How much influence does Portugal have in Angola and Mozambique?

Francisco M Pericão Faria , Business Development Manager (1990-present)
Answered Aug 16, 2018

I have to forewarn you of the dispassionate tone of my answer.
Know those 2 countries very well : the dramatic decline in living conditions since colonial times and the inability to stabilise development under marxist-inspired totalitarian regimes have bred conflicting sentiments :
The first of frustration about the incompetence and graft of the current indigenous ruler elite;

The second of resentment of the former colonial masters on the realisation that perhaps things could have been done differently and with better results if independence had been transitioned rather than fought over.

That much is on Portugal's tab, since the pre-1974 regime didn't even contemplate a peaceful independence that most likely would have avoided Angola and Mozambique to fall in USSR's influence, that led to civil wars and ruinous dictatorship, destroying what Portugal had built for 500 years - on the other hand, Africa in the 70's and 80's was battleground for cold war conflict, so it wasn't really Portugal's responsibility to keep power hungry communists from ruining peoples lives, that took over and haven't left since.

In my own opinion, the end result is that this resentment will always linger on as a cop out for the Angolans and Mozambicans for not moving on, so for the next 500 years, Portuguese will forever be the culprits : they hate our guts, with a vindicative streak.

Your answer is : negative influence. As a rule of thumb, whatever Portuguese people say today to an Angolan or Mozambican will be interpreted as an extension of the former colonial dominance, and therefore despised outright.

That being said, the circumstances of the interaction between Portugal and these former colonies will dictate behaviour to value or dismiss Portuguese influence, according to pure convenience of the parties, it's hipocritical like that.

In the end we only share the same language, and if Angola and Mozambique can deal without Portugal's cooperation, they will gladly submit to China's dominance as a survival strategy.
Money generates influence these days, not principles or kinship.

Andre Garcia Updated Aug 17, 2018

Portugal does have some sort of cultural, commercial and political influence over Angola and less over Mozambique. Angola is a big comercial partner of Porugal and consume in some extense culture from Portugal, mainly sports. Politically, Portugal has some influence also over Angola due to the fact that Portugal is an open door to the elite Angolans access the EU.

Offcourse this goes both ways. Portugal also consumes cultural traits from Angola, mainly music and Angola also have oil, minerals, coffee and other important resources that are not available in Portugal.

I would say that sharing the some language, a common past and Portugal being part of the EU does give Portugal a footprint in Angola but the Angolans also have a huge impact in the Portuguese economy.

Mozambique is different, is more distant from Portugal. Mozambique culture is quite influenced by arabs and economically the country is less atractive. Despite that a lot of Portuguese companies and young Portuguese workers are moving to Mozambique in search of better opportunities. The country is safer than Angola (despite some disturbes in the north).

My final response is Portugal and Angola are politically, comercially and culturally bounded. They have influence and leverage with each other. There´s less Portuguese influence in Mozambique but it´s still there.

Related Links

Why has Angola adopted the Portuguese language so completely?
Why did the Portuguese take so long to leave Angola?

Why did Portugal lose Angola and Mozambique, in spite of Portugal's victory in the Portuguese Colonial War against Angola and Mozambique?

Mozambique and Angola were both Portuguese colonies and both embraced communism. Is that just a coincidence, or is there something to that?

How different is Brazilian Portuguese from the Portuguese spoken in Mozambique or Angola?

How did the ‘retornados’ travel to Portugal from Mozambique and Angola after Portuguese withdrawal from those two territories?

If all of Portugal's former colonies (Brazil, Angola, Mozambique, Ceylon, etc.) were all absorbed back into Portugal, how strong would Portugal be?

How do Mozambican people feel about Portugal and the Portuguese?
Is Angolan Portuguese closer to Brazilian Portuguese or Portugal Portuguese?

Why is Portugal having so much debt, in spite of having a massive empire in history and looting many countries?

Is it true that Brazil and Portugal have almost nothing in common culturally, except the fact that both countries speak the same language and that Brazil has a Portuguese colonial background?

Was Angola and Mozambique were not much more than overseas holdings for Portugal? How did this relationship or colonial process differ from that of Portugal's other famous colony, Brazil? (And to other European colonies in Africa of the time)?

How do Brazilians feel about Portugal?
When and how did Portugal invade Angola?
How do the Portuguese feel about Brazil?

What are some of the most famous people from Mozambique?

Rachel Alberts lived in Mozambique for 7 years. Answered Mar 1, 2017

Off the top of my head:

Samora Moises Machel

Mozambique's first president after gaining independence in 1975 who died in a suspicious plane crash.

Graça Machel

A humanitarian and the only woman in the world to marry two presidents; she was Samora's (above) wife and many years later married Nelson Mandela.

Carlos Cardoso

A journalist who was assassinated for investigating corruption. His murder is linked to Joaquim Chissano's (see above) eldest son and his killer, Anibalzinho, has gained infamy from escaping prison and disappearing.

Mia Couto

An acclaimed writer.

Lurdes Mutola

Maria Lurdes Mutola is an athlete who specialised in 800m - three times world champion and one time Olympic champion. She has competed in SIX Olympic games - a feat only three other people have achieved.

Related Links

How is life in Mozambique?

What are the major stereotypes people have about Mozambique and to what extent are they true?

What is Mozambique?
What is special about Mozambique?
What is Mozambique best known for?
What is the most commonly spoken language in Mozambique?
What are some photos of the most beautiful people from Mozambique?
What are some things most people don't know about Mozambique?
Who are some famous celebrities from Tanzania?
How safe is Maputo, Mozambique?
Why is Mozambique so poor?
What is the best attraction of Mozambique?
What are some of the most surreal places in Mozambique?
Are there white people in Mozambique?
What is an experience you had in Mozambique that you'll never forget?

Why did the Mozambique Civil War start?

Leon Jacobsz , Businessman. Answered Mar 31, 2020

The Mozambique civil war was started when the Rhodesian military needed a response to the Mozambique government's support for the growing independence insurgency war Rhodesia was fighting. The 2 guerilla armies, being the armed wings of ZANU and ZAPU. Part of the Rhodesian government strategy in dealing with the increasing armed incursions from rebels based on Mozambique was to create and arm a rebel movement against the Mozambique government. Kinda like keep them occupied by giving them their own problems.

Mozambique was, and still is, a fairly diverse nation in terms of ethnicity defined by different tribes, geographically dispersed. The issue was, and still is, that the ruling party Frelimo, is a Southern based organization, where the capital Maputo is situate. The governors and administrations of the various provinces were, and still are, dominated by people from the South of the country and, of course, the subsequent domination of resources.

The Rhodesian military did not find it too hard to create a rebel movement, RENAMO, under the leadership of Alfonso Dhlakama based in the Tete province. One can presume RENAMO leadeship knew they were being used as a pawn but took advantage of the situation to address their perceived grievances against the ruling party of Mozambique. The insurgency was effective but contained up West and North of Mozambique.

Rhodesia's political situation was resolved by the transfer of power to ZANU via independence talks. This left RENAMO potentially high and dry, cut off from its supply and technical leadership. However, as fate would have it, many of the white officers in Rhodesian military "emigrated" to South Africa.

In the South African military, where these people were absorbed, they found serious support for the RENAMO project. South Africa was also now facing the same problem Rhodesia has. Support for the ANC led liberation struggle, the training camps and bases for guerilla fighters in Mozambique.

The South African military, if anything, was super efficient and huge in size compared to Rhodesia. Support for RENAMO in military hardware, training, tactical leadership, communications grew exponentially almost overnight.

The result was an intensification and broadening of the war to cover the entire country in a short space of time. Focus was on depopulating the countryside (who needs peasant support when all supplies are abundantly provided from across the border) and destruction of the infrastructure of the country (put max pressure of the government). That war brought the Mozambique nation to its knees.

Mozambique was forced to sign an agreement curtailing there policy of overt support for the ANC guerilla movement. Support for RENAMO was officially cut but in reality RENAMO was kept alive being drip fed supplies. Political transition of South Africa from the white minority to the ANC led black rule ended all support to RENAMO eventually.

Enough of momentum for RENAMO had been created that it took a few years before the exhausted sides sat down to negotiate a cease fire and end of the war. Cynical observers say the leadership of RENAMO was paid off to end the lower intensity struggle.

Conditions on the ground remain essentially the same, Southern dominance of the whole country, especially the abundant resources of the North, that flare ups happen from time to time. Hopefully changes in the political administration structures devolving regional leadership according to voting patterns will happen soon.

Related Links

Is there any possibility of a civil war in Mozambique?
Why didn't UNITA win the Angolan civil war?

Who won the civil war in Mozambique?
How did the Angolan Civil War start? What caused it to happen?
How did the civil war in Congo end?
Why did the Burundi Civil War start?
What was the Angolan Civil War?
Why did the Ethiopian Civil War happen?
What was the cause of the civil war in the Central African Republic?

Why did Angola intervene in the civil war in DRC on the side of President Laurent-Desire Kabila in 1998?

Why did Angola's Civil War last 3 decades?
Why did the Rwandan Civil War begin?

How did conscription for the Mozambican Civil War work? Could individuals that lived in another country who were in Mozambique at the time of the draft be subjected to being drafted to fight in the civil war?

Why did so many countries get involved in the Angolan Civil War?
What if UNITA had won the Angolan Civil War?

Some Facts about Mozambique

There are some who pronounce it Moh_ZAMbick with the ZAM emphasised and the final syllable's sound changed to rhyme with "Pick". However, the first way I have shown above is, I contend, the manner in which it is generally pronounced in The Western Countries - and also in official circles within the nation where the name of the country retains its original Portuguese pronunciation.

Related Links

What is the correct pronunciation of Gaborone, the capital of Botswana? The narrator of "The No. 1 Ladies' Detective Agency" used to say ga-bar-RO-neh. In later books she changed to ha-bar-RO-ne. Which is the Setswana pronunciation?

Why is the P in words such as Egipto pronounced, whereas in Recepção it's not, in Portuguese from Portugal?

How do you pronounce 'Cartagena'?

Why can’t Portugal consider people from Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, and Mozambique as ethnic Portuguese people since they have Portuguese blood?

How do you pronounce "você" in Portuguese?
How is 'Cicero' correctly pronounced in Latin?
What's the correct way to pronounce diabetes?
How do you pronounce the “s” in "nós estamos" (português europeu, Portuguese)?
How is Johannesburg pronounced in Afrikaans?
Is there any difference in pronunciation between "niece" and "knees"?

In Portuguese, the word "no", the contraction of em + o appears to have two types of pronunciation. I have heard it pronounced like the English word "no". Others pronounce it like the word "knew". Which pronunciation is the most common in Brazil?

What are the hardest English words for native Portuguese speakers to pronounce?
What is Mozambique?

How do I pronounce these two words from the Zulu language: "Sikhona" and "Sawubona"? Is there a recording online? It's important that I get the pronunciation correct.

How do you pronounce the Vietnamese surname "Nguyen"?

How is life in Mozambique?

Jay Frank travel blogger Mar 4

My focus will be on Maputo, The country’s biggest and wealthiest city. As a foreigner, you’re more likely to live in this place than any other place. Maputo city is generally safer, But it's important to observe the common safety measures that you would follow in many cities in Africa. Like avoid wearing some expensive jewelry, don’t flaunt your wealth, Try to avoid going to low-income neighborhoods without a local.
Apart from that, Learning Portuguese will be very helpful as the majority of the residents of Maputo hardly understand even some basic English. Corruption is high, so you should prepare to give out some $$ to them.

However, Maputo is a beautiful city and a famous tourist destination for beach lovers as it has a wide range of beaches that are well reserved and not crowded at all, You will definitely a good time if you want a short vacation.

Below is a video on Youtube, It fairly analyzed the city of Maputo, its uniqueness, history, tourist attractions, and all the important info about the city in a short clip.

Follow Jay Frank

What makes Mozambique great?

James Anthony Fitzpatrick · Follow

Owner/Manager at Acacia Grove Guest House - Bedfordview, Johannesburg, South Africa (2016–present) Apr 8

I have never been, but from the stories I have heard Mozambique is not great - at least I do not think it would be great at all for me.

Apparently, it is hot - scorching sweltering heat. So hot in fact that some houses don't even have windows. I don't do well in the heat.

It is also supposed to picturesque and a good diving spot. I don't mind views, but i would not venture outside due to that heat and I have never learned to dive.

The food is supposed to be good - spicy Portuguese type food and good fish dishes, but in this tropical climate, I would be very wary of eating the fist. The local power situation is bad - as in no power for up to 18 hours a day, so more heat as the AC won't work.

The roads are supposed to be crap and all, so be prepared to write off your tires and rims on a trip there.

So in short, I don't think it is great at all. If I wanted a beach holiday, I would prefer somewhere like Durban which has a cooler, more temperate climate and still a sea you can swim in.

After hearing those stories, I would not want visit Mozambique any time soon.

Which country is stronger militarily, South Africa or Mozambique?

Mmaduabuchi Obinelo · Follow

Entrepreneur, Writer, Blogger and a Pan- African (2010–present) Updated 3y

South Africa has a higher military firepower more than many countries in Africa including Mozambique. She has stood out as one of the advanced countries in Africa in terms of military might. They are among the top five countries in Africa when it comes to military firepower and have proven overtime their capacity in terms of training and weaponry.

Mozambique may have a strong force but they are not closer to South Africa. She has been acknowledged globally as one of the trained militaries in Africa and in the world at large. In Africa Mozambique is not among the top ten militaries while South Africa is among the top five so it clearly indicates their disparities. Follow Mmaduabuchi Obinelo

Related Links

What countries in Africa have the strongest military?
Which country has a stronger military between South Africa and Nigeria?

Why is Portugal sending military troops in Mozambique? Does it always have many interests (economic, strategical) here since the independence of this country?

Which country is better: Angola or Mozambique?
Is South Africa really dangerous?
How safe is Maputo, Mozambique?
Why did Mozambique join the Commonwealth?
Which is the greatest country in Africa in terms of military might?
Which country is more dangerous: South Africa or Brazil?
Can Nigeria defeat South Africa in a military war?

How safe is Maputo, Mozambique, in 2019?

Alexandre Baptista Studied Psychology & Sport Psychology at Instituto Superior Da Maia - ISMAI (Graduated 2000) 2y

Getting around Maputo is relatively safe, especially during the day in the city center.

Going out at night is also safe. In fact the overall security level does not differ from a large European city. There are a lot of police all over the city.

It is possible to be comfortable in a restaurant terrace, especially on the avenue Julius Nyerere and surrounding areas.

I walked in various parts of the city and never had problems. There is some harassment from street vendors and some beggars but it's nothing to worry about. This answer is based on my personal experience. I heard reports of people being robbed but curiously the police caught the robbers a few yards ahead. Follow Alexandre Baptista

Why have crime rates, AIDS, corruption, and tribal problems increased since the end of the white rule in South Africa, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, and Namibia?

Françoise Marie · Follow Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University1y

The end of white rule in southern Africa is the best thing that ever happened. A minority of Whites (European settlers) ruling over a majority of indigenous Africans on their ancestral and aboriginal lands was the ultimate insult.

Related Links

Was Zimbabwe (Rhodesia) better off under white rule?
How were the crime rates in South Africa during apartheid?

Can Zimbabwe's economy recover and become an upper middle income economy like Botswana, South Africa or Namibia?

Should South Africa, Zimbabwe, Botswana and Namibia be one country?

If colonialism and Apartheid was wrong, why haven't the land of the African people been returned back to them in South Africa and Namibia?

What led to racial relations being better in Namibia and Botswana, compared to South Africa?

How would you compare Zimbabwe to Botswana and South Africa?

How has Namibia and Botswana avoided the corruption, dictators, war, poverty, and apartheid that almost every other continental African country has experienced?

Why did Namibia split from South Africa?
What was apartheid like in Namibia and Botswana?

Considering South Africa's wealth in natural resources, why are we struggling with unemployment and high crime rates?

If South Africa follows Zimbabwe and begins to seize land without compensation will it cause economic deterioration. Will South Africa end up like Zimbabwe?

If diversity is good, why do Japan and Iceland have such low crime rates compared to rainbow nations like South Africa and Brazil?

How are white people treated in Namibia? Is it like Zimbabwe and South Africa?

Is South Africa really poorer/more crime-ridden/more violent since Apartheid ended? Do the statistics confirm or deny these claims?

Why did Mozambique join the Commonwealth States?

Kevin Richardson · Follow Researcher, Biologist, Historian, Anthropologist. (2008–present)1y

There are few direct benefits of Commonwealth membership and some debate about its usefulness, so the question is a fair one. Mozambique gained neither trade nor aid by virtue of membership.

I expect that the question would be addressed definitively in The Commonwealth Brand: Global Voice, Local Action by Victoria Te Velde (Ashgate, 2011) and in the SADC's Mozambique in the Commonwealth (1997), but I do not have access to the full text of either work.

Factors seem to include the following:

Impoverished shortly after independence, Mozambique had become highly dependent on foreign aid, especially from the Soviet Union. President Samora Machel in his later years, and his successor Joaquim Chissano, pursued stronger ties with other countries and international organizations to balance out this dependence. For example, Mozambique is a full member of the Organisation of Islamic Cooperation and even an observer of the Francophonie

The Commonwealth had worked against White minority rule in Rhodesia and South Africa with the cooperation of Mozambique. For example, Mozambique supported sanctions against Rhodesia and South Africa, seriously damaging its own economy. By the late 1980s, with Zimbabwe having achieved independence and the end of apartheid insight, Chissano wanted to ensure Mozambique had some influence in the future of South Africa. He requested and was granted permission to attend the 1987 Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting (CHOGM) to voice Mozambican concerns.

Although there are few direct benefits of Commonwealth membership, there are NGOs and professional associations affiliated with it. Improving Mozambican access to such institutions and their expertise would potentially assist with development. One must also consider the stalemate of the civil war.

Fighters of the former Mozambican rebel movement "RENAMO" receiving military training, Nov. 8, 2012

The main opposition RENAMO identified with the Portuguese and took the pursuit of membership in the Commonwealth as something of an insult. Had they been victorious, such an effort would not likely have been undertaken. But by the late 1980s, RENAMO was losing support from South Africa and FRELIMO had abandoned its earlier Marxist policies, making peace talks possible — and with the peace agreement in 1992 followed by free elections, Mozambique had fulfilled one of the prerequisites for Commonwealth membership.

There are also all the usual reasons states pursue membership in international organizations:

direct diplomacy at the ministerial and head-of-government levels with other members access to larger/wealthier members

general cooperation on matters of common concern
From the other side, Mozambique was long considered a ”cousin” country to the Commonwealth for its trade ties and support of anti-apartheid efforts. They even drive on the left :). Since the Commonwealth does not have an “observer” status, making Mozambique a full member came under discussion. Mozambique fulfilled the requirements of the Harare Declaration, and it is said that at the Auckland CHOGM in 1995, Nelson Mandela himself made an impassioned speech supporting the application as an exceptional case. Follow Kevin Richardson

Related Links

Why did Rwanda and Mozambique join the Commonwealth as neither were former British colonies?

Would Ireland ever rejoin the Commonwealth?
Could Ireland or the US join the Commonwealth of Nations?
Why isn't Ireland a member of the Commonwealth?
Which former British colonies have chosen not to join Commonwealth of Nations?
Why is the USA not a commonwealth nation even though it was ruled by the British?
Should the U.S. join the Commonwealth of Nations?

The member states of the Commonwealth of Nations are mostly former British colonies, as is the United States, so why isn't the United States a member of the Commonwealth of Nations?

Could Israel join the Commonwealth had it wanted to?

Why didn't Egypt join the Commonwealth like other states who were under British occupation?

Are the Commonwealth countries technically still the British Empire?

Why is the USA not a member of the British commonwealth, when it was a British colony?

What benefit, if any, is there for countries being part of this British Commonwealth under the Queen?

Is the US too proud to be a member of the Commonwealth, given that it was once colonized by Britain?

Should India continue being a member of the Commonwealth Nations? What are some of the advantages/disadvantages of being a member?

Related Answer:
Are Angola, Mozambique, and Equatorial Guinea the only countries in Africa where they speak European languages natively?

Pedro Carvalho · Follow Knows Portuguese Mar 9

Not counting very small minorities, there are many native English speakers in South Africa, Zimbabwe, Sierra Leone, Liberia, Zambia and small numbers in other countries as well.

There are some German speakers in Namibia and if you consider Afrikaans an European language, well, there's that too.

There are native Portuguese speakers in Guinea Bissau and most people in Sao Tome and Principe speak Portuguese natively.

There are small native French speaking minorities in many francophone countries throughout the continent.

If you count the islands, the (small) population of St Helena is English speaking and there are native French speakers in Mayotte and Reunion as well as a few in Mauritius and the Seychelles. Follow Pedro Carvalho

Related Links

Of the colonial European languages, why is it that the Dutch of South Africa changed enough to be considered a seperate language (Afrikaans) whereas the majority of the others didn't? (eg. English in NZ, AUS, and USA; Portuguese in Brazil etc.)

How different are the Portuguese spoken in Angola, Brazil, Cape Verde, East Timor, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, Portugal and São Tomé and Príncipe?

What is the official language of Mozambique?
What position of Mozambique is related to the English language?

Mozambique and Angola were both Portuguese colonies and both embraced communism. Is that just a coincidence, or is there something to that?

Is Spanish in Equatorial Guinea used as a second language and lingua franca similar to English in Nigeria, Uganda, Kenya, Liberia, etc. or French in Niger, both Congos, Rwanda etc. and Portuguese in Angola, Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau, etc.?

Why have Latin American countries and Equatorial Guinea continued using the Spanish language instead of adopting their native tongues?

Is Portuguese really spoken in Equatorial Guinea?

Is the African youth in countries with an European official language abandoning their native languages?

What Equatorial Guinea is known for?

Are there any American (the continent) countries that have a real native language as official, I mean like is there any country there without French, Dutch, English, Portuguese or Spanish (generally any European language) as official?

Why couldn't countries in the Americas (North and South America) keep their pre-colonial language while Asia and Africa could?

Is the Portuguese spoken in countries where it is principally a second language (Angola, East Timor, etc.) beginning at all to shift towards Brazilian Portuguese, given Brazil's overwhelming influence in the Lusosphere?

What language is spoken in the schools of Equatorial Guinea?

If French & Portuguese are co-official with Spanish in Equatorial Guinea, then why aren't the former two taught in schools?

For African people: Do you think the coloniser should pay any kind of compensation for your country? Angola, Congo, Mozambique, Ethiopia, Nigeria.

Stélio Silva Hallar · Follow Lives in Mozambique Updated Jul 21

Mozambican here.

google images

Okay…

A few minutes ago as i was idly inspecting one channel after another looking for an interesting content to watch on tv i came across the (A Volta a Portugal sports event on the RTPÁfrica tv channel). It caught my attention right off the bat because it reminded me of seeing this very question here on Quora earlier today.

The vast landscape of the cities and the roads that hosted the competition looked very pleasing, they had super developed infrastructure, impeccable organization, and premier cleaning solutions to the city were apparent.

Noticing this reminded me of the appalling accounts of horrifying back breaking, forced labour and resource exploitation during colonial times.

It's important to mention that even after independence this exploitation has seen a continuity through the neocolonialism system.

Do i wish a type of retribution for the price our ancestors paid in order to benefit the coloniser?

In an ideal world it would be nice to wake up tomorrow to find no vestige of neocolonialism.

That would definitely represent the awaited reparations.

But i think that this question should be changed to:

No colonial power has come up with a plan to compensate Africans as such do the few people at the top of the economic barrel in Africa wish to eradicate the resource exploitation benefiting themselves and their ex coloniser associates!?

The unswer to that is it doesn't look so!

Wich leads to the conclusion that what i wish is unimportant.

Peace and love Follow Stélio Silva Hallar

Related Links

Why were Ethiopia and Liberia not colonised?

If colonialism is the excuse for why Africa is poor and messed up why are Liberia and Ethiopia poor nations although they were never colonised?

Why did Portugal lose Angola and Mozambique, in spite of Portugal's victory in the Portuguese Colonial War against Angola and Mozambique?

Why has Belgium still not compensated the Congolese after all the atrocities, pain of cruelty, and damage they caused? Why is it hard to return all the icons and belongings stolen in the Congo? Why is it among countries supporting war in the Congo?

How do other African countries view Nigeria?

Why has Belgium not been made to pay reparations for the atrocities that were against the indigenous people of the Congo?

If African poverty is the result of colonial exploitation, why are Liberia (from 1847 run by freed slaves) and Ethiopia (only briefly colonised by Italy between 1936 and 1941) among the poorest African countries?

Why didn't the Portuguese manage to retain and expand their possessions in Nigeria, where they even founded Lagos, and make it a colony for several centuries as they did in Angola and Mozambique? What happened differently in West África?

Why are Africans the only ones who never recovered from colonization?

Why is Ethiopia poor, even though it was never colonized?

How did the impact of tropical cyclone Eloise affect people in Mozambique with reference to social livelihood?

Related Links

How can I discuss the stage of development of the tropical cyclone Eloise?
How did the tropical cyclone Eloise impact the environment?
What is the hypothesis for tropical cyclone Eloise in Mozambique?
How did the tropical cyclone Eloise impact the economy?
What is the impact on social factors of tropical cyclone Eloise in Mozambique?
How did tropical cyclone Eloise impact the people?

What is the introduction on tropical cyclone Eloise using Sapphire Simpson and Beaufort cyclones?

Why are category 1 tropical cyclones more destructive than category 5 cyclones?
What can be done to prevent tropical cyclones?
What is the impact of a tropical cyclone in Mozambique?
What are the effects of tropical cyclones?
What are the social issues of tropical cyclone Eloise in Mozambique with reference?

What is a recurving cyclone, what are its effects and how does it differ from normal tropical cyclone?

What are the effect posed by tropical cyclone on agriculture?
Why do the tropical cyclones weaken over the land after landfall?

Was it possible for an imperial European nation to retain their colonies if they wanted to?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam · Follow English is my lingua franca Mar 19

It was difficult, but not impossible, for the colonies. That is those areas that saw direct settlement. But not every imperial territory was a colony.
I see two primary reasons why retaining control of colonies was challenging.

Colonists could not long tolerate unequal rights since they were of the same race and, often, nation, as the empire-forming people. Especially since many colonies outstripped their mother country in wealth.

That is a tale as old as time. Carthage was to Tyre what the 13 colonies were to Britain.

Colonies were racial and national hierarchies. Whites were at the top and the imperial nation higher on the intra-racial totem pole. That did not matter if the colonists demographically swamped the natives. Decolonisation was inevitable when the reverse was the case.

Yet European nations still control international territories that are a legacy of Empire. What those territories have in common is a reliance on the mother country for subsidies and defence. Their small populations also allow the metropole to maintain their responsibilities without falling foul of EU fiscal rules.

Europe as vengeance for the loss of Empire and the rise of the Welfare State. Those factors are as important as demographic change and the Kalashnikov in explaining the retreat of European imperium.

Demographically buoyant peasants were the backbone. Educated but racially discriminated intellectuals were the impetus. The Kalashnikov made resistance feasible. Socialism was the binding ideology.

Only needs a symbol showing that the Portuguese acknowledged that the rational decision was retreating to the bosom of Europe. Then that flag would be the best history of European imperial retreat ever.

Unshabby

Related Answer

Was it possible for an imperial European nation to retain their colonies if they wanted to?

Haocheng Lin , MEng Computer Science, University College London (2023)
Answered Mar 26

Failed attempt to retain their colonies: France

France attempted to retain control over its colonies after WW2. The Fourth French Republic tried to mask the previous colonial system in the form of the French Union:

The map of the French Union

Asia

After the Japanese surrender, the French reimposed their authority over Indochina. Although there were some initial attempts at negotiation [1], the negotiations failed because the French refused to acknowledge Vietnam's independence and pushed for the idea of a Union system to replace its former colonial structure, the French also began the attack on Haiphong forcing the Vietnam forces to withdraw but sparking the start of the Vietnamese resistance [2].

France experimented with planting the former Vietnam Emperor Bảo Đại as the figurehead of its satellite state: the "State of Vietnam" [3]. The French pursued this approach to maintain its control over Vietnam, controlling its military and diplomacy. France applied the same philosophy to Laos and Cambodia: granting them nominal independence when pressured by Viet Minh's accusation that the French were not allowing "real independence".

Before Dien Bien Phu, it was impossible for the French to win the Indochina war because Vietnam was supported by the USSR and the People's Republic of China. Both have provided Vietnam with military and financial aid. The French were fighting away from home against the Vietnamese who were determined to achieve independence.

After 7 years of wars, the French forces suffered a decisive defeat at Dien Bien Phu [4]. The French Expeditionary forces were annihilated by the Vietnamese forces with 12,000 soldiers captured. The defeat forced France back onto the negotiation table for the 1954 Geneva Conference [5] where the French agreed to withdraw from Vietnam.

Algeria

The French Fourth and the Fifth Republic fought a 7 years war with the Algerian National Liberation Front (FLN) to prevent Algeria's independence [6]. The French government deployed 400,000 troops in Algeria by 1956. The FLN's guerilla warfare tactics turned the war into attrition, the war began to turn the International and public opinions against France over time [7]. There were no effective tactics against guerilla warfare, the French often has to resort to collective responsibility to punish all possible FLN suspects. The war was one of the causes of the fall of the Fourth French Republic. Eventually, President De Gaulle agreed to negotiate with the FLN and began the withdrawal from Algeria. The Algerian war demonstrated that it is possible for a European nation to control its colonies but eventually the cost of maintaining control would become so that great that it is more suitable to withdraw from the colony: it is impractical for a European power to maintain control over its colony.

Conclusion

It's not feasible for an Imperial European nation to retain their colonies after WW2 when most European nations are devastated by the impacts of WW2 and have no financial means to maintain control. In the postwar climate, the USA and the USSR have become world-leading superpowers and they were supporters of decolonisation, maintaining control over the colonies would possibly mean diplomatic isolation on the world stage.

In the 20th century, there has been rising nationalism amongst the colonies, the people have woken up and are actively engaging in independence movements, it would be imprudent to resist the tide of change for the European power. Maintaining control over the colonies would be costly financially, it's easier to allow the independence of the colonies to minimize the losses. All of France's attempts to maintain control over their colonies have ended in failures which demonstrated that it's impractical for any European nation to maintain control over their colonies after WW2.

[1] Smith, Tony (1974). "The French Colonial Consensus and People's War, 1946-58". Journal of Contemporary History. 9 (4): 217–247.

[2] Barnet, Richard J. (1968). Intervention and Revolution: The United States in the Third World. World Publishing. p. 185

[3] State of Vietnam - Wikipedia

[4] Battle of Dien Bien Phu - Wikipedia

[5] 1954 Geneva Conference - Wikipedia

[6] Algerian War - Wikipedia

[7] Benjamin Stora (2004). Algeria, 1830-2000: A Short History. Cornell University Press. p. 87

Related Links

In which European colony were natives treated best?
Why is it that Europeans turned to colonialism first, instead of anyone else?
What do British people think of their imperial/colonial past?

Why do Western Europeans have guilt and are ashamed for colonialism? Why not have pride in the positives it brought?

The US was one of the first European colonies to gain independence. What factors made it get independence so early as compared to other European colonies?

What was Africa like before European imperialism?
Do you think European colonialism was bad?

Are the former European colonial areas full of all sorts of internal fights, hard feelings because the Europeans did not draw boundaries according to traditional tribal areas, messed things up for them and because of European drawn boundaries too?

Did Christianity cause European colonialism?
What if the European nations had refused to give up their African colonies?
Which European countries still have overseas colonies?

Why did Germany come too late to join the imperialism and colonialism race with another European countries?

Did European colonialism ruin our world?

Was there any imperial nation whose home country was conquered but was able to retain its colonies?

Which European country treated their Colonies the best?

What was the purpose of the millions of stone circle structures found all over southern Africa, Zimbabwe, Botswana, Mozambique areas of the world?

Françoise Marie · Follow Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University1y

You left out Thimlich Ohinga in East Africa, Kenya.

Kenya Has a New World Heritage Site

Kenya has a new Unesco World Heritage Site, taking its total to seven.

Thimlich Ohinga, an ancient fortress in Kenya's western Migori region was inscribed on the World Heritage List at World Heritage Centre's (WHC) 42nd annual meeting in Bahrain on June 29. Thimlich Ohinga, loosely translated as frightening dense forest, is made up of stone walls ranging from one to four metres high and three metres wide at its thickest point. The ruins resemble those found at Great Zimbabwe. It has been dated to the 16th century and it is thought ancient inhabitants used the site to guard against attacks and protect their livestock.

According to WHC, the site is worthy of preservation because "it is the largest and best preserved of these traditional enclosures. It is an exceptional example of the tradition."

Migori County's goal is to improve roads leading to Thimlich Ohinga to encourage tourism visitation Museum guide shows size of dry stone wall at Thimlich Ohinga, an...

Museum guide shows size of dry stone wall at Thimlich Ohinga, an abandoned 15th century Iron Age village enclosure. Example of early defensive savannah architecture that became a traditional style across East Africa. Thimlich Ohinga means “frightening, dense forest” in the Dholuo language of the Luo tribe. The dry stone walls consist of meticulously arranged stones, of varied shapes and sizes, with lintels supporting each entrance. Historical museum. Ruins are the best preserved Iron Age remains in East Africa. Walls which are one metre thick, provided defence against hostile communities or wildlife.

Great Zimbabwe: Stone Ruins of a Civilization

Early Beginnings

The hilltop settlements known as the Toutswe Tradition (the name comes from the largest excavated site in eastern Botswana) illustrate the importance of growth in the cattle population. Cattle were perhaps the supreme measure or store of wealth in this part of the world. Control of cattle was the key to power and wealth, and because cattle were held by males in general, this may have also sharpened the gender divide.

Emerging slightly later was the cultural complex called Leopard’s Kopje, after a site in southwestern Zimbabwe. The word kopje is Afrikaans for hill. Certainly, cattle in this successor cultural complex remained central.

People in this especially dry part of the southern savanna maximized the efficiency of cultivation by the use of stone terracing on hillsides. They also used stone to construct residences and cattle enclosures. The peoples of the Leopard's Kopje culture mined not only iron but also large quantities of copper and, probably beginning in the 10th century, gold.

A Forgotten Stone Wall World Uncovered in Africa - Travel.SAPeople.com

The settlements emerged around 1500 and lasted until the 1820s. They were based on intensive farming techniques including massive investment in stone terracing and cattle paths which allowed for the cultivation of rich volcanic soils on the hillsides of the escarpment.

Related Answer

How has a small military contingent from Rwanda been able to accomplish more in short order in pushing back an Islamist insurgency in northern Mozambique than the army of Mozambique has in the last two years?

Africa's Most Powerful Militaries

Based on the Global Firepower PowerIndex rankings* of their military strength in 2020

* The ranking utilizes over 50 individual factors to determine a country's PowerIndex ('PwrIndx') score (0.0000=most powerful) with categories ranging from military might and financials to logistical capability and geography.

Source: Global Firepower

TechLoy

Guess what? Rwanda has invaded the DRC and crushed the DRC army many times in the past. The DRC had to enlist the help of Zimbabwe at one time, but as soon as Zimbabwe pulled out its troops, it was back to square one.

In the recent conflict in Mozambique, 10,000 Mozambican troops failed to repel the Al-Shabaab Islamic insurgents. The Islamic insurgents took over several towns as the Mozambican army was pushed back. The Mozambican president sought help from foreigners and Rwanda agreed to send 1000 troops. It did not take more than two weeks for Rwanda to defeat the Islamic insurgents and take back the towns.

Paul Kagame is not just a former Harvard university graduate, he was also a military commander with extensive experience in jungle warfare. He rose up the ranks to lead the fight against genociders and take over the country in the aftermath of the 1994 Rwandan massacre.

The Rwandan army is well trained, experienced and disciplined.

So to answer your question, winning a war or being a strong army is not about the size of your budget, population, GDP, number of aircraft and tanks. If you look at the chart above, Rwanda and Somalia were excluded yet they are undoubtedly the strongest armies in Africa.

Related Links

Could Mozambique authorities resist the Islamist insurgency in the north of the country? Or is it probable that the insurgents will step by step control more territories?

Is the Mozambique government using military conscription in the Cabo Delgado insurgency?

First it was Congo in the late 1990s to early 2000s, now it's Mozambique in 2021. Why can't the Rwandan Army stay within its own borders?

Is the Mozambique government going to ban Islam because of the insurgency in Cabo Delgado?

Why is the crisis in Mozambique being “ignored”?

Why is Rwandan President Paul Kagame silent on the Kipupu massacre perpetrated by the Ngumino rebel group (supported by Rwanda) which killed 220 people? Are Ngumino in Eastern Congo are there to protect Banyamulenge-Tutsi ethnic group?

Why is Portugal sending military troops in Mozambique? Does it always have many interests (economic, strategical) here since the independence of this country?

What was the situation in Portuguese Mozambique in 1972-1973 ? I have read that the insurgents were active in only a few provinces, that they were pretty much contained, and that they weren't a threat to the main cities. Is this true?

What is going on with the Islamist insurgency in Mozambique?
When we entered into Mozambique as refugees, my father lied about us being from Burundi, when we are Rwandans. Is there an

For African people:
Do you think the coloniser should pay any kind of compensation for your country? Angola, Congo, Mozambique, Ethiopia, Nigeria.

Stélio Silva Hallar · Follow Lives in Mozambique Updated 9mo

Mozambican here.

google images

Okay…

A few minutes ago as i was idly inspecting one channel after another looking for an interesting content to watch on tv i came across the (A Volta a Portugal sports event on the RTPÁfrica tv channel). It caught my attention right off the bat because it reminded me of seeing this very question here on Quora earlier today.

The vast landscape of the cities and the roads that hosted the competition looked very pleasing, they had super developed infrastructure, impeccable organization, and premier cleaning solutions to the city were apparent.

Noticing this reminded me of the appalling accounts of horrifying back breaking, forced labour and resource exploitation during colonial times.

It's important to mention that even after independence this exploitation has seen a continuity through the neocolonialism system.

Do i wish a type of retribution for the price our ancestors paid in order to benefit the coloniser?

In an ideal world it would be nice to wake up tomorrow to find no vestige of neocolonialism.

That would definitely represent the awaited reparations.

But i think that this question should be changed to:

•No colonial power has come up with a plan to compensate Africans as such do the few people at the top of the economic barrel in Africa wish to eradicate the resource exploitation benefiting themselves and their ex coloniser associates!?

The unswer to that is it doesn't look so!

Wich leads to the conclusion that what i wish is unimportant.

Peace & Love

Related Links

Why were Ethiopia and Liberia not colonised?

If colonization is keeping Africa and Africans backward as we made it seem, what about countries like Ethiopia that resisted colonization?

Why did Portugal lose Angola and Mozambique, in spite of Portugal's victory in the Portuguese Colonial War against Angola and Mozambique?

How do other African countries view Nigeria?

If colonialism is the excuse for why Africa is poor and messed up why are Liberia and Ethiopia poor nations although they were never colonised?

Why has Belgium not been made to pay reparations for the atrocities that were against the indigenous people of the Congo?

Why are Africans the only ones who never recovered from colonization?

Why didn't the Portuguese manage to retain and expand their possessions in Nigeria, where they even founded Lagos, and make it a colony for several centuries as they did in Angola and Mozambique? What happened differently in West África?

Why has Belgium still not compensated the Congolese after all the atrocities, pain of cruelty, and damage they caused? Why is it hard to return all the icons and belongings stolen in the Congo? Why is it among countries supporting war in the Congo?

After the Congo(s), which African country suffered the worst under colonialism?

9 Delicious Foods in Mozambique You Unapologetically Eat More

If you enjoy seafood and toppings of fresh food straight from the farm, try Mozambique popular foods.

You can’t have enough of the Portuguese-inspired meals here infused with Arabic dishes. It makes you doubt you are in a Southern African country for a moment. Nevertheless, Mozambican dishes boast a diverse gastronomic environment.

What stands out is that most of its food has a fresh African touch, given the country’s rich agricultural history. There is so much delicious food available for you to try.

What is the Most Popular Food in Mozambique?

Every country across the world has an identity courtesy of popular and/or national dish. It happens that in this former Portuguese colony, Xima takes it all. This is the most popular dish in the land.

It is the foundation of Mozambican cuisine. This staple is a form of corn-based grounded flour widely consumed throughout Africa. Its mild flavour and white colour makes it a great addition to meaty or vegetable-based recipes. In Kenya, it is known as Ugali while in Tanzania and Uganda you will have it as Sima.

Zambians call it Nshima. Here are other Mozambique popular foods.

Pão (Fresh Bread)

Bread is another essential component of Mozambican cuisine, and most communities have a small neighbourhood bakery. This is where residents purchase Pão daily.

It's still a more popular option than the supermarket's mass-produced bread. The customary roll in Mozambique is fluffy on the inside and slightly crunchy on the outside. It's eaten with butter while still warm

Learn more about 9 Delicious Foods in Mozambique You Unapologetically Eat More ANIMALS In The Wild: Is there an evolution in animals for which man is responsible?

Fennec Animal Geek Oct 12

There is the fascinating case of African elephants!
Mozambique's long civil war which was largely funded by poached ivory caused a rapid evolution of elephants.

Indeed, the oldest wandering elephants in Mozambique's Gorongosa National Park bear the scars of the civil war that rocked the country for 15 years: many are helpless.

They are the only survivors of a conflict that killed around 90% of these beleaguered animals, slaughtered for ivory to fund arms and for meat to feed combatants.

Despite the human-influenced lack of tusks in recent decades, tuskless elephants survive and appear healthy.

Scientists say the large proportion of elephants with this disability can alter the behavior of individuals and their wider communities.

Tusks are basically elongated teeth. Yet they are generally used for most everyday tasks: digging for water or vital minerals in the ground, barking trees for fibrous food, and helping males fight over females. .

The problem is that this evolution only concerns females.

In male elephants, the mutation is lethal. Tuskless elephants survived poaching in greater numbers by passing on their mutated genes to the next generation, leading to both an increase in the number of female tuskless elephants and an overall decrease in the number of male elephants.

According to scientists, about a third of young females (the generation born after the end of the war in 1992) never developed tusks. Normally, tusklessness would only occur in about 2-4% of female African elephants.

The evolutionary change in the African savannah elephant population is so significant that scientists predict the species will continue to suffer its impact for generations to come, even if poaching declines.

Similar questions

If evolution is real, why don't we see animals transform into other animals immediately?

What separates humans from other animals? We thought we used tools, were self-aware, and used language, but now we know that some animals do the same.

If evolution is the passage from one species to another, what animals can we observe evolving today?

If humans are descended from apes, why do apes still exist?

Why according to the theory of "the evolution of man" there never existed another animal that evolved into a man?

If the theory of evolution is true why don't we continue to evolve?

Related: Is there an evolution in animals for which man is responsible?

Yab Ly

Master of the World at Farm Animal Conspiracy (2018 – present) Oct. 12

I don't know if we can really speak of "evolution" but the following animals have changed their morphology because of humans.

The deer :

This animal is very popular with hunters. To kill and expose the great antlers of a deer, what an honor in this environment.

Unfortunately, the fact that deer with large antlers are highly sought after by hunters results in a decrease in the number of these animals . Only deer with small antlers pululent and reproduce.

The more the years pass, the more the antlers of the deer decrease in size. This change in morphology implies a decrease in their means of defense.

The hen

In the hen we can observe 2 major changes in morphology:

- Hen
- broiler hen

The laying hen:

Before genetic selection, these individuals laid an average of 6 fertilized eggs per year and up to 20 eggs maximum .

After genetic selection, these individuals lay an average of 300 eggs per year, the fertilization of which is no longer compulsory. Moreover, these hens are getting smaller and smaller to take up as little space as possible in the farms.

Egg laying for a hen was already painful before genetic selection but now in addition to repeating itself every day, their body is proving to be unsuitable .

Broiler hen:

The strains of birds used in breeding have been selected for their ability to grow and grow rapidly. This accelerated growth causes serious health problems : weakened, the birds struggle to carry the weight of this enormous body.

https://www.l214.com/ Animaux/poulets/la-selection-genetique-des-poulets-de-chair/

The cow :

Before being genetically selected cows produced just enough milk to feed their babies.

But since 1950, milk production per cow has almost quadrupled.

Driven to hyperproductivity, cows suffer from painful ailments:

mastitis (inflammation of the udders caused by infections during milking), metritis (infections of the uterus caused by unhygienic conditions during childbirth) lameness (lesions on the legs, laminitis).

And other sores/swellings on the legs (caused by unsuitable bedding) are frequently observed in dairy farms.

The pig :

Breeding sows “produced” 16 piglets per year in 1970, today they produce 29 .

In the pig sector, the productivity gains obtained by zootechnics (genetic selection , feed, breeding techniques, etc.) seem limitless. They continue year after year to progress in pig farms, to the detriment of animal health.

Sheep :

In the wild, sheep only produce the amount of wool they need to keep warm , and they naturally shed some of their fleece each year . Only merino sheep, the result of genetic selection operated by the wool industry, develop abnormally heavy fleeces and suffer if they are not shorn every year.

Like any mass production process using farm animals, sheep farming and wool production pose serious problems in terms of animal welfare (painful interventions , journeys of several weeks, etc.).

If you observe well, you can notice that the industrialists of the animal lobbies do not care about animal welfare or their interest, gain comes first.

In ethics, speciesism designates the - arbitrary - discrimination of which individuals are victims on the basis of their species: to make suffer or kill an animal simply because it is not human (whereas it would be considered criminal to do this a human).

We also speak of speciesism to designate the ideology that permeates our society and which maintains that animals have an inferior moral status which authorizes their exploitation.

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

On Southeastern coast of Africa.

Official title of the state

Republica de Mocambique (nacional)

The Republic of Mozambique: is a country in Southeast Africa bordered by the Indian Ocean to the east.

Flag description:

Three equal horizontal bands of green (top), black, and yellow with a red isosceles triangle based on the hoist side; the black band is edged in white; centered in the triangle is a yellow five-pointed star bearing a crossed rifle and hoe in black superimposed on an open white book; green represents the riches of the land, white peace, black the African continent, yellow the country's minerals, and red the struggle for independence; the rifle symbolizes defense and vigilance, the hoe refers to the country's agriculture, the open book stresses the importance of education, and the star represents Marxism and internationalism.

Neighbours

Tanzania on N. Malawi, Zambia, Zimbabwe on W, South Africa, Swaziland on S. Land boundaries; total 4,571 km. Border countries; Malawi 1,569 km, South Africa 491 km, Swaziland 105 km, Tanzania 756 km, Zambia 419 km, Zimbabwe 1,231 km.

Founder of The Nation
Samora Moises Machel

Local division

10 Provinces /provincias/, with capital region Maputo (cidade de Maputo)

Government type

Republic - semi-presidential

Legislation chamber

Unicameral - Assembly of the Republic

Form of State

Republic

Head of State is the President (elected by popular vote for five-year term and is eligible for second term). A multi-party republic with one legislative house. Assembly of the Republic 248 seats, members are directly elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch

President, Prime Minister, Unicameral "Assembly of the Republic" (Assembleia da Republica). Separated by chief of State and head of Government. President elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms, eligible for a second term. Head of Government to be appointed by the president.

Former Ruler

1974 – 1975 Joachim Alberto Chissano (Interm president)

1975 – 1986 Samora Moisés Machel

1986 - 2005 Joachim Alberto Chissano

2005 – Armando Guebuza
- Felipe Niyussi (incumbent)

Judicial chamber

Supreme court

Capital city

Maputo Altitude 59 mtrs/194 ft.

Geographic coordinates - 25.57S , 32.35E. Located on the west side of the Maputo-Bay at the mouth of Tembe river. A port city on the Indian ocean, it's name has its origin in the Maputo river. Formerly known as Lorenzo-Marques, was named after the Portuguese navigator, the city's name was changed to Maputo in February, 1976, shortly after independence.

Names of main towns

Nampula, Beira, Quelimane, Xai-Xai, Tete.

Date of independence

25th June,1975

Religions (Major)

Traditional beliefs 65%, Christians 23%, Muslims 12%, are mostly in the North.

Main spoken languages

English (official), Portuguese is the most kindly spoken foreign language, Ronga, Shangao, Muchope, Isonga, Senanyanja, Makua, Lomwe widely spoken.

Currency unit

Metical (MZM) =100 Centavos.

Area in Km2

799,380,00

Country area comparison in Africa

16 out of 55 states

Demographic terms ;-

Average annual population growth rate 1.797 %

Birth rate 37.8 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 19.83 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 41.37 years

Male 42.05 years ; Female 40.66 years;

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 42, Female: 41

Average per capita income

USD 1, 000

Population density

27.6/km2

Urban population (%)

38

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishing: 21, Industry: 31, Social service: 48

Main Export Items

Prawns, petroleum products, raw-cotton, cashaw-nuts, kernels, sugar, copra, citrus fruits, timber in logs

Economy is based on:

Agriculture & Tourism

Climate Tropical to sub-tropical; Coastal regions are hot and humid, while the plateau and mountains areas in the northwest enjoy more temperature climate average 21oc hot main season is from October to March.

Extremes;-

Lowest point; Indian ocean coast 0 mtrs.
Highest point; Mt. Binga 2,436 mtrs

Weather of the Capital city (Maputo) average annual temperature 23.10c.

Altitude 59
mtrs/194 ft

Hottest Month
February 22 - 31oc.

Coldest Month
July 13 - 24oc.

Driest Month
July - August 13mm average Rf

Wettest Month
January 130mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system

Time zone

2 hours ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays

1st January (New year), February 3 (Heroes day), May 1 (Labour day), June 25 (Independence day), September 7 (Victory day), September 25 (Armed Forces day)

Ethnic groups

African Bantu tribes 99 %, others 1%

Topographic & environmental concern

Coastal lowlands comprise nearly half the country with plateaus rising in steps to the mountains along the western border. The River-Zambezi flows through the Northcentral and most fertile part of the country. Environment: a long civil war and recurrent drought in the hinterlands have resulted in increased migration of the population to urban and coastal areas with adverse environmental consequences; desertification; pollution of surface and coastal waters; elephant poaching for ivory is a point.

Economy Overview

Industry

Foodstuffs, beverages, chemicals (fertilizer, soap, paints), Aluminum, petrleum products, textiles, cement, glass, asbestos, tobacco

Agriculture

Cotton, cashaw-nuts, sugarcane, tea, cassava, corn, coco-nuts, sisal, citrus, tropical fruits, potatoes, and sun-flowers; beef, poultry

Natural resources;

Coal, titanium, natural-gas, hydro-power, tantalum, graphite. Natural gas rserves have already discovered will make the south East Africa one of the next gas frontiers. Companies are waiting for policymakers to determine priorities and incentives before they can settle on investment plans. Fast forward to 2020. The deep waters off the coasts of Tanzania and Mozambique are teeming with rigs: drilling, extracting and transporting gas from the Mafia and Rovuma basins. Shiny new liquefied natural gas (LNG) plants, where the gas is cooled before being shipped to markets in Asia, are dotted up and down the coast. But just as oil majors such as Royal Dutch Shell, BG Group and Petrobras are looking to buy stakes in the gas fields, the region's governments are still un- decided about the policy regimes they want. Nothing is set in stone. Final investment decisions, even for the most advanced of the new developments – such as US firm Anadarko's planned LNG plant in Mozambique – are due next year. Political wrangles could derail those plans at any time. The scale of the finds so far – and their position close to gas- hungry Asian markets – is attracting big money. In July, Thailand's state-owned PTT Eploration and Production beat back a bid from Shell to buy Cove Energy - an Irish company with an 8.5% stake in Mozambique's Rovuma area 1 block - for $1.9bn in August. Looking to cash in, Indian telecoms tycoon Venugopal Dhoot, whose Videocon Industries owns 10% of the same block, is now eagerly searching for a buyer. A $175m Tax received by Mozambique government after sale of Cove Energy to Thailand's PTTEP In Mozambique, the government held a public discussion in early September on the Norwegian government and World Bank-funded Petroleum Governance Initiative's recommendations for a natural gas masterplan. The study indicated that the government could earn $5.2bn per year from gas by 2026, with enough gas to support 10 LNG trains. The gas finds in Mozambique – of some 2.8trn m3 – are already yielding rewards for the state, which announced it received $175m by applying a 12.8% tax on profits on the Cove sale. Beukes says the government is keeping its thinking "close to its chest" and suggests that state-owned Empresa Nacional de Hidrocarbonetos (ENH), could look to increase its stakes to as much as 40% in new gas finds. ENH currently has 10-15% stakes that are carried through the exploration phase by the developers. Without state-owned gas monoliths like those of Algeria and Qatar driving the pace of development, coordination will be key to East Africa's gas policy regimes. Domestically, question marks remain over whether governments will incentivise companies to team up or to build pipelines. The mechanics of local gas markets will also determine investment decisions. Internationally, gas prices are still a big unknown. The South African cabinet's decision in early September to lift a moratorium on fracking for shale gas in the Karoo could also alter plans to target South Africa for exports. However, perhaps the biggest test for the region will be meeting the needs for qualified gas engineers and technicians come 2018. With Uganda's oil finds and exploration heating up along the Rift Valley into Kenya and Ethiopia, East Africa must act fast to provide the companies with a well-trained cohort – or miss out on jobs.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 7

Grassland: 56

Forest woods: 18

Other: 19

Marine

Coastline - 2470 km.

Commercial sea ports:-

Beira, Maputo, Nacala. A 460 km of the Zambezi river is navigable

Development prospect:

Mining investors from Asian and southern hemisphere countries are beginning to edge out the aid agencies in defining the agenda for Mozambique's development. And yet such is the tax holiday given to incoming companies that their contribution to the country's revenues is still dwarfed by that of the donors, whose share of the annual budget is still put at 57 per cent. Growth rates are looking very strong, thanks to the ongoing expansion of Mozambique's various extractive industries, especially coal mining. GDP growth is forecast at 7.25 per cent in 2011 and 7.5 per cent in 2012. The Metical, the local currency, is gaining against the major currencies thanks to prudent measures by the central bank, but the trend is unlikely to last through 2012. The country's vast mineral wealth is luring in investors from BRIC countries and Australia; their decisions will determine the fate of Tete and other provinces. The bank hopes to keep a lid on inflation, which fell below 8 per cent at the end of September, but underlying trends are upwards. With around $12bn being channelled into Mozambican mines, the country is a honeypot for investors from Australia, Brazil, India and China. Coal is king and output from five different projects under construction could be anannual 20m tn by 2015 and rising. However, companies will need to overcome the all-too-obvious infrastructure constraints of power and transport as well as skills shortages and environmental impacts. The country's vast mineral wealth is luring in investors from BRIC countries (Brazil, Russia, India, China, South Africa) and Australia; their decisions will determine the fate of Tete and other provinces. Brazilian-owned Vale-Mozambique, which has 8,000 workers involved in building its major coking coal mine at Moatize, is financing the railway link via Malawi to Nacala port and concluding a feasibility study for an expansion of the port so it can receive bigger ships. Rio Tinto, already working on Tete's iron ore reserves, has now bought up the nearby Riversdale coal project – in the process turning Tete Province into a major African investment hub. Vale will also have its own coal-fired thermal power station connected to the national grid and subsequently relieve neighbouring countries of their own power headaches. India's Jindal Steel & Power says it will build a $3bn coal-fired thermal power station with a capacity of 2,640MW. Vale is even planning a coal-to-liquids plant to service local and foreign markets. Several large gas finds offshore

- 23 trln cubic feet combined - by ENI and Anadarko will transform Mozambique into a genuine LPG player. Beira port is among the existing facilities under pressure and due for expansion. The Indian group Essar has announced that is seeking to develop the port as the conduit for the export of ironore from its newly-acquired ZISCO mining assets in Zimbabwe. "Mozambique is a mineral rich country," says Rajiv Agarwal of Essar Ports. "We are working towards signing a concession agreement for building a port in that country." Meanwhile the political atmosphere is looking a little shaky for the ruling Frente de Libertação de Moçambique (FRELIMO) party as it shores up defences against varied threats. Apart from having to face down the verbal attacks of the formerly armed opposition party Resistência Nacional Moçambicana (RENAMO), whose leader Afonso Dhlakama loves sabre-rattling, it is more seriously worried by the rise of the Movimento Democrático de Moçambique (MDM), which represents a potential new force to watch in the next round of municipal voting in 2013. Frelimo's own supporters have been accusing the party of promoting corruption and creating an untouchable, unaccountable elite. Several senior officials in state-run companies were fired after anonymous reports of corruption and mismanagement. While limiting Frelimo's powers of patronage, this could at least help its damaged reputation.

