languages, cultures, topography, climates, politics, cuisines and foods etc.

Please refer and identify us with our respective nationalities rather than as Africans or fro

Yemi Adeyemi , lived in The United Kingdom Answered Jun 18, 2020

There are a lot of things most people don’t know:Africa isn’t one enormous Savannah like lion king, it has the second largest desert in the world after Antarctica.

It also has a second desert, the Namibian desert.

Clothes were invented in Africa, between 40,000 BC to 100,000 BC.
Medicine was invented in Africa

Veterinary medicine was first evidenced in Africa

Africa had universities before Europe did.

The first evidence of warfare in the world was in Northern Sudan, Africa, around 14,000 BC.

1.3 million Africans contributed to world war 2, on the side of the Allies but neither the UK or US commemorat

Giwa Olaotan , Amateur and Lazy Writer Answered Apr 24

Hmm, this Question has a lot of insightful answers already, but I will love to chip in mine. This answer will pass for:

“What is something SOME people don't know about Africa? “

My answer: Africa is not a country; Africa is a continent comprising 55 countries.

Photo credits: Lizardpoint.com

Anonymous Answered Oct 27, 2020

First of all, I am African, Born in African, Live in Africa, Still In Africa. I AM AFRICA LOL.

Now some people think we live in the slums or with Lions all over the place. Tattered clothes.

The thing is:

WE DON'T!

First of all to prove to y'all:

We have Pick n' Pay
Game
KFC
Burger King
*Almond Milk

South Africa has McDonalds. I think.
Woolworths
We have food
We have water.
Adidas
Cinemas
Now Africa is actually almost the same as America and other foreign places.

We have good places to go to.

We have rich and poor people

We have fairly well off people

We have all the necessities we need.

The only thing that makes u

Camilla Saetang , lives in Brookline, MA Answered Apr 7

Skeletons of pre-humans have been found in Africa that date back between 4 and 5 million years. The oldest known ancestral type of humanity is thought to have been the australopithecus ramidus, who lived at least 4.4 million years ago.

Africans were the first to organise fishing expeditions 90,000 years ago. At Katanda, a region in northeastern Zaïre (now Congo), was recovered a finely wrought series of harpoon points, all elaborately polished and barbed. Also uncovered was a tool, equally well crafted, believed to be a dagger. The discoveries suggested the existence of an early aquatic o

Temidayo Isaiah Oniosun , Managing Director at Space in Africa (2018-present) Answered Jun 4, 2017

About two years ago, a friend had this short wonderful conversation with an African American friend. (My friend is a Nigerian living in USA)
"Do people have sex in your country?"

"No. Babies fall from the trees like mangoes. I mean they sometimes fall from the skies like the rain."

"Bruh, you sure know what I mean. I mean do you guys have sex before marriage."

"Fam, people do that everywhere if they want to or if they have to."

"I thought y'all Africans don't do shit like that until y'all get married."

"Maybe they didn't live like that before I was born. Fam, I don't know, man."

I think most of these

Pamela Hardman , works at U.S. Federal Government Employees
Updated Nov 18

I'm not African but I'm African American, Black American or whatever you wanna call it….I have no preference because either way, I'm still Sub Saharan African. So anyways, as I started studying Africa more and more, four things shocked me…….the first was that Southern Africa gets cold. This is contrary to what's presented on Nat Geo or other nature documentaries since they always focus on the arid parts of Africa.
The second thing that shocked me was that the Bantu ethnic group was just one of hundreds of African ethnic groups.

The third thing that shocked me were the amount of epicanthal eyefol

Africa is gorgeous !

Lorna Nassuna , works at Deloitte Answered May 10, 2017

I will share some photos I've taken over the past few years (these are not photoshopped)

1. sunrise in Malindi (Kenyan coast)

2.Sunset in Zanzibar (Tanzania)

3.Lake Bunyonyi, Kabale ,Western Uganda (is this gorgeous or what !)

So much beauty in Africa- I love my home :)

Seun Aina-Scott , Business Development Manager (2015-present)
Answered Sep 21, 2017

Africa has its fair share of geniuses, a testimony to that is good ol' Elon Musk, he's from South Africa, indicative of the fact there are Africans that are really smart.
Although you could argue that Elon isn't in Africa at the moment and a significant part of his education, career and achievements are abroad, the fact that he spent his early years here shows that Africans have as much potential as as anyone.

And for those wondering why most Africans of note are in the US or Europe, it's only a matter of time, technology has almost levelled the playing field.

Watch out Silicon Valley!

volunteer (user:Meursault2004) at Wikipedia (2003-present)
Answered Nov 22, 2017

Thanks for the A2A Christopher Hart (Christopher Hart).

Most people don't know that there are Indonesians living in Africa.

Well, they are not exactly Indonesians, but Malagasy people and they don't live exactly in the mainland of Africa, but in the island of Madagascar, off the coast of Africa.

The ancestors of these Malagasy people came to Madagascar some 1000 to 1500 years ago from Borneo, modern day Indonesia. Especially members of the Merina tribe still look like Indonesians.

The Malagasy language is also related to Indonesian languages, especially the Ma'anyan language.

References

Abdulla Alrimihi studied Journalism & Mass Communication at Qatar University Answered Jul 26, 2020

Ah…That it is a Continent? With 54 Countries?

That it is home to a Number of Ethnicities:

[List of ethnic groups of Africa - Wikipedia]

That it is Not "Black" nor "White" but rather a home to a lot of complex groups of people with different backgrounds and stories:

And it is Very Hard to define it or explain what it is without looking at it from different angles e.g: Languages, Ethnicities, History, Countries, Politics…etc.

Paa Grant B.A Computer Science, Ghana Institute of Management and Public Administration (2021)

Updated Jan 31, 2020
Africa is a continent. Not a country
We don't live on trees
It snows in Africa too
We are not all blacks. There are whites and other races too.
We have billionaires too
We don't have supernatural abilities. We don't turn to wolves in the night.
We know about Western Civilization more than most Westerners because we can read too.
The average English speaking African has a better grammar expression than the average American.

We know most Hollywood celebrities. I'm saying this because an American friend of mine asked me who Paul Walker was.
We love Taylor Swift. Does she even have haters?
We hate Nicki Minaj

James Mbuthia , lived in Africa Answered Feb 18

Just how beautiful and how unexplored Africa is. Everbody knows about Europe, Asia, the US. It's all well documented, visited, photographed. Africa on the other hand, not so much. Apart from the safari circuit with beaches and game parks there's not really that much info out there. Infrastructure isn't good in most African countries(it's improving though) so doing road trips requires a tough 4x4 in most places. But if you're ready to go off the beaten track Africa is amazing.
My dream is to buy a decent reliable 4x4, probably a Toyota, and spend months visiting and documenting this untouched Afr

Manoah Burns , works at Self-Employment Answered Dec 2, 2017

That Africa is the cradle of civilization, and that black people where here long before Caucasians.

Chimfwembe Bowa , Founder & CEO at CHB Assets Limited (2020-present) Answered Feb 14, 2019

Anybody that thinks Africa is poor is delusional. The media is to blame for the misconceptions the western world has of Africa. This leads to most of them thinking they are better off, but nothing could be further from the truth.
It's no secret Africa is extremely rich in minerals, that's why we had white people colonising African countries. I'm from Zambia, our largest export is Copper. A few years ago Zambia was the second largest producer of Copper in the world, only surpassed by Chile.

Millions of tonnes of Diamonds, Gold, Silver, Copper, Emeralds and many other precious metals are mined eve

Brad Slavin , Technology Officer at DuoCircle (2014-present) Answered Sep 12, 2019

I am from Africa so this is a question that is dear to me, but Africa is HUGE. If you look at it on a map, it seems like it's just a bit larger than the United States or maybe the size of China and certainly smaller than Greenland. But the map is not the terrain, and Africa is enormous.

Last time that I took a trip home the flight time just over Africa to South Africa was about 10 hours.

[How Big is Africa? As big as the USA, China, India and Europe, together!]

Here is a fun site that lets you compare sizes of different countries. [Compare Countries With This Simple Tool]

I hope that this puts things

[Jacob Joel , Affiliate at Shopify (2016-present) Answered Dec 13, 2018]

If you were ever to sit with your grandmother in the village and ask to learn about you culture and history, you would reach a point filled with bitterness. I know this is cliche, but when the colonials came and took an entire generation, those people, were the future. Those left were either too old to impact knowledge or too young to learn anything.

Hence all the techniques (of the few taken, because come one, you can't tell me that every single tribe suffered this), all the fighting styles, our weapons, medicines, traditional attires, culture, everything, were lost with all those children.
[Jeewen Zhung , working for National Strategic FooYou Agency (2008-) Answered Jan 22, 2018]

Only a few countries in Africa now have a slightly better crop, taking Nigeria, the most populous country in Africa as an example.

Nigeria has a land area of 920,000 square kilometers, roughly equivalent to four areas in Shandong Province. The share of arable land is roughly 65%, which means that the amount of arable land in Nigeria is at least 600,000 square kilometers. Remove the cities, rivers, roads and other factors, according to our understanding of Chinese people, roughly 600 million mu of arable land. And we China have been saying ..... Our arable land red line is 1.8 billion mu of r

Alan McArthur Dargie , lives in Curently Live in Gabon, Have Travelled Around a Lot of West, Central Amd Northern Africa over the La… Answered May 28, 2017

Here's something only a few people know but for me it illustrates the kindness and generosity of Africans. It's a brief incident but very poignant for me and I will never forget it.

Around 25 years ago I was visiting a client's office in Pointe Noire, Congo. International oil company with the usual security - sign in at gate house, leave passport there and pick it up on leaving. Anyway at that time Congo had just introduced a new national flag, their current one. One of the guards had a lapel badge (called a "pin" in French, all the rage at the time) which was the new flag design.. I said I lik

Anavara Limited Medical Tourism Consultant at Anavara Limited (2015-present) Answered Nov 25, 2020

Most people outside Africa, who are not Africans, and have not been in Africa, have a very depleted and downgraded view of the continent.

There are so many things you may not know about Africa or have a distorted impression of, and I will love to clear the air about a few of them which are rampant.

Africa is not a "country", but a "continent" with 54 sovereign countries.
Yes, it may sound funny and unbelievable that some people can refer to Africa as a country, but it is common among average foreigners in other continents.

They may not refer directly to Africa as a country, but you can hear statem

Phillip Ekuwem Footballer and Freelance Football Writer Answered May 16, 2017

I'm Nigerian and I get pissed each time people keep talking about Africa like it's some impoverished country (it's a fucking continent) with all kind of bugs crawling on kids faces while they go out to hunt.

People talk about Africa like it's a huge desert where you can find all kinds of animals, especially Big cats (lions, Cheetahs et al).

I have never seen a real lion before and that's because Africa is a continent and all these wild animals are only found in some countries and regions, not everywhere, plus I don't fancy visiting a zoo.

Mark Welsh 15 years as a claims professional Answered Feb 4, 2020

The starving African children you see in those ads are photo ops. They are sick children and nothing can save them since those are incurable illnesses. That is unfortunate but these children are only a small few in number, very few, and are not starving due to lack of food but due to incurable illnesses. Your money/donation goes to the corrupt governments of those countries, anyway, not to the children. Anyone in America or Europe knows that food is plentiful there in Africa or else those governments would be supplying it from all the excess food in Canada, America and European countries.

Sudan has more than 200 pyramids, double the number found in Egypt.

Mark Albert , former Businessman Answered Dec 20, 2017

The Meroe pyramids were part of the Nubian Kingdom of Kush and are up to 4,600 years old.

Martha Okadigbo African. studied the ups and downs of Africa. Educated
Answered Nov 13, 2020

I've read what everyone has to say about Africa and would like to add few more things.

Asides the genetic diversity spanning across countries in the continent, there is also huge diversity within countries. In Nigeria, there are over 200 tribes with vast cultural differences and this is similar in some countries too. Several tribes have peculiar features unique to just them.

Accents - I've always seen a monolithic representation of africanised English accents on TV shows and I'd like to say that that's like 1/2% of representation (of course they can not represent every African accent but it woul

Poonam Patel , Designer Answered Nov 11, 2020

1. Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

The view of Morocco from Spain across the Strait of Gibraltar.

The two countries are discussing constructing an undersea rail tunnel to connect the rail systems on the two continents.

2. In South Africa you are legally allowed to attach flamethrowers to your car in order to deter car jacking.

Seriously. Can we just say, we've got no stats on the success rate of this technique and definitely wouldn't recommend trying it!

3. Timbuktu, Mali is home of one of the oldest universities

Soikat Bhuiyan Flincher at Search Engine Optimization (2010-present)
Answered Nov 11, 2020

Africa is a huge continent made up of 54 countries and over a billion people. But did you know that in Ethiopia, clocks are upside down with our 6:00 at their 12:00? This and the 12 other incredible facts we're about to impart are sure to turn you into the captain at your next trivia tournament…

1. Africa and Europe are separated by less than 9 miles at the Strait of Gibraltar, which separates Spain from Morocco.

The view of Morocco from Spain across the Strait of Gibraltar.

The two countries are discussing constructing an undersea rail tunnel to connect the rail systems on the two continents.

Who replaced the North-Africans? I mean people often say the ancient north Africans were dark skinned Africans and not brown like today with middle eastern features. Where did brown berbers, moroccans, Algerians, Libians, Tunisians come from?

Walter Smyth Fascinated by ancient history and geneticsMon

They were never replaced. The same people have always lived in North Africa. North Africans were originally Eurasians dated to 30 000 - 40 000 years ago.

37 000 year old Nazlet Khater man found in Egypt resembled Upper Paleolithic Europeans:

Nazlet Khater Man recreated:

Ethiopians migrated into North Africa before 24 000 years ago, but did not replace the people already in North Africa.

Haplogroups of ancient North Africans showing they carried INDIGENOUS North Africa Y-DNA and MTDNA originating in West Asia: Pottery Neolithic cultures of the Levant . Maternally, the Taforalt remains bore the U6a and M1b mtDNA haplogroups, which are common among modern Afroasiatic -speaking populations in Africa. A two-way admixture scenario using Natufian and modern sub-Saharan samples (including West Africans and the Tanzanian Hadza) as reference populations inferred that the seven Taforalt individuals are best modeled genetically as of 63.5% Natufian-related and 36.5% sub-Saharan ancestry (with the latter having both West African-like and Hadza-like affinities), with no apparent gene flow from the Epigravettian culture of Paleolithic southern Europe. The scientists indicated that further ancient DNA testing at other Iberomaurusian archaeological sites would be necessary to determine whether the Taforalt samples were representative of the broader Iberomaurusian gene pool. [7] See also [edit] ^ Wendorf, Fred; Schild, Romuald (1986-01-01). The Wadi Kubbaniya skeleton: a Late Paleolithic burial from southern Egypt . Southern Methodist University Press. p. 68. ISBN 9780870742163 . ^ P. Sheppard & D. Lubell (1991). "Early Holocene Maghreb prehistory: an evolutionary approach

Mechta Afalou Man recreated:

About 7000 - 5000 years ago the Middle Eastern Farmers migrated into North Africa and Egypt. They never replaced the earlier North Africans, but became assimilated into the population already in North Africa:

Berbers looking like their Middle Eastern ancestors:

Kabyle Berbers of Algeria:

Rifian Berbers:

Moabite Berbers:

Tunisians:

Copts:

Berbers living in the southern parts of North Africa carry more Sub Saharan African DNA:

Tuareg:

Quelles sont les choses qui vous font ou vous ont fait perdre la foi en l'humanité ? (What are some things that make or have made you lose faith in humanity?)

Hervée Tia ne juge pas un sac à l'étiquetteTraducteur · 1 an

Fardin Khan
Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Fardin Khan dans Quora en anglais : C'est l'histoire de ma grand-mère.

Pendant le Hadj ou le Oumra (un pèlerinage islamique), il est demandé aux musulmans de faire le tour de la Kaaba 7 fois. Ça s'appelle le Tawaf.

Cette construction carrée de couleur noire est appelée Kaaba. Sur cette image, vous pouvez voir des personnes faire le Tawaf.

Pendant le Hadj, ce lieu entier est pris d'assaut par des millions de personnes.

Venons-en à l'histoire.

Ma grand-mère a effectué le Hadj avec son propre frère.

Elle faisait le Tawaf à ses côtés. Il lui tenait la main pour la soutenir et aussi pour éviter qu'elle perdît son chemin.

Ma grand-mère du fait de sa vieillesse faisait le tawaf un peu lentement. Son frère s'est très vite lassé de son rythme (ils n'avaient pas encore achevé le premier tour).

En constatant que son frère était agacé par sa lente progression, elle a essayé de hâter le pas. Mais ses jambes l'ont lâchée très vite.

Ce qui s'en est suivi était très, très, très triste.

Il l'a maudite à cause de sa lenteur et l'a abandonnée parmi ces millions de personnes, en lui disant qu'il ne pouvait pas gâcher son Tawaf à cause d'elle.

Ma grand-mère s'est assise et a fondu en larmes.

Les gens effectuent le Hadj pour effacer tous les péchés de leurs vies. Dans ce lieu saint, il y a quelqu'un qui a probablement commis le pire péché de sa vie.

Ce qui m'a surpris est que son frère est un éminent intellectuel et docteur. Sa carte de visite comporte un incroyable nombre de diplômes qu'il a obtenus à travers le monde. Mais ce qu'il a fait m'a emmené à perdre la foi en l'humanité.

NDLA:

J'aimerais tous vous remercier pour vos mots de compassion et de réconfort concernant ce malheureux incident en rapport avec ma grand-maman ! Par la grâce de Allah, elle a pu effectuer son Tawaf d'elle-même et est retournée à l'hôtel saine et sauve !

Par ailleurs, si vous avez des membres de votre famille qui prévoient d'effectuer le Hadj/Oumra, s'il vous plaît assurez-vous qu'une personne responsable, attentionnée et de confiance les accompagne afin de rendre leur pèlerinage confortable et paisible. Suivre Tariq Xyz

Questions similaires

Quelles sont les choses ou les images qui vous redonnent foi en l'humanité ?

Comment avez-vous perdu votre foi en l'humanité ?

Quel est le discours qui vous a redonné foi en l'humanité ?

Qu'est ce qui a ravivé votre foi en l'humanité ?

Quelle tendance actuelle vous fait perdre la foi en l'humanité ?

Avez-vous envie d'avoir foi dans l'humanité ?

Quel a été le moment qui a restauré votre foi en l'humanité ?

Quelles photographies restaurent votre foi en l'humanité ?

Quelles sont les raisons qui pourraient me redonner foi en l'humanité ?

En tant qu'homme, quelles sont les choses que font les femmes qui vous font craquer ?

Quelle est la seule chose que vous faites en privé qui pourrait vous embarrasser si le public le savait ?

À quelles occasions et face à quelles personnes, la mauvaise foi pourrait être utile ?

Avez-vous perdu foi en l'humanité ?

Quel acte de bienveillance vous a redonné foi en l'humanité ?

Quelle est la chose qui vous est arrivée qui vous a fait vous remettre en question ?

Are Berbers different from Arabs? Haşmet Kocakucak

Follow Hamilcar ives in Carthage, Tunis, Tunisia (1920-present)

Updated Dec 9 Former Political Science Researcher

Updated 52m they are not berbers (meaningly barbarians) ,, they are imazighen .and yes they are diffeent from arabs but it is not important for france.

North African Arabs are of Amazigh ancestry and thus the same, just with linguistical differences but similar or even same culture. Most of them don't have genealogical connections to Arabs from other places. And yes, Arabs and Berbers are different, but linguistically speaking only. Note that I am talking about North African Arabs. Amazigh from Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya understand their Arabic dialect but not vice versa.

North African Arabs are of Amazigh ancestry and thus the same, just with linguistical differences but similar or even same culture. Most of them don’t have genealogical connections to Arabs from other places. And yes, Arabs and Berbers are different, but linguistically speaking only. Note that I am talking about North African Arabs. Amazigh from Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya understand their Arabic dialect but not vice versa.

North African Arabs are of Amazigh ancestry and thus the same, just with linguistical differences but similar or even same culture. Most of them don’t have genealogical connections to Arabs from other places. And yes, Arabs and Berbers are different, but linguistically speaking only. Note that I am talking about North African Arabs. Amazigh from Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya understand their Arabic dialect but not vice versa.

Updated Dec 9

North African Arabs are of Amazigh ancestry and thus the same, just with linguistical differences but similar or even same culture. Most of them don’t have genealogical connections to Arabs from other places. And yes, Arabs and Berbers are different, but linguistically speaking only. Note that I am talking about North African Arabs. Amazigh from Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya understand their Arabic dialect but not vice versa.

Follow Haşmet

Related Links

Are Berbers of Arab origin?
Is there any difference between Arabs and Berbers?
How good or bad are the relations between Arabs and Berbers in Morocco?
Did Arabs invade North Africa and Berbers lands?
Are Berbers oppressed by North African Arabs?
Why is Morocco ruled by Arabs when most people seem to be Berber?
Were the Berbers and Arabs of North Africa originally black? If so, how did they end up being lighter skin today?
Are the Berber people mixed race?
Are Libyans more Arab or Berber?
In North Africa, how can you tell if someone is Berber or Arab?
Where do the North African Berber people come from? Why do they look so white?
Do Arabs like Berbers?
Can you be an Arab and a Berber?

Are Berbers pre-Roman peoples, or did they migrate to North Africa after the Romans?
Are Tuaregs black despite being Berber?

What are some of the most mind-blowing facts about Africa? What are some things that would surprise even people who live there?

Anthony M Anderson Loves Africa 5h

1. Sex toys are illegal in mauritius

2. Libya is the only and first african country to fully recognize the armenian genocide and is one of the 33 countries on the globe to do so

3. It is illegal to fart in public in malawi
4. Over 2,000 languages are spoken in africa

Africa has 1,500 to 2,000 tribes, this makes the continent to be diverse in languages as 2,000 languages are spoken.

5. The richest man in history was from africa

The richest man ever in history was basically from africa. His name was musa I who was a ruler of the malian empire.

Related Links

What is something most people don't know about Africa?
What are some amazing facts about Africa?
What are some interesting and unique facts you know about African countries?
Which is most beautiful city in Africa?
People who have traveled to South Africa to work/live, what surprised you most?
What advice have you got?
What are some interesting facts about Ethiopia?
Have you ever visited any country in Africa? If so, what is something that surprised you the most?
What is it like to live in Africa?
Which African country surprised you the most when visiting as a tourist?
What is it that surprised you about Africa?

How come Egypt, Nubia, and Ethiopia developed great civilisations but Libya did not?

Melanite Zaryus 1y

Libya actually did create a very advanced civilisation created by a group of Berber peoples called the Garamantes they were mostly situated within the South of Libya by Germa (Fez). Unfortunately not a lot of is known due to the political instability of the area but research in the area has picked up steam in the last few years.

They created and used qanat irrigation systems, and founded a number of kingdoms or city-states within the area. They were also farmers, engaged in intensive trade and rode chariots.

Archaeological work has shown that the people associated with this city state had connections to both Black Africans and North Africans (mostly Black Africans) and were probably an admixture of the two types. (An Urbanized tuareg like people perhaps?)

"Marta Mirazón Lahr conducted research on skeletons from Fezzan dating to the Roman era and found that the skeletons most closely matched Neolithic sub-saharan African samples, from Chad, Mali, and Niger. Lahr associates these remains with the Garamantes, and concludes that the Garamantes had connections with both sub-saharan and northern Africa"

Related Links

Ethiopia was the mother to ancient Egypt. Without Ethiopia, there never would have been an ancient Egypt as we know it. Why isn't this acknowledged?
Which was the first civilization in Africa, Egypt or Ethiopia?
Taharqa is termed as the Black Pharaoh of ancient Egypt. He was from the so-called Ethiopian dynasty that ruled Egypt. Did Ethiopians really conquer and rule Egypt in ancient times?
Was Egypt once a part of Ethiopia, or was Ethiopia once a part of Egypt?
Is Ancient Ethiopia older than ancient Egypt and ancient Nubia?
Did Ethiopia have anything to do with ancient Egypt?
Which civilization is older, Nubia or Egypt?
Didn't Ethiopia at times rule Egypt and produced Pharaohs?

Was there any ancient civilisation in Africa (like say Romans)? If not what are the reasons that such a huge land did not develop a great civilisation.
Could Nigeria and Ethiopia defeat Egypt?

What are some cool facts about the Berbers?

Sam Imazighen Follow Grew up in a small amazigh town isolated in the mountains. Apr 27

We call ourselves imazighen which means free people.
Our ancestors came here from Eurasia atleast 12000 years ago thats why we're considered indeginous.
We are around 60% of the population of the maghreb.(Morocco,Algeria,Tunisia).
There are dozens of amazigh groups and thousands of tribes,those tribes are devided into baraniss tribes and butr tribes.
Baraniss are the majority of the amazigh population. The name Barānis is a plural form of their eponymous forefather, Burnus, who is described as son of Māzīgh a legendary Berber ancestor. (hence the name Amazigh)
Butr tribes are largely subsaharan in ancestry due to their location in the sahara and their long history of goods and slave trade with subsahara
Some baraniss amazigh groups:
Riffians: Numbered around 6 million they are the majority in the region of the rif in Morocco,had their own short lived state during the 20th century.

The Moroccan singer Ibtissam Tiskat is a riffian on both sides of her family:

2. Shilha: Shleuh or shilha are the amazigh of the anti atlas and sous in moroccco. numbered around 8 million

Siham elazzaoui,the winner of the amazigh beauty pageant of 2018 is a shilha:

.

3. Kabyles,kabyles live in the kabylia region of Algeria. numbered around 7 million.

Zineedin zidane the famous footballer is a kabyle

4. chaouia,the chaouia live in the Aures mountains of algeria. numbered around 3 million djo sabri (djamel sabri) is a chaoui and an iconic singer in the aures region and algeria:

Butr groups:

Mozabites,they live the m’zab natural region in the sahara in Algeria. numbered around a 150 thousand:

The tuareg: They are the bulk of butr tribes and are nomadic people who travel between the south of the sahara and subsahara and west africa,numbered around 3 million.

The famous band Tinawerin are tuareg:

BONUS FACT: all baranis groups can understand eachother to some degree but don't understand butr groups,also butr groups don't understand Baraniss groups. Follow Sam Imazighen

Related Links

Were the Berbers and Arabs of North Africa originally black? If so, how did they end up being lighter skin today?
From an unbiased point of view, what race are the Berbers of Africa? Which foreign invasions were able to conquer North Africa? When did this occur?
What kind of skin color did North Africans have in the past? How were they treated by the Romans and end so on?
Berbers are the first inhabitants of North Africa but where did they originally come from? And why are there many different groups of Berbers who don't share much in common?
Is there any evidence that the black race inhabited North Africa before the white race?
Why do some people insist that Berbers are not real Africans when the term Africa itself is of Berber (Amazigh) origin?
Do the Berbers descend from the Phoenicians?
Did black Africans originally live in North Africa?
Are pure North Africans white?
Do Berbers have West Asian origins or African?
Are Berbers/Amazigh related to the Celts?
Do black Africans who live south of the Sahara generally regard the Arab and Berber people living in the Maghreb as also Africans?
Are Moors and Berbers the same race of people?
Are Tuaregs black despite being Berber?
Who are the real ethnic Berbers, the Amazigh or the Tuareg people?

Muammar Gaddafi Family Bodyguard Tells Sky News Former Dictator Headed South

A bodyguard - who worked for one of Gaddafi's sons - has told Sky's Chief Correspondent, Stuart Ramsay, that he saw Gaddafi on Friday along with his daughter. The 17-year-old said he was last seen in a convoy heading south towards Sabha. SUBSCRIBE to our YouTube channel for more videos: http://www.youtube.com/skynews
Follow us on Twitter: https://twitter.com/skynews and https://twitter.com/skynewsbreak
Like us on Facebook: https://www.facebook.com/skynews
Follow us on Instagram: https://www.instagram.com/skynews
For more content go to http://news.sky.com and download our apps: Apple https://itunes.apple.com/gb/app/sky-n...
Android https://play.google.com/store/apps/de...

Journeyman Pictures

Sky News http://video.news.sky.com/skynews/video/
A look at the rise and fall of Muammar Gaddafi after officials in Libya confirm the former dictator's death.

Gaddafi Interview (2010): Colonel Gaddafi, former premiere of Libya, is questioned on many topics including terrorism, Palestine and Israel, the Lockerbie bombing and more. Subscribe to Journeyman here: http://www.youtube.com/subscription_c... For similar stories see our North Africa playlist: https://www.youtube.com/playlist?list... What Was Libya Like 20 Years Ago? https://youtu.be/2ZHafA6dVBs The End Of Gaddafi's Dictatorship https://youtu.be/DjANac8606o In this rare interview shot in February 2010 - less than two years before he was killed while hiding in a culvert - Muammar Gaddafi tells presenter George Negus he's always merely represented the will of the people. "For 40 years I have not been the ruler, the authority has been with the people," says Gaddafi calmly. Surrounded by security guards and local TV crews in a library of his military compound, which was bombed by the Americans back in 1986, Gaddafi gives an air of quiet confidence. He continues to deny responsibility in the Lockerbie bombing and advocates a one-state solution to the Israel and Palestine conflict. He also comments on Libya's nuclear programme, and shares his opinions on terrorism and democracy. Quizzed by Negus about his softened image, Gaddafi responds that "It is the world that has changed."

Like us on Facebook: https://www.facebook.com/journeymanpi...
Follow us on Twitter: https://twitter.com/JourneymanNews https://twitter.com/JourneymanVOD

Follow us on Instagram: https://instagram.com/journeymanpictures
For more info and downloads visit: http://www.journeyman.tv/?lid=65621&b...

Produced by SBS. Ref - 5884 Journeyman Pictures is your independent source for the world's most powerful films, exploring the burning issues of today. We represent stories from the world's top producers, with brand new content coming in all the time. On our channel you'll find outstanding and controversial journalism covering any global subject you can imagine wanting to know about.

Why are people so obsessed with the genetics and ethnicities of North African people? Will the arguments and debates ever be put to rest?

Ali Sarpin Former Writer

I guess it's because various people are trying to claim the Berbers of today as the ancients.

Berbers of today are more related to West Eurasian whites and Arabs, however, the pre-Berber Iberomaurusians were not.

The modern Berbers originated in southern Libya (and West-Central Asia prior to that). They arrived in Africa post 12,000 BC .

''Genetic data from present-day populations (11⇓–13) suggests that North African ancestry has contributions from four main sources: (i) an autochthonous Maghrebi component related to a back migration to Africa ~12,000 y ago from Eurasia*; (ii) a Middle Eastern component probably associated with the Arab conquest; (iii) a sub-Saharan component derived from trans-Saharan migrations; and (iv) a European component that has been linked to recent historic movements*.''

Even then, newer DNA studies are showing that 70% of Berber men descend from E-M183. This means that modern Berbers are actually a very new people in the region.
70% of Maghrebian men come from a common ancestor that lived only 2,500 years ago - NEWS ARCHIVE

70% of Maghrebian men share a common ancestor, a sort of great-great-grandfather that lived 2,500 years ago. This is found in a study carried out by researchers from the Universitat Pompeu Fabra (UPF) and the Institute of Evolutionary Biology (IBE), a joint centre of the CSIC and the UPF, which was based on the genetic data from more than 200 volunteers from northern Africa, the Middle East and the Iberian Peninsula. Since it is responsible for determining maleness and thus is transmitted from fathers to male offspring only, the Y chromosome is very useful to study the historic and demographic processes of the past. To shed light on the history of the northern African population, a team of researchers led by Francesc Calafell and David Comas analysed the E-M183 Y-chromosomal variant, which was found in 75% of Maghrebian men and is therefore the most frequent paternal lineage in the region. Once the Y chromosome from North African E-M183 variant-carrier men was sequenced, scientists found out that the lineage is 2,500 years old. “Previous research suggested it originated in the Neolithic, that is, 4,500 years ago, or even in the Palaeolithic, 12,000 years ago; that is why such dating has been controversial within the scientific community”, Francesc Calafell, professor of the UPF and leader of the Genomics of Individuality research group of the IBE, says. “Such date shows that its origin is extremely recent, especially if we take into account the great mass of people that share this lineage.” A very complex genetic scenario As a result of several migrations and its cultural diversity, the genetic variety in Northern Africa is considerable. Different groups, Phoenicians, Romans, Vandals and Byzantines among them, have populated the region through history, and two different populations defined by their language coexist in the region: Arabians and Berebers. The evolutionary history of the Y chromosome in humans seems to have happened in waves, and some variants have become more frequent due to cultural changes or technological innovations. “Our estimations of the E-M183 variant’s origin are in line with the end of the third Punic war, 146 BC, when Cartago (Tunisia now) was defeated and destroyed, and the Roman hegemony in the Mediterranean kicked off”, states Neus Solé, main author of the research recently published in Scientific Reports. “Approximately 2,000 years ago, the North of Africa was one of the richest Roman provinces, and quite probably this resulted in a demographic growth of the E-M183 variant.” The E-M183 variant, found in the Canary Islands too The E-M183 Y-chromosomal variant was also found in Guanche mummies, so it seems that northern Africa is the most likely origin of the aborigines of the Canary Islands. Given that the most ancient aborigine individuals had already been dated 2,200 years old, such findings back the hypothesis that the E-M183 sprang in the North of Africa. “Data and mutation taxes used in this research reveal that t

https://www.ibe.upf-csic.es/news/-/asset_publisher/PXTgqZXxlocA/content/id/137280035/maximized#.YdripybP200

The modern Berbers absorbed the Iberomaurusians who were a pre-Berber people that were half black/half West Asian.

The Iberomaurusians were not the Berbers of today and the genes of the Iberimaurusians are mostly found in the people of Western Sahara at 30% max. Even then, 30% isn’t much.

Considering that the Iberomaurusians were literally half black, half West Asian, and Western Sahara people are mostly West Asians, the Iberomaurusians were much darker-skinned than the West Sahara people.

West Sahara people.

The Iberomaurusuan African DNA emerged from an ancient people distantly related to the immediate ancestors of modern West Africans, which shows close links to the Hadza of Tanzania, but may have back migrated into Africa somewhere around South East Asia (Papuan New Guinea) before mixing with other Africans.

Claiming Berbers as the Iberomaurusians is like claiming Cape Verdeans (who are half black West African/half West Asian) as Berbers. The Iberomaurusians had a culture that was distinctively theirs and unique. It represented a crossroad between Africa and West Asia, whilst modern Berbers appear more genetically and culturally related to West Eurasians and Arabs. Much of their African culture has disappeared.

The ancestors of today's Berbers who were the ancient Libyans absorbed and in some cases, brutally murdered the Iberomaurusians. The ancient Greeks called the Iberomaurusians "Atlanteans" and even detailed exactly what happened.

"Setting out from the city of Cherronesus, the account continues, the Libyan Amazons embarked upon great ventures, a longing having come over them to invade many part of the inhabited world. The first people against whom they advanced, according to the tale, was the Atlantians, the most civilized men among the inhabitants of those regions, who dwelt in a prosperous country and possessed great cities; it was among them, we are told, that mythology places the birth of the gods, in the regions which lie along the shore of the ocean, in this respect agreeing with those among the Greeks who relate legends, and about this we shall speak in detail a little later."

Upon entering the land of the Atlantians they defeated in a pitched battle the inhabitants of the city of Cernê, as it is called, and making their way inside the walls along with the fleeing enemy, they got the city into their hands; and desiring to strike terror into the neighbouring peoples they treated the captives savagely, put to the sword the men from the youth upward, led into slavery the children and women, and razed the city.

So, trying to claim Iberomaurusians are modern Berbers is a blatant attempt to take away their African culture, which was the very culture that created the animism in which many polytheistic cultures/civilizations emerged from.

Iberomaurusians were animistic/polytheistic and their culture was relative to the West Africans of today as well the ancient Greeks who worshipped various Gods. Berbers of today are Muslims and are culturally more related to Arabs and other Middle Eastern peoples.

The ones of today are largely descended from Ancient Libyans who absorbed the Iberomaurusians. Any genetic continuation comes from that absorption. And as mentioned, the closest descendants are those in the Western Sahara and Mauritania.

RelatedLinks

What is the genetic makeup of Moroccans like? Is it true that European-like or conversely Sub-Saharan African-like ancestry has only arrived in Morocco and its vicinity only in relatively recent historical times, as some claim?

Where do the North African Berber people come from? Why do they look so white?

Why are North Africans white? Is it still safe to call them Africans or being African has nothing to do with skin colour?

Why do people deny North African, Berber, Arab and Sub Saharan African DNA in modern Iberia when there is clear evidence both in culture, architecture and population that it clearly exist's? Even I am entirely Iberian and I get mistaken for Arab?

What is so great about Money Heist on Netflix?

Why do North Africans look brown?

Why do the people of North Africa have almost nothing in common with the rest of Africa or African people?

Why are people from North African countries white?

Is it possible that the Berbers have conquered North Africans in the past? Because Berbers are white light brown and have their own language and culture than the rest of Africa? Is there evidence for this?

Which Sub-Saharan African ethnic group is the closest genetically to all non-Africans

What surprising discovery about a famous person completely changed the way you saw them?

Quelle découverte surprenante sur une personne célèbre a complètement changé votre façon de la voir ? /What surprising discovery about a famous person completely changed the way you saw them?/

Hamid Sam
Souvent conseillerTraducteur · 1 an

Chukwuebuka Sunday
MBBS de University of Nigeria, Nsukka (Diplôme obtenu en 2019)
Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Chukwuebuka Sunday dans Quora en anglais :

Muammar Kadhafi

Il avait été traité de tyran, de dictateur, de terroriste et d'autres noms terribles.

Il était ce leader africain populaire et controversé qui a été tué dans un canal de drainage en 2011.

Le colonel Kadhafi a dirigé le pays libyen pendant quatre décennies.

Il a peut-être été un terrible leader, mais certains articles sur lesquels je suis tombé par hasard ont changé ma perspective sur cet homme. Sous son règne:

Le PIB par habitant de la Libye en 2010 était de 12064,8 USD. Il était de 7529 USD en 2018.

La mère qui allaite a reçu 5000 (dollars américains) pour elle-même et l'enfant.

Il n'y avait pas de factures d'électricité car c'était totalement gratuit.

Une maison, des terres agricoles, du bétail et des semences ont été donnés gratuitement à ceux qui voulaient se lancer dans l'agriculture.

L'éducation et les soins médicaux étaient absolument gratuits.

De généreuses subventions ont été accordées pour les mariages, le logement et l'achat de voitures. Maintenant, les Libyens doivent payer le prix fort pour tout.

Il a construit le plus grand système d'irrigation au monde reconnu comme «la huitième merveille du monde» dont le but était de fournir de l'eau à tous les Libyens à travers le pays.