Brazil, Africa's Growing Star' Brazil seeks a larger international role as the South American giant’s aid and investment in Africa has seen a rise in economy boosting projects in Mozambique, Kenya, and Angola. Amid a myriad of development projects on the continent, including a fight against the HIV/AIDS epidemic in Mozambique, a $150 million loan to Kenya for road construction, training the Angolan military, among others, Brazil is increasingly affirming itself as a force to reckon with in resource-rich Africa. The rising economic powerhouse is building on its historical ties in order to project greater influence in the developing world and the expanding business appeal of Africa. "There's the growing sense that Africa is Brazil's frontier. Brazil is in the privileged position of finally reaching the institutional capacity to do this," says Jerry Dávila, a historian at the University of Illinois. Davila has written extensively about Brazil's inroads across the South Atlantic Ocean. Rio de Janeiro's aid now exceeds $1 billion, and Africa accounts for about 55 percent of the expenditures according to the Brazilian Cooperation Agency, which oversees aid projects abroad. The latest collection of aid projects and loans to Mozambique, Kenya and trade flows between Brazil and Africa surged from $4.3 billion in 2002 to $27.6 billion in 2011. Brazilian connections in Africa also include farming ventures in Sudan; a fiber optic cable connecting Brazil to parts of Africa, and direct flights from some African capitals. A new Brazilian University has also begun offering classes for students from Portuguese-speaking countries, including Angola, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique, and São Tomé and Principe. The development of the Brazil-African relationship also highlights Brazil's transition from aid recipient to aid provider. The country recently overtook Britain as the world's sixth-largest economy, and now has more embassies in Africa than Great Britain. Brazil now has 36 embassies across Africa, and sent jets to fly delegations from Sierra Leone, Liberia and Cape Verde to the United Nations Conference on Sustainable Development in New York, in June, 2012. Nonetheless, Brazil still trails China and the United States, which has far more expansive aid programmes and trade in Africa. "We still have a smaller foreign aid profile than other countries, but we're learning how to do cooperation," said Marco Farani, the director of the Brazilian Cooperation Agency.

Proposed amendment to Mozambique’ s anti-terror law threatens press freedom

The Mozambique National Assembly approved a bill on May 19 that could criminalize reporting about the insurgency in the north. The legislation now awaits President Filipe Nyusi's signature. (AFP/Adriene Barbier)

New York, June 7, 2022 — Mozambican President Filipe Nyusi should not sign amendments to the country's anti-terror legislation into law and should instead ask parliament to change a sweeping clause that could criminalize reporting about the insurgency in northern Mozambique, the Committee to Protect Journalists said on Tuesday.

On June 3, the amendment bill was sent to Nyusi for assent, António Boene, the chairman of the National Assembly's Commission on Constitutional and Legal Affairs, told CPJ via messaging app.

The bill, which was passed by parliament on May 19, seeks to amend Mozambique's 2018 anti-terror law, including an overly broad clause that would penalize anyone who publicly reproduces false statements relating to terrorist acts with a prison term of between two and eight years, according to media reports and a statement by the Mozambican chapter of the regional press freedom group Media Institute of Southern Africa (MISA).

"Reproducing statements is, after all, one of the hallmarks of journalism," said Misa-Mozambique in the statement.

The government has argued that the amendments are necessary in order to strengthen the legal framework for the fight against terrorism because of an ongoing insurgency and terrorist attacks in Mozambique's northern Cabo Delgado province, according to a report by the Mozambican state news agency (AIM) and a government document, reviewed by CPJ, that was introduced in the National Assembly in March 2022.

"Mozambican President Filipe Nyusi must not sign the anti-terror amendment bill into law, but should instead return it to the National Assembly to correct the defects and ensure that reporting on the insurgency in Cabo Delgado is not criminalized or censored," said Angela Quintal, CPJ's Africa program coordinator. "Members of parliament have already watered down other controversial clauses in the bill, but the president must ensure they go a step further to protect media freedom and the public's right to information, instead of trying to control the narrative in Mozambique's ongoing fight against terrorism."

On May 18, the National Assembly approved the first reading of the anti-terror amendment bill, which included a controversial clause stating that anyone intentionally spreading information about a terrorist act, if they know the information to be false, can be punished with a prison term of eight to 12 years, according to media reports and CPJ's review of the bill.

The bill also included prison terms of between 12 and 16 years for anyone who publishes "classified information" about terrorism, according to the AIM report and the draft legislation, reviewed by CPJ.

In a May 17 statement ahead of the first reading of the bill, MISA-Mozambique urged parliament to amend those clauses, saying they threatened press freedom. It said that criminalizing the publication of classified information punished journalists and ordinary citizens, rather than the officials who failed in their duty to safeguard state secrets. The organization also objected to the false information clause, arguing that the wording was ambiguous and had the potential to be applied arbitrarily.

In the bill's second reading on May 19, the National Assembly's Commission on Constitutional and Legal Affairs watered down those two clauses by criminalizing the divulging of classified information by public servants only, rather than citizens in general. It also lowered the prison term to between two to eight years for violating the false information clause, according to the AIM report.

Boene said these amendments were approved and the bill was forwarded to the president on June 3 to be signed into law.

Ernesto Saúl, MISA-Mozambique's program manager, told CPJ in a messaging app call that despite the National Assembly's efforts to amend some of the clauses, the proposed law could still jeopardize the practice of journalism, particularly by punishing anyone who publicly reproduced statements about acts of terrorism.

"We just have to remember that the government has denied terrorist acts in Cabo Delgado for months after the first reports, and many journalists were at the time accused of spreading lies, so the government can very well use this to silence coverage altogether," said Saúl.

Moreover, journalists may publish news about plans of imminent attacks that could easily be considered false news by the government, said Saúl.

Adriano Nuvunga, director of the Center for Democracy and Development, a local human rights group, told CPJ via messaging app that the bill was aimed at closing down civic space and was intended to punish and threaten anyone who even discussed terrorism. "It limits the scope of work of the civil society and of journalists, a tendency of the government that was already visible and is a serious setback for the human rights gains that Mozambicans had fought for," he said.

Emília Moiane, director of the Mozambican government's information office, told CPJ by phone that she did not believe that the proposed law would violate the right to press freedom, as one of the principles of journalism was to publish only the truth.

"We believe journalists follow this principle. Terrorism is not a subject to talk about without certainty," said Moiane, who was not able to say when the president was expected to sign the bill into law.

What do you think happens now with the £829,500 that has been returned to Mozambique?

Related Links

What is the best food to try when visiting Mozambique?

What steps should be taken if money sent to a scammer is returned?

What should an innocent person do if they accidentally send money to a scammer and are not able to get it back?

What happens if we refuse to give money to a scammer?

Is Beira, Mozambique, a safe city?

What happened in Angola and Mozambique after independence?

What will happen if you are caught shoplifting in Mozambique?

What is something good that is happening in Mozambique right now?

How will the introduction of troops from the Southern African Development Community help restore order in Mozambique's conflict-ridden Cabo Delgado province?

What happens if you send money to a scammer and they don't pay you back in return?

What do you think are the '7 wonders' of Mozambique?

Why is Mozambique so poor?

What should you do if you accidentally send money through an email transfer to a scammer who promised to return it but never did?

Are tourists welcome in Maputo, Mozambique?

What was the standard of living in Portuguese Mozambique compared to post-independence Mozambiques?

NAMIBIA

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS- Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview, Diary updates and Refreshes

The Bantu-speaking Ovambo and Herero population migrated from the north in about the 14th century AD. The San are generally assumed to have been the earliest inhabitants of the region. Later inhabitants include the Nama and the Damara or Berg Dama. Germany declared a protectorate over the area in 1884. Colonial settlement provoked a series of uprisings at the beginning of the 20th century, in which the Herero and the Nama peoples were almost wiped out. During the First World War South Africa, in pursuit of its own colonial ambitions, invaded and occupied German South-West Africa and was awarded a League of Nations Mandate. South Africa occupied the German colony of South West Africa during World War I and administered it as a mandate until after World War II, when it annexed the territory. The territory was then administered as a de facto South African colony; many Afrikaners settled there and, after 1948, elements of apartheid were introduced. The UN terminated South Africa's Mandate in 1966. One year later, the UN changed the name of the territory from South West Africa to Namibia. In 1971, the International Court of Justice declared in a landmark advisory opinion that South Africa's presence in the territory was 'illegal' and that it should withdraw. South Africa ignored the Court. Angola's independence in late 1975 created the opportunity for SWAPO, which was founded in 1960, to step up its armed struggle for independence from bases in neighboring Angola. A UN Plan for Namibian independence was adopted in 1978. But, fearful of 'communist' domination of the region, South Africa refused to implement its terms for another decade. Finally, in 1988, under US pressure and after a series of major cross-border campaigns by the South African military (ostensibly intended to destroy SWAPO bases) the South Africans conceded independence in return for a Cuban withdrawal from Angola. In the pre-independence election to the Constituent Assembly, SWAPO won 41 of the 72 seats. This body drew up the independence constitution, elected Sam Nujoma to be the country's first President, and became Namibia's first National Assembly when formal independence was achieved on 21 March 1990. Namibia joined the Commonwealth on the same day.

Originally Called: German South West Africa.

The German rule ended up it's rule, when Germany officially lost Namibia, then called South West Africa in 1915, during the first world war, when their troops surrendered to the South Africans under General Louis Botha.

A treaty of Khorab, signed on the 9th of July of same year, ensured that South Africa, not Germany, had the last say in the national affairs of Namibia until it's independence.

The League of Nations, the precursor of the United Nations mandated Namibia to South Africa in 1920, sadly, from 1948, was captured by South Africa, which later imposed by it's obnoxious apartheid policies onto Namibia too.

In 1966, the South West African People's Organization /SWAPO/ launched a war of independence for the country later became Namibia, but it was not until 1988 that apartheid South Africa agreed to end it's mandate administration in accordance with a UN peace plan for the entire region. Heavily influenced by the cultural impact of Germans.

Achieved independence on 21st March, 1990 from South Africa under a United Nations mandated & supervised elections as Mr. Sam Shafishuna Nujoma it's founder president.

Headship since independence; Head of State of the Namibia self-rule administration

Mr. Sam Shafishuna Nujoma who led Namibia during it's first fourteen years of self-rule before he got retired from government duties on March, 2005, he remains chairman of the ruling-SWAPO party.

Mr. Sam Shafishuna Nujoma: In office from the independence 21 March, 1990 to 21 March, 2005.

Samuel Daniel Shafiishuna Nujoma born in 12 May 1929, is a Namibian politician who was the first President of Namibia from March 1990 to March 2005.

Sam Nujoma led the South-West Africa Organisation (SWAPO) in its long struggle against South African rule and took office as President when Namibia obtained independence on 21 March 1990. He was subsequently re-elected in 1994 and 1999, remaining in office until March 2005. He was President of SWAPO from its founding in 1960 until 2007.

Origins of name: The name is derived from the Namib, the desert that runs along the Namibia coast. Namib in turn means "an area where there is nothing" in the local Nama (Darma) language.

A Republic in Southwest Africa.

Formerly known as South West Africa, a sparsely populated long inhabited by indigenous people, it was explored first by the Portuguese in the late fifteenth century. In 1884 it was acquired by Germany as part of the "German Southwest Africa", and Germany spreaded its control into the interior Namibia in the decade following the proclamation of the protectorate. In 1904, the Hereros the largest tribe of about 200 ethnic-groups, rose-up against the German colonial rule, killing more than 120 civilians. The German response was ruthless- the then colonial master General Lothar Von Trotha signed the notorious extermination order against the Hereros, defeated in battle and drove them into the desert, where most of them died of thirsty of an estimated 65, 000 Hereros, about 15, 000 only survived. It's thought aout 10, 000 Nama people also died. The German rule ended up it's rule, when Germany officially lost Namibia, then called South West Africa in 1915, during the first world war, when their troops surrendered to the South Africans under General Louis Botha. A treaty of Khorab, signed on the 9th of July of same year, ensured that South Africa, not Germany, had the last say in the national affairs of Namibia until it's independence. The League of Nations, the precursor of the United Nations mandated Namibia to South Africa in 1920, sadly, from 1948, was captured by South Africa, which later imposed by it's obnoxious apartheid policies onto Namibia too. The once disputed territory in southern Africa, and bordered by South Africa, which received it by a mandate from the League of Nations refused to give it up after WW II. A UN resolution in 1966 ended the mandate but this was ignored by the South Africans. In 1966, the South West African People's Organization /SWAPO/ launched a war of independence for the country later became Namibia, but it was not until 1988 that apartheid South Africa agreed to end it's mandate administration in accordance with a UN peace plan for the entire region.

In 1985, a United Nations report classified the events as an attempt to exterminate the Hereros and Nama (Darma) peoples of Southwest Africa, and therefore the earliest attempted genocide in the 20th century. Through long negotiations involving many factions and interests, Namibia achieved it's independence in March, 1990. It's new name derives from "Namib" meaning "variously shield" or "wild disolation". The earlier the descendants of the German and South African colonizers ruled the country between them from 1844 to 1990. So even these days, Namibia lookes a mini-South Africa after apartheid while the white section of the population, who were facilitated by apartheid forefathers to enjoy all the previleges in life, while the majority black population struggling to make a living. The white Namibians make-up just 6% of the toal population but control over 90 % of the total Namibian arable lands which made commercialized farmlands. A large part of the country is desertic, but a rich desert in resource, full of Diamonds and Uranium, which are mainly mined and taken away by multi-national companies who do not leave enough to empower the native Namibians.

In 2004, Germany expressed regret officially for what happened in the colonial era. Germany has repeatedly expressed regret but consistently refused to pay reparations to it's former colony, arguing that it has given much development aid to Namibia. The ruling-South West African Peoples Organization (SWAPO), the liberation movement turned party has been governed Namibia, since the country won it's independence in 19th March, 1990. The vast country but sparsely populated Namibia, believed the second least-densely populated country in the world, has enjoyed stability in the region since it's independence, it has been long known as "A land of mystery". In the hearts of southern Africa's Kalahari desert, the Kalahari bushmen in southern Africa used a Cactus like plant to quell their appetite when on long hunts. The Kalahari bushmen are admired for their Camel-like ability to trekk-across deserts for days on end without water or food, all due to a specific molecule that reduces their hunger.

As recent event Namibian crowds welcomed colonial-era skulls from Germany. Hundreds of Namibians have recently welcomed home 20 skulls of ancestors taken to Germany more than a century ago. Believed the German scientists took the heads to perform discredited racial experiments. The skulls are believed to belong to eleven people from the Nama (Darma) ethnic-group and nine from the Hereros, who were died after an uprising against their German colonial rulers more than hundred years ago. They were among hundreds who starved to death after being rounded-up in camps. The incumbent head of state, Mr. Hilfikepunye Pohamba was elected president in November, 2004, 2009 replacing the founder-president Mr. Sam Shafishuna Nujoma, he who led the country during it's first fourteen years of self-rule before he got retired from government duties on March, 2005, he remains chairman of the ruling-Southwest African Peoples Organization (SWAPO) party.

Endnote: A judge ruled that three HIV-positive women in Namibia were sterilized without their informed consent, their lawyer said. But the high court judge said the women did not provide enough evidence to prove that they were sterilized because they were HIV-positive, according to attorney Amon Ngavetene. The judge has not yet decided on awarding damages in the case, said Ngavetene, coordinator of the AIDS Law Unit at the Legal Assistance Centre. The women were seeking 1.2 million Namibian dollars (about $150,000) in compensation. The center is representing 18 women, alleging that public hospitals sterilized them without their informed consent. Namibian authorities have denied accusations that forced sterilizations have been a matter of government policy. Emilia Handumbo, one of the HIV-positive women suing the government, told CNN last year that she was given documents to sign while she was in labor and about to give birth in a public hospital. "I thought they were papers for the caesarian, but then the nurse said to me, 'I think they are going to close you,'" she said. Thanks to anti-AIDS drugs, Handumbo gave birth to a healthy, HIV-negative baby. But then the letters "BTL" appeared in her hospital file. The letters, she later learned, stood for bilateral tubal ligation, a form of sterilization. Attorney Corinna van Wyk said Handumbo is one of many women who are victims of a broken health system. "Doctors are taking advantage of them," van Wyk said. 'The damage is permanent, obviously, not only physically. These women are discriminated against culturally because they can no longer bear children," she said. Human rights groups say that the high profile nature of such case has done little to change the conduct of some health care workers in Namibia, alleging that more HIV-positive women who claim they were forcibly sterilized are still coming forward. A study from the International Community of Women Living with HIV/AIDS and the Namibia Women's Health Network unearthed 40 cases in three of the country's regions. AIDS activist Jenny Gatsi-Mallet, who helped conduct the research, said doctors working for the state have told her they were just following guidelines.

"They are saying that these guidelines came into being when AIDS first came into the country, and I think that was in 2001, and it was a directive that says any woman who tests positive for HIV should be sterilized straight away," Gatsi-Mallet said. But Dr. Norbert Forster, deputy permanent secretary of Namibia's health ministry, told CNN last year that the sterilization of HIV-positive women was "not at all" an official policy. "That is not our position," he said, adding that forcing women to sign consent documents "would not be in line" with the government's policy.

AFRICAN IDENTITY: Namibia, Africa's non-African country'

By Siji Jabbar (September 29, 2011) — ...power cuts are unknown, the roads are good, the water supply works, traffic jams are almost non-existent...' If any other African country was as orderly and efficient as Namibia, you wouldn't stop hearing about it. Why is so little said about Namibia?

'Windhoek, the capital of Namibia, is one of the cleanest, best sign-posted and most beautiful cities in the world. It is located in the hilly valley of two mountain ranges. It's a city of groomed gardens, well-tended trees, four-and six-lane avenues, modern shopping centres and some of the most hospitable people on earth.'

European descent: The weekly magazine New African, from which the quotes above were taken, is an invaluable source of information. Flicking through the June issue we came across the article The Trouble with Namibia, and we thought, oh, we must share this with our readers. So, with great thanks to New African, here are 10 things you might not know about Namibia (we didn't):

1. Namibia is the 34th largest country in the world, but with 2 million inhabitants it is also one of the least densely populated (2nd only to Mongolia). It's capital city, Windhoek — and its largest city — is just over half the size of New York, but has a population of only 324,000.

2. Namibia is one of the richest countries in Africa. The country's GNP per capita was calculated at $2,334 USD (December, 2005), compared with an African average of $681 USD for the same period. But these averages hide something: the wealth is concentrated in the hands of a very small minority, mainly of European descent. The richest 5% of the population controls 71% of the GDP, with an average income of $14,000 USD per year. The poorest 55% account for 3% of GDP, with a per capita income of less than $100 US per year. The unemployment rate is 54% (in a country of 2 million, remember); about the same percentage lives below the international poverty line.

Genocide: 3. Germany ruled Namibia from 1844 to 1915. It was here that the Germans carried out the first genocide of the 20th century, the Herero and Namaqua Genocide. Half the Nama population and 80% of the Hereros were killed. The survivors, when finally released from detention, were subjected to a policy of dispossession, deportation, forced labour, racial segregation (they were confined to so-called “native territories”) and discrimination. The genocide, plus racist laws and sheer brutality, was used to deprive the black Namibians of their land. This land was “given” to the white settlers.

4.The legacy and influence of German colonialism is still very noticeable, not only in the way the country is run, but also in the street names (Bergerstrasse, Litzstrasse, Uhlandstrasse, etc.) and in the old architecture-

Apartheid: 5. South Africa took control of Namibia in 1920, but South Africa at the time was also ruled by a minority white population, so they continued where the Germans left off, imposing South Africa’s policies of apartheid in Namibia. The “native territories” were turned into “homelands” (Bantustans). Namibia finally got its “independence” in 1990, and has since been run by the South West African People’s Organisation (SWAPO), at least in theory.

6. Today’s white Namibians are the descendants of the German and South African colonisers who ruled the country from 1844 to 1990. They make up 6% of the population, but, having held on to the privileges of apartheid, control 90% of the land: 40% of this land is commercial and fenced off, and considered private property. Some of its owners are absentee European landowners who live permanently in Italy, Germany and elsewhere.

7. A large part of Namibia is desert, but desert rich in diamonds, gold, silver, base metals and uranium (it holds the second largest uranium deposits in the world). These are mined and sold by multinationals such as British company Rio Tinto. Some diamond cutting is done in Windhoek, but most is exported raw by the multinationals who mine them. Colonial treaties signed by Western multinationals ensure that the companies and their shareholders in the West enjoy the fruits of Namibia’s resources, with very little of these fruits accruing to the indigenous Namibian population.

8. Shanty town: Katutura (which, in the Herero language, means “The place where we do not want to live”) is where a good percentage of Windhoek’s black population lives. It’s a township created in 1961 so black people could be moved away from the Old Location to make way for the creation of Hochland Park, a whites-only affluent suburb. After independence, Hochland Park became a residential area for the upper middle-class, both black (the few who are doing well, and government ministers) and white.

9. Arable land is farmed on an industrial scale in Namibia (the country is a major beef exporter to Europe), but commercial agriculture doesn't employ much labour: the average commercial farm employed 6 people as of 2005. Thus commercial agriculture as a whole employs about 8% of the labour force.

10. Without land of their own, most of the black population can't become self-employed farmers, or even sustenance farmers (as happens elsewhere in Africa). There is a scheme in place to redistribute some of the land to black farmers, but this is a slow process (between 1990 and 2002, only 1% of commercial land was redistributed). The government cannot do much about this because during the independence negotiations, something called Chapter 3 was inserted into the Namibian Constitution at the request of the Contact Group (made up of the UK, USA, Canada, Germany and France) to prevent the SWAPO government from doing anything radical with the land.

Redistribution? Thus, 21 years after independence, Namibia is still ruled and 'owned' by the descendants of the German and white South African colonisers. A few thousand white Namibians living large, while the majority black population hews wood, draws water, lives mostly in townships and under the poverty line, and remains mostly unemployed. White Namibians are Namibians, too, of course, but when the wealth gap is so obviously based on race as a result of the country's history, isn't some faster redistribution of the country's wealth called for? At the current rate it will take a few generations to make much of a difference, let alone equitable. A time-bomb waiting to explode, as it did in Zimbabwe.

Accession to power of president Hilfikepunye Pohamba - 21st March, 2005, elected.

Tentative election calendar - Presidential/Parliamentary, November/March.

Namibia – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

1488 - Portuguese explorer Bartolomeu Dias visits.

1886-90 - Present international boundaries established by German treaties with Portugal and Britain. Germany annexes the territory as South West Africa.

1892-1905 - Suppression of uprisings by Herero and Namas. Possibly 60,000, or 80% of the Herero population, are killed, leaving some 15,000 starving refugees.

1915 - South Africa takes over territory during First World War.

1920 - League of Nations grants South Africa mandate to govern South West Africa (SWA).

1946 - United Nations refuses to allow South Africa to annex South West Africa. South Africa refuses to place SWA under UN trusteeship.

1958 - Herman Toivo Ya Toivo and others create the opposition Ovamboland People's Congress, which becomes the South West Africa People's Organisation (Swapo) in 1960.

1961 - UN General Assembly demands South Africa terminate the mandate and sets SWA's independence as an objective.

1966 – SWAPO launches armed struggle against South African occupation.

1968 - South West Africa officially renamed Namibia by UN General Assembly.

1972 - UN General Assembly recognises Swapo as "sole legitimate representative" of Namibia's people.

1988 - South Africa agrees to Namibian independence in exchange for removal of Cuban troops from Angola.

1989 - UN-supervised elections for a Namibian Constituent Assembly. SWAPO wins.

Independence celebrations: Namibia's new president Sam Nujoma shakes hands with President FW de Klerk of South Africa, which gave up rule over the territory

March 1990 - Namibia becomes independent, with Sam Nujoma as first president.

1994 - South African exclave of Walvis Bay turned over to Namibia.

1994 – Sam Njoma and SWAPO re-elected.

1998 - Hundreds of residents of the Caprivi Strip flee to Botswana, alleging persecution by the Namibian government.

August 1998 - Namibia, Angola and Zimbabwe send troops to the Democratic Republic of Congo to support President Laurent Kabila against rebels.

August 1999 - Emergency declared in Caprivi Strip following series of attacks by separatists.

December 1999 – Sam Nujoma wins third presidential term.

December 1999 - World Court rules in favour of Botswana in territorial dispute with Namibia over the tiny Chobe River island of Sedudu - known as Kasikili by Namibians.

November 2001 - President Sam Nujoma says he will not stand for a fourth term when his presidency expires in 2004.

August 2002 - New prime minister, Theo-Ben Gurirab, says land reform is a priority. President Sam Nujoma says white farmers must embrace the reform programme.

November 2003 - Union representing black farmworkers calls off plans to invade 15 white-owned farms after reaching agreement with white farmers' group. Government says illegal land occupations will not be allowed.

May 2004 - Road bridge across Zambezi river between Namibia, Zambia opens amid hopes for boost to regional trade.

August 2004 - Germany offers formal apology for colonial-era killings of tens of thousands of ethnic Hereros, but rules out compensation for victims' descendants.

Herero women prepare to vote in the 2004 presidential elections

November 2004 - Hilfikepunye Pohamba, President Sam Nujoma's nominee, wins presidential elections. He is inaugurated in March, 2005.

September 2005 - Government begins the expropriation of white-owned farms as part of a land-reform programme.

November 2005 - Two mass graves are found near a former South African military base in the north. They are thought to date back to the apartheid-era independence struggle.

June 2006 - National anti-polio vaccination campaign is launched following the death of at least 12 people from the disease.

February 2007 - Chinese President Hu Jintao visits, signs aid and economic co-operation agreements.

July 2007 - Controversy as a local rights group asks the International Criminal Court (ICC) to investigate ex-president Sam Nujoma over the death of thousands during the independence struggle.

August 2007 - Ten men are found guilty of treason for leading a secessionist rebellion in the Caprivi region and are given long prison terms.

November 2009 - Presidential and parliamentary polls. President Hilfikpunye Pohamba and his ruling SWAPO party re-elected.

February 2011 - High Court dismisses legal challenge by nine opposition parties claiming irregularities in the 2009 parliamentary election.

July 2011 - Mines and Energy Minister Isak Katali says Nambia has found an estimated 11bn barrels of offshore oil reserves.

October 2011 - Skulls of 20 Herero and Nama people repatriated from a museum in Germany to a welcome from hundreds of descendants.

Namibian president wins African leadership prize

"Let me be honest with you – I just don't understand this. I am in my second term– I love my work but under our constitution, I cannot run again. I actually think I'm a pretty good president: I think if I ran I could win, but I can't.

"There's a lot that I'd like to do to keep America moving, but the law's the law and no one person is above the law, not even the president. I'll be honest with you. I'm looking forward to life after being president. I won't have a great security detail all the time. I can take a walk, spend more time with my family, look for new ways to serve, and make more visits to Africa," Obama was quoted saying by The Guardian.

Sources: Tana
The Guardian

AFRICAN NEWS: Namibian President Unveils 'Prosperity Plan'

Namibian President Hage Geingob has unveiled a prosperity plan which he claims will ensure adequate provision of basic food, clothing, decent shelter, water, basic infrastructure and quality education for every citizen in the country.

Speaking after what he has described as a "historic meeting" with his predecessors, Geingob outlined his Harambee Prosperity Plan, which is intended to complement the country's Fourth National Development Plan (ND4), as well as other existing plans, local newspaper New Erahas reported.

During his meeting with predecessors Hifikepunye Pohamba and Sam Nujoma, Geingob spoke of what he deemed the "New Africa", where leaders are democratically elected and are not persecuted for serving their terms.

"In the New Africa, coups d'état are no more. In the New Africa, our leaders are democratically elected, serve their terms and stay in their countries after their terms of office. In the New Africa, our retired leaders are respected as fathers of their nations," Geingob was quoted as saying.

In addition, the plan also aims at making Namibia "a new-look society" by March 2020. Geingob is expected to provide finer details of the mandate during the delivery of his State of the Nation Address.

Why has it taken Germany over 100 years to admit their genocide in Namibia when post war they profess to be so open about these things?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam Observer of Political Trends
May 28

Everything is political.
As I understand matters, post-war Germany was driven by three goals:

1. Rebuilding the economy of West Germany
2. West European integration
3. Confronting the Soviet Union

West Germany was a more militaristic, conservative society than modern Germany. They just weren't Nazis. At least most of them were not. Quite a few were reformed Nazis.

As the economy boomed, a youth movement raged against their status quo. That helped bring the Left to power on a policy platform that encouraged detente with the Soviets and reduced militarism.

With goal one a smashing success and goal three now politically dead, the political establishment embraced greater Europeanism and Liberalism. The Chancellor knelt at Poland, and the project to spread greater awareness of the Holocaust gained greater salience.

Fast forward to today. Germany is a Liberal, European society subject to Liberal norms.

Previously, Africa was just not important to the calculations of her political establishment.

The increase in the numbers and political heft of the African diaspora across Western Europe, the need for political projects to differentiate themselves from nativist parties, broad-based sympathy for Blacks in the USA and the necessity of greater engagement with African governments to reduce/deter greater migration from the continent were factors that changed that calculus. That combined to push up the European past in Africa further up the agenda. That is also why things like looted artefacts are getting airplay now.

I am comfortable saying that the direct answer to your question is that they had bigger issues on their mind.

Alternatively, that is what the memes tell me the answer is.

What would have happened to Africa if it hadn't been colonized?
Mario Biermann Follow Lived in Africa 17m

Everything should have been “normal”!

Follow Mario Biermann

Related Links

Is Africa poor because of colonization? If colonization never happened, how would Africa have been?

Why hasn't Africa developed as well as other continents?

Could Africans with guns have much more easily beat back the European colonizers, starting with the Portuguese and eventually the English? Why did Africa never discover or acquire the knowledge of firearms?

If Africa is so rich, why hasn't it yet developed and recovered after colonization?

If Africa is poor and backward because of colonialism, why is Ethiopia also poor and backward although it was never colonised?

Why did the world allow Europe to colonize Africa and the entire world? I don't get it. How did colonization happen, and why was it allowed to happen? Before the European colonization, was there ever anything similar?

Why are Africans the only ones who never recovered from colonization?

Why do so many people claim that the colonization of Africa made Europe rich, when Europe was already much more developed than the rest of the world by the 15th century?

If civilisation started in Africa, and all people are believed to come from Africa, how come Africa remains poor and far behind the development?

If colonization hadn't occurred in this world, what would the face of Earth be like as compared to the present day?

Why didn't China colonize Africa? They had superior naval technology than the Europeans and many Chinese travelled to Africa and sent back information. How different would Africa be if this happened?

What would have happened if Columbus had never found America?

Why is Africa the continent which has been mostly abused even throughout history?

Why didn't the Africans colonized Europe?

Why was Africa undeveloped before colonization?

Who is the tribe in "The Gods Must Be Crazy" movie, and do they still dress like that?

Movies & More Follow Answered by Rynne Ivarsson Nov 1

Interesting question and I'm glad you asked because it took me on a mini-learning journey.

The wiki for the film attributes it to the San peoples (also Saan), or Bushmen. They are members of various Khoe, Tuu, or Kx'a-speaking indigenous hunter-gatherer cultures that are the first cultures of Southern Africa, and whose territories span Botswana, Namibia, Angola, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Lesotho and South Africa. In 2017, Botswana was home to approximately 63,500 San people, which is roughly 2.8% of the country's population, making it the country with the highest population of San people.

Their type of dress has not changed in centuries. Below is a scene from the film, below that is a contemporary photo of tribesmen.

Follow Space

Related Links

In Pulp Fiction (1994 movie), what would happen to Vincent and Lance if Mia died and Vincent told Marsellous Wallace that she was a junkie and it wasn't his fault?

Should Tom Cruise make Jack Reacher 3?

How would someone like Clark Griswold from the Vacation movies be treated if he went to Mexico or China with his family and caused chaos without realizing it or insulted the locals with his behavior?

What actor/actress has the best cameo role in a comedy?

In an episode of M*A*S*H, a North Korean soldier on the operating table tried to escape, knocking over the last bottle of AB negative blood. How much of a problem was it during the Korean War (or any subsequent) for medical units to run out of blood?

What didn't you like about Spider-Man: No Way Home?

Which celebrity most Generously donated from Income?

What movie portrays dementia most accurately?

What's your thoughts on the movie "Stillwater" with Matt Damon?

What is the Gimp's backstory in Pulp Fiction, and what happened to him after Butch left?

Which is the most successful Fast and Furious movie?

What movies are part of your Christmas traditions?

What are some of the best books, movies, or shows that deal with the human mind?

How was the term "silver screen" coined?

What are the best comedy movies released in 2021?

Why doesn't South Africa have an actual name, just like Southwest Africa was renamed Namibia?

Ken Westmoreland Knows about South Africa11 mo

It's because no one has come up with an alternative - some of the more radical black nationalist parties like the Pan Africanist Congress of Azania and the Azanian People's Organisation favoured 'Azania', but this had little support elsewhere.
Today, very few people call South Africa 'Azania', and a more commonly used, if colloquial, name is 'Mzansi', from the Xhosa uMzantsi, but even that simply means 'south', so is no more meaningful or evocative than 'South Africa' is.

As it happens, the name 'Azania' is not from any of the African languages spoken in the country, being derived from the Persian word for 'black', just as 'Zanzibar' in East Africa is, and was used in the Evelyn Waugh novel Black Mischief as the name of a fictitious African country, also located in East Africa.

Related Links

Why didn't South Africa change its name after apartheid?

Why are the independent countries Swaziland and Lesotho not part of the Republic of South Africa?

Why doesn't South Africa change its name to Mzanzi or Azania to honor its native people and remove traces of colonialism?

What is the history behind names of African countries which end with 'IA'? Who named them and why? On what agendas? Algeria, Nigeria, Tanzania, Zambia, Gambia, Liberia, Libia, Namibia, Somalia, Tunisia, Ethiopia, South Africa (Azania)

Why did Namibia split from South Africa?
Are Whites beginning to leave South Africa?

Why not rename South Africa? Naming a country as part of a continent sounds irregular.

When was South West Africa changed its name into Namibia?
Should South Africa, Zimbabwe, Botswana and Namibia be one country?
Why is South Africa called that? That's like calling Norway North Europe

Prior to World War I, what were the German Socialists and Communists trying to do with overseas colonial possessions such as New Guinea and Namibia? Did German communists seek to immediately relinquish control over these territories?

Kevin Richardson · Follow PhD in History, The University of Texas at Austin
Fri

While I can’t comment on the exact plans and ideas representatives of the Social Democratic Party of Germany (SPD) held about the future of the colonial possessions of the German Empire, one can definitely attest to a growing split about the general character of colonialism in history within the German Social Democrats around the 1900 mark — this split ran along the lines of an even bigger debate about socialism and the way forward for the socialist movement that was slowly separating Marxists into different groups: A “revisionist” wing (at least that’s what their inner-party opponents called them) most notably represented by Eduard Bernstein who among other things argued that no violent revolution was necessary for a transition to a socialist society which instead would be achievable through gradual reforms; opposed to that group, a wing of "orthodox Marxists" formed around persons like Karl Johann Kautsky or Rosa Luxemburg:

Rosa Luxemburg and Luise Kautsky on holiday in Switzerland in 1909 (left) and Luise and Karl Kautsky in 1902 (right)- unfortunately not the same picture Luxemburg describes in her letter (Source: International Institute for Social History, Amsterdam).

Of course, seeing that internationalism was a lived reality for Social Democrats at the time, these conflicts weren't just confined to the Germany party of Social Democrats but instead openly discussed at meetings of the Second International — indeed, you can find accounts of how such conflicts (about the "colonial question") played out at these congresses by reading the reports several attendants later gave to the parties in their respective countries. One such attendant of the 7th International Socialist Congress held in Stuttgart 1907 (the only one ever being held in Germany) was one of the four representatives from Russia, none other than Vladimir Lenin, who described the discussion of the congress's committee on colonialism as follows:

This is not the first time the colonial question has figured at international congresses. Up till now their decisions have always been an unqualified condemnation of bourgeois colonial policy as a policy of plunder and violence. This time, however, the Congress Commission was so composed that opportunist elements, headed by Van Kol of Holland, predominated in it. A sentence was inserted in the draft resolution to the effect that the Congress did not in principle condemn all colonial policy, for under socialism colonial policy could play a civilising role. [...] The opportunists rallied behind Van Kol. Speaking for the majority of the German delegation Bernstein and David urged acceptance of a "socialist colonial policy" and fulminated against the radicals for their barren, negative attitude, their failure to appreciate the importance of reforms, their lack of a practical colonial programme, etc. Incidentally, they were opposed by Kautsky, who felt compelled to ask the Congress to pronounce against the majority of the German delegation. As we can see, while Henri Van Kol (who himself had not only spent quite some time in the Dutch colony on Java but also ended up buying a coffee plantation) was the main speaker in favor of what he called "positive colonialism", both his primary supporters and opponents in that regard came from the German delegation, the biggest presence at the congress. And as Lenin pointed out, the topic of colonialism wasn't new, esp. for the Social Democrats of Germany. Eduard Bernstein, for example, set out his view on the issue in his 1899 work titled "The Preconditions of Socialism", widely regarded as the first theoretical book on "Revisionist Marxism":

It is not inevitable that the occupation of tropical countries by Europeans should harm the natives in their enjoyment of life, nor has it usually been the case up till now. Moreover, we can recognise only a conditional right of savages to the land they occupy. Higher civilisation has ultimately a higher right. It is not conquest but the cultivation of the land that confers an historical right to its use.

Even at that point, Bernstein found himself in disagreement not just with Kautsky (who regarded any colonial policy as nothing else than capitalist policy) as mentioned by Lenin but also with the chairman of the Social Democratic Party, August Bebel, sometimes called the "Arbeiterkaiser" or "Worker's Kaiser". Ferdinand August Bebel, often regarded as one the father figures of Social Democracy in Germany, had repeatedly denounced the colonial policies and aspirations of the German Empire (esp. under Wilhelm II.) throughout his parliamentary career in the Reichstag, e.g., in a speech on January 26th, 1889:

Basically, the essence of all colonial policy is the exploitation of a foreign population in the highest potency. Wherever we look up the history of colonial policy in the last three centuries, everywhere we encounter violence and the oppression of the peoples concerned, which not infrequently ends with their complete extermination. And the driving motive is always to acquire gold, gold and again only gold. And in order to be able to carry on the exploitation of the African population to the fullest extent and as undisturbed as possible, millions are to be used from the pockets of the empire, from the pockets of the taxpayers, the East African Company is to be supported with the means of the empire, so that the exploitation business is secured for it. (translated with DeepL).

So, in summary, the issue of a socialist perspective on colonialism was a topic of deep discussion and disagreement within the Social Democratic Party of Germany pre-WW1 — embedded in the larger line of conflict between the party's "right" wing of Revisionists around Bernsteind and "left" wing of Orthodox Marxists with Kautsky and Luxemburg was another factor for the eventual split of the Social Democratic Party over the question of supporting the German war effort in WW1. It should be noted though, that the positions weren't as Black and White as this comment makes them out to be for the sake of contrast — Karl Kautsky, unlike Rosa Luxemburg, did not join other left-winger to form what would become the Communist Party of Germany. Kautsky will still have the last word of this reply, maybe being the first part actually answering the question set asked:

The idea of giving up the colonies voluntarily can, therefore, so long as the rule of capitalism continues, only function for us like a compass which shows us the direction in which our policy on the colonies must tend, and not as a practical proposal on whose immediate implementation we must work. Its main practical implication for us is that we cannot agree to any extension in colonial possessions, and that we must work zealously for an increase in the self government of the natives. The native uprisings to throw off foreign domination will be always certain of the sympathies of the fighting proletariat. But the armed might of the capitalist nations is so immense that it is not to be expected that any of these uprisings could come anywhere near their aim.

Sources:

Lenin Collected Works, Progress Publishers, 1972, Moscow, Volume 13, pages 75-81.

Bernstein, E. (1993). The tasks and opportunities of Social Democracy. In H. Tudor (Ed.), Bernstein: The Preconditions of Socialism (Cambridge Texts in the History of Political Thought, pp. 98-188). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. doi:10.1017/CBO9780511802584.010

August Bebel's speech in front of the Reichstag on January 26nd 1889 (German)
Karl Kautsky: Socialism and Colonial Policy (1907), ch. 9

Related Links

Before WW1, what did Germany's socialists and communists seek to do with overseas colonial possessions like New Guinea and Namibia?

What if during WW1, the Germans were able to repel the Australian invasion of German New Guinea and also took over Australian Papua/Port Moresby with their East Asia Squadron? What if they also invaded the Cape York Peninsula and Cairns?

I was recently talking to a friend of mine and she said Canada is becoming a communist country. Do you think we are heading in this direction?

If the Germans had won the Second World War, would National Socialism have spread across the world similar to how Communism did?

If Germany and Austria had not been involved in any world war, would German now be the international language, like Portuguese, spoken in Central Europe, China's Kiautschou, Papua New Guinea, Samoa, the Asia-Pacific islands, African, etc.countries?

Was Samoa a German colony?

Did any Nazi after the end of the Second World War flee to Namibia as it was a former German colony?

What if the Spartacist revolution succeeded and Germany became communist? How do Germans today deal with the Nazi past?

How were East German communist officials treated in Germany immediately following its unification?

How well is the Herero-German war in Namibia, Southern Africa, where about 80,000 Hereros were killed during 1904 -1908, under the German General Lothar von Trotha known?

Why didn't France and Belgium join forces during World War I to expand their domains in Africa by taking more German colonies? Wouldn't that be coherent considering the linguistic-cultural affinity, and the hardships suffered against Germany?

Why don't previous German colonies in Africa speak German as their National language?

What would have happened if Germany had won WWII?
Was Stalin a communist?

What made Cubans dominate over South Africans militarily in Angola and Namibia?

Ruth Dreyer · Follow Updated 9mo

Mark here: This answer is addressed to Boris Sanochkin, but I feel we can all use it.

We are both addressing & countering political narratives. Let us set them aside. Neither advances the truth.

You say the Cubans ruled the skies…

This ground-forces grunt knows that throughout the Bush war in Angola we were frequently deployed, withdrawn & received air-supplies by helicopter - that is, slow, soft-skinned low altitude & minimally armed aircraft. We stopped & nattered with a local hunter on one occasion, deep in, & en passant spotted a DC-47 Dakota flying past. He commented, "That plane is lost. The road they take runs north-west south-east by Cuvalai." The point in his comment is that the RSA Air Force was doing MILK-RUNS over Angola, & the locals KNEW this; again, with slow, prop-driven thin-skinned, unarmed low-flying aircraft. A third example, on one occasion we had a FAPLA/Cuban column boxed in, besieged in the field, unable to move, & without access to water, food or munitions. They resorted to a veritable wagon-train of Mi-8 helicopters, if I remember aright, for re-supply of a column in serious trouble. But we got an inkling of it, our intelligence was GOOD, & we sent over a raid of Impala (Aermacchi 326) fighter trainers. The plus of this is that these jet aircraft, less than minimally viable in modern conflict, could throttle back more or less to the cruising speed of a helicopter. This gave the 'Injuns' in their Impalas optimum dawdle-time with their guns on target, instead of flashing past for a quick squirt & then circling back (some time later) for another all too short squirt. They WASTED the wagon train - the choppers - the helicopters.

The necessary inference is that in none of these cases were the SAAF aircraft so much as challenged by CAFIA aircraft. Hell, they had Mig-23's, we know they did. One defected. They had Mi-8's, of course they did, but they never deployed them for air domination of the Theatre of Conflict: Never. Our Mirages flew freely all over Angola, our Canberras flew freely all over Angola, our Dakotas flew freely all over Angola, & our helicopters flew all too freely all over Angola.

I tell you now: Not a damn would I let that happen if I had aerial domination over the Theatre of Conflict. So also for Agustino Neto - So also for Fidel Castro.

You write, “The Cubans on the over hand had a decent air force equipped with modern jets, decent armor and a knowledge to use it.” Whatever, we know they didn’t.

Scratch that Lie.

Now, our Army, hampered though it was by sanctions, took the lead in several directions, built our own munitions, & deployed them all too effectively. I expect, Boris, that you are not all that unaware of a South African G-5 howitzer that with one shot from a distance of over 50 Kilometres detonated an entire Cuban munitions stockpile. We see that the weapons we built & deployed for conventional operations have a second life all over the World today, as for example our Mine Protected Vehicles, our Artillery & our military electronics. Oh, we did make heavy use of your RPG-7 rocket grenade launchers, one to every platoon - after all we had captured so many.

Sadly, so much else of what we captured was not all that viable in modern conflict. Our take on it was that your lot found no use for them either. Um, we did find a use for your semtex, Czechoslovakian, hey, for military demolitions - against your own structures. You probably know that too.

Scratch that lie.

How did we manage to get hold of all that stuff? Conventional infantry operations against CFA/FAPLA. You write, “ The battle of Cuito-Cuanavale in 1988 in Angola was the turning point of the conflict. 3,000 Soviet and East German troops have been involved on the Cuban side based on anti-Soviet stance of the South African side.” On the contrary. They planned to advance - they planned to cross a river - the SADF stopped them. In. Their. Tracks. CFA/FAPLA forces numbering over 7 500, with the support of East German & USSR ‘advisers’ got their faces plastered to their arses at Cuito Carnavale, by less than 3 000 SADF troops, & not all of them got to be deployed. You call that a victory? I pray God send all my enemies just such a victory as this. Grant this, My Lord, of your great mercy: Amen. (That was a prayer).

It bears note that the OC CFIA, on his return to Cuba, was arrested on trumped up charges & executed before a firing squad. The OC CAFIA smelt the writing on the wall & on thinking it over, flew straight on to Florida, USA, there to apply for (& receive) political asylum. Their military record plainly did not amount, in Castro’s opinion, to Victory. Shall we not defer to his judgement???

Scratch that lie.

The actual question is, “What made Cubans dominate over South Africans militarily in Angola and Namibia?”

They did not, the poor creatures. It really wasn’t fair, what Castro did to them, post them over to Africa without due & appropriate training, equipment & preparation. These same Cubans did not come within long running distance of, to, or from the Namibian Border.

These years past, I have had to do with South African Doctors that went over to study Medicine in Cuba. They came back with no illusions at all. What they had to tell of the Cuban experience of the Angolan War makes sobering conversation for devoted African Socialists. Their return to practice in South Africa is one of the hardest blows to the ANC narrative outright, from their own ranks.

Boris Sanochkin , former (Ret.) Lt. Colonel Answered Mar 17, 2021

I feel like entering a toxic territory of Cuban-South African YouTube wars here but it seems like a quite easy question to answer.

South Africa had a perfectly decent military but they had a specific experience, generally battling agianst primitive tribesmen over centuries.

They had knowledge of bush warfare, competent artillerymen and talented special forces in small group tactics but all of the above was perfectly out of place against a modern military equipped with up to date gear and trained in combined arms tactics.

The Cubans on the over hand had a decent air force equipped with modern jets, decent armor and a knowledge to use it. If not better experienced they had better equipped artillery including MRLS and nice special forces as well, although better suited for jungle and urban warfare.

Also the problem for the South Africans was that when they started to tackle internal problems by attacks on other countries they portrayed it as a war against global communism, to try to win hearts and minds in the West. Given the Marxist infestation of Western institutions in 1970s it was a gross mistake, resulting in severe sanctions against the regime using racism as a pretext, and also forced the Soviet logistic support for Castro for whom the intervention was largely a war on racism, to tackle the accusations of his own regime as racist.

All in all, the Cubans ruled the skies and also had the support of Africans on the ground who disliked ‘Gringos’ how the Cubans called South Africans.

The batlle of Cuito-Cuanavale in 1988 in Angola was the turning point of the conflict. 3,000 Soviet and East German troops have been involved on the Cuban side based on anti-Soviet stance of the South African side.

The South Africans lost and retreated. The Cubans planned a Highway of Death sort of humiliating bombing on them but Gorbachev told Castro to have mercy. That is likely the reason of the modern YouTube wars with South Africans, who claim they won the war but were robbed of victory. Otherwise they would be dead and won't make bombastic claims.

All in all the Cubans liberated Angola from the South Africans and then annexed the Western better part of South Africa - a mineral rich Namibia which is an independent country right now.

Then the Cuban proxies had an uprising in South Africa proper, resulting in the removal of the minority white administration, making the claims of South Africans of how much better comparing to Cubans they were quite laughable.

Related Links

How does the rest of Africa view white South Africans? As an Afrikaner, I feel a lot of animosity from fellow Africans outside of SA. I can understand why, but regardless of where we came from, we now feel African.

After South Africa gave independence to Namibia, did South Africa continue to have troops deployed to Angola?

Did any black South Africans support Apartheid?
Why did South Africa occupy Namibia?
Do black South Africans see white South Africans as African or belonging to Africa?
Why did South Africa end its occupation of Namibia?

If colonialism and Apartheid was wrong, why haven't the land of the African people been returned back to them in South Africa and Namibia?

What is the future of the remaining white populations in South Africa and Namibia?

Did Cuban soldiers ever meet Portuguese or South African soldiers in colonial wars in Africa?

What future do white Africans (especially South Africans, Namibia) have in the country?

What country has a smaller population than most people realize?

Wairia Lawyer & Amateur Astronomer (2013–present) Updated Jan 17

One country comes to mind: Namibia.

With a total area of 825,615 km2, that makes it the 34th biggest country in the world. That's not a negligible area. Infact, it's bigger that some big countries in Europe like France, Germany, UK and Spain. Heck it's even bigger than my own country Kenya. So you'd be forgiven to assume it can compete population wise with these countries. No! Sorry No again. It has a paltry population of 2.5m people. That's about 5% population of Kenya.

The reason? Namibia have alot of these:

Namibia is situated between Namib and Kalahari deserts. Meaning it the most driest country in sub saharan Africa, of course that translates to little or no agriculture which most African countries rely on.

Unless Namibia figures out its food deficit problem it can't sustain a huge population. However, it's economy is considerably better than most African countries thanks to mining and tourism so its population is steadily increasing.

Try and visit Namibia it's one of the most peaceful and scenic countries in Africa.

Related Links

Why is India so populated?
How did China get so big in size and population?

Why exactly is Nigeria so populous and so densely populated relative to other African countries?

Is Nigeria really 170 million in population?
Why are India and China are the most populated in the world?
Why are Asian countries the most populous?
Is Bangladesh the most overpopulated country in the world?

Which countries have the highest percentage of white people?
What is it like to live in Bangladesh?
Is having a very large population beneficial or harmful for a country?

Who created the canals that extend over hundreds of square kilometers across Namibia, Botswana, and Angola?

Kevin Richardson · Follow PhD in History, The University of Texas at AustinJan 25

You appear to be getting this from the Time-Life Mysteries chunk of the Internet, where I'm seeing lots of gushing about ancient irrigation systems in the Kalahari. (Representative example here.)

Go a little deeper than Google Maps, here- you're looking at one low-resolution photograph. The problem is magnified in Google Earth, because these features are smoothed out by algorithms meant to create 3D images of human streets and buildings- they're going to suggest a world full of more polygons and straight lines.

What you're looking at is the Kalahari Desert, and the Kalahari is full of — everyone say it together — SAND:

Sand, when blown by consistent winds from one direction, forms dunes. These dunes take on a rhythmic, linear appearance. I could go on, but I'm going to go straight to a source which also relies on aerial photography — this page from NASA's website.

NASA's Terra satellite captured this image on May 7, 2007... the long, thin diagonal stripes are linear dunes.

So what you're seeing are not shadows within canals, but shadows cast by tall dunes.

Fascinatingly enough, you have accidentally stumbled onto a mystery; the dunes didn't make sense given to wind and vegetation patterns in the Kalahari. According to NASA, researchers in the 1980s and 1990s drilled into the dunes and found that they likely formed between 28,000 and 10,000 years ago, and enough vegetation now survives to hold their shape largely intact.

So, this is a fun exercise which shows us a few things.

If a claim invites skepticism, dig a little deeper.
Look at everything from more than one angle (literally, in this case).

Google returns what you ask for. If you search for "ancient canals in Botswana and Northeastern Namibia," you'll get a flood (ha) of information from Blogspot ranters and Papyrus-font researchers and all kinds of woo-adjacent flakery. If you search for "lines Namibia," this is the first image result — and that led me quickly to solve this mystery.

Observing something through your screen is not observing something. On-the-ground, practical experience is vital. We are, in general, disconnected from the way the world works, and we are addicted to the instant authority of the tools we seem to command. It is necessary to humble ourselves and accept that we need to look harder, think harder, and be better.

Most importantly: Your curiosity and your passion are to be commended. You're fascinated about what the world contains. You're excited that there could be stories hidden everywhere. You're goddamn right. The fact that the conclusion does not match your hypothesis should not disappoint you. You learned something today, and your question allowed lots of other people to learn something, and that is how science and knowledge are built. That's about the only thing that truly lifts humans up and makes them special. Don't be discouraged. Keep exploring.

Related Links

Who created the canals which stretch for hundreds of square miles across Namibia, Botswana, and Angola?

These features appear to be an ancient canal network. They are extremely linear and stretch for hundreds of miles across Namibia, Botswana, Angola, Zambia, and Zimbabwe. Does anyone have any evidence they aren't man made?

What has caused Namibia and Botswana to fare better economically and be much more stable in general compared to other post-independence sub-Saharan African nations, despite both having large areas of fairly inhospitable terrain?

What led to racial relations being better in Namibia and Botswana, compared to South Africa?

Why is Namibia & Botswana allowing Canada to destroy the Okavango Delta through drilling oil? Is Namibia not concerned for their rivers, wildlife, and environment, especially air/water pollution and the damage it will leave?

How much would it cost if the Botswana government decided to buy a portion of land in Namibia that is close to the sea. Like a narrow strip of land of land from Namibia to Botswana that is connected to the sea?

Should South Africa, Zimbabwe, Botswana and Namibia be one country?

It is plausible to travel from Angola to Botswana via passing through Namibia? What travel method would this entail? Could I go directly from Cuando Cubango province in Angola to Ngamiland region of Botswana?

Can Zimbabwe's economy recover and become an upper middle income economy like Botswana, South Africa or Namibia?

What if South Africa, Namibia, Angola, Botswana, Swaziland and Lesotho merged into one country?

What was the purpose of the millions of stone circle structures found all over southern Africa, Zimbabwe, Botswana, Mozambique areas of the world?

What if Angola decides to build a dam on the Cubango river? Would the river stop flowing into Botswana Okavango delta, and then that would heavily affect Botswana's economy?

Why do African countries like Namibia and Botswana spend heavily on the military?

Why are Namibia and Botswana drilling oil in the Okavango Delta, destroying one of the biggest natural habitats which animals/people depend on?

Which is the best country between Rwanda, Botswana, and Namibia for a foreign doctor/specialist?

Did South Africa ever own Namibia?

Ruth Dreyer 11mo

Mark Here: No, never. After the Union of South Africa conquered then German South West Africa in WW-I, the League of Nations laid on the Union a 'C'-Grade Mandate (one of many, 12 in Africa alone), in terms of which the country was more a protectorate - under the protection - of South Africa than a possession. The League of Nations collapsed in mediocrity & disgrace, WW-II came & passed, & the United Nations Organisation was established. Let it be noted that there was no De Jure continuity between the League & the UN, & notwithstanding such claims, the UN had neither the actual power nor the moral authority to claim such, De Facto.

Nonetheless, the Union, & then the Republic, of South Africa upheld its burden as Trustee of South West Africa, the only trustee outright to do so.

It is in the spirit of this trusteeship that South Africa respected, though it DID NOT defer, to UN scrutiny, in 1962, of the Territory under Victorio Carpio of the Philippines and Dr Martinez de Alva of Mexico; & later, in 1989 under Martti Oiva Kalevi Ahtisaari, the Finnish statesman, & ultimately shepherd the Mandate to what would become the Constitutional Democracy of Namibia. This was the ONLY 'C'-Grade Mandate outright to actually achieve its intended status. This is a lasting shame & a rebuke to the League of Nations, to the United Nations, to the World, & specifically the Trustee countries, not excluding the UK.

Related Links

Should South Africa, Zimbabwe, Botswana and Namibia be one country?

What led to racial relations being better in Namibia and Botswana, compared to South Africa?

Why did Namibia split from South Africa?
How does Namibia differ from and compare to South Africa?
Why did South Africa give Walvis Bay to Namibia?

Did the Independent Bantustan in South Africa agree to rejoin South Africa at the end of Apartheid, or were they forced to rejoin it?

What are the main differences between Namibia and South Africa?
What role did white people play in Namibia's independence from South Africa?
Why did South Africa occupy Namibia?
Is it true that South Africa was empty when the colonizers arrived?

If colonialism and Apartheid was wrong, why haven't the land of the African people been returned back to them in South Africa and Namibia?

Did the South African apartheid government want to give Namibia independence?

What were the territories set aside for black inhabitants of South Africa and South West Africa (now Namibia), as part of the policy of apartheid, called?

Why did Lesotho, Botswana and Swaziland not become part of the Union of South Africa?

What were the differences between Namibian and South African apartheid?

How does Namibia differ from and compare to South Africa?

Tia Elago-Oretu Kaumunika Lived in Windhoek, Namibia (2006–2018) 2y

Geography: Obviously, Namibia is situated in an area that is not South Africa. The area that this happens to be is mostly desert or arid. Because of this, Namibia's climate is much more hostile to human habitation: many of Namibia's cities are among the driest in the world!
This also means that Namibia is far more sparsely populated than South Africa. Despite it being 67% the size of South Africa, it has only about 4% the population of South Africa!

Demographics:

Racially, the makeup of Namibia is basically identical to that of South Africa. However, the two countries actually share very few ethnic groups. Apart from Batswana, Coloured, Afrikaners and Khoisan tribes (the latter of which dont make up a very significant population in South Africa), Namibians are very much different from South Africans ethnically. Even when it comes to white Namibians: whereas 1/3 of white South Africans are English, the Namibian whites are 1/3 German instead. This is as a result of:

History:

Namibia, between 1915 and 1990 was under South African rule, and thus has a shared history. Before that, the history of Namibia was a little different. In South Africa, the Brits came to absorb local Kingdoms and Boer Republics. In Namibia, that was done by the Germans. Aside from that colonial period, much of the histories are the same or similar. This has also left a very distinctive mark on Namibian culture, and is perhaps one of the more important ways Namibians differentiate their national culture from South Africa's. Which brings me to:

Lifestyle and culture:

Namibia and South Africa are culturally virtually identical. From this angle, what goes in SA goes in Nam. It actually becomes infuriating for Namibians sometimes cause Namibian memes and songs are essentially claimed by South Africa!! Arghh!! Look it this madness!! hahaha

Music, car culture, language (Afrikaans and English slang, which leaks into all other languages in both countries), cinema, internet culture and so much more see no borders between the two countries. Braaiing, complaining about the governments, land discussion, supporting the Bokke, jokes about “resurrection” hoaxes and so much more connect us a lot.

Aside from this, many of the social issues are identical between the two countries. How to deal with high black unemployment rates, township reintegration, sprawling shanty-towns, the now highly contentious (in South Africa) land issue, and many more can be seen to a similar scale in both countries. However, I would dare say that Namibians and Namibian politicians are more level-headed when dealing with these issues (change my mind, I dare you!!) We also have better beer, and better bread. We also officially have better roads (this is also an important item of pride for Namibians)!!

In return, South Africa is a good wine supplier and I have to say their music is out of this world (they run so many genres in secret, from Rock, Pop, EDM, Afrobeat and what have you!)

In all, Namibia generally differs here and there from South Africa. Namibia is more-or-less the Austria to South Africa’s Germany. (Sidenote: I realise this is not only in our similarities, but also in that last time we were one place it all got a little racist and neighbours got bombed a here and there)

Related Links

What difference does it make to live in Namibia and not South Africa?
What are the main differences between Namibia and South Africa?

Why did Namibia split from South Africa?

What led to racial relations being better in Namibia and Botswana, compared to South Africa?

What is it like to live in Namibia?
How does the cost of living in Namibia compare to South Africa?
Is South Africa more developed than Namibia?
Should South Africa, Zimbabwe, Botswana and Namibia be one country?
What is life like in Namibia?
Is Namibia the only successful post-colonial African state?
How is South Africa viewed by their neighbours (Namibia, Botswana, etc.)?
How does South Africa differ from Lithuania?
What does the border between South Africa and Namibia look like?
Which country is better between Zimbabwe & Namibia?
Is Namibia more like South Africa or Botswana?

Which desert is the most amazing?

Journey into the Wild · Follow Answered by Victoria Ng Feb 14

The only desert in the world that housed elephants who traveled in the desert sands. This is one of many amazing deserts!

The Namibia Desert

At 43 millions years old, many consider the Namibia to be the world's oldest desert, which also features the highest sand dunes. The Skeleton Coast is also part of the desert, straddling the Atlantic Ocean from southern Angola along the length of northern Namibia. Though numerous whale and seal bones once lined the shores during the whaling industry, today old shipwrecks, caught off guard by fog and off-shore rocks, rest on this barren coast. Despite its harsh conditions, the Namib is the only desert in the world to have elephants, which have larger feet for traversing the sands and get their water from the vegetation they consume.

How did Namibia avoid the strife and struggle that South Africa has experienced over the past 25 years?

Izak Burger Born Namibian 2y

I think the main reason is simply that there are much less people in Namibia. Where South Africa has over 50 million people, Namibia has about 2 Million.

I believe there are secondary reasons as well.

The first is that the progression of presidents in Namibia went the opposite way that it did in South Africa. Over time the various presidents became gradually more outspoken about the need for forgiveness and reconciliation, whereas in South Africa such talk was at its peak under Mandela and went decidedly downhill from there.

The second is that you're dealing with different cultures. The dominant Ovambo tribe, as well a the Herero, the Damara and the Nama are quite different to the Xhosa or the Zulu. The Zulu nation has a long military history with many strong military leaders (Shaka, Dingaan, etc), whereas Namibian history tells us of only one strong Ovambo leader (Mandume).

The third reason, Namibia had less British influence. One can argue that a lot of our problems related to segregation actually started with the Brits. Namibia was still very German at this point: Not that the Germans were much better in general (one need only read about Von Trotha), but sometimes small details like that is enough to steer things in a different direction.

Fourth reason: Climate. You will note that the Northern Cape is quite a bit more peaceful than Limpopo or Mpumalanga, where most farm murders actually occur. Namibia's climate is dry, much like the Northern cape, and has many of the same people as well (descendents of the Khoi and Nama). Maybe it's part of the human condition, that when the land is hard, the hearts of the people are softer.

Related Answer

How are white people treated in Namibia? Is it like Zimbabwe and South Africa?

Henri Burger , Medical Practitioner, Nature Lover, South African
Answered Aug 4, 2019

I'm not sure whether you mean as a white inhabitant or a visitor, so I'll try and explain from both perspectives.

Namibians are generally a friendly lot - a small population in a relatively big country. Wherever you go, you are constantly aware of wide open spaces in a dry environment. I've visited the country many times and have never experienced any sort of animosity. Of course, if you behave like an idiot, people will treat you as one, but that is true for almost any place on earth.

I don't have first hand experience of living there permanently, but I have several friends and far off relatives who do, and they all seem to be pretty happy. On that note I have to tell you about an old varsity friend of mine who practices medicine in Swakopmund.

You may be aware that pre-independence South Africa fought a border war against SWAPO insurgents in northern Namibia. South West Africa (as the territory was known then) residents were assigned to the SWA Territorial Forces during military conscription, and said friend was assigned to the SWATF headquarters in Windhoek as a doctor.

As it was always his intention to practice medicine in his home country, he delivered his medical service with exceptional duty and diligence, to the extent that once his conscription ended, he received a Certificate of Exceptional Service from both the Head of SWATF and the Commander of the South African Military Medical Services.

So, years later on a visit to Namibia I looked him up at his practice in Swakopmund and one of the first things I noticed was the two framed Certificate of Exceptional Service on the wall behind the desk in his consulting room. Intrigued, I asked him whether he had any ex SWAPO combatants as patients. Many, he told me.

I then asked him what they think of his military certificates. They love it, he told me, proceeding to say that in their view the only difference between the South African forces and them was that the South Africans had much better medical care, and they respect that.

That's his story, not mine, but I think it does illustrate what the relationships are in Namibia.

With all that said, if you intent to visit Namibia, please do so. I cannot recommend any other country more than Namibia, and I promise you you will not regret it.

And please drop me a note of thanks once you've done it!

Related Answer
How does Namibia differ from and compare to South Africa?

Tia Elago-Oretu Kaumunika lived in Windhoek, Namibia (2006-2018)
Answered Mar 11, 2019

Geography:

Obviously, Namibia is situated in an area that is not South Africa. The area that this happens to be is mostly desert or arid. Because of this, Namibia's climate is much more hostile to human habitation: many of Namibia's cities are among the driest in the world!

This also means that Namibia is far more sparsely populated than South Africa. Despite it being 67% the size of South Africa, it has only about 4% the population of South Africa!

Demographics:

Racially, the makeup of Namibia is basically identical to that of South Africa. However, the two countries actually share very few ethnic groups. Apart from Batswana, Coloured, Afrikaners and Khoisan tribes (the latter of which dont make up a very significant population in South Africa), Namibians are very much different from South Africans ethnically. Even when it comes to white Namibians: whereas 1/3 of white South Africans are English, the Namibian whites are 1/3 German instead. This is as a result of:

History:

Namibia, between 1915 and 1990 was under South African rule, and thus has a shared history. Before that, the history of Namibia was a little different. In South Africa, the Brits came to absorb local Kingdoms and Boer Republics. In Namibia, that was done by the Germans. Aside from that colonial period, much of the histories are the same or similar. This has also left a very distinctive mark on Namibian culture, and is perhaps one of the more important ways Namibians differentiate their national culture from South Africa's. Which brings me to:

Lifestyle and culture:

Namibia and South Africa are culturally virtually identical. From this angle, what goes in SA goes in Nam. It actually becomes infuriating for Namibians sometimes cause Namibian memes and songs are essentially claimed by South Africa!! Arghh!! Look it this madness!! hahaha

Music, car culture, language (Afrikaans and English slang, which leaks into all other languages in both countries), cinema, internet culture and so much more see no borders between the two countries. Braaiing, complaining about the governments, land discussion, supporting the Bokke, jokes about “resurrection” hoaxes and so much more connect us a lot.

Aside from this, many of the social issues are identical between the two countries. How to deal with high black unemployment rates, township reintegration, sprawling shanty-towns, the now highly contentious (in South Africa) land issue, and many more can be seen to a similar scale in both countries. However, I would dare say that Namibians and Namibian politicians are more level-headed when dealing with these issues (change my mind, I dare you!!) We also have better beer, and better bread. We also officially have better roads (this is also an important item of pride for Namibians)!!

In return, South Africa is a good wine supplier and I have to say their music is out of this world (the run so many genre’s in secret, from Rock, Pop, EDM, Afrobeat and what have you!)

In all, Namibia generally differs here and there from South Africa. Namibia is more-or-less the Austria to South Africa’s Germany. (Sidenote: I realise this is not only in our similarities, but also in that last time we were one place it all got a little racist and neighbours got bombed a here and there)

Related Answer
How did South Africa overcome apartheid?

Philip Machanick, works at Rhodes University

Answered Mar 7, 2017

Partially – we have a great human rights oriented constitution. But public institutions are often of poor quality and the government has a track record of favouring patronage over service delivery.

Our school system is divided into fee-charging (government and private) schools and fee-free schools. The latter are poorly resource and a very small fraction have decent results, trapping the poor (mostly black) part of the population in poverty.

Municipal, police and health services are highly dependent on your ability to pay, which remains heavily race-biased. Some black people have done extremely well out of black empowerment policies but they are a small minority.

So technically, though we have banished legalised racism, structural racism remains a huge problem. Apartheid is legally dead and buried but its legacy lives on.

Related Answer
Why did South Africa occupy Namibia?

Deon Fourie, former Professor of Strategic Studies. at University of SA (1968-1997) Answered Mar 11, 2018

Namibia was colonized in the latter part of the 19th Century by the German Empire. When War broke out in August 1914, the British government asked the government of the Union of South Africa, then a British Dominion, to occupy certain parts of was then called German South West Africa so that reports of British shipping in the Atlantic could not be transmitted to the German Kriegsmarine. The initial invasion led to the occupation of the entire colony. After a desultory campaign on 9th July 1915 the German governor surrendered in the neighborhood of Tsumeb in the north. The League of Nations gave South Africa a mandate to govern the territory until the inhabitants could be granted independence. In 1946 South Africa would not transfer the territory to the United Nations and remained in occupation. This led to an insurgency led by the SWA Peoples' Organisation which only ended in 1990 when by a negotiated settlement South Africa finally withdrew and the country became an independent state on 21 March.

Related Answer
Why did South Africa end its occupation of Namibia?

Niel Malan, proudly South African. Answered Nov 4, 2018

While South Africa would have liked to incorporate South West Africa, the international opinion was against it, and by 1971 the International Court of Justice had ruled that the UN should be in control of the territory. South Africa did not dispute or contest this decision, but by this time there was a full-scale Soviet-backed insurgency campaign going. Holding elections while there was such orchestrated political violence was politically untenable and morally unacceptable to the South African government. They therefore remained in control of Namibia, while fighting a counter-insurgency war in the north. Negotiations continued, and in 1978 agreed to UN Resolution 435, which described the agreed independence process. But the war continued, and South Africa refused to implement Resolution 435 until there was stability.

During 1987 and 1988 there was a sharp escalation of the war in the north. There were a number of defeats and a stalemate. The Soviet empire was at its end and not prepared to escalate, and neither were the South Africans eager to bear the cost of escalation. So the war ended in a peace agreement, the Tripartite Accord, between Angola, Cuba, and South Africa. This removed the threat of violent Communist interference in elections, and South Africa could agree to the implementation of Resolution 435.

Related Links

What led to racial relations being better in Namibia and Botswana, compared to South Africa?

How are white people treated in Namibia? Is it like Zimbabwe and South Africa?
Why did South Africa occupy Namibia?
Who controls Namibia?
Is Namibia safer than South Africa?
Is South Africa more developed than Namibia?
Why did Namibia split from South Africa?
How does Namibia differ from and compare to South Africa?
What are the main differences between Namibia and South Africa?
What difference does it make to live in Namibia and not South Africa?

How did Namibia gain independence?
Why did the people of South Africa struggle against apartheid?
Why did South Africa end its occupation of Namibia?
In South Africa, is life a constant "struggle"?

What was it like to live in Namibia in 1988-1990, during the time it gained independence from South African rule?

Why have crime rates, AIDS, corruption, and tribal problems increased since the end of the white rule in South Africa, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, and Namibia?

Françoise Marie · Follow Master's Degree in Public Administration, Syracuse University1y

The end of white rule in southern Africa is the best thing that ever happened. A minority of Whites (European settlers) ruling over a majority of indigenous Africans on their ancestral and aboriginal lands was the ultimate insult.

Related Links

Was Zimbabwe (Rhodesia) better off under white rule?
How were the crime rates in South Africa during apartheid?

Can Zimbabwe's economy recover and become an upper middle income economy like Botswana, South Africa or Namibia?

Should South Africa, Zimbabwe, Botswana and Namibia be one country?

If colonialism and Apartheid was wrong, why haven't the land of the African people been returned back to them in South Africa and Namibia?

What led to racial relations being better in Namibia and Botswana, compared to South Africa?

How would you compare Zimbabwe to Botswana and South Africa?

How has Namibia and Botswana avoided the corruption, dictators, war, poverty, and apartheid that almost every other continental African country has experienced?

Why did Namibia split from South Africa?
What was apartheid like in Namibia and Botswana?

Considering South Africa's wealth in natural resources, why are we struggling with unemployment and high crime rates?

If South Africa follows Zimbabwe and begins to seize land without compensation will it cause economic deterioration. Will South Africa end up like Zimbabwe?

If diversity is good, why do Japan and Iceland have such low crime rates compared to rainbow nations like South Africa and Brazil?

How are white people treated in Namibia? Is it like Zimbabwe and South Africa?

Is South Africa really poorer/more crime-ridden/more violent since Apartheid ended? Do the statistics confirm or deny these claims?

Is it true that the first humans were black or is it Afrocentrism propaganda?

Josh Hill EE, Worked in HDTV Research Updated 7mo

The first humans were human. The modern group that may be most similar to them in some regards because it has stayed in place is the Khoisan of Southern Africa, and they are in fact brown:

What is true is that the first humans were Africans. Skin color evolved as people moved within and out of Africa — very broadly, the less sunlight a population gets, the lighter its skin becomes, although this depends on other factors as well, most particularly diet.

RE: Is it true that the first humans were black or is it Afrocentrism propaganda?

Claire Jordan, Degree in biology and folklore; programmer, shop owner, secretary on newspaper

The first humans were definitely African, no ifs or buts. How black they were is going to depend in part on how far back you want to define our ancestors as human. Once they had lost their fur and become naked apes they must have been quite brown or they would all have succumbed to skin cancer and spina bifida, but while they were still as furry as other apes, we just don't know. Our closest living relatives are the chimps and bonobos: bonobos have black (or rather dark grey) skin under their fur, while chimps are usually a kind of brownish pink. Gorillas are very black, orangutans dark brown. So furry proto-humans could have been any of the colours humans are nowadays, under the fur.

Once they were naked, as I say, they would have been some shade of brown. The KhoiSan, who are an ancient group and live near the first home of humans, around Botswana and the Great Rift Valley, are quite a light golden-tan, almost khaki, so our ancestors may well have been the same colour. But early humans would have darkened like toast as they moved nearer the equator.

Michael B., Studied biology at a college level Answered Aug 5, 2021

It’s an oversimplification, but more or less true.

When talking about the “first humans” you run into the very simple problem of definition. What qualifies a population as “human”. Evolution is not a straight line, it’s a very messy, convoluted process. And it can be difficult to draw a clear distinction between one species and another.

What we do know is that anatomically modern humans evolved roughly 300,000 years ago in Africa, and first left that continent roughly 100,000 years ago. These early humans would have had dark skin. They would have already lost their fur, and so would have needed more melanin to protect them from skin cancer.

It is now believed that when they arrived in Eurasia, they encountered Homo Neanderthals. The products of an earlier wave of hominid migration, that had already evolved white skin, so as to better produce Vitamin D in a more temperate climate.

These two groups were able to produce viable offspring, and some of their DNA exists in the modern gene pool. It is believed that white skin is one of those genes.

Regardless of how it evolved, it did evolve after black skin, as apes, such as humans, aren't indigenous to Eurasia. Humans would have evolved it as they moved north.

And here we must draw the distinction between black skin, and black people. Because while those human populations that remained in Africa never lost their black skin, they still evolved in other ways. You have to run as fast as you can just to keep your place in the race.

From a genetic perspective, modern black people are just as far removed from the first people as modern white people. It's just that they share a common skin color, which we place undue importance on.

evolvopedia Demian R , Learns from history Answered Aug 22, 2021

True: first humans came from Africa.

False: they were black.

Highly likely: they were dark-skinned.

Tell me which of these resemble a current black person:

They all are dark-skinned but none is a black person as we know them today. If you find similarities to black people, it's fair, but just imagine each of these as white and you will also find similarities to current white people. The reason? They all are ancestors to all of us.

Skin colour is an evolutionary treat that has become an evilutionary problem in the minds of certain people.

Cooper Church , History Buff Answered Aug 25, 2021

What I hate about this question, is that they presume that race was a thing back then. The first humans ARE humans. That is, it. Like people living in SubSaharan Africa millions of years ago were dark, probably very dark. They didn't have the same amenities we would have for several millennia. The reason why people's skin colors changed were adaptation to their environments.

For example:

Caucasian’s red hair, blonde hair, and blue eyes are a pretty rare mutation which probably cropped up due to inbreeding with neandertals a hundred thousand years ago.

For example, the blue eye gene can be argued to be a adaptation to more dark environments were people don’t get the same light as everyone, but it was probably a carryover gene from the neandertals, who knows?

Then there are the most curious things about humanity -

These people are the Adamanese People of Indonesian Sub Continent. They are genetically closer to people in Asia, than they are people in Africa, and yet because of genetic isolation they have held onto more African traits than most people of East Asia.

So do the Australian aboriginals

These people are the original settlers in the area, and probably did intermingle with Denisovans and other homo erectus off-shoot species.

So, in the end, pretty much few people are truly “human”, through genetic isolation people have retained their ancient ancestors' traits because there was no need to evolve them out.

The Eskimos and Native Americans are some of the most unique people, because they also are their own race and have their own ethnicity due to thousands of years of intermingling with other tribes changing their own appearance, even though they evolved from people from stone-age Asia who made their way to the Americas during the ice age.

in the end, we are all one human family and we all go back to Africa regardless of color or appearance. Sadly, many of the cultures of the then isolated aboriginals, native indigenous people of the Americas, Adamanese, and the people who continue live in harmony with nature and the ways of the ancestors across the world. They have been culturally raped and destroyed by European invaders, their cultures destoyed, and their history eradicated.

The cultural and genocide against these people means we have peices of “fuzzy history” where we only can infer about these people by what they left behind, they have a legacy, but no people to inherit it.

If we just got rid of the idea of “race” and “racial identify” then every genocide against a race, is not a genocide against race, but against humanity itself. The Nazi’s didn’t just kill people who were Romani Gypsies, Gays, disabled, or Jewish - they murdered humans - people like you and me on the basis of their race and identity.

Race had no bearing for most of our history, it's a new thing, and its time we abandon it to heal collectively and come together as ONE species, ONE race than continue to be divided by the color of our skin, or the structure of our faces.

Now we should focus on the content of the people.

Related Links

How do I debunk the Afrocentric claims that the ancient Egyptians were black and prove to them that modern day Egyptians are the descendants of ancient Egyptians?

Why do so many people call "Afrocentrism" pseudoscience when there are images of "Blacks" from almost every ancient civilization?

What is Afrocentrism? Is it something proved by facts or more of a conspiracy theory? What's the idea behind it?

How do I debunk the Afrocentric claim about the black African nobility of ancient Europe?

Why are Afrocentrics claiming the Etruscans are black?
What do Arabs think about Afrocentrics claiming the original Arabs were black?

As a Greek how do you feel about Afrocentrics claiming the Minoans and Mycenaeans were black?

Why is Afrocentrism considered wrong?
Why do Afrocentrics claim the Minoans and Etruscans were black?
Why do Afrocentrics claim the Carthaginians were black?

Related Answer

Tia Elago-Oretu Kaumunika

, learned to be a professional Namibian in South Africa
Answered May 7, 2020

What difference does it make to live in Namibia and not South Africa?

Namibia and South Africa are very, very similar. Living in Namibia is basically the same as SA, to the point that I, as a Namibian, normally feel like our independence was achieved just because. Namibia is more like a slightly more autonomous province of South Africa really. Windhoek is more similar to Cape Town than Cape Town is to Johannesburg, whilst in all its really all just the same thing! However, there are some differences that may tip the scale of where you'd want to move to. The countries are made for different people. If you like quiet, open spaces, personal space, constant connection to nature, and just chilling, Namibia is for you. If you're all about the hustle and bustle, the big city, many places and faces, nightlife, and so on, as well as short but exciting trips to very diverse natural landcapes, South Africa is for you.

I do believe though, that if youre not student, Namibia may be a better option. Here are a few reasons why:

Namibia is very quiet. South Africa is a big place. Windhoek is by far Namibia's biggest city, but in South Africa it would just be a mid-sized place that the rest of the country would sort-of forget about, like Klerksdorp or that one capital. As a result, Namibia is a very, very spacious place. Extremely spacious. Its kinda crazy, actually. In a country 2/3 the size of SA but with a population smaller than several SA cities alone, you're never more than a 10 minutes drive from pristine nature. I even take quick drives to the hills for quick hikes between lectures sometimes! Its great! That is, unless youre one of the sorry souls that live in Windhoek West and Wanaheda. For them, its a 15 minute drive. I pray for them, the poor things.

Living in Namibia, you therefore are always in touch with nature. You spend a lot of time there. Its mostly because its a great place to be, yes, all that oxygen and pollen and stuff, but its also because theres not too much to undertake in the city compared to the megalopoles of Cape Town, Durban and the city of Gauteng.
Although, despite its size, Namibia does have alot to offer for the urban dweller. Compared to South African cities of similar size, Namibian cities have a decent amount of things to do, according to testaments from Saffer friends and university lecturers. You could probably epxerience all the decent Windhoek clubs within a weekend or two, with a little more time needed for pubs, but if youre cool with becoming a regular at a specific watering hole for you and the bras (or whatever the female equivalent is), then you shouldnt have much of a problem, actually.

The size does have another impact though: everyone knows everyone else. So you might want to avoid doing that one dumb thing that noone should remember, cause someone will know you.

Then there's the fact that Namibians are very non-confrontational. It seems embedded into the core aspects of the South African psyche to stand up for your interests and say "fuck you" to things that challenge what you stand for and also other things. Namibians, on the other hand, could probably apologise to you when you hijack their car! (Might be a tad exaggerated, but you get the point). Namibian protests are generally just gatherings of 7 and a half people with sternly worded posters and a big Namibia flag. A close friend of mine (South African) put it well when she said: "If you let South Africans get Namibian citizenship, youll see your peaceful protests escalate when one of the South Africans peacefully lights a tyre on fire".

Point number strongest: Namibia is safe. Very safe. Okay no just fairly safe. You can walk around at night with a backpack and not worry too much about getting mugged, I do that all the time! (Although i do have friends that have unfortunately been mugged, so precaution should probablt be taken, as it must in most parts of the world). Namibia is definitely muchc much more secure than SA, especially outside of Windhoek.

Racism: Namibians arent as racist as South Africans seem to be, at least not openly. Political discourse is not nearly as intensely racial as it is in SA, and only hardline left-wing "woke" black girls on twitter seem to say the types of things that scare or infuriate white folks on the internet, and of them there are very few (unless you visit poetry night in those "hipster cafes", as my one friend calls them. Whilst white Namibians do have very many racially based prejudices, these are mostly kept very much on the down low, and are often harmless.

BONUS (for Afrikaans speakers): aside from certain neighbourhoods in Windhoek, the Afrikaans language reigns supreme in daily life in Namibia, regardless of race or economics. If you come to Namibia, you dont really have to remember how to say that sentence in that English language that, according to the lovely old lady next door, will just make you thirsty when you speak it.

BONUS (for people with taste and also Germans): the best parts of German culture form a major part part of the core and spine of the Namibian experience. Reinheitsgebot Bier, Currywurst, Oktoberfest (and some local Volksfeste), Bratwurst, Schwarzwälder and other cakes, Schnapps, really good bread, Spannvarkel and so much more populate Namibian menus from the poshest to trashiest of locales, added to the usual South African steaks and soesaties.
The best beer in the world (next to Bavaria's Weihenstephaner and Münchener Augustiner) comes from Namibia. We export a lot of it to South Africa to keep them from drinking the rat poison they make, but the best Nam beer you only get on tap at the bars of the great Namib. If youre not a beer person, and prefer your wines (like everyones mom and students getting drunk in their friends bedroom to save entrance money) South African wines are easy to access too.

Another great thing about choosing Namibia: South Africa is literally right there. If you miss seeing green grass, traffic and trees that aren't constantly dodging drying out completely, it's a few hours drive or flight to the greenery of South Africa.

Related Answer
Is it worth going to Namibia?

Dawn Runge , American-born, Namibian-living Answered Jul 27, 2015

American living in Namibia! Brad Pitt & Angelina Jolie love Namibia, so much so that they adopted a Namibian child and love to visit. Prince Harry is currently in the north working on rhino conservation. However, the value of Namibia lies in what you are looking for in a vacation.

First, Namibia is a vast and diverse country, so how much time/energy are you willing to devote? Second, how close are you to Namibia/would it be out of the way for your travel destination? Third, what are your travel goals?

Namibia is sparsely populated, vast with varying road types, and with a highly diverse landscape. The largest city, Windhoek, is 300,000 people. If you are driving (from S. Africa, for example) you will need at least 3-4 days to commit to just driving and setting up camp if you plan to tour various areas of the country- and you should be comfortable with a 4x4. If you are flying into Windhoek and only have 1-2 weeks you want to focus on the major tourist sites that lie within 4-5 hours of the capital, there are tours/public transport for this type of travel.

To the south, deserts and canyons are abound. Many people who travel up from S. Africa are surprised by the desolate beauty of the area. There is a ghost town called Kolmanskoop, where the sand has taken over the town giving an eerie feeling.

The southeast side bordering Botswana offers lots of game, hunting, and entrance to the Botswana/Namibia/S. Africa Kgalaghadi Transfrontier Park (Kalahari desert).

The southwest side is one of Namibia's greatest draws. The Namib-Naukluft National Park is Africa's largest game park, and is part of the Namib desert- the world's oldest desert. The trees in Deadvlei, or Dead Valley, are the most photographed in the world and make you feel like you are on mars. The incredible red dunes (the highest in the world) also feel other-worldly. The opening of Jennifer Lopez' The Cell was shot here, as was Mad Max: Fury Road. The area has very little light pollution, offering amazing stargazing.

The Western mid-coast offers Swakopmund & Walvis Bay. Personally, I am not a fan of chill and mist- and it can get COLD here. Swakopmund has older German architecture, and offers some nice seaside restaurants and fresh seafood. Walvis Bay is less fancy, but offers some working-class options and fresh oysters. The bay has very large flocks of flamingos, and the salt works are something interesting to see. Spitzkoppe and the mines are also close- you can get a wide variety of precious stones for decent prices.

Heading north from Windhoek, there are wildlife options abound. Lodges focused on game drives or rehabilitation are a big focus. Etosha National Park is one of the biggest focuses of tourist activity, I would recommend at least 4-5 days to move about the park. There are both rhino and big cat conservation centers in the areas. There are too many to count, but if you love conservation/animals this is a good area.

To the northeast/Caprivi Strip- you start getting into more lush areas. I live in a town next to the river, and get to watch the beautiful sunsets. The bird life is superb, and crocs and hippos still roam very close to the camps along the river. If you are heading to/coming from Chobe, Okavango Delta, Victoria Falls it would be a worthwhile stop.

Lastly, there are many very interesting tribal groups still living traditionally, like the Himba, the San, Kavango groups etc... and if you like that aspect you will be truly treated.

Namibia does not offer big nightlife or city life, although Windhoek has a few nice restaurants and amenities.

IN SUMMARY

If you like: wildlife, differing scenery, feeling like you are on another world, solitude, taking your time, nature, birds, other cultures...then Namibia will be worthwhile.

If you need: significant public transport, night life/lots of people, a quick vacation fix, then Namibia may not be the place for you.

Related Answer
Is Namibia the most stable African country?

Tukondjeni Handobe, Founder&CEO at Meme, aspiring INSEAD, MBA Dinged by Harvard & Stanford Answered Jul 16, 2015

Yes. Namibia is an upper-middle income country, a typical emerging market nation, closely linked to the BRICS nations in its past and current economic dispensations. The ruling party, South West African Peoples Organization (SWAPO) is the political party that liberated Namibia from racism and colonialism and is credited with establishing robust "good governance" system. SWAPO leaders, are a rare breed of sober-minded Namibians with vast global experience in political governance and should be credited for maintaining stability and steering the economy of Namibia into the right direction. Although Namibia is still grappling with the huge mandate to economically emancipate its people, most key economic and human development index shows a country on the rise. It will no doubt be the Singapore of Africa within the next 15 years.

Related Links

Which is the most developed African country?
What's the most westernised African country?
Why is Kenya more famous than most other African countries?

Is there racism in African countries towards Africans from other African countries?

Is Namibia the most stable African country?
Which is the most successful country in Africa?

Which African country is likely to become the first developed country on the continent?

Is there ever hope for African development?
How can Africa become more prosperous?

Is it true that there are cities in Africa that are just as modern and developed as any American city?

Is South Africa the most developed country in Africa?
Will Africa develop between now and the 2060s?
What is the most friendly country in Africa that is worth a long vacation?

How is South Africa really positioned? Is it the richest country on the African continent, but still considered a developing country when directly compared to Australia, NZ, UK, Canada, US, EU, UAE, Japan, Israel & Singapore? How far is the gap?

Why is Africa so poor?

Related Answer

Christine Szuszkiewicz

, works at Actors and Actresses Answered Dec 21, 2014 · Upvoted by

Dennis Bett

, lives in Kenya (1997-present)

Is Kenya a good country?

Originally Answered: What is Kenya like?
I feel pitifully unqualified to answer, but I've been asked. Having grown up in beautiful, stunning California and having travelled and lived in various parts of the globe, words like wondrous, beautiful, peaceful, exciting, a natural haven, which can be used to describe my home state and other places...utterly fail to capture what is special about Kenya.

It's a feeling, not comparable to what we can understand in the "Live-to-Work" United States, at least. Perhaps Europeans would be less awed by the experience of living there. I've lived for a time in several part of Europe, but it's not the same feeling. But those I know who've spent any time there, we all agree that Kenya quickly gets under your skin and haunts you when you leave...for years! I don't know whether the surrounding countries evoke such subconscious passion, whether it is the land, the people, the culture, the melting pot of cultures, nature...It's a visceral feeling. I've never ever longed for a place before. It's been many, many years since I've been, and writing this has awakened a deep longing in me to return.

Obtuse examples are all I'm left to try and explain my meaning. I grew up playing the piano, but only ever could really play from sheet music. The first time I've ever felt free enough to actually try to create music myself, was on a friend's piano a couple of months after I arrived. I just started playing.

People there work, but at 5 they depart immediately, everyone does, and without a question or hesitation. No matter how low or lofty their position. Perhaps the day before or as soon as one left, one had made plans already with friends and family. Yes, in Washington, DC, I had 2 cocktail parties a night to attend, but it's not the same; those seemed almost an extension of work. After work in Kenya, one immediately gathered in a space with friends (or family, I would assume). We'd cook together, or take turns as we spent a different eve in a different home. Other days we'd go to a coffee house, or a bar, or a restaurant. It felt highly social and to be anything but part of this would have been odd. In the world I left, I don't know, maybe there were too many people, too many people to have as friends?

I needn't talk about the wonder of being out in nature, which I grew up having continual access to in California. It was a shock to move to Washington, DC, where I kept waiting for friends to pile in a car on the weekend to visit a natural site or other, which they rarely did. But this is only a part of what I mean; yes, nature was part of daily life. You can read about Kenya's wilds anywhere. I will only say how new the experience of being a possible victim of nature was. In most all places, if you exited your car you never knew what potential hazard might away. Cape buffalo are very dangerous, there are snakes, predators, and angry hippos of which to be aware. Downtown, one has to be careful of people, as theft is not uncommon. Still, one feels so alive there. So alive.

Related Answer
Is Namibia the most stable African country?

Tukondjeni Handobe, Founder&CEO at Meme, aspiring INSEAD, MBA Designed by Harvard & Stanford Answered Jul 16, 2015

Yes. Namibia is an upper-middle income country, a typical emerging market nation,closely linked to the BRICS nations in its past and current economic dispensations. The ruling party Swapo is the political party that liberated Namibia from colonialism and is credited with establishing robust "good governance" system. SWAPO leaders, are a rare breed of sober-minded Namibians with vast global experience in political governance and should be credited for maintaining stability and steering the economy of Namibia into the right direction. Although Namibia is still grappling with the huge mandate to economically emancipate its people, most key economic and human development index shows a country on the rise. It will no doubt be the Singapore of Africa within the next 15 years.

Related Answer
What has caused Namibia and Botswana to fare better economically and be much more stable in general compared to other post-independence sub-Saharan African nations, despite both having large areas of fairly inhospitable terrain?

Samuel Rugo, Branch Manager Answered Nov 22, 2018

Am from Kenya, lived in Botswana for 3 years and now live in South Africa. i have also visited Namibia twice so i can say ave seen a bit of Bots and Namibia.

Both countries have one thing in common. mineral wealth and low population. Botswana for instance is the size of Kenya and Texas. yet the population is only 2m, which is half the population of Nairobi alone so figures dont tell the true picture of the state of affairs in these countries. Many Batswana prefer to work in South Africa where life is better than their country.

In Botswana the majority of the wealth is in the hands of the government. private sector is very weak. the government had to build the CBD of the capital city about 8 years ago as business private sector couldn't drive such such construction. almost all the revenue is from Diamonds. so when we talk of GDP per capital the figures look good but the common man will either depend on government or be very poor if not employed by same government.

But with very low crime rates, those in Botswana with a good income live very good lives. you must afford air conditioning and such other amenities that are a luxury to many though as the country is very hot.

Related Answer
What are the main differences between Namibia and South Africa?

Mqondisi Gumede , South African Updated Dec 29, 2015

Hi Keir,

The differences are many; I wish I knew from what perspective you were mainly interested in.

For starters, consider the population: South Africa circa 50m Namibia circa 2m.

As a result South Africa has more cities, more diversity of industry, and a larger economy.

The people are completely different. The Namibian ethnic make up is completely different. Namibian ethnicities comprise the Ovambo, Herero, Himba, German and Afrikaans. South Africans ethnicities include Zulu, Sotho, Tswana, Xhosa, Swazi, Ndebele, Venda, Tsonga, Pedi, Afrikaans and English. We have no overlapping ethnicities (except maybe the Khoisan who are statistically very slight), and Afrikaans people (except for the most recent expats are still quite different in worldview, tempo and outlook than South African Afrikaners). Therefore the cultures are different.

Namibia is a former German colony called German South-West Africa, and South Africa is a former British Colony and Dutch Colony. South Africa is fairly unique in its apartheid-past; so that is another difference.

The landscapes are very different: Namibia is more arid in nature and not as diverse as South Africa. Therefore, farming is very different in Namibia - mostly game and a few grains (mainly on a subsistence basis).

South Africa grows all kinds of fruit - from deciduous, to citrus, to sub tropical. Grapes serve as input into a vibrant wine industry. The sugar cane grown has some of the highest sucrose content in the world. Vegetables of every kind are grown, and there is livestock-rearing, game farming, plantations for paper, pulp and other industries, including fishing and much more.

The pace of Namibian commerce (and therefore life in general) is more pedestrian than in South Africa; as it is a smaller market for various products, there are many things that you can find in South Africa that you cannot find in Namibia from a product and brand point of view.

I suppose one could go on, but I think that these would be what I classify as the main differences.

Related Links

Which is the most developed African country?
What is it like to live in Namibia?
What's the most westernised African country?
Why is Namibia a developing country?
What African country is the most successful today?
What difference does it make to live in Namibia and not South Africa?
What are some positive sides to living in Namibia?
Is it worth going to Namibia?

What is it like to live in Botswana?
What are the main differences between Namibia and South Africa?

Why are epicanthic folds dominant, when black Africans (the most dominant people) have very round and very large eyes?

Walter Smyth · Follow Fascinated by ancient history and genetics Wed

Khoisan:

300 000 year old modern human from China recreated:

Not true. Africans like the Khoisan have epicanthic folds. They likely share the same ancient ancestor, the Homo erectus with East Asians.

https://www.globaltimes.cn/page/202110/1235906.shtml

Were early humans (hunter gatherers) thin or muscular?

Hamza Khan A proud Democrat1y

They didn't look like bodybuilders, athletes or those celebrities who are on steroids so they were not muscular. Hunters gatherers were leaner because they were thin and the reason why they were thin because they were moving around more and eating less. The thinner you are the more leaner your body gets because then you lack body fat. These are the images of the Bushmen living a paleolithic life they look like ordinary people no steroids nothing just lack of body fat. In fact Arnold Schwarzenegger looks dull and he's most likely weaker compared to the Bushmen.

alamy stock photo
MNF86R
www.alamy.com

iStock
by Getty Images
EDITORIAL USE ONLY

Naro bushman, Central Kalahari , Botswana

Related Links

Were humans meant to be physically ripped and muscular all the time? Is obesity something of the recent two centuries?

Why is it believed that our hunter-gatherer ancestors were lean and muscular, whereas hunter-gatherers that live today are nothing like that?

Why were ancient people so physically well-built without modern bodybuilding techniques? (I mean exercises, not steroids and supplements.)

Were ancient humans such as Vikings actually muscular? How did they get so muscular and massive?

If a modern pro bodybuilder was brought back to the 13th century, what would the people there think of him?

How large were groups of people when they were still hunter-gatherers?

Why were all those ancient Greeks so muscular?

Are humans today stronger than humans 500 or earlier years ago?

When humans were hunter-gatherers, did the alpha males monopolize reproductive rights in each tribe?

Were Stone Age people/hunter gatherers

Response similaire: Apprenez moi des faits fou et insoupçonnables sur les animaux ?

Blandine Poitel

Butine les champs du possible 31 mars

Je vous emmène dans le désert du DESERT DU NAMIB, découvrir sa faune incroyable. -*-

C'est un désert où vivent, paradoxalement, de gros animaux :
* Éléphants (doivent consommer plus ou moins 300 kg de fourrage et 230 litres d'eau par jour ET par éléphant !!!). Pour trouver eau et nourriture, ils font des dizaines de km toutes les nuits. Sont capables de creuser le lit de rivières asséchées pour trouver de l'eau fraiche en profondeur. Se reposent souvent en journée. **--

* Girafes **--

* Oryx gazelle **-*-

Il est capable : se passer d'eau durant des mois de concentrer son urine et de tolérer une température corporelle de 45° sans transpirer, afin de limiter les pertes d'eau au maximum.

* Autruches **--

C'est le plus vieux désert de la Terre (il a 50Ma)

L'un de ses habitant les plus répandu est aussi un essentiel pour les écosystèmes de ce désert : la termite.

Plusieurs espèces cohabitent :
Celles qui construisent cela :

Elles patrouillent toute la journée pour rapporter des brindilles sèches à la termitière. Elles ne peuvent en digérer la cellulose mais s'en servent pour nourrir des champignons … qui les nourrissent en retour !

Et celles à l'origine de cela :

Les "cercles de fées"
Endroits circulaires totalement dépourvus de végétation.
Les termites consomment les jeunes racines des végétaux avant qu'ils n'aient eu le temps de sortir de terre, et préservent aussi une zone "humide" sous les cercles dépourvus de végétation-**-

Les termites sont la principale source de nourriture de :
la hyène du Namib* (protèle) Sa langue est plus longue et sa salive est collante pour mieux capturer ces insectes qui sont pratiquement sa seule source de nourriture.

Protèle — Wikipédia

le renard à oreilles de chauve souris Contrairement à ce que suggère son nom, ce n'est pas vraiment un renard ("Vulpus") mais un Otocyon, genre dont on n'est même pas sûrs de la parenté avec les Vulpus ! Il a une technique de chasse très spéciale, il chasse les termites … aux sons qu'elles émettent sous terre !

Renard à oreilles de chauve-souris — Wikipédia

 L'Oryctérope du Cap
Il a des "pelles" très griffues au bout de ses pattes pour creuser plus efficacement.

Il creuse régulièrement des terriers, lesquels sont ensuite, quand il les a abandonnés, occupés par les hyènes du Namib, les renard à oreilles de chauve souris et autres animaux.

Visez moi ces griffes !

https://fr.wikipedia.org/wiki/Oryct%C3%A9rope_du_Cap

La taupe dorée (qui n'est pas une taupe)
Petit insectivore très discret, peu connu, peu observé, aveugle et sans oreilles apparentes, détecte les termites par les vibrations qu'elles émettent !

Chrysochloridae — Wikipédia et ce serait une lointaine cousine de l'oryctérope !

-*- Désert du Namib — Wikipédia
-- Eléphants adaptés au Désert - Autograph Safaris
About Wild Animals: How elephants survive the namib desert?
-*-NAMIBIE, entrez dans l'intimité du plus vieux désert au monde
--Oryx gazelle — Wikipédia
--Les cercles de fées namibiens : des réserves d'eau pour termites
(Les cercles de fées namibiens : des réserves d'eau pour termites)

Si vous voulez aller plus loin :
NAMIBIE, entrez dans l'intimité du plus vieux désert au monde
Les animaux de Namibie en 50 photos - My Wildlife

Le reportage qui m'a fait découvrir le Désert du Namib et quelques uns de ses habitants :

Questions similaires

Quels sont les faits hallucinants du règne animal ?
Quels animaux étranges semblent dangereux mais ne le sont pas ?
Quel est le fait le plus fou à propos de Pablo Escobar ?

Quel est selon vous l'animal le plus innocent et le plus inoffensif ?

Quels sont les faits intéressants sur les animaux que vous ignoriez et qui prendront 1 seconde à retenir ?

Quel fait mathématique vous rend fou ?
Quels sont les faits étonnants sur les lions ?
Qui est le PDG le plus fou ?

Quelle est la chose la plus improbable que vous ayez dit ou fait lors d'un oral important ou un examen et qui vous a avantagé de façon surprenante ?

Quel est le fait le plus incroyable que vous connaissiez des animaux ?

Why don't strong animals/predators have large defined pectoral muscles like we do?

Gary Meaney Animal lover and zoologist 3y

These are humans in their "natural state".

I assure you, these men are in superb physical condition. Chances are they're fitter than you. However, they're not excessively muscular, at least superficially - nor is any "natural" animal.

There are no Arnold Schwarzeneggers hunting kudu in the Kalahari or ice fishing in Greenland. Humans who body-build are doing so to make themselves more attractive to potential mates (and yes, that is really why you're doing it, regardless of your sexual orientation), not to aid their survival.

Humans depend on tools for hunting, and so we have little use for immensely strong muscles (throwing and running are the main things we're "supposed to" use our muscles for). Most large predators require musculature, and believe me, they are muscular.

However, they're still more reasonable compared to the most muscular of humans. The only animals which are truly ripped are freaks who have often undergone training for extra muscles, like the famous Roger:

In short, (some of) us humans only have big defined pecs because we have the luxury of professionally set up weight training procedures and a lot of time on our hands.

Related Links

How strong are human muscles?

The neck region of the body is the weakest point in most animals, including humans, and that's where most predators attack first for instant kill. So why haven't we developed shorter and stronger necks to deal with this?

Why don't animals have large pectoral muscles like humans?

Why are male animals usually the stronger sex (with more muscle mass, more dense bones, etc.)? What evolutionary benefit does it have?

Were early humans (hunter gatherers) thin or muscular?
Why are animals, preferably predators, lean and muscular?
Why didn't herbivores evolve to eliminate their predators?

Were humans meant to be physically ripped and muscular all the time? Is obesity something of the recent two centuries?

Why are chimpanzees so much more muscular than humans?

Why is it that humans must cook meat before consumption to avoid illness and animals don't need to?

Quelle est la particularité du désert du Kalahari?

Joël Lodé, écologue naturellement, sans parti. (1975-présent)
Répondu 12 mai 2021

Oh, il y en a plusieurs !

Premièrement, ce n'est pas un désert à proprement parler, on dira un semi désert avec des arbustes, des arbres.

Il représente, au Botswana une plaine sableuse ; je n'y ai pas vu de dunes comme dans le Namib.

Il abrite dans le nord, un fleuve endoréique qui se termine en delta sans aller vers la mer : l'Okavango, car il se situe dans une cuvette :

Il abrite toute une faune, dont des lions

On y trouve des plantes succulentes comme des Aloe : des petits comme Aloe zebrina

Mais aussi des géants comme Aloe marlothii

Il est peuplé de tribus appelées improprement Bochimans, qui sont parmi les plus anciens des chasseurs-cueilleurs de la planète : entre autres les San.

La particularité (infâme) est que ces personnes qui ont vécu toute leur vie dans ce désert, en sont aujourd'hui chassées par les autorités pour laisser la place à des chasseurs de grand gibier, des multinationales minières pour le manganèse et le diamant, des lodges avec piscine alors que leurs habitants n'ont plus accès à leurs puits historiques ou droit de chasser pour nourrir leur clan.

Bushmen

The Bushmen are the indigenous people of southern Africa. They have experienced a genocide which has been almost completely ignored; having once occupied the whole of southern Africa, just 100,000 remain today. Most have lost their land to white or Bantu colonists.

https://www.survivalinternational.org/tribes/bushmen

Lors de mon voyage, les San vivent encore à l'état libre : leur calvaire commence en 1997 :

Botswana : le calvaire des Bushmen expulsés de leurs terres ancestrales

C’est l’une des communautés les plus marginalisées d’Afrique. Premiers habitants de l’Afrique australe, les Bushmen, également appelés San, seraient au nombre de 100.000, répartis pour l’essentiel en Namibie et au Botswana. C’est dans ce dernier pays qu’ils sont particulièrement persécutés. La plupart d’entre eux ont été chassés de leurs terres ancestrales.

https://www.francetvinfo.fr/monde/afrique/botswana/botswana-le-calvaire-des-bushmen-expulses-de-leurs-terres-ancestrales_3061055.html

Donc, l'autre particularité du Kalahari, c'est qu'il renferme des gisements de diamants

En 1978, les recherches diamantifères de la De Beers Company ont donné leurs fruits :

A l'époque, lorsque, invité par les autorités et le Ministère du Commerce et de l'Industrie, dont dépend le tourisme, le président du Botswana, Sir Seretse Khama, me demande ce que je voudrais voir dans son pays, je lui réponds : "une mine de diamants !". Chose dite, chose faite. J'aurai l'autorisation de visiter la mine de Jwaneng (le jour de mon anniversaire !), qui est en cours de prospection. (Désolé pour les mauvais scans de mes diapos, qui n'ont jamais été publiées).

DE BEERS BOTSWANA
MINING COMPANY (PTY) LTD.
JWANENG MINE

Kimberlite, la roche-mère du diamant

Jwaneng est aujourd'hui la mine de diamants la plus riche du monde:

https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jwaneng_diamond_mine

J'ai également trouvé des gisements de manganèse :

DISTRICT COMMISSIONER
5 - OCT 1978
KANYE BOTSWANA

Between ~~Sekoma~~ Takatshame and Sekoma I did not cycle because of the sand.

IN GABORONE

Speedometer Reading 0281/8

Mr. LODE Joël, French, 26 years old of;
5, rue de Mindin - 3e étage
44100 Nantes
FRANCE.

Arrived on cycle here crossed the Kalahari Desert on bicycle from GHANZI to KANYE between (Date)....28th September 1978 and (Date)..5th October, 1978.....; as the first man (World Record).

cycled between Gantsi and Lobatse

DATE: 9/October/1978.

283 Kilometres

Official Stamp & Signature:

REGISTRY HEADQUARTERS
DATE RECEIVED
6 - OCT 1978
GABORONE
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

Les gens sont absolument adorables, et que ce soient les officiels ou les anonymes rencontrés, tous ont été très bienveillants :

OFFICE EQUIPMENT SPECIALISTS

Les choses ont bien changé depuis lors.

Où peut-on trouver un désert en France ?

Anthony Lapeyre , ancien(ne) Journaliste Répondu 26 août 2020

La France a un climat tempéré on n'y trouvera donc pas de déserts. Par contre les aléas locaux qu'ils soient géologiques, climatiques ou humains ont parfois créé des paysages que l'on pourrait comparer à ceux des déserts. Voici les plus connus.

La Crau (Bouches du Rhône)

La Crau est une plaine aride située dans le département des Bouches du Rhône, d'une superficie originelle de 550 km2. Seuls 95 km2 de ce qui constitue le dernier habitat de type steppique d'Europe occidentale subsistent intacts aujourd'hui. Par endroit son paysage évoque un peu celui des regs

La Dune du Pilat (Gironde)

Haute de 110m, longue de 3 km et large de 500 m, il s'agit de la plus haute dune d'Europe : 60 millions de m3 de sable ! C'est aussi un peu de Sahara en plein milieu de la forêt landaise.

Les rives du lac de Salagou (Hérault)

Souvent mises à nu par l'érosion, les roches rouges qui caractérisent les paysages du Lac de Salagou ne sont pas sans évoquer (très modestement) l'Arizona.

Le Colorado provençal (Vaucluse):

Sur 30ha dans le massif du Luberon s'étend un site insolite qui rappelle les paysages arides du Far west. Il s'agit en fait d'une ocrière exploitée jusqu'en 1992. Ce n'est pas sans raison qu'on l'a baptisé « Colorado provençal »

De manière plus anecdotique on pourra citer la mer de sable du massif des Trois Pignons en forêt de Fontainebleau (Seine et Marne) ou celle d'Ermenonville (Oise).

Voilà…

Questions similaires

Pourquoi y a-t-il du sable dans les déserts ?
Y a-t-il eu un océan dans le désert du Sahara ?
En dessous du sable du Sahara, qu'est-ce qu'il y a ?
Combien y a-t-il de désert de sel dans le monde ?
Quand est-ce qu'il y avait de la neige dans le désert du Sahara ?
Y a-t-il des roses de sables ailleurs qu'au Sahara ?
Pourquoi la sable du désert est-il plus fin que celui sur une plage ?

Combien y a-t-il de grains de sable dans tous les déserts du monde entier?

Préférez-vous vivre dans les montagnes Rocheuses ou le désert du Sahara?

Quelle est la profondeur du sable du désert du Sahara ? Qu'y a-t-il en dessous ? Y a-t-il une surface plane ?

PRESERVING OUR ANIMALS IN THE WILD: The "white" or ghost elephants of Etosha National Park, Namibia.

Posted by Kathy Pennell Mon

"Because of white clay and calcite sand of their surroundings, the elephants of Etosha are known for their ghostly appearance, which they maintain with regular mud baths. Elephants use the cooling effects of the mud to escape the high temperatures of the park which usually hover in the region of 40° C during the daytime. When the water evaporates, their skin remains covered in a film of white soil, giving them this otherworldly air.”