Ses derniers mots à ses assassins furent "Qu'est-ce que je t'ai fait?"

Était-il vraiment un chef terrible ou les gens étaient-ils fatigués de lui?

Suivez moi pour plus de contenus inédits: Hamid Sam

Questions similaires

Quelle célébrité devrait réaliser qu'elle n'est plus célèbre ?
Quelle personne décédée, si elle etait ramenée à la vie, serait la plus surprise d'apprendre qu'elle est devenue célèbre à titre posthume ?
Quelle personne célèbre avait la vie secrète la plus terrifiante?
Quel produit, qui vous a coûté 10€ ou moins, a complètement changé votre vie ?
Avez-vous déjà été complètement surpris de voir à quel point une certaine célébrité est agréable dans la vie réelle ?
Quelle est la célébrité que vous n’arrivez pas à prendre au sérieux ?
Quelles photos de personnes célèbres sont méconnaissables ?
Quelle a été votre rencontre la plus surprenante ?
Quelle personne célèbre dans l'histoire, idolâtrée, était en fait une personne horrible ?
Quel personnage célèbre de l'histoire est très apprécié, mais était en fait une personne

What are some of the most mind-blowing facts about Africa? What are some things that would surprise even people who live there?

Anthony M Anderson Loves Africa Jan 2

1.Sex toys are illegal in mauritius
2. Libya is the only and first african country to fully recognize the armenian genocide and is one of the 33 countries on the globe to do so

3. It is illegal to fart in public in malawi
4.Over 2,000 languages are spoken in africa

- Africa has 1,500 to 2,000 tribes, this makes the continent to be diverse in languages as 2,000 languages are spoken.

5. The richest man in history was from africa

- The richest man ever in history was basically from africa. His name was musa I who was a ruler of the Malian empire.

  Related Links

  What is something most people don't know about Africa?

  What are some amazing facts about Africa?

  People who have traveled to South Africa to work/live, what surprised you most? What advice have you got?

  What are some interesting and unique facts you know about African countries?

  Which is most beautiful city in Africa?

  Have you ever visited any country in Africa? If so, what is something that surprised you the most?

  What is it that surprised you about Africa?

  Which African country surprised you the most when visiting as a tourist?

  What are some interesting facts about Ethiopia?

  When you hear 'Africa' what is the the first thought that comes to your mind?

Pourquoi les gens pensent-ils désormais que Kadhafi n'était pas un si mauvais chef d'Etat ? How come people think Gaddafi wasn't such a bad person?

Timothée Henry Suivre Connaissances : EspagnolTraducteur Mis à jour le 2 ans

Melissa Lavochi SEO Expert and Marketing Digital Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de Melissa Lavochi dans Quora en anglais :

En 2011, la majorité du peuple libyen soutenait encore Khadafi. Il a donc résisté pendant plusieurs mois après le début des bombardements de l'OTAN. Demandons-nous aussi pourquoi le nombre de migrants libyens est si faible en Europe et en France — bien plus faible que les algériens, les tunisiens, les marocains.

La vérité est très simple : la vie en Libye était meilleure que ce que les médias occidentaux ont avancé. La Libye avait des standards de vie plus élevés que ceux des voisins du Maghreb, et avait un système social plus avancé également.

Dans ce qui va suivre, je vais utiliser les termes d'Etat et de gouvernement pour désigner le système politique libyen appelé "Jamahiriya", qui est assez unique. On pourrait le traduire par "République des masses", grosso modo.

Voici une liste, non-exhaustive, de ce qui a causé l'attachement de la population libyenne à leur frère Guide :

1. Electricité à la maison gratuite pour tous.
2. Eau gratuite pour tous.
3. Prix du litre de pétrole : 0,08€/litre.
4. Coût de vie plus faible qu'en France : 0,11€ pour une demie baguette, contre 0,40€ en France.
5. Prêts sans intérêt de la part de la banque de Libye.
6. Les citoyens n'avaient pas à payer d'impôts, et la TVA n'existait pas non plus.
7. L'Etat investissait beaucoup pour créer des emplois.
8. La Libye n'était pas endettée. La France avait quelque chose comme 2,3 billions d'euros de dette en 2011, soit 67% de son PIB.
9. Le prix d'achat d'une voiture était à prix d'usine.
10. Chaque étudiant qui voulait étudier à l'étranger recevait un bourse de 1627,11€/mois de l'Etat.
11. Chaque étudiant sortant de licence obtenait un salaire moyen de la profession pour laquelle il ou elle ne trouvait pas un travail.
12. Lorsqu'un couple se mariait, l'Etat payait leur premier appartement, de 150 m².
13. Chaque famille Libyenne pouvait recevoir une aide de 300€/mois sur présentation du livret de famille.

14. Il y avait des endroits appelés "Jamaiya", où la nourriture était achetée à moitié prix pour chaque famille nombreuse, sur présentation du livret de famille.
15. Chaque retraité recevait 200€ par mois minimum.
16. Chaque fonctionnaire de l'Etat libyen qui était muté recevait une maison et une voiture gratuitement. Après une certaine durée, ces biens leur appartenait.
17. Pas de retrait de salaire pour cause d'absence, dans la fonction publique.
18. Le droit d'avoir une demeure était fondamental. Chaque citoyen qui avait besoin d'une maison pouvait en demander une.
19. La rénovation des appartements était également gérée par l'Etat.
20. Des protections liées au genre et à l'égalité des genres avaient été mises en place, permettant à des femmes d'arriver à de postes de responsabilité.
21. Chaque citoyen libyen pouvait participer à la vie politique, locale, régionale ou nationale, dans un système de démocratie directe.

Si on compare cela avec ce qui prévaut aujourd'hui, dans la Libye "post-libération", on comprend bien pourquoi Kadhafi était soutenu. Déduisez ce qui ne vous a pas été dit.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi tant de gens pensent-ils que le régime de Kadhafi était une bonne chose pour la Libye ?
Vous êtes nommé président du Tchad. Comment améliorez-vous la situation de ce pays ?
Pourquoi Mouammar Kadhafi a-t-il été tué, et qui a fourni des aides aux rebelles pour y parvenir ?
Que devient le clan Kadhafi, dix ans après la révolution en Libye ?
Que pouvez-vous me dire sur le président Paul Kagame que la plupart des gens ignorent ?
Qui sont les plus grands hommes d'Etat africains qui ont marqué leur pays que vous connaissez ?
Pourquoi les gens haïssent-ils le capitalisme ?
Après 7 années d’opération Barkhane et un résultat en demi-teinte, qu’est ce qui justifie encore la coûteuse intervention de la France dans le Sahel ?
Quelqu'un peut-il m'expliquer ce qui se passe en Libye ; Haftar, c'est bien, ou ce n'est pas bien ?
Pourquoi la France soutient le général Haftar en Libye ?

Le colonel Kadhafi tué pour le fond monétaire africain

Dernièrement est sorti le livre “Avec les compléments du guide” de Fabrice Arfi et Karl Laske. Dans cette enquête digne d’un polar, les auteurs reconstituent le puzzle du financement de la campagne de Sarkozy en 2007 par le colonel Kadhafi. Ce qui expliquerait les raisons le l’invasion de la France en Libye. Les journalistes de Médiapart allant même jusqu’à dire que le guide a été assassiné par les agents de la DGSE, et non lynché par la foule.

Mais dernièrement, j’ai rencontré un journaliste d’un grand quotidien régional, et voilà ce qu’il me disait : “un moment, les journalistes, faut qu’on arrête de mentir, tiens par exemple, sais-tu pourquoi Khadafi a été tué ? C’est parce qu’il voulait créer le fond monétaire africain et libérer les pays qui sont sous le joug du Franc CFA.”

Voilà une piste intéressante, très peu évoqué. On pourrait aussi rajouter que Mouammar Kadhafi voulait l’indépendance dans les télécommunications, le transport… La France voulait aussi une plus grande part de son or noir, et à terme, c’est l’Afrique qui aurait échapper à l’Occident. Voici quelques sources des projets du guide de la Jamahiriya libyenne pour l’Afrique :

L’éliminer avant ou perdre le contrôle total de l’Afrique à partir de 2014’ voici toute la raison qui guida la France, les États-Unis, la Grande Bretagne et leurs alliés dans leur campagne contre Kadhafi.
“Monnaie, fond monétaire africain, banque centrale africaine, télécommunications, transports, États-Unis d’Afrique… Muammar Kadhafi avait ingénieusement tout planifié, se fixant comme délai l’année 2014 pour la création de la banque centrale, le fond monétaire et bien d’autres encore pour affranchir le continent noir après un demi-siècle d’indépendance aux allures de parole suivie d’aucun acte ou de “gouverner sans régner”.

Après avoir émis l’idée en 2000 lors du sommet de l’Organisation de l’Unité Africaine(OUA) à Lomé de concrétiser le rêve de Kwame Nkrumah et de Cheikh Anta Diop, et obtenu la création de l’Union Africaine (UA) quelques années plus tard, le guide libyen pousse le bouchon plus loin.

Satellite africain et Afriqiya : Deux idées concrètes pour l’unité

Mouammar Kadhafi pousse ses pairs à acheter un satellite africain pour que l’Afrique ait son indépendance en matière de communication. Il préfinance cet achat avec plusieurs centaines de millions de dollars américains.

« Il sait dépenser sans compter(…) ainsi pour acheter le satellite africain, il a mis trois cent millions de dollars sur la table » témoigne Moustapha Cissé, ancien ambassadeur du Sénégal en Libye et ex-conseiller spécial de l’exprésident sénégalais Abdiou Diouf en charge du monde arabo-islamique.

Le Guide de la Jamahiriya Libyenne offrit ainsi RASCOM-QAF1, le premier satellite de télécommunications entièrement dédié au continent africain et ses îles. Il a été mis en orbite le 20 décembre 2007! Cela a été le premier lancement de l'histoire pour tous les pays africains.

Kadhafi lance également la compagnie de transport aérien, Afriqiyah Airawyas, qui assure la liaison entre les capitales africaines et régions du continent. La compagnie offrait 4 vols réguliers entre Tripoli et Dakar, Abidjan et le Caire…etc. « Beaucoup de gens utilisaient la ligne Afriqiyah pour aller à Paris. Parce qu'on pouvait faire Dakar,Tripoli, Paris, et retour à 400 mille FCFA (615 Euros) » ajoute le diplomate sénégalais.

« Alors Tripoli était devenue une plateforme de communication entre l'Afrique, le monde arabe et l'Europe ».

La monnaie et la banque centrale africaine en 2014

Khadafi avait proposé la mise en place d'une union monétaire africaine (UMA). Il avait dégagé 30 milliards (dollars) pour la création de l'UMA qui devrait avoir Yaoundé (Cameroun) pour siège. Il avait également prévue la création d'une banque centrale africaine (BCA), qui devrait installer son quartier général à Abuja, la capitale fédérale du Nigeria. Il était question que cette banque africaine commence à émettre une monnaie africaine à partir de 2014.

« Ce qui ne plaît pas aux occidentaux parce que ça nous permettrait de nous passer du CFA et des autres monnaies qui ne font que briser nos économies » s'indigne M.Cissé

Un investisseur africain en Afrique

Khadafi avait une politique africaine très dynamique. Du Sénégal au Tchad, en passant par le la Guinée, la Côte d'Ivoire, le Ghana, le Libéria, le Bénin, le Togo, le Nigéria, le Niger, le Mali, etc. Le guide Libyen a investi des milliards de dollars dans les secteurs agricoles, hydrocarbures, hôtellerie et tourisme, et dans l'équipement.

Au Mali, le plus petit investissement libyen est chiffré à 50 milliards (FCFA) dans l'industrie hôtelière. « Ces investissements libyens dans l'hôtellerie sont estimés à plus de 50 milliards de francs CFA", a déclaré Oumar Balla Touré, directeur général de l'Office malien du tourisme

Plusieurs autres centaines de milliards ont été investis dans le secteur agricole.

Pour les maliens Khadafi est “un homme qui s’est engagé pour la cause africaine”

Le Conseil nationale de transition (CNT) est considéré au Mali comme un organe rebelle soutenu par la communauté internationale.

Dès le début de la révolte à Benghazi, et l’entrée de l’aviation étrangère, des associations musulmanes et des partis politiques avaient organisé à Bamako des manifestations de soutien à Khadafi, dénonçant une “invasion occidentale “.

Le guide libyen a, par railleurs, dégagé plusieurs milliards de dollars pour la création de banques sahélo-sahariennes au Sénégal, Mali, Niger, Mauritanie, Tchad, etc, et le rachat de plusieurs compagnies occidentales en Afrique pour réduire leur emprise sur les économies du continent.

C’est par exemple le cas de Mobile Oil, du groupe américain Exxon Mobile, qui est devenu Oil Libya dans la majeure partie de la sous-région Ouest africaine.

La Guinée-Conakry doit sa toute première chaîne de télévision à Mouammar Khadafi ; il le lui a offert au nom du peuple Libyen comme présent au « peuple frère » de la Guinée en 1979. Il a également équipé l’armée guinéenne, de l’armement lourde aux uniformes des soldats pendant plusieurs décennies. Sans compter un appui financier gigantesque.

« Et maintenant certains financiers disent que les investissements libyens dans la sous-région dépassent les investissements » fait remarqué l’ambassadeur Moustapha Cissé.

La vie des libyens de l’ère Khadafi

1- La Libye est le dernier pays sur la liste des pays endettés ! La dette à 3,3% du PIB ! En France, elle est à 84,5% ! Aux USA à 88,9% ! Au Japon à 225,8% !

2- L’électricité à suage domestique était gratuite !
3- L’eau à usage domestique était gratuite !
4- Le prix d’un litre d’essence était de 0,08 Euros !
5- Les banques libyennes accordent des prêts sans intérêts !
6- Les citoyens n’ont pas d’impôts à payer, et la TVA n’existe pas !
7- Chaque famille libyenne, sur présentation du livret de famille, reçoit une aide de 300 Euros par mois !
8- Pour chaque étudiant voulant faire ses études à l’étranger, «gouvernement» attribue une bourse de 1 627,11 Euros par mois !

Source seneweb

About Author Jack
Directeur de la publication. Jacques, Jack, Ismaël. Plusieurs pseudos pour une seule personne ! Revenant à l'Islam depuis pas mal d'années, grâce à Allah, ma vie a été chamboulée non sans regret. Comédien de formation, humoriste, auteur, vadrouilleur dans le monde mais surtout à Paris. Je souhaite faire partager le quotidien d'un musulman à travers ce webmagazine, avec des articles et des vidéos.

Ismaël. Plusieurs pseudos pour une seule personne ! Revenant à l'Islam depuis pas mal d'années, grâce à Allah, ma vie a été chamboulée non sans regret. Comédien de formation, humoriste, auteur, vadrouilleur dans le monde mais surtout à Paris. Je souhaite faire partager le quotidien d'un musulman à travers ce webmagazine, avec des articles et des vidéos.

Libye: plusieurs migrants tués par les gardes d'un centre de detention

Publié le : 08/10/ 2021 - 22:16

Des migrants détenus par les forces de sécurité libyennes après avoir tenté de s'échapper du centre de détention Al-Mabani, le 8 octobre 2021, à Tripoli. © Husam Ahmed, AFPSix migrants originaires d'Afrique subsaharienne ont été tués par balles par les gardes libyens d'un centre de détention à Tripoli, selon le bureau de l'Organisation internationale pour les migrations (OIM). Des médias locaux ont rapporté que des centaines de migrants s'étaient évadés de ce centre surpeuplé.

Des gardes libyens ont tué, vendredi 8 octobre, par balles six migrants africains dans un centre de détention à Tripoli, a indiqué l'Organisation internationale pour les migrations (OIM), dénonçant des conditions de vie "terribles" dans ce lieu surpeuplé.

Des médias libyens ont rapporté, vidéos à l'appui, que des centaines de migrants s'étaient évadés du centre sans faire état des tirs meurtriers dans le complexe.

"C'est en lien avec l'entassement des migrants"

L'incident s'est produit dans le centre de détention d'Al-Mabani où sont détenus quelque 3 000 migrants, a indiqué le responsable de l'OIM, Federico Soda. "Six migrants au total ont été tués par les gardes." "Nous ne savons pas ce qui a provoqué l'incident, mais c'est en lien avec l'entassement des migrants qui vivent dans des conditions terribles et tendues", a-t-il ajouté. "Beaucoup de migrants se sont évadés pendant le chaos."

Selon Federico Soda, le centre de détention Al-Mabani a une capacité d'accueil de 1 000 détenus, mais plus de 3 000 s'y entassent, dont environ 2 000 hors du bâtiment principal, mais dans le périmètre du complexe. "Leur détention est arbitraire. Nombreux d'entre eux ont des papiers en règle mais sont bloqués dans le pays", a-t-il affirmé.

La Libye est un important point de passage pour des dizaines de milliers de migrants, majoritairement issus de pays d'Afrique saharienne, cherchant chaque année à gagner l'Europe par les côtes italiennes, distantes de quelque 300 km des côtés libyennes.

Plusieurs ONG et agences onusiennes dénoncent régulièrement les conditions déplorables dans les centres de détention en Libye, où passeurs et trafiquants ont profité ces dix dernières années du climat d'instabilité ayant suivi la révolte de 2011, faisant de la Libye la plaque tournante du trafic d'êtres humains sur le continent.

Des "crimes de guerre" et des "crimes contre l'humanité" commis en Libye

Début octobre, une opération "anti-drogue" menée par les autorités libyennes dans un faubourg de Tripoli, qui a ciblé principalement des migrants en situation irrégulière, a fait un mort et au moins quinze blessés, selon la Mission d'appui des Nations unies en Libye (Manul). Au moins 5 000 personnes, dont des femmes et des enfants, ont été arrêtées, selon Médecins sans frontières (MSF).

Lundi, une mission d'enquête d'experts de l'ONU a publié un rapport dans lequel elle a dénoncé des "crimes de guerre" et des "crimes contre l'humanité" commis en Libye depuis 2016, en particulier contre les migrants. Les migrants sont soumis à toutes sortes de violences "dans les centres de détention et du fait des trafiquants", selon le texte. "Notre enquête montre que les agressions contre les migrants sont commises à une large échelle par des acteurs étatiques et non-étatiques, avec un haut degré d'organisation et avec les encouragements de l'État – autant d'aspects qui laissent à penser qu'il s'agit de crimes contre l'humanité".

De plus en plus de morts en Méditerranée

De nombreux drames de l'immigration clandestine se sont produits en partance de Libye. Le dernier date de mardi quand les corps sans vie de 17 migrants ont été découverts sur la côte ouest libyenne après le naufrage de leur embarcation.

Le nombre de migrants morts en mer en tentant de rejoindre l'Europe a plus que doublé cette année par rapport à la même période en 2020, selon des chiffres de l'OIM publiés en juillet. En septembre, l'OIM a dénombré 1 369 migrants morts noyés en Méditerranée depuis de début d'année.

La Libye tente de tourner la page d'une décennie de chaos depuis la chute du régime de Mouammar Kadhafi tué lors d'une révolte populaire. Surmontant les années de conflit, un gouvernement de transition a été installé en mars, sous l'égide de l'ONU, pour mener le pays vers des élections prévues en décembre et en janvier, mais qui restent hypothétiques en raison de la persistance des divisions. Avec AFP

LIBYA

France and US killed Qaddafi for his gold and oil

Alexander Finnegan · Follow Jan 16 Posted by Alexander Finnegan

With the recent release of Hillary Clinton's emails by Wikileaks, the public now knows exactly how the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) went from a collective defense organization to the new Barbary Coast Pirates of imperialism.
During the 2011 Libyan uprising, the United Nations Security Council passed Resolution 1973 which called for a ceasefire and authorized military action to protect civilian lives. A coalition formed, centered around NATO with the March 17, 2011 passing of the Resolution. Its purpose – a so-called "no-fly zone" over Libya.

The irony that the U.S.-dominated NATO military organization would be concerned with "protecting" Arab civilians is all too obvious since the United States is the nation most responsible for killing Arab civilians.

The real reasons for the attack have been dealt with most directly by America's famous reformed "economic hitman," John Perkins.

Perkins points out that the attack on Libya, like the attack on Iraq, has to do with power and control of resources, not only oil, but gold. Libya has the highest standard of living in Africa. "According to the IMF, Libya's Central Bank is 100% state owned. The IMF estimates that the bank has nearly 144 tons of gold in its vaults," Perkins wrote.

NATO went there like modern Barbary Coast Pirates – to loot Libya's gold. The Russian media, in addition to Perkins, reported that the Pan-Africanist Qaddafi, the former President of the African Union, had been advocating that Africa use the gold so plentiful in Libya and South Africa to create an African currency based on a gold dinar.

"It is significant that in the months running up to the UN resolution that allowed the U.S. and its allies to send troops into Libya, Muammar al-Qaddafi was openly advocating the creation of a new currency that would rival the dollar and the euro. In fact, he called upon African and Muslim nations to join an alliance that would make this new currency, the gold dinar, their primary form of money and foreign exchange. They would sell oil and other resources to the US and the rest of the world only for gold dinars," Perkins explained.

Revelation in Email to Hillary Clinton

Wikileaks released an unclassified U.S. Department of State document emailed to Hillary dated April 2, 2011, key Clinton aide Sidney Blumenthal confirmed that the Perkins was right and the attack on Libya had nothing to do with Qaddafi being a threat to the United States and NATO and everything to do with looting his gold.

"Qaddafi's government holds 143 tons of gold, and a similar amount in silver. During late March, 2011, these stocks were moved to Sabha (south west in the direction of the Libyan border with Niger and Chad); taken from the vaults of the Libyan Central Bank in Tripoli," Blumenthal reported to Clinton.

Blumenthal pointed out the purpose of Qaddafi's precious metal: "This gold was accumulated prior to the current rebellion and was intended to be used to establish a pan-African currency based on the Libyan golden Dinar. This plan was designed to provide the Francophone African Countries with an alternative to the French franc (CFA)."

Blumenthal spells out the reason for NATO's attack and France's imperial plunder, "French intelligence officers discovered this plan shortly after the current rebellion began, and this was one of the factors that influenced President Nicholas Sarkozy's decision to commit France to the attack on Libya."

There were five reasons for France's illegal war with NATO against Libya. Sarkozy sought, according to Blumenthal, "a. A desire to gain a greater share of Libyan oil production, b. Increase French influence in North Africa, c. Improve his internal situation in France, d. Provide the French military with an opportunity to assert its position in the world, e. Address the concern of his advisors over Qaddafi's long term plans to supplant France as the dominant power in Francophone Africa."

Under the neo-colonialism favored after World War II during the period of the Cold War, we preferred to bribe various African leaders to help us loot their nation's resources. The U.S., of course, killed any Pan-African aspirations as well as potential leaders like Patrice Lumumba.

This highjacking of Arab and African resources and slaughtering of Arab civilians is a long-standing plan put forth by neo-conservatives in the United States. The Project for the New American Century (PNAC) has had a "hit list" of Arab nations and little regard for Arab casualties.

General Wesley Clark wrote in "Winning Modern Wars" that "As I went back through the Pentagon in November 2001, one of the senior military staff officers had time for a chat. Yes, we are still on track for going against Iraq, he said. But there was more. This was being discussed as part of a five-year campaign plan, he said, and there was a total of seven countries beginning with Iraq, then Syria, Lebanon, Libya, Iran, Somalia, and Sudan.

What we witnessed in Libya was old-fashioned 19[1] th century imperialism – the deliberate plundering of a sovereign nation-state's resources by more powerful Western conquistadors.

Hillary thought his public sodomy and murder was hilarious:

This video is why I hate Hillary Clinton. And her rigging of the primaries in 2016 against Bernie was unforgivable. If you are not also offended by it, block and mute me now.

Wake Up Africa!
Was Gaddafi the best ever to have come out of Africa? Could he have been the link to the contest of world power for other African countries?

Answered by Robert Kamanja 56m

Gaddafi had very good intentions about Africa.He was ahead of our time.He muted the idea of an Afri an currency backed by our gold reserves I wonder why all good african people who mean well for Africa have to be eliminated.Patrice Lumumba etc

Related Links

How was the contact between Western Sudan and North Africa promoted?
Why is it that South Africa doesn't have a refugee camp yet they have a high number of asylum seekers?

How do you achieve a stable and harmonious development of the country amidst the issues and challenges of migration caused by globalization?

Could it have been the call President Muhammad Buhari placed to the Super Eagles of Nigeria before the match brought them bad luck as been speculated on social media?

What does the future hold for Nigeria? With series of loan been collected and nothing tangible to show for it? With dwindling economy, how will the next government survive?

What is the youngest African country?
Why is the killing of a wall gecko forbidden in Africa?

How can patriarchy be ruled out in African traditional societies in the 21st century?

Are there still chances that Nigeria will still become the giant of Africa?

Is it possible to volunteer in Africa without paying huge fees or volunteer with-locals without going through European and Western organisations?

How is that developed nations after plundering Africa’s resources for free and its people for centuries are now our saviours for giving us aid?

Which country will win the AFCON? Why do you suggest the country will win?

Is it better for African countries to collect loans from China instead of the World Bank and/or IMF?

When did South Africa fist have a significant Black middle class?
What are the best government bonds in your country for investing?

News Nigeria
Over 160 Africans lost their lives yesterday crossing from Libya to Italy.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Thu

If we continue to only watch and speak with eloquence, who will take these actions?

How did Muammar Gaddafi rule for 50 years?

Mustapha Hajji Libyan Jamahiriya Updated 1y

I don't like to answer questions about my leader since his demise, as remembering him sometimes gives me heartaches, not only because he's no more nor the unjust manner in which he was assassinated by the 48 unjust countries, but because of the present chaotic pitiful state of Libya —it is disheartening how a once prosperous country now became a safe haven for terrorists and an epicenter of illicit arms.

Gaddafi was able to rule Libya successfully for decades because he was the kind of leader who always make the interests of his people his top priority.

The West called him tyrant, they demonized him, they used their traduce-like media to ostensibly besmirched him... They rejoiced after killing him, but little did they know that the battle was more psychological than physical.

>Meanwhile under the rule of the "tyrant" (according to the confused western government parasitic cockroaches) —The tyrant did more for Libya than they (the western governments) will ever do for their people in the west!

Under The Tyrant In Libya

In Libya , a home was considered a natural human right.

The state provided financial aid to mothers after childbirth.

Education and health care was free.

Education improved: Literacy went from 25% to 75%.

Electricity was free.

➡️Starting a farming business was supported by the government, including land, livestock and seeds 🌱.

➡️Zero interest loans could be accessed at banks with no external debt.

➡️Muammar Gaddafi tried to introduced a single African currency to a gold standard.

⬆️If all these projects and achievements makes a leader "tyrant" according to the "west" —then I'll rather have a tyrant as my leader than a "democratically decorated thieve", hiding under the umbrella of democracy to deny me my fundamental human rights and sell my future to his fellow colonial parasitic thieves.

During Gaddafi's rule in Libya :-

Libyan students abroad received free education (tuition paid by Government), allowances and even their clothes were paid for by the Government.

Politics and government of Libya under Gaddafi.

Under Gaddafi, Libya was governed by a military regime professing the idea of Arab nationalism, socialism, and Islam . The highest state authority was the General People's Congress (GPC), consisting of representatives of People's Committees. In practice, the GPC had the functions of a parliament. Its members were elected at local and regional levels, although part of them were assigned by Gaddafi personally. Gaddafi also appointed his ministers from among the members of the GPC. While Gaddafi himself did not hold any official posts, he remained the leading political figure in Libya .

Islam is the state religion of Libya , but the influence of the Muslim clergy is limited. Direct democracy has been declared in the country and oil revenues make it possible to maintain a high standard of living for the Libyan population. The presence of foreign capital is reduced, the enterprises in the sphere of large and medium industry are owned by the state.

The basis of justice is the Quran. Judicial proceedings are conducted by a hierarchical system of courts. Small lawsuits are considered in the Magistrates' Courts. Next come the Courts of the First Stage, the Appellate Courts and the Supreme Court.

The official main principle of government in Libya was: "Power, wealth and weapons - in the hands of the people."

Gaddafi's government Relationship with Islam ☪, Muslims and non Muslims. [True Islam ☪ is the one that defends the weak, even if they are not Muslims"]. :- Colonel Gaddafi

In the absence of specific prescriptions for the transformation of society in the so-called "Islamic socialism", Gaddafi constantly made revisions to this theory. Before the "Green Book", Islam was considered one of the ideological sources of official ideology, but the third part of this book, which appeared in the summer of 1979, did not assess its truthfulness on the basis of the precepts of Islam.

On the contrary, "the truth" of Islamic provisions themselves was evaluated in terms of their compatibility with the theory. It was declared that the driving force of history was national and social struggle. At the same time, as Gaddafi specified, "if we were to restrict ourselves to the support of Muslims only, that would be an example of bigotry and selfishness: True Islam ☪ is the one that defends the weak, even if they are not Muslims".

In the subsequent explanations and comments on the "Green Book", many of its provisions underwent significant revisions while still remaining the basic catechism of ideology in Libya .

The theory was partially implemented in Libya . In March 1977, the "Declaration of Sabha" was declared, and the republic was transformed into a Jamahiriya (the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya). Those forms of private ownership which were deemed exploitative were abolished (whereas private family businesses in the service sector were preserved).

With the advent of globalization and the information revolution Gaddafi slightly modified his theory by introducing a thesis about the era of large spaces in which the nation-state is becoming inviable. The word "Jamahiriya" (Arabic: جماهيرية jamāhīriyyah, approximately "[state] of the masses") is an Arabic neologism. It is the feminine nisba adjective formed from the term "Jamahir" (masses). It echoes the Arabic term for "Republic", "Jumhuriyah" (formally the feminine nisba adjective from Jumhur "people")

Gaddafi's "Jamahiriya" form of government was supposed to be different from both the monarchy and the republic, hence the name of "Third" International Theory.

"True Islam is the one that defends the weak, even if they are not Muslims".
:-Muammar Al-Gaddafi
-Mustapha_Hajji-
@desert__lion

Muammar Mohammed Abu Minyar Gaddafi was the 1st, and the only leader in the Arab world to formally apologise for the Arab role in the trade of captured African people, even though he was not even part of it.

When Muammar Gaddafi was in power, Blacks played a major role all through out Libya's Government. Most of Gaddafi's security details was made up of Black people, as shown in the pictures below . Gaddafi trusted his life with Blacks.

Muammar Gaddafi also proclaimed in his Green Book , quote; "The Black race shall prevail throughout the world .

This is the picture of the Powerful Black Woman that was in charge of Gaddafi's security details.

When Muammar Gaddafi was in power, Blacks played major roles through out Libya's Government. Most of Gaddafi's security details was made up of Black people. Gaddafi trusted his life with Blacks.

Below are pictures of Libyan Military Officers in Benghazi, Libya 🇱🇾.
As you can see, they are Blacks.

Photo taken by @ali.bojwary

Gaddafi was also a Pan-Africanist, he believed in the African dream. He once stated that;

I shall continue to insist that our sovereign African countries work together to achieve the "United States Of Africa —with a single military force, a single currency and a passport for Africans to move freely around #Africa

Colonel Gaddafi —African Union (AU) Chairman - (February 2009).

✨ If you think the United Nations (UN) 🌐 love Africa 🌍 more than me, then allow them to kill me and watch them return Africa 🌍 back to slave trade... :- Muammar Gaddafi

➡️ The slavery Gaddafi was referring to is not the type of olden days slavery that requires chains ⛓️🔗 —modern slavery require no chain ⛓️

➡️ The modern slavery imposed on Africa 🌍 by the colonial parasites are piloted to destabilise African countries economically, politically, religiously, spiritually, mentally and psychologically.

—Is there any African country that is not critically suffering from one of the aforementioned factors?? 🤔🤷🏾‍♂️

➡️Africa 🌍 is blessed with multitudinous resources, yet most of our people are suffering and smiling, while some microscopic few elites we elect to manage our resources on our behalf are in fact enriching themselves and colluding with their colonial masters in the west to keep extorting us at will!

⚠️Gaddafi's warning went unheeded!

Barack Obama called Gaddafi evil. But here are some facts about Libya

🇱🇾 under Colonel Muammar Al Qaddafi and USA 🇺🇸 under Barack Obama.

🇱🇾 Free Healthcare

🇺🇸 No Free Healthcare

🇱🇾 Free Electricity

🇺🇸 No Free Electricity

🇱🇾 No Interest Loans

🇺🇸 Yes, Interest Loans

🇱🇾 Rebuilding Africa 🌍

🇺🇸 Destroying America 🌎

🇱🇾 Invaded No One

🇺🇸 Invaded Libya 🇱🇾 and Middle East

🇱🇾 Gaddafi was a Desert Lion ✨✨☪️

🇺🇸 Obama was an American Sheeple 🐑

"YOUR ARMED FORCES HAVE TOPPLED THE REACTIONARY, BACKWARD AND CORRUPT REGIME. WITH ONE STRIKE YOUR HEROIC ARMY HAS TOPPLED IDOLS AND DESTROYED THEM IN ONE OF PROVIDENCE'S FATEFUL MOMENTS. AS OF NOW LIBYA SHALL BE FREE AND SOVEREIGN, A REPUBLIC UNDER THE NAME OF THE LIBYAN ARAB REPUBLIC. NO OPPRESSED OR DECEIVED OR WRONGED, NO MASTER AND NO SLAVE; BUT FREE BROTHERS IN A SOCIETY OVER WHICH, GOD WILLING, SHALL FLUTTER THE BANNER OF BROTHERHOOD AND EQUALITY. AND THUS SHALL WE BUILD GLORY, REVIVE HERITAGE AND AVENGE A WOUNDED DIGNITY. SONS OF THE BEDOUINS, SONS OF THE DESERT, SONS OF THE ANCIENT CITIES, SONS OF THE COUNTRYSIDE, SONS OF THE VILLAGES, THE HOUR OF WORK HAS STRUCK AND SO LET US FORGE AHEAD."

- MUAMMAR GADDAFI

@THEOMITTEDHISTORY

Gaddafi was never the problem of Libya 🇱🇾, if he was the problem, then why isn't Libya 🇱🇾 peaceful and prosperous after the West assassinated him? 🤔

Gaddafi also believed in the emancipation of women as part of his Pan-Africanmovement, just like his predecessors, he wrote in his famous “Green Book 📗” that “a WOMAN is a human just like a MAN is”.

According to Gaddafi, it is an undisputed fact that both man and woman are human beings. It follows, as a self-evident fact, that woman and man are equal as human beings. Discrimination against woman by man is a flagrant act of oppression without justification for woman eats and drinks as man eats and drinks; woman loves and hates as man loves and hates; woman thinks, learns and comprehends as man thinks, learns and comprehends. Woman, like man, needs shelter, clothing, and transportation; woman feels hunger and thirst as man feels hunger and thirst; woman lives and dies as man lives and dies.

How can a man with these qualities and mindsets, not rule a nation for 50 years or even 500 years if he live long.

I'm not trying to depict Gaddafi as a perfect man, he had his flaws, he made mistakes just like any other human… But he was not a bad leader as the West portrays him to be. Follow Mustapha Hajji

Related Links

What makes Libya worse now than before when Gaddafi was in power?
What are some facts about Muammar Gaddafi known by very less people?
What was it like to live under the Gaddafi regime?
Who gave NATO the right to kill Gaddafi?
Did Gaddafi deserve to die the way he did?
Was Muammar Gaddafi a dictator?
Why do so many people believe that Gaddafi did good for Libya?
Why was Libyan president Muammar Gaddafi toppled?

Why is Gaddafi portrayed as a bad man in Western media when he has done so much for his people and country?

Why did they kill Gaddafi? What was his crime?
What crimes did Muammar Gaddafi actually commit?
Do Libyans regret killing Muammar Gaddafi?
Why do people now think that Gaddafi was not such a bad head of state?
How was Muammar Gaddafi in real life?
What are the key differences between Saddam Hussein and Muammar Gaddafi?

Why does Libya have a larger black population than the rest of North Africa?

Naziru Gelajo Ethnically speaking I'm a Nigerian Fulani so simply put, a Sahelian 3y

Back when Ghaddafi was alive, many black Africans (including black natives in Libya like the Touareg Berbers, Toubou, Kanuri, etc) lived in Libya.
Libya was one of the most successful countries in Africa and thus neighbouring and nearby countries (Chad, Nigeria, Niger Republic, etc) would relocate there for higher salaries and promise of good treatment since Ghaddafi was very pro-African.

The Black Africans in Libya today are a combination of native/indigenous black people that have been there for thousands of years and those from nearby countries (the aforementioned countries).

Is Libya more like Algeria and Tunisia, or more like Egypt?

Eric Arbib Former Customs Specialist (1992–2016) Mar 28

Egypt is basically a country based on Muslims that were once Christians,Moors or completely dark skinned like Saadat, and Christian Copts (10% of the population). Most of the Egyptian population is stable, it has very little of people that came from other countries. Libya, as other North African countries and even more than the others, is a completely Muslim Sunni Maliki country. It means that it is religiously speaking a very compact country. Ethnically speaking, Libya is built of nearly 50 different tribes ,Arabs, Berberian, Touareg, Black Africans, all that built on a base Punic (From Sidon and Thyre in Lebanon), Greek, Jewish(from 400 before Christ),Roman, Bizantyne, Vandal , Turkish. Being a country of almost 2 million square kilometers with very sparse population, ,Libya has a problem being a united country.

Related Links

Is Egypt more like Libya or Algeria?
Is Algeria more like Tunisia or like Egypt?

Why is Egypt so much more chaotic and dirty than other North African countries like Tunisia and Algeria when Egypt has such a long history of civilization?

Is Tunisia more connected to Libya or Algeria?
Why is Tunisia so much more Westernized than Algeria, Morocco, or Libya?
How religious are people in Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia?
Does Algeria like Egypt?
Are you pro unification of Algeria and Tunisia?
What would happen if Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia became one single country?
Why is Morocco more touristic than Algeria and Tunisia?
Which is a richer country: Algeria, Tunisia, Egypt, Morocco? And why?

Why aren't Libya, Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco considered part of the Middle East just like Egypt?

Were Egypt, Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya originally the land of the ancient black Africans like the kings and mummies who built the first civilisation?

Is atheism growing in Algeria, Morocco, Tunisia?

Why did the Ottoman Empire not fight to keep Egypt, Tunis, and Algeria the way they did for Libya? What made Libya so special?

De votre selection
Qui est la figure historique la plus mal comprise ?
Who is the most misunderstood historical figure?

Serge Elia Raffole de l'histoireTraducteur · sam.

Anthony M Anderson Student Cette réponse peut ne pas être une traduction fidèle de la réponse de dans Quora en anglais :

Mouammar Kadhafi.

Ce fut le deuxième dirigeant de la Libye, un panafricain, sans doute la figure la plus mal comprise puisqu'il fut traité de terroriste et d'assassin à cause de ses activités mauvaises, dont l'ordre de l'attentat de Lockerbie. Ainsi, les médias occidentaux renvoyaient une image négative de lui.

L'Occident traitait Kadhafi d'assassin et de terroriste.

En réalité, Kadhafi était un panafricain aimé par la majorité de la population libyenne, ainsi que par la majorité des Africains en raison de son ambition panafricaine, visant à unir l'Afrique en un seul pays.

Voici les bonnes choses faites par Kadhafi, dont d'aucuns ont été surpris :

Il mit en place la gratuité des soins de santé, de l'éducation et de l'électricité en Libye.

Il entama la construction du système d'irrigation le plus important au monde.

Il avait la volonté d'introduire le dinar en or comme unique monnaie pour toute l'Afrique.

Il mit en place les logements gratuits, en particulier pour les diplômés de collège ou d'université.

Il fit de la Libye l'un des pays africains les plus riches et les plus prospères.

Il avait une ambition panafricaniste, ainsi que la volonté de créer les États-Unis d'Afrique.

Il fit de la Libye un pays autonome et autosuffisant.

Ndt : Je tiens à prévenir mes lecteurs que je n'ai fait que traduire objectivement la réponse initiale sans l'adopter ou pas. Je ne veux guère que ma réponse soit sujette à controverse, et je ne veux pas non plus qu'elle porte atteinte à quiconque.

Pourquoi les gens pensent-ils désormais que Kadhafi n'était pas un si mauvais chef d'Etat?/ How come people think Gaddafi wasn't such a bad person?

Timothée Henry Connaissances : EspagnolTraducteur · Mis à jour le 2 ans

Melissa Lavochi SEO Expert and Marketing Digital

En 2011, la majorité du peuple libyen soutenait encore Khadafi. Il a donc résisté pendant plusieurs mois après le début des bombardements de l'OTAN. Demandons-nous aussi pourquoi le nombre de migrants libyens est si faible en Europe et en France — bien plus faible que les algériens, les tunisiens, les marocains.

La vérité est très simple : la vie en Libye était meilleure que ce que les médias occidentaux ont avancé. La Libye avait des standards de vie plus élevés que ceux des voisins du Maghreb, et avait un système social plus avancé également.

Dans ce qui va suivre, je vais utiliser les termes d'Etat et de gouvernement pour désigner le système politique libyen appelé "Jamahiriya", qui est assez unique. On pourrait le traduire par "République des masses", grosso modo.

Voici une liste, non-exhaustive, de ce qui a causé l'attachement de la population libyenne à leur frère Guide :

Electricité à la maison gratuite pour tous.

Eau gratuite pour tous.

Prix du litre de pétrole : 0,08€/litre.

Coût de vie plus faible qu'en France : 0,11€ pour une demie-baguette, contre 0,40€ en France.

Prêts sans intérêt de la part de la banque de Libye.

Les citoyens n'avaient pas à payer d'impôts, et la TVA n'existait pas non plus.

L'Etat investissait beaucoup pour créer des emplois.

La Libye n'était pas endettée. La France avait quelque chose comme 2,3 billions d'euros de dette en 2011, soit 67% de son PIB.

Le prix d'achat d'une voiture était à prix d'usine.

Chaque étudiant qui voulait étudier à l'étranger recevait une bourse de 1627,11€/mois de l'Etat.

Chaque étudiant sortant de licence obtenait un salaire moyen de la profession pour laquelle il ou elle ne trouvait pas un travail.

Lorsqu'un couple se mariait, l'Etat payait leur premier appartement, de 150 m².

Chaque famille Libyenne pouvait recevoir une aide de 300€/mois sur présentation du livret de famille.

Il y avait des endroits appelés "Jamaiya", où la nourriture était achetée à moitié prix pour chaque famille nombreuse, sur présentation du livret de famille.

Chaque retraité recevait 200€ par mois minimum.

Chaque fonctionnaire de l'Etat libyen qui était muté recevait une maison et une voiture gratuitement. Après une certaine durée, ces biens leur appartenait.
Pas de retrait de salaire pour cause d'absence, dans la fonction publique.

Le droit d'avoir une demeure était fondamental. Chaque citoyen qui avait besoin d'une maison pouvait en demander une.

La rénovation des appartements était également gérée par l'Etat.

Des protections liées au genre et à l'égalité des genres avaient été mises en place, permettant à des femmes d'arriver à des postes de responsabilité.

Chaque citoyen libyen pouvait participer à la vie politique, locale, régionale ou nationale, dans un système de démocratie directe.
Si on compare cela avec ce qui prévaut aujourd'hui, dans la Libye "post-libération", on comprend bien pourquoi Kadhafi était soutenu. Déduisez ce qui ne vous a pas été dit.

Related Answer
Has Libya recovered from the civil war?

Richard Ross, political analyst Answered Apr 13, 2019

Originally Answered: Have Libya recovered from the civil war?

You can tell a lot about a country’s trajectory by looking at its annual GDP numbers. Here are Libya’s:

Libya's GDP peaked in 2008 before the global economic crash at $93 billion (not shown in chart), dipped quite a bit in 2009/2010 before taking a massive hit in 2011 - the year of Libya's great civil war between Gaddafi's Jamahiriya forces and Libyan National Transitional Council rebel forces (the latter aided by NATO airstrikes).

In 2012, despite the terrible war, Libya appeared to be (at least economically) on par with the pre-war years. It held its first elections, governments were establishing relationships with the new administration and there was a great deal of hope for the future of Libya. But by 2013, it appears that things were sliding due to the physical power of militias that formed during the war, overwhelming political actors. Sometime before 2013 (in September of 2012) came the infamous US embassy attack and it was obvious that Libya had a problem with security and militancy. At some point in 2013, the militias went so far as to kidnap the prime minister, Ali Zeidan.

In 2014, as the next major drop reflects, Libya slid into its second civil war, this time between the so-called "Operation Dignity" forces of Khalifa Haftar (who is backed by Egypt, UAE, France and Russia) vs the Fajr Libya factions (who received Qatari and Turkish backing). This battle lasted for much of the year, resulting in an uneasy truce and left two standing governments- one in the West in Tripoli (Fajr Libya) and one in the East based in Tobruk (Dignity forces). Nobody expected this truce to last forever, and indeed the battles of today demonstrate show that.

In 2015, ISIS emerges and seizes control over Sirte (with the help of disgruntled members of Gaddafi's clan) as well as Derna. They staged numerous attacks on Libyan cities. Meanwhile the battle by Khalifa Haftar's forces to take Benghazi from extremist militias were underway. At the end came the Libyan Political Agreement, which saw the establishment of a 3rd government - the Government of National Accord (GNA)- which was to take the place of the current one in Tripoli and aim to unite the existing bodies. This year was Libya's lowest year in economic output.

In 2016, all territories by ISIS are retaken. Forces loosely affiliated or loyal to this new GNA defeat ISIS- with US help- in the battle for Sirte, and the ISIS militants are driven out of Derna by a rival Islamist group. Despite this, it becomes clear that the two sides of the second civil war were irreconcilable. The Eastern Government's parliament rejected the GNA and continued to endorse its commander Khalifa Haftar, who continued to do battle in Benghazi. GDP barely rises that year over 2015, given these battles, administrative problems, and oil production freezes.

In 2017, Haftar finally conquers Benghazi, eliminating Islamist radicals from Libya's second-largest city before setting his sights on further conquests that he would try to achieve, such as Derna and the Southern province of Fezzan. Tripoli meanwhile struggled with rival militias frequently doing battles on the streets and the GNA unable to establish its authority. Electricity cuts are frequent, inflation made the exchange rate in excess of 5 dinars per dollar (on the black market), and the human trafficking situation is out of control in the country. Libya has served as the launching point for desperate refugees and migrants reaching Europe since the days of Gaddafi, but given the simultaneous crises across the middle east and the security shortfall, the trafficking problem has spiraled out of control, much to Libya's detriment.

Recent events unfortunately indicate that another bloody chapter is about to be written into Libya's history as the two sides of the second Libyan Civil War are battling over Tripoli, Libya's largest and most important city. It seemed not too long ago that a national conference would attempt to bring the sides together this month, but Haftar, having conquered Libya's East and pacified much of the south, showed that he has no interest in negotiations whatsoever. He ordered his troops to invade Tripoli last week, and his opponents have gathered to resist his advance. We won't know the numbers until much later, but I'd bet on a slight rise in 2018 before another momentous drop for 2019.

Therefore, I can sadly report that Libya has failed to win the peace after the initial war of 2011, and that's sadly common these days in countries that experience civil conflict. It may be a very long time before the animosity of these years subsides and the people of this country can make peace with its violent past. I can only hope that it happens soon in a manner that is agreeable to (almost) all Libyans.

Related Answer
What are the factions in the Second Libyan Civil War and who supports them?

Dan Gall , worked at Canadian Armed Forces (1972-1997) Answered Apr 10, 2019

The Second Libyan Civil War is between the various rebel groups extant in the country.

The conflict at the beginning was mostly between the House of Representatives (HoR) government that was controversially elected in 2014, also known as the "Tobruk government"; and the rival General National Congress (GNC) government, also called the "National Salvation Government", based in the capital Tripoli, established after Operation Odyssey Dawn and the failed military coup.

In addition to those three factions, there are also smaller rival groups: the Islamist Shura Council of Benghazi Revolutionaries, led by Ansar al-Sharia, which has had the support of the GNC and was defeated in Benghazi in 2017; the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant's (ISIL's) Libyan provinces;the Shura Council of Mujahideen in Derna which expelled ISIL from Derna in July 2015 and was later itself defeated in Derna by the Tobruk government in 2018;as well as many militias and armed groups, whose allegiances often change.

Libyan Civil War (2014–present) - Wikipedia

Related Links

Who are the 'good' and 'bad' guys in Libya’s civil war today?
When will the chaos and civil war in Libya finally end?
What are the factions in the Second Libyan Civil War and who supports them?
Why was Libya attacked by the US?
Has Libya recovered from the civil war?
Why hasn't the Libyan Civil War ended already?
What was the actual problem in Libya?
What do you think of Libya now?
Do Libyans regret killing Muammar Gaddafi?
What are the main causes of war in Iraq, Yemen, Syria and Libya?

What was the real reason Libya’s Gaddafi was removed and killed with possible support from the United States?

During the Libyan Civil War in 2011, why the Military of Libyan Jamahiriya is weak? Why the Green Army can't crush the rebels in the early stage of Civil War?

Is there still war in Libya?
Why was Libya destroyed and plunged into further chaos?

Is Libya better off after the death of Gaddafi?

AfriStar
La fille de KADHAFI, AISHA KADHAFI :

· Suivre Publication par David-GDK ven.

« Depuis la mort de notre Papa, le Monde entier nous a tourné le dos. Ils étaient nombreux à venir voir Kadhafi, et à tout demander. Après sa mort plus personne ne s'approche de nous, ils sont tous partis, nous sommes restés seuls.

Mais Nous Nous en sortons très bien car Allah est resté à notre côté. Père nous a éduqué à surmonter toutes les difficultés. Allah est avec Nous et c'est très suffisant. »

Is Libya part of the Maghrebs?

Oreste Papadopol · Follow May 19

Politically yes as Libya is taken as a whole. Culturally and historically though, the Cyrenaica historical region is part of the Mashriq (East).

There are three maghrebs:

The Near West (maghreb al-adna) which includes historically Tripolitania (Western Libya), Tunisia, Malta and Sicily.

The Middle West (Maghreb al awsat) which is Algeria

The Far West (Maghreb al-Aqsa) which is Morocco and al-Andalus.

It's very important to me to clearly destinguish between Cyrenaica and Tripolitania as not belonging both to the Maghreb because this allows me to understand better the Libyan Civil War and in general the underlying backstory of its current events.

Salwa Halabia , Emanates from Syrian-American family Answered Jun 28, 2017

The Maghreb al-Djazirat al-Maghrib , "the peninsula of the sunset" is usually defined as Northwest coast of Africa west of Egypt consisting of Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria, and Libya.

"Before the establishment of modern nation states in the region during the mid- 20th century, Maghreb most commonly referred to a smaller area between the Atlas Mountains in the south and the Mediterranean Sea."

Today the Greater Maghreb may also include Mauritania an Western Sahara.

Le Maghreb
Maghreb - Wikipedia

Was Libya better under the rule of Gaddafi?

Lin Xieyi Keen Interest in Geopolitics Updated Aug 17, 2018

Ahmed Abdelhaq Zaydan , lived in Meknès, Morocco Answered May 1

Oh boy… Some of the answers you see on Quora. No, "Maghreb" is not a term for Arabs and Arabized Berbers although it is an Arabic geographic term.

Throughout history, various peoples have developed their own names for regions. Take "The Middle East" which implies there is a Near East and a Far East. But the Near East of who? Morocco? No. It's a term used for Europeans to refer to regions east of Europe.

Arabs, like Europeans, developed their own geographic terms.

North Africa was Maghreb which means Land of Sunset

Egypt, the Levant and Iraq were Mashrik which means Land of Sunrise

The Arabian Peninsula was Jazeera which means Island

Now there were many other terms but those three are the most basic.

So are all people in North Africa considered part of the Maghreb?

Yes. Because Maghreb is just the old Arabic name for North Africa. So instead of North Africa and North African, you would say Maghreb and Maghrebi in Arabic.

Isn't Morocco also called Maghreb though?

Yes, Morocco's name is literally "Kingdom of North Africa".

Why is Morocco's real name 'Kingdom of North Africa'?

Because our founding father, Sultan Idriss I (r. 788-791) was granted authority by the Awraba Berbers. As the Moroccan founding legend goes, the Awraba Berbers were devout Sunni Muslims and sought to unite all the Berbers of North Africa (called the Maghreb at the time) under one single Islamic State. An Islamic State ruled by an Awraba Berber elite, but an Islamic state nonetheless.

It has been 1,231 years since Idriss I's death and the Awraba Berbers as well as Idriss' family have long disappeared but their dream lives on.

Is Egypt part of the Maghreb state?
Amr Rady (□ □ □□ □ □)□Born and raised in EgypBorn and raised in Egypt
Updated Jan 18, 2020

No. Egypt is part of the Mashriq (East), not the Maghrib (West). The Greater Maghrib region consists of Mauritania, Morocco including the Western Sahara, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya.

One day. One day we'll achieve it.

Do people in the Arab World still use the old Arab terms?

Yes and no.

People have a tendency to use the language of the dominant civilization, this is why the Awraba Berbers named Idriss I the "Sultan" (an Arabic title) of "Maghreb" (an Arabic term). The Arabs had the most powerful and prosperous civilization and so the Awraba adopted Arabic terms.

In 1957, Morocco went from having a "Sultan" (Arabic term) to "King" (Western term) because the West is the dominant civilization in modern times.

Just as Morocco's royalty adopted a Western title, so did many Arabs adopt Western terms. The Saudi Royal family owns a newspaper named Al-Sharq al-Awsat which is Arabic for the Middle East. They did this because many Arabs now refer to Mashriq and Khaleej as Al-Sharq al-Awsat. However, the Western terms haven't replaced the Arabic terms fully. They're used side by side.

Saudi man reads a copy of "The Middle East"

I hope that clarifies things for you

Saudi man reads a copy of "The Middle East"

I hope that clarifies things for you

Related Links

Is Libya part of the Middle East?
Why is the Maghreb more culturally modern than other parts of the Arab world?
What countries make up Maghreb?
Do people of the Maghreb consider themselves to be "Africans"?
Why do people think that the Maghreb countries are in the Middle East?
Is Egypt considered part of the Levant or the Maghreb?
Why isn't Egypt considered a Maghreb nation? Why aren't Egyptians Berbers?

What's the difference between the Celts and the Gaels, and what's the difference between the Celtic-Irish and the Gaelic-Irish? And what are the Irish people made up of?

What would happen if North African (Maghreb) countries became one nation?
Are all people in North Africa considered Maghreb?

Is Libya part of the Middle East?

Salwa Halabia , Follows Middle Eastern affairs Answered Jun 19, 2016

No, Libya is part of North Africa, and considered part of the Arabic World, but not the Middle East, although some will expand the Middle East to show affliated countries by culture and languages.

Here is a classical map of the Middle East:

Admiral Alfred Thayer Mahan coined the term "Middle East" in 1901. However, it was popularized in 1916 by Sir Mark Sykes, a British member of Parliament, famous for the Sykes-Picot agreement.

Editorial Notebook; How the Middle East Was Invented

Map of the Arab World, including Libya (note Turkey and Iran are missing)

Quelle était l'idéologie de Kadhafi ?/What was Gaddafi's ideology?

Serge Elia Dévoreur de livresTraducteur · 30 avr.

Jean-Marie Valheur political aficionado & former journalist

De tout temps l'Europe était un continent déchiré par la guerre malgré ses grands exploits prometteurs. Mouammar El-Kadhafi maîtrisait très bien ses connaissances historiques – constatant que l'Union européenne apporta en Europe la paix et la stabilité, il voulut faire la même chose en Afrique, son propre continent.

La seule façon dont Kadhafi pouvait y parvenir, comme il le savait, était de consolider une Union africaine inspirée de son homologue européenne : un gouvernement centralisé, une unique devise africaine. De tout temps le jeu des grandes puissances coloniales consistait à diviser pour régner ; même en l'absence de ses anciens suzerains du jeu, l'Afrique est menacée d'être réduite jusqu'à devenir une simple marionette aux mains des Chinois. Kadhafi ne voulait pas de cela, il en voulait davantage. D'ordre habituel, les gouvernements étrangers ne tarissent pas d'éloge de la politique dite « de développement et d'aide », et le fait d'être des « partenaires économiques » n'est pas pour leur déplaire ; mais Kadhafi, mieux que quiconque peut-être, savait que c'était faux – chaque affaire contenait des lettres cachées, tout contrat cachait des paragraphes louches, et chaque avantage négocié dissimulait des inconvénients dont on ne parlait pas commodément…

Il paraît qu'une Afrique unie et forte fait trembler le reste du monde. Paris, Londres, Pékin, Washington… personne ne veut que s'éveille le continent africain. Alors, Kadhafi devait y aller jusqu'au bout, et c'est ce qu'il a fait. À présent, l'union africaine est redevenue une chimère, et l'Afrique est redevenue un jouet au sujet duquel les grandes puissances se chamaillent…

En 2011, la majorité du peuple libyen soutenait encore Khadafi. Il a donc résisté pendant plusieurs mois après le début des bombardements de l'OTAN. Demandons-nous aussi pourquoi le nombre de migrants libyens est si faible en Europe et en France — bien plus faible que les algériens, les tunisiens, les marocains.

La vérité est très simple : la vie en Libye était meilleure que ce que les médias occidentaux ont avancé. La Libye avait des standards de vie plus élevés que ceux des voisins du Maghreb, et avait un système social plus avancé également.

Quelle idéologie a le moins de sens pour vous ?/Which ideology makes the least sense to you?

Dimitri Ken , Apprenti polymathe Traducteur · Traduit le 13 mai

Viktor Couderé Conservative in the European sense

Le panafricanisme.

Honnêtement, je n'ai aucune idée de pourquoi les gens soutiennent le panafricanisme sans équivoque.

Voici une carte linguistique de l'Afrique :

La carte ethnique :

Cela ne prend même pas en compte les différentes tribus au sein de ces ethnies…

Voilà une carte religieuse :

C'est sans compter les différentes sectes au sein de ces religions…

Quel histoire, culture ou patrimoine commun tous ces groupes partagent-ils ? Littéralement aucun.

C'est pourquoi je pense que le panafricanisme a le moins de sens parmi à peu près toutes les idéologies qui existent, sauf peut-être celles comme le posadisme.[1] Mais ce qui rend vraiment celui-ci encore plus ridicule que les goûts du posadisme, c'est simplement sa popularité. Je ne comprends pas comment des millions de personnes peuvent réellement soutenir une idéologie qui a aussi peu de sens que le panafricanisme.

Muammar Kadhafi était-il vraiment un cruel dictateur ?

Ilkhom Mirzakirov , Production visuelle chez Act of Expression (2019-présent)
Répondu 25 nov. 2019

Il a certainement fait des choses répréhensibles par la loi et l'éthique mais de l'autre côté Kadhafi a fait énormément de bien à son peuple il y a de nombreux exemples:

Couverture santé gratuite, électricité gratuite, 50,000$ offerts aux nouveaux mariés pour trouver un logement, des prêts gratuits, les mères recevaient 5,000$ à chaque naissance, chaque citoyen recevait un pourcentage sur l'exportation de pétrole, le gaz valait 0.14$/ litre, il n'y avait pas de banque centrale détenue par un Rotschild, pas de frais concernant l'éducation.

Les exemples sont nombreux et la liste du dessus est loin d'être exhaustive, prenez le temps de vous informer à ce sujet vous serez surpris du décalage entre le portrait esquissé en occident du dictateur libyen et la réalité des faits.

Notes de bas de page

[1] Fourth International Posadist - Wikipedia

Questions similaires

Pourquoi l'Algerie s'immisce dans l'affaire du Sahara Occidental ?
Comment Mouammar Kadhafi a-t-il gouverné pendant 50 ans ?
Quelle idéologie a le moins de sens pour vous ?

Vivons-nous à une époque où nous sommes programmés pour suivre des idéologies politiques, ou est-ce notre propre idéologie que nous voulons imposer aux autres ?

Quelle est l'idéologie soutenue par l'Oulipo ?

La situation du Mali est-elle l'échec du Mali ou de la France ?
Pourquoi Vladimir Poutine était à l'enterrement de Jacques Chirac ?

Normalement retirer ses troupes du Mali et d'Afrique devrait être un soulagement pour la France, alors pourquoi insiste-t-elle pour rester là où elle dit qu'elle ne gagne rien ?

Quelle est ou quelles sont les idéologies politiques de l'Argentine ?
Pourquoi associe-t-on sociologie et idéologie de gauche ?

Response similaires
Quelle découverte surprenante sur une personne célèbre a complètement changé votre façon de la voir ?

Hamid Sam Souvent conseillerTraducteur · 1 an

Chukwuebuka Sunday MBBS de University of Nigeria, Nsukka (Diplôme obtenu en 2019)

What surprising discovery about a famous person completely changed the way you saw them?

Colonel Muammar Kadhafi

Il avait été traité de tyran, de dictateur, de terroriste et d'autres noms terribles.

Il était ce leader africain populaire et controversé qui a été tué dans un canal de drainage en 2011.

Le colonel Kadhafi a dirigé le pays libyen pendant quatre décennies.

Il a peut-être été un terrible leader, mais certains articles sur lesquels je suis tombé par hasard ont changé ma perspective sur cet homme. Sous son règne:

Le PIB par habitant de la Libye en 2010 était de 12064,8 USD. Il était de 7529 USD en 2018.

La mère qui allaite a reçu 5000 (dollars américains) pour elle-même et l'enfant.

Il n'y avait pas de factures d'électricité car c'était totalement gratuit.

Une maison, des terres agricoles, du bétail et des semences ont été donnés gratuitement à ceux qui voulaient se lancer dans l'agriculture.

L'éducation et les soins médicaux étaient absolument gratuits.

De généreuses subventions ont été accordées pour les mariages, le logement et l'achat de voitures. Maintenant, les Libyens doivent payer le prix fort pour tout.

Il a construit le plus grand système d'irrigation au monde reconnu comme «la huitième merveille du monde» dont le but était de fournir de l'eau à tous les Libyens à travers le pays.

Ses derniers mots à ses assassins furent "Qu'est-ce que je t'ai fait?"

Était-il vraiment un chef terrible ou les gens étaient-ils fatigués de lui?

Suivez moi pour plus de contenus inédits: Hamid Sam

More answers from Chukwuebuka Sunday View more

What are some interesting facts about tigers?
Who is the most intelligent criminal in history? Why?
What are some jobs you just cannot do?
Who were the most incompetent dictators of all time?
What are some of the most notable robberies in history?

In other languages
In French
Quelle découverte surprenante sur une personne célèbre a complètement changé votre façon de la voir ?

In Japanese
ある有名人についてのどんな驚くべき発見が、その人を見る眼を完全に変えてしまいましたか？

In Indonesian
Penemuan mengejutkan apa tentang seseorang yang terkenal yang benar-benar mengubah cara kamu melihatnya?

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location
Libya is a country in the Arab Maghreb region of North Africa at the Mediterranean coast of Africa
.
Official title of the state
The Republic of Libya

Flag description:

The pre-September 1969 Royal Libyan flag reintroduced;- Three horizontal bands of Red (top), Black (double width), and Green with a White-crescent and Star centered on the Black stripe; National Transitional Council reintroduced this flag design of the former Kingdom of Libya (1951 to1969) on the 27th, February 2011. It replaced the former All-green banner promulgated by the Quadhafi regime in 1977. Colours represent the three major regions of the country: Red stands for Fezzan; Black symbolizes Cyrenaica; Green denotes Tripolitania; The Crescent and Star represent Islam, the main religion of the country.

Neighbours

Tunisia on N. Algeria on NW. Niger, Chad on S. Egypt on E.

Land boundaries; total 4,348 km. Border countries; Algeria 982 km, Chad 1,055 km, Egypt 1,115 km, Niger 354 km, Sudan 383 km, Tunisia 459 km.

Founder of The Nation
A constitution was enacted in 1949 and adopted in October 1951. A National Congress elected

Mohammed Idris as King of Libya, and as Idris I he proclaimed the independence of the United Kingdom of Libya as a sovereign state on 24 December 1951.

Local division

3 traditional parts of the country are Tripolitania, Fezzan and Cyrenaica
22 states, known locally as "Baladiyah",and 25 municipalities

Government type.
Until recently Jamahiriya Shaabiyat system (General Peoples Congress), now turns to 'The General National Congress'.

Legislation chamber
Unicameral Parliament – The former General Peoples Congress (GPC) turned to a 200-seats assembly 'The General National Congress' (equivalent to Parliament).

The General National Congress (GNC) formerly known as The General Peoples Congress (GPC), becomes a 200-seats assembly. 80 members drawn from competing parties, 120 individual or independent members drawn from the public, 20 independent women members voted into existence on right 7th of July, 2012. First parliamentary session held on 8th of October, 2012.

Form of State

The General National Congress; is the would be central policy-making body elected by the populace through direct election for 200 seats. According to the new Libyan constitution, national elections are direct, parliamentary system and multi-party elections were introduced in the draft-constitution.

Executive branch

Separated by Head of State & Head of Government elected for certain executive termlimits to be decided by the upcoming Libyan constitution.

Former Rulers

1932-1942: Zentani Muhammad Al-Zentani

1939-1940: Abdul Razzaq Al-Sawsa

1940: Muhammad Al-Zaruq Rajab.

1949: Abdul Ati Al-Obeidi.

1951: King Mohammed Idris Al-Senussi

1969: Captain Muammar Al-Quadhafi (Abu-Minyar)

2011: Mustapha Abdul-jalil/Mahmoud Jibril (Transitional Executives)

2012: Current Ali Zeidan

Judicial chamber

Supreme Court

Capital city Tripoli (Tarabulus-Saabiyah) Altitude 81 mtrs/266 ft.

Geographic coordinates - 32.53N , 13.10E. It derived from the Greece word Tarabulus (Tara-Bu-Lus Al-Gharb) meaning for "the three cities". It was founded in the 7th century BC by the Phoenicians, who named it first Oea.

Names of main towns

Benghazi, Tobruk, Mitsurata, Al-khooms.

Date of independence

24 Decemb er, 1951.

Religions

(Major)

Muslim 97%.

Main spoken languages

Arabic (official), Berber,
Italiano spoken. Currency unit

Libyan Dinar
(LYD)=1000 Dirhams.
Area in Km2

1,759,540,00

Country area comparison in Africa

4 out of 55 states.

Demographic

terms ;-

Average annual population growth rate 2.117 % Birth rate 24.58 births

per 1,000 population

Death rate 3.4 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 77.47 years

Male 75.18 years ; Female 79.88 years;

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 4, Female: 22

Average per capita income

USD 14, 000

Population density

3.7/km2

Urban population (%)

78

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishing: 2, Industry: 83, Social service: 15

Main Export Items

Crude oil, refined petrol product.

Economy is based on:

Petrol and Agriculture

Climate

Hot and dry with mild-winters, Mediteranean along coast: Dry, extreme desert interior. Extremes;-

Lowest point; Sabkhat Guzayyil 47 mtrs.

Highest point; Bikkubitti 2,267 mtrs.

Weather of the Capital city Tripoli (Tarabulus) average annual temperature 20.10c.

Altitude 81 mtrs/266 ft

Hottest Month August 22-30oc average daily min. & max.

Coldest Month January 8-16o c.

Driest Month July 1mm average Rf.

Wettest Month December 94mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system &Local measures also used: 1 Dramilky = 50 CM, 1 Passo =2 Dramilky, 2 Dramilky =1 mtr, 1 Kile = 36 litres, 1 Ukia = 30.05 gms, 40 Ukia = 1 Oke, 40 Oke = 1 Kantar.

Time zone
2 hours ahead of

GMT/UTC Public

holidays

1st September/revolution day/ 2 and 28 March, 11 June, All

Muslim holidays. Ethnic groups

Arab & Berber tribes; Warfalla, Beni-Walid, Tarhuna, Azzintan,

Maslata, Arrujban, others. Topographic & Environmental concern

Desert and semi-desert region 92% of the land with low mountains in N. higher mountains in S. and a narrow coastal zone. Environment: Desertification; limited natural freshwater resources; the Great Man-made River Project, the largest water development scheme in the world, brings water from large aquifers under the Sahara to coastal cities.

Economy Overview

Industry

Carpets works, textiles, leather shoes, petroleum, petro-chemicals, aluminum, iron and steel production, food-processing, handicrafts, cement.

Chief crops

Citrus, date-olives, grapes, other fruits, vegetables, grains, tobacco, peanuts, soybeans : cattle.

Natural resources

Petroleum, Natural-Gas, Gypsum.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 2

Grassland: 8

Forest woods: 0

Other: 91 (Note: more than 90 % of Libya is desert or semi-desert).

Marine

Coastline; 1,770 km.

Commercial Sea ports:-

Tripoli (Tarabulus), Benghazi, Mitsurata (Misrata)

Development prospect;-

The newly elected Libyan government's priority will be to speed up the rebuilding of the oil sector and to establish new systems of transparency and accountability. The government is to post a comprehensive list of government assets and contracts on the internet.

Post-internal conflict reconstruction costs will run into the tens of billions. UBI-France estimated that the electricity sector alone will need over $12bn. And cities such as Benghazi and Misrata are lobbying for more investment because they suffered decades of neglect under Quadhafi.

Top 24 Richest And Poorest Countries Of Africa – 2020 Edition

By Stephanie Rheingold Last updated Oct 23, 2021

Libya

Credit: Hussein Malla, AP

Libya is one of the smallest countries in Africa, with a population of only 6.87 million people. It holds a GDP figure of $44.96 billion, which might not sound like a lot, but it places Libya as the 6th richest country in Africa, in terms of GDP per capita with a figure of $6835.62.

> Just like many Africa countries, most of Libya economic growth comes from oil. It accounts for over half of its GDP, and about 97% of its exports. Due to those figures, Libya has been described as the “Upper Middle Economy of Africa” by > the World Bank.

> It is hard to look into the future for Libya right now with so many moving parts in the country. From political instability to major security threats, there are definite challenges the country must face head-on during 2020 and 2021.

Was the overthrow of Gaddafi a terrible mistake of NATO?

Sylvain Saurel

Apr 15

NATO does not see it that way.

It is important to understand why France ended its support for Gaddafi and whether he was liquidated in Libya.

Before his fall, Muammar Gaddafi had just been elected head of the African Union by his peers. With the confidence of Africa and as the head of the country with the largest oil reserves in Africa, Gaddafi set out to create a new pan-African and pan-Arab currency: the famous gold dinar project.

This currency was to become the main means of payment for Africa's natural resources and free Africa from the CFA franc (Franc of the French Colonies in Africa). 700 billion dollars would then have disappeared from the Western monetary system. It always comes down to the color of the bills in which the raw materials are sold.

This was unacceptable to America, which then intrigued with help of France and the United Kingdom to bring down Gaddafi.

All US wars are therefore aimed at protecting the petrodollar.

If you look closely, all wars waged by America are aimed at protecting its domination of the world at all costs. In the case of Gaddafi, France, and the UK also had interests.

Putin was deeply affected by seeing how cruel the West could be to former allies. For him, it was the worst shame, because it is his greatest fear to end up like Gaddafi humiliated in the streets of Moscow by his population. Humiliated, tortured, and killed.

This is the reason why Putin also supported Bashar El-Assad in Syria at all costs later on. There were also the strategic interests of Russia in Syria, but also the will to show that Russia never abandons its allies. And this, unlike the West.

What happened with Gaddafi convinced Putin that it was impossible to trust the West.

Related Answer
Was the overthrow of Gaddafi a terrible mistake of NATO?

Alexander Finnegan

.

Follow J.D. Law, Marxist-LeninistApr 18

"Mistake"?

Was the carpet bombing, systematic destruction, napalming, and chemical poisoning of the impoverished, Asian nation, Vietnam, for 14+ years a "mistake?"

Was the 2003 invasion of Iraq based on lies about "WMD's and the literally Hitler, Saddam Hussein," a mistake?

You accidentally forget to brush your teeth. That is a mistake.

When military situations are planned and governments are intentionally destroyed, that is never a "mistake." That is an act of war. It is premeditated. It is done with the full knowledge and malice aforethought.

Gaddafi had an agreement with the U.S. that he would abandon his WMD programs in exchange for security. He was directly betrayed by NATO, under Obama's consent. A U.S. drone located his convoy. NATO did a strike against it. Gaddafi was then captured by French backed rebels, who proceeded to brutally sodomized and murder him, publicly. Then Libya, once the most prosperous nation in Africa, collapsed, becoming a failed state. There are public slave markets there. For $400 you can buy a slave. Killing a leader and causing a power vacuum that harms millions of people is very dangerous for regional and world stability. It is totally reckless.

The U.S. does this all the time. And saying "Alexander Finnegan just hates the West, he acts like Russia never does anything wrong" is a red herring. What I think doesn't change what NATO, Obama, and the West have done. And NATO is my source. They say what they did. Sarkozy is a war criminal. So is Obama.

If you focus on the messenger and not the message, you become a tool of propaganda.

Alexander Finnegan's answer to Why is Vladimir Putin afraid that the Western sphere of influence is increasingly close to Russia's borders?

Alexander Finnegan's answer to What does Alexander Finnegan think of the Vietnam War?

Related Links

What makes Libya worse now than before when Gaddafi was in power?

Was the late Colonel Muammar Gaddafi a good or a bad person?

Why do so many people believe that Gaddafi did good for Libya?

Is Libya better off after the death of Gaddafi?

Why do some Africans celebrate, and see Gaddafi as a good man? That man was a tyrant and dictator, who refused to leave power. Shouldn't Africa be thanking the West for helping remove one of their dictators?

Why did the US attack Libya and overthrow Gaddafi, who was an anti-terror ally?

Where was Gaddafi's female guard during his final days? Why didn't his soldiers protect him?

What are the key differences between Saddam Hussein and Muammar Gaddafi?

Did the killers of Muammar Gaddafi stick an AK-47 up his butt?

Why was Muammar Gaddafi hated?

Why was Muammar Gaddafi so loved in Sub-Saharan Africa but so hated in North Africa and the Middle East?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam

.
Follow
Nigerian3y

He was loved by revolutionaries, probably. Definitely not the establishment.

He was not loved in Chad which he invaded twice. Nor in Morocco for supporting the POLISARIO. The Egyptians thought him a terrorist. He sponsored actual Charles Taylor and Foday Sankoh in Liberia and Sierra Leone, respectively. He created an "Islamic Legion" of disaffected Sahelian migrants who mutated into everything from the Janjaweed to Islamic State members. He supported Bokassa, Idi Amin and Mengistu; the revolutionaries that overthrew them obviously had dry eyes when he was killed.

It is one thing to tyrannise your own people but the man also sought to spread chaos to his neighbours. Not a plan exactly calibrated to endear affection.

That and the whole United States of Africa idea which gets him internet love; it clearly had one leader in mind. Guess who?

Why was Gaddafi so loved in Sub-Saharan Africa but so hated in North Africa and the Middle East?

Totti Bossi

.
Follow
Former Foreign Trade & Business Development (1992–2009)Upvoted by

Arhin Shadrack

, BA History & Political Science, Kwame Nkrumah University of Science and Technology (2022) and

Petri Ruohomäki

, MA History & Social Sciences, University of Turku (2014)1y

What makes Libya worse now than before when Gaddafi was in power?

An interesting question…

I did not have the chance to see Libya, but I had friends who were and worked there in the 80s. They, as foreigners, were happy with their salaries and did not complain.

According to some Libyans - Qaddafi was a dictator and bad guy, according to others – he was a good one…

What I know is that Libya was the most literate and most richest country in Africa. And the world's largest irrigation project was there. As far as I know it's even in the Guinness World Records book. And all this was done while that guy was in power.

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Great_Man-Made_River

Why do some Africans celebrate, and see Gaddafi as a good man? That man was a tyrant and dictator, who refused to leave power. Shouldn't Africa be thanking the West for helping remove one of their dictators?

Boris Ezomo

.

Follow Africa is hot but I love it here.Updated 4y

Warning graphic image.

Gaddafi had to die because he endangered the western economy and influence. That's it. Not because he was a dictator.

This is Gaddafi just before the African Union summit of 2009

This is Gaddafi after the 2009 AU summit.

So what just happened at the AU summit of 2009 that would kill him?

Gaddafi was into Pan Africanism. As he became the president of the AU that year. He advocated that Africa is poor as it is without having to give rich westerners the little we have. That we should STOP TRADING WITH THE DOLLAR. That he had started creating an Pan African hard currency called the “Golden dinar” backed by gold reserves. Advised rest of Africa to sign up and start trading amongst themselves with it.

Bingo he is dead.

We all knew that was the reason he was murdered by the West. Thanks to Hillary and her constant blunder with e-mails, it is confirmed Hillary Emails Reveal True Motive for Libya Intervention | Foreign Policy Journal

So the west was murdering Gaddafi for their own benefit, using useful Libyan idiots that were willing to destroy their country for their own agenda.

Was Gaddafi a dictator? Yes. So? Like Gaddafi before the summit, majority of today's dictators are good friends of the West. Every King , Queen, Emir or Sultan comes from a long line of dictators, that even if they do not control political power, still hold onto its wealth.

Was he a benevolent dictator? He was. Did more for his country than anyone else in Africa. Probably among the best in the world.