Photo Credit Anja Denker

WAR-Wildlife at Risk

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

On the Atlantic coast of Southwest Africa.

Official title of the state

The Republic of Namibia: is a country in southern Africa whose western border is the Atlantic Ocean.

Flag description:

A wide red stripe edged by narrow white stripes divides the flag diagonally from lower hoist corner to upper fly corner; the upper hoist-side triangle is blue and charged with a yellow, 12-rayed sunburst; the lower fly-side triangle is green; red signifies the heroism of the people and their determination to build a future of equal opportunity for all; white stands for peace, unity, tranquility, and harmony; blue represents the Namibian sky and the Atlantic Ocean, the country's precious water resources and rain; the yellow sun denotes power and existence; green symbolizes vegetation and agricultural resources.

Neighbours

Angola on N., Botswana on E., South Africa on S. Land boundaries; total 3,936 km. Border countries; Angola 1,376 km, Botswana 1,360 km, South Africa 967 km, Zambia 233 km.

Founder of The Nation

The South Africans conceded independence in return for a Cuban withdrawal from Angola. In the pre-independence election to the Constituent Assembly, SWAPO won 41 of the 72 seats. This body drew up the independence constitution, elected Mr. Sam Njoma to be the country's first President, and became Namibia's first National Assembly when formal independence was achieved on 21 March 1990. Namibia joined the Commonwealth States on the same day.

Local divisions

13 regions with elected regional councils

Government type

Republic - semi-presidential

Legislation chamber

Bicameral parliament

Political History:

South Africa occupied the German colony of South-West Africa during World War I and administered it as a mandate until after World War II, when it annexed the territory. In 1966 the Marxist South-West Africa People's Organization (SWAPO) guerrilla group launched a war of independence for the area that was soon named Namibia, but it was not until 1988 that South Africa agreed to end its administration in accordance with a UN peace plan for the entire region. Namibia won its independence in 1990 and has been governed by SWAPO since. Hifikepunye Pohamba was elected president in November 2004 in a landslide victory replacing Sam Nujoma who led the country during its first 14 years of self rule.

Form of State

Republic

Head of State is the President who is elected every 5 years. A republic with two legislative houses. The National Council 26 seats, members appointed by regional councils to serve for six-year terms, and the National assembly 78 seats, members to be elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch

President, Prime Minister, Bicameral parliament.

Separated by chief of State and head of Government. President elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms eligible for a second term. Head of Government is to be appointed by the president.

Former Rulers

1977 – 1979 Marthinus T. Steyn

1979-19800 Gerrit Viljoen

1980 – 1983 Daniel Hough

1983 – 1985 Willie van Niekerk

1985 -1990 Louis Pienaar

1990-2005 Sam Nujoma

2005- Hifikepunye Lucas Pohamba
2010 – Hage Geingob

Judicial chamber

Supreme Court

Capital city

Windhoek Altitude 1760 mtrs/5773 ft.

Geographic coordinates 22. 34S , 17. 05E.

Derived from Afrikaans word "Wind-Hoek" meaning for "wind corner". The city is traditionally known by two names, Khoekhoe meaning for "hot springs", and Otjomuise, meaning for "place of steam", both names reference the hot springs near today's city center.

Names of main towns
Rundu, Walvis Bay, Oshakati, Swakopmund, Ondangwa, Keetmanshoop, Tsumeb.

Date of independence

21 March, 1990.

Religions (Major)

Protestant (mostly Lutheran) & Apolistic Methodist (American) 49.5%, Roman catholic 18%, Christians 13.5 %, Independent christians 10 %, traditional beliefs 7%, others 2%.

Main spoken languages

English (official), Afrikaans, Oshivambo, Herera, Nama (Darma), and German.

Currency unit

Namibian Dollar (NAD) = 100 cents.

Area in Km2

823,144.00

Country area comparison in Africa

15 out of 55 states

Demographic terms ;-

Average annual population growth rate 0.909 %

Birth rate 21.82 births per 1,000 population

Death rate 12.97 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 51.95 years

Male 52.25 years ; Female 51.64 years;

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 11, Female:9

Average per capita income

USD 6, 900

Population density

2.6/km2

Urban population (%)

37%

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishing: 11, Industry: 33, Social service: 56

Main Export Items

Uranium, diamonds, gold and other minerals, fish meat

Economy is based on

Is dominated by Agriculture. Minerals & Tourism the main ones

Climate

Semi-arid & Sub-tropical. Rainfall sparse and erratic

Extremes;-

Lowest point; The Atlantic coast 0 mtrs.

Highest point; Konigstein 2,606 mtrs.

Weather of the Capital city (Windhoek) average annual temperature 16.9oc.

Altitude
1760 mtrs/5773ft

Hottest Month
January, February 17-29oc.

Coldest Month
June - July 6-20oc.

Driest Month
July 1mm average Rf.

Wettest Month

January 350 mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system.

Time zone

2 hours ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays

January 1 (New year), March 21 (independence), May 1 (labour day),
May 4 (Cassinga day), May 25 (Africa day), August 26 (Heroes day), December 10 (Human rights day).

Ethnic groups

African tribes (Ovambo, OKavango, Herero, Nama (Darma) 88 %, mixed 6%, whites 6%.

Topographic & Environmental concern
Mostly high-plateaus; Namib desert along coast, Kalhari desert in east.
Environment: limited natural freshwater resources; desertification; wildlife poaching; land degradation has led to few conservation areas.

Economy Overview

The economy is heavily dependent on the extraction and processing of minerals for export. Mining accounts for 20% of GDP. Rich alluvial diamond deposits make Namibia a primary source for gem-quality diamonds. Namibia is the fourth-largest exporter of nonfuel minerals in Africa, the world's fifth-largest producer of uranium, and the producer of large quantities of lead, zinc, tin, silver, and tungsten. The mining sector employs only about 3% of the population while about half of the population depends on subsistence agriculture for its livelihood. Namibia normally imports about 50% of its cereal requirements; in drought years food shortages are a major problem in rural areas. A high per capita GDP, relative to the region, hides the great inequality of income distribution; nearly one-third of Namibians had annual incomes of less than $1,400 in constant 1994 dollars, according to a 1993 study. The Namibian economy is closely linked to South Africa with the Namibian dollar pegged to the South African rand. Privatization of several enterprises in coming years may stimulate long-run foreign investment. Mining of zinc, copper, and silver and increased fish production led growth in 2003.

Industry

Tourism, fishing (largely by foreign fleets), fish processing, dairy-products, meat-processing. And raising of cattle mostly, making the country a major beef exporter to Europe.

Chief crops

Grapes, millet, sorghum, peanuts, wine-grapes.

Natural resources

Mining; Gem-Diamonds, Zinc, Lead, Copper, Gold, Silver, Tin, Lithium, Cadmium,Tungsten, Salt, Hydro-power, Coal, Iron ore, and the king of all Uranium. Suspected deposits of Crude-oil.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 4

Grassland: 43

Forest woods: 22

Other: 31

Marine:
Coastline; 1572 km.

Commercial Sea ports:-

Swakopmund, Walvis-Bay, Luderitz-Bay

Development prospect;-

In Namibia, Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) expanded by 147 per cent between 2005 and 2010 to $858m, and inflows are set to continue growing in 2012, with investments in uranium, gold, manganese and marine phosphates projects and associated industrial developments. But the SWAPO Youth League (SYL) favours more radical policies, including faster farmland redistribution and a greater state role in mining. The SYL scored a hit when the government announced in April 2011 that the state-owned firm, Epangelo Mining, would be accorded exclusive mining and exploration rights for uranium and five other 'strategic' minerals: gold, diamonds, copper, coal and rare earth elements. However, under strong pressure from the local mining industry, the government restated the policy to make it clear that existing mining and exploration rights, along with mining grant applications already in the pipeline, would be unaffected. Similarly, the government withdrew most of a May 2011 tax package proposed by finance minister Saara Kuugongelwa-Amadhila, which would have weighed heaviest on mining. Real GDP growth was vigorous in 2010 and is forecast at 4.2 per cent in 2012. Further high growth is anticipated following major expansions at the uranium mines of Langer Heinrich and Trekkopje, as well as increased copper and cement production. By 2014, Namibian uranium output is forecast to triple to over 15,000tn of yellowcake, with planned new mines at Husab and Etango in the central Namib uranium district, which the state-owned China Guangdong Nuclear Power Co. and privately-owned Sichuan Hanlong Group are on track to acquire. The government has embarked on intensified investment in public infrastructure, amounting to $2.2bn over three years. A key project is the expansion of container handling capacity at Walvis Bay so that it can become a key regional cargo hub. Higher Southern African Customs Union receipts should result in a reduced budget deficit of 7 per cent of GDP in 2012/13, although borrowing to finance successive budget deficits will push up outstanding public debt to a forecast 30per cent of GDP. However, most government borrowing (over 80 per cent) is on domestic markets. External debt liabilities will remain relatively modest with little risk of external debt servicing problems.

What is your favorite fact that seems wrong but is actually legitimate?

Jerome Cohen

.

Versatile contradictor. (1970–present) Translator · May 25

Viktor Couderé

Amateur Historian

This answer may not be an accurate translation of

Viktor Couderé

in Quora in English:

What's your favorite fact that sounds fake but is actually legitimate?

There is a politician named Adolf Hitler in Namibia, a former German colony.

Photo of Namibian politician Adolf Hitler Uunona.

Ok, to be fair, Adolf Hitler is actually his first name, his last name is Uunona. Namibia being a former German colony and having been ruled by apartheid South Africa – which used Afrikaans, a West Germanic language like German, as its language – until 1990, Germanic names like Adolf are quite common in the country.

Adolf H. Uunona, as he calls himself for obvious reasons, admits that his father probably named him after Germany's best-known dictator, but that he didn't know exactly what kind of person he was. Luckily for online scumbags, he said he had no plans to change his name.

He is a member of the Social Democratic Party, SWAPO, and a former anti-apartheid activist.

In 2010 and 2015, he was elected as a Councillor for the Ompundja Constituency in the Oshana Regional Council in northern Namibia. In November 2020, he was re-elected with 85% of the vote.

He also proclaimed that, unlike his namesake, he has no plans for world domination.

News Nigeria

News Nigeria
Jose Mourinho is spending his holiday in Namibia.

Aniekpeno Ekong

Publisher, News Nigeria

Namibia is such a beautiful country, and one of the best African countries to live in.

NIGER

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and relating news articles in timeline

Overview

Niger played an important role in the trade between North Africa and kingdoms farther south from the 14th century onwards because of its extensive mineral resources. The nomadic, animal-breeding Tuaregs controlled most of the north and after a drought in the 18th century, extended their dominance southwards, making contact with agriculturalists. Niger was a French colony, part of French West Africa. The French colonised Niger in the late 1800s, but not before meeting heavy resistance, particularly from the Tuaregs. Niger was granted its independence in August, 1960 but retained strong ties with France through a series of bilateral agreements, including a defence agreement, and its membership of the Franc Zone. Its first President, Hamani Diori, introduced a one-party state which survived until Niger experienced its first military coup in 1974. The military regime, first under Colonel Seyni Kountche till his death, followed by Colonel Ali Sabou, stayed in power until 1991. Following trends elsewhere in Africa, domestic and international pressure forced the military to concede to demands for a multi-party democracy. In 1991 a National Conference drew up a new constitution, a transitional civilian government was formed, elections were held and a new civilian government was installed in April 1993. But it was not to last. Three years later, the military, led by Colonel Bare Mainassara, intervened again in January 1996. His regime survived until April 1999 when it was overthrown by a fellow military officer, Major Wanke. Although Mainassare had civilianised his regime and held elections, in which he won the Presidency, his government was oppressive and corrupt. Wanke's takeover was therefore widely welcomed in Niger, although it was condemned by the EU , the USA and the OAU. He promised a return to civilian rule within nine months. He kept his word.

Mr. Hamani Diori was appointed first native prime minister of Niger and to become founder-president of the "Republic of Niger", when Niger attained full independence on 3rd August, 1960 from France.

Headship since independence; Head of state and government.

A Republic in the Interior of North Africa.

An Inland state believed several kingdoms were existed there before French colonialists arrived. It was important since earliest times for it's trans-Saharan trade routes. It was made part a French colony in 1922 and an overseas territory of France in 1946, gained independence in August, 1960. Mr. Hamani Diori was appointed first native prime minister later founder-president of the republic of Niger, when Niger gained independence. A widespread public disorder followed allegations that some government ministers were mis-appropriating stocks and food-aid and accused the President Hamani Diori of consolidating power. And he limited cabinet appointments to fellow Djerma, close friends, and family members. In addition, he aquired new powers by declaring himself minister of Foreign affairs & Defence. On the 15th of April, 1974 army officers led by a former Leutenant in the French army, Lt. Colonel Seyni Kountche, now the army chief of staff, led a military coup that chased Hamani Diori from office, was then imprisoned him for the next six years, after his release in 1980, he remained under house arrest until 1987. After being released from house arrest, he went exile to Morocco, where he died on the 23rd April, 1989 at the age of 72.

Niger experienced a one party rule and military regimes until 1991 when General Ali Saibou was forced by public pressure to allow multi-party elections which that resulted a democratically elected government of Mr. Mahmane Ousmane on the 27th of March, 1993. A political infighting led to another military coup of the 28th January, 1996 that brought to power of Colonel Ibrahim Mainasara Bare, he who announced that a popular referendum would be held on May, 1996, the referendum has favoured for a constitutional amendment, presidential and parliamentary elections were held for Niger's fourth republic. In 1999, Col. Ibrahim Mainasara Bare was assassinated and mourned at his hometown of Domega, in western Niger by military officers staged the coup, in a counter-coup by military officers who restored democratic rule and held elections that brought Mr. Mamadou Tandja to power in December of the same year, Mr. Tandja was re-elected in December, 2004 & 2009. In August 2009, Mr. Mamadou Tandja had dissolved the national assembly and set-up a "constitutional court" to pave the way for him to become president for life.

In 18th February, 2010 a group of soldiers led by Chief Air-squadron Colonel Salou Djibo staged a coup against the government of President Mammadou Tandja, calling itself "Supreme Council for the Restoration of Democracy" stormed Niger's presidential palace to snatch the president Mamadou Tandja and his ministers to arrest them, announced a military ruling council. The military rulers promised to revert Niger to a civilian rule before their first anniversary of the 18th February, 2010 coup. A new constitution would be created to replace the one amended in August, 2009 that abolished limits on presidential terms of office, a referendum on a new constitution will be held in October, 2010, with the vote for president taking place by 26th of December, 2010. It has to be recalled that main donor the USA have suspended all non-humanitarian assistance to Niger in 2009 after former president Mamadou Tandja changed the constitution to enable him extend his rule, but resumed it's aid programs a year later after Mr. Mamadou Tandja was ousted by the Nigerien military and replaced through elections.

Mamadou Tandja, initially praised for helping stabilise his country, brushed aside domestic and international objections to change the constitution and stay in power. The former army officer was first elected in 1999 and was returned to power in elections in 2004. However, as the expiry of his second and final term approached, he sought a constitutional amendment to overturn a provision banning him from standing for a third term. The West African regional bloc Ecowas suspended Niger when President Tandja refused to postpone parliamentary elections in the face of an opposition boycott. Internal insurgency by the Tuaregs. The Niger Movement for Justice (MNJ) complained in 2008 that a 1995 peace deal that ended the previous insurgency has never been fully implemented and that the region remains marginalised. The group demands greater autonomy and a larger share of uranium revenue.

Niger is one of the poorest countries in the world. A landlocked nation, the economy centres on subsistence crops, livestock, and uranium deposits. Drought cycles, desertification, and strong population growth have cut economic growth. Niger shares a common currency, the CFA franc, and a common central bank, the Central Bank of West African States (BCEAO), with seven other members of the West African Monetary Union. Niger has been branded by the UN as the world's worst place to live. The UNDP looked at life expectancy, education and living standards, and rated it last out 182 countries. With almost 60 per cent of the population living below the poverty line, the cost of healthcare makes it inaccessible for the majority. The government has approved a plan to provide free healthcare to pregnant women and children under five, but does not yet have the funds to realise the proposal.

Niger has one of the lowest literacy rates in the world. The state controls much of the nation's broadcasting, though private radio stations have proliferated. Niger is also cited as a source, transit, and destination country for children and women trafficked for forced labour and sexual exploitation; caste-based slavery practices, rooted in ancestral master-slave relationships, continue in isolated areas of the country - an estimated 8,800 to 43,000 Nigeriens live under conditions of traditional slavery. Patriarchal customs have meant slow progress on the rights of women in Niger. As side note, the men of the Wodaabé tribe are so tall and amazing looking that they enter beauty contests. A panel of female judges picks a winner after hours of dancing and face-pulling.

Major conflicts

The country has had some disputes with her neigbours, mainly; Libya claims about 25,000sqkm in a currently dormant dispute in the Tommo region,

Much of the Benin-Niger boundary remains undemarcated,

Niger, Cameroon, Chad and Nigeria have disputes over access to shrinking water resources in the Lake Chad Basin.

Niger has had several coups

1974: First President Hamani Diori ousted in a military coup. Lieutenant Colonel Seyni Kountche tookover power.

1996 : Mahamane Ousmane deposed in coup by Colonel Ibrahim Bare Mainassara

In 1999: Colonel Ibrahim Mainassara Bare assassinated by his presidential guard and mourned at his hometown of Domega, in western Niger by military officers staged the coup, in a counter-coup by military officers who restored democratic rule and held elections that brought a civilian president to power in December of the same year,

In 2009: Mamadou Tandja's unconstitutional push to extend his term generates internal and regional tensions, prompting a military coup in February 2010. Mr. Mahamadou Issoufou assumed the presidency in Niger followed the April 7, 2011 presidential election after winning second round of balloting in March, 2011. A longtime political figure in the landlocked west African nation, has served as prime minister from 1993 to 95, headed the Nigerien national assembly for the next two years, and was opposition leader and a candidate in four presidential races over two decades. The March 2011 election, conducted by the ruling military regime headed by ex-Flight squadron commander Brigadier General Salou Djibo who ousted the previous president Mamadou Tandja who tried to extend his tenure by manipulating the constitution was generally judged to have been fair and free.

Side note: Niger malnutrition crisis spreading. Months of warnings have failed to prevent a serious malnutrition crisis in Niger, Save the Children has said.The charity says more than six million people are affected there, and about 18 million across West Africa.It says a rising number of children now need medical treatment for the condition, as the crisis is reaching a new level of seriousness. Save the Children's warning comes as this weekend's G8 meeting is expected to discuss food security.The Charity says it is now moving to an emergency response. Alarm bells have been ringing about Niger - with its record of severe food crises - since late last year after erratic rainfall threatened crop shortages and food prices also soared, the BBC's Mike Wooldridge says. Aid organisations have been trying to mitigate the impact. Overall, 25% of the world's children are suffering from chronic malnutrition - over and above the current food emergencies in Africa, Save the Children says. It has expressed its concern that G8 leaders will shy away from making bold commitments to ensure not only that children have enough to eat, but also the right kind of food and nutrition.

Accession to power of president Mahamadou Issoufou, by election.

Tentative election calendar- Presidential/Parliamentary, March/April.

Niger – Timeline Diaries updates, and related key notes:

1890 - French occupy Niger.

1958 - Niger becomes autonomous republic of the French Community.

1960 - Niger becomes independent; parliament elects Hamani Diori president.

1968-73 - Severe drought devastates Niger's livestock and crop production.

1974 - Hamani Diori overthrown in military coup led by Lt-Col Seyni Kountche.

1987 - Ali Seybou, the armed forces chief of staff, succeeds Kountche who dies of a brain tumour.

1989 - A new constitution brings Niger back to civilian rule, but under a one-party system; Seybou re-elected president.

1990 - Seybou legalizes opposition parties following a wave of strikes and demonstrations.

1990 - Rebellion by Tuareg people in the north begins.

July 1991 - Constitutional conference strips Seybou of his powers and sets up a transitional government under Andre Salifou.

Ibrahim Mainassara seized power in 1996, was assassinated in 1999 1992

- New constitution allowing multiparty elections ratified.

1993 - Mahamane Ousmane elected president and his coalition, the Alliance of the Forces of Change wins a majority of seats in parliament.

1995 - Ceasefire between the government and the Tuareg's Revolutionary Armed Forces of the Sahara comes into effect.

January 1996 - Ousmane ousted in a coup led by Colonel Ibrahim Mainassara, who bans all political parties.

May 1996 - New constitution giving the president increased powers approved in a referendum; ban on political parties lifted.

July 1996 - Mainassara wins presidential election.

1997 - The Democratic Renewal Front, a hard-line Tuareg group, signs peace accord with government.

April 1999 - Major Daouda Wanke assumes power following the assassination of Mainassara by his bodyguards.

August 1999 - New constitution restoring the balance between the legislative and executive branches of power approved in a referendum.

October and November 1999 - Mamadou Tandja elected president and his party, the National Movement for the Society in Development, wins majority of seats in parliament.

January 2001 - Niger bans hunting in an effort to save its wildlife population, which includes the lion, the giraffe and the hippopotamus.
August 2002 - Soldiers mutiny in the east and in the capital and demand the payment of wage arrears and better conditions. The rebellions are put down.

January 2003 - US President George W Bush claims Iraq tried to acquire uranium from Niger for its nuclear programme. Claim also made in UK's September 2002 dossier on Ir March 2003 - Nuclear watchdog tells UN that documents relating to Iraq-Niger uranium claim are forged, concludes specific allegations are unfounded.

December 15, 2003: A handwritten memo, a copy of which has been obtained exclusively by the Telegraph, is dated July 1, 2001 and provides a short resume of a three-day 'work programme' Atta had undertaken at Abu Nidal's base in Baghdad. "In the memo, Habbush reports that Atta 'displayed extraordinary effort' and demonstrated his ability to lead the team that would be 'responsible for attacking the targets that we have agreed to destroy'." And there's even this: "The second part of the memo, which is headed 'Niger Shipment', contains a report about an unspecified shipment ? believed to be uranium ? that it says has been transported to Iraq via Libya and Syria."

July 26, 2007 (AFP): Niger expels head of French nuclear company NIAMEY. The head of French nuclear group Areva in Niger has been ordered to leave the uranium-rich west African state, the company said Thursday, denying media reports that he backed Tuareg rebels. Dominique Pin was expelled after a decision Wednesday by Interior Minister Albade Abouba, according to the daily Republicain, which reported government concerns over Areva's alleged links to the rebels. There was no confirmation from the government. From its headquarters in Paris, Areva condemned the expulsion which comes just a week after Pin strongly denied rumours that Areva was financing the rebels of the Niger Movement for Justice (MNJ). "Nothing that Dominique Pin has done justifies such action," a company official told AFP. "The accusations made out against Areva are without any foundation," he said, stressing that the decision came at a time of "mutual misunderstanding." Areva, which has been operating mines in Niger for 40 years and is the country's biggest private employer, stressed that despite the expulsion it intends to "remain an important player in the social and economic development of Niger", the world's third-largest uranium producer. Seen as a key partner for Niger previously, Areva has become the target of heavy criticism despite investing one billion euros (1.4 billion dollars) in its Imouraren exploration site, its biggest uranium project in the country. Some national media have accused Areva of supporting a Tuareg rebellion since February in the uranium-producing north of the country. A recent television debate turned into a platform for verbal attacks against Areva, French media -- Radio France Internationale has been taken off the FM band -- and Libya. The following day several thousand people demonstrated against the French company and Libya. Pin is currently abroad. The expulsion order was received by the company's Niamey office. Local consumer and student groups as well as rights organisations in Niger accused "foreign interest groups like Areva" of supporting the MNJ but the Tuareg group has consistently denied receiving external support. Pin said in a statement last week that such accusations "harm the reputation of Areva and deeply hurt its staff" and insisted his firm also needed "security and stability" to continue its operations in Niger. In April, MNJ rebels attacked Areva's Imoumaren site, which is south of the main uranium-producing centre of Arlit. The MNJ, which emerged in February, says peace will not return to the region without better integration of Tuaregs into the army and the mining sector.

August 6, 2007: Niger boots Areva (French) for Chinese and Canadian mining Companies’

AFP - Niger ends 'monopoly' of French nuclear group NIAMEY. Niger's government has ended the effective monopoly of French nuclear group Areva in uranium mining in the country, and is seeking higher prices for the mineral, according to a ministerial statement. "Niger is determined to launch a policy of diversification of its partners, which means that Areva's monopoly in our country is broken," Foreign Minister Aichatou Mindaoudou said on television late Friday. The move followed the expulsion last month of the company's local head, Dominique Pin, amid accusations that it was supporting rebels of the ethnic Tuareg Movement for Justice (MJC) in the uranium-producing north. Areva has been operating two uranium mines in Niger for 40 years and is the west African country's biggest private employer. President Mamadou Tandja has accused it of backing the MJC in a bid to keep out competition. Areva has denied the accusations, and said last week that its contracts with Niamey had been renewed. The row prompted talks at the weekend in Niamey between French Cooperation Minister Jean-Marie Bockel and Niger officials, including Tandja. "I'm very satisfied with the exchange I had with President Tandja on a whole range of subjects including Areva, where very significant progress has been made towards overcoming a certain number of points of incomprehension," Bockel said on Saturday. "The fact the contracts were renewed... shows that a first step has been made and that things are going in the right direction." He added: "It's clear that Areva does not support and never has supported the rebellion. "There may have been the odd gaffe committed on the ground. We must now do everything to ensure there is no more ambiguity between Areva and Niger." Following the meeting between Tandja and Bockel, Mindaoudou told journalists the revamped contract with Areva obliges the company to sell its uranium at a higher price. The new price -- 40,000 CFA francs, or 60.98 euros (84 dollars) a kilo -- represents a significant increase over the old price of 27,300 CFA but is still well below the current international rate. The increase, retroactive to January 1, is only valid until the end of 2007, Mindaoudou said late Friday. In addition, for the first time Niger will be allowed to sell directly on its own account 300 tonnes of uranium, 100 this year and 200 in early 2008. Further negotiations with Areva will determine new prices for 2008 and beyond, she said. Prime Minister Seini Oumarou had earlier criticised the sale price of uranium that Areva fixes, commenting on state television that a kilo currently sells for 122,000 CFA francs (186 euros) on the international market. Mindaouodou said that in future Areva would be treated like any other mining company in its search for new deposits in Niger, which is the world's third largest producer of uranium with some nine percent of the market. "If Areva fulfils the conditions" laid down by Niger, "it will be granted permits, if not, it will not," she said. Since 2006 Niamey has granted some 20 licences to prospect for uranium to Chinese and Canadian companies.

October 10, 2007: Niger: No Holds Barred In Fight for Agadem’

After zeroing in for over a year, companies seeking the Agadem concession finally submitted their bids to Niger’s government on Sept. 28. The operation has aroused intense interest because Agadem contains identified reserves of nearly 300 million barrels and, along with the assets of Devon, constitutes the leading oil prize up for sale on the continent.

January 6, 2010: Niger: Zinder Refinery In the Works'

China is to begin work on the Zinder refinery in January as a condition of winning the contract to develop the Agadem oil field.

October 27, 2010: Niger: China Sonangol Eyes Oil Exploring’

The joint venture between Angola’s national company and Chinese interests, which operates in Guinea and Zimbabwe, appears interested in exploring Niger’s basins.

November 10, 2010: Niger: New Blocks Carved Out’

Just prior to his recent dismissal (see Page 8), Niger’s mines and oil minister, Souleymane Mamadou Abba, signed a decree confirming a new configuration of exploration blocks.

January 12, 2011: Niger: A milestone year ahead for Oil’

Spared for the moment from the insecurity spawned by Al Qaeda in Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) in the west and north of the country, Niger’s petroleum sector is growing in leaps and bounds under the leadership of the new oil minister, Djibo Salamatou Gourouza, who was named two months ago.
February 9, 2011: Angola: Sonangol sees future in pre-salt plays’

Angola and its national oil company Sonangol are actively preparing for the future of their oil industry - and energy in general. Luanda is not only intent on profiting fully from the current spike in demand for oil and gas and a forthcoming rise in OPEC quotas, but also banking on increasing its oil footprint elsewhere on the continent, such as in Ivory Coast and Congo-K

April 20, 2011: Niger: Zinder won’t start up until 2012'

Construction of the refinery in Niger will take another year to complete, giving CNPC and the government additional time to agree on how it will be funded.

October 5, 2011: Niger: Zinder off starting block'

A small ceremony at the oil ministry on Oct. 1 made it clear that production at the new refinery in Zinder is likely to start any time now.

November 16, 2011: Niger: Zinder to come on stream'

The brand-new Zinder refinery is due to be formally inaugurated on November.

November 30, 2011: Niger: CNPC to step up work on Agadem’

The latest meeting between the Chinese and the oil ministry indicated that a major drilling campaign is in the offing on Agadem.

November 30, 2011: Niger: Zinder’s prices contested’

On November 14, Niger’s energy and oil minister, Pierre Foumakoye Gado, announced a list of prices for oil products from the Zinder refinery with effect from December 1.

January 19, 2012: Hundreds of Tuareg tribesmen have fled Libya for their native Mali (just south of Libya) and formed a new rebel group (for an independent Tuareg state in Mali)." should read "Hundreds of Tuareg tribesmen have fled Libya for their native Mali (just south of Libya) and formed a new rebel group (for an independent Tuareg state in Mali)." To be a little picky, Mali is not "just south of Libya." Mali is south west of Libya and is separated from Libya by either Algeria or Niger.

February 29, 2012: Niger: CNPC wants to use Doba (Chad) and Kribi (Cameroon)'

The Chinese company is going to try to persuade ministers from Chad and Cameroon to allow crude from Agadem to be carried on the pipeline built by Exxon.

March 6, 2012: Niger: Post-Agadem oil rush in Niamey'

Business is booming in Niger's oil sector. After the inauguration of the Zinder refinery and new development on the Agadem block, numerous companies are knocking on Niger's door in the wake of the China National Petroleum Co. (CNPC). Who are they and what's at stake in the development of this new oil country.

May 2, 2012: Niger: Decisions on Zinder put back'

The board of Societe de Raffinerie de Zinder (SORAZ) which met in Beijing in early April decided, in fact, to make no decisions.

March 14, 2013: Niger: Several companies eye same blocks'

Five oil companies have put in firm offers for exploration rights and the government will shortly start weighing their bids. What blocks attract the most interest?

September 30, 2013: Niger and US strike military pact’

Niamey: Niger is incapable of dealing with the terrorist threat on its own soil and has given the US free rein to step in and take over.

December 16, 2014: Niger recently revealed that it had spent $13.5 million to buy a reconnaissance aircraft. That’s a high price to do something many other countries are doing for a lot less money. For example Afghanistan and several Middle Eastern countries have been buying Cessna Caravan 208B transport aircraft for this recon function. The 208B is a large, single engine, aircraft that can carry up to 14 passengers or 1.3 tons of cargo. It costs about half of what the more popular (in the U.S. armed forces) twin engine King Air does and is already popular as a passenger/cargo aircraft in remote parts of the planet. The four ton 208B has a cruising speed of 317 kilometers an hour and can stay in the air for about six hours per sortie. The 208 has been in service since the mid-1980s and over 2,000 have been built. New ones cost about $2 million each. Add reconnaissance equipment and training and you are still under $5 million.

The King Air 350 is a 5.6 ton, twin engine aircraft that has been used by the military for decades. It can fly higher (11 kilometers/35,000 feet) and is faster (over 500 kilometers an hour, versus 215) than UAVs like Predator or aircraft like the 208B. Fully equipped with cameras and electronic monitoring gear a King Air could cost over $12 million.

Niger has been hosting American UAVs and small recon aircraft (like the King Air) for over a year now and has been acquiring familiarity with the equipment and what it can do. It seems likely that Niger went with the more expensive option, if only because they had seen close-up how it works. (Text ends)

Why can't Africa control its population? (Africa's population will grow to more than 4 Billion before the end of this century.)

Ygor Coelho Brazilian fascinated by world history, cultures & genetics.
Updated 2y

To be fair, the birth rates in virtually all countries of Africa are slowing down in an increasingly significant pace, but, yes, I won’t be all optimistic and cheerfully blind in this answer. Yes, there is no doubt that much of Africa, with some notable exceptions like South Africa, Tunisia or Cape Verde, needs to tackle this issue much more seriously in the next decades and push for social and economic advances that naturally lead to a decrease in birth rates (forced birth control is not just morally wrong, it rarely works effectively for a long time).

In some countries, the population growth is not just fast, the real issue is that it’s not decreasing as rapidly as once was thought and as it happened in Latin America and Southeast Asia a few decades ago. So, the issue at stake is that some countries are failing to undergo a “normal” demographic transition as that experienced by other places of the world, therefore we can't be sure that those societies will avoid the worst predictions of demographic explosion.

The need to accelerate the already ongoing reduction in the fertility rate of women is especially urgent the countries that are already very populated (in some regions, they're even more populated than fully developed European countries that, nevertheless, still feel just a bit overpopulated despite all their wealth, like England and Germany).

Some countries of Africa, if they keep reducing their fertility rates at the present moderate rates, will experience an absurdly high population density by 2100 (just realize that, according to some moderate - not extreme - estimates, Uganda alone is poised to surpass 200 million people in just 241,000 km²), and that can't be good news either for most people, and especially for the natural flora and fauna of Africa.

My impression is that, in those countries which still have a very high birth rate even though they are mostly improductive deserts (e.g. Niger) or already very densely populated (e.g. Uganda), the increasing competition for work, land, resources and services will spontaneously lead future generations to desire smaller families and thus adapt to the higher costs of living and especially of rearing their children with sufficiently good conditions.

That is, the "most effective birth control" will end up being the natural dynamics of the society as its population and its economy increases, leading to much higher levels of urbanization, more dependence on service and trade as a source of income, and higher cost of living. However, it would be nice the governments, through educational and health services, encouraged that change preemptively so that it could happen in a less dramatic and potentially problematic way.

People are mostly rational, and I doubt that the majority of the population of any of those nations will simply leave their country in droves without any perspective of finding work elsewhere, pressured by the increasing population density and lack of enough jobs or property for everyone. Most people want to make their living where they were raised, and they will just need to get used to the new social and economic conditions and decide accordingly when they start their own families.

Of course, it would help a lot of if the people as a whole and particularly the women receive a much better education and health services, because people are much more likely to make reasonable choices when they are aware of their options and they have the means to fulfill them, and as we have seen in many other nations of the world it is mostly women who ultimately decide if they'll have more or less children. Educated, free, independent women can do that much more fast and strongly than women who are still to dependent on their fathers or husbands.

Related Links

Will Africa's huge population growth become a problem for the rest of the world?

Can the African population growth be seen as a threat to Europe?

Why is Africa's population booming and Europe's population is growing so slowly?

Will Africa's population reach 4 billion by 2100, or are population projections for Africa exaggerated?

How can Africa's rapid population growth be prevented?

Why the population growth in Europe is decreasing?

By Ygor Coelho: Avid reader on history of peoples and population genetics. updated Oct 18

Here we go, alea jacta est. I predict all the usual tags-to-be-used-to-people-who-say-things-we-dislike will come out in the comment section soon: "racist", "white supremacist" (yes, of course, a mixed-race Brazilian from a highly multiracial developing nation, someone who would likely be deemed a lowly Latino mongrel in the real white supremacist circles);

"pessimistic" (apparently if you warn that, if someone keeps on doing the very same thing for a much longer time, it will probably end up having some negative effects, you're "wishing them ill" or something, instead of the exact opposite, perhaps even being a little too careful to avoid any ills);

"nosy" (for those who think we have to get citizenship or reincarnate in order to have an opinion about facts happening on the other side of imaginary borders, because apparently human beings are such a "different species" abroad, and even numbers and logics work totally upside down once you move to a certain place — the convenient excuse of "exceptionalism");

“patronizing”, “paternalistic” (because apparently it’s “oppressive” and “offensive” if you merely express an evidence-based and non-judgmental opinion about what you think is bound to happen in a certain situation if all conditions remain unchanged — anywhere and at any time, regardless of ethnicity, geography or “race”).

Okay, nothing surprising in Quora or any other social network, in which people who don’t like what they read have learned their “cancel language dictionary” very well for those occasions in which, though they can’t demolish the points you made rationally and don’t negate the objective data you presented, they still dislike what you said more by its “negativity” than by any incoherence, untruth or weakness of its content (because naive and thoughtless agreement, in order to not “stand out” as an author of - how dare you?! - a “criticism”, no matter how polite, well-aimed or substantiated, as well as toxic positivity are basically a must nowadays to be hailed as “our good progressive ally”).

Often people by far prefer those false friends that superficially support and praise everything they’re saying or doing, because those don’t really care about the outcomes, it doesn’t concern them in the slightest, to those real friends that call a spade a spade and aren’t shy to voice their genuine opinion, no matter how joy-killer or unpleasant it may be, because they honestly wish the best. A cheerful, rose-colored, upvote-seeking, politically correct answer that says a reassuring “it’s all fine” without even checking the matter deeply is usually preferred… but is often less helpful or enlightening.
End of rant. ;-)

Let’s begin with this statement: the main purpose of an analysis of future scenarios with forecasts and warnings is precisely to make all those worst predictions eventually become totally incorrect. Isn’t that self-evident enough?

Someone who exposes his negative views on climate change or overconsumption of resources does so in the hope that, because of that awareness raised about the long-term consequences of the current trends if they do not change significantly and sooner than predicted, all those negative forecasts will never even come to be true, because circumstances and conditions will have changed enough along the way to create a much more moderate and less worrisome scenario.

Claiming that “hey, see how all those alarmist models and warnings were just made up to make us look worse!”, after fortunate changes and advances avoided the worst, is totally missing the point.

Ditto for those who say that current yearly population growth has been stubbornly too high for too long in some nations of the world, mostly nowadays in Africa (but not just in Africa, don't forget!).

It's not as if it's a problem intrinsic or exclusive to Africa, which is why, for instance, nobody who is well informed includes countries like South Africa, Botswana or Tunisia in their "pessimistic" speeches about the socio-economic and environmental consequences of a dramatic population boom. Those countries are not part of this concern at all, which shows clearly that it's not a "racial matter". They have been going through a regular demographic transition from high fertility/high death rate to low fertility/low death rate, so they're pretty much experiencing what's expected from any country in a similar level of development.

But there are countries and countries. In some parts of Africa, what is really striking is that those* patterns of demographic transition that happened in Europe, in North America, in Latin America, in East Asia, in Southeast Asia, in much (though not all) of the Middle East, are just not happening at all.

Or rather, "a" demographic transition is indeed happening, but in a totally different, much slower pace, even many decades after the bulk of the decrease in death rates started to happen. As is widely known, it is not an increase in fertility rates that causes most population booms: it's a dramatic decline in death rates enabled by socio-economic and techno-scientific advances.

Unlike the "expected" pattern of previous demographic transitions in the underdeveloped world (Latin America, East/Southeast Asia etc.), which was an acceleration of the decline in fertility and birth rates starting ~20-40 years after the intense decline in death rates, that has not happened so far or did indeed happen, but in exceedingly moderate levels, in much of Africa. That's not a matter of opinion: it's a fact.

The current high population growth of most of Africa is like a very protracted version of the intermediary stage of the demographic transition that's already closer to completion in most other parts of the world. That is the stage in which death rates started to plummet just a few decades earlier, but people are still "wared" to think just like they did in the prior and "traditional" demographic situation, when infant mortality rates were still huge and the odds of dying early at any time were still pretty high. Birth and fertility rates often start to decrease ever so slightly, but way too little to compensate for the sudden and really intense decline in death rates. Population boom ensues.

The social, economic and cultural adjustment to that unprecedented situation takes some decades to catch on, until a new balance (hopefully) is found in later decades. Much of Africa seems to be stuck in the middle of that path or crossing it without any hurry, though. The transition is definitely going on, but as if people were often using the brakes.

Birth rate

The number of live births occurring during the year, per 1,000 people.

Our World in Data

Source: United Nations – Population Division (2019 Revision)

OurWorldInData.org/fertility-rate • CC BY

The result is, as everyone knows, permanently enormous population growth for longer than 60 years — and likely to continue at least until the end of the 21st century even if fertility rates and birth rates decline in an increasingly faster pace, which is predicted by the UN forecasts.

The cases of 3 Saharan-Sahelian countries, Mali, Niger and Chad are particularly concerning considering the extremely high levels of sustained and so far unabated population growth in what are hyper-arid-majority countries in which the overwhelming majority of the population is concentrated in a minority of the territory that has more hospitable and productive climate conditions.

Population estimates

	1887	2021	2100	Accumulated growth
Mali	2.05	20.86	80.38	3821%
Chad	1.92	16.91	61.85	3121%
Niger	1.21	25.13	164.95	13,532%

Absolute population numbers mean little. 20 million in the fertile river valleys of China is very little, but 20 million in the desert of Atacama will be a lot. Niger, Mali, Chad, Mauritania, Somalia, Namibia, Egypt, Morocco and some other nations are mosly occupied by deserts and semi-arid grasslands without major fertile river valleys, which is why the overwhelming majority of the people in those countries are heavily concentrated in just a small portion of their large territories, so obviously these lands are, unless major technological advances happen in the future (an unforeseeable condition), less capable of sustaining very high population densities without any hardship.

Köppen–Geiger climate classification map for Mali (1980–2016)

The Sahelian countries also face the challenge of Saharan expansion (desertification) and very obvious problems to feed and give humane living conditions, jobs and overall opportunities to their generally very young populace. To be honest, as a a general rule, 3% growth of it per year is hardly coped up with ease for a very long time, even in countries that are booming economically and developing fast.

As for Nigeria, Uganda, Rwanda, Egypt (even with more than 90% of its territory being almost uninhabited desert) and a few other nations, they already have very high population densities, much higher than most countries of the world. So, as of now, without any further growth, they are already very populous for their land size, regardless of climate conditions. If they triple or quadruple their population, they will be among the most populated places on earth, with all the obvious direct and indirect consequences that derive from that.

There is no need to wait for an "apocalyptical scenario" to start caring about long-term social, environmental and economic impacts and to think about the conditions that will allow people to not just survive two or three generations from ours, but also to thrive, preferably with a much higher level of socio-economic progress than exists now. I hope a consensus can be reached that it's wrong to believe that "it's all fine as long as the Doomsday doesn't come, so nothing must be done to avoid further problems in lands that already deal with lots of chronic problems, because whatever happens, it surely won't be as bad as the end of the world". That would be really lowering the bar for Africa and Africans, and I definitely don't think we should do that.

Someone who really think it is no problem and of no concern at all, not for now, but for the not so distant future, that a country that already experienced a major population boom in the 20th century keeps growing 2–3% per year for another century is either naively over-optimistic (of that kind that can get dangerous for oneself and for other people), or very reckless and obstinate even in the face of reason and sheer factual likelihood.

Of course it may also be, for some, a case of excessive focus on the short term, so that 50 years from now seems to be an extremely remote prospect, or, in other cases, ignorance of how population growth, being the exponential proportion that it in fact is, escalates over time until what was not initially a concern suddenly becomes a concern right when it's way too late to make anything to curb it.

Population of country A in year 0: 25 million

If it keeps increasing...	After 100 years it'll have...	Accumulated growth
3% per year	480.5 million	1822%
2.5% per year	295.3 million	1081,2%
2% per year	181.1 million	624,4%
1.5% per year	110.8 million	343,2%
1% per year	67.6 million	170,4%
0.5% per year	41.2 million	64,8%

Let's make it clear: a 2%, 2.5%, even 3% population growth is obviously no dramatic danger to any society, to nature or to the world this year, next year or in the next 10 years…

But have it sustained in those immense levels for many decades (even after many previous decades of similarly high growth, mind you), and maybe things will start to look differently, and not just because of the figures per se, but because of the new conditions, risks and obstacles that appear.

Demographics is really destiny (and, I might add, mathematics is, too), but fortunately we are perfectly able to predict what's going to happen and prepare for the challenges that are still not present so vividly, but will soon emerge in an unmistakable way.

For one, a much increased demand for all sorts of natural (e.g. water, food stuff, land, metals, electricity etc.) as well as human resources just to keep the present standards of living (usually poor and underdeveloped, let's be realistic), without even increasing it at all on a per capita basis.

A huge feat in a world that is already struggling to find ways to keep its current levels of consumption without completely disrupting the natural environments that ultimately we rely on to survive and have a hospitable and minimally pleasant homeland to live and work on.

And that's just considering our own self-centered interests as human beings… I don't need to tell what is obviously going to happen to more and more natural areas "claimed" by farms, pastures, mining, urban and inter-urban infrastructure, housing, and so on, do I? People have to find a way to survive, and they're also entitled to having their ambition to earn and consume more.

For another, there is the inconvenient fact of the utter incapability of the traditional, pre-modern or proto-modern, agrarian economy to properly guarantee work, land and decent living for, say, 200 million people where there used to be just 10 million people less than 200 years ago, especially the territory in question is arid or semi-arid or, alternatively, already quite densely populated or even a lot so).

Moreover, there is the already ongoing, almost unstoppable and easily predictable transition from mostly rural to mostly urban in most of the world, including Africa. Even with moderate population increase, an urbanization process is very challenging and often creates new societal problems (e.g. criminal violence, urban gangs, pollution, sewage and other infrastructure issues, mass transport systems, etc.) or worsens those that already exist.

With high (~2–3%) natural increase that would already guarantee a massive growth in the population figures and sizes of cities, but with that strongly compounded by fast urbanization, economic modernization and increasing "push" factors in rural areas, it's going get really rough in many highly sought-after metropolitan areas.

Keeping in line with our aforementioned hypothetical example using a generic Country A (maybe thus people think twice before accusing me of being "afro-pessimistic"), let's see how those two trends work together:

Population of country A in year 0: 25 million. Urbanization rate: 30% (7.5 million).

If it keeps increasing...	After 100 years...	Urban population Rate: 80%	Accumulated growth of the urban pop.	Rural population Rate: 20%	Accumulated growth of the rural pop.
3% per year	480.5 million	384.4 million	5025,3%	96.1 million	449,1%
2.5% per year	295.3 million	236.2 million	3049,3%	59.1 million	237,7%
2% per year	181.1 million	144.9 million	1832,0%	36.2 million	106,9%
1.5% per year	110.8 million	88.6 million	1081,9%	22.2 million	26,9%
1% per year	67.6 million	54.1 million	621,1%	13.5 million	-22,9%
0.5% per year	41.2 million	33.0 million	339,5%	8.2 million	-53,1%

In the scenarios of highest continuous growth, with urban population skyrocketing by a staggering 5,025%, it'd be basically as if you live in a medium-sized city with 0.5 million inhabitants, and only one hundred years from now there will be 25.6 million people that will have to have everything provided to them in the same city. Now, multiply that in an entire country. That's maybe feasible, why not?, but definitely not devoid of any problems and concerns. Even a much more intermediate scenario (like the one with average 1.5% increase per year) still involves a huge boom of city dwellers, above 1,000% in one century.

Some people have pointed out to me that Africa is "underpopulated" and has "vast empty lands and resources available for a much larger population". That would be a good relieving point, but… well, unfortunately "underpopulation", at least for worldwide standards, is not exactly the reality of much of Africa even by now (particularly if you take away all the inhospitable deserts), let alone 50 or 100 years from now if its population really booms as foreseen.

As for "vast empty lands" I hope they're not considering the mostly infertile and not so favorable desert and semi-desert zones that cover almost 1/3 of Africa's territory, nor taking the entirety of the remaining (and already much reduced) areas of natural vegetation as "lands to be used in the next years". That would be a disaster not just for nature, but, in the long term, for the people themselves.

In the table below, anyone can easily see that much of Africa is objectively not underpopulated. In fact, some of the world's highest population densities are found in Africa even now, and many of the countries that initially seem to be very underpopulated are just majority very arid and/or semi-arid locations, where the large majority of the population necessarily has to live in a small portion of the country.

From the table it's also clear that, whether we like it or not, it's just a fact that Africa has a vast amount of deserts, semi-deserts and semi-arid steppes, not exactly the least vulnerable environments for a massive, continuous boom in the population.

	Mostly arid and semi-arid countr
	Largely arid and semi-arid count

	Area	2020 estimate	Pop. Density
World average	-	7.800.000.000	53,0
Algeria	2.381.740	43.851.044	18,4
Angola	1.246.700	32.866.272	26,4
Benin	112.620	12.123.200	107,6
Botswana	600.370	2.351.627	3,9
Burkina Faso	274.200	20.903.273	76,2
Burundi	27.830	11.890.784	427,3
Cabo Verde	4.033	555.987	137,9
Cameroon	475.440	26.545.863	55,8
Central African Republic	622.984	4.829.767	7,8
Chad	1.284.000	16.425.864	12,8
Comoros	2.170	869.601	400,7
Côte d'Ivoire	322.460	26.378.274	81,8
Democratic Republic of the Congo	2.345.410	89.561.403	38,2
Djibouti	23.000	988.000	43,0
Egypt	1.001.450	102.334.404	102,2
Equatorial Guinea	28.051	1.402.985	50,0
Eritrea	121.320	3.546.421	29,2
Eswatini (Swaziland)	17.363	1.160.164	66,8
Ethiopia	1.127.127	114.963.588	102,0
Gabon	267.667	2.225.734	8,3
Gambia	11.300	2.416.668	213,9
Ghana	239.460	31.072.940	129,8
Guinea	245.857	13.132.795	53,4
Guinea-Bissau	36.120	1.968.001	54,5
Kenya	582.650	53.771.296	92,3
Lesotho	30.355	2.142.249	70,6
Liberia	111.370	5.057.681	45,4
Libya	1.759.540	6.871.292	3,9
Madagascar	587.040	27.691.018	47,2
Malawi	118.480	19.129.952	161,5
Mali	1.240.000	20.250.833	16,3

Mauritania	1.030.700	4.649.658	4,5
Mauritius	2.040	1.271.768	623,4
Mayotte (France)	374	272.815	729,5
Morocco	446.550	36.910.560	82,7
Mozambique	801.590	31.255.435	39,0
Namibia	825.418	2.540.905	3,1
Niger	1.267.000	24.206.644	19,1
Nigeria	923.768	206.139.589	223,2
Republic of the Congo	342.000	5.518.087	16,1
Réunion (France)	2.512	895.312	356,4
Rwanda	26.338	12.952.218	491,8
Saint Helena, Ascension and Tristan da Cunha (UK)	394	6.077	15,4
São Tomé and Príncipe	1.001	219.159	218,9
Senegal	196.190	16.743.927	85,3
Seychelles	455	98.347	216,1
Sierra Leone	71.740	7.976.983	111,2
Somalia	637.657	15.893.222	24,9
South Africa	1.219.912	59.308.690	48,6
South Sudan	644.329	11.193.725	17,4
Sudan	1.861.484	43.849.260	23,6
Tanzania	945.087	59.734.218	63,2
Togo	56.785	8.278.724	145,8
Tunisia	163.610	11.818.619	72,2
Uganda	236.040	45.741.007	193,8
Western Sahara	266.000	597.339	2,2
Zambia	752.614	18.383.955	24,4
Zimbabwe	390.580	14.862.924	38,1

So, sorry, but the "we have plenty of room to grow indefinitely" argument doesn't hold water and seems to be a blindly accepted myth, a self-denial or an excuse to refuse to discuss the matter. It's perhaps true for some places and provided that population increase goes on strongly for some time, but it doesn't work as a whole for the entire continent nor in the longer term.

Someone else, also from Africa, told me that the people there are very "resilient" and always easily "learn how to adapt and survive under all conditions", as they've done for centuries (he only forgot that they did so when their population numbers were tremendously lower), even without the need for any of the modern apparatus of technology and modern economy.

Apparently, this person who has electricity, a mobile phone/notebook and access to good internet connection to write to me, ironically, thinks those comforts of modern technology and knowledge are totally needless and perhaps even undesirable for millions or even, in a near future, billions of other people who live in the same continent: "they don't need those things to survive and be glad about their lives" — so the privileged few must think, and it must feel so convenient for them to believe so, indeed.

It's almost as if the real point that is meant is that "it's enough to guarantee their mere survival", irrespective of living conditions, economic opportunities and both environmental as well as social sustainability. Provided that they don't die in droves, it's all neat.

Sorry, but I can't think that way. In my book it's not enough that people survive early childhood and live some sort of living for some time, no matter how meager, impoverished or subject to premature disease and death. At least that isn't what we should strive for right from the start, without even trying to move things a bit to make a different future come true.

Most of those people aren't just "living simple lifestyles": low life expectancy, increased risk of premature death, relatively high infant mortality, high maternal mortality, high undernourishment rates, insufficient access to proper medical treatment, lack of sanitation and improved water — those are not "Western luxuries" nor "modern comforts", nor do I think they are deliberate "choices" to live "a more simple and traditional way of life", at least not for most people, who were given no choice where they were born.

Now that kind of romanticization of underdevelopment is what I think really sounds very condescending. It's usually an argument used by those who have access to all those so-called "luxuries" to underplay the challenges and hardships faced by the common men and women.

Ironically, three of the well-known leading facts that are strongly correlated with the slow decrease of fertility and birth rates in any country are low access to at least primary and secondary education, low access to physicians, medical materials (including contraceptives) and healthcare in general, and low opportunities of better education and independent work for women.

So, that kind of "fake-progressive" thought actually becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy: by stressing that people just need to keep being the resilient survivors that they have always been, they're also guaranteeing that the population surge continues strongly for more years, and vice-versa in a mutually reinforcing way.

What definitely proves that the rapid population increase of most of Africa in this century does merit some concern and serious consideration in public debate and policy, without shrugging it off or putting half-concocted labels on anyone who dares to speak, is that African people, hopefully and fortunately, will not just get stuck in the very same living conditions, consumption patterns and economic opportunities that they have now in the next seven or eight decades.

Africa is developing and enriching, and it just won't stop because some people may think they don't need much more to live well. Clearly most people do want more goods, energy resources, services, knowledge, and so on. That's already happening, but it's evidently a process that, as anywhere else, is very costly to the environment and very demanding to both humankind and the entire planet.

If Africa's population rises from the present 1.3 billion people to nearly 4.3 billion people in 2100, as per the medium (pay attention at this) scenario of the UN forecasts, the effective impact of that growth for the planet won't be an additional 3 billion humans. At least I sincerely hope it won't, because Africa is expected to narrow the gap between it and other world regions and have average continent-wide standards of economy, quality of life, nutrition, etc. on a par at least with the more developed among the emerging countries (e.g. Mexico, Iran, Brazil, Turkey, Colombia, Thailand, etc.).

But for that to happen, demand and consumption of resources per capita (for productive purposes as well as for direct use) will necessarily have to increase *a lot, even if major technological breakthroughs reduce waste and improve efficiency, productivity and environmental sustainability.

It's pure mathematics. If Africans by 2100 consume 3x or 4x times as much as they do now, still well below what people in the rich developed world on average do nowadays, in 2021, then those 4.3 billion people in 2100 will in fact have the total effect or "footprint" of 12.9–17.2 billion individuals living by the socio-economic standards of 2021 Africa.

Population of country A in year 0: 25 million.
Use of resources per capita: 1x = 2020 patterns

If it keeps increasing...	After 100 years...	Use of resources	Tantamount to:	Accumulated increase in total use of resources
3% per year	480.5 million	4x	1.922 billion	7,588%
2.5% per year	295.3 million	4x	1.181 billion	4,624%
2% per year	181.1 million	4x	724.4 million	2,798%
1.5% per year	110.8 million	4x	443.2 million	1,673%
1% per year	67.6 million	4x	270.4 million	981,6%
0.5% per year	41.2 million	4x	164.8 million	559,2%

That's a huuuuuuge leap. It's no reason for panic and alarm, however there is no way you can say it'll be easy-peasy like a walk in the park, and the more people refuse to take that seriously and prepare accordingly, the harder it will be.