I will list what he did for Libya.

1. There is no electricity bill in Libya; electricity is free for all its citizens.
2. There is no interest on loans, banks in Libya are state-owned and loans given to all its citizens at zero percent interest by law.
3. Having a home is considered a human right in Libya.
4. All newlyweds in Libya receive $60,000 dinar (U.S.$50,000) by the government to buy their first apartment so to help start up the family.
5. Education and medical treatments are free in Libya. Before Gaddafi only 25 percent of Libyans were literate. Today, the figure is 83 percent.
6. Should Libyans want to take up farming career, they would receive farming land, a farming house, equipments, seeds and livestock to kickstart their farms all for free.
7. If Libyans cannot find the education or medical facilities they need, the government funds them to go abroad, for it is not only paid for, but they get a U.S.$2,300/month for accommodation and car allowance.
8. If a Libyan buys a car, the government subsidizes 50 percent of the price.
9. The price of petrol in Libya is $0.14 per liter.
10. Libya has no external debt and its reserves amounting to $150 billion are now frozen globally.
11. If a Libyan is unable to get employment after graduation the state would pay the average salary of the profession, as if he or she is employed, until employment is found.
12. A portion of every Libyan oil sale is credited directly to the bank accounts of all Libyan citizens.
13. A mother who gives birth to a child receives U.S.$5,000.
14. 40 loaves of bread in Libya cost $0.15.
15. 25 percent of Libyans have a university degree.
16. Gaddafi carried out the world's largest irrigation project, known as the Great Manmade River project, to make water readily available throughout the desert country.

Does your country do that for you?

The African Union begged the West to leave Libya alone. As usual we were treated like little children that do not know what is good for them.

Not only were we sure of what will happen to Libya. We knew it will spread.

Niger, Chad and Nigeria got a taste of it. Here is something that you will not hear in the MSM. Terrorists groups in the region hated Gaddafi. When war started, they all headed there. No surprise that After the war, Boko Haram seemed to be better armed than the Nigerian army. Bet they came from Libyan military stockpiles.

On a personal note, when I was a student in Bulgaria in the 80s. All foreign students just like the locals, had to take political subjects as a compulsory course. With exception of Libyans. When Gaddafi heard about this course, he told the Bulgarian ambassador that if they make his citizens study communist subjects, he will make Bulgarians working in Libya study his green book.

Actually most Africans see what happened to Libya as a tragedy. Even Libyans that wanted a change. Or Africans that view democracy from a western prospective.

Sitting in the doctors mess in a Liverpool hospital in the UK, a Libyan friend told me:

“ I was p—-ed with you Africans trying to tell us what is good for Libya. Now I see what you meant. I still cannot locate several family members, and see no future.”

EDIT: I had been repeatedly asked the same question. If he had done all this for his people. Why did so many fight against him.

For one, he was winning so therefore had a very large support of his people. They along with him were bombed by the West out of existence . Why not ask why he was winning before West arrived and started the role of Rebel Airforce? A army with air supremacy no matter how small will always win.

Two, many were not happy for his secular stance. A common problem in Muslim countries. That is why soon after fall of secular governments as in Iraq or to a degree Syria or Chechnya , sharia law pops up. As evident by the fundamentalist factions running around.

Three. If you arm protesters, the protest will spread. If you drop weapons to “black lives matter” protests in the USA. There will be a blood bath that will spread. The rebels were armed and trained by the West.

Four. Everyone wants to be boss. Common problem in Africa . They will always find support among their own people. This is evident by the several “governments” there are in Libya now. Also by the fact that Gaddafis tribal area was last to fall.

Take Nigeria as a example. It is a democracy. Yet one person sparked a movement for a new Biafra, that ended up with a military action in the Ibo east. Killing a lot of youths. Happened just last year. Imagine a superpower power dropping weapons to the Ibo youths and bombing the Nigerian army. Even if every Ibo supported this. The Nigerian government will still fall to the less than a quater of the population of Nigeria .

In Summary. It is a false premise that if there is a civil war, that the faction with more support will win.

Related Answer
Why do some Africans celebrate, and see Gaddafi as a good man?

Lise Brouillette

.

Follow

3/4 degree in Political Science (Strategic Studies), HUGE media file on 9/114y

1. Khadaffi welcomed all Africans or Muslims into Libya to work, without a visa. And there was plenty of work. Well-paid work.
2. Khadaffi made such generous donations to poorer African countries, and supported so many programs, he was like Santa Claus to black Africa.

3. Khadaffi, with his “green revolution”, installed an underground irrigation system that was the envy and admiration of all third-world countries in the world. He literally turned a desert into a garden.
4. Libya had the highest per capita income of all Africa, the highest percentage of literacy, the highest level of education in the world. AND one of the highest standards of living on the planet - owning a house was considered a right. Do YOU know any Libyans refugees? I don’t. And boy, does Canada have a lot of refugees.

Of COURSE Khadaffi was a dictator. You can’t be anything else in that part of the world, with every tribal leader and little war lord thinking he should be king instead of you. Only brute strength is respected, and if you don’t rule with an iron fist, you’re considered weak and will be toppled in a New York minute.

You think whoever the US installed in his place was democratic? You think the Saudi prince and the King of Jordan (both US-supported) are democratic? HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA HA, come on, là. You want me to give you a list of horrible dictators the US of A supported because it was convenient? Pul-leeze.

Now, for the reason Khadaffi was really killed…

1. He was a nasty, evil, despicable socialist. And worse yet, the most unforgiveable sin of all*:* he made it work. He didn’t need a Berlin Wall to keep people in, on the contrary, people were fighting to get there to work, and daring to cross one of the worst deserts on the planet to make their way there. And he wasn’t greedy: Libya’s wealth really WAS shared with all its citizens, which made Libyans some of the richest on the planet. THAT’s why there were no Libyan refugees or immigrants: they had no reason whatoever to leave.

But The US has such a visceral hatred of socialism that they were willing to team up with Al Qaeda in order to remove him. And that’s exactly what they did. When Khadaffi went to the UN Security council to complain that he was fighting Al Qaeda on the ground, and was laughed at, you know what? He was telling the truth. And guess what, the Al Qaeda main operative that was on the ground in Libya is now in Syria. What a surprise.

2. He was a Pan-African - aNOther thing that would make him seen as a good man. One of his projects was an African union, much like the European Union, and a united currency for all of Africa. A huge threat for the end of exploitation of African countries by the West - ever so democratic.

People like you keep forgetting that Khadaffi may have been a “dictator”, but he was elected. Gaddafi's Libya was Africa's Most Prosperous Democracy | Foreign Policy Journal

The US of A does NOT have the God-given right to remove elected leaders as they see fit, just because they don’t like them. So, for you to state that he “refused to leave power” as if this constituted a crime against humanity, Muammar Khadaffi was IN NO WAY OBLIGATED TO “LEAVE” JUST BECAUSE THE USA WANTED HIM TO. (The greatest democracy in the world, YESSIR!) The USA, much as they like to think they are, are not the masters of the universe.

And BTW… this terrorist episode, where Khadaffi financed the downing of Pam Am Flight 103…? That was in response to Americans bombing his compound and killing his daughter.

While this was NOT an appropriate answer, if Khadaffi is guilty of terrorism, then so is the USA. And they started it.

Khadaffi made reparation to the victim survivors. While this does not bring back the dead, that sure is better than what the US did in reparation for Khadaffi's daughter's death and the other victims - ZERO.

Does that answer your question? (I doubt it will change your mind…)

I don't expect I'll get a lot of votes on this… people only see what they want to see, and Khadaffi has been so demonised… But intellectually honest and curious people might want to check the following links:

https://www.globalresearch.ca/libya-ten-things-about-gaddafi-they-dont-want-you-to-know/5414289

The Green Book (Muammar Gaddafi) - Wikipedia

New Evidence: The Real Reason Gaddafi Was Killed | The African Exponent

And there is plenty more out there, for people who truly want to know.

Related Links

Is Libya better off after the death of Gaddafi?

Was the late Colonel Muammar Gaddafi a good or a bad person?

Was Libya better under the rule of Gaddafi?

What was the real reason Libya's Gaddafi was removed and killed with possible support from the United States?

Muammar Al-Qaddafi was a dictator, which means he was cruel and would kill without hesitation, but he worked and developed Libya too. How do you perceive him? What were his pros and cons?

What crimes did Muammar Gaddafi actually commit?

Why was Gaddafi/Qaddafi branded a tyrant?

What made Gaddafi a great leader of Libya?

Why did the US attack Libya and overthrow Gaddafi, who was an anti-terror ally?

Why was Muammar Gaddafi hated?

Benghazi before Benghazi now

I found an interesting video on YouTube concerning how Libya was during Qaddafi and after.

It's in Russian so I tried to translate some interesting data from it, as far as I can.

During Gaddafi time :

Living wage – 730 USD

Nurse salary – 1000 USD

New married were given gift for buying a home – 64000 USD

Gift for entrepreneur – 20000 USD

Education and healthcare were – FREE

Study and internship abroad – FREE (fully paid by state)

Chain of stores for large families were made – with symbolic product prices

For making/producing fake medicaments/pills – Capital punishment

Home rent – there were no such…

Electricity – FREE for everyone

Sales and consumption of Alcohol was – Prohibited

Mortgage and car credits were – without interest rate

Real estate services were – prohibited

Gasoline price per liter – 0.14 USD

Related Links

Why is North Africa more developed than sub-Saharan Africa (except South Africa), and why is South Africa more developed than the rest of the continent?

North Africa is much richer than Sub-Saharan Africa. Why is that?

Why didn't the Arabs colonize sub Saharan Africa?

Why is North Africa separated from the rest of Africa?

Why is North Africa much more developed than sub-Saharan Africa?

How developed is North Africa compared to Sub-Saharan Africa?

Why was Muammar Gaddafi hated?

How did Muammar Gaddafi rule for 50 years?

How was Muammar Gaddafi in real life?

How was Muammar Gaddafi viewed by the people of Libya?

We can build the United States of Africa, Gaddafi says.

Yussif Issah Oyen

OTC Drugs Seller at Pharmaceuticals (2013–present)May 28

Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi addresses the media as he leaves the venue of the African Union (AU) Summit in Uganda's capital Kampala July 27, 2010. REUTERS/Xavier Toya

KAMPALA (Reuters) - Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi said on Tuesday his dream of a United States of Africa was still alive and this week's African Union summit was another step toward that objective.

Gaddafi has been pushing for an African unity government for years, saying it is the only way Africa can develop without Western interference, but many African states say the idea is impractical and would encroach on their sovereignty.

Like previous African summits, this week's gathering in the Ugandan capital Kampala discussed steps toward creating an African government, but the issue was overshadowed by chaos in Somalia and an international arrest warrant for Sudan's president.

Libya under Muammar Gaddafi

Yussif Issah Oyen

OTC Drugs Seller at Pharmaceuticals (2013–present)May 28

After coming to power, the RCC government initiated a process of directing funds toward providing education, health care and housing for all. Public education in the country became free and primary education compulsory for both sexes.

Medical care became available to the public at no cost, but providing housing for all was a task the RCC government was unable to complete.Under Gaddafi, per capita income in the country rose to more than US$11,000, the 5th highest in Africa.The increase in prosperity was accompanied by a controversial foreign policy, and there was increased domestic political repression.

During the 1980s and 1990s, Gaddafi, in alliance with the Eastern Bloc and Fidel Castro's Cuba, openly supported rebel movements like Nelson Mandela's African National Congress, Yasser Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organization, the Provisional Irish Republican Army and the Polisario Front (Western Sahara). Gaddafi's government was either known to be or suspected of participating in or aiding attacks by these and other proxy forces. Additionally, Gaddafi undertook several invasions of neighboring states in Africa, notably Chad in the 1970s and 1980s. All of his actions led to a deterioration of Libya's foreign relations with several countries, mostly Western states,and culminated in the 1986 United States bombing of Libya. Gaddafi defended his government's actions by citing the need to support anti-imperialist and anti-colonial movements around the world. Notably, Gaddafi supported anti-Zionist, pan-Arab, pan-Africanist and Arab and black civil rights movements. Gaddafi's behavior, often erratic, led some outsiders to conclude that he was not mentally sound, a claim disputed by the Libyan authorities and other observers close to Gaddafi. Despite receiving extensive aid and technical assistance from the Soviet Union and its allies, Gaddafi retained close ties to pro-American governments in Western Europe, largely by courting Western oil companies with promises of access to lucrative Libyan energy sectors. After the 9/11 attacks, strained relations between Libya and the West were mostly normalised, and sanctions against the country relaxed, in exchange for nuclear disarmament.

In early 2011, a civil war broke out in the context of the wider "Arab Spring". The rebel anti-Gaddafi forces formed a committee named the National Transitional Council on 27 February 2011. It was meant to act as an interim authority in the rebel-controlled areas. After killings by government forces in addition to those by the rebel forces,a multinational coalition led by NATO forces intervened on 21 March 2011 in support of the rebels.The International Criminal Court issued an arrest warrant against Gaddafi and his entourage on 27 June 2011. Gaddafi's government was overthrown in the wake of the fall of Tripoli to the rebel forces on 20 August 2011, although pockets of resistance held by forces in support of Gaddafi's government held out for another two months, especially in Gaddafi's hometown of Sirte, which he declared the new capital of Libya on 1 September 2011.The fall of the last remaining sites in Sirte under pro-Gaddafi control on 20 October 2011, followed by the subsequent killing of Gaddafi, marked the end of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

The name of Libya was changed several times during Gaddafi's tenure as leader. From 1969 to 1977, the name was the Libyan Arab Republic. In 1977, the name was changed to Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.Jamahiriya was a term coined by Gaddafi,usually translated as "state of the masses". The country was renamed again in 1986 as the Great Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, after the 1986 United States bombing of Libya.
sources: Reuters

Why do so many people believe that Gaddafi did good for Libya?

Gheorgei Uzun

Gagauz MoldovanUpdated Wed

Quite possibly because he did.

A family friend of mine from Moldova named Aleksandyr worked in Misrata & Tripoli for 7 years. He continues to insist to this day that Libya is a better country. Free electricity, affordable housing, insanely cheap gas, & free education. Libya received hundreds of thousands of expats, it was once the wealthiest state in Africa.

The way that Gaddafi transformed Libya from a largely rural & poor Kingdom into an urbanized & modern state in a matter of a few decades is remarkable. And still, his own countrymen betrayed him and killed him. Now Libya is a 3rd world nightmare where those who can afford it go to Algeria, Tunisia, Egypt or Italy.

The Western media ironically never showed the Libyans who came out in the streets to support Gaddafi during the “revolution”. Aleksandyr was there in Misrata in 2011, tens of thousands of people came out of their own will to support him.

Related Links

What was it like to live under the Gaddafi regime?

Are there any Libyans here? I would like to ask whether electricity was really free in Gaddafi's regime?

What makes Libya worse now than before when Gaddafi was in power?

Was Libya better under the rule of Gaddafi?

Why do some Africans celebrate, and see Gaddafi as a good man? That man was a tyrant and dictator, who refused to leave power. Shouldn't Africa be thanking the West for helping remove one of their dictators?

Do Libyans regret killing Muammar Gaddafi?

What crimes did Muammar Gaddafi actually commit?

What was Gaddafi's ideology?

How was life in Libya before Gaddafi was overthrown?

Do Libyans regret overthrowing Gaddafi?

Who else would stand with AFRICANS FOR AFRICANS: 16 real Reasons why Muammar Gadafi was killed:

Trends today's Posted by

Salka

1. Libya has no electricity bill, electricity comes free of charge to all citizens.

2. There were no interest rates on loans, the banks were state-owned, the lan of citizens by law 0%.

3. Kadafi promised not to buy a house for his parents until everyone in Libya owns a home.

4. All newlywed couples in Libya received 60,000 dinars from the government & because of that they bought their own apartments & started their families.

5. Education & medical treatment in Libya are free. Before Gaddafi there were only 25% readers, 83% during his reign

6. If Libyans wanted to live on a farm, they received free household appliances, seeds and livestock.

7. If they cannot receive treatment in Libya, the state would fund them $2300+ accommodation & travel for treatment abroad.

8. If you buy a car, the government finances 50% of the price.

9. The price of gasoline became $ 0.14 per liter.

10. Libya had no external debt, and reserves were $150 Billion (now frozen worldwide)

11. Since some Libyans can't find jobs after school, the government will pay the average salary when they can't find a job.

12. Part of oil sales in Libya are directly linked to the bank accounts of all citizens.

13. The mother who gave birth to the child will receive $5000

14. 40 loaves of bread cost $0.15.

15. 25% of Libyans had all Ilisna diplomas.

16. Kadafi has implemented the world's biggest irrigation project known as the "BIG MAN PROJECT" to ensure water availability in the desert.

If this is called “DICTATORSHIP” I wonder what democracy is?

~ Exposing Truth

MADAGASCAR/MALAGASY

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries update, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

Madagascar is the world's fourth largest island.

The people of Madagascar are of mixed African and Malay-Indonesian ancestry migrated to Madagascar at about 700 AD. Although Madagascar is geographically close to mainland Africa, its history and culture are distinct. The first settlers are believed to have arrived from the area of Indonesia in about the 5th century. The forebears of the present population were from South-East Asia and from East Africa in equal measure, with the Asian element predominant in the highlands, and the African (and Arab) element predominant in the coastal areas. While people and culture represent a unique blend, the nearest relation to the Malagasy language, which bears few African traces, is today spoken only in southern Borneo. In contrast to most African countries where linguistic diversity is the rule, Madagascar has a single common language. A strong independent Merina monarchy was dominant through out the eighteenth century on the central plateaus before it became a French colony in 1896. It conquered the whole island in the 19th century, with British help, developed links with the British royal family and concluded an anti -slaving treaty with Britain. Protestantism brought by the London Missionary Society (LMS) was adopted as the official religion. The LMS created a written language and, together with French and other missionaries, developed the educational system and introduced industrialisation. The last Queen, Ranavalona III, was exiled in 1895 when France imposed protectorate status.

In 1942, British and Commonwealth forces ousted the Vichy French. Following the return to French control at the end of World War II, there was a serious uprising against French colonialism in 1947 in which 15-20,000 Malagasy were killed and many more died of starvation in the eastern forests.

Became a French overseas territory in 1956, and a semi - Autonomous republic in 1958, with Mr. Philbert Tsiranana it's first native prime minister until May, 1959, he then formed the latterly Social Democratic Party (PSD), a moderate party, which supported semi-Autonomy for Madagascar from France, when it was decided that Madagascar would receive full independence from France, he candidated for president earlier in May, 1959, to become Madagascar's first head of state at independence in June, 1960.

In 26th June, 1960 Madagascar officially achieved it's independence. Its recent history has been marked by coups in spite of a theoretically democratic constitution; Madagascar has never had a constitutional change of government. Moving from a socialist regime through to a parliamentary structure, Madagascar now has a Presidential system concentrating power in "strongman" leaders.

Headship since independence; Head of State

Madagascar is known for it's rare wildlife and eco-tourism, and home to many species of flora and fauna that exist nowhere else in the World.

In March 2009 Ravalomanana was overthrown by a coup d'état, backed by mutinous elements from the military. The coup leader, Andry Rajoelina (former Mayor of Antananarivo), formed an interim self-declared transitional government, the High Transitional Authority (HAT, after its French acronym). Ravalomanana now lives in exile in South Africa.

Origins of name - Uncertain; It is speculated that Marco Polo may have named it as "Madeigascar" after the Arab name for Mogadishou, "Mogadiscio".

An Island republic in the Indian ocean off-southeast coast of Africa.

The fourth largest island in the world. Formerly it was an independent kingdom, and later to be known as the Malagassy republic. The people of Madagascar are of mixed African and Malay-Indonesian ancestry migrated to Madagascar at about 700 AD. The Merina native kingdom was dominant through out the eighteenth century, and in 1868 signed a treaty granting France to control over the north western territorial coast. It was made a French protectorate fully in 1896, became a French overseas territory in 1956, and a semi- Autonomous republic in 1958, with Mr. Philbert Tsiranana it's first native prime minister until May, 1959, he then to form the latterly Social Democratic Party (PSD), a moderate party, which supported semi-Autonomy for Madagascar from France, when it was decided that Madagascar would receive full independence from France, he candidated for president earlier in May, 1959, to become Madagascar's first head of state in June, 1960.

Madagascar is known for it's rare wildlife and eco-tourism, rainforests of Madagascar, which lie within six national parks in the east of the island state, were put on the least because of the threat to the many unique species inhabiting them, especially primates and lemurs. In early, 1972, the government of Mr. Philbert Tsiranana was confronted with student protesters and face with the many economic problems at the time, ethnic & social class tensions when so much unrest was created, he was forced to resign as president and handed over power to the ex-premier Gabriel Ramanantsoa, who then came to head the nation amidst massive political protests, the ex-president Philbert Tsiranana gave up and stayed out of politics until his death of sickness on the 16th of April, 1978, at age sixty five. The Government under Mr. Gabriel Ramanantsoa was nearly to collapse in a serious of public protests in December, 1974, on February, 1975, ex-Naval senior officer, called Didier Ratsiraka nicknamed, the "Red Admiral" was made head of state, as chairman of the came up ruling "Supreme Revolutionary Council", by the Military leadership on the 15th of June, 1975, he began to set up a socialist system, which was approved in a referendum held on the 21st of May, 1975, establishing the second republic, Mr. Didier Ratsiraka was also elected president for a seven-year term in this referendum, which he received 95% of voters backing. In the midst of political unrest, the president has began to reform some of his socialist policies after a few years on power and he started implementing reforms when an outside pressures mounted he was reelected as president with 80% of the vote in 1982 and with 63% of the vote in 1989, when the latter election was marred by fraud which the opposition protested and many were killed in the resulting violence, he stayed on power until faced intense opposition to his rule in 1991 , on the 10th of August, 1991, about half a million people marched in front of the presidential palace, the presidential bodyguard attacked demonstrators with gunfire and hand grenades but the incident came onto severely undermine his already precarious political position. On the 31st of October, 1991, he signed the Panorama convention, establishing a transitional government and stripping him of most of his political power, although he remained president, the opposition leader, Professor Albert Zafy became head of the newly established High Authority of the State. During 1992-93, free elections were held ending 17 years of one party rule, Mr. Didier Ratsiraka who has been stayed in office, ran in the multi - party presidential elections of November, 1992 placing second behind Mr. Albert Zafy in the first round, in the second round, held in February, 1993, Didier Ratsiraka lost to Zafy, taking about one-third of the vote and left office on the 27th of March, 1993, Mr. Albert Zafy to impeach in 1996, and Mr. Didier Ratsiraka, who had been in exile in France achieved a political comeback in late 1996 when he won that year's presidential elections and took office again on the 9th of February, 1997.

On the 15th of March, 1998, a constitutional referendum was held and approved by a narrow majority of Madagascarians which that resulted in a major increase in the president's powers, enabling him to disolve the national assembly and appoint the prime minister and government without the national assembly's agreement, it also provided for decentralization of power onto provinces by granting autonomy. By the year, 2001, however, Mr. Didier Ratsiraka had become widely unpopular once again, on the 26th of June, 2001, he announced that he would be a candidate for the presidential elections to be held in Decembre, of the same year, Mr. Marc Ravalomanana, a major rival took first place with 46 % when Didier Ratsiraka came second with 40 % vote, Mr. Marc Ravalomanana was sworn into office as president by his supporters on the 22nd February, 2002 and the two parallel governments were fought each other for control of the country, by the end of February, 2002 Mr. Marc Ravalomanana had control over the Capital, Antananarive, which had always been his support base, but Mr. Didier Ratsiraka largely maintained control over provinces and established himself in Toamasina, his primary support base area, however, within few months Mr. Marc Ravalomanana had gained an upper hand onto the existed power struggle that was ended up in mid-June of that year and the ex-president Didier Ratsiraka went to France, although said he would achieve a comeback, he did return to Madagascar in a couple of weeks time, but his position was continuing to weaken, on the 5th of July, 2002, he fled to the nearby islands of Seychelles, to be self - exiled in France once again. Mr. Mark Ravalomanana, a wealthy businessman & the previous Mayor of Antananarive city, who became head of Madagascar won the second term easily since he has been elected by general election in April, 2002, defeating his rival ex-president Didier Ratsiraka.

On the 6th of August, 2003, the ex-president has been accused of stealing public funds from the Central Bank of Madagascar in June, 2002, just before going into exile was sentenced to ten years of hard labour in Madagascar, because he was living in France, he had been tried in absentia, the lawyer appointed for Mr. Didier Ratsiraka by the court, accepted the verdict & the sentence passed by the court as fair and said that he would not appeal. On the 17th of March, 2009, the opposition under Mr. Andrey Rajoelina, a former Disc Jockey, puts pressure on the president, Mark Ravalomanana to stand-down, as the army backed his parallel administration, Mr. Andrey Rajoelina, then 34, comes to head the transitional government as acting president, announced that his far main political task is to rewrite Madagascar's constitution and hold a free, fair and democratic election in couple of years, then his predecessor announced a quit shortly, however, the transitional president Mr. Andry Rajoelina as well as Mr. Marc Ravalomanana, who had himself been ousted and forced into exile, former presidents, Albert Zafy and Commander Didier Ratsiraka, were in the Madagascar crisis talks held in Maputo, Mozambique, mediated by the African Union good will Ambassador, ex-president Joachim Alberto Chisano, regarding Mr. Didier Ratsiraka's amnesty issue, related to the court's sentence that prevented him from returning home, was resolved at the talks.

According to the Maputo (Mozambique) talks, rival parties reached a political agreement to hold a referendum onto constitutional reforms in August, 2010, with parliamentary and presidential polls to be held in September and November of 2010 respectively, Mr. Andry Rajoelina not to stand as candidate in the presidential elections for a fourth republic planned for later the year. Analysts believed the agreement would place Madagascar on the path to returning to a constitutional order and therefore the support of the international community, Madagascar was in constitutional disorder since March, 2009. On the 24th November, 2011 Madagascar's former president, Didier Ratsiraka, has returned to the island after nine years in exile in France. Mr. Didier Ratsiraka, who seized power as a young naval officer in 1975, ruled the Island state untill 1991 and again from 1996 to 2002. He left the country after losing disputed elections, his return comes three days after a Unity government was unveiled to try to end the political deadlock in Madagascar. In 2003, a Madagascan court had sentenced him 10 years and hard labour in absence for corruption. However, the current president, Mr. Andry Rajoelina, who seized power two years ago, has said that the 75 years old ex-president is free to return home.
Since the 2009 coup, the country has seen its economic situation deteriorate as foreign donors cut-off aid. Most of Madagascar's population lives in dire poverty. Growth was affected by an increase in food prices and higher international fuel costs, while the suspension of aid by western donors after Andry Rajoelina's coup curbed infrastructure projects. Analysts say the Island state faces uphill struggle to regain the confidence of foreign investors who had been eyeing it's deposits of oil, gold, chrome and uranium. It's tourism industry has also taken a beating from the political unrest and textile exports have suffered after the US ended preferential trade deals under it's AGOA initiative. The de-facto President Andry Rajoelina, the baby-faced former disc jockey who assumed power through a military-backed coup d'etat agains Marc Ravalomanana in 2009, had refused to allow the latter's return from exile in South Africa ahead of new polls. Efforts were made to resolve Madagascar's protracted leadership crisis moved a step forward when the Indian Ocean island's politicians collectively agreed on how to implement a plan to end their country's two year-long political stalemate by the Southern African Development Community (SADC). The agreement allows for the appointment by consensus of a prime minister on 1st November, 2011 as well as the appointment of a transitional government and parliament members on the 17th November. As it's first task, the new parliament is expected to ratify the roadmap at the end of November. Next would be the formation of a new independent electoral commission to manage elections scheduled for about a year from now. As chairman of the SADC, South African President Jacob Zuma has an oversight of the Madagascar political crisis and is assisted by the former Mozambican President Joachim Alberto Chisano as his chief mediator.

Madagascar has had a tortuous political history since it's independence from France in June, 1960. Replete with political intigue and instability, the coutry's politics was dominated by Commander Didier Ratsiraka, who governed Madagascar as president from 1975 through 2002, albeit with an interregnum in the 1990s. After the disputed poll in 2002, Didier Ratsiraka's challenger and then mayor of the capital Antananarivo, Marc Ravalomanana, took power and forced his rival into exile. Mr. Ravalomanana began many reform projects, forcefully advocating "Rapid and durable Development" and the launching of a battle against corruption. After being re-elected in 2006, Ravalomanana's government faced growing opposition, and was ousted in March, 2009 in an uprising led by Andry Rajoelina and backed by the country's military generals. Andry Rajoelina proceeded to set up a High Transitional Authority (HAT) which he led it as a transitional head of state until new elections scheduled for this had been held. However, the regional economic bloc, the SADC barred Mr. Rajoelina's transitional government forom holding any elections until it has implemented ke political reforms. The chief mediator Mr. Albert Chisano pronounced that conditions for free and fair elections in Madagascar did not exist. He also called the United Nations to supervise future polls in the country.

Mr. Andry Rajoelina, has over the past two years invested much effort in trying to ber the return of his nemesis to the country. In August, 2010 the Johannesburg based Marc Ravalomanana was sentenced in absentia to life in prison with hard laour for ordering the killing of opposition supporters. Believed the charges were arise from the Rajoelina led protests against Marc Ravalomanana's government in March, 2009 during which the then-president's guards were opened fire against the unarmed civilian demonstrators, killing 30. Ravalomanana was charged with murder and being an accessory to murder, along with 18 other people, some of whom are also in exile. The former presdent's defence lawyers protested at the ruling, saying the court was being used by the incumbent president's administration to bar their client from returning to the country and running in future elections.

Higher Council for the Transition (CST) & The self-exiled Marc Ravalomanana’

In February, 2011, Mr. Marc Ravalomanana told a prees conference in Johannesburg, South Africa that he was returning to Madagascar for the first time since his removal from power. Political commentators said his decision was most likely provoked by the region's economic bloc, SADC's proposal at the time that Andry Rajoelina and his High Transitional Authority (HAT) should remain in power until fresh elections, thus sidelining Mr. Marc Ravalomanana from the transitional process. Expectations were that Mr. Andry Rajoelina would most likely refuse Ravalomanana's plane permission to land if he did fly back to Madagascar. As anticipated, Marc Ravalomanana was barred from boarding by the airline he was to fly back with as the HAT had informed it of its intentions. In September, 2011 Marc Ravalomanana once again stated his intention to travel back to Madagascar, but the move was immediately met with widespread media reports suggesting that Andry Rajoelina had officially asked the South African government to arrest the former president so he could return to serve his life sentence.

Like Marc Ravalomanana before him, Andry Rajoelina was a popular mayor of the capital city when he led an anti-government march that led to Marc Ravalomanana's ousting after military generals chose to back him. He was only 34 years old then and constitutionally ineligible to hold the presidency. However, in November, 2010 the country approved it's new constitution that lowered the minimum age limit for a presidential candidate from 40 to 35, allowing the incumbent, now 37, to run. Madagascar's new consttitution also contains a clause that requires presidential candidates to have lived in the country for at least six months prior to the polls, to effectively exclude Marc Ravalomanana and other opposition leaders now living in exile from contesting. Malagasies are waiting with hope and apprehension for the outcome of the latest roadmap. Political intrigue and extra-legal assumptions of power are not alien to their country's history, but many of the island's 20 million inhabitants will certainly wish for an end to the destabilizing ambitions of their political leaders and look with a sense of envy at the culture of democratic power transfer that's fast taking root elsewhere on the African continent.

Side note: The chief army mutineer in Madagascar has been killed in a battle with loyalist troops, the military has said. A barracks was recaptured from dissident soldiers. The motives for their mutiny were unclear, an army spokesman told the BBC. Flights to and from the airport in the capital, Antananarivo, were suspended while the gun battles raged. Madagascar has been unstable since President Andry Rajoelina captured power in 2009 with military backing. His rival, Marc Ravalomanana, is exiled in South Africa. This is the second failed army mutiny on the Indian Ocean island in two years. The defence minister's chief-of-staff, General Raphael Ramasy, said the mutiny was led by Corporal Koto Mainty, who was shot dead after loyalist forces stormed the barracks near the airport in Antananarivo, Reuters news agency reports. "The situation is under control; the other mutineers gave themselves up or were arrested," he said. Two other people were also killed in the gun battle - including an officer who had earlier tried to mediate an end to the mutiny, army spokesman Colonel Philibert Ratovonirina told the BBC French service. He said the mutineers demands were unclear. "We don't know precisely what the mutineers wanted. It seems there was a statement broadcast on Free FM radio saying that there was no government left, that it had been dissolved and it was no longer in charge of running the country," Colonel Ratovonirina said. "But we don't know if that statement was really made by the mutineers. If it did come from the mutineers, it would appear this might be a coup attempt." Witnesses reported sporadic bursts of gunfire for about four hours on Sunday, and dozens of locals gathered near the base to see what was happening. Police and soldiers surrounded the area and evacuated some buildings as they quelled the mutiny. The army plays a major role in Madagascar's society, frequently meddling in politics. It backed Mr. Rajoelina's 2009 seizure of power from Mr.

Marc Ravalomanana. The two leaders are due to meet in the Seychelles capital in the latest effort to end the conflict in Madagascar. "The mutiny could have an impact on the meeting," retired general Desire Philippe Ramakavelo is quoted by Reuters as saying. "It is taking place amid turmoil." In 2002, the army had also helped Mr. Marc Ravalomanana to seize power in similar fashion when he led street protests against the previous Marxist administration of Commander Didier Ratsiraka.

Endnote: Soldiers mutiny at Madagascar army base: three people were killed and several others wounded in an apparent mutiny by soldiers at a base outside Madagascar's capital, Antananarivo, military authorities reported Sunday. Police surroundedthe base in Ivato, nearthe capital's international airport, and government officials were attempting to negotiate withthe mutineers,the country's Armed Forces Ministry said.The mutineers' demands were not immediately known. A senior military source, who was not authorized to speak onthe record, saidthe mutiny involved about 90 young soldiers. All but a handful ofthem had given up by Sunday evening, he said. An army communique saidthe ringleader was a former bodyguard to a general involved in a 2009 coup attempt. The camp housesthe army's 1st Regiment, an elite force. Shooting began around 5 a.m. (10 p.m. Saturday ET), with sporadic gunfire reported throughoutthe day. The mutiny took place ahead of Wednesday talks between ousted President Marc Ravalomanana andthe country's transitional leader, Andry Rajoelina, in Seychelles. Mr. Ravalomanana was toppled in a 2009 coup inthe Indian Ocean island nation.The country's military handed power to Rajoelina, who survived another coup attempt by renegade officers in 2010. Ravalomanana has twice attempted to returnfrom exile in South Africa, most recently in January. That attempt failed when aviation authorities in Madagascar refused permission for his aircraft to land.

Accession to President Andry Rajoelina, by election.

Tentative election calendar - Presidential, pending.

Madagascar – Timeline Diaries updates and related key notes:

1880s-1905 - France consolidates its hold over Madagascar in the face of local resistance.

1910-20 - Growth of nationalism fuelled by discontent over French rule.

1946 - Madagascar becomes an Overseas Territory of France.

1947 - French suppress armed rebellion in east. Thousands are killed.

1958 - Madagascar votes for autonomy.

June 26, 1960 - Independence with Philibert Tsiranana as president.

1972 - Amid popular unrest, Tsiranana dissolves government and hands power to army chief Gen Gabriel Ramanantsoa as head of a provisional government. He reduces the country's ties with France in favour of links with the Soviet Union.

June 1975 – Lt. Commander Didier Ratsiraka seized power as a young naval officer in 1975. Didier Ratsiraka is named head of state right after a coup. The country is renamed the Democratic Republic of Madagascar and Ratsiraka is elected president for a seven-year term. He governed Madagascar until 1991.

1976 – Didier Ratsiraka nationalises large parts of the economy, forms the Arema party. Over the years he increases state control over the economy until 1986 when he changes tack and promotes a market economy.

1992 - Under pressure of demonstrations, Ratsiraka introduces democratic reforms. A new constitution is approved by referendum.

1993 – Professor Albert Zafy elected president.

1996 – Albert Zafy impeached. Didir Ratsiraka voted back into office from 1996 to 2002. He went into exile following the disputed elections.

March 2000 - Thousands homeless after two cyclones hit the island and Mozambique.

December 2000 - Arema wins in most of the cities, apart from Antananarivo, in provincial elections. The elections are for a new system of local government. Some 70% of voters stay away after the opposition called for a boycott, saying voters had not been properly informed about the reforms.

February 2001 - An opposition parliamentary group, the Crisis Unit for the Defence of Democracy, is established following the jailing of MP Jean-Eugene Voninahitsy for insulting the president and cheque fraud.

May 2001 - Senate reopens after 29 years, completing the government framework provided for in the 1992 constitution, which replaced the socialist revolutionary system. The new framework comprises the presidency, national assembly, senate and constitutional high court.

December 2000 - First round of presidential elections. Opposition candidate Marc Ravalomanana claims an outright victory and says there's no need for a second round.

January 2002 - Ravalomanana and his supporters mount a general strike and mass protests.

February 2002 - Ravalomanana declares himself president after weeks of political deadlock with Ratsiraka over the December polls, which he says Ratsiraka rigged. Violence breaks out between rival protesters.

April 2002 - High Constitutional Court declares Ravalomanana winner of the December polls after a recount. Ratsiraka says he'll ignore the verdict. In June the US recognises Ravalomanana as legitimate leader of Madagascar.

May 9, 2002: South Africa is increasingly concerned that instability (and potential civil war) in Madagascar could sow trouble throughout the region. The troubles in Madagascar compound the situation created by the Mugabe regimes brutal actions inside Zimbabwe. The island nation of Mauritius is also concerned because of its trade links (particularly in textiles) with Madagascar. Madagascars tourism industry is also feeling the effects of the civil conflict (and whos surprised by this?).

June 6, 2002: AFP reported two more bridges were destroyed by pro-Ratsiraka troops, this time in the Mahajanga region (northwest Madagascar). One of the bridges spanned the Mahajiamba River. A subsequent report said the bridges were blown up as part of an attempt to stop a movement by Ravalomanana forces operating in the area.

June 22, 2002: The civil war in Madagascar is becoming more like a Frederick Forsyth novel with each passing day. Raymond Ramandimbilahatra, a spokesperson for Madagascar's President Marc Ravalomanana, told the press on 21 June that "three helicopters left this morning from East London, in South Africa, with 36 mercenaries on board destined for the island of Sainte-Marie. They have orders to carry out "Operation Toro" which is meant to disrupt Independence Day festivities on June 26 and to assassinate President Marc Ravalomanana." Ramandimbilahatra called on the people of Madagascar to stay calm but vigilant and to keep watch along their coastlines and across the country, since the helicopters would have to make several refueling stops before reaching their final destination.

He said the operation was commanded and financed "by an African head of state and was code-named "Toro" (the 'nom de guerre' of a general loyal to Ratsiraka). Bruno Ranarivelo, Madagascar's consul general in Johannesburg, told the Beeld newspaper that a group of South Africans could already be in Madagascar disguised as security guards and preparing a coup against Ravalomanana.

Furthermore, on the night of the 21st, Ravalomanana told the press that at least three mercenaries from the Ukraine had been intercepted at Johannesburg International Airport. The South African Department of Foreign Affairs said that it had no knowledge of allegations that South African mercenaries were on their way to assassinate Ravolomanana. Civil aviation officials in South Africa likewise expressed surprise at the report, saying there was no unusual traffic in their airspace on the 21st.

A dozen French mercenaries were reportedly heading to embattled Madagascar on the 19th, having left Paris's Le Bourget airport earlier that day aboard a Falcon 900. The plane stopped in Dar-es-Salaam to refuel and its occupants told Tanzanian authorities they were bound for Madagascar. The official flight plan said the aircraft would pick up a delegation of Ratsiraka's associates from Toamasina (a port on Madagascar's east coast where Ratsiraka has set up a parallel government) and take them to Addis Ababa. An Organization of African Unity (OAU) is due to hold a summit meeting on Madagascar on the 21st. Ratsiraka left Madagascar for France last week.

However, the group was instead blocked in Tanzania and then forced back to France. A Kenyan newspaper reported that all 15 passengers were taken to Royal Palm Hotel until the issue was sorted out. The French government then asked Tanzania to order the plane back to Paris because the passengers were illegal. The plane left Dar-es-Salaam at around 1715 GMT.

A senior Madagascar army source loyal to Ravalomanana said that the mercenaries were led by Marc Garibaldi, a former French soldier who has worked as a mercenary in the Democratic Republic of Congo and in Cote d'Ivoire. Other sources in France claimed that Mr Garibaldi was at his French home on the 19th. One unnamed foreign observer in Madagascar quipped that "this ridiculous team of mercenaries could ruin all the OAU's diplomatic efforts and it shows that Admiral Ratsiraka, if he is truly in charge, is ready to do anything not to lose face."

A sea battle was meanwhile being fought overnight on the 18th/19th by the two forces, when a small coastal ship requisitioned by one of Ratsiraka's commando units intercepted a merchant vessel full of Ravalomanana's men and opened fire on it with an anti-aircraft gun. Ravalomanana's boat was heading to Nosy Be, a small tourist resort isle off the northwestern coast. One of Ravalomanana's senior officers admitted that the battle continued into the morning, adding that they were "not hit, but we only had automatic weapons to reply with". In the town of Ambanja, troops from both sides faced off across a bridge and exchanged gunfire sporadically. Both sides have sent reinforcements to Ambaja over the previous two days.

Meanwhile, half of Madagascar's capital was left without electricity or water after a power line blew up on the 21st. Three pylons were blown up between Antananarivo and a hydro-electric plant at Andekaleka, 90 miles (150 kilometers) east of the capital and officials suspected an act of sabotage. An unnamed expert told AFP that there were just a few thermal plants left but their fuel reserves were almost exhausted and if the pylons are not repaired by the 22nd (which seemed unlikely), electricity in the whole city will be cut.

State radio also carried unconfirmed reports that clashes between Ravalomanana's forces and soldiers loyal to Ratsiraka in the northern province of Antsiranana had resulted in dozens of dead on both sides. Ravalomanana loyalists said they had taken control of most of Nosy Be early on the 21st. - Adam Geibel June 25, 2002: Here’s an interesting follow-up on the mercenary band stopped in Tanzania on its way to Madagascar. Kenyan sources say 15 mercenaries were involved, 14 men and one woman. Their plane intended to fly to the Madagascan town of Toamasina, which was controlled by pro-Ratsiraka forces. The alleged leader of the mercenary group is Marc Garibaldi. While waiting to be shipped back to France, the mercs were put up in the Royal Palm Hotel in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania. The same sources say the Falcon 900 jet the mercs were on is the same private jet that was hired by the government o France to fly Ratsiraka to a meeting in Dakar, Senegal, on June 8.

July 2, 2002: Pro-Ravalomanana (RAV) loyalists entered Antsiranana, Diego Suarez province's (Northern Madagascar) administrative capital at 18.00 hours 2 July. RAV units were in control of key points and the airport, four miles (seven km) south of the town. The airport fell after heavy fighting, while RAV chief of general staff General Sylvain Razafimandimby said that "our men took it after neutralizing anti-aircraft batteries".

An unnamed RAV general staff officer claimed that they had armored vehicles and heavy artillery at Moramanga, 67 miles (108 km) from Brickaville, where their next target was the Brickaville bridge roadblock. The officer estimated that it would take 48 hours to overrun these RAT positions 135 miles (220 km) east of Antananarivo on the road towards Toamasina.

As a Follow Up on previous reports, RAV forces managed to take control of Ambilogodra hill (around 100 km from the city of Antsiranana) on the morning of 1 July, after being repelled twice by Ratsiraka (RAT) elite forces. The strategic position gave the RAV control of the communication routes to Antsiranana.

RAV General Peter Behajaina told the press on 2 June that the next objective would be North Anivorano (74km south of Antsiranana). RAT forces have set up defenses backed by an anti-aircraft machine gun around 50 km south of the city, covering the Saharenana River bridge. Some sources inside of Antsiranana claimed that RAV advance units were just 12 miles (20 km) away on the night of 1 June, which suggest that the RAT lines had been bypassed.

Over the night on 2-3 July, a RAT officer on guard duty shot dead a pro-RAT militiaman who pulled a gun on him. The incident occurred when the militiaman tried to free one of his comrades being held in a defense ministry police barracks cell. Sporadic gunfire and explosions could also be heard throughout the night.
Another resident reported that Ratsiraka's most feared military aide, Lieutenant-Colonel Ancelin Koutiti, flew out of Antsiranana on a Sonavem company private plane (owned by Ratsiraka's son Xavierto) to Toamasina, the country's eastern port town where the former head of state had set up his base early this year. Several sources confirmed this report. Antsiranana province's pro-Ratsiraka governor, Jean-Robert Gara, also fled on 1 June in a speedboat with Lieutenant-Colonel Balbine, another hardline officer.

Koutiti and two other pro-RAT officers have been combing the country's north with commando squads of regular soldiers and militiamen, executing a relentless campaign of torture, murder and intimidation. Ratsiraka now only controls part of the Tamatave region (his traditional power bastion and the island's principal harbor, Toamasina). The city's defenses were assigned to Colonel Koutiti's Rapid Intervention Force, which is better trained and equipped than the RAV troops. The majority of RAT forces where militias recruited from the local population, which have usually fled before the advancing RAV army.

French Foreign Minister Dominique de Villepin was expected to arrive in Antananarivo on 3 July to meet Madagascan elected-President Marc Ravalomanana. Marc Ravalomanana announced late on the 2nd that two new ministerial posts would be created, to allow members of Ratsiraka's Arema party into the new government. Some say that this was one condition set by France in return for recognition of Ravalomanana's legitimacy. - Adam Geibel

July 2002 – Didier Ratsiraka seeks exile in France, marking end of seven-month political crisis.

December 2002 - Ravalomanana's party, I Love Madagascar (TIM), wins a parliamentary majority in elections which are seen as a test of popular support.

February 2003 - Former head of the armed forces is charged over an attempted coup against President Ravalomanana.

August 2003 - Exiled former president Didier Ratsiraka is sentenced in his absence to 10 years hard labour. He is accused of embezzling public funds.

December 2003 - Former PM Tantely Andrianarivo is sentenced to 12 years hard labour for abuse of office.
February/March 2004 - Tropical cyclones Elita and Gafilo hit; thousands are left homeless.
October 2004 - World Bank, International Monetary Fund say they're writing off nearly half of Madagascar's debt - around $2bn.

March 2005 - Madagascar is the first state to receive development aid from the US under a scheme to reward nations considered by Washington to be promoting democracy and market reforms.

May 2006 - The main opposition parties boycott talks with President Ravalomanana which were intended to ease political tensions ahead of December's presidential elections.

December 2006 - Officials declare Marc Ravalomanana, the incumbent, the winner of presidential elections.

April 2007 - Voters in a referendum endorse constitutional reforms to increase presidential powers and make English an official language.

July 2007- President Marc Ravalomanana dissolves parliament after new constitution calls for end to autonomy of provinces.

July 26, 2007: India has opened its second foreign base, a electronic monitoring station in northern Madagascar. There, India has radars and electronic monitoring equipment. Some 2,500 kilometers to the north-east is the American base on Diego Garcia island. India has leased an atoll to the east of Madagascar, in the Mauritius islands, for another monitoring station. These two bases, in addition to providing the Indian navy with a real-time picture of what's happening off the coast of Africa, also monitors the most heavily used routes of supertanker (ships too large for the Suez canal) traffic going around the Cape of Good Hope. India already has similar monitoring stations on its east and west coasts. In addition, India has berthing rights for its warships in Oman, enabling its warships to regularly visit the Persian Gulf, and trouble spots like the Somali coast (as part of an international anti-terrorism and anti-piracy patrol).

A lot of this new base activity is believed to be a counter to Chinese moves into the Indian ocean. China is now a major investor in Africa, especially in oil field development. China also has a monitoring base off the coast of Burma, in the Coco islands. India just opened its first foreign base last month, in Tajikistan, where is stationing aircraft and training Tajik pilots.

September 2007 - President Ravalomanana's I Love Madagascar (TIM) party wins 106 seats out of 127 in early parliamentary elections.

November 2007 - President Ravalomanana opens 3.3 billion dollar nickel cobalt mining project in Tamatave. Mine said to be largest of its kind in the world.

February-March 2008 - Cyclone Ivan, second of the season and one of the largest to hit the island kills 93 and leaves 332,391 homeless. UN launches flash appeal for $36.4 million to help cyclone-hit areas in the country.
March 2008 - Madagascar produces first barrels of crude oil in 60 years and at a time of record oil prices. The government has issued 19 licenses to search for offshore oil since last August.

January 2009 - Dozens are killed as a result of violent protests in Antananarivo following the closure of opposition TV and radio stations. Opposition leader Andry Rajoelina calls on the president to resign, and proclaims himself in charge of the country following the riots.

February 2009 - Dozens of people are killed after police open fire on an opposition demonstration in the capital, amid ongoing political turmoil.

February 24, 2009: The island of Madagascar is off the southeast coast of Africa, and is unique in many ways. But one of the strangest things about the place is the current "civil war" it is undergoing. Two popular politicians, president Marc Ravalomanana, and mayor the capital Andry Rajoelina, are both insisting that they are the true leaders of the country, and are using growing street violence to decide the issue. Not your normal type of civil war.

Ravalomanana was elected president in 2002, and proceeded to institute popular economic reforms. He was reelected in September, 2007. One of Ravalomanana's main political critics, media entrepreneur Andry Rajoelina, was elected mayor of the capital city three months later. Rajoelina defeated an ally of the president, and proceeded to use his TV station, and media skills, to go after what he saw as authoritarian methods of the president. In December, 2008, the government closed down Rajoelina's TV station, and Rajoelina responded by declaring himself the true ruler of Madagascar, and accusing Ravalomanana of corruption and trying to set himself up as a dictator. Many people believed Rajoelina, who also headed the powerful TGV party. Rajoelina promptly put thousands of demonstrators into the streets. President Ravalomanana didn't want a civil war, but he didn't want chaos in the capital, and he didn't want to back down from Rajoelina. Things turned nasty on February 7th, when over 10,000 demonstrators marched on the presidential palace in downtown Antananarivo (the capital). When the demonstrators tried to enter the palace grounds, the police opened fire, killing at least 40 people, and wounding many more. In two months of demonstrations and political violence, about a hundred people have died.

After this violence, and growing unrest throughout the island (as partisans of the two men fought each other), Christian church leaders arranged for Ravalomanana and Rajoelina to meet and try to work out their differences. The meetings were held in the presence of church leaders, and some progress has been made. Things have quieted down, but the dispute is not settled and Rajoelina seems inclined to take to the streets again.

International financial institutions have halted aid to the country because of suspected corruption on the part of Ravalomanana.While there has been a lot of new construction (especially on infrastructure) since Ravalomanana took power, the poverty rate (about 50 percent) has not gone down much at all. Rajoelina calls for more honest government (corruption has long been a problem) and less of Rajoelina's authoritarian ways.

Madagascar's population (20 million) is about half African (Bantu) and half Malay/Polynesian. The Africans are predominant along the coasts, the Malay/Polynesians in the interior. Nearly half the population still practice traditional (pagan) religions. About 45 percent are Christians (several sects, many of whom still use some traditional practices.) About seven percent of the population is Moslem. The country is poor, with per capita GDP of $1,000 (including good consumed by producers, like subsistence farmers). The more conventional GDP is about $400. The armed forces contain about 13,000 personnel, including national police and presidential security troops.

March 2009 - Andry Rajoelina assumes power with military and high court backing. Move is condemned internationally and isolates Madagascar. Marc Ravalomanana was ousted and sentenced for ordering the killing of protesters

June 2009 - Deposed President Marc Ravalomanana - who has been living in exile in South Africa since March - is tried in absentia for abuse of office and sentenced to four years in prison.
August 2009 - International mediators broker power-sharing agreement between the rival camps at talks in Mozambique. Deal fails to materialise and Mr Rajoelina later formally abandons it.

March 1, 2010: Al Shabaab has banned the major supplier of food aid, the WFP (the UN World Food Program). Al Shabaab wanted more cooperation, and payments (of food and cash) from the UN. However, the Islamic radicals said they banned the WFP because some of the food was past its expiry date (technically true, as some of the donated food is stuff that was still good, but about to be destroyed because of expiration dates, which are set with a large safety margin). Al Shabaab also claimed the food aid depressed the price of food in markets, and hurt local farmers. That is also true, but it also means millions of Somalis in refugee camps will go hungry because farmers are not producing enough food to feed everyone. But without food aid, prices in the markets will skyrocket, and al

Shabaab will collect a bigger tax from the grateful farmers. The UN is trying to negotiate their way back in, which will have to involve paying al Shabaab a larger bribe, and not admitting it publicly.
Off the east coast, a Danish warship sank a pirate mother ship that was headed towards the Seychelles islands.

March 2, 2010: In Somaliland, a group of Puntland pirates seized three trucks used to transport food aid south to starving Somalis. The pirates are holding the trucks and drivers until the Somaliland government frees some pirates they had arrested for crimes on land.

March 3, 2010: In Mogadishu, government forces pushed into an al Shabaab controlled neighborhoods, increasing the daily casualties to over fifty. Most of the dead and wounded are civilians, even though many people have fled the city, most have remained. The main government offensive is not expected to start until next month. But there is shooting every day, and several times a week there is a shoot out in the streets between government and al Shabaab gunmen.

March 4, 2010: Off the east coast, a French warship destroyed a pirate mother ship.

March 5, 2010: Pirates freed a chemical tanker, after a ransom of over $5 million was paid. Out in the Gulf of Aden, a Turkish warship captured seven pirates. North of Madagascar, a tanker heading for Tanzania, was seized by pirates. The tanker stayed well east of the Somali coast, as it travelled from the Persian Gulf. It's believed that the pirates have spies in the shipping industry, passing on location of ships. Traffic is much thinner off the east coast, than it is in the Gulf of Aden, and without knowledge of where the potential victims are, mother ship could search for weeks without spotting any vulnerable targets.

March 7, 2010: The international Anti-Piracy patrol is winning the battle for control of the Gulf of Aden, but is still vulnerable in more distant waters. For example, on March 5th, a small tanker was taken north of Madagascar, over a thousand kilometers south of Somalia (and more than 1,500 kilometers from the pirate bases in Puntland). The tanker had travelled from the Persian Gulf, swung east of the Seychelles islands to avoid pirates, and was on its way to Tanzania (just south of Kenya), when it was seized.

Most of the thousand or so pirates in Puntland are not willing, or able, to travel that far to find a vulnerable ship to capture. So most continue playing tag with the foreign warships that escort convoys and guard two shipping channels through the Gulf of Aden. The pirates, shadowed by UAVs and maritime patrol aircraft, are increasingly unable to get near a merchant ship not in sight of a warship. In one case, some four dozen pirate speedboats were closing in on 31 merchant ships being escorted by warships, apparently hoping to overwhelm the security. The warships are not allowed to fire on pirates who are not actually attacking. Chinese warships then showed up, demonstrating an intention to shoot first, and the pirates backed off.

Merchant ships are doing more to defend themselves. It's increasingly common for commercial ships to carry armed security teams. So far this year, four ships so equipped fought off pirate attacks with gunfire. This caused the pirates to retreat.

In response, pirates are increasingly going after smaller, ocean going, fishing boats, to use as mother ships. Towing two or more speedboats behind them, these mother ships can travel to the Seychelles or Madagascar, looking for less well defended, or alert, prey. It's believed that some of these mother ships have arranged to use spies within the shipping and insurance industry, to obtain location information for ships moving around the Seychelles or Madagascar. Shipping traffic is much less out there, compared to the Gulf of Aden, and without specific GPS coordinates, the mother ships could cruise around for weeks without finding suitable prey. In response, the anti-piracy patrol is looking for, tracking, and seizing, mother ships.

It's not easy being a pirate, but the money is still good for those that take a ship.

March 7, 2010: Pirates released a Thai fishing ship, for a ransom of three million dollars. The tuna fishing ship was held four months. Meanwhile, a French warship arrested eleven pirates and sank a mother ship. The French have arrested 35 pirates in the last three days.

More merchant ships are carrying armed guards, and there have been at least four incidents this year where these guards fired their weapons to drive off pirates.

The anti-pirate patrol is apparently going after pirate mother ships that are trying to move far out to sea. These vessels (usually stolen sea -going fishing ships) are spotted leaving known pirate bases, and, when they leave coastal waters, are intercepted by a warship. If weapons and boarding equipment is found, the pirates are arrested, and the mother ships and speedboats destroyed. The anti-piracy forces have a considerable maritime reconnaissance force of aircraft and UAVs, plus the occasional use of photo satellites. Thus it is difficult for the pirates to head out for the high seas without being spotted. The pirates are no doubt trying to come up with some new tactic to get around this.

Government officials speak openly of the offensive they are preparing, to force al Shabaab fighters from Mogadishu. Not everything the officials say can be believed. There is talk of over 10,000 trained government fighters ready for action. While thousands of volunteers have been trained outside the country, this has not translated into anything like 10,000 organized troops. Maybe half that, and their reliability depends a lot on how reliable their leaders are. Not a lot to be optimistic about on that issue . Normally, government officials try to steal the payroll, which has a negative effect on the troops.

Foreign aid donors have tried to impress on transitional government officials how important it is to spend the aid money wisely, and not just steal it. It's unclear if this message is understood, and as a result, much promised aid money (over $200 million worth) has not been spent yet. But the Somalis believe the Americans will be their secret weapon, providing air reconnaissance and smart bombs. The U.S. is also considering providing trainers for Somali police and troops. Intelligence information is apparently being given to the government, but smart bombs are another matter. These require American air controllers on the ground, in order to avoid a lot of civilian casualties. Helping out in Somalia is always a tricky business, which often backfires on the donors. Meanwhile, the U.S. has provided a lot of logistical and intel support for the AU peacekeepers, who are a lot more reliable and professional than any Somali forces. The AU often pass American intel onto the Somali government forces. Thousands of Somalis have been trained, during the last few months, in Djibouti and Kenya.

Al Shabaab has become more radical, as it kills or drives away more moderate members. The more radical fighting force is an advantage, because the gunmen tend to be more fearless, although still just as inept as their Somali opponents. Al Shabaab is recruiting more suicide bombers, which are an intimidating weapon. Such fanatic, if unfocused, efforts are an ancient Somali tradition, and Somalis can relate to it. But an equally true item from Somali history is that trained troops eventually defeat the wild men. Al Shabaab plays that down, preferring to believe that, since they are on a Mission From God, the Lord Will Provide some kind of miracle. This only happens in the fairy tales, not the history books.

March 8, 2010: Britain and Canada are joining the United States in banning al Shabaab recruiting, propaganda and fund raising operations in their countries. This will take a month or so to implement in Britain and Canada, thus the Somali radicals there have time to shift their operations underground. But the al Shabaab activists will then be liable to arrest for illegal activities. In places like Britain and Canada, al Shabaab plays down its terrorist activities and al Qaeda ties, and instead seeks cash to help hungry and injured people in Somalia. There is also recruiting, seeking young men for "jihad". These volunteers are usually up for being suicide bombers.

March 2010 - African Union imposes targeted sanctions on Mr Rajoelina and his administration.

May 2010 - Mr Rajoelina sets a timetable for a constitutional referendum and elections. The timetable later slips.
June 2010 - EU decides to suspend development aid to Madagascar in the absence of democratic progress.

August 2010 - Exiled former president Marc Ravalomanana is sentenced in absentia to life in prison for ordering killings of opposition supporters.

November 2010 - Voters in referendum endorse new constitution that would allow de facto leader Rajoelina to run for president.

September 2011 - Eight political parties sign agreement intended to pave the way for elections to be held within a year to re-establish democracy. The deal leaves Mr Rajoelina in charge of a transitional authority until elections scheduled for March 2012. It also allows for the return of exiled former president Marc Ravalomanana.

November 2011 - New unity government is unveiled. Opposition parties agree to join new government "with reservations".

Former President Didier Ratsiraka returns to Madagascar after nine years in exile.

January - 2012 Interim president Andry Rajoelina agrees not to contest elections in May, falling in line with a plan by mediators from SADC, the regional bloc.

January 2012 - Ousted president Marc Ravalomanana tries to return from exile but his plane is turned back.

February 10, 2012: A lot of the unrest around the world is found on island nations. Let us just consider six of them (the Maldives, Madagascar, Comoros, Fiji, New Guinea, and Haiti). All these are the scene of much unrest but little media attention or international outcry for intervention and peacekeeping.

The latest bit of unrest is in the Maldives, where the first democratically elected president resigned when an attempt to remove corrupt officials sparked demonstrations and the threat of civil war between the army and police. What just happened in the Maldives is not unusual but there will not be a call for peace keepers, or pleas from neighbors for help, or UN permission to invade. That's because these island nations have only fish for neighbors, have small populations, and not much resources to fight over. The world tends to leave these islands to sort out their disputes on their own and at their own pace.

All these places are poor, as islands tend to be. The Maldives, southeast of India, have only 400,000 people. Madagascar, southeast of Africa, has 21 million. Madagascar is an odd place, first visited by humans only 2,000 years ago and home to a wide variety of ethnic groups and cultures. Democracy has led to a rapid turnover in governments, since the various groups have been unable to achieve long-term compromises. The smaller Comoros, off the east coast of Africa, have only 800,000 inhabitants but a similar lack of consensus. Fiji, east of Australia, has 850,000 people, with about half the original Fijians and the rest more recent arrivals from India. Disputes between these two groups have caused years of stalemate and unofficial military rule. New Guinea, north of Australia, has 9.9 million people and is spilt into two political entities (the nation of Papua New Guinea in the east and the Indonesian Papua provinces in the west). Both suffer from a lack of education and economic development and an overabundance (several thousand, actually) of tribal groups who are unable to get along with each other. And then there is Haiti, on the western half of the Island of Hispaniola southeast of the U.S., with a population of 9.7 million and two centuries of independence and bad government. Haiti is currently occupied by UN peacekeepers. This is not the first time and probably won't be the last because the Haitians are still unable to form a stable government.

There are many other islands in need of peace and not likely to see any peacekeepers anytime soon. Isolation has its benefits and burdens as well.

May 2012 - Coup leader Rajoelina says he hopes elections can take place "as soon as possible".

July 2012 - The army puts down a mutiny at a military barracks near the main airport.

September 2012 - Three journalists are given refuge in the South African embassy after they complain of harassment.

September 11, 2012: In early September, on the island Madagascar off the east coast of Africa, over a hundred cattle thieves were surprised by a large group of armed (with spears, machetes and shovels) villagers. The rustlers had carefully planned a simultaneous raid on herds next to three villages. But they had been spotted and were surprised themselves, with 67 of the rustlers killed. Where were the police when all this was going on? They were elsewhere in southern Madagascar, battling with other groups of rustlers. Those clashes left three policemen and eight rustlers dead. Most of the stolen cattle were recovered. That's unusual, for the cattle rustlers are no longer mainly young tribesmen out for a little adventure but men who have formed into bandit gangs and are armed with cheap AK-47s.

Stealing cattle has gone from a minor form of entertainment to a major source of violence and criminal activity in sub-Saharan Africa. This sort of looting kills more people than wars and rebellions but gets little attention.
This new source of mayhem is largely the result of tribesmen, over the last two decades, getting access to cheap AK-47s. As a result the cattle raids, which are an ancient tradition, have gotten a lot bloodier. The AK-47 has become as much of a curse for Africa as many major diseases. Not just in the places you hear about, like Somalia, Angola, Congo, and Sudan but in many others as well. Easy availability of firearms has produced a murder rate in South Africa that is, per capita, ten times what it is in the United States.

In many parts of East Africa rural tribes got access to cheap AK-47s. This has resulted in traditional crimes, like stealing cattle or land, turning into bloody battles. In western Kenya alone there have been over a thousand deaths from tribal clashes in the last few years. The violence has caused thousands of people to flee their homes and wrecked local government in many areas. Sending in additional police and soldiers quieted things down somewhat. But the local guys with the guns know where to hide and the government reinforcements don't. So, eventually, the police will leave and the AK-47s will still be there. Angola does not have a lot of tribal animosity and is paying cash for weapons, especially assault rifles and machine-guns of all types to get them away from trigger happy teenagers.

Foreign aid organizations have adapted by hiring some of the local gunmen, to protect the relief operations from all the other gunmen. That just takes money away from more socially acceptable work. But the guns cannot be ignored. Local bad guys can steal a lot more armed with an AK-47 than in the old days when all he had was a spear or an axe.

The disruptive effect of all these guns has halted, or reversed, decades of progress in treating endemic diseases. Death rates from disease and malnutrition are going up. All because of several million Cold War surplus AK-47s getting dumped in Africa in the 1990s. The world market for such weapons was gutted by the late 1990s. All that was left was Africa but only if you were willing to sell cheap.

The cheap AK-47 also made it possible to use 10-14 year old children as soldiers. This was a new development because the old weapons (spears, swords, bows) required muscle. But now, if you could lift a 4.5 kg (ten pound) AK-47 and pull the trigger, you were a killer. Child soldiers changed everything because warlords could just kidnap kids and quickly brainwash them. These armies of young killers made insurrection and anarchy more common. Tens of millions of Africans fled their homes to avoid these tiny terrors, and many of those refugees died of starvation or disease. These victims were just as dead, even if the bullets didn't get them. In fact, few AK-47 victims died from bullets. It was the massive fear, and breakdown of society and the economy, that killed most people confronted by all these cheap AK-47s. The kids weren't very good shots but if they got close enough to you, they were capable of unimaginable horrors.

This influx of cheap AK-47s also created something of a gun culture. That has led to an increase in locally made weapons. In Nigeria, for example, there are the "Awka Guns," named after the southern city of Awka, which developed a tradition of handmade firearms in the 1960s, when it was part of the breakaway Republic of Biafra. The Biafran rebels needed weapons and Awka, which had been a center of metal working for over a thousand years, mobilized thousands of metal workers to build crude firearms. The weapons manufacturing continued after the war, mainly to supply hunters, gangsters, and anyone needing an illegal firearm for any reason. The cheapest of these weapons is basically a single shot pistol firing a .410 (10.4mm) or 20 gauge (15.6mm) shotgun shell. This is for a young thug, or a homeowner desiring protection and accurate enough for something within 2-4 meters (6-12 feet). Not much good for hunting. These cost $25-$40 each. The Awka gunsmiths also make full size (or sawed off) shotguns (single or double barrel) that sell for $80-$250. These could be used for hunting. There are also handmade 9mm revolvers for about $100. These weapons are found all over the country but mostly in the south and mostly among those who can't afford to pay a thousand dollars or more for a factory made weapon. On the down side, these weapons are more dangerous to use, often lacking a safety switch and prone to exploding rather than firing when the trigger is pulled.

Ironically, people out in the countryside, where there are still dangerous animals that a gun can protect a village from, have fewer firearms. That's because there's more money, more to steal, and more demand for weapons in the cities. But throughout Africa there is a lot more fatal violence. This mayhem only gets noticed when there are politically savvy groups at the center of it. That's what will eventually bring in peacekeepers. But there's not much effort to pacify all those places now terrified by kids with AK-47s.

September to November, 2012 - Amnesty international calls on government to rein in security forces accused of killing dozens of people in a crack-down on cattle rustling in the south.

January 4, 2013: TGV wants to play the nationalist card'

The President of the transition, Andry Rajoelina known as TGV, would really like to stand up to his country’s international partners (SADC, United States, European Union and France) who are very strongly recommending him not to run in the presidential election in May 2013. Source: ION

January 8, 2013: Andry Rajoelina, the billboard king turned president'

Andry Rajoelina, who has been president of Madagascar's High Transitional Authority (MADAGASCAR – Conseil Supérieur de la Transition) since March 2009, is Africa's youngest head of state. The controversial circumstances of his accession to high office have tainted his lightning political ascension, however, and earned him the hostility of part of the international community. Nothing predestined Rajoelina to become a central figure on the Malagasy political scene. He began by organising dances and then set up the digital printing company Injet. In the 1990s, through his marriage to Mialy Razakandisa, he took over Doma Pub, a company owned by his family in law which was to become leader on the local advertising hoarding market. He decided to go into politics after clashing with the authorities after they stopped him installing advertising hoardings in the Malagasy capital, Antananarivo. He bought a radio and television station and was elected mayor of the city in December 2007. Self-taught and energetic, he gradually established himself as leader of the opposition to the then president, Marc Ravalomanana. Although their political careers have a lot in common, the two became bitter enemies.

Rajoelina then officially set up his own party, Tanora MalaGasy Vonona (TGV), the initials of which – which refer to the French high-speed train and, by extension, to the speed of his own rise to political prominence – were to become his own nickname. Backed by part of the Merina bourgeoisie which had had enough of Ravalomanana and by the youth of the poor districts of the capital who identified with him, he led the popular uprising against the previous regime of 2008 and 2009. He came to power himself in March 2009 after getting a helping hand from the army which had rallied to his cause. His management of the transition has caused controversy, however, and, in the eyes of part of a section of local public opinion and the international community, he has ended up being seen as one of the obstacles to a solution of the country's crisis. ION

September 13, 2013: MADAGASCAR-Electoral alliances start to take shape'

ANTANANARIVO: The last to declare himself as a contender in Madagascar's October 25 presidential face, the outgoing finance minister, Hery Rajaonarimampianina, is now rushing to make up for lost time. For his part, after hesitating lengthily on whether to spend millions of dollars on an electoral campaign, the unelected mayor of Antananarivo, Edgard Razafindravahy, appears to now be in the starting blocks.

September 26, 2013: PEACEKEEPING: Another Central African Catastrophe?

On September 16th a bomb went off in the capital of the island nation of Madagascar. When police investigated they found one man dead in the house where the bomb exploded. He was apparently building the bomb.
Also found in the house were an assault rifle and bomb making materials. The bomb debris was similar to two other bombs that had gone off in the capital in the previous week. Supporters of former president Marc Ravalomanana are suspected, because a new group took responsibility for the first two bombs and said they were protests against local and foreign groups trying to keep Marc Ravalomanana from regaining power. Political unrest and terrorism have ruined Madagascar's economy over the last decade and have led to a political stalemate for the last four years.

The island of Madagascar is off the southeast coast of Africa and is unique in many ways. But one of the strangest things about the place is the current "civil war" it is undergoing. It is not anything like the Arab Spring uprisings or the civil wars so common in the rest of Africa. This one is more of a slow-motion battle waged with demonstrations and, recently, terror attacks apparently intended to create noise but no casualties. The cause of it all is two popular politicians, former president Marc Ravalomanana and temporary president (and former mayor of the capital) Andry Rajoelina, both insisting that they are the true leaders of the country. There are demonstrations, growing street violence, and now terrorism as efforts to decide the issue escalate. Not your normal type of civil war.

Madagascar's population (estimated at 22 million) is about half African (Bantu) and half Malay/Polynesian. The Africans are predominant along the coasts, the Malay/Polynesians (the first settlers) in the interior. Nearly half the population still practice traditional (pagan) religions. About forty-five percent are Christians (several sects, many of whom still use some traditional practices). About seven percent of the population is Moslem (descended from Arab traders moving down the coast of Africa). The country is poor, with per capita GDP of $1,000 (including goods consumed by producers, like subsistence farmers). The more conventional GDP is about $400. The armed forces contain about 13,000 personnel, including national police and presidential security troops . France has run the island as a colony from 1896 until 1960 and is still influential. The French occupation was notable for ending slavery (500,000 were freed) and economic growth. French is still a common second language.

Ravalomanana was elected president in 2002, and proceeded to institute popular economic reforms. He was reelected in September, 2007. One of Ravalomanana's main political critics, media entrepreneur Andry Rajoelina, was elected mayor of the capital city three months later. Rajoelina defeated an ally of the president and proceeded to use his TV station, and media skills, to go after what he saw as authoritarian methods of president Ravalomanana. In response the government closed down Rajoelina's TV station in December, 2008. Rajoelina responded by declaring himself the true ruler of Madagascar and accusing

Ravalomanana of corruption and trying to set himself up as a dictator. Many people believed Rajoelina, who also headed the powerful TGV party. Rajoelina promptly put thousands of demonstrators into the streets. President Ravalomanana didn't want a civil war, he didn't want chaos in the capital, and mainly he didn't want to back down from Rajoelina. Things turned nasty on February 7th, when over 10,000 demonstrators marched on the presidential palace in downtown Antananarivo (the capital). When the demonstrators tried to enter the palace grounds, the police opened fire, killing at least forty people, and wounding many more. In two months of demonstrations and political violence, about a hundred people died.

After this violence, and growing unrest throughout the island (as partisans of the two men fought each other), Christian church leaders arranged for Ravalomanana and Rajoelina to meet and try to work out their differences. The meetings were held in the presence of church leaders, and some progress has been made. Things quieted down but the dispute was not settled and Rajoelina partisans took to the streets again.

Finally, in March 2009, the military stepped in and backed the removal of Ravalomanana and, on March 21st, Rajoelina was sworn in as president. Ravalomanana supporters kept demonstrating while Rajoelina promised new elections. But first he proposed a new constitution, which was passed in 2010, and elections were planned for 2013, but have been delayed three times, largely because of unrest fomented by Ravalomanana supporters who see all this as a conspiracy to keep Ravalomanana (who moved to South Africa) from regaining power.

Even before 2009, international financial institutions had halted aid to the country because of suspected corruption on the part of Ravalomanana. While there has been a lot of new construction (especially on infrastructure) since Ravalomanana took power, the poverty rate (about fifty percent) had not gone down much at all. Rajoelina's campaign was more about honest government (corruption has long been a problem) than anything else.

Since 2009, the economy has shrunk because foreign firms and tourists are reluctant to come as long as there is all that unrest and political uncertainty. As a result the poverty rate went from fifty percent of the population to nearly ninety percent. The people are not happy with the political deadlock and violence is increasingly being used to try and settle the issue. But Madagascar is so unusual in so many ways that it's hard to predict how the situation will develop. Most people want more honest and efficient government but are still believers in charismatic leaders and two of those have created a deadlock.

October 25, 2013: MADAGASCAR- Presidential election is reviving business’

(ION) While the presidential election on 25 October may not bring political stability, it has already boosted business, via the heavy expenditure by the five or six candidates with the highest profiles before the numerous international observers. The cost of good media coverage and holding election meetings in the provinces is estimated at $2 million for each of the main candidates.

October 28, 2013: MADAGASCAR - Jean Louis Robinson to win ticket for second round run-off’

(ION) Based on a count of the votes from 20% of the electors by 28 October, Jean Louis Robinson, the candidate backed by ousted President Marc Ravalomanana, is set to get 30% of the votes cast in the presidential election on 25 October.

November 15, 2013: MADAGASCAR- Hajo, Camille and Roland put their heads together'

ION N°1367: Three important candidates from the first round of the presidential election, who polled a total of over 26% of the votes between them, could hold the balance of power for the second round on 20 December.

December 6, 2013: MADAGASCAR - Danger looms after general elections'

ION: The shadows of the Transition President Andry “TGV” Rajoelina and his predecessor Marc Ravalomanana, living in exile in South Africa, are hanging over the second round of the presidential election on 20 December. The two men each have their proxies for this poll.

December 31, 2013; MADAGASCAR - Robinson J. Louis could urge supporters to take to the street' ION: The electoral team of Robinson, who won 46.5% of votes in the run-off in the presidential election, are thinking of calling upon his supporters to put pressure on a Cour Electoral Speciale (CES) to rule on two appeals filed in late December.

January 25, 2014: The official ceremony to inaugurate the new Malagasy president Hery Rajaonarimampianina, in Antananarivo.

May 29, 2014: The island state of Madagascar is finally at peace, having managed to avoid a bloody civil war, but not years of economic disruption. Political unrest and terrorism have ruined Madagascar's economy over the last decade and that led to a political stalemate for the last five years. All that political strife and violence seems to have finally come to an end. Elections in late 2013 and early 2014 have installed a new president (Hery Rajaonarimampianina) who appears acceptable to supporters of former president Marc Ravalomanana and those supporting Andry Rajoelina who ousted the elected president in a 2009 coup. In addition to most of the Madagascar population, international organizations and major donor nations also back Rajaonarimampianina.

The island of Madagascar is off the southeast coast of Africa, and is unique in many ways. But one of the strangest things about the place is the recently ended "civil war". It was not anything like the Arab Spring uprisings or the civil wars so common in the rest of Africa. This one was more of a slow-motion battle waged with demonstrations and eventually (in 2013) a few terror attacks apparently intended to create noise but no casualties. The cause of it all was two popular politicians, former president Marc Ravalomanana, and temporary president (and former mayor the capital) Andry Rajoelina both insisting that they were the true leaders of the country. There were demonstrations, growing street violence and then in 2013 terrorism as efforts to decide the issue escalated. Not your normal type of civil war. Peace finally came through negotiations and compromise.