A way to achieve that big socio-economic advance together with a big population boom will have to be found amidst: increasingly worrisome climate changes detrimental to the economy and the livability of some areas, an already very populated world, and an increasing perception that the limits of the sustainable and self-replenishable use of the Earth's resources may have been already breached by humankind.[1]

We aren't talking here about a future that is way over the visible horizon, guys. It's "just" 28 years separating us from 2050 (we will hopefully all be alive by then), and 2100 is "just" 78 years from now. We all know many children who will be (God willing!) alive in 2100 or even many years after that. It's just about three generations from now. The population momentum of the last years virtually guarantees that the forecasts will be reasonably accurate at least until the 2050s.

These prospects and concerns are not totally unrealistic "dystopic fantasies" about things that are so far ahead that we can do nothing about nor should waste much time thinking about.

If the currently estimated trends continue (stress on the word if), Africa will have most of the most densely populated countries in the world, with the majority of the continent's nations well above the world average population density of 2100 or, for what it's worth, 2021, and it will certainly have an even tremendously higher increase in consumption of resources, arable lands, public services, and so on.

That's just a neutral, objective, logical fact driven by demographic processes: it's not something that will magically solve itself or miraculously emerge with rigorously no apparent consequences for anyone — for individuals, societies, fauna, flora, the entire planet. Denial and delusion never helped anyone handle a new situation successfully.

	Area	2100 estimate	Pop. Density	2020-2100 increase (%)
World average	148.900.000	10.880.000.000	73,1	39,5
Algeria	2.381.740	70.700.000	29,7	61,2
Angola	1.246.700	188.280.000	151,0	472,9
Benin	112.620	47.210.000	419,2	289,4
Botswana	600.370	4.170.000	6,9	77,3
Burkina Faso	274.200	83.190.000	303,4	298,0
Burundi	27.830	50.900.000	1829,0	328,1
Cabo Verde	4.033	603.949	149,8	8,6
Cameroon	475.440	90.230.000	189,8	239,9
Central African Republic	622.984	11.630.000	18,7	140,8
Chad	1.284.000	61.850.000	48,2	276,5
Comoros	2.170	2.190.000	1009,2	151,8
Côte d'Ivoire	322.460	96.630.000	299,7	266,3
Democratic Republic of the Congo	2.345.410	362.030.000	154,4	304,2
Djibouti	23.000	1.330.000	57,8	34,6
Egypt	1.001.450	224.740.000	224,4	119,6
Equatorial Guinea	28.051	4.510.000	160,8	221,5
Eritrea	121.320	9.060.000	74,7	155,5
Eswatini (Swaziland)	17.363	2.150.000	123,8	85,3
Ethiopia	1.127.127	294.390.000	261,2	156,1
Gabon	267.667	5.860.000	21,9	163,3
Gambia	11.300	8.180.000	723,9	238,5
Ghana	239.460	79.010.000	330,0	154,3
Guinea	245.857	45.260.000	184,1	244,6
Guinea-Bissau	36.120	5.710.000	158,1	190,1
Kenya	582.650	125.420.000	215,3	133,2
Lesotho	30.355	2.700.000	88,9	26,0
Liberia	111.370	15.530.000	139,4	207,1
Libya	1.759.540	8.010.000	4,6	16,6
Madagascar	587.040	99.960.000	170,3	261,0
Malawi	118.480	66.560.000	561,8	247,9
Mali	1.240.000	80.380.000	64,8	296,9
Mauritania	1.030.700	17.060.000	16,6	266,9
Mauritius	2.040	827.303	405,5	-34,9
Mayotte (France)	374	745.691	1993,8	173,3
Morocco	446.550	44.710.000	100,1	21,1
Mozambique	801.590	123.650.000	154,3	295,6
Namibia	825.418	5.794.000	7,0	128,0
Niger	1.267.000	164.950.000	130,2	581,4
Nigeria	923.768	732.940.000	793,4	255,6
Republic of the Congo	342.000	20.960.000	61,3	279,8
Réunion (France)	2.512	901.249	358,8	0,7
Rwanda	26.338	33.410.000	1268,5	157,9
Saint Helena, Ascension and Tristan da Cunha (UK)	394	4.496	11,4	-26,0
São Tomé and Príncipe	1.001	708.097	707,4	223,1
Senegal	196.190	63.520.000	323,8	279,4
Seychelles	455	88.327	194,1	-10,2
Sierra Leone	71.740	16.680.000	232,5	109,1
Somalia	637.657	75.720.000	118,7	376,4
South Africa	1.219.912	79.190.000	64,9	33,5
South Sudan	644.329	31.740.000	49,3	183,6
Sudan	1.861.484	142.340.000	76,5	224,6
Tanzania	945.087	285.650.000	302,2	378,2
Togo	56.785	26.950.000	474,6	225,5
Tunisia	163.610	12.970.000	79,3	9,7
Uganda	236.040	136.780.000	579,5	199,0
Western Sahara	266.000	1.380.000	5,2	131,0
Zambia	752.614	81.550.000	108,4	343,6
Zimbabwe	390.580	30.970.000	79,3	108,4

Now, is this massive surge ultimately good or bad, welcome or undesired? It's up to each person or people to decide that. Of course every nation has the power and the right to self-determination, to lead their own fate as they please, but it's really important that they are all fully aware of what each of the available choices will take and what the consequences of each of them will be. You can only make a choice when you at least know that it is a choice to begin with, and not just a fatalistic decision by the Fates.

As a final note, I want to stress that it's not like accelerating the demographic transition is a feat that no African nation achieved, or something that they are all incapable of or universally against. Persistently high population increase is not some integral part of the "African ways". Some countries have already paved that way, like Djibouti and Cape Verde, which have converged with the world average trend very rapidly in the last 40 years and is not likely to experience any big surge in its population numbers.

Related Links

Why can't Africa control its population? (Africa's population will grow to more than 4 Billion before the end of this century.)

Africa’s population is growing irresponsibly, it’s a bad thing for the world. Will measures be taken to lower the birth rate?

What are the consequences of the strong population growth in Africa: 1.3 billion inhabitants in 2018, 2.5 billion in 2050 and 4.4 billion in 2100?

Will Africa's population reach 4 billion by 2100, or are population projections for Africa exaggerated?

How can Africa's population grow to 2.4 billion by 2050, as stated by the Population Reference Bureau (US), with all the known geopolitical and economic problems affecting the continent?

What caused the rapid population growth in Africa in the last 60 years?

Si la France venait à interdire l'immigration massive venant d'Afrique, est-ce que certains pays Africains devraient interdire l'exploitation et l'exportation d'uranium par la France ?

Pierre Jamain Anciennement Gérant de S.A.R.L. (Labo photo professionnel) à Labo photo professionnel (1970–2000) 23 mai

Réponse originale : Si la France viendrait à interdire l'immigration massive venant de l'Afrique, est-ce que certains pays Africains devraient interdire l'exploitation et l'exportation d'uranium à la France ?

Si la France ne pouvait plus exploiter et importer l'uranium du Niger ce ne serait pas gênant puisque elle exploite et importe ce minerai depuis le Kazakhstan, le Canada et l'Australie qui avec la Namibie produisent 80% de l'uranium naturel.

Questions similaires

L'Afrique est-elle pauvre à cause de la colonisation ? Si la colonisation n'avait jamais eu lieu, comment se présenterait l'Afrique ?

Pensez-vous qu'il y a des pays dont la France devrait interdire l'immigration pour cause d'incompatibilité avec sa culture et ses valeurs ?

L'immigration est-elle toujours "une chance pour la France" ?

Pourquoi la France a-t-elle des critères peu exigeants en terme d'immigration ? Alors qu'elle aurait tout à gagner à sélectionner les personnes avec le plus de potentiel pour son économie Pourquoi l'Afrique est colonisée par la France ? Et de quel droit ?

Est-il vrai que ce sont les immigrés qui provoquent le plus d'incidents en France ?

Pourquoi la France privilégie l'immigration nord-africaine (pays non en guerre et non misérables) au détriment d'autres populations de pays en guerre ayant vraiment besoin d'aide (Afghanistan, Syrie), est-ce contraire aux droits internationaux?

Pourquoi E. Macron a-t-il parlé d'annuler la dette des pays africains lors de son allocution télévisée du 13 avril 2020 sur le covid-19 ? Craint-il une nouvelle crise migratoire de l'Afrique fuyant le virus en direction de l'Europe ?

En France, pourquoi ne pas faire la promotion d'une immigration de masse venue d'Asie pour "diluer" l'immigration africaine et nord-africaine et ainsi lutter contre le séparatisme islamiste ?

Pourquoi la France n'efface-t-elle pas la dette des pays Africains ? Ne devrait-elle pas payer des réparations à son égard ?

Face aux accusations fréquentes de pillages et de déstabilisations de l'Afrique dont fait l'objet la France, êtes-vous pour un retrait des troupes françaises de l'Afrique afin de laisser les Africains se débrouiller tout seul ?

Pourquoi le fils du président Denis Sassou Nguesso est mis en examen en France ?

Et pourquoi les politiques/PDG français qui ont des biens mal acquis ne sont pas jugés en Afrique ? Est-ce que la France est un pays impérialiste ?

Est-il vrai, comme l'affirme E. Zemmour, que 275 000 immigrés entrent sur le territoire français par an et que seulement 14% viennent y travailler ?

Pourquoi la France ne veut-elle pas se passer de l'Afrique ?

Pourquoi certains français sont-ils contre l'arrivée massive d'immigrés africains en France ?

Are Black people only Ikelan caste in Tuareg society or can they also be Imrad?

Alton Allen Knowledgeable In African and African Diaspora History:Jan 16

TUAREG CHIEFS | Photo

TUAREG LEADER

menu continents Advertisement « previous next » TUAREG CHIEF Bought the leather & shell pendant from around his neck...does that make me a chief?

FACES OF MALI...TIMBUKTU April 13th 2011 FACES OF MALI…TIMBUKTU Many faces partially obscured by the indigo turbans of the Tuareg..or smiling from them...the nomadic peoples of the southern Sahara Desert...strong faces...showing resolve, endurance and handsome all...Tuaregs arriving by camel to trade...but also Songhai (descendents of the Songhai Empire who once controlled the gold & salt trade) & Bozo (fishermen of t ... read more Africa » Mali » North-West » Timbuktu The Sudanese Republic and Senegal became independent of France in 1960 as the Mali Federation. When Senegal withdrew after only a few months, what formerly made up the Sudanese Republic was renamed Mali. Rule by dictatorship was brought to a close in... ... read more Advertisement Tot: 0.028s; Tpl: 0.008s; cc: 6; qc: 14; dbt: 0.0036s; 1; m:saturn w:www (104.131.125.221); sld: 1; ; mem: 1.3mb now: 1642362887 age: 47 ttl: 3600 left: 3553 © 2017 TravelBlog.org & Bloggers

https://www.travelblog.org/Photos/6036454
https://afropop.org/articles/susan-rasmussen-on-the-tuareg

Susan Rasmussen on the Tuareg

Susan Rasmussen is a professor of anthropology at the University of Houston. She has conducted of some 30 years of field work among rural and urban Tuareg communities in Niger and Mali, and more recently, African immigrants in France. She specializes in anthropology of religion, gender, lifecycle aging, medical and ritual healing, and verbal art performance. Her five books and numerous articles and papers on Tuareg culture include studies of spirit possession, of youth culture in Agadez, Niger, and a study of acting and plays in Kidal, Mali. Banning Eyre spoke with her in preparation for the Hip Deep program, "The Tuareg Predicament in Mali." Here's an edited transcript of their conversation.

Note that this transcription uses Susan's favored spelling for the name of the Tuareg language: Tamajaq. Elsewhere on this site and in the literature, you will find other spellings, such as Tamashek or Tamasheq. This discrepancy, like so many other conundrums, goes with the territory.

Banning Eyre: Let's start at the beginning. Who are the Tuareg?

Susan Rasmussen: There's a mix of myth and history in any account of a people's origins. Even the term Tuareg is a cover term or a gloss for a number of different groups, though they are closely related. The Tuareg sometimes call themselves Kel Tamajaq , after their language, which is in a family of languages called Berber, or the local term Amazight. The Berber or Amazight people are the original inhabitants of North Africa. The Tuareg themselves fall into large regional confederations, and smaller clans and descent groups. Today, most Tuareg live in the northern areas of Niger and Mali, the southern area of Algeria, Libya and parts of Burkina Faso. Although keep in mind that there have been migrations and dispersions, as well as returns to the central Saharan region for centuries, in response to ecological disasters such as droughts, and also in response to political violence.

Now, I'm not a historian, but I can tell you that the origins of the Tuareg are disputed. Most researchers agree that the Tuareg originated in the central Sahara. It depends on who you read and to whom you speak on the ground when conducting field research. Some can be traced to the Fezzan region in southern Libya. Some of the different groups trace their origins to Morocco or Libya. Others go further back and will trace their ancestries to people in Yemen, largely through trading and the spread of Islam. But keep in mind, there is a diversity within a unity in Tuareg culture. Most Tuareg today identify themselves on the basis of language, Tamajaq. Modern political leaders often appeal to language in an attempt to unify the Tuareg.

Susan Rasmussen

Traditionally, the Tuareg are a seminomadic people, until recently, a rural people. Starting in colonial times, and more recently under independent nation-state government policies, or as a result of drought, many have been compelled to settle down on oases. So you do have some sedentarized Tuareg as well. Also, you have itinerant trade, traditionally the caravan trade across the Sahara. Recently the camel caravans are diminishing, giving way to truck trade. But even truck trade has been interrupted by political violence in the region.

I like to think of the Sahara as an ocean with ports. Rather than being very remote, it’s been a vibrant crossroads of trading, of religious scholarship, of culture, of the arts. It is a difficult geographic access, but Tuareg groups have adapted very well to it. The nomads traditionally herded livestock, though this has been disrupted both colonial policies and postcolonial policies.

Tuareg near TImbuktu (Eyre 2003)

That's an excellent introduction. And I'm glad you raised this point about how Tuareg is really an umbrella term. But what about this term kel? Sometimes that gets translated as clans, but I'm not sure it's quite that simple.

Yes. Kel literally translates as "people of." As I said, there are several major regional confederations of Tuareg. And within these confederations, we have somewhat large descent groups—that is, groups that trace their ancestry to a common founder, often a female founding cultural hero or ancestress, predating conversion to Islam. But also, some will trace to an important Islamic scholar or holy man who came to spread Islam. It varies. But usually the kel signifies one of these subgroups. For example, one of the largest in Mali is the Kel Adagh. That's the group found to predominate generally around the Kidal and Adrar des Ifoghas region. These are "people of the mountain." The Kel Aïr tend to predominate in northern Niger, around the Aïr Mountains—including the Bagzane Masif and the town of Agadez. Aïr, I believe, etymologically is a term for caravan trade.

Within these groups, you also see the term kel used to describe various descent groups, smaller units, somewhat like clans. For example, the Kel Ifoghas are very large descent group found within the Kel Adagh federation in northern Mali. Kel can also describe the roles of these groups. Kel Essouk, also prominent in northern Mali, literally means “people of the market.” “Market” is the literal translation of souk, but it also means a crossroad, a place where people come together, ideally in peace. The Kel Essouk have traditionally interpreted the Qur’an for Ifoghas aristocrats. The Kel Essouk try to impose peace, which, of course, has met terrible challenges in recent decades with the turmoil in the Sahara and the Sahel.

The English terms don't do justice to the precise local meeting or role of these groups, but it's an approximation. Particular clan names may or may not be preceded by the term kel. For example, we have the Kel Igurmaden. Prior to disruptions caused by French colonialism and independent nation states, Mali and Niger, these clans were often coordinated in managing subsistence in Sahara desert and desert-fringe Sahelian savanna regions. This required mobility, basically free passage for caravans throughout the region. French colonial powers tried to control the caravan trade by setting up borders. And this of course interfered with delicate ecological, social, and political balances. Now some of these groups have cooperated in trade, have even intermarried. Others have competed over resources such as water, livestock, pasture. As anywhere, the picture is complex. Allegiances and alliances shift.

Interesting. But across all this diversity is the Tamajaq language universally understood?

Yes, it is. To varying degrees, depending on the dialects. It's the way perhaps some English speakers have to listen very closely when they hear, for example, an Australian English dialect, or an old British film. They have to listen carefully. It's not always easy, but yes, indeed, it is the same language despite the different dialects. Now in studies of language and culture, where a dialect ends and a new language starts is a very hazy place. It is gradual. It is not something that you can pinpoint easily. But yes, I can say that most speakers of Tamajaq can manage to understand each other with varying degrees of difficulty.

Which makes it a very logical basis on which to create a sense of unity across diversity.

Yes. The modern leaders are tending to emphasize that. For example they urge their audiences in speeches and songs and poetry: We are all under the same tent. Ehan iyen. Which means one tent. Ehan is tent, iyen is the number one.

Tuareg group dancing takamba, seated (Eyre 2016)

I want to ask about the status of women in Tuareg society. I understand that gender roles distinguish Tuareg communities from some of those around them.

Yes, indeed. One can say, while remaining wary of overgeneralization, that many Tuareg women enjoy high social prestige and economic independence. In most groups, particularly the more nomadic groups, the major source of women's wealth was in livestock. Now, because of a series of droughts and intermittent wars, livestock herds have been much reduced. Therefore some women have become less wealthy. Certain NGO agencies and other programs in northern Mali and Niger are training Tuareg women in other professions such as tailoring, oasis gardening and other alternatives. This is something new, very novel and different from the tradition in which women did not plant.

But in Tuareg society, women still enjoy a high degree of free sociability, even in public. Most women can visit and travel freely—except perhaps those who are married to more conservative Arab men or devout Muslims who interpret the Qur’an as requiring seclusion of women. And keep in mind, there is always cultural interpretation involved. Not all Muslims even agree on that. But most Tuareg women are not secluded. They can represent themselves legally. They have a right to initiate divorce. They also, as I said, inherit, own and manage their own property, which has traditionally included livestock, date palms. A few women own houses. Fewer women own houses than men, however. But central here, especially in the rural and nomadic groups is the nuptial tent. The woman in seminomadic or nomadic camps owns her tent. It is brought to her marriage as a dowry. And she can eject the husband from it upon a quarrel or upon divorce.

The situation becomes complicated in some areas of seminomadic agro-pastoralism because men are building a lot of houses that they tend to own. And you will have situations sometimes with a house and a tent in the same compound, and upon quarreling or divorce, there arises a conflict about who stays and who leaves.

In general, most Tuareg men will still tell you they respect women. Women should be treated equally. As a a few told me in French their women are "like princesses," and they have to be respected. Now of course as anywhere, as in any society, what people say and what is ideal are not followed by everybody perfectly. Wife beating is considered very shameful. In fact, ideally, a man is not to be angry with a woman. If he gets angry with a woman, she can lodge a complaint and he can be summoned, so to speak, called to the carpet by a group of men who can impose a fine on him. I have seen several cases of this happening.

One more point concerning inheritance. Almost all Tuareg adhere to Islam, and officially, there is Qur'anic inheritance, which gives two-thirds of property to the male heir and only one third to the female heir. But many Tuareg practice additional inheritance forms that compensate women for that disparity. In other words, women have special compensatory means of inheriting property, for example living milk herds in the case of livestock. These are forms of property that are bequeathed to women. There also pre-inheritance gifts. So there are alternative forms of inheritance that benefit women as well as men.

Fadimata Walet Oumar (Disco) of Tartit (Eyre 2016)

Interesting. Knowing Tuareg musicians, for example in the band Tartit, which has very powerful women at its center, I have always sensed that they have a different way about them. In Mali, women generally carry themselves with a great sense of confidence and power that you don't necessarily feel in other parts of Africa.

Yes. Sometimes in the towns, there is multiethnic influence, not to mention fear of the more militant Islamist reformist revivalists. Sometimes this does produce modifications in gender roles. But gender arrangements tend to be more flexible in Tuareg society than in some of their neighbors' communities.

We will come to the question of Islam in a moment. But first, we sometimes hear and read about "white Tuareg" and "black Tuareg." People in Mali talk about the Bella people as slaves or former slaves of the Tuareg. I'd like you to untangle this, and talk about how this relationship plays out in modern times.

Yes, of course. There has been a great deal of misunderstanding in much, though not all, of the popular media, about the hierarchical nature of Tuareg society. It is traditionally a ranked, hierarchical, stratified society. That is, you have a cluster of occupational groups whose occupational specialties were traditionally inherited based on descent. But let's bracket that and talk about the Bella, or Buzu as they're called in Niger. First of all, there is a great deal of distortion in some popular media that's highly unfortunate, and in my opinion and that of many other scholars on Tuareg society, dangerous. Popular media sometimes imposes Western pseudo-racial concepts, Western folk beliefs concerning so-called race, on the Tuareg. In fact, one finds quite a variety of physical appearances, including complexion tones, among the different social categories. For example, among persons of aristocratic social backgrounds in the precolonial system, one finds persons an American might think of as black. Conversely, among some more subordinate persons, one might find a different appearance that might be lighter. So we have to avoid projecting our own European and American folk beliefs about so-called race onto other societies.

In Mali and Niger, slaves first began to be freed around the turn of the 20th century, and were completely freed legally around midcentury, at the time of independence. Now as anywhere, sometimes there is a lag between public legal policies and actual social or economic practices. Witness the way in the United States, some racism is unfortunately still with us despite the civil rights movement and the liberation of slaves in our own country.

Tuareg at 2003 Festival in the Desert (Eyre 2003)

Today, the situation of the Bella—former servile people in Tuareg society—is highly variable. In towns, some Bella are well represented in some of the jobs in the new infrastructures. And there is a reason for this. Initially, when the French introduced nomadic boarding schools—and later some independent nation-state governments continued this—they established certain quotas for school registration. And at first, aristocratic Tuareg and Tuareg in pre-colonial traditional leadership positions tended to shun the schools because they viewed them as a threat to their culture. They suspected that the schools were magnets for controlling the nomads by taking censuses, levying taxes… So they often sent the children of their subordinates to school instead. As a result, many persons of more servile social backgrounds became more exposed to secular modern education.

In the countryside, again, there is variation for the Bella in Mali and the Buzu in Niger. By the way the Tamajaq term was iklan, "those who are owned." They are no longer owned. Today, they must be paid for their work. Now some of them in the countryside do tend to still do more menial jobs, but they are paid for them. I personally am unaware of any enforced labor without pay in the communities where I have worked, in either rural or urban communities. Also, one should note that it was not only the Tuareg who took slaves, and not all Tuareg had slaves Sometimes popular literature and press give that impression, but it's simply not true. Some Hausa in Niger had slaves, as did some Songhai and some Bambara. These were societies were stratified, ranked societies, and there was a mutual dependence between the different social categories.

In the past, there was very little intermarriage between the social categories, but this has changed completely, particularly in the towns. One reason is that many Tuareg men have become impoverished. Some families try to marry their daughters to more prosperous suitors to escape poverty. Some of the more prosperous suitors come from either a different social background, or even a different regional or ethnic background. I have encountered many multilinguistic families, particularly in the towns.

Tumast culture center in Bamako (Eyre 2016)

One quick clarification on the Bella. The Bella are also Tuareg, aren't they? They also speak Tamajaq?

Yes. They speak Tamajaq. They dress much like Tuareg these days. You will read in some of the historical and ethnographic literature about what we call sumptuary laws, laws similar to those existing in medieval Europe about who could wear what kind of dress. For example, only nobles, the aristocrats, were permitted to wear silver jewelry or carry long saber swords. They monopolized weapons and livestock. But that is long past. When you read about Tuareg stratification, you have to be very careful; you have to think about when it was written. A hundred years ago, there was very little intermarriage, and Bella didn't wear silver.

There are remnants of the past relationships. On an oasis about thirty years ago, for example a group of descendants of slaves might come in and help with mat and ten repair. But in exchange, they are now paid or given various things. It is not forced labor, or defined as slavery. It's a kind of trade. It's almost like a sewing bee or a barn-raising party in the United States.

So the past echoes in some patterns of the present.

Yes. But keep in mind, that these Sahelian and Saharan societies were traditionally ranked and occupationally specialized. There were the smith artisans. In some societies there were griots, musicians. There were Qur'anic scholars. It was a very complex society, and all of these groups were ultimately dependent upon each other.

Tuareg woman at the Festival in the Desert (Eyre 2003)

Let's turn to the question of Islam and conversion. When it happened, how it happened, and how it was particularly problematic for the glory given the nature of their culture.

That’s an interesting question. It's vast. In order to address it, it's good to refer back first to the larger Berber or Amazight groups who originated in North Africa, and the arrival of the Arabs. Most of these original peoples, including the Tuareg, resisted Islam initially. They converted at various times between the eighth and the 12th centuries of our current era (CE). Amazight people tended to cluster in the mountainous masses found throughout the Sahara—the Moroccan Atlas Mountains, the Ahagar or Hogar Mountains in Algeria, Adagh-n-Ifoghas as in Mali, the Aïr massif in Niger. They were difficult to access, not isolated, but difficult to remote and elevated for defense in times of armed conflicts.. So initially many resisted, in part because their social institutions were very different from Arab institutions.

We have to distinguish between what is Islamic and Koranic and what is culturally Arabic, and that is a complicated question. Arabic cultural patrilineal institutions, that is, inheritance and descent legally calculated through males on the father's side, were imported. Now Islam, like other religions, is also subject to interpretation, and different Muslims have interpreted this and other injunctions differently. So we have to think in terms of Arabic cultural and legal influence along with the importation of Islam into continental Africa. In addition, French colonial legal institutions tended to import patriliny into their colonized areas.

Now, patriliny–that is, calculating one's descent and passing property through men—definitely was in some ways incompatible with the local Tuareg system of matrilineal ancestors. Matriliny involves tracing your descent to a female ancestral culture hero, and passing property through women, on the mother’s side. Men are included in matrilineal systems, as women are included in patrilineal systems. I don't want to get too jargony here. But the Tuareg and some other Amazigh people initially experienced a lot of conflict with this. Matriliny isn't matriarchy. It doesn't mean that women rule. In Tuareg society, men have tended to be the official leaders, the chiefs, the heads of the confederations, and so on. But matriliny gives women a prominent place in mythical history, and provides forms of inheritance more favorable to women. So there was a clash over culture, not just religion.

To make a long story short, Tuareg were unevenly converted, and over a number of centuries. Some groups of Tuareg are more devoutly Islamic than others. For example, in my own work, I did quite a bit of research on medical ritual healing, using herbal medicine—predominantly women's work. One finds not solely conflict, but also a very compatible and flexible combination of Islamic and pre-Islamic, or popular Islamic beliefs and practices. In fact, many Tuareg herbal medicine women insisted to me that Islamic scholars and herbal medicine women are like husband and wife. They are complementary. They respect each other. Islamic scholars sometimes cure patients with verses from the Qur'an. There are certain kinds of illnesses that are amenable to that, usually nonorganic, or what we might call mental illnesses. Well, sometimes these Qur'anic verses may not cure a patient. So in that case they refer the patient to the herbal medicine women, who tend to cure with plants, roots, leaves, barks. Some do more complicated divination in dreams—a sort of psycho-social counseling.

They may also refer a patient to a practitioner who uses drummers and musicians in a spirit possession exorcism ceremony. In this case, people are defined as being invaded by alien spirits, and music is a kind of a group therapy with songs and drumming and general support from a small, usually rather intimate audience of friends, neighbors and relatives. This is considered non-Islamic, and many Islamic scholars will faintly disapprove of it. Often they don't attend. But they don't usually forbid it, except in the case of the more recent militant Islamic reformist revivalists. But keep in mind, most Tuareg are very cool towards these new reformist Islamist movements, certainly the more militant ones. Because not all the reformist Islamist movements are violent. Some of them are, but others aren't.

O.K., let's bring this up to the present. With all this as background, give us a clear view of what happened in Mali in 2012.

I will try to be concise. It's complicated. One reason those more militant groups were able to come into those northern regions was the withdrawal of services. Starting in the late 1980s, restructuring by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund compelled African governments to privatize and withdraw certain services. This impoverished many people, and consequently, some of the Islamist piety organizations, not all of whom are violent–I want to emphasize that–moved in to fill that gap building clinics and schools in northern Mali and Niger.

That's crucial. But when the actual 2012 rebellion came, the original idea was to declare a separate political territory in the north, Azawad.

Well, I'm not really into the politics that much. But I think at that time, the African Union never recognized Azawad. Prior to 2012, the goal had been semi-autonomy. For example, the Kidal region was declared the eighth region of Mali. It was no longer to be under military rule as it previously had been. There had been atrocities committed in the Kidal region going back to 1963, the time of the first nomadic uprising in Mali. It was disputed how the food was being distributed. It was argued, for example, that the nomads had been required to come in and settle down in order to receive food. The point is, there had been tensions.

Most Tuareg leaders have not necessarily favored complete independence, just some level of cultural autonomy, more resources built in the north, schools, clinics and hospitals, more Tuareg admitted into the national army. Also more Tuareg in jobs in the modern infrastructures of the towns. There were certain promises made to returning exiles who had emigrated away from those countries, who came home and they found themselves unemployed. I'm sure you've read that this situation has to do with the early origins of that popular guitar music, ishumar.

Tinariwen, Brooklyn, (Eyre 2012)

Right. The name actually comes from the French word chomeur, "unemployed."

Anyway, the so-called rebels who established independent Azawad did not find support, even though they called on all Azawadis to come home. They didn't use the term Tuareg; they used Azawadi. So this wasn't some kind of racist apartheid state. They wanted all Azawadis to come home. They promised to practice a democratic system. They called on all other armed groups to leave the area. Of course they didn't obey, as we know. And Islamist militant groups were able to easily move in to that kind of power vacuum. The militants came in at first professing to help the Tuareg separatists, but later they took over.

When you say they call themselves Azawadis, did that include the Songhai, the Bozo, the Dogon, the Fulani?

Yes. I mean, many of them did not intend it to be strictly one ethnic group. As I say, I am not an expert on the political situation. But I know that initially there were Tuareg leaders who wanted a degree of cultural autonomy, also more representation in the jobs in the state structures, and more resources in the north. So the declaration of Azawad was connected with hopes to develop the region. But I can't really speak for Tuareg political viewpoints. You need more context on the ground from local viewpoints, and I tend to shun partisan politics when I do my research as much as possible.

Understandably. I think the politics of this situation really turned around on Tuareg musicians too. Some ishumar bands had been singing for rebellion, but once the jihadists took the upper hand, they actually tried to ban music altogether.

Ishumar guitar music originated in the Tuareg rebels during the '80s and '90s, with the exiles and migrants. Originally it was protest music. But I've collected much of this myself in the field, because one of my interest is in verbal art performances. And many of the verses of songs later advocated peace. So they evolve somewhat. At first they were political protest music, and then later, they promoted peace and reconciliation.

Well that's something we will look into. But I have a question about the music of the ishumar guitar bands. Is it a continuation of pre-existing traditional music? Or is it something entirely new?

I'm glad you asked this question. First of all, music, songs and poetry are of absolute central importance in Tuareg communities. That's long-standing. Now traditionally, specific musical instruments and genres tended to be associated with the different social categories, you know, in the old ranked system. But that's no longer true. In fact one goal of the original composers and performers of ishumar guitar music was to get around this. One reason the guitar appealed to them was because it was an instrument anybody could play. It was from outside Tuareg society, and they used it as a symbol of equality in order to draw the diverse people in Tuareg communities together. In other words, the guitar was not associated in their viewpoint with the old, precolonial differences in status.

Ahmed Ag Kaedi of Amanar (Eyre 2016)

That certainly makes sense.

This music is extremely central now. Many of the performers are trying to use music and performance as a way of healing themselves from their experiences during the recent political violence and ecological disasters, such as the drought, but also to bring other people together. Whether it's a religious ceremony, or a musical festival, the idea is inclusive. Artists are supposed to bring people together.

Now anybody in Tuareg society can become respected and renowned through composition, performing, music, or singing, or poetry—regardless of their social background. Even in precolonial Tuareg society, a person of subordinate status could be respected if they were a talented poet, for example. So it's logical that music would become a way of channeling efforts to reconcile people and bring people together.

There's another important point about much of the poetry and singing. In traditional Tuareg culture, this quality of reserve, takarakit, is widely valued. Many sentiments, such as love and anger, are not supposed to be directly expressed. In other words, rather than telling these things directly in conversations, you're supposed to convey them indirectly. One way of doing this is through music, song and poetry, so that's another important role of performance. For example, in my own research on spirit possession, and songs that they sing at this musical group therapy rite, often the verses will refer to a secret love, but they won't mention this directly, or name the people involved. Instead, they might praise somebody's camel. Or, if you dislike somebody but you are not allowed to be aggressive towards him directly, you might name your dog after them.

That's interesting. So this word is takarakit, and it translates as “reserve.”

Approximately. Reserve, respect. It's practiced more between some people than others. For example, a newly married bridegroom, or even a longer-married husband, is supposed to practice reserve towards his parents-in-law a lot. But nevertheless, in general, there is a tendency, and I call it a tendency because not everybody observes it, it's supposed to be a polite way of behaving. And as anywhere, as with anything like that, not everybody practices it, but it's the idea.

Ishumar CD

I remember struggling to get translations of song lyrics when I first met Tinariwen back in 2002. Maybe that's part of the reason.

Well, there are layers of meaning. Another important concept you might find interesting is tangalt. That's the Niger Tamajaq term. But this aesthetic concept is important in Mali too. This approximately translates as "symbol." Metaphor, shadowy speech. There's a great deal of value placed upon that, particularly in the poetry and song lyrics.

I'd like to ask you one question about griots in Tuareg culture. I am familiar with Mande griots. I lived with a family and studied guitar with a great griot guitarist. Are Tuareg griots similar?

It depends on where you are. In the groups I work with, griots tend to be from other ethnic groups. The Tuareg often use the services of a griot, but in the places where I worked, they really didn't have their own griots. There are many griots throughout the entire Sahel—Mauritania, Mali, Niger, Senegal. But in the Tuareg communities where I worked, they tend to use the services of griots from a neighboring group, not necessarily related to the Tuareg families. They don't marry into them; they tend to marry among themselves. Now in some other Tuareg groups, for example in the rural Aïr Mountains, I found that smith artisans actually perform like griots. They will sing praise songs of aristocratic families at weddings and other rites of passage, such as babies' name-days. Another researcher confirmed it. Dominic Casajus, a French researcher who also worked in the Aïr Mountains.

Still, the performance of some types of verbal art, such as praise-songs, are generally associated with inherited social categories such as griots and smith artisans. That's very widespread in all Tuareg communities. But the precise relationship of the griots to the Tuareg, I confess to you, I am not certain about in all groups. The ones I know best tend to use the service of griots from the neighbors.

Tuareg griots playing tehardent lutes (Eyre 2003)

Interesting. And when you say neighbors, do you mean other Tuareg?

Not necessarily. It might be a Songhai griot or an itinerant Bambara griot. When I was in Kidal, Mali, I conducted this study of acting in plays in urban Tuareg society there. I just finished the book manuscript. It hasn't been published yet. The actors kept telling me very emphatically that they were not griots. But there is some overlap with the specialty of griots.

We will leave that to further investigation. Maybe they feel that mediators such as griots who come from outside would be more objective in their verbal art.

Right. It's a similar position to the Tuareg smith artisans. You are a go-between. You don't usually marry in to that group, and therefore you can mediate between them. You don't have a stake in the game personally.

This is great, Susan. Thanks so much for all this.

Niger River sunset (Eyre 2003)

Related Links

Did the Garamantes ever raid the lands of the Sao?

Why do people think West Africans built no cities prior to colonization even though there are countless ruins that prove otherwise?

Was the Muslim quarter of Koumbi Saleh built by North Africans/Arabs? Or was it predominately black Muslim converts?

What is a regional and district center in archaeology?

Did rectilinear style houses spread from Jenne-Jeno to other Mandinka towns?

When Leo Africanus described timbuktu as a city of thatched huts was he refering to the Tuareg dwellings found today, or did the general population of Timbuktu live in small thatched huts?

Why does Al Umari's account of Niani (Capital of the Mali Empire) say that the houses were typical mudhuts even though the archeology shows the houses were made of stone? Is it possible he was confusing granaries for homes?

Were domes and minarets common in the Mali empire like it was in the rest of Islamic Africa? I ask because when looking at the present day architecture in Timbuktu and Djenne I noticed that the signature domes found in Hausa architecture are absent with the exception of Djinguereber mosque.

What was life like for a commoner in Medieval Mali?
How do I prove that the Garamantes were black?

Why has Eurasia-centrism taken over discussions of Ancient Egypt and why have Afrocentrists stopped fighting it?

A common criticism I see regarding the Great Zimbabwe ruins is that it was not a city, but a glorified village of mud huts and stone enclosures, how do I prove that it was indeed a city?

A common criticism I hear about the ruins of Great Zimbabwe is that it was not a city, but nothing more than a glorified village of mud huts with stone enclosures. How do I prove them wrong?

Was Niger a French colony?

Jason Almendra · Follow Most Viewed Writer Colonization 16 Apr 2019 not to be confused with neighboring Nigeria Sat

Yes, Niger was a French colony. It's pronounced knee-zhay. Nigeria was a British colony. A Haitian coworker told me that fluent French speakers wear nice suits. But their wallets are empty. I kid you not.

Related Links

What are the major differences between being a British colony and a French colony?

Why do former French colonies tend to be extremely unsuccessful? Is there a correlation between being a French colony and not being successful?

How did French colonialism differ from British colonialism?
Why was there a French colony in Turkey?

What was the assertion that, unlike the British West African colonies, development of nationalism in the French colonies unduly delayed?

Is France taking colonial tax from her old colonial states? (Like Algeria, Tunisia or other African states)

Generally…are French Colonies poorer than British colonies? Why?
Why did the French government have such trouble with its colonial holdings?
What was the life of Vietnamese under French rule?

Is it true that 14 African countries are still forced to pay colonial taxes to France?
How is French colonialism taught in France?
Which French colony was the most important?
Why are British colonies more successful economically than French/Spanish colonies?
Why don't African French colonies revolt and abandon the "colonial pact"?
Why are former British colonies doing so well compared to Spanish/Portuguese/French colonies (there are exceptions, but the general trend is obvious)?

Are Niger and Nigeria related in any way? Why or why not?

Boris Guiffot I might be called Cameroonian but I'm from Wakanda 2y

Besides the obvious similarity between their names, the two countries are crossed by a major river : The Niger River. The importance of the river for both countries explain why they were named after it. Most Northern Nigerians and Nigeriens share similar traditions and the muslim religion. They are from the Hau sa-Fulani ethnic group and speak Hausa, one of the most spoken languages in Africa.

Total population
70 million[year needed]
Regions with significant populations
Nigeria	55,622,000[2]
Niger	10,486,000[citation needed]
Benin	1,028,000[citation needed]
Ivory Coast	1,035,000[citation needed]
Cameroon	386,000[citation needed]
Ghana	281,000[citation needed]
Chad	287,000[citation needed]
Sudan	500,000[3]
Togo	21,000[citation needed]
Gabon	12,000[citation needed]
Algeria	11,000[citation needed]
Congo	12,000[citation needed]
Burkina Faso	2,900[citation needed]
Eritrea	30,000[4]

The main difference is that Niger used to be a French colony while Nigeria was a British protectorate. Despite that, Hausa is usually the common first language in the area. If a Northern Nigerian and a Nigerien meet, they would usually speak Hausa.

AfriStar

Rapports s3xuels avec les chiens : la police nigériane prend d'importantes décisions

Publication par David-GDK jeu.

La police nigériane s'est engagée jeudi à débusquer les propriétaires de chiens qui paient des femmes pour avoir des relations s3xuelles avec leurs animaux de compagnie.

Le responsable des relations publiques de la police, Muyiwa Adejobi, l'a fait savoir dans une déclaration aux journalistes jeudi matin.
Selon lui, les propriétaires de chiens seront punis et poursuivis en justice dès leur arrestation.

Il a également déclaré que les femmes qui ont déjà eu des rapports s3xuels avec des chiens seront arrêtées.

De plus, les hommes se livrant à des actes bestiaux ne seront pas épargnés non plus et la publication des vidéos d'un tel acte abominable ne sera pas tolérée.

Selon les avocats, la loi sur le Code pénal et la loi sur le Code criminel criminalisent le fait de coucher avec un animal et cet acte est passible d'une peine d'emprisonnement pouvant aller jusqu'à 14 ans au Nigeria.

Quelle tradition d'une autre culture trouvez-vous incompréhensible ?

Auguste Lesage Humaniste et chercheur indépendant 17 mai

En visite au nord du Niger les années 90 pour une mission technique, nous avions eu le plaisir et le privilège de connaître quelques tribus touareg (l'homme bleu) où l'hospitalité pour eux est une deuxième nature , là-bas contrairement au autres régions du monde musulman ce sont plutôt les hommes qui mettent le foulard et pas les femmes qui sont en général plus coquines et décontractées .

L'autre tradition qui a attiré mon attention est la cérémonie du thé, le thé circule dans le sang du tergui, on le consomme pratiquement du matin au soir, et pour le hôtes on leurs sert selon une tradition codifiée où l'invité est obligé de prendre trois tasses de thé au risque de le prendre comme manques de respect .

Questions similaires

Qu'est-ce qui est parfaitement acceptable dans votre culture, mais choquant dans d'autres cultures ?

Si chaque humain est un descendant de Noé, pourquoi toutes les cultures n'ont-elles pas l'histoire de l'arche de Noé ?

Quelles choses trouvez-vous dégoûtantes dans certaines cultures ?
Qu'en est-il de votre culture que vous considérez comme allant de soi ?

Si vous deviez épouser une personne d'une autre culture et d'un autre pays, quel serait votre choix de coeur ?

Quels sont quelques exemples de traditions culturelles très brutales ?
Quelles sont les choses qui sont uniques à votre culture ?
Quelle est l'importance de la culture pour vous ?
Quelles sont les choses que vous n'aimez pas chez votre culture ?
Est-ce que vous célébrez des traditions ou fêtes originales ?

Retrait du Mali: dans un entretien le président du Niger acte la fin du G5 Sahel

David-GDK Connaissances : Anglais18 mai

« Le G5 Sahel est mort » : déclaration sans ambiguïté de Mohamed Bazoum. Dans un entretien exclusif accordé au quotidien français*La Croix*, le président du Niger, donne sa vision des nouvelles autorités du Mali et du départ des forces militaires françaises du pays.

« *L'isolement de Bamako en Afrique de l'Ouest est une mauvaise chose pour toute la sous-région… Le G5 Sahel est mort », attaque Mohamed Bazoum qui développe : « Si ce pays était dans une situation normale, nous serions en mesure de développer notre coopération en relation avec Barkhane. »

Pour le chef de l'État, les forces maliennes ne remplissent pas leur mission dans la zone des trois frontières. « Notre frontière avec le Mali est sous la coupe de l'État islamique au Grand Sahara. Bamako n'a pas investi les postes avancés dans cette zone. »

Dans ce long entretien au journal français, Mohamed Bazoum interpelle également directement le président français Emmanuel Macron : « Qu'attendez-vous de lui interroge le journaliste ? » : « Une présence de Barkhane plus conséquente et plus d'équipements pour nos armées. »

Pour le président du Niger, les Occidentaux doivent changer leurs règles d'engagement : « Les Occidentaux en opération prennent trop de précautions. Ils doivent consentir à un peu plus de sacrifices et ne pas être hantés par les pertes. »

Mohamed Bazoum s'exprime enfin sur le sentiment antifrançais, pour lui instrumentalisé par « des officines mobilisées derrière ce courant ». Loin d'exprimer pour le chef de l'État une réalité : « Sur le terrain, les populations n'ont pas ce problème. Elles ne demandent qu'une chose : que la présence des Occidentaux contribue à lutter efficacement contre les terroristes. »

Qui parmi vos anciens camarades de classe vous a le plus surpris plus tard dans la vie et pourquoi ?

Auguste Lesage · Suivre Humaniste et chercheur independent 25 mai

C'était un ancien camarade et ami proche d'origine nigérienne que j'ai fréquenté à l'Université dernièrement j'ai découvert qu'il est devenu ministre au Niger, par obligation de réserve je vais pas dire qu'il était comme moi nul sur tous les plans.

Questions similaires

Quel genre de personne souffrira le plus dans la vie ?
Qu'est-ce qu'un de vos élèves/étudiants vous a dit qui vous a surpris ?
Quel a été le camarade de classe le plus bizarre que vous ayez eu ?
Que sont devenus les meilleurs et derniers de votre classe au lycée ?
Que sont devenus vos «premiers de la classe» ?

Avez-vous déjà été agréablement surpris que l'on se souvienne de vous, malgré les années qui passent ?

Qu'est-ce que les meilleurs élèves pensent vraiment de leurs camarades de classe?

Qu'est devenu l'élève qui était premier de votre classe ?
Qu'est-ce qui vous a agréablement surpris quand quelqu'un s'est déshabillé ?
Un prof a-t-il déjà fait quelque chose en classe qui vous a choqué ?

AfriStar
Retrait du Mali: dans un entretien le président du Niger acte la fin du G5 Sahel

« Le G5 Sahel est mort » : déclaration sans ambiguïté de Mohamed Bazoum. Dans un entretien exclusif accordé au quotidien français*La Croix*, le président du Niger, donne sa vision des nouvelles autorités du Mali et du départ des forces militaires françaises du pays.

« *L'isolement de Bamako en Afrique de l'Ouest est une mauvaise chose pour toute la sous-région… Le G5 Sahel est mort », attaque Mohamed Bazoum qui développe : « Si ce pays était dans une situation normale, nous serions en mesure de développer notre coopération en relation avec Barkhane. »

Pour le chef de l'État, les forces maliennes ne remplissent pas leur mission dans la zone des trois frontières. « Notre frontière avec le Mali est sous la coupe de l'État islamique au Grand Sahara. Bamako n'a pas investi les postes avancés dans cette zone. »

Dans ce long entretien au journal français, Mohamed Bazoum interpelle également directement le président français Emmanuel Macron : « Qu'attendez-vous de lui interroge le journaliste ? » : « Une présence de Barkhane plus conséquente et plus d'équipements pour nos armées. »

Pour le président du Niger, les Occidentaux doivent changer leurs règles d'engagement : « Les Occidentaux en opération prennent trop de précautions. Ils doivent consentir à un peu plus de sacrifices et ne pas être hantés par les pertes. »

Mohamed Bazoum s'exprime enfin sur le sentiment antifrançais, pour lui instrumentalisé par « des officines mobilisées derrière ce courant ». Loin d'exprimer pour le chef de l'État une réalité : « Sur le terrain, les populations n'ont pas ce problème. Elles ne demandent qu'une chose : que la présence des Occidentaux contribue à lutter efficacement contre les terroristes. »

What should you know before going to Niger, are there things not to do?

Mathieu Dutour Sikiric Worked at Ecole Normale Supérieure 19 Oct.

It is one of the poorest countries in the world. You have to be careful with everything in these countries.

For Americans the recommendation is not to go because of crime, terrorism and kidnappings. I see no reason why this would not also apply to the French.

For things not to do, you can consult the penal code in force in Niger:

http://www.justice.gouv.ne/images/lois/pdfs/Code_penal_et_CPP_Edition_Janvier_2018.pdf

Olivier Nix

International Business Development Oct. 20

Q: What do you need to know before going to Niger, are there things not to do?

Of course: the thing not to do: go to Niger

Clearly, not a good idea at the moment!

France Diplomatie

Contexte sécuritaire - Risque d'enlèvement

Appel à la vigilance maximale – risque d'attentat

https://www.diplomatie.gouv.fr/fr/conseils-aux-voyageurs/conseils-par-pays-destination/niger/

Conseils aux voyageurs pour le Niger

Évitez tout voyage (avec avertissements régionaux)

Advice and warnings for Niger(Canada)

ROYAUME DE BELGIQUE
Service public fédéral
Affaires étrangères,
Commerce extérieur et Coopération au Développement

General security in Niger (Belgium)

https://www.cia.gov/the-world-factbook/countries/niger/

Faisal Laib Retired Math Professor Fri.

The outward journey is insured but not the return. Al-Qaida in the north, Boko Haram in the south:

Similar questions

What are some things not to do in Canada?

Are there any mistakes to be made?

What's fun to do in Paris with kids?

I am French and I am going to Cameroon. I have no culture in Africa. What should I do/not do? What do I absolutely have to see in this country?

What are the do's and don'ts during a job interview?

What should I know before going to Delaware (USA)?

Discuss Naija: The Nigeries & Nigerians

Posted by Daniel Dinari Nov 14

I think Niger is a really fascinating country, to begin with. Nigeria and Nigerians alike, seem to be like a round peg in a round hole, I'll say the country and it's people fit into each other. The citizenry of Nigeria, is one of her blessings. There's no other country on earth that can endure what Nigerians have endured, No people on earth can swallow what Nigerians take for granted, irrespective of the mismanagement and corruption, the people still find a way to smile and do the right thing even in the midst of all the trouble and hardships. My perspective, or point of view , is on the rough roads Nigerians have been made to travel all these years, and yet they still have that resilient spirit to try one more time, every four years. Whenever I see how far we've come as a people, and as a nation, I can not help but salute the courage of HOPE, FAITH, EXPECTATIONS and DREAMS, that every Nigerian has. According to our general slogan and believe; One day e go better!

COUNTRY FACT FILE

Location

In the Interior of North Africa.

Official title of the state

The Republic of Niger: is an inland state in Western Africa, named after the Niger River.

Republique du Niger (French)

Flag description:

Three equal horizontal bands of orange (top), white, and green with a small orange disk centered in the white band; the orange band denotes the drier northern regions of the Sahara; white stands for purity and innocence; green symbolizes hope and the fertile and productive southern and western areas, as well as the Niger River; the orange disc represents the sun and the sacrifices made by the people. Note: similar to the flag of India, which has a blue spoked wheel centered in the white band.

Neighbours

Libya, Algeria on N., Mali, Burkinafaso on W., Benin, Nigeria on S., Chad on E. Land boundaries; total 5,697 km. Border countries; Algeria 956 km, Benin 266 km, Burkinafaso 628 km, Chad 1,175 km, Libya 354 km, Mali 821 km, Nigeria 1,497 km.

Founder of The Nation
Hamani Diori, its first President introduced a one-party state which survived until Niger experienced its first military coup in 1974. The military regime, stood under Colonel Seyni Kountche till his death.

Local divisions
8 regions, includes, 1 capital district, Niamey

Government type

Republic - semi-presidential

Legislation chamber
Unicameral - National Assembly.

Political History:

Niger became independent from France in 1960 and experienced single-party and military rule until 1991, when Gen. Ali Saibou was forced by public pressure to allow multiparty elections, which resulted in a democratic government in 1993. Political infighting brought the government to a standstill and in 1996 led to a coup by Col. Ibrahim Mainasara Bare. In 1999 Bare was killed in a coup by military officers who promptly restored democratic rule and held elections that brought Mamadou Tandja to power in December of that year. Tandja was reelected in 2004. Niger is one of the poorest countries in the world with minimal government. Services and insufficient funds to develop its resource base. The largely agrarian and subsistence-based economy is frequently disrupted by extended droughts common to the Sahel region of Africa. A predominately Tuareg ethnic group emerged in February 2007, the Nigerien Movement for Justice (MNJ), and attacked several military targets in Niger's northern region throughout 2007 and 2008. Events have since evolved into a fledging insurgency.

Form of State

Republic

President is the Chief of StateHead of Government is the Prime Minister. Head of Government is the Prime Minister.President elected by popular vote for a five-year term (eligible for a second term).A multi-party republic with one legislative house. The National Assembly 113 seats, members are elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms.

Executive branch

President, Prime Minister, Cabinet (appointed by the President). Separated by chief of State and head of Government. President elected by popular vote to serve for five-year terms without presidential term limits. Head of Government is to be appointed by the president.

Former rulers

1960 – 1974 Hamani Diori (Head of state and government)

1974 - 1987 Lt. Colonel Seyni Kountché (Military head of State)

1987 - 1993 General Ali Saïbou (Military head of State)

1993 – 1996 Mahamane Ousmane, first democratically elected president. 1996

- 1999 Colonel Ibrahim Mainassara Baré (Military head of State) April 11,

1999 - December 22, 1999 Daouda Malam Wanké December 22, 1999 –

February 18, 2010 Mamadou Tandja

In February, 2010 Mr. Mahamadou Issoufou assumed the presidency in Niger followed the April 7, 2011 presidential election after winning second round of balloting in March, 2011.

Judicial chamber

State Court

Capital city Niamey Altitude 216 mtrs/708 ft.

Geographic coordinates 13.31N , 2.07E.
Lying on the Niger River, founded as a village in the mid-18th century. It became the national capital of Niger in 1926.

Names of main towns

Zinder, Maladi, Tahoua, Agadez

Date of Independence

3 August, 1960.

Religions (Major)

Muslim 80%, other (includes indigenous beliefs and Christian) 20%

Main spoken language

French (official), Hausa,Tuareg, Djerma, Fulani, Arabic, Kanoui, Tamasheq.

Currency unit

African Franc (CFA) =100 Centimes.

Area in Km2

1,267,000,00

Country area comparison in Africa

6 out of 55 states.

Demographic terms ;-

Average annual population growth rate 3.66 %

Birth rate 51.08 births per 1,000 population.

Death rate 14.47 deaths per 1,000 population

Average life expectancy ; 52.99 years

Male 51.75 years ; Female 54.26 years ;

Note: The country also has one of the highest fertility rates in the world, at 7.9 children.

Illiteracy rate (%)

Male: 72, Female: 88

Average per capita income

USD 700

Population density

12.1/km2
Urban population (%)

16

Contributor groups (%)

Farming, Fishing: 39, Industry: 17, Social service:44

Main Export Items

Vegetables, hides & skins, cotton, animal-products, uranium, live-animals.

Economy is based on

Agriculture and Uranium mineral.

Climate

Tropical; In extreme south; Desert mostly hot, dry and dusty; Rainy season May to September.

Extreme;-

Lowest point; Niger River 200 mtrs.

Highest point; Mt. Bagzane 2,022 mtrs.

Weather of the Capital city (Niamey) average annual temperature 29.10c.

Altitude 216 mtrs/708 ft

Hottest Month May 27-41oc.

Coldest Month January 14

Driest Month December 0 mm average Rf.

Wettest Month 188 mm average Rf.

Measures

Metric system & traditional measures.

Time zone

1 hour ahead of GMT/UTC

Public holidays

3 August, 18 December, All Muslim holidays.

Ethnic groups

Haoussa 55.3%, Djerma Sonrai 21%, Tuareg 9.3%, Peuhl 8.5%, Kanouri Manga 4.7%, others 1.2%.

Topographic & Environmental concern

Mostly arid desert and mountains a narrow savanna in the S and the Niger river basin in the SW, contain most of the population. Niger, one of the world's poorest countries, has been especially hard hit by the collapse of the uranium market and is dependent on subsistence farming as the backbone of its economy. Its high population growth rate also puts pressure of the few remaining forest lands. Consequently, between 1990 and 2005, the country lost 679,000 hectares or 34.9 per cent of its forest cover. In Niger, formerly forested lands are being stalked by soil loss and desertification. The Sahara desert, which already covers two-thirds of the country, is expanding at a rate of 200,000 hectares annually. In an effort to slow the Sahara’s progress, the government planted more than 60 million trees between 1985 and 1999.

Environment: overgrazing; soil erosion; deforestation; desertification; wildlife populations (such as elephant, hippopotamus, giraffe, and lion) threatened because of poaching and habitat destruction.

Economy Overview

Niger is one of the poorest countries in the world, ranking near last on the United Nations Development Fund index of human development. It is a landlocked, Sub-Saharan nation, whose economy centers on subsistence crops, livestock, and some of the world's largest uranium deposits. Drought cycles, desertification, and strong population growth have undercut the economy. Niger shares a common currency, the CFA franc, and a common central bank, the Central Bank of West African States (BCEAO), with seven other members of the West African Monetary Union. In December 2000, Niger qualified for enhanced debt relief under the International Monetary Fund program for Highly Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC) and concluded an agreement with the Fund on a Poverty Reduction and Growth Facility (PRGF). Debt relief provided under the enhanced HIPC initiative significantly reduces Niger's annual debt service obligations, freeing funds for expenditures on basic health care, primary education, HIV/AIDS prevention, rural infrastructure, and other programs geared at poverty reduction. In December 2005, Niger received 100% multilateral debt relief from the IMF, which translates into the forgiveness of approximately US $86 million in debts to the IMF, excluding the remaining assistance under HIPC. Nearly half of the government's budget is derived from foreign donor resources. Future growth may be sustained by exploitation of oil, gold, coal, and other mineral resources. Uranium prices have increased sharply in the last few years. A drought and locust infestation in 2005 led to food shortages for as many as 2.5 million Nigeriens.

Industry

Uranium mining, cement, bricking, consumer goods, textiles, food processing, chemicals, Animal slaughter-houses.

Chief crops

Peanuts, cotton, cowpeas, millet, sorghum, cassava, rice : cattle, sheep, goats, camels, donkeys, horses, poultry.

Natural resources

Uranium (world producer), Coal, Iron ore, Tin, phosphates, Gold, Gypum, Salt, Salt, Molybdenum, Crude-oil reserve.

Land in use (%)

Arable land: 10

Grassland: 7

Forest woods: 1

Other: 82

Marine:

Coastline; None

Commercial Sea port:-

An inland state, significant exports pass through the port of Cotonou (Benin).

Development prospect;-

New oil and uranium production means more revenue for the government. Niamey's 2012 budget, pushed higher by greater spending on the military, rose 57% over 2011 to 1.4 trn CFA francs ($2.9bn). Revenues of 873bn CFA are due from mining and petrol royalties and taxes, as exports are set to triple over the next four years.

The refinery owned by the China National Petroleum Corporation (CNPC) and the government is due to come online in early 2012, ending the country's need to import refined fuel. With a capacity of 200,000 barrels per day (bpd) it will easily meet the country's 7,000 bpd demand. CNPC started production on the 650m barrel Agadem field in September and will export surplus production through the Chad-Cameroon pipeline. Uranium is the main source of foreign exchange and the country is set to become the world's second-largest supplier when Areva's mine at Imouraren begins production of 5,000tn per year in 2014. In April, the government signed a $99m deal with the China Export-Import Bank to finance China's National Nuclear Corporation's Azelik mine. In January, the ruling junta awarded two uranium licences at Toulouk to Russia's Gazprombank GTB NGS. President Issoufou has indicated that the government could seek to get more revenue from the mining industry.

Telecom services growth was slowed after the government cancelled the sale of a majority interest in state-owned Sonitel to Libya's LAP Green in June. Sonitel started the search for a new bidder in August. The government is also selling off two licences to operate new third generation networks. The major obstacle to economic growth is creating a reliable food supply. Insecurity in Libya, insufficient rainfall and pests resulted in a 519,000tn grain deficit at the end of 2011. The World Food Programme estimates that at least one million people will need urgent food aid in the year to come.

Top 24 Richest And Poorest Countries Of Africa – 2020 Edition

By Stephanie Rheingold Last updated Oct 23, 2021

Niger

Error! Filename not specified. Credit: Wikipedia

Niger is among the poorest countries in Africa, with a population of 24.2 million, GDP of $9.72 billion and a per capita GDP of $487.68. This puts them amongst the poorest countries in the world. Niger's economy is based on agriculture (mainly subsistence agriculture), which provides jobs for most of its citizens, and its large uranium deposits, which is actually one of the largest in the world.

Despite the efforts, Niger economy struggles to make huge strides. It is negatively affected by drought cycles, rapid population growth, and the decline in uranium prices over the years.
Until entrepreneurial dynamism improves, the landlocked country will struggle to really see any huge improvements. There are some growth opportunities with the mineral exports, but the country is still figuring out how to fully capitalize.

Nominal GDP Rank: #35
Nominal GDP Per Capita Rank: #48

Are Niger and Nigeria two different countries?

Yome Agu

· Follow Former Council Member at Andromeda Council Intelligence (1900–2012) Jun 22

Yes, they are.

Nigeria was colonised by the British and Niger was colonised by the French.

Yome Agu

Former Council Member at Andromeda Council Intelligence (1900–2012)Updated Jun 25

When was Nigeria created, and why was the country given the name 'Nigeria'?

Modern Nigeria dates from 1914, when the British Protectorates of Northern and Southern Nigeria were joined. The country became independent on October 1, 1960

Niger and Nigeria get their names from the River Niger.

Origins:

Niger: African nation, named for the river Niger, mentioned by that name 1520s (Leo Africanus), speculated to be an alteration (by influence of Latin niger "black" but this was proven to be a misinterpretation) of a local Tuareg name □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □ □, egereou n-igereouen, from egereou "big river, sea" + n-igereouen, plural of that word. Translated in Arabic as nahr al-anhur "river of rivers."

It was coined by British journalist Lady Flora Shaw (well kind of and at the same time not she just found out the name of the river and named the country after that adding an ia). Flora Shaw combined the words “Niger” and “Area” to form the name Nigeria.

The reason she was able to name Nigeria is because she got married to Lord Frederick Lugard, the person behind Nigeria’s amalgamation. He was the governor of both the Northern and Southern protectorates.

This is them.

Are Niger and Nigeria one country?

Anazuo Salihu

Born and bred in Nigeria, a developing country Upvoted by Israel Oluwole Ebenezer

, NYSC at Nigeria (2016-present) and

Yusuf Idowu

, lives in Nigeria 3y

Originally Answered: Is Niger and Nigeria one country?

Niger is a Francophone speaking (they speak French) country sitting just atop Nigeria. Nigeria is coloured green. We speak English because we were colonised by the British.

You can find more details about both countries here [1]

Additional information:

Here's River Niger, the 3rd largest river in Africa. It flows Eastwards in a clockwise direction, towards the Atlantic Ocean, through Nigeria's Niger-Delta region.

There's also Niger State, Nigeria's largest state by area. It has 2 major hydroelectric power plants and 2 game reserves.

Pronounciations:

Nigeria: naɪˈdʒɪəriə

Niger (country): French: niʒɛʁ

River Niger and Niger State: naɪdʒər

Footnotes
[1] Niger vs. Nigeria

Related Links

Why do many countries not like Nigeria?

How do Niger and Nigeria differ?

Are Niger and Nigeria related in any way? Why or why not?

Which two countries hate each other the most?

Which country is better to live in, Kenya or Nigeria?

How do other African countries view Nigeria?

Why is there so much lawlessness in Nigeria?

Can you be married to two different people in two different countries?

Is Nigeria the richest country in Africa?

What is serving as a corper in Niger State, Nigeria like?

What are Nigerians good at?

Osazua Iruedo

Surviving in Nigeria3y

- Nigerians are good at buying and selling.
- Patronising and buying foreign goods. They love the term “it's imported"
- Answering questions with questions.
- Buying houses, cars, new phone model etc.
- Showing off. That's what we know as “notice me" in Nigeria.

- Turning everything into a joke. There's always something funny at the end of the day.
- Taking advantage of the festive season to Increase price of everything.
- Airing their views about the nation, government, corruption etc on social media.
- Insulting or attacking other countries or anyone that says something bad about Nigeria.
- They are also very good at being hospitable and helping those who are in need.

Related Links

What is something only Nigerian people would do?

Why do Nigerians think Nigeria is better than all other African nations?

Do Nigerians mean well?

What does it mean to be a Nigerian?

Are Nigerians really that good at whatever they do?

What do you love about Nigerians?

What would you do to help Nigerians?

What do you think of Nigerians?

What screams "I'm Nigerian"?

Is it true that there's a Nigerian person in every country?

Journalist Idrissa Soumana Maïga detained for ‘undermining national defense’ in Niger

Idrissa Soumana Maïga, editor of L'Enquêteur, was charged with "undermining national defense" on April 29, 2024. (Photo: Mohamadou Harouna)

Dakar, May 7, 2024 — Nigerien authorities must immediately release Idrissa

Soumana Maïga, editor of the privately owned newspaper L'Enquêteur, and allow him to report freely, the Committee to Protect Journalists said Tuesday.

An investigative judge at the court in Niamey, the capital, charged Maïga with "undermining national defense" and ordered his transfer to Niamey prison on April 29, according to news reports and his lawyer, Ousmane Ben Kafougou, who spoke to CPJ by messaging app.

If convicted, he could face between five and 10 years in prison, according to the penal code.

"Nigerien authorities must drop the spurious charges against editor Idrissa Soumana Maïga, immediately release him, and ensure he can work without threat of arrest," said Angela Quintal, head of CPJ's Africa program. "Officials must respond to questions from journalists who are holding power to account and stop criminalizing the public interest work of Niger's media."

Niamey judicial police arrested Maïga four days earlier, on April 25, and questioned him about a L'Enquêteur article published the same day about allegations that Russian agents placed listening devices in public buildings.

"Maïga did not assert these allegations himself, but rather asked questions based on an article in the (French) newspaper Le Figaro," L'Enquêteur said in an April 27 statement on Facebook.

Kafougou told CPJ that pre-trial detention or arrest warrants for press offenses in Niger are prohibited under the press freedom ordinance. The judicial authorities justified Maïga's pre-trial detention in court by saying that "the facts are serious enough and that he should be detained in prison for the purposes of the investigation," Kafougou said.

CPJ's calls to the publicly listed number of Niger's justice ministry went unanswered.

In October 2023, Nigerien authorities charged journalist Samira Sabou with disseminating data likely to disturb public order and maintaining "intelligence with a foreign power." After 11 days in detention, they released her under judicial supervision.

In July 2023, Niger's military took control of the government in a coup that overthrew its democratically elected president. Since then, CPJ and other press freedom groups have raised concerns about journalists' safety in the country.

NIGERIA

National Flag and Emblem

Locator Map

TEXT HIGHLIGHTS: Diaries updates, key events, brief analysis and news articles in timeline

Overview & Diary Refreshes

Originally a collection of African states whose wealth came from trans-Saharan (and trans-Atlantic) trade, it became a British colony in 1861, divided into two British Protectorates in 1898, and then merged in 1914 to form the colony of Nigeria. A federal system of government was created in 1954 and independence achieved in 1960. Find out more about Nigeria with these Country Guides.

The area known as Nigeria today began to come under British influence in 1861. Nigeria was a British colonial creation. It came into being in January 1914 with the amalgamation of the Colony of Lagos (first annexed in 1861), the Southern Protectorates (established 1885 - 1894) and the Northern Protectorate (pacified by 1903). Hitherto, the British had administered them as separate but related territories. Local involvement in government was introduced as early as 1922 when southern politicians, from Lagos and Calabar, took seats in the central legislative assembly. Their northern counterparts did not have legislative experience until 1947 when a new constitution introduced the principle of regional representation. The 1954 constitution created fully-fledged regional governments, and federal elections were held in 1959 the year before independence. Nigeria was granted its independence on 1 October 1960, originally with Dominion status. In 1963, Nigeria broke its direct links with the British Crown, and became a Republic within the Commonwealth. The independence constitution provided for a federation of three autonomous regions - Northern, Western and Eastern - each with wide-ranging powers, its own constitution, public service, and marketing boards. The overarching but weaker federal government had powers limited to national issues, including control of the police and army, and economic planning. The political system was derived from the Westminster model. A fourth region - the Mid-West - was created in 1964 to satisfy the demand of the minorities. In the early 1960s, the inherited regional structure led to a series of crises and conflicts, both within and between the 3 ethno-centric regions, as competition grew for control over the federal centre. The 1964 federal elections were marred by violence and rigging. Inter-party and inter-ethnic tensions continued leading ultimately to a military takeover in January 1966, led by Igbo officers. Thereafter Nigeria's post-independence history was marked by a series of military interventions in politics: coups, counter-coups, and a civil war (1967-70) when the Eastern Region attempted to secede as the Republic of Biafra. Over 1 million died in the conflict. Nigeria has only enjoyed three short periods of civilian rule -

1960-65, 1979-83, and 1999 to the present. The intervening periods, totalling 29 years, saw military governments in place. In an attempt to break up the power of the regions, and forestall future conflict, the regional structure was dismantled in 1967, and replaced by 12 states. At the same time, the federal centre took back most of the powers to itself, and a new radical revenue sharing formula was established which deprived the new states of most of their derivation funds. Additional states were later created in phases in response to demands from powerful local interest groups - in 1976 the number rose to 19, in 1989 to 21, in 1991 to 30, and in 1996 to 36. No new states have been created since then although pressures for new states are ever present. A new Federal Capital Territory, at Abuja in the centre of the country, was created in 1976 but it was not fully operational until the mid-1990s.

By 1903, British control was imposed allover Nigeria, protectorates of Northern and Southern Nigeria formed in 1900 and united as a colony in 1914. Nigeria gained it's independence as a member (Dominion) of the commonwealth in 1960. One of the world’s largest oil-producers.

Headship since independence; Governor-general then Founder-president

On the 1st of October, 1963 "Federation Republic of Nigeria" established and Mr. Nnamdi Azikiwe affectionately known as "Zik" became Governor-general and founder president is believed to be one of the leading figures of modern Nigerian nationalist, when the premiership comes to sir Al-hadji Abubakar Tafawa Balewa, he was a Nigerian politician, and the only civilian prime minister of independent Nigeria, who served from 1st October, 1960 until he was overthrown and killed in a military coup d'etat on the 15th of January, 1966.

The war between the government and the Biafra secessionists ended in July, 1970.

Nigeria has had nearly eight military coups and change of governments since it's independence in October, 1960 from the Great Britain. Nigeria a land of extreme diversity, with at least 250 different ethnic-groups and more than 500 spoken local languages, is the most populous country in Africa.

May 30, 1967: Biafra, the Igbo Nation Nigeria Seceded On This Day.

(DIARIES) In January 1966, a military coup led by Igbo from the east led to the killing of 30 political figures, including Prime Minister Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa. President Nnamdi Azikiwe was spared in the attack. In July of that year, though, military officers in the north launched their own coup and Muslim officials there named an Anga Christian man, General Yakubu “Jack” Gowon, as its leader of the Federal Military Government (FMG). It was estimated that around 30,000 Igbos were killed in this coup, thus escalating matters further.

In January 1967, military officials and leaders from all the regions held a meeting in Aburi, Ghana, and established a confederation. Northern Nigerians were not responsive to the plans made, though, and Obafemi Awolowo, leader of the western region, promised that if the eastern region seceded, then the West would also. The threat dissatisfied leaders in the north overall. The new federal government and eastern region officials could not come to an agreement and the region voted to split away from the nation.

In the early years of its independence, Nigeria was rocked by a pair of coups between prominent ethnic groups that led to a portion of the nation, Biafra, to secede for a period of three years on this day in 1967. The period was an especially tense time for Nigeria and led to a period of violence and war. Nigeria’s independence from the United Kingdom came about in 1960, creating a variety of new borders among the various ethnic and religious groups in the nation. The Hausa and Fulani people lived in the north. The Yoruba people lived in the southwest, with the Ijaws in the south and the Igbo people mostly in the southeast portion of the country.

Consequently, Eastern Region Military Governor Chukwuemeka Odumegwu Ojukwu announced the region as the Republic of Biafra.

The FMG launched an effort to seize the region, which was an oil-rich part of the nation, and important to Nigerian interests. The Biafrans were not as well-equipped as the FMG forces, although they fought gamely and managed to stave off some attacks. By October 1969, however, the nation banned the Red Cross from giving aid to Biafra, restricting food supplies but allowing medical supplies to get through. Ojukwu appealed to the United Nations for a cease-fire, which did not occur. Instead, Ojukwu fled to Côte d’Ivoire after elite fighting forces from the Nigerian Army managed to split Biafra in half by seizing much of the land. The nation surrendered on January 12, 1970, and was reabsorbed into Nigeria three days after. More than 1 million Biafrans died from starvation according to reports.

Political analysts blame Nigeria's frequent power struggles hinging on ethnicity on its colonial past where the British rulers used divide and rule tactics. Nigeria, Africa's most populous country celebrates its 54nd independence anniversary right on October 1st, 2014.

A Federal Republic in West Africa on the gulf of Guinea

There were several pre-colonial empires including the state of Kanem-Bornu, the Songhai, the Hausa and the Fulani kingdoms. The area known as Nigeria now began to come under British influence in 1861, and the former political, now the economic capital, Lagos was annexed. By 1903, British control was imposed allover Nigeria, protectorates of Northern and Southern Nigeria formed in 1900 and united as a colony in 1914. The most populous country in Africa, Nigeria a land of extreme diversity, with at least 250 different ethnic groups and more than 500 spoken local languages, gained it's independence as a member (Dominion) of the commonwealth in 1960. According to analysts, Nigeria's problem of disunity can be traced to the merger of the two British-colonies namely of Northern Nigeria and Southern Nigeria in 1914 for the British-colonists administrative convenience. While the British directly administered the South, in the North they went into alliance with the mainly feudal Fulani traditional rulers of the time who had conquered the Hausaland and other areas in the vast region in the wars for power and territory of the early 1880s that are generally referred to as the Jihad. The Fulani rulers, known as "Amirs", were allowed by the colonial administration to exercise power on behalf of the British Crown. The system of indirect rule was so successful that it was replicated in other British colonies in Africa. It is believed that the Fulanis had been migrating from the Futa-Jallon area of today's Guinea into today's northern Nigeria since the 1500s.

The British colonists employing divide and rule politics, made sure that there was no unity b/n the leaders of three major political forces (regions) of the time at independence namely, the eastern region, led by Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, the Northern region, led by Al-Hadji Ahmadou Bello and the Western region, led by Chief Obafemi Awolowo, the leaders were deeply divided and suspicious of one another Sir Dr. Benjamin Nnamdi Azikiwe, affectionately known usually as "Zik of Africa " or " Grand wiseman of Africa" became first prime minister of Nigerian semi-colonial administration b/n 1953 and 1959, and later to become it's first native "Governor -general" 1960 to 1963, he was a renowned journalist by profession, became founder-president for then first Nigerian republic officially titled as "Federation Republic of Nigeria" on the 1st of October, 1963, Zik is believed to be one of the leading figures of modern Nigerian nationalist, when the premiership comes to sir Al-hadji Abubakar Tafawa Balewa, he was a Nigerian politician, and the only civilian prime minister of independent Nigeria, who served from 1st October, 1960 until he was overthrown and killed in a military coup d'etat on the 15th of January, 1966. Nigeria, a land of lots of potentials with it's immense richness especially, in agriculture, minerals and of course human resources. For example, in 1960, when it was granted independence by the British, it was the beacon of the continent, today Nigeria is touted as the symbol of post-colonial African failure according to journalists and authors.

Since it's independence, Nigeria has been started plaguing by the North-South sectarian questions, public policies are viewed not on how they seem to address the problems confronting the country or promise to improve the living conditions of Nigerians, but rather which region, or more so which regional elite, would profit most from them, appointments into publc offices are also therefore judjed on the basis of which region they seem to favour. The country already faced a major constitutional crisis barely three years after the departure of the British. The total breakdown of law and order in the Western Region following rigged elections in 1965 sparked the military coup of January, 1966. Though they acted with the best of intentions, the young idealist soldiers led by Chukwuma Nzeogwu, an army Colonel of Igbo extraction,were unable to fully take over power after killing some of the principal rulers, among them Prime Minister Abubakr Tafawa Balewa and the Northern Regios Premier, Ahmadou Bello, both Northern Muslims. With no major Igbo political actors killed during the coup, Northern Politicians concluded that the coup was a ploy by the Igbo to take over the country. The Igbo, one of Nigeria's three main ethnic groups along with the Yoruba and Hausa-Fulani, had been in control of the Nigerian Army at the time, with one of them, Major-General Thomas Oguiyi-Ironsi, taking over power after foiling the coup by his younger kinsman. But Majour-General Aguiyi-Ironsi lasted only six months in power before a counter coup launched by young northern military officers on the 29th of July 1966 saw to his death precipitated a wave of killing of the Igbos in the North, the declaration of an independent Republic of Biafra and a three year civil war from 1967 to 1970, which claimed more than a million lives. The Eastern region was seceded as the Republic of Biafra for the duration of the severe civil war and misery that lost lives of 1.3 million people from 1967 to 1970, General Chukwuemeka Odumegwu Ojukwo nicknamed, "Emeka" was the leader of the secessionist state of Biafra in Nigeria during the Nigerian civil war, he declared the state of Biafra on the 30th of May,1967, following mass killings of Igbos in the Northern part of the country, the declaration sparked a civil war that claimed 1.3 million casualties, he lost the battle to the Nigerian army since 1979 he returned from exile (Cote D' Ivoire) to Nigeria under a government pardon granted by civilian president Al-Hadji Shehu Shagari in 1983.

On the 29th of July 1975 saw the charismatic Brigadier General Murtala Muhammed wresting power from General Yakubu Gowon, who came to power following General Aguiyi-Ironsi's demise. And that in 1 October, 1974 he was postponing indefinitely which he had promised to handover power to a civilian government. Majour-General Yakubu Gowon was attending an Organization of African Unity (OAU) summit conference of heads of states and governments in Kampala, Uganda when he was thrown out of office. The new Nigerian ruler Murtala Muhammed accused General Yakubu Gowon of dishonouring the Nigerian Army by pledging publicly to handover power to civilian rule and then peremptorily gone back to his word. But General Murtala did not last, killed seven months later, on the 13th February, 1976, in an unsuccessful putsch by Colonel Bukar Suka Dimka, who was later apprehended, tried, convicted and executed along with his co-conspirators. Democracy was restored on 1st October 1979 by Murtala Muhammed's successor Lt. General Olusegun Obasanjo, who successfully conducted elections that saw Mr. Shehu Shagari, a teacher-turned-politician from the North, emerged as Nigeria's first president under the newly introduced US-style presidential system of government. The experiment was, however, cut short by a midnight coup d' etat on the 31st December 1983. Buhari is a native of Daura in Katsina State; he is of Fulani ethnic background. General Muhammadu Buhari, who led the coup, was ousted less than two years after, on the 27th of August 1985, by the willy General Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida, known as IBB, whose half-hearted attempt to restore democratic rule was aborted with the inexplicable annulment of the epochal 12 June 1993 presidential ballot won by the business mogul MKO Abiola, who later died in custody, forced to abandon power after exausting his tricks, IBB hurriedly handed over to an interim government headed by Mr. Ernest Shoenekan, a politically inexperienced technocrat, on the 26th August 1993.

It took less than three months, precisely on the 17th November, 1993 for the taciturn army General Sani Abacha to dismantle the contraption and assume power. General Sani Abacha eventually turned out to be a monumentalcurse on Nigeria, perpetrating a maximum rule outstanding for it's wickedness, hallmarked by the murder, after a sham trial, of renowned playwright and minority rights activist Ken Saro-Wiwa over local Ogoni politics, with Saro-Wiwa's murder in November, 1995 alongside eight other Ogoni activists, General Sani Abacha fully turned Nigeria into a pariah nation following the country's suspension from major international organizations.

Ken Saro-Wiwa was born in October 1941 in Bori, Nigeria. After graduating from the University of Ibadan he worked briefly as a teacher before his best known novel, Sozaboy: A Novel In Rotten English, an anti-war satire, was published in 1985. This was followed by his second book, On A Darkling Plain, about his experiences in the Nigerian Civil War. He subsequently went on to write numerous novels, as well as the hugely popular television sitcom, Basi and Company, for which he wrote over 150 episodes..

In 1990 Saro-Wiwa joined the Movement for the Survival of the Ogoni People (MOSOP). He campaigned for greater autonomy for the Ogoni lands and demanded that the international oil corporations (namely Shell) share revenues made on oil extracted from Ogoni land and clean up the environmental damage the extraction had caused.

Ken Saro-Wiwa was first arrested in 1992 and detained for several months before being released. In January 1993 MOSAP led a peaceful demonstration which was violently suppressed by the Nigerian security services and five months later Saro-Wiwa was imprisoned for a month.

On the 21 May 1994, four Ogoni chiefs from a different faction of MOSOP to Saro-Wiwa were killed by a mob of militant MOSOP supporters. Saro-Wiwa (who earlier had been prevented from attending a meeting with the four chiefs) was arrested along with fourteen other MOSOP leaders and charged with inciting the murders.

Ken Saro-Wiwa was convicted of the murder despite many observers claiming that the trial had been rigged. On 10 November 1995, after an extensive international campaign led by centres of PEN International, Saro-Wiwa was executed. His death led to an international outcry.

The next year a collection of his essays written during incarceration was published—A Month And a Day: A Detention Diary.

In 1996 a lawsuit was filed against Shell alleging their complicity in human rights abuses in Nigeria including the execution of Ken Saro-Wiwa. In June 2009, Shell agreed to pay a settlement of fifteen and a half million dollars despite claiming it was not guilty of the charge.

For the first time, Nigerians publicly celebrated the death of one of their rulers when they woke-up in the morning of 9th June 1998 to learn that Sani Abacha had died overnight in a cloudy circumstances. The appointment of the liberal General Abdulsalami Abubakar as Head of State and his promise of a quick return of democracy brought a new ray of hope that was however soon squelched by the death, in confinement, of Moshud Abiola on the 7th of July 1998. Moshud Abiola's death in controversial circumstances climaxed the political crises engendered by the annulment of his electoral victory and, for a moment, Nigeria appeared headed for the abyss, mercifully, Abdulsalami Abubakar defused the tension by keeping his promise to restore democratic rule on the 29th of May 1999, with the two political parties that contested the elections fielded Yoruba presidential candidates as a way of placating Moshud Abiola's kinsmen.

The 1999 transition to civilian rule saw the return to power of Mr. Olusegun Obasanjo, who as military Head of State from 1976 -1979 had climaxed what is now regarded as the golden era of economic boom and infrastructural development. Though, he launched a war against graft, paid off the country's external debt and restored Nigeria's prestige internationally, but Mr. Olusegun Obasanjo failed to bring back the good times of Nigeria as expected, worse, he soiled his reputation by organizing fraudalent elections in 2003 and 2007 and attempting to tinker the country's connstitution so as to enjoy a third term of office, a move which ended in humilation when Nigeria's parliament refused to play along.

In the circumstances, Olusegun Obasanjo had no option than to handover power to his prefered successor, Mr. Umaru Musa Yar'Adua, a northerner on the 29th of May 2007, after finishing his second and final term of office, marking the first time that a civilian government in Nigeria successfully conducted elections and handed over power to another. The elections were the worse Nigeria has ever witnessed, Mr. Umaru Musa YarAdua's sudden death on the 5th of May 2010 paved the way for his deputy, Mr. Goodluck Jonathan, to become the first person from the Oil-rich but grossly marginalised Niger Delta to rule Nigeria. It is generally believed that he will be officially elevated to the post since it was long expected, based on achievements in a short time he has been in charge, he will likely to win the presidential election to be held in 2011.

Almost fifty years after the departure of the British colonists, Nigeria is still divided along the Muslim-north and the rest of the country. the introduction of the Islamic legal code (Shariah) in 12 northern states in early 2000, has increased the difficulty of building a national consensus. Is Shariah about religion? Professor Wole Soyinka says no. "It is about it's cynical manipulation by political forces made desperate by the erosion of a hegemonic power-base", said the 1986 winner of Nobel prize for literature. The struggle to establish a sustainable democratic system based on equity, against the resistance of forces that are the beneficiaries of the existing conditions created by the British manipulation, is the greatest challenge Nigeria faces today.

The story of Nigeria's first half-century of independence is a tale of wasted potential. The sub-Sahara Africa's most populous and complex country, Nigeria, is a regional economic powerhouse, and home to it's biggest Oil-riches, fifty years after the departure of the British colonists, is still impoverished by thieving autocrates and divided b/n the Muslim-north and the rest of the country along with numerous ethno-linguistic groups. Broadly the Hausa-Fulani people based in the north are mostly Muslims. The Yorubas of the South-west are divided b/n Muslims and Christians, while the Igbos of the South-east and neighbouring groups are mostly Christians or animists. The middle-belt is home to hundreds of groups with different beliefs, and around Jos there are frequent clashes b/n Hausa-speaking Muslims and Christian members of the Berom-community.

On the renowned Chinua Achebe: Nigeria’s most revered man of letters, has had a truly remarkable literary career, writing a mix of poetry, fiction and essays.

There had been successions of military rulers following the assassination of it's first civilian prime minister since January, 1966. Following nearly two decades of military rule, a new constitution was adopted in 1999, post-independence Nigeria had several sudden violent seizing of power by the military, his election in 2007 marked the first transfer of power from one civilian president to another since Nigeria's independence in October, 1960. The late president went to a Clinic in Jeddah, KSA for three months, leaving a power vaccum and intense speculation about the state of his health, the vice president Goodluck Ebele Jonathan, affectionately known as GEJ, a southerner, elevated to acting president in the absence to ill health, of ex-president Umaru Musa Yar'Adua, he sworn into office as head of state and commander in-chief of the Armed Forces of the Federal Republic of Nigeria on the 6th of May, 2010, in a ceremony held in the presidential Villa in the capital, Abuja, a day after the ailing president passed away with long battling of chronic kidney and pericarditis. In his speech on assuming office, he stated his total commitment to "good governance, electoral reform and the fight against corruption". He pledged that his government would establish a strong foundation on which to build a sustainable future for Nigerians through his commitment to credible elections, power-generation and distribution, the fight against corruption and overcoming the challenges to national security for Nigeria as a whole and the Niger-Delta in particular.

A recent report released by the United Nations Environmental programme (UNEP) on the horrors of oil-pollution in Nigeria's Ogoniland, which in their words, could require " the World's most wide ranging and long-term oil clean-ups exercise, needs billions of dollars and 30 years of work to restore the devastated eco-system and rehabilitate it's impoverished inhabitants. Oil contamination in Ogoniland is widespread and severely impacting many components of the environment-- the Ogoni people live with pollution everyday", according to the UNEP. Following the collection of over 4, 000 samples, from 69 sites for soil, water and air quality analysis, as well as the examination of the medical records of over 5, 000 local people, the UNEP team held 264 community meetings with the inhabitants of the area. One of the major issues facing the Nigerian government is the implementation of an amnesty programme in the Oil-rich Niger-Delta, where a violent insurgency has been waged for the past seven years, hampering Crude-Oil production and destabilising the nation's politcal infrastructure. The amnesty programme launched in late 2009 by the late Mr. Musa Yar'Adua, one of his last initiatives before he fell ill, was a major attempt to resolve the issue. With the start of the amnesty, thousands relinquished their arms and took advantage of the deal. In the Rivers state, which was witnessed some of the worst incidents of the insurgency, 6,000 militants were disarmed. Today, the amnesty has been fully iplemented with an extensive training and rehabilitation programme to re-integrate former militants into the rest of the society. Though, pockets of militant activity still persist, there is increasing evidence that these are not connected to any known command structure and mostly involve rag-tag groups. The government of Nigeria has commenced a campaign to halt their activities. The Niger-Delta remains at the top of the list of priorities in order to prevent a recurrence of the insurgents sabotage of the Oil-industry.

The country is still plagued by widespread poverty, among other social problems, despite the hundreds of billions of USD it has earned from oil & Gas exports in the past four decades. It's most talented citizens are scattered around the world while ethno-religious violence has caused massive internal migration in the past ten years, nothing to do with it's Electorate thinking politicians The ruling Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) in Nigeria has a tradition of alternating power b/n the moslem-north and the christian & animist south, along north-south lines, with each side getting two tenures. There is no such agreement in Nigeria or in the national constitution, that agreement only exists within the ruling Peoples Democratic Party (PDP), which incidentally has been ruling the country since 1999. It is to be recalled that a new constitution was adopted on the 5th of March, 1999, effective 29th of May, the same year. And a peaceful transition of power to civilian rule is completed, presidential elections were held in April of 1999, 2003 and 2007 respectively, the general election of April, 2007 marked the first civilian to civilian transfer of power in the country's history. Meanwhile, the nations electoral body, the Independent Nigerian Electoral Commission (INEC), has announced that elections regularly will take place in April and that the 29th of May date for the swearing-in of the elected officials will be met. With so many natural resources at it's disposal, Nigeria would have been expected to be a major center of development in Africa, though, Nigerians have cause to hope for a better life. The Federal political capital was moved to Abuja in December, 1991, while Lagos, the former capital remained economic capital of Nigeria.

The incumbent President Mr. Goodluck Jonathan has been declared winner in the presidential election with the Electoral commission saying he received about 57% of the vote. But supporters of the main-opposition rival allege ballot-rigging. Violence have broke-out after incumbent Goodluck Jonathan won elections. Rioting spread across the Muslim-North, the opposition's power base, as the outcome became clear. It is the first time in Nigeria's history that the election result has exposed the huge division b/n the muslim-north and the christian-south. Election in Nigeria are not necessarily about issues but about ethnicity, religion and regionalism. So historically they have been won as a result of either a formal alliance by political parties or, more recently, an informal agreement within the governing PDP-party to alternate the presidency b/n north and south. For this reason the winning candidate irrespective of region, religion or ethnicity normally commanded a wide national spread. It was the first popular mandate for Goodluck Jonathan, a christian from the country's south who was appointed last year when then president died. However, the power-rotation was broken when he succeeded to the presidency right after the death of Umaru Yar'Adua, a northerner. Many in the North felt the next president should have been from their region, as Mr. Umaru Yar'Adua died before he could finish his term. The north and south also have cultural, ethnic and linguistic differences. Analysts say "the unrest is not simply an expression of religious divide between north and south but the result of political and socio economic grievances, but Goodluck Jonathan's ascension to the highest office marks the first time a member of a minority-group from the Oil-producing Niger Delta has emerged as the country's leader". Nigeria sits atop some of richest reserves of natural resources in Africa but is plagued by corruption. As side note, the former leader of the Nigerian breakaway State of Biafra, ex-Governor Army Colonel Chukwuemeka Ojukwu, nicknamed "Emeka", dies after a long illness at age of 78.

Major Conflicts

1966 Coup

When: 1966

Who: Igbo officers VS Federal Government

Why: The officers claimed the government was Hausa-Fulani dominated Outcome: the coup was not successful, however, Major-General Johnson Oguiyi-Ironsi, from the Eastern Region, took power when the government collapsed

1966 'Revenge' Coup

When: 1966

Who: Lt. Colonel Yakubu Gowon Vs Majour-General Oguiyi-Ironsi's Government

Why: Northern officers wanted control

Outcome: Ironsi was killed and Gen Yakubu Gowon took power A conflict erupted over the Biafra When: May, 1967

Who: Igbos of the Eastern region VS Federal Nigerian Government

Why: The Eastern region was seeking to gain independence from the federal government and create the Republic of Biafra, Colonel Emeka Odumegwu-Ojukwu refused to accept Gen Gowon's authority and after months of political impasse, declared an independent republic of Biafra in May 1967. Followed by the declaration of the Biafran independence by General Ojukwu in May, 1967, 1 to 2 million deaths and destruction wrought by the civil war.

Outcome: Federal forces forced a Biafran surrender in 1970, it is estimated that 1 million people died during this conflict.

1975 Coup

Nigerian leader Major General Yakubu Gowon left an OAU Kampala (Uganda) Summit when he was informed that he had been overthrown.

When: July 29, 1975:

Who: Brigadier General Murthala Mohammed Vs Majour General Yakubu Gowon on his attendance at OAU conference of heads of states and governments in Uganda.

Lt. General Olusegun Obassanjo succeeded after the assassination of Murthala Mohammed to follow his plan.

1st October, 1979

Democracy was restored by Lt. General Olusegun Obassanjo, he successfully conducted elections that saw Al-Haji Shehu Shagari a teacher-turned politician from the North emerged as Nigeria's first president under the newly introduced Nigerian presidential system.

Coup of 31st December, 1983

When: 1983

Who:

Majour-General Muhammadu Buhari (with military) VS Civilian President Al-haji Shehu Shagari

Why: There was no confidence in the civilian regime.

Outcome: Even though Muhammadu Buhari succeeded in the coup, the economic crisis and civilian criticism of the military undermined his position. And in August 1985 a group of Army officers under Majour General Ibrahim Babangida, known later as IBB removed Muhammadu Buhari from power.

27th August, 1985 Election made by Majour-General Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida, known in short as IBB.

12th June, 1993 Presidential ballot won by the wealthy businessman Moshud Abiola.

26th August, 1993 IBB handed over power hurriedly to an Interim president Ernest Schonekan.

17th Novemer, 1993 General Sani Abacha Vs Ernest Schonekan

Why: There was no confidence in the civilian regime.

Outcome: Even though succeeded in the coup, the economic crisis and the civilian criticism against General Sani Abacha intensified. President-elect Moshud Abiola custodied.

Conflict in the Niger Delta

When: 1995 to Present

Who: Militants in the Niger Delta (in particular the Movement for the Emancipation of the Niger Delta (Mend) since 2006) VS The Nigerian Government and Oil companies.

Why?: The oil industry has been a major cause of pollution in the area, which displaces people living near the delta from their homes and reduces their ability to fish. Also, many of the communities in the area are not benefiting from the lucrative oil resources. The environmental damage that the Niger Delta had endured and the sufferings of it's people, since the beginning of Oil-exploration in the region by major western Oil Companies a half century ago. Here we see children scooping crude oil from the ground of their family's farm after a ruptured oil pipeline explodes, damaging about 300 hectares of community lands: we see the acrid, black, billowing smoke of the fires of burst pipelines: we see the eerie dead forests and wastelands: and we see the remnants of Oil industry infrastructure in areas that have been sucked dry by the Oil companies and abandoned. As an environmental expert commented "Oil Companies are far more sensitive to public opinion and respectful of the judicial systems in their own countries than they are in Nigeria. A recently published damning United Nations Environmental Programme (UNEP) comprehensive report on the massive Oil spills in the Ogoniland, making the Dutch Shell Company more responsible. The government of Nigeria must work hard towards getting this all-important legislation passed because until that happens, several prospective multi-billion dollar investments will remain frozen for the lack of an appropriate regulatory environment.

Outcome: Mend was notorious for the kidnap of oil workers and the movement’s demands are getting more politicised. There are now groups emerging that have been ‘inspired’ by Mend and continue guerilla tactics in the region which make it difficult for ceasefire agreements to be reached

What to see?

The Sallah Festival: Muslim celebrations in the towns of Kano, Katsina, Maiduguri and Zaria, festivities last for several days with horseback processions, musicians and dancers.

The seven Olumirin Waterfalls:

The Cross River National Park: Starts at the town of Ikom, on the road to Cameroon, which has curious carved monoliths set in circles, believed to be ancient monuments assembled in reverence to ancestors in the park there is a variety of wildlife

Politics

Separatist movements and military coups have resulted in thousands of deaths over the years.

Former President Olusegun Obasanjo had been in office for two consecutive terms but despite huge corruption in the state his, third term was blocked by parliament.

The Movement for the Emancipation of the Niger Delta (Mend) called a truce following an amnesty offer from and direct pledges made by the president – however, a small hardline faction have ended this truce and resumed attacks on the delta.

Economy

Being an oil producer creates problems; conflict in the Niger Delta, pollution, overdependence on the oil sector.

Attacks on oil installations and their employees have cut Nigeria's output by a third in the past three years and helped raise oil prices.

Recently, the Nigerian Government had to withdraw funds from reserve oil accounts due to the global economic crisis.

The government is currently trying to push bills through the national assembly in order to allocate more oil revenue directly to villages in the Delta region.

Social

Religious conflict between the Muslims and Christians.

Conflict over cultural minorities and those that control the oil production.

Widespread corruption in the government and private sector.

Electricity: Weak industrial sector, and therefore jobs and businesses, are collapsing due to erratic power supplies and blackouts: however, donors are unwilling to give loans as they fear the money will end up in the wrong places. Health: there is a mass exodus of medically trained people to the US and Europe, hospitals and health facilities often suffer from lack of essential appropriate drugs.

Side notes: It is widely believed that the areas surrounding Calabar, Cross River State, contain the world's largest diversity of butterflies. Nigeria has the highest rate of twin births in the world, compared to any other country. The centre of this twin zone is Igbo-Ora, a town in South-West Nigeria.

Side note: Nigeria's Supreme Court recently dismisses five state governors. Nigeria's Supreme Court has ordered five of the country's powerful state governors to step down immediately. It marks the end of a long legal battle about when exactly their terms in office, which last four years, began. They were from the ruling People's Democratic Party, winning polls in 2007 in Bayelsa, Cross River, Kogi, Adamawa and Sokoto and vote re-runs in 2008. It is said to be a landmark judgement, asserting the authority of the judiciary. Governors, who can serve no longer than two terms in office, enjoy wide powers in Nigeria. Some, especially in oil-producing areas of Nigeria, control bigger budgets than those of national governments in some neighbouring West African countries.

Side note: A nation in crisis: In recent times Nigeria rocked by two unprecedented events - a national strike that some say heralds the country's version of the Arab spring, and the biggest wave of bombings ever carried out by Islamist group, Boko Haram, that left almost 200 people dead. It has to be recalled that the state of Nigeria had been captured in the past since January, 1966 by a group of political army officers namely, Thomas Oguiyi-Ironsi, Yakubu Gowon, Murthala Muhammad, Olusegun Obasanjo Muhammad Buhari, Ibrahim Babaginda, Abdusalaami Abubakar and Sani Abacha.

Side note: The death of Emeka: Mr. Odumegwu Ojukwu passed away in London hospital on the 26th November, 2011, at the age of 78, having suffered for almost a year after a massive stroke. He had been evacuated from his native Nigeria to the UK on 23rd December, 2010. Former Nigerian Army General Odumegwu Ojukwu nicknamed as “Emeka” : was born on 4th November, 1933 at Zuneru (now Niger State) to the multi-millionaire business tycoon and British knited Sir Louis Philip Ojukwu of the Anambra state, in eastern Nigeria. He started formal education in Lagos, the former capital, and came to England when he was 13. He attended Oxford University where he obtained a Masters Degree in Modern History. After his return to Nigeria, in 1956, he worked as a civil servant before joining the army. He served in the United Nations peacekeeping force in the Congo, and was later posted to Kano in northern Nigeria as commander of the 5th battalion of infantry. He was appointed the military governor of Eastern Nigeria in January, 1966 right after the Nigerian military takeover of power. But a rising military career was marked by a serious crises after Ojukwu's politically-minded spirit stirred his passions to formally declare the "Biafra independent" of Nigeria in May, 1967 following a pogrom against Easterners living in Northern Nigeria. This forced the then Nigerian head of state, Majour-General Yakubu Gowon, to declare war on Biafra in July, 1967. Biafra had some notable successes durig the war but was finally defeated by the federal armed forces in 1970. The rebeled General Odumegwu Ojukwu hastily handed over power to his then deputy, Majour-General Phillip Effiong, and fled the country. The Ivorian president, Felix Houphouet-Boigny, granted him political assylum in his country, where Ojukwu lived for the next 13 years before returning home, following an unconditional pardon in 1982 by the civilian government of president Al-haji Shehu Shagari. Odumegwu Ojukwu soon went into active politics and co-founded the All Progressives Grand Alliance (APGA), under which he sought twice without success to become Nigeria's president, in 2003 and 2007. Former arch-rival, Majour-General Yakubu Gowon former head of state of Nigeria said, "the fact that Ojukwu valued peace and he had helped build a united Nigeria made him pray that he would return home after receiving treatment in London, the UK, so, we could continue the struggle to keep Nigeria as one indivisible entity. But I am happy this time that Emeka died as Nigerian, and not as a Biafran".

Side note: Radical Islamist group Boko-Haram has said it was behind the June 17 suicide bombings of three churches in the northern Nigerian state of Kaduna. The blasts were in revenge for what it said were previous Christian 'atrocities' against Muslims, the group said in an e-mail sent to local media, the BBC reported. At least 50 people were killed in the bombings and reprisal killings, the Red Cross says. The Red Cross says another 131 people were injured by the violence, the third weekend in a row in which Boko-Haram has carried out bombings on churches. Two of the blasts happened in the Wusasa and Sabon-Gari district of the town of Zaria and a third hit the nearby city of Kaduna, the state capital. Rioting broke out in different parts of Kaduna state as youth took to the streets in anger and attacked Muslims. Kaduna state governor Patrick Yakowa told the BBC the attacks were 'sad and disheartening'. In an e-mailed statement in the local Hausa language, the Boko-Haram spokesman Abul Qaqa said, 'Allah has given us victory in the attacks we launched against churches in Kaduna and Zaria towns which resulted in the deaths of many Christians and security personnel.' The group said the attacks were carried out in revenge for what it described as government-backed killings of Muslims in earlier bouts of violence in central Nigeria.

Accession to power of president Goodluck Jonathan February, 2010, elevated.

Tentative election calendar - Presidential/Parliamentary, April/May.

Nigeria – Timeline Diaries updates and related Key notes:

About 800 BC - Jos plateau settled by Nok - a neolithic and iron age civilization.

circa 11th century onwards - Formation of city states, kingdoms and empires, including Hausa kingdoms and Borno dynasty in north, Oyo and Benin kingdoms in south.

1472 - Portuguese navigators reach Nigerian coast.

16-18th centuries - Slave trade: Millions of Nigerians are forcibly sent to the Americas.

1809 - Single Islamic state - Sokoto caliphate - is founded in north.

1830s-1886 - Civil wars plague the Yorubaland, in the south.

1850s - British establish presence around Lagos.

1861-1914 - Britain consolidates its hold over what it calls the Colony and Protectorate of Nigeria, governs by "indirect rule" through local leaders.

1922 - Part of former German colony Kamerun is added to Nigeria under League of Nations mandate.

1960 - Independence, with Prime Minister Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa leading a coalition government.

1962-63 - Controversial census fuels regional and ethnic tensions.

January 1966 – Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa killed in a coup. Major-General Johnson Aguiyi-Ironsi heads up military administration.

July 1966 – Brigadier General Oguyi Ironsi killed in counter-coup, replaced by Lieutenant-Colonel Yakubu Gowon.

1967 - Three eastern states secede as the Republic of Biafra, sparking bloody civil war.

1970 - Biafran secessionist leaders surrender, former Biafran regions reintegrated into country.

1975 – Majour General Yakubou Gowon overthrown while he was at the OAU summit conference in Kampala, Uganda, flees to Britain, replaced by Brigadier Murtala Ramat Mohammed, who begins process of moving federal capital to Abuja.

1976 – Brigadier General Murthala Mohammed assassinated in failed coup attempt. Replaced by his deputy, Lieutenant-General Olusegun Obasanjo, who helps introduce American-style presidential constitution 1979 – General elections bring Alhaji Shehu Shagari to power.

January 1983 - The government expels more than one million foreigners, mostly Ghanaians, saying they had overstayed their visas and were taking jobs from Nigerians. The move is condemned abroad but proves popular in Nigeria.

August, September 1983 –Al-haji Shehu Shagari re-elected amid accusations of irregularities.

December 1983 - Major-General Muhammadu Buhari seizes power in bloodless coup.

1985 - Ibrahim Badamasi Babangida seizes power in bloodless coup, curtails political activity.

June 1993 - Military annuls elections when preliminary results show victory by Chief Moshood Abiola.

August 1993 - Power transferred to Interim National Government under Ernest Schonneka.

November 1993 - General Sani Abacha seizes power, suppresses opposition.

1994 – Mr. Moshood Abiola arrested after proclaiming himself president.

1995 - Ken Saro-Wiwa, writer and campaigner against oil industry damage to his Ogoni homeland, is executed following a hasty trial. In protest, European Union imposes sanctions until 1998, Commonwealth suspends Nigeria's membership until 1998.

1998 - Abacha dies, succeeded by Major-General Abdulsalami Abubakar. Chief Abiola dies in custody a month later.

1999 - Parliamentary and presidential elections. Olusegun Obasanjo sworn in as president.

July 18, 1999 The southern town of Shagamu had a major outbreak of ethnic violence between Yorubas and Hausas.

July 19, 1999 Violence continues in Shagamu, with more than 66 dead. Riot police have arrived and put down most of the violence. Many Hausas have fled the town fearing retribution from the more numerous Yoruba.

July 24, 1999 Ethnic violence breaks out in the northern city of Kano, with majority Hausas attacked Yorubas.

July 26, 1999 Violence continues Kano, after three days of ethnic violence. About two dozen died.

July 27, 1999 More violence in Kano, about 80 have died, mainly Christian Yorubas in this mainly Moslem Hausa town.

July 28, 1999 Ethnic fighting broke out in eastern Nigeria (the Aguleri-Umuleri region). The majority population in the area is Ibo. The death toll is high, with 50-100 dead.

July 29, 1999 Refugees who fled ethnic fighting in Kano have begun to return home.

August 3, 1999 For the last several days, fighting between Ilajes and Ijaws in the towns of Oroto and Apaja have killed as many as fifty people. The fighting sometimes involves who will obtain what benefits from the local oil production. About 700 of the 3,000 Nigerians living in Sierra Leone are being evacuated because their homes and livelihoods were destroyed in the civil war.

August 8, 1999 The new government has discovered that the military officers who recently left office had looted the treasury. The theft could be as high as 400 million dollars. This will make it more difficult for the new government to keep the peace, as money is often the cure for civil unrest.

August 9, 1999 Fighting between Ilajes and Ijaws in Ondo state has flared up again over the last few days, leaving several dead. Army reconnaissance troops of the 2nd Mechanized division have arrived to get a better idea of just what the situation is. Officials of the newly elected Nigerian government are claiming that the ethnic unrest currently plaguing the country is being instigated by enemies of the new government. No proof was provided.

August 10, 1999 Fighting between Ilajes and Ijaws in Ondo state continues, and gets worse.

August 11, 1999 Local newspapers reported that last week troops killed some 300 civilians while putting down unrest in a remote area of northeast Nigeria.

August 12, 1999 The government played down, but did not deny reports that last week troops killed some 300 civilians in northeast Nigeria. Apparently a force of 20 police, 20 soliders and 60 civilian volunteers went in to pacify the area. Leaders of the various ethnic groups in Ondo state agreed to allow the army to enter and keep the peace. Civil disorder in Nigeria's coastal oil provinces has cost the country a billion dollars in lost production last year. The local people have gotten little to show for all the oil pumped out of their neighborhoods. There has been a lot of pollution because of the oil drilling, and few of the locals have gotten jobs or any economic benefit out of it. As a result, the last few years have seen more and more demonstrations and violence against the oil operations. The oil companies have been more helpful in dealing with the problem than the government, and because of that the disorder continues.

August 15, 1999 Ijaw militants in oil rich Ondo state attacked soldiers guarding an oil installation .One person was killed and several wounded. Some 200 people have died here in ethnic fighting during the last two weeks. Recently arrived government troops have imposed a dusk to dawn curfew.

August 17, 1999 Civil unrest has forced Texaco to halt production in its Nigerian oil fields The lost production amounts to 1.3 million dollars of oil sales per day. Total Nigerian daily production is about 36 million dollars a day. The new civilian government plans to reduce the size of its military from 80,000 to 50,000 men.

August 24, 1999 The Nigerian air force has decided to sell its older MiG 15 and 21, Jaguar and G222 aircraft and replace them with more modern multi-purpose warplanes.

September 1, 1999 Nigeria is withdrawing its peacekeeping troops from Liberia, where 80 of its soldiers have been killed over the last six years.

September 4, 1999 Nigeria plans to cut its military from 80,000 personnel to 50,000 as part of its transition to democracy. The Army will be cut the most (to 30,000); the Air Force and Navy will be reduced to 10,000 men each. Dismissed troops will be retrained for civilian jobs.--Stephen V Cole

September 5, 1999 The new reform government plans to reform the national police force. The current force is noted for its corruption and ineffectiveness. The plan is to retire 50,000 and recruit 125,000 officers over the next five years, as well as reforming police procedures. Meanwhile, Nigeria has told the United Nations that Nigerian peacekeeping troops will be withdrawn from Sierra Leone in the next few months whether or not the UN has new troops available to replace them.

September 8, 1999 Nigeria has forced the retirement of all military officers who had previously held political office. The new civilian government had observed that officers who had held political posts lived more lavishly than those who had not, causing resentment among the career military officers. The new House of Representatives has asked the government to relocate the five military units that surround the presidential palace to prevent them from staging a future coup against the elected government.--Stephen V Cole

September 10, 1999 Fighting between rival Islamic groups in southern Nigeria left five dead.

September 14, 1999 Four days of clashes between rambunctious youths and police in the southeast left nineteen dead. In early 1999, twenty youths had been killed by the police, and relations with the police were tense. The soldiers apparently join in with the police in going after local youths.

September 20, 1999 Hundreds of demonstrators have closed a liquid gas plant. The people demand more oil and gas money for their villages.

September 24, 1999 It is feared that a bomb destroyed an oil pipeline in southeast Nigeria. Many in the local population are in rebellion against the long term denial of oil money going to the area where the oil is pumped. The government fears that this might grow to a separatist rebellion.

September 28, 1999 Tribal disputes between Ilajes and Ijaws in Ondo state (Akure) have, over the last few days, left sixteen dead and over twenty injured. There hadbeen a truce in this dispute since may, but the Ijaw hired soldiers (of Ijaw background) to help renew the fighting.

October 6, 1999 The government has removed locally recruited troops from the rebellious coastal oil producing areas. The local troops have become involved in criminal activity. By bringing in troops from other areas, fewer cozy relationships with local criminals will be formed.

October 8, 1999 Soldiers were ordered, from now on, to wear civilian clothes when off duty. This is expected to reduce the incidence of soldiers intimidating and extorting civilians.

October 18, 1999 In a growing crackdown on corruption in the now defunct dictatorship, the former head of the army and national police were arrested.

October 20, 1999 A major pipeline near the coast was broken by a bomb, probably placed by locals agitating for more of the oil wealth to be spent locally. The Movement for the Survival of the Ogoni People (MOSOP) has been leading the opposition for some years. October 23, 1999 The last Nigerian peacekeepers have left Liberia.

October 27, 1999 The government of the largely Moslem northwestern state of Zamfara have declared they will impose Sharia (Islamic law). The federal government and local non-Moslems have objected.

October 28, 1999 Nigeria has asked the US for military aid, and the US responded with a willingness to help Nigeria in light of all the peacekeeping Nigeria has done in West Africa during the last few years. Britain was also asked for help in upgrading the Nigerian police, and responded favorably.

October 30, 1999 Nigerian troops returning from peacekeeping duty abroad have been getting stern warnings to respect the constitution, democracy, and civilian government which came into being while they were out of the country.--Stephen V Cole

October 31, 1999 Ethnic fighting between Ilajes and Ijaws in Lagos have left at least five dead.