Madagascar's population (22 million) is about half African (Bantu) and half Malay/Polynesian. The Africans are predominant along the coasts, the Malay/Polynesians (the first settlers) in the interior. Nearly half the population still practices traditional (pagan) religions. About 45 percent are Christians (several sects, many of whom still use some traditional practices.) About seven percent of the population is Moslem (descended from Arab traders moving down the coast of Africa). The country is poor, with per capita GDP of $1,000 (including goods consumed by producers, like subsistence farmers). The more conventional GDP calculation is about $400 in actual cash. The armed forces contain about 13,000 personnel, including national police and presidential security troops. France has run the island as a colony from 1896 until 1960 and is still influential. The French occupation was notable for ending slavery (500,000 were freed) and encouraging economic growth. French is still a common second language.

Ravalomanana was elected president in 2002, and proceeded to institute popular economic reforms. He was reelected in September, 2007. One of Ravalomanana's main political critics, media entrepreneur Andry Rajoelina, was elected mayor of the capital city three months later. Rajoelina defeated an ally of the president, and proceeded to use his TV station, and media skills, to go after what he saw as authoritarian methods of president Ravalomanana. In response the government closed down Rajoelina's TV station in December, 2008. Rajoelina responded by declaring himself the true ruler of Madagascar and accusing Ravalomanana of corruption and trying to set himself up as a dictator. Many people believed Rajoelina, who also headed the powerful TGV party.
Rajoelina promptly put thousands of demonstrators into the streets. President Ravalomanana didn't want a civil war, he didn't want chaos in the capital, and mainly he didn't want to back down from Rajoelina. Things turned nasty in February 2009, when over 10,000 demonstrators marched on the presidential palace in downtown Antananarivo (the capital). When the demonstrators tried to enter the palace grounds, the police opened fire, killing at least 40 people, and wounding many more. In two months of demonstrations and political violence, about a hundred people died.

After this violence, and growing unrest throughout the island (as partisans of the two men fought each other), Christian church leaders arranged for Ravalomanana and Rajoelina to meet and try to work out their differences. The meetings were held in the presence of church leaders, and some progress has been made. Things quieted down, but the dispute was not settled and Rajoelina partisans took to the streets again.

Finally, in March 2009 the military stepped in and backed the removal of Ravalomanana and on March 21st Rajoelina was sworn in as president. Ravalomanana supporters kept demonstrating while Rajoelina promised new elections. But first he proposed a new constitution, which was passed in 2010 and elections were planned for 2013, but were delayed three times, largely because of unrest fomented by Ravalomanana supporters who see all this as a conspiracy to keep Ravalomanana (who moved to South Africa) from regaining power.

Even before 2009 international financial institutions had halted aid to the country because of suspected corruption on the part of Ravalomanana. While there has been a lot of new construction (especially on infrastructure) since Ravalomanana took power, the poverty rate (about 50 percent) had not gone down much at all. Rajoelina's campaign was more about honest government (corruption has long been a problem) than anything else.

Since 2009 the economy has shrunk because foreign firms and tourists are reluctant to come as long as there is all that unrest and political uncertainty. As a result the poverty rate went from 50 percent of the population to nearly 90 percent. The people were not happy with the political deadlock and violence was increasingly being used to try and settle the issue. But Madagascar is so unusual in so many ways that it was hard to predict how the situation would develop. Most people wanted more honest and efficient government, but were still believers in charismatic leaders, and two of those have created a deadlock. The eventual selection was new elections that neither Ravalomanana nor participated in as candidates. To everyone's relief that worked, and everyone won.

Why is Madagascar not part of Indonesia when the history, genetics, customs, traditional dances and instruments as well as the Malagasy language are East Indonesian heritage of 3000 years ago?

Kevin Einstein · Follow Tue

Ben Haryo , lives in Bekasi, Indonesia Updated Jan 9 · Upvoted by Pasha Aulia Muhammad, lived in Indonesia (2004-2017)

Indonesia are colonist… they are not indigenous to the lands of Madagascar! Colonist came after the 1500 AD… not 3000 BC!
Madagascar is indigenous to African Pygmies for longer than 100,000 years! They are still there!

There were no country known as “Indonesia” existing when those Dayak immigrants from Nusantara landed and settled in the island now known as “Madagascar” several centuries ago.

DYAK WAR PRAHU ON SKERANG RIVER

They consider themselves simply as members of “Dayak” tribe, coming from an island now known as “Kalimantan” in a Western region of a country now known as “Indonesia” but formerly was known by many names, and only after 1st century AD that this country began to unite under huge empires, such as “Srivijaya Rajanata” then “Majapahit Wilwatika” or “Nusantara”, then “Nederlands Oost-Indie”, and finally “Republic of Indonesia” in 1945.

Austronesian Migration

http://en.mobile.wikipedia.org/wiki/History_of_Madagascar

Within such a long time and spanning several generations, the descendants of those Dayak immigrants which landed in Madagascar many centuries ago has no memory of their original homeland and prefer to be known as the people of Madagascar, thus have no feelings whatsoever to the country now known as “Indonesia”.

Even the physical appearances has not much resemblance anymore. These below are modern-day native Dayak tribespeople from Indonesia.

While these below are Madagascar natives:

See? Not much similarities. Today there are no feelings of familial relationship whatsover between the people of Indonesia and Madagascar, only a greater sense of “shared history”.

However, the relationship between Madagascar and Indonesia is very good. Indonesia is among the countries which gave Madagascar developmental assistances.

Related Links

Should I leave Indonesia immediately? I might have thought too far, but I am honestly concerned with the current situation here in my country. I'm worried that if I don't leave right now my safety will be in danger.
Is Indonesia a terrible and dangerous country?
Indonesia is a great country, but why do some people from other countries see Indonesia as a horrible country?

To what extent do the Malay, Malaysian, and Indonesian languages differ? How mutually intelligible is this set of languages? How many and in which counties are speakers of each language (both native and non-native)?
Is Indonesia a racist country?
Both Indonesia and Philippines were the 2 countries in Asia colonised for approximately 4 centuries, Indonesia the longest. How come people in Philippines are way more colonial-minded than people in Indonesia?
If you are not Indonesian. What have you heard about Indonesia?
Why isn't Indonesia more well-known in the world stage?
Why is Apple not successful in Indonesia?
Why did you leave Indonesia?

Madagascar was pretty close to industrialization before European colonialism. Is this true? It's something I remember seeing some people claim on a Twitter thread that was talking about pre-colonial Africa.

Kevin Richardson Follow PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin Sat

I think it's highly likely that the claim you read was written by someone who'd heard something about Gwyn Campbell's paper "An Industrial Experiment in Pre-colonial Africa: The Case of Imperial Madagascar, 1825-1861", which appeared in Journal of Southern African Studies 17 (1991). If so, the writer either hadn't read the paper very carefully, or had some reason to exaggerate the claim, because Campbell certainly doesn't suggest anything along the lines of "Madagascar", as a whole, being "pretty close to industrialization" in the 19th century.

What he does do is to examine what began as an interesting experiment in cotton manufacturing carried out by the Merina empire, a polity with its main power bases the central highlands of the island. Merina was by far the most powerful of a number of states that existed on the island prior to its seizure by the French in 1894; its monarchs were often referred to by Europeans as the kings and queens of Madagascar as a whole.

According to Campbell, the rulers of Merina attempted an "industrial experiment" in Imerina, a central province of their kingdom, between 1825 and1861 — that is, at a time when word of the concept of the industrial revolution and its possibilities had had plenty of time to reach the island. This project, Campbell says, was of considerable note, as it occurred in the precolonial era, was contemporaneous with industrial experiments in Western Europe and North America, it was a result of indigenous enterprise, and it involved large scale factory machine-based production.

Madagascar did possess a number of the pre-conditions required for industrialization. It had natural resources, including a center for iron ore production at Miarinarivo, about 35 miles south-east of the capital at Antananarivo, and smelting at Amoronkay; in addition, two major famines in the early and mid-1700s had led to the emergence of a class of full-time rural artisans.

The experiment began with the textile industry but was expanded to incorporate the processing of sugar and tobacco, and eventually even arms production. It was an ambitious effort, but one that ultimately failed, so while Campbell notes that “by the mid-nineteenth century, many of the preconditions for successful industrialization had been met,” it wasn’t the case that Madagascar came close to fully industrializing before the arrival of the French, only to be thwarted by an invading colonial power — which is, I’d suspect, the form the Twitter claim you mention, took.

Nonetheless, the experiment was quite a large-scale one. The major local industrial site, at Mantasoa, eventually “comprised five factories with blast furnaces, plus numerous workshops, employing 5,000 workers and producing a wide range of manufactured goods including cannon, muskets, glass, tiles, clothes and leather.”

Mantasoa. Source: google.

The furnaces themselves were also pretty advanced: “four feet deep and two in diameter, in which the charcoal fire was fanned by two manually operated bellows,” each capable of producing almost 50 pounds of iron in under five hours. The metal they output was used to make iron tools – spades, needles, hammers, scissors, pots and, of course, weapons.

Ultimately, Campbell concludes,

if one accepts as one standard definition of 'factory' industry a single production unit employing a minimum of fourteen workers, the workshops on the iron ore fields of eastern Imerina qualified as a factory industry as early as 1817 ... comprising furnaces, each of which would employ seven labourers, and two workshops containing 18 and 32 forges respectively.

There were other outputs, too, that allow us to consider all this “industrialization” in a real sense. For example, the development of a “market system”, first organized on a permanent basis by king Andrianamboatsimarofy (1773-95), resulted, in turn, in the emergence of a “symbiotic relationship between rural industry and agriculture leading to regional specialization”. While Imerina was the main area in which this work was going on in, moreover, it also sat at the center of an island-wide long-distance trade network, in which inter-regional specialization began to flourish. And the project also involved some impressive attempts to improve education in the region, and so develop an efficient industrial workforce — which resulted in a literacy rate of around 7% among the adult population, a significant proportion for the place and time.

Campbell explores several key problems which combined to stall the Merinan project. These included lack of capital (which was largely offset by the availability of cheap manpower — Campbell notes that, in fact, about a third of the workforce were agrarian laborers transferred to the industrial sites and made to work there without pay; this resulted in high rates of desertion and some acts of industrial sabotage) and “exorbitant transport costs” caused by the almost total lack of infrastructure; there was no road network capable of shipping products to the main towns or the coast.

In the end, he writes, the major issue was the way in which the state used compulsion to develop the economy; in particular, he writes of the long term damage this inflicted upon the Merina economy as, in the attempt to avoid the intolerably harsh régime, artisans abandoned their trade and petty farmers abandoned the land, thus undermining the rural economy, the very strength of which, at the start of the nineteenth century, had made feasible the attempt to industrialise.

All in all, then, the tweets you’ve been reading do have some basis, in fact. There was a conscious effort to industrialize in Madagascar. It was pursued over a relatively long term by a series of rulers. And it produced results — albeit with the help of the local slave trade and only by significant exploitation of the workforce. However, it certainly is not the case that Merina itself, much less Madagascar as a whole, was “pretty close to industrialization” when the island was colonized. Campbell’s analysis suggests the experiment had already failed 50 years earlier, the result of a combination of inadequate infrastructure and the failure to build an export trade, increasing availability of imported industrial goods, and a significant industrial accident:

It would appear that production was never on a sufficient enough scale to meet state demand for armaments, as the court was obliged to import gunpowder from the American commercial agent Marks at Mahajanga on the west coast, and powder and muskets from Delastelle on the east coast throughout the later 1830s and 1840s.

Finally, in November 1853 the Isoraka powder mills exploded, instantly killing nine workers, including Rainimanana [a British-trained factory-owner], and wounding a further 47, some of them fatally. This was followed four years later by the expulsion of Laborde [a French entrepreneur with interests in sugar processing and cigar-manufacture on the island] from the island, after which production at Mantasoa came to an abrupt end. Of the 'foreign' industrial techniques introduced onto the plateau only soap manufacture succeeded, spreading steadily from the mid 1830s but on a handicraft rather than factory basis.

The expulsion of foreigners like Laborde, which was not uncommon in the period 1835-57, underlines a key feature of Madagascan proto-industrialization we have not commented on to date: it was driven from the top down, by authority in search of power, not by a diverse group of profit-seeking technocrats and merchants who enjoyed independent access to capital. This did have short-term advantages (no competition), but it also meant support for the whole project could be turned off like a switch. Royal capriciousness also had the further consequence of making Madagascar seem an unwelcoming environment for inward investment of both cash and industrial expertise. Indeed, after c.1850, the whole attitude of the local elites towards industrialization changed, so that indigenous skilled artisans, including foreign-trained Merina, were eventually banned from working for themselves for fear the greater efficiency of their manufacturing would dent the profits of Crown-owned artisanal industries.

The failure of industrialization in Madagascar, then, owed more to local issues and to local problems and attitudes, than anything else, and it's hard to lay it at the doors of either international competition or invading imperialists. It was a genuinely fascinating experiment, nonetheless, and I'm not surprised it still attracts the attention of people on Twitter.

Related questions

What were some positive effects of European colonialism on the places they colonized?
Is there any region or indigenous population that can be said to have net benefited from being colonized?

Did European colonialism ruin our world?

Africans often claim that European colonialism made Africa poor, does that mean that Africans were well off before European colonialism?

What did Africa look like before colonialism?
How did French colonialism differ from British colonialism?

Supposedly Madagascar was pretty close to industrialization prior to European colonialism. Is this true? If not, were there any other places that were close to Industrialization?

Is colonialism the primary reason why Africa is so poor?
Why didn't Africans settle Madagascar?

What were the positive effects of the colonialism in Africa? What caused them?
What are the major differences between being a British colony and a French colony?

In the decolonization of Africa, did some Europeans really vandalize and dismantle colonial cities before leaving?

What would have happened to Africa if it hadn't been colonized?
Did European colonialism benefit Europe?
Do you think European colonialism was bad?
Is it true that 14 African countries are still forced to pay colonial taxes to France?

News Nigeria

Photos of a car park housing several private cars collapsed on houses following the heavy rains of the last few days in the Ankadifotsy neighborhood of Antananarivo, Madagascar, Jan. 24, 2022.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 20h

Officials in Madagascar say that tropical storm Ana has caused widespread flooding in Madagascar, including in the capital city, raising the death toll from recent heavy rains to 34 people and displacing more than 55,000.

With torrential rains continuing, Antananarivo's rivers are rising and officials are urging residents to leave low-lying areas of the capital and surrounding areas.

Many residents have been evacuated in inflatable motorized boats. Madagascar’s meteorology department warned Monday of continued heavy rains. The tropical depression has moved across the Indian Ocean to the African continent, causing strong winds and rain in northern Mozambique.

The storm hit Madagascar over the weekend after the island had already experienced several days of rains.

Pourquoi Madagascar arrive-t-elle au-delà de la 120e position des pays contaminés et a-t-elle aussi peu de morts, alors qu'il n'y a peu ou pas de vaccins ?

Damien DULAC · Suivre BAC+6 de Université Paris Saclay (Diplôme obtenu en 2000) sam.

On recapitule la position de Madagascar :

Une île.
Superficie : 80 % de la France.
Population : 40 % de la France.
Faible densité de population. 46 h/km²
Capitale et banlieue 4 fois moins peuplée que Paris.

En dehors des carrefours de circulation.

Trafic aérien faible.

Plus de 50 % de jeunes de moins de 20 ans

Très peu de personnes très âgées.

Climat tropical.

A fermé plusieurs fois et totalement ses frontières.

Ses vagues de contamination sont décalées et retardées.

Le nombre de morts augmente à chaque vague.

Avec le nouveau variant, les morts sont supérieures au lieu d'être inférieures.

Conclusion : une situation totalement opposée aux pays européens comme la France.

On ne parle pas non plus de la sous déclaration des cas et des morts dans un tel pays. Que beaucoup de malades ne sont comptabilisés car non testés.

Quant à la vaccination :Covid-19 : 54 nouveaux décès, hausse de la contamination dans les autres régions – Madagascar-Tribune.com

54 nouveaux décès liés à l'épidémie de Covid-19 ont été enregistrés à Madagascar en une semaine, du 1er au 7 janvier, selon le bilan rendu public samedi par le ministère de la Santé publique. Ceci porte…

https://www.madagascar-tribune.com/Covid-19-54-nouveaux-deces-seule-la-region-Bongolava-est-epargnee.html

Certains antivax fantasment sur des remèdes naturels miracles …

A ce jour, l'efficacité de l'artemisia contre le Covid-19 n'est pas prouvée scientifiquement

Le texte d'un naturopathe belge, partagé près de 2 000 fois depuis fin avril, décrit un breuvage malgache à base d'artemisia comme un "remède simple" au Covid-19. Si des essais cliniques sont en effet en cours pour évaluer l'efficacité de cette plante sur le coronavirus, son utilisation n'est pour l'instant pas recommandée par l'OMS, en l'absence de preuves scientifiques concluantes.

https://factuel.afp.com/ce-jour-lefficacite-de-lartemisia-contre-le-covid-19-nest-pas-prouvee-scientifiquement

On n'a toujours aucune étude montant l'efficacité réelle de ce remède sur l'homme et surtout que son emploi ne soit pas dangereux aux doses utiles. Après 2 ans.
Comme d'habitude, les antivax cherchent un par un les pays qui pourraient conforter leur croyance irrationnelle. Mais la réalité est plus forte qu'eux.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les contaminations au Covid-19 dans le monde chutent-elles si rapidement à l'heure actuelle ? Il est certainement beaucoup trop tôt pour que les vaccins en soient responsables, car ils ne sont pas disponibles dans de nombreux pays.

Est-il exact que Mr Fauci a déclaré que face au variant Delta, les personnes vaccinées présentaient la même charge virale de Covid que les non-vaccinés ?

Covid-19 : pourquoi 96% des nouveaux cas contaminés sont-ils des non-vaccinés ? Les virus font-ils exprès de ne s'en prendre qu'aux non-vaccinés ?

Comment la grippe espagnole a-t-elle été éradiquée ? Y a-t-il eu un vaccin ou a-t-elle disparu par elle-même ?

Combien de temps faudra-t-il avant que tous les antivax soient morts, sachant que 95% des gens qui meurent actuellement du Covid ne sont pas vaccinés et qu'au 9 août 68 personnes mourraient du Covid-19?

Pourquoi la science ne donne-t-elle pas aux gens un remède contre le cancer ?

La pandémie dure depuis presque une année, sommes-nous devenus désespérés au point d'accepter le vaccin louche dont tout le monde parle, après le changement remarquable et la souffrance du monde de la nouvelle situation ?

Les autorités françaises poussent la population à accepter une troisième dose de vaccin, alors que 5 pays nordiques font une étude sur les risques de pathologies cardiaques accrues. Qu'en pensez-vous ?

Pourquoi avons-nous trouvé le vaccin Covid-19 si rapidement avant d'autres maladies ou pandémies qui remontent à des décennies (sida, paludisme, etc.) ?

La France seule a plus de cas de COVID-19 que beaucoup de pays africains, mais les

Pourquoi Madagascar arrive-t-elle au-delà de la 120e position des pays contaminés et a-t-elle aussi peu de morts, alors qu'il n'y a peu ou pas de vaccins ?

Damien DULAC · Suivre BAC+6 de Université Paris Saclay (Diplôme obtenu en 2000) sam.

On recapitule la position de Madagascar :

- Une île.
- Superficie : 80 % de la France.
- Population : 40 % de la France.
- Faible densité de population. 46 h/km²
- Capitale et banlieue 4 fois moins peuplée que Paris.
- En dehors des carrefours de circulation.

- Trafic aérien faible.
- Plus de 50 % de jeunes de moins de 20 ans
- Très peu de personnes très âgées.
- Climat tropical.
- A fermé plusieurs fois et totalement ses frontières.
- Ses vagues de contamination sont décalées et retardées.
- Le nombre de morts augmente à chaque vague.
- Avec le nouveau variant, les morts sont supérieures au lieu d'être inférieures.

Conclusion : une situation totalement opposée aux pays européens comme la France. On ne parle pas non plus de la sous déclaration des cas et des morts dans un tel pays. Que beaucoup de malades ne sont comptabilisés car non testés.
Quant à la vaccination :

Covid-19 : 54 nouveaux décès, hausse de la contamination dans les autres régions – Madagascar-Tribune.com

54 nouveaux décès liés à l'épidémie de Covid-19 ont été enregistrés à Madagascar en une semaine, du 1er au 7 janvier, selon le bilan rendu public samedi par le ministère de la Santé publique. Ceci porte…

https://www.madagascar-tribune.com/Covid-19-54-nouveaux-deces-seule-la-region-Bongolava-est-epargnee.html

Certains antivax fantasment sur des remèdes naturels miracles …

A ce jour, l'efficacité de l'artemisia contre le Covid-19 n'est pas prouvée scientifiquement

Le texte d'un naturopathe belge, partagé près de 2 000 fois depuis fin avril, décrit un breuvage malgache à base d'artemisia comme un "remède simple" au Covid-19. Si des essais cliniques sont en effet en cours pour évaluer l'efficacité de cette plante sur le coronavirus, son utilisation n'est pour l'instant pas recommandée par l'OMS, en l'absence de preuves scientifiques concluantes.

https://factuel.afp.com/ce-jour-lefficacite-de-lartemisia-contre-le-covid-19-nest-pas-prouvee-scientifiquement

On n'a toujours aucune étude montant l'efficacité réelle de ce remède sur l'homme et surtout que son emploi ne soit pas dangereux aux doses utiles. Après 2 ans.

Comme d'habitude, les antivax cherchent un par un les pays qui pourraient conforter leur croyance irrationnelle. Mais la réalité est plus forte qu'eux.

Questions similaires

Pourquoi les contaminations au Covid-19 dans le monde chutent-elles si rapidement à l'heure actuelle ? Il est certainement beaucoup trop tôt pour que les vaccins en soient responsables, car ils ne sont pas disponibles dans de nombreux pays.

Est-il exact que Mr Fauci a déclaré que face au variant Delta, les personnes vaccinées présentaient la même charge virale de Covid que les non-vaccinés ?

Covid-19 : pourquoi 96% des nouveaux cas contaminés sont-ils des non-vaccinés ? Les virus font-ils exprès de ne s'en prendre qu'aux non-vaccinés ?

Comment la grippe espagnole a-t-elle été éradiquée ? Y a-t-il eu un vaccin ou a-t-elle disparu par elle-même ?

Combien de temps faudra-t-il avant que tous les antivax soient morts, sachant que 95% des gens qui meurent actuellement du Covid ne sont pas vaccinés et qu'au 9 août 68 personnes mourraient du Covid-19?

Pourquoi la science ne donne-t-elle pas aux gens un remède contre le cancer ?

La pandémie dure depuis presque une année, sommes-nous devenus désespérés au point d'accepter le vaccin louche dont tout le monde parle, après le changement remarquable et la souffrance du monde de la nouvelle situation ?

Les autorités françaises poussent la population à accepter une troisième dose de vaccin, alors que 5 pays nordiques font une étude sur les risques de pathologies cardiaques accrues. Qu'en pensez-vous ?

Pourquoi avons-nous trouvé le vaccin Covid-19 si rapidement avant d'autres maladies ou pandémies qui remontent à des décennies (sida, paludisme, etc.) ?

La France seule a plus de cas de COVID-19 que beaucoup de pays africains, mais les

Ylias Akbaraly, businessman wi th a world eye view INSIDERS MADAGASCAR April 22, 2013
With his Franco-Malagasy nationality, his Karana Indian origins, his Italian wife and Indian overseas citizenship, Ylias Akbaraly is a businessman with an international outlook. He was trained by his father, who was born as he was in Madagascar and who founded Société Industrielle des Produits de Madagascar (Sipromad) in the 1970s. Ylias took over from him and, today, the family group comprises some 20 companies in various sectors, including such names as Madaphar, ITech, Hôtel de France and GS

Aviation. It also has holdings in a number of others companies, including Brink's Madagascar and Banque des Mascareignes-Madagascar.

Akbaraly had been managing director of the group since 1991 but, today, leaves day-to-day management to Nelly Jirari from La Réunion, who was appointed managing director at the end of 2012. He contents himself now with the position of board chairman but still makes a point of keeping up good relations with High Transitional Authority president Andry "TGV" Rajoelina. Rajoelina is due to relinquish his position after the presidential election due to take place in late July 2013, in which he will not be running.

Akbaraly is careful, however, not to make too much of his friendly relations with TGV. In the past, he paid a high price for his close relations with former president Didier Ratsiraka and, most notably, with the latter's children, with whom he set up a business partnership in 2001. This venture left a lasting impression on him because it resulted in his spending a short time in the wilderness after Marc Ravalomanana came to power in 2002. He bore up to his misfortune but then turned to investment projects outside the country, notably, in Mauritius and Mozambique, before publicly welcoming Ravalomanana's re-election in 2006. He had no misgivings, nevertheless, about supporting TGV's bid to become mayor of Antananarivo in December 2007 and then president in March 2009. On June 26 2009, he was prominent in the official stand at the ceremony to commemorate the 49th anniversary of Madagascar's independence, presided over by TGV but boycotted by Western diplomats in the Malagasy capital.

Nevertheless, in recent years, Akbaraly has paid more attention to his international position with the aim of ensuring that his business affairs survive in the event that his close links with the regime in power in Antananarivo should again unravel. (Text ends

Why is Madagascar an island whereas the bigger chunk of Africa is not considered an island which is also surrounded by water?

By Matt Riggsby

MA Archaeology, Boston University March 9

First, there's the not-very-coherent concept of "continents," which are in some way bigger and therefore different from islands. Moreover, Africa is not naturally surrounded by water. Africa is connected to Asia by a strip of land about 90 miles wide between the Mediterranean and the Gulf of Suez. Yes, there's a canal there now, so technically Africa is separated from Asia by water and you're very clever to have noticed, but it's not a natural body of water, let alone a recognizable gulf or sea or ocean, so it's not usually counted as a meaningful separation for the purpose of calling Africa an island.

Related Links

Madagascar probably does not exist. Does anyone have any proof that there is such a large island off the southeast coast of Africa?

Why is Madagascar considered an African country?

Why is Australia considered a continent and not an island?

Why is Tasmania considered an island whereas mainland Australia is not considered an island?

Which country is the largest island located off the coast of Africa?

Why is Africa not called an island?

Why is Madagascar not part of Indonesia when the history, genetics, customs, traditional dances and instruments as well as the Malagasy language are East Indonesian heritage of 3000 years ago?

Ben Haryo Follow Lives in Bekasi, Indonesia Updated 21h

There were no country known as “Indonesia” existing when those Dayak immigrants from Nusantara landed and settled in the island now known as “Madagascar” several centuries ago.

DYAK WAR PRAHU ON SKERANG RIVER

They consider themselves simply as members of “Dayak” tribe, coming from an island now known as “Kalimantan” in a Western region of a country now known as “Indonesia”

but formerly was known by many names, and only after 1st century AD that this country began to unite under huge empires, such as “Srivijaya Rajanata” then “Majapahit Wilwatika” or “Nusantara”, then “Nederlands Oost-Indie”, and finally “Republic of Indonesia” in 1945.

Austronesian Migration

http://en.mobile.wikipedia.org/wiki/History_of_Madagascar

Within such a long time and spanning several generations, the descendants of those Dayak immigrants which landed in Madagascar many centuries ago has no memory of their original homeland and prefer to be known as the people of Madagascar, thus have no feelings whatsoever to the country now known as “Indonesia”. Even the physical appearances has not much resemblance anymore. These below are modern-day native Dayak tribespeople from Indonesia.

While these below are Madagascar natives:

See? Not much similarities. Today there are no feelings of familial relationship whatsover between the people of Indonesia and Madagascar, only a greater sense of “shared history”.

However, the relationship between Madagascar and Indonesia is very good. Indonesia is among the countries which gave Madagascar developmental assistances.

Indonesia Pledges to Support Infrastructure Development in Madagascar

Minister of State-Owned Enterprises (SOEs) Rini M Soemarno is committed to encouraging SOEs to help Madagascar in infrastructure development.

https://www.medcom.id/english/business/GKdRGreb-indonesia-pledges-to-support-infrastructure-development-in-madagascar

UPDATE: People of Madagascar have origins in Borneo, Africa

People of Madagascar have origins in Borneo, Africa People of Madagascar have origins in Borneo, Africa New study confirms unusual ancestry of the Malagasy Sailing across the Indian Ocean to make landfall on the world's fourth largest island? Rhett Butler, mongabay.com May 3, 2005 An ethnic Sakalava boy near the Manambolo River in western Madagascar. […]

https://news.mongabay.com/2005/05/people-of-madagascar-have-origins-in-borneo-africa/

This article above mentioned Ma’anyan subtribe from Borneo as one of originators of Madagascar people. Ma’anyan is one of the Dayak subgroups living near Barito river.

Ma'anyan people - Wikipedia

Ethnic group in Indonesia Ma'anyan people Dusun Ma'anyan / Dayak Ma'anyan / Eastern Barito Dayak Ma'anyan women at Keang Ethnic Festival. Approximately 85,000 Indonesia : Central Kalimantan 71,000 South Kalimantan 10,000 Ma'anyan language , Ngaju language , Banjar language , East Barito languages , Indonesian language Christianity , Kaharingan , Islam Dayak people , Malagasy people , Ot Danum people , Banjar people Ma'anyan (colonial spelling Maanjan or Meanjan), Dayak Maanyan or Eastern Barito Dayak people are a sub-ethnic group of the Dayak people indigenous to Borneo . They are also considered as part of the east Barito Dusun group with the name Dusun Ma'anyan . According to J. Mallinckrodt (1927), the Dusun people group is part of the Ot Danum people cluster, although later that theory was disproved by A. B. Hudson (1967), who argues that the Ma'anyan people are a branch of the Barito family. The Ma'anyan people who are often referred to as Dayak people are also referred to as Dayak Ma'anyan. The Dayak Ma'anyan people inhabit the east side of Central Kalimantan , especially in the East Barito Regency and parts of South Barito Regency which are grouped as Ma'anyan I. The Dayak Ma'anyan people also inhabit the northern parts of South Kalimantan , especially in Tabalong Regency which refers to the Dayak Warukin people. The Dayak Balangan people or Dusun Balangan people which are found in the Balangan Regency and the Dayak Samihim people that are found in the Kotabaru Regency are grouped together with the Dayak Ma'anyan people group. The Dayak Ma'anyan people in South Kalimantan are grouped as Ma'anyan II. Administratively, the Ma'anyan people have just recently appeared in the 2000 census and made up 2.8% of the Central Kalimantan population; previously the Ma'anyan people were grouped together with the Dayak people in the 1930 census. [1] The uniqueness of the Dusun Ma'anyan people among others are agriculture, elaborate funeral ceremonies, and having shaman to treat their disease. [2] History [edit] Ma'anyan people (or other indigenous people of Kalimantan closely related to the Ma'anyans) were brought as labourer and slaves by Malay and Javanese in their trading fleets, which reached Madagascar by ca. 50-500 AD. [3] [4] [5] The Malagasy language originated from the Southeast Barito language , and the Ma'anyan language is its closest relative, with numerous Malay and Javanese loanwords. [6] [7] In the oral literature of the Ma'anyan people, after the Nan Sarunai kingdom was attacked by the Majapahit kingdom , the Ma'anyan people broke up into several sub-group. Among the sub-groups, they are:- Ma'anyan Paku Ma'anyan Paju Epat/Ampat or Ma'anyan Siong Ma'anyan Dayu Lasi Muda Ma'anyan Paju Sapuluh of Kampung Sapuluh (had Banjarese influence) Ma'anyan Banua Lima or Paju Dime (had Banjarese influence) Ma'anyan Warukin (had Banjarese influence) Ma'anyan Jangkung (extinct and had Banjarese influence) According to the Ma'anyan people, before they h

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ma%27anyan_people?wprov=sfla1

../../../AppData/Roaming/Microsoft/Word/Suku Merina di Madagaskar Mirip dengan Suku Maanyan di Kalteng - Banjarmasinpost.co.idSebagian penduduk Madagaskar, sebuah negara di Afrika, diyakini berasal dari Indonesiahttps:/banjarmasin.tribunnews.com/2012/11/16/suku-merina-di-madagaskar-mirip-dengan-suku-maanyan-di-kalteng

This article below claimed that the Dayaks were brought as part of Malay expedition.

The Settlement of Madagascar: What Dialects and Languages Can Tell Us

The dialects of Madagascar belong to the Greater Barito East group of the Austronesian family and it is widely accepted that the Island was colonized by Indonesian sailors after a maritime trek that probably took place around 650 CE. The language most ...

https://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC3283610/

“…The language most closely related to Malagasy dialects is Maanyan, but Malay is also strongly related especially for navigation terms. Since the Maanyan Dayaks live along the Barito river in Kalimantan (Borneo) and they do not possess the necessary skill for long maritime navigation, they were probably brought as subordinates by Malay sailors.” Follow Ben Haryo

Related Links

Culturally, is Madagascar a Southeast Asian country, or does it belong to Africa? The Malagasy language is Indonesian, not African, and so are many of the Malagasy customs.

Genetic analysis of Malagasy people have shown that the island of Madagascar was settled by Austronesians from Indonesia approximately 1,200 years ago. What is known about this migration and have any cultural survive in Malagasy culture to this day?

To what extent do the Malay, Malaysian, and Indonesian languages differ? How mutually intelligible is this set of languages? How many and in which counties are speakers of each language (both native and non-native)?

Is Madagascar an African country or a Southeast Asian country? The language, Malagasy, comes from Indonesia.

If East Timor return to integrate with Indonesia, can Indonesian people accept besides their hurt feeling?

Do Indonesians understand the Malay language?

Why did the Malagasy sail from Borneo to Madagascar?

After they settled in Madagascar did they maintain relations with Indonesia?

Why isn't Indonesia more well-known in the world stage?

Why don't many Indonesians speak Dutch?

What is the origins of Malagasy language?

Pourquoi est-ce que le vol de vanille est si condamnable au Madagascar ?

Arnaud Sion · Suivre

Lieu : Rio d Janeiro (2014–aujourd'hui)lun.

Dans le monde de la vanille , le vol de gousses de vanille sur pied, une vanille de couleur verte est un fléau, car le vanillier n'est pas une orchidée difficile à produire à vrai dire, on peut faire des boutures de vanillier[1] dans l'eau.

Mais le vanillier va produire ses premières fleures trois après sa mise en pot et surtout plus de 5 ans avant de produire 5kg de vanille verte. C'est un problème qui est similaire au Brésil avec la coupe du palmier açai de la mata atlantica au Brésil qui va produire seulement de l'açai après ses 9 ans.

Le vanillier va produire une fleur qui faut polliniser à la main. Et la fleur dure qu'une matinée, donc il faut savoir qu'il faut une armée de petite main pour polliniser les fleurs.

Ensuite entendre 9 mois pour que le fruit soit mûr et surtout, c'est dans les deux dernières semaines que le vanillier va donner l'arôme de la vanille, la vanilline. Donc, quand il y a un vol de vanille, il y a tout simplement le vol d'un travail de 1 an voir de 5 ans pour que le pied produit le maximum et surtout pour le consommateur, il va avoir une vanille moins bonne, car les vols de vanilles vont se faire lors des dernières semaines, quand la vanille se charge en arôme de vanille.

Notes de bas de page

[1] Bouture de vanille dans de l'eau - Blog du Comptoir de Toamasina

Qui a été la reine la plus crainte de l'histoire ?

Dimitri Ken , Féru d'histoire Répondu 4 oct.

Commençons par une anecdote. La reine vous demande de prouver votre loyauté. Comment ? Tribunal ? Non, juste un petit test : avaler la peau de 3 poulets crus… Vous parvenez à avaler la première et la deuxième. Après tant de mal à pousser la troisième au fond de votre gorge, vous n'en pouvez plus et vous rendez deux peaux sur le coup. « Coupable ! », crie-t-elle. Votre sanction : la mort. Selon elle, si vous étiez innocent, vous auriez dû vomir les trois peaux… Telle est la justice selon la reine folle de Madagascar : Ranavalona Ier. (1778 -1861)

Née Ramavo, son père s'est attiré les grâces de l'ancien roi en lui permettant d'échapper à une tentative d'assassinat. Reconnaissant, le roi a pris Ramavo comme sa fille, et plus tard, l'a mariée à son fils légitime (Radama Ier, l'héritier du trône).

Dès son accession au trône, Radama a commencé à purger le royaume de ses rivaux, incluant les membres de la famille de Ramavo. En réponse, la désormais reine l'a lentement empoisonné, jusqu'à sa mort en 1828. La sœur de Radama était censée devenir la reine. Mais Ramavo avait préparé son coup pendant un an. Grâce à l'aide des riches et puissants, elle s'est emparée du trône et a elle-même commencé une purge de ses rivaux, surtout les membres de sa famille adoptive :

Le neveu de son mari a été transpercé avec des lances ;
La sœur de Radama a été enfermée et est morte de famine. Toutes les femmes de la famille royale ont subi le même sort.

Elle s'est débarrassée des enseignants, diplomates et commerçants venant d'Europe pour moderniser le royaume. Aidée par le paludisme, elle a écrasé les troupes françaises qui avaient envoyé une expédition punitive en conséquence. Elle a fait exclure les missionnaires catholiques, et a fait pendre les 14 irréductibles qui étaient restés. D'autres ont été exécutés à la cathédrale Andohalo.

Très inspirée par la période médiévale, elle a fait développer des méthodes de torture et d'exécution horribles. Ainsi. Les criminels et les dissidents étaient :

Jetés dans des marmites d'eau ou d'huile bouillante ;
Attachés et brûlés vifs ;
Enterrés vivants.

Et tout cela, pendant que leurs familles étaient forcées de regarder.

Les citoyens incapables de payer leurs impôts étaient immédiatement réduits en esclavage. Généralement, ils mouraient de faim, ou à cause des conditions horribles de travail forcé. Pour payer ses troupes, elle s'en remettait à la tradition : laisser ses soldats piller les villages environnants, tuant et violant à tout va et réduisant les capturés en esclavage.

Au fil des années, elle devenait de plus en plus folle, ce qui a amené à la fameuse chasse au buffle.

En 1845, la reine Ranavalona I de Madagascar ordonna à 50 000 de ses sujets de partir à la chasse au buffle. La chasse [NDT : qui a duré 6 semaines] nécessitait de construire des routes à travers les jungles, ce qui a duré 4 mois. Environ 10 000 personnes sont mortes d'épuisement, de famine et de paludisme, mais pas un seul buffle n'a été tué.

Traduction de Fact Republic (voir « Buffalo Hunt » en source)

Au total, il est estimé que par exécution, famine, travail forcé ou combats contre les Européens, le règne de Ranavalona Ier a coûté la vie à (jusqu'à) 75% de sa population, soit 2,5 millions de personnes ! Ce qui en fait la femme la plus meurtrière de l'histoire. Le livre des records Guinness devrait songer à détrôner Élizabeth Bathory (voir ma réponse)…

Sources :

Ranavalona I - Wikipedia
Buffalo Hunt
Queen Ranavalona I: Most Murderous Woman in History - Historic Mysteries
Most Evil Queen - Killed 75% Of Her Subjects - The Infographics Show

News Nigeria

An aerial view shows damaged houses and flooding on a road in Vohiparara and in the town of Mananjary, Madagascar, as locals stand among the ruins left in the aftermath of Cyclone Batsirai.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Feb 8

Questions similaires

Qui a été la personne la plus malchanceuse de l'histoire de l'humanité ?