November 3, 1999 Militant Ijaw youths, insisting on a greater share of oil profits being pumped out of the Niger Delta (Ijaw territory) took captive five crew and passengers on a helicopter. The youths do things like occupy oil platforms and sabotage oil company equipment. In most cases, small bribes clear up the problems.

November 3, 1999 The government of the largely Moslem northwestern state of Zamfara insists that their imposition of Sharia law was legal and dared the central government to try and stop it. The plan is to impose Sharia in the province on January 27, 2000.

November 4, 1999 Yoruba youths, largely Moslem, have proclaimed enthusiasm for the imposition of Sharia (Moslem law) in areas where Yorubas predominate. While the north of Nigeria is largely Moslem, the south is mostly Christian and animist, with pockets of Yorubas and other Moslem peoples. Nigeria contains some 250 different ethnic groups. The Yorubas are largely in the southwest part of the country, but in the last few decades, people from many different groups have come to the Niger Delta (where the oil is) and the capital, Lagos.

November 5, 1999 Gangs of Ijaws and Yoruba youths battled in Lagos, leaving nineteen dead and over fifty buildings burned down. Increasing violence throughout the Niger Delta has led to the imposition of a curfew, but the police do not appear to be up to the task.

November 6, 1999 There are growing complaints that the fifteen years of military rule had ruined the national police as well as the army. Rampant favoritism, corruption and bad leadership have left the army and police full of incompetents and criminals. This has led to a growing crime wave.

November 8, 1999 Eight policemen were kidnapped by Ijaw gangsters. They would have been killed if not for the intervention of Ijaw tribal elders.

November 10, 1999 The government has threatened to impose martial law on the Niger Delta (where most of the oil comes from) unless the violence declines. Young Ijaw men have been openly carrying automatic weapons, hijacking boats and indulging in general mayhem.

November 12, 1999 Ethnic strife in the Niger Delta continues between Ijaws and Yorubas. One person was killed and several injured. In the last week, at least a dozen policemen have been killed trying to control the violence.

November 13, 1999 Nigeria's new civilian government is investigating charges that some of the weapons used in the continuing inter-tribal skirmishes were provided by or stolen from the Nigerian military. In an effort to end the harassment of civilians by off-duty soldiers, the new civilian government has ordered that the old "Code of Conduct" (ignored during the Junta regime) be reinstated. This includes a provision prohibiting soldiers from wearing their uniforms off-post when not on official duty.--Stephen V Cole

November 13, 1999 Ten soldiers guarding oil facilities in the Niger Delta were killed by Ijaw gangs, The Ijaw have become increasingly violent in their demands for a share of the oil wealth that is extracted from their region.

November 14, 1999 Six Shell Oil employees kidnapped in October have been released. The Ijaw young men who held the captives demanded money, jobs and other considerations. Some of these demands were apparently met.

November 15, 1999 Further unrest in the oil rich Delta area killed eighteen people, all from the Itsekiri tribe. The victims were passengers on a boat attacked by Ijaw men as part of longstanding disputes between the two tribes.

November 17, 1999 Nigeria has withdrawn its last peacekeeping forces from Liberia. The seven-year intervention cost Nigeria $8 billion and the lives of 500 soldiers.--Stephen V Cole

November 18; Further unrest in the oil rich Delta area killed more than fifty people, including four policemen. Men from the Oleh and Olomoro tribes got into a dispute over who would get some scrap metal. More than eighty houses were destroyed and thousands fled the violence.

November 18, 1999 Five thousand Moslems demonstrated outside a courthouse in northern Zamfara state, protesting a judge who struck down the provincial governors introduction of Islamic Sharia law.

November 19, 1999 As if tribal unrest weren't causing enough problems, there are also labor disputes over scarce jobs. Twenty people were killed in a battle between rival factions of a dockworkers union in Port Harcourt. Meanwhile, the death toll from the ethnic violence in the Niger river delta has risen to sixty. To make matters worse, a police station was seized by a mob, and looted of all the arms and ammunition stored there.

November 20, 1999 The Nigerian military, convinced that the country faces severe threats from within and without, is becoming increasingly restive. Military leaders have urged President Obasanjo to send troops to areas of unrest including the oil-rich delta.--Stephen V Cole

November 23, 1999 Over two thousand army and police reinforcements have arrived in the Niger delta area to protect oil facilities and put down local rebels. Some 43 deaf reported, with the locals (especially militant teenagers) resisting with automatic weapons. Most of the dead are rebels, although eight soldiers were also killed.

November 25, 1999 A disagreement over which ethnic group would control a market area in the capital turned into ethnic warfare. At least 27 bodies have been found, and many more injured. The conflict began when a hard line Yoruba organization (the OPC, or Odura Peoples Congress) sought to forcibly take control of a market are controlled by Hausas. The Yoruba are dominant in the southwest part of the country, the Moslem Hausa in the north. The capital attracts peoples from all tribes, but has generally been free of violent ethnic conflicts. The Moslems from the north tend to monopolize the nations political affairs, much to the discomfort of the mainly Christian southern tribes. The government ordered the arrest of OPC leaders and strong measures against anyone engaging in violent behavior. By the end of the day, the police were ordered to shoot on sight anyone engaging in criminal activity.

November 26, 1999 Ethnic violence continued in the capital, as Yoruba and Hausa factions mobilized their forces for what may be even larger clashes. The police have been ordered to shoot on sight anyone engaging in ethnic violence..

November 27, 1999 Police are searching for the leader of the OPC, the hard line Yoruba organization responsible for starting the Hausa-Yoruba violence that is causing bad feelings between the two largest ethnic groups in the country.

November 29, 1999 Outside observers were allowed into the Niger delta town of Odi, where troops and armed rebels clashed ten days ago. Some 300 soldiers came in after a dozen policemen were killed. The two is now nearly deserted and most buildings are destroyed. Residents say that dozens were killed and that the troops deliberately destroyed the town.

November 30, 1999 The violence in the capital has killed up to 90 people in the last week. Many Hausas are fleeing, even though the violence has decreased. All this makes the politicians, as the Hausas are the largest ethnic group in the country, and come from the Moslem north. The Moslems have long dominated politics in the country..

December 1, 1999 The government's order for police and troops to "shoot on sight" looters and rioters raised an uproar among local legislators and foreign governments. The fear is that such heavy handed tactics would further inflame the population. Nigerians, and nations with an interest in Nigeria, fear a civil war along ethnic lines.

December 2, 1999 Either people were killed and many more injured when a gang of bus drivers invaded a neighborhood to exact revenge for the killing of another bus driver. Such vigilante violence is becoming more common as the corrupt police of the former dictatorship are still on duty and not allowed to exercise unrestrained power (to keep down the corruption, but this also allows the criminals to do as they please as long as they don't do it to the police.)

December 3, 1999 Nigerian Defense Minister Lt. General Theophilus Danjuma has ordered all military commanders to send him a list of officers with active political inclinations. Those on the list will be given a fair hearing before they are discharged.--Stephen V Cole

December 6, 1999 Police arrested 21 members of the OPC (a hard line Yoruba group) and accused them of planning terrorist actions.

December 7, 1999 In the southeast, at least fifteen people were killed, many more injured and some 20,000 made homeless when two towns fought each other over fishing rights. Meanwhile, police have replaced soldiers in the devastated town of Odi.

December 11, 1999 Nigerian troops "taught a lesson" to civilians of the town of Odi in the oil-producing delta region on 20 Nov. The Army's 2nd Amphibious Brigade took over the town, expelled the residents, and burned most of it to the ground (including hundreds of individual homes). Many civilians were killed, and the Army admitted that it had done most of the damage. Odi had been the site of recent trouble; more than a dozen policemen were killed by "a criminal gang" (or perhaps a local insurgent group, the difference depending on who was writing the after-action report). The Army moved in when the town government refused to take any action against the culprits. "No village will want to go through what Odi went through" said an Army spokesman.--Stephen V Cole

December 12, 1999 The start of Ramadan in northern Nigeria has caused an increase in Moslem radicalism. Two more northern states, Kano and Sokoto, have joined Zamfara in pledging to implement Islamic Sharia law.

December 15, 1999 Fighting between different Yoruba activist factions killed one man and destroyed a clinic run by a moderate activist group.

December 20, 1999 Mobs of Moslem youths in northern Nigeria have set fire to fourteen churches.

December 23, 1999 Moslem/Christian unrest in the north led to four churches being burned and one Moslem man being killed.

December 24, 1999 Police announced that they had arrested, on the previous Monday, seven men suspected of killing the policemen at Odi.

December 31, 1999 The OPC has accused army and police commanders of conspiring against them.

January 1, 2000 Ijaw Vigilantes in the Niger delta killed six men suspected of kidnapping and attacks on oil production facilities.

January 3, 2000 In the wake of four Christian churches being burned down, a Moslem leader has declared that Christians are importing weapons for a religious.

January 4, 2000 The government denied that it was preparing for war with Cameroon over a border dispute.

January 5, 2000 Over 40 people were killed during ethnic clashes in the capital. The Yoruba OPC fought Ibos and other groups. Another ten people died in ethnic strife 140 kilometers north of the capital.

January 10, 2000 A police commander was killed, allegedly by the radical ethnic group OPC.

January 14, 2000 A fifth state, Niger, announced it will implement Moslem Sharia law.

January 16, 2000 WAR ALERT IN WEST AFRICA: The dispute between Nigeria and Cameroon over the oil-rich Bakassi Peninsula appears ready to heat up once again. France, allied to Cameroon, is building a new air base at Gargura, near the peninsula. Nigeria put its own Air Force on alert, as well as the 1st Nigerian Armored Division; they were ordered to be ready for combat operations by 1 Feb. The Bakassi Peninsula is in fact not a peninsula but a series of small islands and salt marshes extending into the Atlantic. When Germany and Britain defined the Nigerian-Cameroonian border in the 1800s, they did not define who got the Peninsula, which both countries now claim. Britain had agreed to cede the area to the German colony of Cameroon in 1913, but World War I broke out before the deal was signed. A similar 1975 agreement would have given the peninsula to Cameroon for remaining neutral in the Nigerian civil war, but this had not been ratified when the Nigerian military staged the 1975 coup and renounced the deal. --Stephen V Cole

January 18, 2000 Some 90 people have been arrested in the last 10 days in the after math of the killing of a senior police official and attacks with acid on two other policemen in the capital.

January 23, 2000 The state of Kano has passed a Sharia (Moslem legal system) law, the third Moslem majority state to do so. The federal government says these moves are illegal, but has not moved to stop the states from imposing Sharia.

January 27, 2000 The northern province of Zamfara began imposing Sharia (Moslem) law.

January 31, 2000 Tribal violence in the north killed sixteen people (included four beheaded) and some two dozen mission. The Ifeku and Anegbetter were fighting over the latters claim to "supremacy" over the former.

February 15, 2000 Several thousand Moslems held a rally in the northern city of Kaduna to endorse the imposition of Sharia (Islamic) law in Kaduna province. Sharia was imposed on neighboring Zamfara province in late 1999.

February 21, 2000 Religious riots broke out in northern Kaduna province, mainly in the capital Kaduna, where about half the population is Christian. A dawn to dusk curfew was declared, but local police appeared to lack the manpower to control the situation. Gunfire, shouting and out of control fires were present all night. Meanwhile, a second province, Niger, has adopted Sharia law. The federal government announced it planned to double the size of the national police force to 160,000 men over the next three years.

February 22, 2000 In a continuing effort to eliminate officers who were connected with the previous military regime (or incompetent officers who were promoted by that regime), the Nigerian Army will force 426 officers to retire and will promote 364 non-political officers into more senior positions. --Stephen V Cole

February 23, 2000 The imposition of Sharia (Islamic religious law) in some northern provinces has caused violence between Moslems and minority Christians in those provinces (and danger of spreading to the majority Christian south.) Although the Moslem governors up north said Sharia would only apply to Moslems, the implementation hit Christians in visible ways. Beer halls were shut down (except in cases were Christian soldiers from local garrisons were customers, the troops would menace the provincial officials and the beer kept flowing.) Segregation between men and women on public transport was enforced, without regard to whether a woman was Moslem or Christian. There has always been a degree of animosity between Moslems and Christians, and this has been made worse because the Moslems in the north are a slight majority of the population and have long controlled the central government. But the oil wealth (and much commerce and industry) is in the Christian south. The Christians see "their" wealth being stolen by the Moslem northerners. The fact that the last few decades saw mostly Moslem generals looting the national (mainly oil) wealth has done little to keep bad feelings at bay. The new reform government has been cracking down on corrupt officials, many of whom are prominent Moslems. All this is a proven recipe for religious war. The Nigerian Supreme court has yet to rule if these provincial attempts to impose Sharia are legal. Three northern provinces have so far enacted laws imposing Sharia, only two of them (Zamara and Kaduna) have began applying it.

February 24, 2000 The northern Moslem city of Kaduna was blanketed by police and troops to stop the religious violence that has so far left nearly 200 people dead and many more injured. Property damage is extensive. The unrest has gone on for most of the week. Unlike the rest of the province, which is mostly Moslem, nearly half the population of Kaduna is Christian, and many of those Christians are from southern ethnic groups. Religion and tribal affiliation are both volatile issues in Nigeria. The violence in Kaduna was started by the provincial governments attempt to impose Moslem religious law.

February 25, 2000 Violence in the north has left over 400 dead so far as Christians and Moslems battled in the streets over the adoption of Sharia law. While the fighting is dying out in the north, unrest in the south against minority Moslems there seems to be increasing.

February 26, 2000 Religious violence continues in the northern city of Kaduna. Government officials in the north threatened strong retaliation against the religious violence. Northern officials vowed not to back down on their adoption of Sharia law.

February 27, 2000 Christian religious services passed without incident in the north. But violence still simmers beneath the surface. In some Northern towns with large Christian populations, Christian militias began intimidating the local Moslems to flee.

February 28, 2000 Violence has begun to flare up in the south. Some 30 were reported dead in the southern city of Aba, as Christians went after local Moslems. In the northern city of Kaduna, police and troops have arrested some 300 people in an effort to stop the violence that has killed 400 people so far as Moslem mobs attacked local Christians. The legislature in northern Zamfara state has revoked the appointment of 40 Sharia law judges. In the northern city of Kachia, some 65 died in religious violence.

February 29, 2000 Nigeria's 110 million population is dominated by three ethnic group. The largest group are the Hausa. They are predominantly Moslem, speak a language heavily influenced by Arabic and most live in the north. For centuries the well organized and energetic Hausa have dominated much of Western and Central Africa. They dominate the government of Nigeria. The next largest group are the 30 million Yoruba, who live in the Southwest. The Yoruba are enthusiastically Christian and much in favor of technical and economic progress. Yorubas dominate the professional classes in Nigeria. The third largest group is the Ibo, who dominate in the southeast. Also largely Christian, the Ibo have long been noted as traders and entrepreneurs. Instead of the more traditional tribal system, the Ibos have long organized themselves in clans. The remaining 20 million Nigerians belong. to some 200 different ethnic groups, many of which are being slowly absorbed by the larger ones. In the south, Christian Ibos have been killing any Moslem Hausas they could find, and causing thousands of Hausas to flee for their lives. This violence was triggered by reports that Christian Ibos and Yorubas in the north were being killed by Moslems. The governors of three northern states have agreed to revoke Sharia law for the moment, because of the violence. The president has called an emergency meeting of provincial governors and other officials to discuss the spreading religious violence.

March 1, 2000 Over 300 died in the southern town of Aba, as Christians went after Moslems in retaliation for the Sharia riots against Christians in the north. Army and police units have entered Aba to restore order. The governor of the northern state of Kure has announced that he will back off on introducing Sharia law.

March 2, 2000 The president held an emergency meeting with the provincial governors over the issue of provinces switching from civil to Sharia (Moslem religious) law. The president then announced that there was a consensus that provinces should not switch to Sharia law. Kano state has agreed to withdraw it's decision to switch to Sharia. Meanwhile, the flow of northerners fleeing violence in the southeast has abated. Over 500 Moslem northerners were killed in the south in retaliation for the death of Christians in the northern provinces that have adopted Moslem Sharia law. Most of the dead were in one town; Aba.

March 3, 2000 The governors of several northern provinces that have already adopted Sharia, and seen hundreds die in religious strife as a result, have declared that they will continue using Sharia law.

March 5, 2000 More than 1000 people have been killed in ethnic, regional, and religious clashes inside Nigeria since the end of military rule. This has been fueled by several factors. With the end of the autocratic junta, many groups are out to get as much as they can under the new democratic government. Other groups are demanding redress for what they regard as years of oppression (and misuse of their regional resources) by the national government. The power has shifted from the Moslem north to the Christian south, a move that the Moslems in the north oppose. Moslem factions are increasingly demanding that Islamic Sharia law be imposed in their provinces (which would block an infusion by Christian businessmen) and eventually extended to the Christian south (which would probably trigger another civil war).--Stephen V Cole

March 7, 2000 Religious violence continued in the north, with churches and homes being burned, and at least three more people dead. In the southwest, hundreds flee the violence that has killed at least thirty more people in the last few days.

March 8, 2000 Hundreds of Christians are fleeing Kano, fearing more religious violence. Governors of northern provinces that imposed Sharia law now say they will not back down, but are willing to compromise.

March 9, 2000 Despite a curfew and heavy police presence, nine more died in religious violence in the southwest.

March 11, 2000 Some 33 policeman were arrested for taking part in the looting, instead of halting it, in Kaduna during the recent unrest there.

March 14, 2000 Large gangs of young men in the southeastern oil region are increasing their hostage taking. Basically, the oil governments keep the peace by passing out money, jobs and other favors to the locals. But there are more people wanting attention than the oil companies can take care of. Thus groups who feel they have been left out, take matters into their own hands. The government gets involved if the oil company cannot cut a deal (as in cases where the demands are for things the oil companies cannot deliver, like government reforms.)

March 17, 2000 In the southwest, Yoruba factions fighting over land ownership and political disputes have left at least six dozen people dead. There are two different disputes like this going on in the southwest, one near Port Harcourt, and another 230 kilometers southwest of the capital. Altogether, over a hundred have died in these two disputes, which are similar (fights over real estate and political differences.)

March 20, 2000 In the northern city of Kaduna, police killed two people overnight while enforcing the curfew. In the southwest, Yoruba factions fighting over land ownership and political disputes have left more than two dozen people dead.

March 21, 2000 Politicians in the southwest have called for consideration of a confederation form of government in Nigeria. This would allow for more differences in how the various states govern themselves, and a much weaker central government. Some see this as a prelude to the breakup of Nigeria. Meanwhile, in the northern city of Kaduna, police killed four people overnight while enforcing the curfew.

March 24, 2000 A ceasefire has been arranged in the southwest between Yoruba factions fighting over land ownership and political disputes. Some 80 people have died in the last three weeks because of these disputes. Meanwhile, Zamfara state has continued to apply Sharia law, including amputating the hand of a thief, despite calls from the central government not to. Non-Moslems have urged the president to take the issue to the Supreme Court to get a final decision. That is a gamble, as it could go either way and there is no appeal from the Supreme Court.

March 25, 2000 The president accused five governors of eastern states of treason for advocating a confederation form of government. The eastern governors are looking for some way to deal with problems like some northern provinces wanting Sharia law despite pressure from the central government not to.

March 28, 2000 Religious violence in Damboa resulted in four churches and two mosques being burned down. Several other structures were burned and there were some injuries.

March 29, 2000 Religious strife in the northeastern town of Damboa left at least fifteen dead. The violence began over a land use dispute. Christians bought land near a Mosque and announced they would build a church there.

March 30, 2000 Religious strife in the northeastern town of Damboa left at least 20 dead. Thousands of refugees fled the area.

April 3, 2000 Two gangs battling for control of markets in the southeast have left ten dead in their wake.

April 4, 2000 The governors of the 19 mainly Moslem states in the north have agreed to suspend plans to impose Sharia law and to do more to maintain peace between their Moslem and Christian residents.

April 5, 2000 Fighting between two towns in the southwest has left seven dead. Many more were injured.

April 7, 2000 Over three days, fighting between two towns in the southwest has left eleven dead. Dozens more were injured.

April 11, 2000 Police attacked a neighborhood in Ogoni state, killing ten and destroying 80 homes. In Edo state, police intervened in an ethnic battle and killed five.

April 12, 2000 After several deaths because of ethnic fighting in Ogoni state, police arrested the leader of MOSOP, an ethnic rights group.

April 13, 2000 The governor of Moslem majority North Kano state announced that Sharia law would be introduced in the area. In the southwest, ethnic strife left another seven dead in Osun state.

April 14, 2000 Ijaw rebels kidnapped 19 oil workers in the southeast. The rebels are demanding jobs and money.

April 15, 2000 Two feuding ethnic groups (the Ife and Modakeke) in the southwest agreed to a truce, after over a hundred had been killed.

April 17, 2000 Protests in Nassarawa state against a government reorganization left fifteen dead, including two policemen.

April 18, 2000 Despite the installation of a civilian government in Nigeria, the US will not consider a military defense pact with that nation.--Stephen V Cole

April 22, 2000 The US has agreed to a three-part $10 million aid package for the Nigerian military. The first part will pay for the creation of a civilian secretary of defense. The second part will pay to refit the Nigerian Air Force's C-130s and provide new technical manuals for them. The third part will provide training equipment to set up a combat simulation center.--Stephen V Cole

April 27, 2000 Religious strife in the southwest left three churches burned down by Moslems.

April 30, 2000 Nigeria offered peacekeeping troops for use in the Congo.

May 3, 2000 Nigerian is sending diplomats to Sierra Leone to talk to the head of the RUF rebels after Nigerian peacekeepers were taken prisoner by the rebels.

May 5, 2000 Nigeria and Chad have agreed to improve security on their border after several incidents of Chadian gangs raiding Nigerian towns near the border. Fighting in the southwest towns of Modakeke and Ife left 25 dead and over 50 injured.

May 6, 2000 Feuding between Yorubas in the southwest towns of Modakeke and Ife left a clergyman dead and a policeman wounded. The dispute is over land rights.

May 11, 2000 Another four people have died in fighting in the southeastern Nembe region, where there has been several weeks of unrest over who shall control the local government.

May 16, 2000 Calls for Nigeria to send troops to Sierra Leone led to Nigerian leaders demanding that a Nigerian be given command of the UN troops in Sierra Leone and that Western nations pay for the effort. Nigerian troops in Sierra Leone have threatened to open fire on British paratroopers. The Nigerians resent how the British came in and seemingly took over.

May 17, 2000 A Christian church was burned down by Moslems in the northern town of Kaduna. There were no injuries.

May 19, 2000 Conflicts between farmers and herders in the southwest left a dozen people dead.

May 20, 2000 Ibo leaders and governors of southeastern provinces with majority Ibo populations have all condemned calls for the establishment of a Ibo state. Thirty years ago, Ibos fought a bloody civil war to establish the Ibo state of Biafra. The effort failed and there appears to be little enthusiasm for another try.

May 21, 2000 In a clash over borders, people from two southeastern states (Akwa Ibom and Cross River) battled for several days, leaving nearly a hundred dead and many more injured.

May 22, 2000 Fighting has broken out between Christians and Moslems in the northern city of Kaduna There have been several dead and many more injured. In the southeast, demonstrations in favor of establishing an independent state of Biafra have broken out.

May 23, 2000 Two days of fighting between Christians and Moslems in the northern city of Kaduna left dozens dead and many more injured. A curfew has been imposed and thousands of additional troops and police have been sent in. In the southeast, demonstrations in favor of establishing an independent state of Biafra left two dead and many injured.

May 24, 2000 Some 150 have died in religious violence in northern city of Kaduna over the last few days. The police are seeking to arrest a local emir (of Zazzau, a Moslem traditional leader) for instigating the strife to show his power and displeasure for a government attempt to diminish his power.

May 30, 2000 A real estate dispute in the southwest state of Edo continued, leaving ten dead and dozens injured in recent fighting.

June 3, 2000 The government raised fuel prices 50 percent on June 1st and the trade unions immediately took advantage of the popular unrest by calling for a national strike.

June 5, 2000 Some 2,000 Ibo rioted in protest over the removal of an Ibo as the head of the Senate. This political dispute shows how such issues can quickly generate widespread ethnic conflict.

June 7, 2000 Fighting over political power in the southwest town of Owo continues, leaving at least 25 dead in the last week. Inrest over fule price increases has left at least three dead and dozens injured.

June 8, 2000 A popular strike against fuel price increases has entered its fourth day and paralyzed the country.

June 9, 2000 Unrest over fuel price increases have led to the arrest of sixteen suspected looters.

June 12, 2000 Riots and unrest continued over increased fuel prices. Several deaths and many injuries were reported. The government has apologized for the way they went about the price increases.

June 13, 2000 Labor unions called off the strike (protesting increased fuel prices.) The government promised to convene a broad based committee to review the new fuel prices. Riots during the strike left at least half a dozen dead and dozens injured.

June 19, 2000 Kidnappers freed 29 oil company workers (27 Nigerians and two foreigners) they had seized three days earlier. No mention was made of the reason for their release, but in the past the oil companies have paid ransom of some sort in these situations.

June 21, 2000 Hundreds of thousands assembled and cheered as Sharia law was implemented in the northern state of Kano. This is the most populous state in Nigeria, and the federal government has come out against Sharia law. The northern states have long been considered quite different from those in southern Nigeria. In the early 19th century there was an Islamic revival, and revolution, in what is now northern Nigeria.

Even when the British conquered the area later in the century, the northern areas were allowed to retain many Sharia elements in their law. The northerners have not forgotten their history.

June 27, 2000 Civil war is brewing as leaders in six central Nigerian states advocate breaking links with northern states that adopt Sharia law. In Abia state, political violence continued as mobs rioted and looted.

July 4, 2000 Factional fighting in the southwest town of Owo left seven dead and over 40 wounded. The violence was caused by a dispute over which chief will preside over the local Yam festival.

July 6, 2000 The southwest town of Owo has been placed under curfew to curb the violence over which chief will preside over the local Yam festival. At least twenty people have died in the violence so far.

July 10, 2000 Police searching for illegal arms in the volatile delta region, were ambushed by armed locals. Three police were killed and five injured. Some 27 civilians and rebels were killed. Most of the unrest is over disputes on who gets payments extorted from oil companies to keep the locals from attacking oil facilities and staff. In the southwest town of Owo, 31 people were arrested for possessing illegal arms. The area has seen much violence as different factions battle over which tribal chief will preside over the annual Yam festival.

July 11, 2000 Leaders of the southern, largely non-Moslem, states have publicly denounced the adoption of Sharia (Islamic) law in the north. This could be the start of a civil war.

July 12, 2000 Outside Warri, in the delta region, over a hundred local men ambushed the police. In the ensuing battle, 25 civilians died, along with five policemen. The locals are upset over money, donated by oil companies for local development. being stolen by officials.

July 17, 2000 Several incidents between vigilantes and criminals in the capital left thirty dead, including several policemen who tried to interfere. The rising crime rate led to the growth of vigilante action. But now many of the vigilantes are getting organized, often to take on criminal gangs. The organized vigilantes are increasingly getting into turf battles with the police. There is also fear that the organized vigilantes will become political groups, armed political groups.

July 18, 2000 The police have ordered a crackdown on vigilante groups, before such organizations become too powerful to control.

July 21, 2000 Three are dead and dozens injured as police battled students protesting a teachers strike in the southwest.

July 22, 2000 There is an increase in tensions between Christians and Moslems in northern states imposing Islamic law. Governors of southern (largely Christian states) are protesting and calling for federal intervention to protect the rights of Christians in the north.

July 24, 2000 Fighting between police and a Yoruba vigilante groups (OPC, Odua People's Congress.) has left some 30 dead in the past week.

July 27, 2000 One of the larger, and better organized vigilante groups in the lawless southeast, "the Bakassi Boys", have incurred the wrath of the police for being too aggressive. The police have been ordered to crack down, especially in cases where the vigilantes refuse to turn their prisoners over to the police, or simply kill the suspects on the spot (usually in some gruesome fashion). That won't be easy. There are three large vigilante organizations operating in Nigeria, all more or less tolerated by the police. In the delta, there is the Egbesu Boys and in the southwest is OPC (Odua People's Congress), which has gotten into trouble of late for it's political activities. There is reasonable fear that these thousands or organized vigilantes may form the nucleus of local armies.

July 31, 2000 Over a hundred armed locals, using motorboats, boarded two oil rigs in the southeast. and took hostage 165 workers (including seven Americans and 13 other foreigners.) The locals demanded jobs with the local oil companies. Disputes over who is to get jobs frequently leads to this kind of violence.

August 1, 2000 In the north, a fifth state (Katsina) has announced it will introduce Sharia (Islamic) law.

August 2, 2000 The armed locals holding 165 men on oil rigs agreed to release their hostages in return for jobs with the local oil companies. In the north, a sixth state (Jigawa) has announced it will introduce Sharia (Islamic) law. This further divides the Moslem north and Christian south. Civil war or dissolution becomes ever more likely.

August 3, 2000 Armed locals, holding hostages on oil rigs, backed off on their promise to release their prisoners. The two oil rigs are in the southeast.

August 4, 2000 Armed locals, holding hostages on oil rigs, finally vacated the rigs, this releasing their prisoners.

August 8, 2000 Some 40 US soldiers have been in Nigeria since late July, determining what would be needed to train Nigerian troops for peacekeeping duties. A seventh state, Yobi, has declared it will impose Islamic law (starting October 1st.)

August 9, 2000 The US has agreed to send 200 military personnel to train (and equip) five battalions (about 4,000 men(of Nigerian troops for peacekeeping duties.

August 15, 2000 Nigeria will help Benin develop its armed forces so that they can participate more fully in joint regional activities. The Nigerians are getting tired of carrying all of the load for regional security and peacekeeping and are trying to bring other regional armies to a point they can shoulder some of the burden.--Stephen V Cole

August 17, 2000 The government revealed that fifty soldiers wounded in Liberian and Sierra Leone peacekeeping operations are receiving medical care in Egypt. In the northeast, an eighth state (Borno) has announced it will introduce Sharia (Islamic) law. Three other northern states (Bauchi, Gombe and Kebbi) are considering such a move.

August 19, 2000 In the capital, OPC vigilantes tracked down and killed four robbery suspects. The police have been unable, so far, to reign in the vigilantes throughout the country.

August 23, 2000 The US has agreed to train seven battalions of West African troops so that they can take over the mission in Sierra Leone. Nigeria is providing the first two battalions and will eventually provide five of the seven. Nigeria has demanded that the UN appoint a Nigerian general to command the peacekeeping troops in Sierra Leone and change their mission from peacekeeping to peace enforcement (which would allow the UN troops to hunt down the RUF guerrillas).--Stephen V Cole

August 29, 2000 The visit by US president Clinton, and the government effort to put the best face forward for the event, have caused a period of calm in the nation. The only major protests were in the north as Moslems demonstrated against the possibility of American resistance to the introduction of Sharia law. While the US is against anything that might drag Nigeria into civil war, it does recognize that the desire for Sharia law is largely driven by a desire to eliminate corruption. While much attention is paid to the religious aspects of Sharia law, for most Moslem Nigerians, Sharia provides a formidable weapon against the most common forms of government corruption and common crime.

September 3, 2000 Some 10,000 Christians in majority Christian towns of Gombe state rioted against the approaching introduction of Sharia law. The rioters, mostly young men, were members of the minority Tangale tribe. Similar, but smaller, demonstrations have taken place in other northern states ready to impose Sharia law.

September 7, 2000 Fighting between Christians and Moslems in northern Gombe state left at least ten dead and many more injured. The police arrested at least six people and restored peace.

September 8, 2000 A report by the the commander of UN troops in Sierra Leone charges that over the years that Nigerian generals ran peacekeeping operations in the country, the generals became increasingly corrupt, even doing business with the RUF rebels. Back in Nigeria there was indignation from army officers, and demands that the Indian general commanding UN forces in Sierra Leone be dismissed. The corruption of Nigerian officers and troops in peacekeeping operations had long been noted. Despite years of peacekeeping by Nigerian troops, peace never seemed to arrive. The UN report accuses the Nigerians of wanting the violence to continue so that they can continue to cash in on it.

September 13, 2000 Several hundred police moved into the university campus at Kano (in the north) to prevent more violence between Christian and Moslem students. Meanwhile, an international survey ranked Nigeria the most corrupt nation on the planet.

September 19, 2000 A recent international survey ranked Nigeria as the most corrupt nation on the planet. Most Nigerians accepted this, especially in light of recent scandals. Like mass expulsions of college students for cheating and a recent increase in the number of government workers, most of whom turned out to be "ghost workers" (people who didn't exist, but whose salaries were pocketed by their bosses.) The pervasive corruption is feeding the unrest in the nation. For example, one reason the northern states are so eager to embrace Sharia law is because the Islamic law is particularly harsh in dealing with corrupt practices.

September 24, 2000 Northern states that have adopted Sharia law have begun applying it, with thieves suffering amputation and lesser violators being flogged.

September 25, 2000 A team of American advisors have arrived to assist in reforming the armed forces and insuring that the troops remain under civilian control.

September 29, 2000 In the delta, locals kidnapped 12 oil workers for ransom (or, reparations for a 1989 oil spill, take your pick.) The oil workers were released after a few hours when the company agreed to discuss the issue. The government has formed an anti-corruption commission, as part of it's pledge to reduce rampant corruption. The commission has considerable police powers.

October 3, 2000 A land dispute in the southwest turned violent, leaving five dead and several more people wounded.

October 5, 2000 An investigation discovered that government financial records for the last twenty years were in such disarray that they could not be audited. This was largely a result of the rampant corruption. A recent global survey found Nigeria to be the most corrupt nation on the planet.

October 10, 2000 Leaders from 17 southern states met to draw up a list of political demands in the face of increasing independence of northern, mainly Moslem, states. The meeting was also prompted by the corruption and poor political performance of the nation as a whole.

October 12, 2000 The first of 200 US Special Forces have arrived in Nigeria to train five battalions of the Nigerian Army for peacekeeping duties in Sierra Leone. The US is providing rifles, mortars, machineguns, vehicles, ammunition, and radios. The US is also chipping in a $10 million program to reform the Nigerian Army's command and training systems.-- Stephen V Cole

October 15, 2000 In the southern city of Lagos, fighting broke out at night between Yoruba and Hausa. It appears that the attacks were organized by the Yoruba OPC. Only a few deaths have been reported, but the violence appears to be rapidly escalating. The 30 million (largely Christian) Yoruba and 40 million (largely Moslem) Hausa are the two largest ethnic groups in Nigeria. The Yoruba's are mainly in the south, the Hausa in the north. The current dispute began over a long simmering dispute. In central Nigeria, the Yoruba town of Ilorin has since a Hausa-Yoruba war in 1845, been ruled by a Hausa Emir. The prospect of having to live under Sharia law has inflamed the Yoruba and hundreds have died in such religious conflicts over the last year.

October 16, 2000 Ethnic fighting between Yoruba and Hausa continued in Lagos, with the death toll now over 40. The Hausa are getting the worst of it.

October 17, 2000 Troops have been deployed in Lagos to keep control, and this has reduced the violence quite a bit. In Ilorin, police arrested 18 suspected members of the OPC for possessing illegal weapons. The fighting in Lagos has killed nearly eighty so far.

October 18, 2000 The government has banned OPC (a Christian Yoruba group), as that organization has been held responsible for the recent violence. Some 20,000 Hausas have fled the violence.

October 19, 2000 The leaders of the OPC (a Christian Yoruba group) have been arrested, as that organization has been held responsible for the recent violence. About a hundred were killed, most of them Moslem Hausas from the north. Altogether, 204 people have been arrested for participating in the violence. US Army instructors have begun training Nigerian troops. Although Nigeria has a large army it is generally considered undisciplined, poorly trained, badly led and corrupt.

October 20, 2000 The leaders of the OPC have been charged with murder, weapons possession and arson. The ethnic attacks the OPC lead have largely stopped since the OPC leadership was arrested.

October 22, 2000 Cameroonian paramilitary police attacked Nigerian villages in a disputed border zone. Casualties were not reported, but there has been periodic violence in the area since 1994. The disputed area contains oil deposits.

October 25, 2000 In the southwest, police arrested thirty members of the Yoruba militant group OPC. Because of the OPCs role in recent violence, the government is cracking down on it hard.

October 28, 2000 The governor of the northern state of Yobe announced that the Sharia law alcohol ban was absolute and applied to soldiers in their barracks. This could be what triggers a civil war. The federal troops in northern garrisons are often Christians from the south. These troops don't care to much for Sharia law and, of course, the soldiers are armed. The governor has not said when he will start enforcing the alcohol ban on the soldiers.

October 29, 2000 In southern Edo state, police attempts to close a university campus resulted in four dead students, and 24 others injured.

November 1, 2000 Niger announced that thirteen of their citizens were killed in the mid-October ethnic violence in the Nigerian capital. In the northern state of Zamfara, an armed militia of 2000 men has been formed to enforce Sharia law.

November 7, 2000 Increased unrest in the southern oil fields has caused the oil companies to reduce production. The chief cause of the unrest has been violent attempts by local young men to extort money or jobs from the oil companies.

November 8, 2000 In Lagos, several hundred students demonstrating against corrupt politicians were dispersed by police using tear gas.

November 9, 2000 In Rivers state, an eight week strike by doctors over pay has led to the death of some 2,500 people, mostly mother with childbirth complications and victims of accidents.

November 10, 2000 Sharia law in northern Nigeria is having some positive effects, with arrests for corruption up, and corruption in general down.

November 17, 2000 The leader of the OPC, arrested for complicity in the deaths of over a hundred people in ethnic violence during October, had charges dismissed for lack of evidence.

November 21, 2000 Violence over the price of liquor licenses in Niger state left nine dead. Niger state has implemented Sharia law, which outlaws sale of alcoholic drinks to Moslems. But non-Moslems can buy booze from shops that have a state license. Some non-Moslem groups are very opposed to paying $1650 for a license and this led to communal violence.

November 22, 2000 Just as 200 US Army Green Berets began teaching peacekeeping to the Nigerian Army, special troops loyal to Chief of Staff Victor Malu showed up, ordered them to stop, and began checking the records of the Nigerian troops for past human rights abuses. General Malu opposes the program for US troops to teach his troops peacekeeping, despite the fact that Nigerian President Olusegum Obasanjo started the program and requested US troops to teach it.--Stephen V Cole

November 24, 2000 Nigerian President Obasanjo has approved the use of military personnel as police in crime-ridden Lagos, the country's commercial capital. The military was banned from police duty after the civilian government took over from the military regime in May 1999, but the crime rate has risen steadily and the country's ability to conduct international business has been imperiled.--Stephen V Cole

November 28, 2000 Vandalism and growing theft are crippling the country's electricity system. Transmission facilities and power stations are ransacked for metal and components to be sold. This is happening faster than repairs can be made. This is another aspect of the lawlessness and corruption that has long plagued the country.

December 2, 2000 Troops and police raided a town in the southeast looking for Ralph Uwazurike, the leader of a Biafran separatist organization (MASSOB). Several people were killed during the search, as the troops appeared angry that they had not found their man.

December 3, 2000 The Nigerian Air Force has asked the government for $24 million to refurbish its combat air wing. The MiG-21 Fishbed-Js are obsolescent and need new radars, avionics, and weapons. The Alphajet light attack planes are grounded due to a lack of spare parts. The US recently provided $4 million to get a dozen Alphajets and six C-130H transports back into operation. The Nigerian Air Force complains that the various military governments over the last 15 years have neglected the need to keep the Air Force up to date. The Nigerian Air Force has just received two Mi-35P attack helicopters from Russia and 16 L39Z Albatross combat-capable trainers from the Czech Republic, and has found the funding to reactivate twenty modified T18 Air Beetle trainers.--Stephen V Cole

December 7, 2000 A investigation of violence by the military dictatorship during the 1990s revealed that anti-terrorist police received training in North Korea and from Israeli experts.

December 8, 2000 In the semi-desert northeast Borno region, 5,000 people demonstrated and threatened to secede and join neighboring Cameroon. The locals are upset that they never get any aid or assistance from the central government.

December 12, 2000 A close friend and minister in the government of the late dictator Sani Abacha says he murdered his former boss. The former minister, Jerry Useni, was party to several plots against his boss. The first two failed, but they finally got Abacha with a poisoned apple delivered by two prostitutes. Abacha was buried the day he died and an autopsy was never performed. He was thought to have died of a heart attack. Abacha, an extremely corrupt dictator even by African standards. was unpopular with many of his henchmen.

December 16, 2000 The first infantry battalion trained by US instructors completed it's training.

December 18, 2000 The many towns and cities that suffered ethnic and religious violence in the past year are quiet only because of the presence of troops and additional police. The animosities that killed some 3,000 people are still there, ready to break out again.

December 23, 2000 Nigeria hosted a training exercise for peacekeepers in late October. The exercise was sponsored by the British and French. About 80 senior officers and officials from several nations participated in what was more a seminar than an exercise.--Stephen V Cole

December 24, 2000 Christmas this year brings the annual fuel shortages, increase in crime and more aggressive extortion by police and government officials. Moreover, after over a year of democratic government, the average Nigerian is worse off economically.

December 30, 2000 Twenty-five soldiers who served in peacekeeping duty (with ECOMOG in Liberia and Sierra Leone) and protested neglect and non-payment of their foreign allowance, were sentenced to life imprisonment for mutiny.

January 4, 2001 Throughout the north, states that have adopted Sharia law are enforcing it vigorously. Whippings are being given out liberally for a variety of offenses, from use of alcohol to fornication. Women are being warned to cover up, or be punished. Bars and brothels are being closed down. Most worrisome is the application of Sharia law to Christians living in the north, which could lead to more violence against Moslems living in the predominately Christian south.

January 9, 2001 The governors and senior officials of the 17 southern, mostly Christian, states have met several times to discuss matters of mutual interest. The main issue at the moment is the 19 northern, mainly Moslem, northern states adoption of Islamic Sharia law, and how they are applying it to Christians as well as Moslems. The southern governors also discuss how oil money is allocated and separatist tendencies. Meanwhile, communal violence over aid from local oil companies had led to twenty kidnappings. More of these disputes are led by young men with automatic weapons.

January 10, 2001 Three more have died in the range war between farmers and herders in the north. Also in the north, mobs of Moslem youths have burned down taverns and Christian churches. They did this when they saw a solar eclipse and went out of control.

January 14, 2001 The 17 Christian southern states have given the government three weeks to allocate more money to them or face legal action.

January 19, 2001 The third largest ethnic group in the country, the Igbo, fought a bloody civil war in 1967-70 to establish their own state of Biafra. Since then, the Igbo have largely been excluded from high government positions. The Igbo still hold separatist ideas and have recently held a meeting of Igbo leaders to decide on how to work with the government for unity, or separatism.

January 23, 2001 The governors of the 19 northern Moslem states have demanded stronger measures against organizations in the south that have been behind the killings of northerners living in the south. More than a hundred northerners have died in such incidents.

February 2, 2001 President Olusegun Obasanjo has refused to discuss the calls for regional autonomy. The southern Christian states are particularly upset at how the president has allowed the Moslem northern states to impose Sharia religious law. This form of autonomy has been ignored by the federal government and the Christian states want the federal government to either protect Christians in the north, or grant the southern states some measure of autonomy.

February 6, 2001 Political violence within political parties is becoming more serious. A dispute by rival factions of the ruling People's Democratic Party in Delta state turned violent and left six dead and many more wounded. The factions have been arming for some time, and the young men are particularly difficult to control.

February 8, 2001 American instructors training Nigerian troops for peacekeeping duties noted that the troops were not very well trained, equipped or disciplined to begin with. But the troops took well to the professional training they received, as well as the new equipment that was handed out. Nigerian peacekeeping troops took hundreds of casualties in the 1990s while on peacekeeping operations in West African nations. Often, the Nigerian peacekeepers were the only thing preventing situations from coming completely apart. But training and discipline varied greatly from unit to unit. In some cases, the Nigerian troops were little better than the bandits they were fighting. Some officers were more professional than others. Over decades of military dictatorship, many officers owed their rank more to political loyalty than professional skill. It remains to be seen if the new elected government of Nigeria can clean the political hacks out the officer ranks.

February 16, 2001 The government announced that it had spent $11 billion during the 1990s on peacekeeping in Liberia. Some 500 Nigerian troops were also killed during those operations. Nigeria's generosity in the peacekeeping area was largely an attempt by the military dictatorship to distract international pressure on them to allow elections and halt the brutal oppression at home. The current elected government is still willing to take place in peacekeeping operations, but without such generous budgets. Efforts to deploy 1,700 peacekeepers to the Guinea and Sierra Leone border are hampered by logistical problems and lack of funding.

February 17, 2001 The president presided over a forum on how to deal with increasing communal violence. Government ministers, state governors attended, as well as tribal, religious and student leaders. After the meeting, the president noted that the discussions noted the role of politicians, businessmen and former soldiers might have played a role in formenting the violence.

February 19, 2001 Nigeria has announced that the plan announced last year (to cut the Army by 30%) "was a mistake" and the Army will remain at its present strength.--Stephen V Cole

February 25, 2001 The government of northern Kano state has apologized for the actions of Moslem vigilantes. The "volunteers" were to help the police enforce Sharia law, but have gone beyond that. They destroyed a truck carrying beer to an army garrison and beat up foreign journalists drinking at a press center. In both cases the alcohol was legal.

February 28, 2001 Over 500 young men seized a pumping station in the delta, demanding jobs and money.

March 2, 2001 The Nigerian Army's 195th Motorized Infantry Battalion has completed a 10-week course in peacekeeping taught by the US Army and will be sent to Sierra Leone.--Stephen V Cole

March 6, 2001 The leader of a major vigilante group, the Bakassi Boys, was arrested as a suspect in the murder of a politician. The federal government has banned the vigilante groups, but the leaders of three southern states have put the local vigilantes on the payroll. The states are not allowed to have their own police. The only police are the federal police and they are very corrupt and ineffective. The result has been increasing lawlessness, as criminals know the police are more interested in bribes than public order. The northern states introduced Sharia Law, and religious vigilantes, to stem the crime rate. The Bakassi Boys, operating in Anambra state, have been among the more successful vigilantes. But as every Nigerian knows, if you go after criminals, you're going to catch a lot of politicians.

March 11, 2001 An example of how economics and corruption are intertwined can be seen in the way the gasoline market operates. The former dictator allowed local refineries to run down, thus creating the need to import refined petroleum products into a nation that was a major producer of oil. It was more lucrative to rig these import deals than to steal from local refineries. Because Nigeria is a major oil producer, people expect to pay little for fuel. Currently, gasoline sells for about 75 cents a gallon. But people in neighboring nations pay some two dollars a gallon, so there is a huge smuggling operation. This creates shortages for Nigerians and costs the government over a billion dollars a year to subsidize the low price. Raising the price would eliminate the smuggling, corruption and shortages. But this is a volatile proposal, if only because the many people (including politicians) involved in smuggling are making a lot of noise about the price increases. Keeping the prices low insures that the corruption continues, raising the prices means more unrest.

March 13, 2001 Students in the city of Enugu demonstrated to protest a rise in tuition. Locals claim the police killed five and wounded over fifty while breaking up the demonstration. Following the violence, students rioted. The police deny any casualties.

March 19, 2001 In the northeast, violence between Fulani nomads and Hausa farmers continued, leaving nine dead, fifteen wounded and many houses burned.

March 21, 2001 Government attempts to verify who was on the payroll of the police and army has resulted in over 20,000 police and soldiers from being paid for the last two months. Police and army and police units often pad their staffs with phantom members. The commanders get money for these missing people, and pocket it.

March 24, 2001 The growing lawlessness takes many forms. In the southwest city of Ibadan, fifteen people were killed by a mob that suspected them of children for black magic rites. Although most Nigerians are Christians or Moslems, there is still widespread belief in magic. It is believed that the most powerful magic can be conjured up with the ritual sacrifice of children. The police are reluctant to get in the middle of vigilante violence directed at suspected practitioners.

March 28, 2001 The governors of the 17 southern Christian states have launched a lawsuit to gain control over the oil revenues obtained from wells located in the south. Most of the oil revenue comes from fields in the south and the federal government controls the income. Much of the money has been lost to corruption. Some 95 percent of Nigeria's export earnings come from oil. The government has offered the southern states 13 percent of the revenue. The Islamic states in the north have always gotten a share of the money, often an excessive share as many of the national leaders for the past four decades have been northerners.

March 30, 2001 The army has ordered the withdrawal of soldiers assigned as aides for retired generals and colonels. The army says this practice was not supposed to have happened in the first place.

April 2, 2001 In the northern city of Kano, battles between rival political groups left at least twenty dead.

April 4, 2001 Hundreds of Moslem fundamentalists in the north demonstrated for more power (to enforce Sharia law) and financial incentives to do so. The group vowed to fight to the death to achieve strict adherence to Sharia law. In the south, tribal violence left two dead in the Delta region.

April 5, 2001 One of the nine Russian built trainer aircraft delivered in the last week has crashed on takeoff.

April 7, 2001 Conflict between the Tiv and Kwala tribes in central Nigeria have left over fifty dead in the last three days. At least 40 houses were burned down.

April 10, 2001 The 19 northern, largely Moslem, states have responded to the southern state's lawsuit asking for a larger share of oil revenues. The northern states want control over mining operations in the north. In the south, a mob lynched eight members of a religious group. The victims were accused of practicing witchcraft.

April 11, 2001 Ethnic violence broke out in three cities over the last few days, leaving at least 25 dead and many more wounded. Most of the violence was against foreigners from Chad and Niger. Locals resent the foreigners talking scarce jobs.

April 17, 2001 In response to popular enthusiasm for enforcement of Sharia law, the deputy governor of Kano state led a number of raids on suspected brothels in the state capital.

April 18, 2001 Tribal violence between the Bogghom and Taroh in Plateau state left 5-10 people dead and much property destroyed.

April 24, 2001 In the aftermath of what is apparently a policy dispute, the president has replaced the commanders of the army, navy and air force. The former (now retired) commanders had served under the earlier military dictators and opposed reform in the military.

April 28, 2001 Russia and Nigeria have signed a four-year agreement concerning "military technology cooperation" in the upgrading and replacement of Russian-built weapons.--Stephen V Cole

May 4, 2001 In the south east, violence between the national police and vigilantes supported by the local governor has left twelve policemen injured. Eight members of the vigilante group, the Bakassi Boys, were arrested. The vigilantes were under police pressure because of recent political murders. Apparently the politicians backing the vigilantes were using the Bakassi boys to settle political scores.

May 5, 2001 Religious tensions continue to grow in the north as local governments increase their enforcement of Sharia laws. Thieves are having their hands amputated, women are warned to not wear short skirts or slacks and people are arrested for drinking or selling alcohol. While many of the Sharia laws are not supposed to be applied to Christians, this exemption is not generally observed. This angers the Christian minority in the north, and the Christian majority in the south. More major outbreaks of violence over Sharia enforcement are expected.

May 9, 2001 Disorder in the delta oil region continues to make oil production a risky proposition. Hardly a week goes by without oil workers being threatened, attacked or taken hostage. The oil companies have traditionally tried to keep the peace by making payoffs in cash and low level jobs. Increasingly, these payoffs are less effective. Meanwhile, the United States is attaching strings to offers of aid. America wants to extradite 26 Nigerians for drug dealing. These people are the big guys, and Nigeria has a problem as some of the drug lords the US wants are big shots in Nigeria (including some members of parliament.)

May 10, 2001 Disorder in the delta oil region finally stopped operations of a shipping terminal. Protesters broke into the Exxon Mobil terminal and halted shipment of 500,000 barrels a day. Shipments resumed after a day, but not before prices went up on world markets. The terminal generates sales of over $4 billion a year. The protesters were seeking jobs, more economic aid for the communities in the region. For decades, oil operations in the region have caused pollution and little economic benefit for the locals. Since the end of the dictatorship, locals have been more demonstrative in obtaining some benefits from all the oil operations. Little of the oil money has reached average Nigerians, most of it being stolen by government officials.

May 19, 2001 In the past 30 years, Nigeria has earned $280 billion in oil revenue. But in the last 25 years, income for average Nigerians has fallen 40 percent. In addition, corrupt governments have piled up some $30 billion in foreign debt (which Nigerians are demanding be forgiven.) The basic problem in Nigeria is corruption at all levels of government. Nearly everyone either takes bribes, or is open to such offers. There is little trust in government institutions, and even vigilante organizations formed to deal with out of control crime, soon becomes corrupt.

May 22, 2001 In northern Gombe state, 25 were injured as Moslems attacked a group of Christians protesting Sharia law. A church and several other buildings were burned as well.

May 28, 2001 Hundreds of police and soldiers have moved into Warri (in the Delta oil region) to calm things down after three battles between three tribes. Violence over the weekend has left several people wounded and much property damage.

May 29, 2001 There was some outrage, and some congratulations, after it became known that the government sponsored vigilante group the Bakassi Boys had executed (with machetes and iron rods), 36 suspected armed robbers. The suspects had been rounded up over the last few weeks and were killed earlier this week.

June 6, 2001 The introduction of Sharia law in the north, and the application of punishments (amputating the hands of thieves) had caused many criminals to form gangs and move to the border areas of Niger and Chad. As gangs, they are better able to fight off police attacks. The gangs can also engage in raids on larger communities, as well as stealing cattle and other livestock. Nigeria and Niger have agreed to send more police and troops to the border area to seek out and destroy the bandit gangs.

June 7, 2001 Another example of the effects of years of government corruption occurred when a power transmission tower collapsed and cut off power to 13 of Nigeria's 36 states for up to two weeks. Several decades of corruption have left the national infrastructure in ruins and a climate of criminal behavior widespread and somewhat tolerated. Because of the tribal and religious differences, and the mistrust these differences breed, building a national consensus for reform is difficult. Regional (people of the same tribe and religion) reform movements are more readily moving ahead, and contributing to the possibility of another civil war.

June 12, 2001 A bomb went off headquarters of the People's Democratic Party in the southern Bayelsa state. Two were injured. The cause appears to be a struggle to impeach officials for corruption.

June 13, 2001 A spiritual advisor to the governor of northern Nasarawa state, and five others, were ambushed and killed by unknown gunmen. Press reports connected the killing with ethnic tensions between Tiv and Hausa in the region.

June 15, 2001 In central Nigeria, thousands of minority Tiv tribesmen fled their homes fearing retribution after a chief of the majority Hausa was shot and killed. Hausa believe the killing was in revenge for the killing of several Tiv two months ago.

June 16, 2001 Militant youths who kidnapped two Nigerian oil workers in the delta said they were willing to negotiate for the captive's release. The locals are upset over oil spills and lack of jobs.

June 18, 2001 In the northern city of Kano, two youths were killed when resisting Moslem vigilantes closing of a brothel. Over 2,000 people have died in the last year in this city as Christians and Moslems clashed over the imposition of Islamic Sharia law. The governor of northern Niger state says Sharia law in his state would not include amputation or stoning.

June 21, 2001 Tiv and Azeri tribesmen wandered about central Nigeria attacking each other and civilians. At least ten have died since the violence began ten days ago. The government is setting up camps for the thousands of Tic refugees fleeing the area.

June 22, 2001 Tiv and Azeri tribesmen wandered about central Nigeria attacking each other and civilians. Dozens have died since the violence began ten days ago. In the north, Christians in northern Kano state rioted when a Moslem bus driver insisted that male and female passengers sit in different parts of the bus, as prescribed by Sharia law. Christina passengers objected and the unrest began. Several Mosques were burned, but police intervened before there were injuries.