Qui est la personne la plus étrange dans l'histoire de l'humanité ?
Qui a été le Roi le plus craint de l'histoire ?

Est ce que les Rois de l'époque se battaient vraiment sur le champ de bataille comme on le voit parfois dans les films ?

Quel roi est considéré comme étant le meilleur de l'histoire de France, aujourd'hui ?
Quel a été le pire roi de l'histoire du monde ?
Quel roi fut le plus bon pour son peuple ?

La Reine d'Angleterre va-t-elle devenir la monarque ayant régné le plus longtemps dans l'histoire de tous les pays du monde ?

Quel personnage historique aurait pu le plus légitimement proclamer : "Je suis le roi du monde" ?

Qui était le pire roi de France ?
Quelle a été la bataille la plus sanglante de toute l'histoire ?
Quel fut pour vous l'événement le plus tragique de notre histoire ? Pourquoi ?

Est-ce que bien savoir mentir a déjà été considéré comme une qualité dans l'histoire de l'humanité ?

Comment des extraterrestres visitant notre planète un milliard d'années après la chute de l'humanité pourraient-ils déterminer que la vie intelligente était présente ici ?

Pourraient-ils la voir depuis l'espace ou devaient-ils atterrir ?

Quel a été la reine de France la plus puissante dans tous les domaines armée, politique, etc? Et pourquoi ?

MONGABABY NEWS

People of Madagascar have origins in Borneo, Africa

By Rhett A. Butler on 3 May 2005

People of Madagascar have origins in Borneo, Africa. New study confirms unusual ancestry of the Malagasy. Sailing across the Indian Ocean to make landfall on the world's fourth largest island?

Rhett Butler, mongabay.com

May 3, 2005

A new study in the American Journal of Human Genetics confirms that the people of Madagascar have origins in both East Africa and also distant Borneo.

Despite the island's proximity to southern Africa, some anthropologists believe it was ethnic Indonesians who first settled Madagascar 1500-2000 years ago. The language of Madagascar, called Malagasy, can be traced back to Indonesia where it most closely resembles the modern Malayo-Polynesian language of Ma'anyan, which is spoken by people in the Barito Valley of southern Borneo. Some anthropologists postulate that these Indonesians could have either sailed directly across the Indian ocean — possible given the sailing prowess of these people — or gradually made their way along the coast of South Asia eventually finding their way to the island, which is the fourth largest in the world. On the way, these intrepid explorers could have mixed with mainland Africans or Africans may have arrived at a later date.

Regardless of who set foot first on the island, most experts agree that Madagascar's inhabitants arrived relatively recently. There is no evidence of a stone age in Madagascar and the island was settled around the time Polynesians reached the planet's most isolated place — Easter Island. It is thought that subsequent migrations have brought other groups (Arabs and Indians) into the ethnic and cultural mix.

The study

The study, led by a team of geneticists at the universities of Cambridge, Oxford and Leicester examined both the Y chromosomes of Madagascar residents — inherited essentially unchanged from father to son — and the mitochondrial DNA, which is passed directly from mothers to their children. Tiny mutations in these two forms of DNA can help scientists trace human migration and inheritance.

The researchers found that as a whole, Malagasy people (both the name of the language and the people of Madagascar) are a roughly 50:50 mix of two ancestral groups:

Indonesians and East Africans. Today, this mixed origin has produced an interesting set of cultures that draws from southeast Asia, India, Africa, and the Middle East.

Diverse society

Within Madagascar there is a great deal of variation between ethnic groups from the Indonesian-looking Merina in the highlands to Arabic Antaimoro on the eastern coast to the African Sakalava in the south and west of the country. Despite these differences, the Malagasy language is spoken throughout the country, something which is a bit surprising given the size and ethnic diversity of the island. Sharing a common language is the strongest bond between Malagasy — people's physical appearance, religious practices, and traditions are highly regional.

Malagasy language

Malagasy only recently become a written language. Until Welsh missionaries transcribed the language in the 1820s, the Malagasy had to rely on oral history to mark past events. However, even with the development of a written form, written Malagasy hardly resembles spoken Malagasy — the last syllable is typically dropped while unstressed syllables in the middle of words often disappear (spelling versus pronunciation was evidently influenced by the Welsh transcribers). The capital city of Antananarivo is pronounced "Tananarive" but usually shortened to "Tana."

Cultural richness

What this all means is the people of Madagascar have a remarkable ancestry. One that has produced a unique set of customs and extraordinary cultural richness. Madagascar is a place where ancestors are as much a part of the present day as they are of the past; where in many areas taboo and tradition takes precedence over the law; and western-style religion is freely mixed with beliefs in sorcery and unparalleled funerary customs.

This article used information from WildMadagascar.org, Reuters, and the American Journal of Human Genetics. For further reading on the people of Madagascar I highly recommend The Eighth Continent by Peter Tyson.

For more on Madagascar, take a look at WildMadagascar.org.

Related articles:

Madagascar looks toward a brighter economic future with movie, new aid package
Exploring the Manambolo River

Seeking the world's strangest primate on a tropical island paradise off Madagascar

News Nigeria

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Feb 10

Cyclone ng winds orld Food ultimately displace over 700,000 people

News Nigeria

Over one million people in southern Madagascar are dependent on food deliveries from the UN's World Food Program.

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 3h

Red sand is blowing everywhere in a once-fertile corner of the country after four years of drought linked to climate change, the UN says. Deforestation caused by people cutting trees down for charcoal and farmland has transformed the Androy region into a dust bowl.

EPP

How does one classify Madagascar, Indian or African?

Niels Faber

Lived in Madagascar (2018–2019) Mar 5

Malagasy ethnic groups (source: Wikipedia)

Well, definitely not Indian. I guess you mean Asian or better Polynesian or African. The answer is both, or neither. The first settlers on the island were Polynesians that settled in the north eastern part of Madagascar.

School kids in Marovoay (north)

Africans later crossed the strait of Mozambique to settle the south western part.

With my neighborhood kids on the block in Toliara (South)

As a result, the Malagasy people are a blend of both worlds, with people in the south still tending to have a more African look, and the people in the north look more Asian. All the shades of black and brown in between are represented on the island as a result.

My guide from Fianarantsoa, in the mid to mid south

Related Answer

Is Madagascar more developed than most African countries?

Amolo Ng'weno, works at Consulting Answered Jul 29, 2018

In a word, no.

Madagascar is poorer and less developed than most African countries. Its GDP per capita of $400 per year puts it about level with mainland neighbor Mozambique, and far below island neighbors of the Comoros ($770), Mauritius (nearly $10,000).

GDP is not everything, you'll say, and you'll be right. The literacy rate of about 65% is right on the African average. However, what's surprising and unusual is that this rate has been falling at least since 2000 and perhaps much longer (although with some recent gains). I was very surprised to discover that a skill as important as reading could be lost from a population over time.

Madagascar ranks about number 143 (the same as Comoros) in the world happiness index, whereas Mozambique is at about 120 (having fallen sharply in recent years) and Mauritius is at 55.

There are many wonderful things about Madagascar, including its unique culture and astonishing flora and fauna. I highly recommend a trip.

But developed, no.

Ryan Lamont

, Entrepreneur (2011-present)
Answered Feb 10
It's in Africa so African.

You cannot then start classifying Southern Indias as Africans can you?

No African heritage ancestry

Imagine if everyone was counted as African ancestry or black ancestry?

Wow so many diversities

Chenchu women

This was Boa Sr, she was the last speaker of the Bo Language in India. She was also part of an ancient ethnic group, one of the oldest in Asia:

Ancient tribal language becomes extinct as last speaker dies

As ancient people left Africa for Europe and Asia many found places that were very simular to Africa in climate. As a result these people retained their ancient African features, while others adapted in different ways.

She was from the Andaman Islands. Andamanese - Wikipedia. People from the Andaman Islands and Sentinel island are genetically related and carry some of the oldest genetic branches in Asian.

AMERICA
AFRICA
1798 A.D.

Dalles
Algonquin
Powhatan
Shinneco
@Safa Karu
Kootenai
Flathead
Assiniboine
Sioux
Navajo
Aniyunwiy
Quilcene
Chata
Kickapoo
Miniconjo
Lakota
#IndigenousToAmerica

British colonial official with Islamic slave traders in Zanzibar. On the far right is Hamad bin Mohamed bin Jumah bin Rajab bin Mohamed bin Said al-Murghabi, more commonly known as Tippu Tip. He was the most notorious Islamic slaver. al-Murghabi died in 1905.

Okechukwu Favour Ngozi

Niels Faber , lived in Madagascar (2018-2019)

Malagasy ethnic groups (source: Wikipedia)

Well, definitely not Indian. I guess you mean Asian or better Polynesian or African. The answer is both, or neither. The first settlers on the island were Polynesians that settled in the north eastern part of Madagascar.

School kids in Marovoay (north)

Africans later crossed the strait of Mozambique to settle the south western part.

With my neighborhood kids on the block in Toliara (South)

As a result, the Malagasy people are a blend of both worlds, with people in the south still tending to have a more African look, and the people in the north look more As
The Malagasy people are a blend of both worlds, with people in the south still tending to have a more African look, and the people in the north look more Asian. All the shades of black and brown in between are represented on the island as a result.

Related Links

Are people from Madagascar black or Asian?
Why didn't Africans settle Madagascar?
Why do most of the population of Madagascar looks more like Asian than Africans?
How do Africans feel about African Americans?
Does Madagascar have a caste system, with Asians on top and Africans below?
Why are North Africans classified as Caucasian and white?
Which one is Somalia, Arab or African?
What do black Africans think about black Americans, and vice versa?
Are Indians Africans?
How is it rational that Madagascar was discovered by Austronesians from the other..?

Response similaire

Quels sont les animaux endémiques de Madagascar ?

Serge Elia · Suivre Amoureux d'animaux 19 h

Parmi les nombreux animaux endémiques de Madagascar, je cite les suivants :

– Le fossa, le plus grand mammifère carnivore du pays et le seul superprédateur malgache, puisqu'il règne de manière insurpassable et inégalée, bien qu'il soit malheureusement menacé d'extinction à cause des activités humaines.

– Le caméléon-panthère, qui présente des variations de couleurs bien plus nombreuses que tout autre caméléon sur Terre.

– Le gecko à queue plate, dont le corps (de par la couleur et la forme) a évolué pour ressembler sans faille aux feuilles, brindilles, branches, etc.

– L’aye-aye, type de primate nocturne qui possède des yeux élargis, utiles pour localiser ses proies dans la plus sombre des nuits, ainsi que de longs doigts capables d’attraper des insectes bien cachés dans les troncs d’arbres.

– Le shama de Madagascar, une espèce d'oiseau endémique au pays, et que l'on croise un peu partout dans l'île.

– Le boa malgache, une espèce de serpent constricteur qui ne dépasse généralement pas les 2,13 mètres de long.

– Et évidemment, l'immense variété de lémuriens, des animaux uniques mais menacés que l'on ne trouve nulle part ailleurs dans le monde, y compris le maki catta (voir ci-dessus) – sans doute le plus connu d'entre tous.

Questions similaires

Quel est l'animal le plus petit au monde ?
Quels sont les animaux les plus rares ?
Quels sont les animaux qui sont nés suite à un mélange de deux autres animaux ?
Quels sont les animaux les plus incroyables du monde ?
Quels sont les animaux qui n'ont pas de queue ?
Quelles sont les espèces d'oiseaux endémiques dans le monde ?
Quels sont les animaux prédateurs de Nouvelle-Zélande ?
Quel est l'animal le plus laid de la forêt amazonienne ?
Quels sont les animaux Nyctalopes ?
Quelle est la capitale de Madagascar ?
L'île de Madagascar est-elle menacée de désertification ?
Quels animaux sont les plus rapides sur des longues distances ?
Quelles sont les plus incroyables animaux vivants dans les abysses ?
Quels sont les animaux, s'il y en a, que l'on peut trouver sur tous les continents ?
Quelle est la superficie de Madagascar ?

Why are elephants in Thailand so serene, and so aggressive in Madagascar?

Thi H. Nguyen

· Follow Amateur wildlife and conservation enthusiast Updated 2y

Ignoring the fact that they are not native to Madagascar, elephants are NOT serene, neither in Thailand nor anywhere else. Elephants are highly complex, intelligent, social creatures who exhibit a wide range of emotions and behaviors just like we humans do, such as love, pain, empathy, sadness, fear, frustration, excitement, joy, anger, annoyance, confusion, etc. We only see the “serene" side of elephants because it is the only side we don't deny them of their naturally rich inner and outer lives.

Do not listen to any BS about how the Thai people give “cute, docile, intelligent elephants” the respect of a God and this is somehow part of the magic behind their perceived serenity. It is one of the biggest hypocrisies of modern Thai culture that the elephant occupies some revered space within their society. This applies to other Hindu-influenced cultures that make up the Indosphere as well where the elephant is native. In theory, yes, the elephant is the embodiment of a God. In practice, the elephant is a tool exploited for trade and revenue and by and large endures unimaginable abuse in South and Southeast Asia as a result, including Thailand, Laos, Cambodia, Burma, India, and Sri Lanka. Elephants are one of only three mammal groups, including cetaceans and primates, known to be able to recognize themselves in the mirror. They have a mind, a sense of self, a sense of their own existence, and unfortunately a sense of their own suffering at our hands.

Ostensibly serene elephants are raised in captivity and now submit to the presence of humans. They very often have been “trained” in one of several brutal processes designed to “domesticate" them. One of the worst is a process known as phajaan, which literally means “to crush." There is a reason why bullhooks and chains are kept at the ready in Thailand and elsewhere in Asia by people whose job is to subdue these unfortunate beasts who have been robbed of their natural environment and behaviors. Remember this when you engage in popular elephant tourism. That elephant you are riding, that artwork you bought that was “painted" by an elephant, that blessing you received from a temple elephant, it all came with a far bigger price tag than you realize and the elephant is the one who paid dearly for it.

You call it serene; I call it broken.

NOTE: If you were moved by the content of this answer and are concerned with the future of the elephant, please share this answer. Awareness is the strongest weapon against the continued suffering of these magnificent creatures.

Young elephants undergo the cruel phajaan process, so they learn to submit to the will of humans. Half of them never make it out alive.

Note the bullhook resting on the elephant's head to remind it of what will be in store if it doesn't comply.

A chained elephant is being trained here to stand still for hours and hours on end. Note the stick resting upright against the elephant's body. If the stick falls, the elephant will be punished. Elephant bodies were designed to move. They normally walk tens of kilometers daily in search of food and water in the wild.

A bull elephant is kept chained all night. Due to their enormous mass, standing still for extended periods puts extreme stress on their leg and hip joints and foot pads. Captive elephants suffer immense pain from early arthritis and foot rot as a result, yet they are forced to keep working for decades beyond that. Based on the opacity of his eye, this bull is likely blind. Working elephants are often blinded to make them easier to control. He is also severely underweight for an adult bull elephant. He has no belly and his hind quarters are visibly emaciated. His workload will not subside though.

The sharp end of a bullhook being pressed into the sensitive forehead of an elephant as a warning.

An elephant that didn't heed the warnings.

The broken, disfigured body of a female elephant whose spine was horrifically dislocated during a forced breeding attempt, after which she received no medical attention whatsoever. Elephants are forcibly bred in order to produce more captive babies and elephants to feed the various tourist traps and trades.

An elephant is brutally, viciously, and repeatedly beaten in India for what seems to be no reason at all. Moreover, there is no reason that could possibly justify it. Note that the Indian and the Thai elephant are the same species. Also note the nearby raft of oblivious individuals floating by indifferently in the background as the elephant is relentlessly battered.

Why are the people of Madagascar hybrid Bantu, Indonesians?

Franklyn Williamson · Follow Read many books about history and anthropology Thu

They're not hybrid but mixed people of indigenous Bantu tribes and colonial settlers from Indonesia.

This is how some people on Madagascar look. They look Bantu but you can tell their have few Asian DNA.

VAO
Line

Related Links

Why is Madagascar not part of Indonesia when the history, genetics, customs, traditional dances and instruments as well as the Malagasy language are East Indonesian heritage of 3000 years ago?

Why didn't Indonesians adopt Dutch culture, names, ancestry despite of being under the Dutch for 350 years, unlike in the colonization of the Philippines which became Catholic country and adopted Spanish names and some descent after 333 years?

Who are the Bantu people?
What are the major causes of Bantu migration?
Why do Indonesians like to ask the "origin" of fellow Indonesians?
Why was the island of Madagascar not discovered by the Bantu people but rather by Austronesians?

Is there a Shona/Bantu equivalent of hieroglyphics, Nordic runes, or Maori/Polynesian symbols? If so, where can one find such information and their meanings?

What is the history of the Bantu people?
Which groups do Indonesians feel closer to, Malagasy or Polynesian?

My secrets of Africa: Andavadoaka (Madagascar):

Worked in Africa for 3 years

Andavadoaka is a small fishing village located on the southwest coast of Madagascar.

The village sits on the edge of a shallow lagoon protected from the ocean by a bar of coral reefs, which is a vital resource for local artisanal fishing. Due to their isolation, the reefs of Andavadoaka are among the most developed and diverse coral reef systems in the Indian Ocean.

Biodiversity studies have identified several hundred marine species in the waters of the region.

Street artist Julien "Seth" Malland was there!

Andavadoaka, peace and tranquility

Andavadoaka: in 4 on the map

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

A Republic and a larger island state situated in the Indian ocean off the Southeastern coast of Africa. Madagascar is a larger island in the Indian ocean off the Southeastern coast of Africa.

Official title of the state

Repoblikan'i Madagaskara (National)

The Republic of Madagascar and previously known as 'The Malagasy Republic

Flag description: Two equal horizontal bands of red (top) and green with a vertical white band of the same width on hoist side; by tradition, red stands for sovereignty, green for hope, white for purity.

Neighbours

Nearest are:- The Comoros islands and Mozambique, across the Mozambique channel.

Land boundaries; None

Founder of The Nation

Mr. Philbert Tsiranana: its first native prime minister until May, 1959, he then formed the latter Social Democratic Party (PSD), a moderate party, which supported semi-Autonomy for Madagascar from France, when it was decided that Madagascar would receive full independence from France, he candidated for president earlier in May, 1959, to become Madagascar's first head of state at independence in June, 1960.

Local division
6 provinces /Faritany/.

Government type
Republic - semi-presidential

Legislation chamber
Bicameral legislature

Form of State
Republic

President is elected by popular vote for a five-year term.

Prime Minister is appointed by the President. A transitional government headed by High Transitional Authrity, established for a 15 months transition period concluding in general-elections. Consisted of two legislative bodies. The Senate 100 seats, members to be appointed by regional assemblies to serve for four-year terms, and the National Assembly 127 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for four-year terms.

Executive branch Chief of State (President), Head of Government (Prime Minister), Cabinet (Council of Ministers. Temperarily separated by chief of High Transitional Authority and head of transitional Government. President would be elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms, eligible for a second term.

Transitional head of Government to be appointed by the transitional president.

Former Rulers

1960 – 1972 Philibert Tsiranana

1972 – 1975 Gabriel Ramanantsoa

1975 - Richard Ratsimandrava

1975 – 1993 Commander Didier Ratsiraka

1993 – 1996 Professor Albert Zafy

1996 - 1997 Norbert Ratsirahonana

1997 – 2002 Commander Didier Ratsiraka (2nd time)

2002 – 2009 Marc Ravalomanana

2009 – Present Andry Rajoelina (former disk Jockey)

Judicial chamber

Supreme Court; High constitutional court

Capital city

Antananarivo (Tana) Altitude 1276 mtrs/4185 ft.

Geographic coordinates 18.55S , 47.31E. Situated in the centre of the island, in short form "Tana" or in french "Tananarive", length-wise, about 145 (90 miles) away from the eastern coast. Founded as a village in 1625.

Names of main towns

Fianarantsoa, Toamasina, Toliary, Antsiranana, Antsirabe, Mahajunga.

Date of independence

26th June, 1960.

Religions (Major)

Traditional 51%, Christian 41%, Muslims 7%.

Main spoken languages

Malagasy/French (official), English (working).

Currency unit

Malagasy Ariary (MGA) = 100 cents

Area in km2

587,041,00

Country area comparison in Africa

21 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms ;-

Average annual population growth rate 2.993 %

Birth rate 37.89 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 7.97 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 63.26 years

Male 61.27 years ; Female 65.3 years; Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 24, Female: 35

Average per capita income

USD 900

Population density

36/km2

Urban population (%)

30

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishing: 27, Industry: 16, Social service: 57 Main

Export Items

Coffee, vanilla (world producer), cloves, pepper, exotic fruits, chromite, graphite, mica, cattle.

Economy is based on:

Agriculture, Eco-tourism, Fishery.

Climate

Tropical along coast; Temperate in land; Cooler in highlands; Arid in south.

Extremes;-

Lowest point; Indian ocean coast 0 mtr.

Highest point; Maromokotro 2,876 mtrs.

Weather of the Capital city (Antananarivo) average annual temperature 16.6oC.

Altitude 127 mtrs/4185 ft

Hottest Month

December 16 – 27oc.

Coldest Month

July 9 – 20oc.

Driest Month

June 8mm average Rf.

Wettest Month January 300mm average Rf.

Measures
Metric system.

Time zone
3 hours ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays
29 March (patriots day), 26 June (Independence day), All Roman Catholic holidays.

Ethnic groups
Merina 26%, Betsileos 12%, Batsimisaraka 15%, Tsimihety 7%, Sakalava over 6%, Antaisaka 5%, Antandroy 5%, Cotiers (mixed African races), others 18 Malayo-Indonesian tribes with Arabs presence.

Topographic & Environmental concern
Narrow coastal plain, high plateau and mountains in centre. Humid coastal strip in the E. fertile valleys in the mountains plateau region and a wider coastal strip on the W. Environment: soil erosion results from deforestation and overgrazing; desertification; surface water contaminated with raw sewage and other organic wastes; several endangered species of flora and fauna unique to the island

Economy Overview

Industry
Eco-tourism, light industries, meat processing, sea foods, consumer goods, breweries, tanneries, sugar, textiles, glasswares, cement, auto - assembly plant, paper mill, petrol.

Chief crops

Coffee (over 50 % of exports), cloves, vanilla, rice, sugarcane, sisal, tobacco, peanuts, bananas : livestock products.

Natural resources

Chromium, Graphite, Coal, Bauxite, Salt, Quartz, Tar-sands, semi-precious stones, Mica, Fish, Hydro-power.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 5

Grassland: 57

Forest woods: 27

Other: 11

Marine:

Coastline; All round 4,828 km.

Commercial Sea ports:-

Toamasina, Mahajunga, AntSiranana, Toliari.

Development prospect;-

Tourism, a usually reliable source of foreign exchange, has faltered but tourism minister Rina Andriamandavy predicted that 2011 levels would rise to those of pre-crisis levels, when income from visitors amounted to $430m. Mining provides the best long-term prospects for higher government revenue. Reduced aid flows and trade sanctions have strangled the textiles sector, and the country is failing as a tourist destination. Mines hold the best promise Much will now hang on how the international community regards the transition. Madagascar has been feeling the effects of a severe squeeze in external aid, imposed since the March 2009 military putsch that installed the HAT regime. The US also imposed trade sanctions that have badly hurt the textile export industry, one of the country's largest employers. Worried by a rise in poverty, donors have tried to keep funding basic social services by making payments that bypass the treasury, but this has not prevented a gradual contraction of incomes and services. Real GDP has been virtually stagnant in 2011, with growth at a mere 1 per cent, but the forecast for 2012 is a more optimistic 4.7 per cent. Sherritt International's huge Ambatovy nickel mine is set to begin production in the first quarter of 2012 with capacity for 60,000tn of nickel and 5,600tn of cobalt. Partially out of fear that investors would be wary of the country's political instability, the mining ministry called off an auction of 225 oil licences in March, 2012. Madagascar Oil's heavy oil project at Tsimiroro and Total's at Bemolanga are not due to begin production until 2015 and 2019 respectively. Avana Petroleum hopes to list on London's Alternative Investment Market in 2012 so that it can raise the funds for its Sambaina shale oil field and other East African properties.

Top 24 Richest And Poorest Countries Of Africa – 2020 Edition

By Stephanie Rheingold Last updated Oct 23, 2021

Madagascar

Credit: @Madagascar Tourism

Despite the potential and growing interest in Madagascar as a thriving tourist destination, tourism in Madagascar remains underdeveloped, with few visitors each year in comparison to its neighboring countries. People are intrigued mostly by the unique forests and habitats. The government continues to attempt developing the tourism industry, but it’s still a huge work in progress.

Apart from tourism, Madagascar bases most of its economy on agriculture, textile and mining industries. The population of Madagascar is 27.69 million, its GDP stands at $12.73 billion and its per capita GDP is $470.67.

Those in charge continue to work on developing a capital market that sticks. Government corruption has always hurt the business environment in the country, so until that is fixed, Madagascar will continue to struggle.

Nominal GDP Rank: #28

Nominal GDP Per Capita Rank: #50

Are Malagasy people more African or Austronesian?

Françoise Marie

Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University1y

Madagascar is more African than Austronesian for the following reasons:

1. Location: Madagascar is an African island;
2. Earliest settlers: Madagascar was first settled by people from Africa known as the Wazimba; they were described as diminutive Blacks of either Pygmy or San ancestry;
3. Level of African ancestry: They are of 60% of African ancestry;
4. Geopolitics: Madagascar is a member state of the African Union;
5. Africa is a continent of many "races" and ethnic groups: The Merina of Madagascar have lookalikes in Indonesia. They are still Africans as they are listed among the ethnic groups of Africa.

Truth be told, many Merina feel Austronesian first and foremost. They are only "geographically" Africans.

The Dark And Beautiful History Of Madagascar's Malagasy People |The Pan-African Alliance

The people of Madagascar carry their history in their blood. Collectively known as the Malagasy, the island nation is a diverse mixture of races and cultures from all over Africa and Asia.

Genomic Analysis Sheds Light on Diversity of Malagasy People of Madagascar

The genome-wide SNP data likewise indicated that Southeast Asian and East African Bantu groups contributed to the genetic makeup of the Malagasy people. On average, the researchers reported that the Malagasy population is about 60 percent African, 36 percent East Asian, and 4 percent West Eurasian.

Though an identical-by-descent analysis, Letellier and his colleagues found that Bantu and Indonesian populations — particularly Indonesian populations from south Borneo — shared many large fragments with Malagasy people.

Still, the genomic diversity of the Malagasy people varied by geography, as Asian ancestry was higher in the central highlands of the island and African ancestry was higher in the north and along the coast. In particular, maternal African lineages were more common in northern Madagascar, while maternal Asian lineages were more common in southern and central Madagascar. At the same time, paternal Asian lineages were less frequent than paternal African lineages, and paternal African lineages were present mainly on the coast and in the north.

Additional analyses indicated that each of the Malagasy genetic groups has the same origin and all diverge from southern Borneo and Bantu populations. The researchers dated the split between the Borneo and Malagasy populations to have occurred some 2,000 years to 3,000 years ago and the split between Bantu and Malagasy people took place about 1,500 years ago.

The island of Madagascar was first settled by the Wazimba, Africans. They were not Asians. The earliest inhabitants of Madagascar were described as “diminutive people” similar to the pygmies. The Bantu arrived later. Actually, the Bantu from the East African coast reached Madagascar before the Austronesians.

Where is Madagascar? Republic of Madagascar: history, sights, interesting facts

The first inhabitants of the island

We suggest you first get acquainted with the storyan interesting country like the Republic of Madagascar. Interesting facts about this island nation are numerous. We will focus only on the most important events from the history of its settlement.

According to myths, migrants from Africa were the first inhabitants of Madagascar. They are known as Mikea, or Wazimba Pygmy.

Humans Lived in Madagascar 6,000 Years Earlier Than Previously Thought

Ingicco says this finding makes sense from a genetic perspective. The presence of Bantu people (i.e. sub-Saharan Africans) in Madagascar prior to the arrival of Austronesian-speaking people to the island some 2,000 years ago (they sailed on boats from southeast Asia), is consistent with genetic evidence. “This study is the archaeological evidence one would have been waiting for,” said Ingicco.

Saito Takashi

.
Follow
japanese student, loves historyUpdated 1y

Related
Japanese and Malay/Indonesian people can look similar. Can there be some shared DNA or genetics?

Yes, we occasionally look similar.

Japanese and Malay/Indonesian people are both East-Eurasians. So genetically we are already closely related. (Japanese are closest to modern Koreans and northern Chinese thought.)

Malay/Indonesian:

Japanese:

Generally, people of East Asia, Southeast Asia, Siberia, and some other regions, even Native Americans, can look quite similar and are genetically closely related.

This is called the “Mongoloid race”. Westerners often simply say “Asian”. But this is incorrect, as Asia also includes Indians and Arabs, which actually look closer to Europeans.

Here is a quote from jp.wiki:

モンゴロイドは、東アジア（北アジア及びチベット高原を含む）・東南アジアを中心に、中央アジア・南北アメリカ大陸・太平洋諸島及びアフリカ近辺のマダガスカル島に分布する。
Translation:

“Mongoloid race is found natively in East Asia, Southeast Asia, Siberia, America, Pacific, and most parts of Central Asia, also Madagascar/Africa.”
Genetic studies revealed a close genetic relation between these populations and that they can be clearly distinguished from other populations (e.g. Africans or Europeans or Indians.) Even Native Americans. I heard that Native people in Latin America are often called Chinese “Cinos” or something like that.

I personally think that many Native Americans often look like Siberian and Southeast Asians. The Dayak of Indonesia look identical to Amazon forest natives.

Complete genome analysis reveals the distribution of the Mongoloid race in modern world. Its East-Eurasian lineages and genome.

Very interesting also to say is O1b distribution common among Japan/Korea and Cambodia/Vietnam as well as Indonesia.

I did take testing. I am O2a1c myself, it is common.

Southeast Asians, East Asians, Siberians, Central Asians, Native Americans, Polynesians and Malagasy are very closely genetically. It is clearly distinguishable from Africans or Europeans or Indians. Anthropologically Mongoloid is indistinguishable from each other, but very different from Negroid or Caucasoid. Forensic experts can reveal the race/ancestry of a skull to 95% correctness. It is amazing.

Thus Japanese and Malay/Indonesian appear very similar, but we are often still able to tell from which region a person is.

Some graphics:

Kazakh - Central Asia

Khmer - Cambodia

Dayak - Indonesia

Native American - Canada

Kalmyk - Russia

Tibeto-Burmese - India

Malay - Malaysia

Mongol - Mongolia

Malay - Malaysia

Okinawan - Japan

Ulch - Russia/Northeast Asia

Paleolithic ancient Asian

Ural tribal - Russia

Altai tribe - Russia

Northeast India tribe - India

Sakha Yaku - Russia/Siberia

Thai - China (southern)

Uzbek - Uzbekistan

Japanese - Japan

Southeast Asians and East Asians are very closely related. Thus many look similar and have similar traits. Like in a family, you have people which resemble each other.

I hope this helps.

If you like my answer please upvote or comment, thank you!

Related Links

How is it rational that Madagascar was discovered by Austronesians from the other side of the world and not by Africans even though it was beneath their nose for 100,000 years?

How Austronesian are the Malagasy (genotype), given that they seem black (phenotype)?

Are people from Madagascar black or Asian?

Genetic analysis of Malagasy people have shown that the island of Madagascar was settled by Austronesians from Indonesia approximately 1,200 years ago. What is known about this migration and have any cultural survive in Malagasy culture to this day?

Are the Negritos related to Sub-Saharan Africans?

What happened to the original Austronesian settlers who first arrived in Madagascar?

Why do most of the population of Madagascar looks more like Asian than Africans?

What do Indonesians think about Madagascar?

The island of Madagascar was first settled by Asians, not Africans. Is there any racism Malagasy society?

Does Madagascar have a caste system, with Asians on top and Africans below?

Madagascar is the world's oldest island. Scientists say it has been isolated for about 80 million years.

Yussif Issah Oyen

OTC Drugs Seller at Pharmaceuticals (2013–present)Jun 20

They say it broke away from Africa 165 million years ago, then from India 100 million years later.

A study states that people first settled in the country 1,200 years ago.

Are the original inhabitants of Madagascar Africans?

Ryan Lamont

.
Follow
Entrepreneur (2011–present)Jun 29

Madagascar is in Africa, yes? So what foreign peoples would have mysteriously migrated there from who knows where before the migration southward from the cradle?

Please use some common sense.

No one on the planet are as old or older than Africans.

These are basically the same people with various admixtures from various migration waves.

Africa is the most diverse indigenous peoples on the planet.

Yet they are also part of the foundation of many outside of Africa all over the planet and I'm not speaking about the idiocy of slavery causing all these black admixed people many were not even involved in slavery

Somalia
Kenya
Nigerian Ghana
ozambique
Jamaica
Angola
Gambia
IG: @JacobMason11

uilcene
Chata
Kickapoo
Miniconj
Lakota
#IndigenousToAmeric

AMERICA
AFRICA
alles
Algonquin
Powhatan
Shinneco
@Safa Karu
Kootenai
Flathead
Assiniboine
Sioux
Navajo
Aniyunwiy

Related Links

Why didn't Africans settle Madagascar?

Is there racism on Madagascar, Black African vs. Asians?

Why do most of the population of Madagascar looks more like Asian than Africans?

How did the ancestors of proto-Malagasy in South Borneo reach Madagascar? The Malagasy, the original inhabitants of Madagascar, are of both African and Asian ancestry.

Is Madagascar still separating from Africa?

Are people from Madagascar black or Asian?

Who are the original inhabitants of Africa?

How does one classify Madagascar, Indian or African?

Why is Madagascar considered an African country?

What are the original inhabitants of Greenland called?

MALAWI

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

Early human inhabitants of what is now Malawi date to 8000–2000 BC Bantu-speaking peoples migrated there between the 1st and 4th centuries AD. Malawi takes its current name from the Maravi (which means 'rays of light') empire which developed on the shore of Lake Malawi in the 16th and 17th centuries. In the 19th century Maravi was devastated by the arrival of Nguni invaders from the south, and Muslim slavers from the east, leading to the establishment of the British Protectorate of Nyasaland at the end of the 19th century. Christian missions, inspired by Livingstone's appeal to end the slave-trade, played a key role in promoting British intervention. Apart from local initiatives - most notably by John Chilembwe, an evangelical Christian minister (and national hero), in 1914 - there was little resistance to colonial rule until the 1950s when there were widespread protests against the unpopular Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. He quickly adopted an autocratic style, leading to ministerial rebellions in the 1960s, which in turn led to further repression. He also adopted a policy of détente with the remaining white-ruled states in southern Africa and, in contrast with the governments of Tanzania, Zambia and (after 1975) Mozambique, took a staunchly capitalist and pro-Western line. In the climate of the Cold War donors were prepared to tolerate his domestic idiosyncrasies, especially since - again in contrast to his neighbours - he managed an effective economy in one of the poorest countries in the world. But with the collapse of communism, the props both domestic and international were kicked away. Under donor and popular pressure, as well as feeling the effects of age (he was at least 90), he conceded multi-party democracy in 1993.

Formerly known as Nyasaland

The culture is mainly indigenous mixed with European aspects

Former British protectorate of Nyasaland

The colonies of Northern and Southern Rhodesia (now Zambia & Zimbabwe) and the Nyasaland federation (now Malawi) formed the central African federation in 1951-3 which that was dissolved in 1963.

In February, 1963 Dr. Hastigs Banda was formally appointed as prime minister of then Nyasaland, and led the country to independence as Malawi, that renamed when it achieved full independence in 6th July, 1964, a year later, in July, 1966, declared itself a Republic. In 1971, Dr. Hastings Banda known as "Kamuzu" meaning for "the Lion", became founder-president of the nation, he consolidated power and later to declare Malawi a one-party state under the Malawi Congress Party (MCP), and designated himself "President for life of Malawi" and ruled Malawi further. In 1993, facing international pressure and widespread protest, a referendum ended his one-party rule and a special assembly stripped him of his title. Dr. Kamuzu Banda ran for presidency in the democratic elections of May, 1994, but unsuccessfully defeated.

Headship since independence; Head of instrumental self-administration A Republic in South central Africa.

The area now known as Malawi was settled by Bantu speaking people migrated b/n first and the fourth century AD, formerly known as "Nyasaland" meaning for "the land of lakes". Britain established colonial authority in 1891 and the Area became known as Nyasaland in 1907. The colonies of Northern and Southern Rhodesia (now Zambia & Zimbabwe) and the Nyasaland federation formed the central African federation in 1951-3 which that was dissolved in 1963. He was the leader of Malawi and it's predecessor state Nyasaland from 1961 to 1994, after receiving much of his education overseas returned to home country, then the British Nyasaland to speak against colonialism and advocated for independence. In February, 1963 Dr. Hastigs Banda was formally appointed as prime minister of then Nyasaland, and led the country to independence as Malawi, that renamed when it achieved full independence in July, 1964, a year later, in July, 1966, declared itself a republic. In 1971, Dr. Hastings Banda known as "Kamuzu" meaning for "the Lion", became founder-president of the nation, he consolidated power and later to declare Malawi a one-party state under the Malawi Congress Party (MCP), and soon to become "President for Life". He improved the country's infrastructure, and maintained a good educational system relative to other African countries. However, he presided over one of the most repressive regimes in Africa, he also faced sharp criticism for maintaining full diplomatic relations with apartheid-South Africa. "I would have to deal even with devil, if that could meet the interest of my people" responded to critics of his government regarding on why he secretly visited apartheid-South Africa in the early, 1980s. Dr. Hastings Kamuzu Banda designated himself "President for life of Malawi" and ruled Malawi further, in 1993, facing international pressure and widespread protest, a referendum ended his one-party rule and a special assembly stripped him of his title. Dr. Kamuzu Banda ran for presidency in the democratic elections of May, 1994 but unsuccessfully defeated.

A provisional constitution came into full effect followed the multi-party elections of May, 1994, that brought Mr. Bakili Muluzi, an unknown person to Malawi politics who came up to lead the United Democratic Front (UDF) after leaving the Malawi Congress Party (MCP), was the candidate of the opposition UDF in the May, 1994 presidential elections, Malawi's first multi-party election, and he won the election with 47 % of the vote, defeating Malawi's leader since independence, sworn into office as second president, replacing the last oldest African president for his inability to lead Malawi, who he died in a Clinic in South Africa in 1997. Mr. Bakili Muluzi was reelected in June, 1999, having secured 52.4 % of the vote, he stepped aside in 2004 after serving as president for ten years, then the current president Mr. Bigu-Wa-Mutharika elected to office after a failed attempt by the previous president to amend the constitution to permit another term. Mr. Bingu-wa-Mutharika is heading Malawi as 3rd president of the republic since 24th May, 2004, was re-elected to a second term in May, 2009. Former president Mr. Bakili Muluzi was arrested and released on bail on later times on several occasions on fraud and corruption charges. It is not clear if the incumbent president would be eligible to stand for contest again as the constitution bans a president from more than two consecutive terms.

Side note;-Malawi's new leader Mrs. Joyce Hilda Banda has sacked her foreign minister, Peter Mutharika, the brother of the late president who recently died in office as to solve the problems she has inherited from the late president Bingu wa Mutharika in next two years leading up to the 2014 general elections. Peter Mutharika had been anointed as heir-apparent for the 2014 elections when Bingu wa Mutharika was due to retire. The dramatic cabinet reshuffle comes days after the burial of the former president at his farm on Monday. Mrs. Banda had been vice-president since 2009 but later fellout with the president and became a fierce critic. She was forced to resign from his Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) in 2010 when she refused to endorse his choice of Peter Mutharika to succeed him, but Mr. Mutharika had no choice but to retain her as vice-president since she was elected in 2009 as his running mate. In the wake of Mr. Bingu Wa Mutharika's death on 5th April, 2012 there had been concerns that allies of the foreign minister would try to stop the constitutional transfer of power to Mrs. Joyce Banda, who had set up her own political party. Mrs. Joyce Banda, hitherto Malawi's vice president, was finally sworn in on 7th of April, as Bingu wa Mutharika's constitutionally required successor.

Mr. Bingu wa Mutharika died of a heart attack on 5th April, 2012. Mr. Mutharika was born Ryson Webster Thom in 1934, in Malawi's Thylo district. Hechanged his name first to Bingu Mutharika to demonstrate his pro-African sentiment. Mr. Bingu wa Mutharika who died in hospital recently after having a cardiac arrest, had nursed ambitions of ruling Malawi since the dictatorship of Hastings Kamuzu Banda began to unravel in 1993. Mr. Mutharika unsuccessfully ran for the presidency in the 1999 presidential elections and then ran as presidential candidate in 2004, his ambition was realised after five years when president Bakili Muluzi failed in his bid to be allowed a third term. This time Mutharika won the election later he won a second term, with a resounding victory. In 2011, as people struggled with rising food prices and fuel shortages, frustration and anger spilled over into the streets and the country experienced some of the worst riots in its history. At least 19 people were killed when police used live bullets. Mr. Mutharika, a church-going Catholic, had four grown-up children by his Zimbabwean wife, Ethel, who died in May 2007.

Side note: President Joyce Hilde Banda has said she wants Malawi to overturn its ban on homosexual acts, the first African country to do so since 1994. Two Malawian men were sentenced to 14 years in prison in 2010 after saying they were getting married. Several Western leaders have recently said they would cut aid to countries which did not recognize gay rights. Mrs. Joyce Banda took power after her predecessor, Bingu wa Mutharika, died of a heart attack.

Accession to power of presdent Mrs. Joyce Hilde Banda: by nomination.

Tentative election calendar Presidential, May.

Malawi – Timeline Diaries updates and related key notes:

1480 - Bantu tribes unite several smaller political states to form the Maravi Confederacy which at its height includes large parts of present-day Zambia and Mozambique plus the modern state of Malawi.

17th century - Portuguese explorers arrive from the east coast of present-day Mozambique.

1790-1860 - Slave trade increases dramatically.

1850 - Scottish missionary David Livingstone's exploration of the region paves the way for missionaries, European adventurers, traders.

1878 - Livingstonia Central African Mission Company from Scotland begins work to develop a river route into Central Africa to enable trade.

1891 - Britain establishes the Nyasaland and District Protectorate.

1893 - Name is changed to the British Central African Protectorate. White European settlers are offered land for coffee plantations at very low prices. Tax incentives force Africans to work on these plantations for several months a year, often in difficult conditions.

1907 - British Central African Protectorate becomes Nyasaland.

1915 - Reverend John Chilembwe leads a revolt against British rule, killing the white managers of a particularly brutal estate and displaying the head of one outside his church. He is shot dead by police within days.

1944 - Nationalists establish the Nyasaland African Congress.

October 23, 1953 - Despite strong opposition from the Nyasaland African Congress and white liberal activists, Britain combines Nyasaland with the Federation of Northern and Southern Rhodesia (now Zambia and Zimbabwe respectively).

1958 – Dr. Hastings Banda, "the black messiah", denounces the federation and returns from the US and the UK, where he has been studying, to lead the Nyasaland African Congress.

1959 - Violent clashes between the Congress supporters and the colonial authorities lead to the banning of the organisation. Many leaders, including Mr. Banda, are arrested and a state of emergency is declared.

Malawi Congress Party is founded as a successor to the Nyasaland African Congress.

1960 – Hastings Banda is released from Gwelo prison and attends talks in London with the British government on constitutional reform.

1961 - Elections held for a new Legislative Assembly. Kamuzu Banda's Malawi Congress Party wins 94% of the vote.

1963 - Territory is granted self-government as Nyasaland and Hastings Kamuzu Banda appointed prime minister.

July 6, 1964 - Nyasaland declares independence as Malawi.

July 6, 1966 – Hastings Banda becomes president of the Republic of Malawi. The constitution establishes a one-party state. Opposition movements are suppressed and their leaders are detained. Foreign governments and organisations raise concerns about human rights.

1971 – Hastings Banda (Kamuzu) is voted president-for-life.

1975 - Lilongwe replaces Zomba as Malawian capital.

1978 - First elections since independence. All potential candidates must belong to the Malawi Congress Party and be approved by Banda. He excludes many of them by submitting them to an English test.

1980s - Several ministers and politicians are killed or charged with treason. President Hastings Banda reshuffles his ministers regularly, preventing the emergence of a political rival.

1992 - Catholic bishops publicly condemn Hastings Banda, sparking demonstrations. Many donor countries suspend aid over Malawi's human rights record.

1993 - President Hastings Banda (Kamuzu) becomes seriously ill.

Voters in a referendum reject the one-party state, paving the way for members of parties other than the Malawi Congress Party to hold office.

1994 - Presidential and municipal elections: Bakili Muluzi, leader of the United Democratic Front, is elected president. He immediately frees political prisoners and re-establishes freedom of speech.

Banda announces his retirement from politics.

1997 - Banda dies in hospital in South Africa where he is being treated for pneumonia.

1999 - President Muluzi is re-elected for a second and final five-year term.

October 30, 1999: Malawi, which has a military of about 5,000 men (all volunteers), has announced that it will now allow women to volunteer for military service.--Stephen V Cole

October 30, 1999: Cambodia has established an elite 52-man airborne unit. Cambodian officers said that South Korea had provided training and funds to create the unit.--Stephen V Cole

In 2000 the World Bank says it will cancel 50% of Malawi's foreign debt.

March 9, 2005 AIDS in Africa is devastating the armed forces of many countries there. Probably the worst case is Malawi. Although the country has a population of eleven million, it cannot find enough volunteers free of AIDs to keep their 5,000 man armed forces up to strength. Currently, over 40 percent of those in the armed forces are HIV positive. This problem goes beyond the borders of the nations affected. The UN is trying to get more African nations involved in peacekeeping operations. Most of these operations are currently in Africa, and African peacekeepers are, naturally, better suited for peacekeeping in their own backyard. Although the UN pays the peacekeepers far more than the troops usually make, the UN also insists that all peacekeepers be HIV free. This severely limits how many of their troops most African nations can send. Also, despite efforts to get the troops to use condoms, or be careful where they stick it, HIV rates in the military continue to climb. James Dunnigan

October 23, 2005: Starvation in southern Africa is leading to a peacekeeper crises. A protracted drought has seriously reduced crops yields in several countries in southern Africa. Mozambique, Lesotho, Swaziland, Zambia, Malawi, and Zimbabwe, are all affected. In Malawi and Zimbabwe, the problem has been exacerbated by serious political mismanagement and turmoil. The U.N. World Food Program has embarked on a fund raising program, having estimated that by Spring of 2006, some $200 million worth of aid will be required to avert famine in some areas. The results, however, have been poor, since the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, plus recent remarkable series of disasters - the December 2004 tsunami, several severe hurricanes in the Caribbean and Gulf of Mexico, Central America, and recent earthquakes in Asia, have already resulted in enormous outpouring of international aid, which has left few of the world?s traditional donor nations - notably the U.S., western Europe, and Japan - with much left to give.

As a result, the possibility of widespread famine looms over the region. Since several of the countries involved are beset of significant political turmoil or have only recently emerged from civil war, there is a great danger that this may lead to a revival of widespread disorders.

In this regard it is worth noting that South Africa, which is not affected by the drought and expects bumper crops this year, is committed to supporting the U.N. effort to get food to the stricken area, and is also restructuring its armed forces to serve more frequently as peacekeepers. The growing unrest to the north could mean even greater demands on South Africa for peacekeeping troops. The South Africans are regarded as the best trained and disciplined troops in Africa, and are eagerly sought after as peacekeepers. But the South Africans have limited resources, and there is already popular resistance to sending more peacekeeping troops north.

November 10, 2005: The most critical problem in peacekeeping today is a serious shortage of troops suited to peacekeeping. Many of the nations that have traditionally supported peace operations, such as Western European and Scandinavian countries, as well as India and Pakistan, are already committed heavily in missions such as Afghanistan, Iraq, Bosnia, Kosovo, Haiti, Democratic Republic of Congo, and so forth. This shortage of qualified personnel has led to a lowering of standards, and is one reason for recent incidents in which peacekeepers have been found abusing they people they're supposed to be helping.

In recent decades, most peacekeeping operations have been in Africa, where currently nearly 80-percent of U.N. peacekeepers (some 75,000 troops) are deployed, as well as thousands more troops engaged in peacekeeping under the aegis of regional organizations such as ECOWAS (Economic Community of West African States). In 1997, a time when the demand for peacekeepers were particularly high, the U.S. developed the African Crisis Response Initiative (ACRI) to train African troops for peace operations. In 2001 this was restructured as the African Capacity for Peace Operations (ACOTA) Program.

Administered by the State Department in cooperation with the Defense Department, ACOTA is intend to provide African armed forces with:

Training & equipment to permit them to respond to peace support and complex humanitarian relief missions

Building enhance business African peace support training capacity

Developing effective command and control capabilities

Promoting commonality and interoperability with "First World" peacekeeping forces

Enhancing international and regional peace support capacity

Rather than a "one size fits all" approach, an attempt is made to tailor ACOTA programs to "nation-specific" needs. In this way trainers can focus on the most critical needs of each particular army.
The ACOTA program has been very successful. The program has resulting in the training of some 17,000 troops from nine African countries (Benin, Botswana, Ethiopia, Ghana, Kenya, Malawi, Mali, Mozambique, and Senegal).

ACOTA does not operate in countries with internal security problems, to avoid the appearance of training government forces against local unrest. As a result, over the years ACOTA support to a number of countries has been terminated, such as Ivory Coast.

Naturally, some aspects of the program are pretty standard. For example, all of the recipient nations are likely to receive uniforms, communications equipment, GPS systems, generators and portable electrical systems, water purifiers, and so forth. Normally, ACOTA does not provide weaponry or vehicles, except in very specific circumstances.

November 15, 2006: France has agreed to create an elite military unit for the southern African nation of Malawi. To this end, 80 Malawi soldiers will be trained as paratroopers, and a transport aircraft will be given to Malawi for their new airborne force. France has also provided new navigation equipment for other Malawi military aircraft, and upgraded the control tower at the nations main airport. Malawi is one of the poorest countries in Africa. It's 13 million people are poorly educated and ruled by a pro-Western elected government. But it's basically a one party state. The Malawi paratroopers will give the government some competent muscle for use against any minor threats. France has been working to build stronger relationships with Malawi for the last few years.

January 23, 2007: Ethiopia began moving some of its troops back to Ethiopia. Truckloads of troops could be seen moving off towards the Ethiopian border. Meanwhile, some Ethiopian troops were still fighting remnants of the Islamic Courts, which include dozens of foreign Islamic radicals. Another American air strike was involved in these.

January 24, 2007: The Transitional Government says it is now in control of the entire country. Sheikh Sharif Ahmad, the chief financial official of the Islamic courts is under arrest in Kenya, and the Transitional Government in Somalia wants him. Ahmad was arrested three days ago, as he tried to enter Kenya and seek asylum. Meanwhile, in Mogadishu, clans opposed to the Transitional Government supported violence against Ethiopian troops. This consisted of a few mortar shells fired at the airport, and some shots fired at Ethiopian troops. At least one Ethiopian soldier was killed in the last two days. The Ethiopians fire back, and several of the attackes have been killed.

January 27, 2007: Kenya continues to arrest Islamic Courts officials at the border, or inside Kenya. Over 4,000 Somalis are stalled at the border, with Kenya refusing to let them enter. In the last year, Kenya has accepted over Somali 50,000 refugees, and does not want the Islamic Courts setting up shop in those refugee camps. If that happened, the camps would become bases for a guerilla war in Somalia, and Kenya would be in the middle of it. U.S. Special Forces troops have been spotted in Kenya and Somalia. In Kenya they usually wear civilian clothes. The U.S. commandos are trying to round up as many Islamic radicals as possible.

January 28, 2007: A third of Ethiopias troops in Somalia have been withdrawn. Ethiopia appears determined to get out as quickly as possible. The Ethiopians have told the Transitional Government that, if the Islamic Courts regain control of the country, the Ethiopian army will come in again. But that, and some military advisors and trainers, is as far as the Ethiopians will go in helping the Transitional Government.

January 29, 2007: Uganda, Nigeria and Malawi have agreed to send peacekeepers to Somalia, but Rwanda and South Africa have refused. The African Union (AU) is trying to get 8,000 peacekeepers into Somalia, to replace the same number of Ethiopian troops. So far, the AU has commitments for only 4,000 troops, and even those donor nations are reluctant to move into Somalia, and the violence so typical of that place.

January 30, 2007: In Mogadishu, the battle for control of the city continues, as it has since the early 1990s. Those clans that sided with the Islamic Courts are now on the outs, and are believed to be supplying the gunmen who are firing at policemen, and police stations. A few mortar shells have been fired into residential areas. This sort of thing will go on until one side or the other sufficiently intimidates the other to halt the violence. That kind of peace usually doesn't last long. It's basically gang warfare, with the gangs fighting over control of territory. The businesses in that territory pay protection money. The Islamic Courts were popular because they just took the money, and did not allow their gunmen to freely engage in petty theft and rape within those territories. The clan chiefs and gang leaders often allowed that sort of misbehavior because it saved them money (they could pay their gunmen less).

March 27, 2007: LRA guerrillas have left south Sudan and returned to bases in the Congo (Democratic Republic of Congo), apparently inside Garamba National Park.

An army commando unit ambushed a group of Allied Democratic Forces (ADF) rebels in western Uganda. The ADF force was trying to infiltrate from the Congo. Four ADF rebels died in the firefight. The Ugandan troops had been pursuing ADF rebels since mid-March and have killed 61 ADF rebels during that period. The army had been blocking infiltration routes along the Semliki River. This "quiet offensive" hasbeen very successful, although it is very tough to confirm the numbers. However, in March, Uganda sent the Congolese government and UN representatives of MONUC (UN peacekeepers in the Congo) a number of messages about ADF infiltration. MONUC had promised to take action against the guerrilla groups.

April 2, 2007: At least18 people died in a "tribal clash" in northeast Uganda. The violence was sparked by a cattle raid, which is all too common in the area. ApparentlyJie tribesmen attackedBokora tribesman. The Jie claimed the Bokora had stolen over 400 head of cattle. Thegunbattle lasted six hours, and only ended when a Ugandan Army helicopter gunship arrived in the area.

April 3, 2007: Mozambique and South Africa have joined Kenya as new sponsors of the Uganda-LRA peace talks. The government of South Sudan had been encouraging other African countries to use their diplomatic influence to keep the peace process going. The three governments will likely send mediation teams to Juba, Sudan, when peace talks reconvene on April 13.

April 4, 2007: The National Mine Action Program is now in full operation in northern Uganda. From February 9 to April 2, the de-mining teams in northern Uganda had removed over 200 land mines and unexploded ordnance. The unexploded ordnance includes RPG rockets and hand grenades.

April 8, 2007: Families of Ugandan peacekeepers killedin Somalia will receive a death benefit of approximately $50,000 from the African Union. This is an enormous sum for the average Ugandan.The AU is paying for the peacekeeping operation. Uganda has around 1600 troops in Somalia, and is, at the moment,the only AU force in Somalia. Malawi and Ghana have agreed to send troops. Burundi has promised 1700. Nigeria has promised 850 soldiers.

June 1, 2007: Many Ugandans are wondering why other African Union states have failed to deploy peacekeepers in Somalia. Early on, Burundi and Nigeria promised to send troops; Ghana and Malawi later said they would send contingents. The mission's high degree of difficulty may be one reason; the nations may not want to get into street fighting in Mogadishu. Some Ugandans are speculating that Uganda should have coordinated with other African nations before quickly committing to send troops. The number of disgruntled voices in Uganda is increasing. Opposition parties are describing the Ugandan deployment as "another Iraq."

June 5, 2007: The LRA will have an additional three weeks to move its fighters to the Ri-Kwangba assembly area in Sudan, and the LRA had agreed to make the move. Meanwhile, Sudanese reports of LRA rebels marauding in south Sudan continue to crop up. The South Sudan government wants the Ugandan war settled so that it can get on with its own developmental programs.

June 8, 2007: Due to pressure from the business community, the government is considering opening an embassy in Somalia. Trade and business development are two major reasons.

June 10, 2007: For several years the Ugandan government has had a "weapons turn-in" program in the Karamoja tribal region (northeastern Uganda). The Karamoja are cattle herders who occasionally engage in smuggling and raiding. Many tribal warriors acquired cheap automatic weapons, which made their raids a lot more deadly than when all that was used was spears and bows.. Uganda's program has had mixed successes, mainly because the government did not keep pace with the rising price of weapons. As recently as three years ago an AK-47 sold for around $200, which is a lot of money in that part of Africa. Now AK-47s sell for between $500 and $600. So the government will offer more money for weapons. Meanwhile, the guys with guns have turned their attention from rustling to hijacking, and convoys carrying food are being ambushed with greater frequency. The region has been suffering from a drought and more and more people are depending on outside food aid. Food is always a useful commodity, but in an area afflicted by starvation it is a precious commodity. This could be an indication of even more trouble in northeastern Uganda.

June 10, 2007: Spain is rapidly becoming a major weapons exporting nation. Last year, Spanish defense sales were $1.1 billion, compared to a year earlier, when they were only $545 million. Currently, about $50 billion worth of weapons are exported each year by all arms producing nations. The top five arms exporting nations are the U.S., Russia, Britain, France and Israel, and they account for about two-thirds of those export (with American exports being about three times those of Israel). Most of Spains exports are warships (surface ships and subs).

July 15, 2007: About 60 percent of the 1,325 delegates (clan elders and warlords) have arrived in Mogadishu for peace talks.

July 16, 2007: Various factions continue to fight for control of the Bakara market, and merchants are beginning to leave for other parts of the city. The local clans and Islamic Courts are not strong enough to fight the government troops (from clans outside the city) or Ethiopians, so they use human shields from which to fire off a few shots or throw a grenade. The return fire usually hits the civilians, as the perpetrator quickly moves away. The local clans would rather see the Bakara market shut down, than concede control to outsiders. The chaos at the market has caused shortages, and inflation of up to 100 percent for some goods.

July 17, 2007: The recent oil exploration deal with a Chinese company is coming undone because not all the main factions in the Transitional Government agree on it. In other words, not all the clan factions are happy with the amount of money they got for the deal.

July 18, 2007: The UN is appealing for donors to provide $20 million to buy 25,000 tons of food for starving Somalis. This will take care of needs until the end of the year. However, the usual donor nations are reluctant to give, because so much of the food aid is stolen. Somali pirates are increasingly active, and especially eager to grab ships carrying UN food aid. During the first six months of the year, nearly a million Somalis received food aid.

July 19, 2007: The 1,600 Ugandan peacekeepers have limited themselves to guarding the airport and docks area. There were supposed to be 8,000 peacekeepers, but the other African countries have backed off in the face of the continuing violence. They want a peace to keep, not a violent situation where they have to impose peace. The African Union has agreed to extend its peacekeeping mission to Somalia for another six months. But Nigeria, Burundi, Malawi and Ghana, have delayed sending peacekeepers they have pledged. The excuses tend to revolve around promised military equipment from Western nations not arriving, or training not being completed.

July 21, 2007: The Transitional Government is still trying to hold a reconciliation conference in Mogadishu, but clans native to the city and their Islamic Courts allies refuse to talk until Ethiopian troops withdraw. If that were done, the Islamic Courts would use force to coerce other clans to accept an Islamic dictatorship, or at least leave the local clans in charge of Mogadishu. The greed, readiness to use violence and lack of civic spirit are a curse that has prevented Somalia from forming a government for over a decade.

August 14, 2007: This is just my observation. I actually think Somalia's abroad are less informed and aware of the principles of democracy. Most seem to be driven by their emotions than reason. The fact that they only react to the extreme action of the government , is an evidence for their lack of commitment to build democracy in somalia . It takes dedication, hard work and sacrifices to build a democratic society anywhere, let alone in Africa. If Somalia's are lacking the interest to participate in the building of democracy in somalia when it is relatively peaceful and only react when things are in chaos, it seems to me that somalia do not understand the basic steps in building democracy.

If you would like to know whether I know the answer to the political problem in somalia , I don’t know. I also think no one knows the right answer to this question. But I know what would lead to the answer, an open dialog among all the stake holders. I also believe that this would not happen till all Somalia's. think they are Somalia first and however they want to describe themselves ,second. If one is only defined by by tribe or region , it is hard to compromise for the good of all. So, it is hard to believe that the Diaspora know the answer to somalia complex political problem when they can’t even see beyond their Tribe Association.

Clear-cut democratic issues like unity, individual freedom, individual rights and obligations, justice and equality for all are but bitter and sour pills for tribal political epistles and disciples. In the name of this or that liberation front, these misguided tribal political groups have already stained themselves with and washed their hands by the blood of innocent somolian , ICU Islamic Courts Union's , SDN(Somali Diaspora Network).WSC/USC, elders of the Hawiye clan and others who carry the trade marks of so-called liberation fronts (LFs) hate democratic language and democratic preconditions. They are not willing to forge the noble wisdom of unity that serves as a pillar for peace, prosperity; they forget that democratic tradition is the pathway that brings society towards the fulfillment of democratic rights, freedom of individuals and freedom of groups. those groups are undemines the development and prolongs our position as one of the poorest countries in the world. As long as we continue to hate one another within, how can we hope to compete globally?

October 30, 2007: "Forced re-locations" are occurring at refugee camps in Darfur. Apparently government forces were trying to force Darfuri refugees to leave a refugee camp near Nyala, South Darfur state. The government has said that it is concerned about security at refugee camps. Darfur rebel groups say the government really wants to drive many Darfuris into exile outside of Sudan.

The UN-African Union "hybrid" force in Sudan (UNAMID) announced that it had opened a base in the Darfur town of El Fasher. UNAMID described the base as an "operational base."

October 31, 2007: The UN extended the peacekeeping operation in southern Sudan (UNMIS). The peacekeeping force is supporting the 2005 Comprehensive Peace Agreement which ended the civil war in the south, which pitted the "Arab-Muslim north" (national government) against the "black African Christian and animist south" (led by the SPLA). That deal has become increasingly shaky as the emerging government of South Sudan and the Sudanese government (Khartoum) struggle over troop repositioning in oil producing regions.

November 1, 2007: UNAMID (Darfur peacekeeping force) now has troop pledges from the African nations of Burkina Faso, Egypt, Ethiopia, Ghana, Kenya, Gambia, Nigeria, Malawi, Mali, and Senegal. Thailand recently promised an infantry contingent. Bangladesh, Holland, Jordan, and Norway have indicated they areconsidering sending troops to serve with the UN-AU peacekeeping force in Darfur.

November 2, 2007: A South Sudan spokesman said that the Sudanese Army units which were to re-deploy (per the 2005 Comprehensive Peace Agreement) will have until December 15 to meet the redeployment goals.

November 5, 2007: The government says it has reached a deal with the government of South Sudan, which will "re-launch"the 2005 Comprehensive Peace Agreement. South Sudan acknowledged that the South Sudan government and the national government had reached an agreement. Basically, the two sides agreed that unfulfilled provisions of the 2005 agreement will be implemented by the end of 2007. The biggest stumbling block is troops deployments in the central and southern oil fields.

Along with the G8 "Africa Action Plan", ACOTA was one the inspirations behind the June 2004 American proposal for a "Global Peace Operations Initiative" (GPOI). An international (i.e., G8) effort, GPOI will absorb the ACOTA program, and integrate similar training programs being run by Britain and France. GPOI is intended to increase the number of military and police personnel available for international peace support operations by providing training, logistic support, and equipment. The ultimate objective is to have 50,000 properly trained and equipped troops available in Africa and another 15,000 in Asia, Europe, Latin America, and the Caribbean by 2010. The initial goal is to train ten battalions per year in African and in the Western Hemisphere, Europe, and Asia. In addition, the program proposes to establishing a center in Italy to train international paramilitary constabulary forces to support peacekeeping operations. The estimated cost of GPOI is about $650 million, of which Congress has already committed $100 million, by transferring funds from existing programs for training foreign forces and for peace operations. The balance is to come from foreign sources.

July 20, 2012: M23 is solidifying its control of the town of Bunagana (Uganda-Congo border) and a strip of territory west of the town (Congolese side). M23 also controls the Runyonyi and Jomba areas. The Congolese government stated that it believes M23 intends to attack North Kivu's capital, Goma.

July 22, 2012: The Rwandan government denied accusations that it is supporting the M23 rebel movement in the Congo.

July 24, 2012: The army fought with M23 rebel forces in and around the town of Kibumba and Rugari (North Kivu province, eastern Congo). The two towns are north of the provincial capital, Goma. UN forces employed helicopter gunships in the battle. The UN also estimated that at least 260,000 Congolese have fled their homes since April in order to escape M23 fighters. Rebels and government forces traded heavy weapons fire around two eastern villages on Friday, forcing thousands of civilians to flee towards the provincial capital days ahead of a regional summit due to tackle the rebellion.

July 25, 2012: The UN is seeking more support for the Congolese Army. Congolese soldiers report that they are not receiving their pay, that they are under-paid when they do, and that their living conditions are poor. All of that is true. The request may help have a political angle. Improving Congolese Army conditions would make it less likely that Congolese soldiers would rebel and join various rebel militia groups still operating in the eastern Congo.

August 1, 2012: M23 is getting the headlines but the FDLR (Democratic Forces for the Liberation of Rwanda) is still operating in the eastern Congo. The FDLR is primarily a Rwandan Hutu tribal force and has ties to the Hutu radicals who instigated the 1994 genocide. In many ways the Hutu-Tutsi struggle in Rwanda is continuing in the eastern Congo. Though Rwanda now stands accused of supporting the M23 rebels, the Congolese government has let Rwandan Army units track and pursue FDLR rebels in the eastern Congo. Rwanda and Congo have coordinated military operations against the FDLR.

August 2, 2012: The UN Security Council stated that foreign nations must end their support for Congolese rebels, specifically the M23 rebel group. Essentially the UN condemned Rwanda without naming Rwanda.

August 9, 2012: The government rejected calls for negotiations with the M23 rebel group and said that it will not negotiate with the rebels. It still considers the rebels to be mutineers from the Congolese Army (FARDC). The government also said that it would not support any peacekeeping force in the eastern Congo that included Rwandan troops. The government prefers UN peacekeepers and it wants UN forces to take a more active role in confronting M23.

August 15, 2012: The Rwandan government said that the UN Group of Experts on the Congo is acting in bad faith. Rwanda contended the UN report was filled with inaccuracies. Rwanda contended that it has not supplied M23 with weapons and that M23 has access to weapons (including heavy weapons, like multiple rocket launchers) that were seized in 2008, by the CNDP militia and then hidden. The government accused one member of the UN study group of having a benign view of radical Hutu organizations like the FDLR and had published an article that described the FDLR as victims of the Rwandan Tutsi government. Essentially, Rwanda claimed that the UN study exhibited an anti-Tutsi tribal bias. Welcome to African politics and political interpretation.

August 18, 2012: The Congo is a topic at the Southern African Development Community (SADC) annual summit. The South African government told the summit that Rwanda must end its support for Congolese rebels in the eastern Congo. South Africa was referring to UN and Congolese accusations that Rwanda supports the M23 rebel movement.

August 19, 2012: The stand-off with the M23 rebel group continues in the Bunagana area. Since the beginning of the month, a tentative ceasefire has been arranged between the Congolese Army and the M23 fighters but the government believes that the M23 militia is reorganizing and preparing for another round of fighting.

August 21, 2012: The government responded to critics who argue that Zimbabwe should not be allowed to deploy peacekeeping troops in the Congo. The government said that Zimbabwean troops contributed to stability when they deployed into the Congo during the Great Congo War. Others remember

Zimbabwean participation quite differently. The Zimbabwean forces reportedly committed many atrocities and plundered Congolese mineral resources. Zimbabwe sent troops to the Congo in 1998, and only withdrew them in 2001. A UN study found evidence that Zimbabwean Army officers and senior members of Zimbabwe's governing ZANU-PF party made money by selling and smuggling Congolese resources. It is also argued that Angola should not be allowed to participate in an AU sponsored peacekeeping force that may deploy into the eastern Congo. Angolan and Namibian forces also intervened in 1998. The Zimbabwean, Angolan, and Namibian forces are sometimes referred to as the SADC (Southern African Development Community) contingent in the Great Congo War, or the SADC Alliance. At the time Zimbabwe's dictator, Robert Mugabe, justified sending troops because he contended the Uganda and Rwanda had invaded the Congo. In 2009, the Angolan government stated that SADC's Standby Brigade was ready to intervene in the Congo, if asked. SADC has 15 members, Malawi, Angola, Congo, The Republic of Congo, South Africa, Namibia, Botswana, Mauritius, Lesotho, Mozambique, Madagascar, Swaziland, Zambia, Zimbabwe, and the Seychelles. (Austin Bay)

August 24, 2012: MONUSCO now has around 4,000 peacekeeping troops deployed in the northeastern Congo. The last thing Congo needs is more ethnic strife, but Congo's northeastern Ituri district is once again experiencing ethnic tensions that include echoes of tribal separatism. The FRPI (Patriotic Resistance Front in Ituri) militia group now controls an area around Lake Albert (about 100 kilometers south of Ituri's capital, Bunia). The FRPI claims that it has formed an alliance with the PFDDI (Popular Front for Durable Development in Ituri), the RAF (Revolutionary Armed Forces) militia, and the IAFI (Integrated Armed Forces of Ituri). Allegedly the alliance wants the Congolese government to make Ituri a province. Ituri, as Kibali-Ituri, was a Congolese province from 1962 to 1966. It is now governed by the Ituri Interim Administration as part of Congo's Orientale province.

However, Rwanda and also Uganda have been accused of supporting various rebel groups in the eastern Congo, including the M23 Movement which still controls a large chunk of territory in the Congo's North Kivu province, including a strip near the Ugandan border. The UN's Group of Experts on the Congo (GoE Congo) has accused Rwanda of providing M23 with material and financial support. Rwanda denies the accusation. However, many of the M23 rebels were associated with Laurent Nkunda's CNDP (National Congress for the Defense of the People) militia. Rwanda supported the CNDP until January 2009. The CNDP was regarded as a Congolese Tutsi militia. The M23 Movement takes its name from March 23, 2009, the date M23 the 2009 peace agreement that was signed. The agreement was supposed to end the war and chaos in the eastern Congo. It promised rebel groups that they would have political rights and various economic opportunities. M23 rebels contend that the government has violated the peace agreement. M23 began operations in April 2012. (Austin Bay)

August 31, 2012: Several international organizations have suggested that a peacekeeping force composed of African Union (AU) nations deploy into the eastern Congo. UN officials in Africa began discussing it publicly late last year but the idea has circulated in the diplomatic community for several years. The concept of an African peacekeeping brigade of some sort has bounced around at least since the 1970s. The code phrase for the Congo is deploying a neutral regional force, or some variation. The AU would likely sponsor the force, if it is organized, and the UN might sponsor it as well. Critics point out that the UN peacekeeping force is an international force. They point that out not to criticize the AU but to note that the UN is losing interest in the Congo and its intractable problems. That is the dirty little public secret about the UN Stabilization Force in the Congo (MONUSCO) operation. MONUSCO still deploys around 20,000 personnel (soldiers, police, administrators, etc.) in the Congo but UN members are frustrated and are tired of paying the bill. The diplomats reply that a regional force would bring a regional political commitment to stopping the chaos and bloodletting in the eastern Congo. That political commitment ought to translate into regional efforts to stop the smuggling of minerals and weapons that help finance the various militias and gangs operating in the eastern Congo. In early August the defense ministers of Burundi, Republic of Congo (Brazzaville), Rwanda, Angola, Tanzania, and Uganda met with the Congolese defense minister and discussed the idea of creating an African regional force for policing the eastern Congo, and there was interest in creating the force.

April 5, 2013: Malawi President Collapses after heart attack'

Malawi’s vice president has asked the nation to pray for President Bingu wa Mutharika, who was rushed to a hospital in the capital Lilongwe on Thursday. Diplomatic sources say the 78-year-old leader collapsed earlier on Thursday after a suffering a heart problem. The government did not immediately confirm the illness or the president’s condition. In the hours following Mr. Mutharika’s hospitalization, medical sources said he was unconscious.

In an interview with VOA, Vice President Joyce Banda asked Malawians “to stay in prayer and to stay united” as they pray for President Mutharika to recover quickly. “I as the vice president of the Republic of Malawi would like to take this opportunity to wish the state president a quick recovery and to also ask God at this point in time to protect and strengthen the family members that are looking after him. I would also like to ask all Malawians to stay in prayer and to stay united as we pray for our president to recover quickly.

Joyce Banda also said she is praying that God protects and strengthens President Mutharika's family. She did not provide details about his medical condition. Mr. Mutharika was elected president of Malawi in 2004 and won a second term in 2009. Critics of the president say he has become increasingly autocratic. Nineteen people were killed last July in anti-government protests. Source: VoA

April 6, 2013: Malawi President Bingu wa Mutharika 'Dead'

President Bingu wa Mutharika of Malawi has died, doctors and cabinet ministers have told the BBC, but this has not been officially confirmed. One of the doctors who treated Mr Mutharika said the president was "clinically dead" on Thursday after suffering a cardiac arrest. State media are still reporting that he has been flown to South Africa for medical treatment. If confirmed, his death would spark a constitutional crisis, analysts say. According to the constitution, the vice-president takes over if the head of state is incapacitated or dies in office. But Vice-President Joyce Banda and Mr Mutharika fell out after a row over the succession in 2010, and she was expelled from the ruling party. The BBC's Raphael Tenthani in the main city, Blantyre, says that ministers have been meeting all night to discuss the situation. The doctors and ministers say that Mr Mutharika's body was taken to South Africa while a decision is taken about what to do next. Source: BBC News

April 6, 2012: Female president for Malawi - Ghana News'

Lilongwe – Updates: Malawi's state radio announced this morning that President Bingu wa Mutharika had died, and Vice-President Joyce Banda prepared to take over as southern Africa's first female head of state. The radio announcement confirmed reports by medical and government sources yesterday that the 78-year-old Mutharika had died shortly after a heart attack the previous day. The delay in the official announcement, as well as the airlifting of Mutharika's body to South Africa on Thursday, had aroused suspicions about the succession process in the impoverished southern African nation. The United States, which has been an important aid donor for Malawi, expressed alarm at the official silence and said it did not want to see any delay in the swearing of Banda, a women's rights activist. Malawi's constitution is clear that Banda should take over, although a smooth transition has not been completely assured since she was booted out of Mutharika's ruling DPP party in 2010 after an argument about succession. Mutharika appeared to have been grooming his brother Peter, the foreign minister, as his de facto successor.

“Malawi’s constitution lays out a clear path for succession and we expect it to be observed. We are concerned about the delay in the transfer of power,” the US State Department said. “We trust that the vice-president who is next in line will be sworn in shortly.” Banda is due to hold a news conference today, officials said, as well as meet the attorney-general and head of the armed forces, suggesting any divisions over the transfer of power have been ironed out. Few of Malawi’s 13 million people mourned Mutharika, whom they regarded as an autocrat personally responsible for an economic crisis that stemmed ultimately from a diplomatic spat with former colonial power Britain a year ago. “We know he is dead and unfortunately he died at a local, poor hospital which he never cared about – no drugs, no power,” said Chimwemwe Phiri, a Lilongwe businessman waiting in a line of cars for fuel at a petrol station. As reports of the death of the self-styled “Economist in chief” swept the capital, there were pockets of drunken jubilation among those who accused Mutharika of turning back the clock on 18 years of democracy in the “Warm Heart of Africa”. “I am yet to see anyone shedding a tear for Bingu,” said Martin Mlenga, another businessman. “We all wished him dead, sorry to say that.” Medical sources said Mutharika’s body was flown to South Africa because Malawi’s energy crisis was so severe the Lilongwe state hospital would have been unable to conduct a proper autopsy or even keep his body refrigerated. There has been no comment from the South African authorities. Source: Reuters

April 6, 2013: Malawi gov’t declares VP Joyce Banda illegible for taking over power - Ghana News" LILONGWE (Xinhua) - Updates: The Malawi government on Friday night declared that Vice President Joyce Banda illegible to take over the reigns of leadership in any event that President Mutharika is incapacitated or deceased as per the constitutional requirement citing the fact that she formed her own party as the reason. The declaration was made by Information Minister Patricia Kaliati late Friday evening flanked by five other ministers including the health minister, the local government minister and the youth minister. Kaliati’s remarks came following the Vice President’s press briefing held on Friday that she was kept in the dark as to what would be the way forward now that President Mutharika was critically ill and receiving medical attention in South Africa. “As government we are very concerned with the Vice President’s remarks and those of the former president that she (Joyce Banda) is supposed to take over leadership following the president’s illness,” said Kaliati. “She speaks as if there is a vacancy in the seat of presidency which is very unfortunate because by the virtue that the Vice President started her own political party makes her illegible to take over in such situation," said Kaliati.