June 23, 2001 Some 17,000 Tiv have fled their homes because of the unrest in central Nigeria.

June 25, 2001 Some 35,000 Tiv have fled their homes because of the unrest in central Nigeria.

June 26, 2001 In central Nigeria, Azeri tribesmen were attacked Tiv refugees, killing at least 11 people.

June 27, 2001 In central Nigeria, Tiv tribesmen attacked a Hausa Azeri village, killing at least 58 people. This was in retribution for earlier attacks on Tiv by the majority Hausa Azeri. Additional police units have been sent to the area to deal with the growing violence.

June 28, 2001 In the delta area, sixty oil workers, taken hostage by local militants earlier in the week, were released. A deal was negotiated with the militants, probably including payment of some cash and giving out some jobs.

June 29, 2001 Fighting between Tiv and Hausa tribesmen in central Nigeria have killed over 200 people so far. Many others have been wounded, at least fifty seriously enough to be hospitalized. Most of the latest casualties are a result of revenge attacks by members of both groups.

July 2, 2001Recent ethnic and religious conflicts have created 72,000 refugees so far.

July 3, 2001 A land dispute between members of two different tribes in the delta region has left nine dead.

July 4, 2001 In the north, ethnic and religious animosities have combined to create widespread violence between Christian Sayawa's and Moslem Hausa's. Over fifty have died in the last week and the local government has tried to keep the news from getting out lest it inspire revenge attacks.

July 5, 2001 Another twenty people were killed in Taraba state, where Tiv and Hausa have been attacking each other for weeks.

July 6, 2001 In the last few weeks, several hundred have died, and over 50,000 fled their homes because of tribal violence. Nigeria has some 250 ethnic groups (many organized as tribes around shared customs, language and culture) in a population of 122 million. Many consider it a miracle that the nation survives at all. Without the century long colonial period (mid 19th to mid 20th century), Nigeria would not exist at all. Instead, it would be a collection of several dozen kingdoms, organized around the largest and most cohesive tribes. Warfare, as was the case in the pre-colonial period, would be constant. Each of the kingdoms would have ethnic minorities that would either be rebellious, or urged to go that way by ethnically related people in neighboring kingdoms. The one sub-Saharan nation that was not colonized, Ethiopia, experiences frequent civil war and rebellion because of its dozen or so different ethnic groups. No one has yet come up with a quick solution for this problem, for the problem itself is unique. Historically, the only thing that works is gradual absorption of many of the smaller groups into the larger ones. This has been going on more rapidly in the last few centuries, making it easier for many stable nations to form. Africans want to hold on to their colonial era borders, even if it means constant threat of unrest. This is preferable to the pre-colonial tribal warfare. But the current violence is a classic example of how difficult it is to keep the peace. The Tiv people speak a language that can be traced to areas to the south of Nigeria. They have apparently been moving into Nigeria over the past few centuries. The local Hausa tribes regard the Tiv as unwelcome interlopers and it never took much to spark a bloody confrontation over the issue.

July 11, 2001 The Bakassi Boys vigilantes killed a notorious gang leader in the southeastern city of Onitsha. This was done before thousands of cheering civilians and in defiance of orders from the national police to turn the gangster over. The Bakassi Boys are sponsored by the state governor. Last month, the governor and the national police achieved a compromise whereby the Bakassi Boys and police would cooperate.

July 12, 2001 Police have destroyed 2,400 weapons (pistols and rifles) seized from criminals and smugglers. The weapons were taken over the last few months.

July 17, 2001 Nearly a 100,000 people have fled tribal violence in central Nigeria. Several hundred have been killed (including six policemen) and the fighting continues.

July 18, 2001 After much violence, and over 500 dead, all the Moslem residents (over 20,000) of the northern town of Tafawa Balewa have fled, leaving only Christians. When Islamic Sharia law was introduced in the region, the Christian residents of Tafawa Balewa protested. This led to violence and the Christian minority gained the upper hand. The state government has tried to keep the last six weeks violence quiet, but eventually the news got out.

July 20, 2001 Police retaliated against a bandit gang in the southeast, killing 14 and arresting eight.

July 21, 2001 An attempt by a popular Nigerian musical group to give a concert in the northern city of Katsina resulted in a brawl between Islamic purists (who oppose any musical entertainments) and music fans. At least 24 were injured.

July 31, 2001 Despite disputes with local police, the Bakassi Boys vigilante group in the southeast killed four suspected robbers publicly by hacking them apart with machetes, then burning the body parts. This was done before a cheering crowd. Vigilante violence is becoming more common throughout the country.

August 2, 2001 Although the government has banned the OPC (a Yoruba vigilante group in the southwest), local politicians seem to be subverting the ban. Local police have stood by while OPC leaders continue to operate.

August 9, 2001 The US has donated $150,000 of equipment to the Nigerian national police.

August 10, 2001 Ganiyu Adams, leader of OPC, has been "wanted" by the police for 20 months. But Adams moves about Yoruba areas freely, guarded only by stick wielding bodyguards. OPC vigilantes are increasingly used to go after criminals in their neighborhoods, and local politicians are wary about coming out against Adams or the OPC. In effect, we are seeing the formation of ethnic warlord armies. If the many arms dealers in east Africa decide to move west, cheap AK-47s could turn vigilantes into armies.

August 16, 2001 Nigeria has ordered military paymasters to crack down on non-existent soldiers who, amazingly, still draw their pay. What happens, of course, is that the commanders simply report a given number of troops, pay a smaller number of actual troops, and pocket the difference. New procedures require each soldier to present himself to a paymaster and for the paymaster to create a document listing the soldier's identification and other information.--Stephen V Cole

August 17, 2001 In Lagos. OPC vigilantes burned three suspected robbers to death.

August 22, 2001 Ganiyu Adams, leader of OPC, has apparently pushed the police too far. He was arrested while planning to break some followers out of a police station. It's not yet clear if Adams arrest will result in street violence that officials have long feared.

August 25, 2001 Nigerian President Olusegun Obsanjo said recently that he would consider using troops to protect lives and property against criminals. The crime rate in Nigeria is spiraling out of control, which has a negative effect on foreign companies doing business there.--Stephen V Cole

August 26, 2001 The national power grid collapsed again, plunging the entire country into darkness for three hours. In Lagos, the nation's largest city, the telephone company shut down emergency police calling service because the police had not paid there phone bill for months. The police say the government does not provide enough money. A large chunk of the police budget is lost to corruption.

August 27, 2001 Fighting between Christian and Moslem villagers in northern Bauchi state has left several dead. The cause was the imposition of Islamic Sharia law. Off the coast, 99 oil workers were released by armed locals. The hostage takers increasingly run an extortion scheme whereby they take oil workers hostage until the oil companies give them jobs or money.

August 29, 2001 The Bakassi Boys vigilantes in southeast Abia State were set up by the provincial governor to deal with rampant crime. The police are controlled by the central government and are largely ineffectual. But now the Bakassi Boys are now going around collecting a "security tax." This is seen by most people as another form of extortion, and a sign that the Bakassi Boys have passed from being a solution to being part of the problem.

September 4, 2001 The Yoruba vigilante group OPC has declared that it will cease operations against criminals. This is being done because OPC leader Ganiyu Adams is going on trial for murder. The OPC is one of many vigilante groups that have been formed in the last few years to try and cope with rising crime rates. The police are corrupt and largely ineffectual.

September 5, 2001 In the Niger Delta, ethnic violence between Itsekiri and Urhobo left five dead and fifty homes destroyed. It's the usual disputes over land and resources.

September 7, 2001 Fighting broke out in the central city of Jos between native Christian Beroms (the majority in the area) and recent migrant (Moslem) Hausa people. There are reports of bodies in the street, gunfire and burning buildings.

September 8, 2001 Troops have been sent to Jos, where ethnic and religious tensions have killed at least fifty people in the last two days. Meanwhile, the government signed an agreement to obtain training and technical assistance for the army from Britain.

September 9, 2001 The death toll in Jos has reached 50 and is rapidly climbing. The local police have not been able to contain increasing fighting between Christian and Moslem bobs.

September 10, 2001 A major reason for the unrest in Jos is the thousands of Christian refugees from northern Moslem areas. Christians in the north are uncomfortable with the imposition of Sharia (Islamic) law and are often persecuted because their customs are different than Moslem ones (Christians can drink alcohol, Moslems cannot.) Since the military government was overthrown two years, at least 6,000, and as many as 10,000, have died in religious and ethnic violence. The military dictatorship kept a tight lid on protests and such, but the underlying animosities remained.

September 11, 2001 Police and Army patrols in Jos have not been able to stop the fighting between Christians and Moslems. Some 200 are already dead and nearly a thousand wounded. Bodies are still being discovered.

September 12, 2001 Thousands of Moslems in northern Nigeria celebrated in the streets when they heard of the terror attacks in New York City and Washington DC the day before. Such demonstrations will increase antagonism between Christians and Moslems, as the attacks were harshly criticized in the Christian south. Fighting between Moslems and Christians has broken out again in the central city of Jos.

September 13, 2001 The death toll in Jos has reached 500. Many more have been wounded.

September 16, 2001 With over 500 dead in Jos, police arrested some 300 in an attempt to stop the religious violence. Over a thousand have been wounded and much property destroyed in the city with a mixed Moslem and Christian population. Police and army troops have been all over the place in the last week and most of the violence appears to have disappeared from the streets.

September 17, 2001 The Supreme Council for Islamic Affairs, the highest religious authority for Nigeria's Moslems, condemned the September 11th terrorist attacks.

September 22, 2001 The government has set up a special task force to track the activity of any Islamic terrorists. While most Moslems condemned the September 11th attacks, there were some celebrations in the north. Osama Bin Laden is a hero to some Moslems and the country does not want to be seen as a supporter of international terrorism.

September 27, 2001 The government is reviving it's anti-terrorist squad. The unit was broken up as a tool of the military dictatorship in 1999, when democracy returned. The emergence of Islamic fundamentalism, and many bin Laden supporters, in the past few years caused the government to rebuild the old anti-terrorist unit. Now, these policemen will actually go after terrorists, rather than opponents of a military dictatorship.

September 29, 2001 The Nigerian Scams- Just about everyone in business has received a letter or Email from someone in Nigeria offering millions of dollars for nothing. Nigeria is awash in corruption, and millions of such letters (and untold Emails) are sent out every year looking for a few people who will bite. US Postal authorities and the Secret Service intercept and destroy about two million such letters every year. Nigeria is considered the most corrupt nation on the planet, and this corruption has much to do with the economic and political problems that beset the most populous nation in Africa.

There are more kinds of scams than can be counted, but most follow a set pattern. Someone in Nigeria has a bunch of money they need to sneak out of the country, and if you will just tell them which bank account to send it to, they will wire it over and you can keep a share of it when you give them the rest. Those with money to move include relatives of ousted government leaders, corrupt officials, oil brokers who have accidentally accumulated surplus profits, people who just got a kickback from a Soviet arms deal 20 years ago, and any number of similar stories. If you're smart, you simply throw the letter away. They send out millions and won't bother to track down those who don't respond. Since dozens of scam groups operate from the same mailing lists, you will get another offer within a few months anyway. If you give them a bank account number, they will immediately check to see how much money you have in it. If you don't have a bunch of money, you probably won't hear from them again as you have nothing for them to steal. If your account does have serious money, they will follow up with a letter stating that you must pay fees, taxes, or bribes to get the millions. They know your account balance and will ask for a goodly share of what you have. If you don't pay up, they may try to draft your account, telling you (when you ask) that they were sure they had your ok and that you shouldn't mind since millions are en route. If you do pay up, you'll get letters asking for more and more fees until you figure out you've been had and stop. They'll try to keep you going with payment guarantees, notifications that cashier's checks have been issued, documents approving the transfer of the money, and so forth. For increased credibility, you may hear from an international clearing house which is holding your millions in escrow until you pay your fees. And by the way, they will want to do all of their communication by phone and fax to Nigerian numbers which charge you $50, which you won't mind as you're getting millions. After you stop paying, you'll wait a few months and then hear from the police, an investigative committee, or a government panel. It seems they have arrested a group of criminals in their country, the very group that bilked you out of your money. They have recovered your funds and will be happy to send them to you (with interest) just as soon as you pay legal fees and transfer taxes. Another variation is that the scammer shows up with trunk loads of US currency, all of it died black by Nigerian banks because it was held in reserve accounts. For a few tens of thousands of dollars, they will obtain the secret chemicals needed to turn the black paper into clean currency. Another variation is a letter threatening your life if you don't pay the final fees to get your millions, since they want their share.

There are any number of other scams. In one variation, the usual surplus profits will be donated to your charity; the letter asking for fees will come in reply to your agreement to accept the funds. In another variation, the scammers have a large export order for a foreign customer but need to run it through your company books. They may flatter you by praising your expertise and asking for your advice on some fairly obvious matter. Of course, there are no products and no end user, just your money. Some Nigerian companies will order a few thousand dollars worth of your product with valid checks, then suddenly send you a huge emergency order with a fraudulent cashier's check. They will want the products shipped right away, before the check has time to clear. Any number of pieces of Nigerian-owed real estate are for sale by people who do not own them. Most dangerous is an invitation to come to Nigeria to take advantage of a business deal; you will find it necessary to pay huge fees to get back out of the country. If it sounds too good to be true, it is. Don't think for a minute that a deal too preposterous to be a scam isn't a scam; it is.

October 4, 2001 Some 3,000 Moslems peacefully demonstrated, against the presence of US troops, in northwestern Kebbi state. The Americans arrived last week to train Nigerian soldiers as peacekeepers.

October 5, 2001 The governor of the northern, largely Moslem, Zamfara state, has promised to escalate political violence as street gangs controlled by political rivals violence attack the governors supporters. The Moslem politicians strive to gain more public support by insisting they are all defending Islam. In the last two days, at least four have died in this violence.

October 7, 2001 Some 3,000 Moslems held a peaceful pro bin Laden demonstration in the northern city of Kano. In the northern city of Kaduna, mobs destroyed several liquor stores and three churches. Both cities have been the scene of bloody religious conflicts between Moslems and Christians in the last two years.

October, 12 2001 Sixteen of 20 soldiers taken prisoner by a tribal militia yesterday were found dead. Hundreds of soldiers were sent to the central states of Benue and Taraba to keep the peace after a border dispute erupted into violence. Farmers in one state and herders in the other have been fighting for the last two years over land and grazing rights.

October 14, 2001 Riots between Christians and pro-bin Laden Moslems in the northern city of Kano has left 13 dead and over a hundred injured in two days of violence. Several churches and mosques were burned down. Hundreds of Christians have taken refuge in an army barracks.

October 15, 2001 Violence continued in Kano as Christian and Moslem mobs battled each other and looted.

October 16, 2001 Soldiers are swarming over Benue province, seeking the men who killed 16 soldiers. In Kano, soldiers fired shots to disperse crowds of angry men.

October 17, 2001 The violence in Kano has subsided and soldiers withdrawn. More than a hundred people were killed. Of 286 people arrested, some 150 have been charged with crimes.

October 18, 2001 Hundreds of police entered Benue state to look for who killed 19 soldiers. More soldiers are being sent as well.

October 22, 2001 Soldiers entered Benue state to look for who killed 19 soldiers. But the soldiers began massacring civilians. Dozens of civilians are dead and many buildings destroyed.

October 24, 2001 Soldiers continued killing civilians in central Nigeria. Over a hundred civilians have died so far. A curfew was imposed in several cities in the area.

October 25, 2001 President Olusegun Obasanjo ordered soldiers to stop killing civilians in central Nigeria.

October 26, 2001 More soldiers poured into Benue state in the wake of the October 22nd massacre of 200 civilians. Patrols and road blocks are all over the region. In the Niger river delta, clashes between Itsekiri and Urhobo tribesmen left at lest five dead.

October 28, 2001 The army has launched an investigation of the killing of 200 civilians by soldiers in Benue state on October 22nd. Three of the dead were from the family of a retired lieutenant general (Victor Malu, a Tiv) who lived in the area. The general's house was also destroyed. General Malu has been demanding an investigation.

October 31, 2001At least 12 died in the southeast as the Bakassi Boy's militia fought with local merchants.

November 1, 2001 A retired army colonel is supervising the training of 6,000 Tiv tribesmen in Benue state. A Tiv militia group killed 19 soldiers last month, mistaking them for militiamen from the Jukun tribe. There has long been bad feeling between the Tiv and other tribes in central Nigeria. Police are arresting Tic suspected of militia activity or possession of illegal weapons.

November 2, 2001 Police arrested 52 people so far in connection with the killing of 19 soldiers in Benue state. Police are also seizing illegal weapons. Several days of retaliatory action by soldiers left at least 200 civilians dead.

November 4, 2001 In northern Gwantu state, violence between Christians and Moslems left at least ten dead and several hundred people refugees.

November 5, 2001 The Romanian government is setting up a pilot training facility in Nigeria to train military pilots fro west African nations. In central Nigeria, army troops seeking the killers of 19 soldiers, raided two villages, killing at least three civilians.

November 10, 2001 Troops were called out to patrol the city of Jos because rumors of coming violence between Christians and Moslems. Such violence in September killed over 500 people in the city.

November 11, 2001 A drunken soldier, apparently a Christian, killed six Moslems at a Mosque in the northern city of Kaduna.

November 17, 2001 In the southwest, police arrested six Pakistani Islamic radicals for inciting local Moslems to violence. Last years, fighting between Christians and Moslems in the area left over a hundred dead. In central Nigeria, Tiv and Jukun leaders agreed to a peace plan. The tension between the Tiv and Jukun tribes in central Nigeria continues to simmer, with violence restrained by the presence of thousands of police and soldiers. The Tiv are seen as troublesome interlopers, even though the Tiv moved here from the Congo some four centuries ago. There are now as many as three million Tiv in the region. But the major part of the problem is that the native Jukun have always had a paramount chief, the Aku Uka. The Tiv are more decentralized, with all the local chiefs consulting each other over any joint concerns. Since independence in 1960, the Jukun Aku Uka has tried to use regional power obtained during the British colonial power to help the Junkun against the Tiv where there were disputes over land and political patronage. The tension has been constant and has led to violence, In 1992, major fighting killed at least 5,000. Last June, more violence led 200 dead. The Tiv have formed armed militias and some of these killed 19 soldiers last month. Soldiers, in revenge, killed over 200 Tiv. The Tiv now feel threatened by the army and the Junkun, and continue to arm and train for battle.

November 26, 2001 Over the weekend, some 200 Tiv militia attacked Junka and Chamba villages, killing at least 50 people. The Tiv fear being attacked, and fear the army more because the Minister of Defense is a Junka.

November 27, 2001 In central Nigeria, thousands of Tiv fled fearing retaliation from Junka and Chamba tribesmen for recent raids by Tiv militia.

November 29, 2001 In the Christian majority southwest, police arrested an Islamic preacher for inciting violence. Enraged Moslems responded by damaging 11 Christian churches.

December 6, 2001 Nigeria is hosting UN peace talks between the Congo government and rebel groups.

December 9, 2001 Eleven northern states have adopted Sharia law to one degree or another. Few have applied Sharia to major criminal cases and, since most of these states have a Christian minority, there has been a lot of violent opposition to the use of Sharia law.

December 14, 2001 In the five years since the military dictatorship was replaced with a democracy, some 10,000 people have died in ethnic and religious violence. Many more were injured or driven out of their homes.

December 17, 2001 In the Northern city of Kano, violence continued over the weekend, leaving at least nine dead. The violence was said to be less between Christians and Moslems and more a matter of pillaging and banditry.

December 23, 2001 The national Minister of Justice, Bola Ige, was murdered in southwest Oyun state. Ige was a Yoruba Christian and was outspoken against the imposition of Sharia law. He was also involved in the increasingly violent factional politics in the southwest.

December 24, 2001 Troops have been sent to Oyun state in case the murder, yesterday, of the Federal Justice Minister touches off large scale fighting there. Meanwhile, in central Nigeria, Tiv militiamen killed 14 civilians in an ambush.

December 29, 2001 In the northern (Moslem) city of Kano, violenct pro-Palestinian demonstrations have left five civilians and a policeman dead.

December 30, 2001 Health workers in the northern (Moslem) city of Kano have noticed that the majority of children born recently have been named Osama (after Osama bin Laden.)

December 31, 2001 In the northwest, violence between herdsmen from neighboring Niger and Nigerian farmers has left at least five farmers dead.

January 6, 2002 In the southwest, violence instigated by the ethnic OPC militia left at least three dead.

January 7, 2002 In the northeast, a tribal dispute over land has left some 50 Mambilla and Fulani dead. The feud has been going on since 1918.

January 10, 2002 Tribal violence in central Nigeria has left eight villages destroyed and at least a hundred dead. Men from the Loku, Udege and Agutu tribes are fighting over fishing rights in a local lake.

January 12, 2002 The US and Nigeria have signed an agreement for the third phase of Operation Focus Relief, a project to train seven battalions from Nigeria, Senegal, and Ghana for peacekeeping duties in Sierra Leone.--Stephen V Cole January 13, 2002 In the southwest, a fight between Yoruba tribal factions left at least 36 dead. This battle was over which faction would obtain the title of Olowo (king) of Owo.

January 14, 2002 Ethnic fighting in the oil region has left two dead and 15 wounded.

January 16, 2002 Labor unions called for general strike's to protest an increase in the price of gasoline and kerosene. Many of the demonstrations have turned violent and looting has occurred. The price's are among the lowest in the world (72 cents a gallon for gas) and the corrupt state run oil industry is rarely able to meet the domestic demand. Raising the prices should enable the nation to pay its debts, but most Nigerians feel that the additional money will be stolen just like most other taxes and fees collected by the government. Courts have declared the strikes illegal.

January 17, 2002 The national labor union federation called off their talk after a court ordered them to. The strike had been in protest against an increase in fuel prices.

January 19, 2002 Police attacked a merchant in Danja, after a policeman was bumped by the merchant's cart. This sparked a fight between civilians and police that left seven policemen and three civilians dead.

January 20, 2002 Hundreds of police surrounded the town of Danja and awaited orders to enter. Citizens had fled the town after seven policemen were killed and residents feared retribution from the police. Police have already arrested 60 people as suspects in the killings.

January 21, 2002 The federal government ordered hundreds of police to withdraw from the town of Danja. Citizens had fled the town after seven policemen were killed and residents feared retribution from the police.

January 23, 2002 The army is attempting to eliminate the lawlessness in the oil producing regions of the Niger river delta. Several soldiers have been reported killed (and later denied by the government) and civilians are fleeing for fear of army retaliation.

January 24, 2002 The government opposition is increasingly upset by the continued corruption among government officials and the government's inability to do anything about it, despite constant talk of anti-corruption measures.

January 27, 2002 Corruption continues to be a problem, despite arrests and investigations by the new government. Case in point are the pensions the 60,000 retired soldiers and officers of the army are supposed to receive. These are the men who spent their entire careers in the armed forces. Once the military dictatorship was overthrown in 1996, these pensions were seen as fair game for corrupt government officials. The government finally recognized the problem and, in 2001, authorized $26 million to take care of the unpaid pensions. That money appears to have disappeared as well and the retirees are still unpaid. A related concern of the government is unhappiness among active duty troops and national police over the pension issue.

January 30, 2002 In Lagos, a mob lynched three policemen. The cops had killed a bus driver and bus conductor who refused to pay a bribe at a roadblock.

January 31, 2002 Over 15,000 people have fled their homes because of the ammunition dump explosion in the capital. The death toll is over a thousand. There is great public anger at the government for the way the ammo dump was mismanaged. Meanwhile, police have arrested other police officers thought to be ringleaders of a strike many police say they will start on February 1st. The police are upset over not getting paid on time and poor promotion opportunities.

February 1, 2002 Faced with growing mutiny by government employees, the government said it had found the cash to meet all government employees January payrolls. Meanwhile, army troops (who get paid from a different budget), were ordered into towns where the police were "on strike." Since strikes by the police are illegal, the government is calling it a mutiny. The police are upset over not getting paid on time and poor promotion opportunities. The national police have never gone on strike before. Generally regarded as corrupt and ineffective, the national police do provide some protection, particularly to larger businesses that can afford to supplement the cop's low pay.

February 2, 2002 Ethnic violence between Yoruba and Hausa street gangs has broken out in the capital. The police appear unable to suppress the violence. The national police strike ended when the government came up with money for back pay, and threatened to punish the strikers. The US and Britain are sending bomb disposal teams to deal with the munitions lying all over neighborhoods bordering an army base in the capital that suffered a munitions dump explosion.

February 4, 2002 Last week's police strike resulted in the arrest of at least 30 policemen for the illegal strike. Army troops have been deployed in the capital to deal with ethnic violence.

February 6, 2002 In the capital, nearly a week of ethnic strife between Yoruba and Hausa left over a hundred dead. Increased army and police patrols have reduced the violence. Over 400 people have been wounded, more than 20,000 have fled their homes and over a thousand homes have been destroyed.

February 8, 2002 Land disputes continue to cause much of the unrest in the three years since the end of the military dictatorship. The lad ownership laws encourage communal ownership of land, and a lot of land is under long term lease from one tribe to another. A common cause of dispute is the sudden refusal of one tribe to pay rent to another tribe on land it has been occupying for a century or more. Much land is also held by feudal chiefs. Population growth, and the inability to buy and sell much land is causing more unrest and violence.

February 12, 2002 Upset over how the world media are covering the growing ethnic violence in Nigeria, the government is threatening to sue CNN and the South African Broadcasting Corporation for defamation.

February 14, 2002 Police in the northern, mainly Moslem, city of Kano, said that the Islamic vigilante group, Hisbah, would be arrested if they continued using force to enforce Islamic (Sharia) law. The Hisbah organization denies that it is using violence. But Hisbah has been loudly and energetically preaching vigorous action against lax Moslems and non-believers.

February 18, 2002 With ethnic and religious violence leaving over 10,000 dead in the last three years, and 66 percent of the population destitute (versus 32 percent 15 years ago), the democratic government is trying to cope. It's been pointed out that ethnic and religious violence had killed fewer than a thousand people during 15 years of military rule. But it was the corrupt generals that plundered the economy and created so much poverty. Corruption and rising crime rates are being met with a tripling of the size of the corrupt national police force.

February 20, 2002 A series of crises in Nigeria over the last month point to growing political instability and possible coup plots. On 27 January 2002, an army ammunition dump near the Ikeja Military Cantonment and a large residential area in the Ikeja district of Nigeria's biggest city Lagos caught fire. The hour-long blaze ultimately caused the death of 1,000 Nigerians, many of them drowned or trampled to death as they ran for their lives. Hundreds of bodies were pulled from the Oke-Afa and adjoining Pako canals near the Ikeja military barracks.

An unnamed officer claimed that the fire broke out at a street market for soldiers and spread to the ammunition dump. But the market was too far away for this to be possible. The Nigerian military launched an inquiry two days after the blasts, following growing speculation that the devastation of Nigeria's principal armory was not caused just by an accidental fire.

On 2 February, a two-man British bomb disposal recon team was dispatched to join U.S. and UN teams already on site. By 20 February, EOD experts had recovered 1,350 unexploded bombs, mortar shells and other pieces of ordnance from a three-mile radius around the Cantonment.

An unnamed military source told a Nigerian newspaper that the interim report submitted to the chief of army staff also blamed sabotage for the ammunition dump explosions. President Olusegun Obasanjo also would not rule out sabotage, while the military inquiry noted that a large quantity of arms were stolen during the explosions. Obasanjo said that senior army officers had visited the armory in recent months and handed over $29,000 to fund improvements to the facilities.

The governor of Lagos has claimed that the explosion, riots and a police mutiny are part of a plot to bring generals back to power. In early February, the police mutinied in many stations and had to be replaced by Federal troops. Nigerian troops then had to end four days of fighting between gangs armed with crude weapons in a Lagos slum. At least 100 people were killed, 400 injured and thousands left homeless. In October 2001, anti-American riots in Kano that left hundreds dead were linked to the U.S.-led attack on Afghanistan.

These events have prompted public anger at a government increasingly hard-pressed to bring security to Africa's most populous nation. Rival politicians have been recruiting private militias, in a bid to consolidate power ahead of 2003 presidential and legislative elections. - Adam Geibel

February 21, 2002 In the Delta, a bank robbery was seen as another case of the police not responding to crime. In response, a mob of civilians attacked a local police station. Prisoners were released and weapons stolen. In retaliation, the police went after the young men suspected of taking part in the attack, and killed 15 and wounded at least 25.

February 25, 2002 Nothing the success of policemen in getting back wages by striking, unpaid prison guards now demand back wages or they will strike. The government says it will find the money.

March 5, 2002 Junior ranking police officers and army officers are threatening to go on strike in a pay dispute with the government.

March 8, 2002 Hundreds of retired soldiers demonstrated in the capital to protest the failure to pay their pensions. Some $130 million of pension money for 60,000 retirees is held up in a failed commercial bank. The bank's failure was the result of mismanagement and corruption and the government will not come up with additional funds to pay the pensions. Such disasters are common, but this one has an impact on the morale and stability of the armed forces.

March 9, 2002 Armed men attacked a Roman Catholic prayer service in the southeast. In the resulting stampede by the crowd, 14 people were trampled to death. The police responded by saying they would prohibit any future prayer services.

March 14, 2002 Popular secret cults are common on many college campuses, but some of the cults operate like criminal gangs. In a recent case, 50 cult members went on a campus rampage that left eight students dead. The cults are officially outlawed, but the police are reluctant to get involved with campus affairs (which often sparks a general student uprising against the police.) The national police has 180,000 cops, but that's not really enough to cover everything. The low pay and corruption also cause low morale and performance.

March 19, 2002 The extent of the corruption that has ruined the nations economy and corrupted public life can be seen in the continuing negotiations with the family of the late dictator Sani Abacha. From 1993 to 1998 general Abacha ran, and plundered the nation. His rule ended when he dropped dead. It was estimated that Abacha stole up to four billion dollars, and allowed others to steal much more. Negotiations with his family have so far resulted in the return of nearly a billion dollars. A deal is in the works whereby the family would get a pardon (and be able to keep whatever stolen money they have left) after they return another $1.2 billion. It is thought that the family would have about $300 million left. Some of the returned money has again been stolen by corrupt officials (which never seem to be in short supply.)

March 21, 2002 The government is trying to reorganize and reform it's police, security and intelligence forces in order to better deal with the violence that has broken out during the past three years. Some 10,000 people have died in ethnic, political and religious violence since the military dictatorship was overthrown three years ago. The problems are many. The low paid law enforcement officials regularly use extortion and other forms of corruption to supplement their income. Powerful local officials often "adopt" local police by, in effect, putting them on the payroll. But the problems with the police are basically one of numbers. The large cities have only one cop per thousand population, while the international standard (based on experience) is one policeman per 400 population. Crime is literally out of control, causing the police in large cities to form special "combat unit" that have orders to shoot on sight if they see civilians with weapons.

March 26, 2002 The imposition of Islamic (Sharia) law in the northern states has brought about a crises as Sharia courts condemn women to death for adultery. This has caused a national and international uproar, particularly when it became known that the woman was raped. While no woman has been executed yet, and one has had her conviction overturned (because her crime occurred before Sharia came into force. But another woman has been put under a death sentence (which, according to Sharia, is carried out by stoning). The federal government threatens to overrule such Sharia convictions. Some governors in the north vow armed resistance to this.

March 30, 2002 Military commanders say that a letter sent to the president claiming that junior officers were planning to strike over living and working conditions, was a fake. Rumors of such a movement have been circulating for weeks.

April 1, 2002 Ten oil workers, including six foreigners, were taken hostage by locals in the delta oil region. The kidnappers are demanding money and jobs. Such incidents are fairly common in the area.

April 6, 2002 Faced with an increasingly angry population upset over soaring crime rates and civil disorder, the government announced a massive increase in the size of the national police force. Currently, there are 180,000 police nationwide. The only police are the national police. In the next year, the government plans to recruit and train 397,000 new police. It's feared that an inability to adequately train and supervise such a large number of new recruits will lead to even more corruption and inefficiency in the police force.

April 10, 2002 Thousands of tribal herders in the east have fled into Cameroon to escape. Tribal wars in eastern Nigeria has left several hundred dead so far this year. There are at least 10,000 Nigerians are refugees in Cameroon and some armed groups are coming after them.

This is causing more tension between the two nations, which still have an unresolved border dispute along the coast.

April 12, 2002 The US Army has sent 50 explosive ordnance disposal experts to Nigeria to help clean up the Ikeja Military Cantonment. This huge ammunition dump exploded on 27 January, killing over 1,000 people and scattering shells and other ordnance over a square mile.--Stephen V Cole

April 17, 2002 A deal has been reached with the family of former dictator Sani Abacha whereby the family will stand aside and allow $1.1 billion to be returned to the government. The government will allow another $100 million (stolen by Abacha before he became head of government) to be released by foreign banks to the family. Other senior government officials stole at least $3 billion in the last ten years. Graft and corruption absorbed most of Nigeria's oil income over the last few decades.

April 20, 2002 Police arrested a Moslem religious teacher in the southwest. The man was found to have a large cache of weapons and was unable to provide an explanation for it. Fear of more religious violence continues. In the southwest, Moslems are a minority. The minorities (in the north, Christians are a minority) realize that their best protection against attack by hostile mobs is better weapons.

April 21, 2002 Before oil was discovered in 1956, Nigeria was a food exporting country. But since the oil began to arrive, cheaper food imports, and no support for local farmers, has turned Nigeria into a large importer (including over $100 million a year in fruit juice) of food. The large unemployment rate is largely a result of the weak agricultural sector. Traditional African agricultural practices cannot compete, on price, with Western methods. But if the government provided training and capital for local farmers, the nation could become a food exporter once more. But the oil money that could have done this in the past was largely stolen by government officials. The current government, bowing to growing government anger over corruption, is increasing it's prosecution of corrupt officials, even going after senior people like government ministers and provincial governors.

April 22, 2002 Local militants took 88 hostages when an offshore oil platform was seized. These seizures have become a common occurrence in the oil regions, where gangs of young men will try to get around oil company security and take hostages. Small amounts of money, goods or low paying jobs are then given to get the hostages released.

April 25, 2002 Local militants released 43 hostages they had taken when an offshore oil platform was seized three days ago. Originally 88 men were seized, but some were released earlier.

April 28, 2002 The government is making a major effort to reduce government, starting with arresting hundreds of policemen. If the police can be cleaned up, the rest of the government will be gone after as well. Government officials are very nervous.

May 4, 2002 A southern state, where Moslems comprise about half the population, is to impose Sharia law for civil, but not criminal matters than involve Moslems. Meanwhile, northern states continue to hold off on imposing death and amputation sentences. Islamic conservatives and local non-Moslems continue to demonstrate, and sometimes resort to violence, over this issue. Meanwhile, the war on corruption is losing traction as corruption in the media became an issue (via reporting in the foreign press.) The local media won't openly admit they are bribed, but privately they do. This makes it difficult to handle corruption short of a civil war.

May 7, 2002 Recent commercial aviation accidents have brought more calls for stamping out corruption (which allowed unregulated airlines to flout safety regulations). But this is easier said than done, as even the younger generation is not reforming. Hundreds of university students were recently expelled for everything from cheating on exams, cult activities and armed robbery.

May 8, 2002 Tribal violence in Ogoniland left two dead. Police were called in to try and restore order.

May 10, 2002 Tribal violence continued in Ogoniland (in the Niger river delta), leaving at least five dead and many more injured.

May 11, 2002 Nigeria, Chad and Cameroon are establishing joint border patrols to try and stop several bandit gangs that operate on both sides of the border. Once the gangs cross a border, any police pursuing them have to stop. The international patrols will eliminate this shortcoming.

May 16, 2002 There are an increasing number of incidents of unrest in response to continued police and government corruption.

May 17, 2002 Because gangs of young men have increased their seizure of oil facilities and oil workers in the Delta, another 300 policemen to the area. Unfortunately, the ill trained and poorly led police often increase the unrest with acts of theft and rape by some of the police.

May 25, 2002 Vigilante groups are turning to politics and becoming the basis of warlord armies. The largest group, a coalition called the Bakassi Boys, have become a major law enforcement operation in three southern states. Smaller vigilante groups are operating elsewhere in the south, while religious bases groups impose Sharia (Islamic) law in the north. Local politicians are making deals with the vigilantes, to try and avoid competition from the violent and popular peacekeepers.

May 29, 2002 In the northeast, an ongoing tribal dispute over grazing land has led to Fulani herders attacking Kwol village and killing at least ten people.

May 30, 2002 The Bakassi Boys vigilante group seized and killed 20 suspected criminals. Groups like the Bakassi Boys have been hired by politicians to provide muscle in elections or other disputes.

June 15, 2002 The population continues to simmer over government corruption and ethnic and religious animosities. The nation continues to move towards a north (Moslem)/south (Christian) split, with numerous smaller spats along tribal lines. As medieval as Islamic Sharia law appears to be, it is the only form of law that northerners feel can be applied fairly. But so far, those who are applying Sharia are doing so against low level offenders, not corrupt government officials. There is a national despair that leads educated and able people to try and leave for America or Europe rather than trying to organize a revolution that works. The 1999 toppling of the military government has led to three years of disappointment. The elections next year do not appear likely to change anything.

June 17, 2002 Violence between student gangs on college campuses is growing. Today, five students were killed during a raid by one gang on the campus. Religious and ethnic differences, plus competition over criminal activities, has fueled the gang activity. In the oil region, two tribal youth gangs battled once more, leaving several injured. The youth gangs run an extortion racket on the oil company and the oil workers.

June 27, 2002 Responding to growing public anger at police abuse of power by prosecuting seven policemen (including a senior commander) involved in the recent shooting of three civilians by police. The national police are notoriously corrupt and quick to violence against the people they are supposed to be protecting. In many parts of the country, the police are ignored and vigilantes impose whatever law and order that's available. Many of these vigilante groups are turning into local militias, under the control of local politicians. This is how a system of warlords is created, and that often leads to civil war or national disintegration.

June 28, 2002 At least more six died in battles between tribes in central Nigeria. The fighting over grazing rights killed 30 people last week, when the violence began.

June 30, 2002 Police arrested three senior government officials in Benue state, for asking for a $2.5 million bribe before granting a government contract. It's rare that senior officials get nailed, especially when a lot of money is involved.

July 1, 2002 In the first three months of the year, 19.3 billion barrels of oil were exported. Royalties and fees on these exports brought the government 402 million dollars. But little of this money finds its way to the Nigerians living in the coastal region where the oil wells and pumping facilities are. For decades, this money has been used, by whichever military or elected leader of the country was in power, as patronage. The money was paid out to the leaders of the many ethnic and religious factions that make up the nation, in an attempt to keep everyone happy. This sort of works on a national scale, but does little locally. Not much of the oil money gets down to the average Nigerian. This has led to an ongoing shake down racket in the oil producing regions, where the locals compete to think up forms of demonstration that the local police and army troops can't stop and will force the oil companies to pay up. The local government will only offer police violence, but the oil companies will pay, and write it off as a cost of doing business in a place like Africa.

July 3, 2002 Voting on ruling party candidates for national elections is causing widespread violence. Those who can get elected, and late become a government official, have access to patronage and corruption opportunities. Despite calls for eliminating corruption, enough people are still attracted to it to cause the organization of armed gangs to fight for places on the ballot. The vote is this Sunday, and violence is expected to increase.

July 6, 2002 Banditry is becoming a major problem, with gangs of bandits regularly attacking cars and buses on the main roads linking towns and cities. And the heavily armed bandits are often brutal, with one gang killing 20 passengers on a bus, then robbing the bodies. Police have been ineffective against the highway bandits, and the vigilante groups lack the mobility and organization to patrol the country roads.

July 11, 2002 Unrest continues in the oil producing areas along the coast. This time, several dozen mothers are occupying an oil facility and demanding jobs for their sons. Many oil workers are threatening to strike if they don't get a raise. Some 95 percent of Nigeria's foreign exchange comes from crude oil sales. Most of the government revenue from this is stolen by corrupt government officials.

July 12, 2002 In central Nigeria, battles between Tarok and Hausa tribes left at least 13 dead. The area has seen lots of tribal and religious violence in the last year, with over 300 dead.

July 18, 2002 In the southwest, tribal violence in the town of Owo left at least ten dead. This violence is over a dispute about who was recently appointed head of the tribe.

July 26, 2002 In the oil district, rival groups fought each other and police over who would get $1.2 million allocated by the government for youth groups. At least four were killed.

July 29, 2002 The president made a rare visit to the Moslem north, for a ceremony in Kano. He was met by thousands of demonstrators, and six were said to have died in the resulting violence. Northerners are mad at the prosecution of the Abacha family (of the former dictator, for stealing billions of dollars from the government.) The former dictator and his family were Moslems from the north.

On the Niger border, strife between Christian and Moslem tribes left ten dead (one policemen and nine men believed to be Niger or Chad mercenaries working for one of the warring factions.)

July 31, 2002 National elections for August 10th were called off by the courts after some parties protested that there was not enough time for them to complete their preparations. The three large parties that formed when the dictatorship fell and elections were held in 1999, have been accused of being corrupt, and smaller, anti-corruption parties want a chance to campaign and get their message out.

August 6, 2002 Russia has delivered three more Mi-34C light helicopters to the air force. Three more were delivered earlier in the year. The Mi-34C is used for patrolling and can carry three people or a pilot and about 500 pounds of cargo.

August 7, 2002 Seizures of arms and ammunition at the borders are up, as political factions arm themselves in anticipation of pre-election violence leading up to the national elections in 2003.

August 8, 2002 Troops guarding the border with Niger were alerted to be on the look out for mutinous soldiers from Niger trying to cross into Nigeria. Many soldiers in Niger have been complaining about poor living conditions and unpaid wages. Many have deserted and some are trying to leave the country.

The police have begun to fight back against vigilante groups like the Bakassi Boys in the southeast. The vigilantes, paid by local politicians and businessmen, impose law and order where the corrupt police have failed to. The vigilantes don't use courts and are quick to impose a death sentence on the spot. The police see their ability to extort money from businesses interrupted by the vigilantes, and this gives the police an incentive to fight the vigilantes. Attempts to reform the police are meeting with mixed success.

August 9, 2002 The US State Department has increased the level of warning to American citizens traveling to Nigeria. Kidnapping, ethnic violence and general lawlessness are seen as likely dangers American visitors would encounter.

August 13, 2002 President Olusegun Obasanjo has launched another corruption investigation. None of these operations have resulted in the conviction of any senior officials. The persistence of corruption has led to public unrest and even mutinies in the police and armed forces.

August 15, 2002 A majority of parliament has demanded that president Obasanjo resign because of incompetence and unwillingness to sign laws passed by the legislators. The president refuses and government remains paralyzed. The legislators are particularly incensed at the president's unwillingness to move against the massive corruption that has paralyzed the economy. Nigeria is rated as having the most corrupt government on the planet, and the atmosphere of corruption has resulted in Nigerian criminal gangs being highly active all over the world.

August 16, 2002 President Olusegun Obasanjo, faced with a move by parliament to impeach him, has backed off on plans to do a massive investigation of government finances. Although legislators and government officials complain about lack of action against corruption, they really get agitated if anyone actually tries to crack down on corruption. This means that the nation will continue to wallow in corruption and growing popular unrest. Tribal and religious animosities make it difficult for someone to start a popular, nationwide anti-corruption movement. More likely is civil war and a break up of the country.

August 22, 2002 Christians and Moslems in the northern state of Kaduna signed a peace agreement to avoid religious violence in the future.

August 29, 2002 The government says it will not go to war with Cameroon if the International Court of Justice rules against Nigeria in a dispute over who owns 1,000 square kilometers of land on their border.

September 3, 2002 A prominent lawyer and critic of the Bakassi Boys vigilantes was assassinated in an ambush. Last month the police raided five Bakassi Boys headquarters and arrested 33 of them, but the group continues to operate. Bakassi Boys members have been threatening their critics.

September 7, 2002 Nigeria and Cameroon have signed an agreement to settle the dispute over ownership of 1,000 square kilometers of land on their border. Cameroon has also released 165 Nigerians it had arrested over the last year for trespassing in the disputed territory.

The legislature continues the process to remove the president. This impeachment movement arises largely out of the inability of the Nigerian political process to do anything effective to deal with the corruption and mismanagement that cripples the national economy.

September 18, 2002 Lawyers belonging to the Nigerian Bar Association (NBA) stayed away from the courts today to protest the sharp decline in law and order and growth of vigilantism and regional warlords. The NBA is particularly upset over the murder of one of their members earlier this month by the Bakassi Boys (who were upset at the lawyers legal actions against them.) The Bakassi Boys have since been recognized by the state government as Anambra Vigilante Services. Private law enforcement now competes with the government police.

September 19, 2002 A government report on religious strife in the central Nigerian city of Jos states that 915 people died. The fighting began on September 7 as a property dispute in a market place. It got worse on September 11 when many Moslems held public demonstrations in support of the attacks on the World Trade Centers and Pentagon. The local Christians took exception to this. Police and soldiers eventually restored peace in the city, but the strife has since spread to the countryside, where Christian and Moslem villages battle each other over property ownership, or simply because of the religious difference.

Over 10,000 have died in religious and ethnic fighting since the military dictatorship was overthrown in 1999.

Current attempts to register 60 million voters, to prevent voting fraud, have run afoul of massive attempts to commit voter fraud with the registration system.

September 22, 2002 The tribal strife in the oil producing regions is becoming increasingly disruptive. Today, members of the Warri tribe seized a pumping station and cut off the flow of millions of dollars a day worth of oil. Some 90 percent of Nigeria's export earnings are from oil. The Warri are constantly feuding with the Itsekiri and Urhobo over who gets what from the oil business. These efforts often amount to extortion and in many cases are just a matter of one upmanship over the other tribes.

September 25, 2002 The national police, long reviled as corrupt and ineffective, have finally struck back at the most prominent vigilante group that has formed to keep the peace. In a series of raids, over a hundred members of the Bakassi Boys were arrested and several of their offices closed down. The prisoners were ordered moved to the capital, to make it more difficult for anyone to try and free them by force.

September 26, 2002 The government sent three Alpha ground-attack warplanes to help the government of Ivory Coast defeat rebels. Nigerian troops may be sent as well.

September 30, 2002 Police have rescued at least 45 people who were being held captive by the Bakassi Boys vigilantes. Many of the prisoners had been tortured.

October 4, 2002 Tribal strife flared up in Plateau state, with several dead and at least a dozen homes burnt down.

October 9, 2002 The air force has withdrawn three warplanes sent to Ivory Coast to assist the government there in dealing a rebellion. The Nigerian government took this step to protest the Ivory Coast government's unwillingness to sign a ceasefire agreement and negotiate with the rebels.

October 10, 2002 After eight years of litigation, the International Court of Justice decided that the Bakassi Peninsula belonged to Cameroon, not Nigeria. The decision was based on a 1913 treaty between colonial powers Britain and Germany. Only about 10,000 people live in the swampy area (400 square miles) along the southeast coast of Nigeria. But the area is thought to hold several billion dollars worth of oil. Ownership was disputed for decades, and the area has long been occupied by Nigerian police and troops. In recent years there has been violence there, as Cameroonian troops and guerillas skirmished with Nigerian soldiers along the border.

October 12, 2002 The government has begun evacuating Nigerian citizens from war torn Ivory Coast.

October 15, 2002 In Lagos, hundreds of people rioted and burned down a police station after police shot dead a cab driver who refused to pay a bribe. Police shot dead two rioters as well.

October 19, 2002 The government has not yet officially responded to the International Court of Justice decision that the Bakassi Peninsula belongs to Cameroon. Nigerian troops are still in Bakassi and Cameroon soldiers have not tried to move in and take over. Thus there is still a possibility of more fighting over ownership of Bakassi. Meanwhile, local leaders in Bakassi have threatened to declare independence.

October 21, 2002 Nigeria's President Olusegun Obasanjo moved to squelch mounting speculations that his country would go to war with Cameroon over the disputed oil-rich Bakassi Peninsula and insisted that the nation would rather pursue a peaceful resolution to the issue. Obasanjo told the delegation of Community Development Committees from the oil-producing states that government would soon issue a comprehensive statement on the ruling of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) at The Hague, Netherlands.

The ICJ ruled on 10 October, basing its decision on a document between colonial powers Britain and Germany (the Anglo-German Agreement of 11 March 1913: Arts. XVIII-XX). Since the ICJ decision, there have been repeated calls within Nigeria for the Federal Government to ignore the verdict. This may present another problem for France.

Elf Petroleum Nigeria Limited, the local subsidiary of French oil giant TotalFinaElf, had facilities in both countries and was naturally worried about the security implications. Elf, along with US oil giant ExxonMobil, are major operators in Nigeria and Cameroon but both have larger assets in Nigeria that Cameroon: Mobil at over 500,000 barrels per day (bpd) is Nigeria's second largest oil producer and Elf at 150,000 bpd is Nigeria's fifth. Cameroon's total production is 90,000 bpd. But the two oil firms, along with three other Nigerian oil operators (Addax, Moni Pulo and Oriental Energy) have their operating fields located close to the disputed area. - Adam Geibel Thirteen men were arrested for the murder of the justice minister last year. Many of the suspects are junior politicians or relatives of politicians in Oyo state. This makes Justice Minister Bola Ige's killing yet another bit of political infighting.

October 23, 2002 Nigeria has officially rejected the International Court of Justice ruling that the disputed Bakassi peninsula belongs to Cameroon. Nigeria bases it claim on the fact that the people living in Bakassi belong to a Nigerian tribe. Nigeria also rejects borders drawn up during the colonial period. This, however, is an exception. Since the colonial powers left in the 1960s, African leaders have been very respectful of the borders drawn up by the colonizing nations. The Nigerians also accused the judges of being biased. It would appear that Nigeria really wasn't interested in the International Court of Justice unless it ruled in Nigeria's favor. Nigeria has far more troops in the Bakassi area than Cameroon, but it is feared that Cameroon will support guerilla operations against Nigeria over the issue.

October 24, 2002 The High Court has, for the first time, called a halt to the proceedings of a Sharia (Islamic law) court in the north. The defendant was facing death by stoning. But people in the north are reacting violently to such federal intervention and it is feared that this could lead to civil war. The federal government is under a lot of international pressure to stop Sharia courts from executing women for adultery.

October 30, 2002 The fighting in Ivory Coast has caused nearly a thousand Nigerians living there to flee back to Nigeria.

October 31, 2002 The government is resisting UN pressure to accept the International Court ruling on giving Cameroon the 400 square mile Bakassi region. The government is willing to discuss the matter with Cameroon, but that discussion will probably consist of Cameroon demanding and Nigeria saying "no."

November 1, 2002 Foreign aid donors, particularly the US, are criticizing the government for arresting people for financial fraud and corruption, but not prosecuting them. The arrested have a tendency of eventually not being in prison after a while, with bribes suspected as the reason.

November 8, 2002 Although alarmed at the way Nigerians living in the Ivory Coast have been mistreated, the government is reluctant to provide peacekeepers for a multinational force being assembled. American Special Forces have been providing training for Nigerian troops as peacekeepers. In the past (Liberia and Sierra Leone), Nigerian peacekeepers got involved in criminal activity and caused problems rather than solving them. Moreover, there is the potential for war with Cameroon over the disputed Bakassi area.

November 14, 2002 National riot police, manning a checkpoint in southeastern Anambra state, fired on a busload of people returning from a Christian religious ceremony. Four passengers were killed. The state government demanded that the national government removed the riot police. The riot police were sent to the state over the Summer to deal with the problems created by the state sponsored vigilante group; the Bakassi Boys. The riot police deny they killed anyone, although over a dozen civilians have been killed by riot police gunfire in the last three months.

November 16, 2002 A bomb went off in a newspaper office in central Nigeria. Five people were wounded. The attack was thought to be a common form of editorial criticism. Sometimes, however, gangsters bomb an enterprise when extortion demands are rebuffed.

November 19, 2002 Northern politicians and religious leaders are demanding that the Miss World pageant, to he staged in southern Nigeria next month, not be broadcast to northern Nigeria. This way, religious northern Nigerian Moslems would not be offended by the image of women in bathing suits and revealing dresses.

November 20, 2002 Rioting broke out in the northern Moslem city of Kaduna. The cause was Moslem anger over holding the Miss World contest in the Christian south. The spark for the rioting was an editorial in a newspaper that commented that the Prophet Mohammed would approve of the pageant. The newspapers offices were attacked and burned. Some Moslem religious leaders have been quick to incite violence against any disrespect, real or imagined, against Islam. Corrupt politicians tolerate, or encourage, this as eventually stopping the riots with force (police and troops), demonstrates the politicians power. However, this is a risky business, as sometimes the rioting gets out of control and brings down governments. But that's the way the game is played in Nigeria, where the rule of law is little know. Guns and violence work, though.

November 22, 2002 The rioting in the northern city of Kaduna has spread to the capital, Abuja. It is rare for such rioting to take place in the well policed capital. At least a hundred are dead in Kaduna so far.

November 23, 2002 The Miss World contestants were flown out of Nigeria, thus completing the humiliation of Nigeria's image. The original idea was to stage the widely televised event in Nigeria to show the world what a wonderful place Nigeria was. And help encourage investment and tourism. But this ignored the fact that Nigeria was still mired in corruption, crime and growing religious violence. Now the world knows. Not quite the image the government wanted to project, but a more accurate one.

November 24, 2002 The religious rioting in Kaduna have killed at least 200 people so far and the police and army are having a hard time controlling it. Over 5,000 refugees are homeless and at least 400 people are being treated for injuries at hospitals.

So far, 12 of the 19 northern Moslem states have adopted Islamic Sharia law. But those states using Sharia have been reluctant to carry out the death sentence, and only seven thieves have had hands chopped off. The large Christian minority in the north has met violence with violence when Islamic radicals attempt to use force, or violent demonstrations, to encourage the use of Sharia law. The country has always been split in half by religion. Traditionally, better organized groups from the north provided the rulers of the country. But the money (oil fields) are in the Christian south and since the overthrow of the military dictatorship, southerners are running the national government. If it came to a civil war, the south would probably win, but the fighting would be very much driven by religious difference. Wealthy Moslem states in the Persian Gulf would get involved (with money, weapons and volunteers).

November 25, 2002 The rioting in Kaduna appears to have ended. Some 220 people died and another 30,000 fled their homes. Over 300 rioters were arrested.

November 27, 2002 Christian leaders have warned that if the state and national government cannot protect Christians from Moslem rioters, Christians will organize their own defense. This would be another step towards civil war.

November 28, 2002 The Supreme Islamic Council of Nigeria proclaimed that a fatwa cannot be used against a non-Moslems. This dispute is all about the Christian journalist who wrote the story (about the Prophet Mohammed wanting to marry a beauty contest participant). Moslem politicians and Islamic radicals proclaimed this an insult to all Moslems and conjured up riots that killed over 200. The journalist has fled Nigeria since the fatwa was issued and taken refuge in the United States. The Supreme Islamic Council is acting to head off more religious violence, for Nigerian Christians get very upset at any talk of them being subject to Islamic law. The Council is also upset at a politician (the governor of Zamfara state) issuing fatwas.

December 3, 2002 The violence in Nigeria is not just about religion. It's also about tribal loyalty, political power and oil money. The Islamic north has long seen itself as destined to rule the nation, and for decades the rulers of Nigeria were from the north. But the oil is in the south and the Christian southerners are now in charge of the national government. No one wants a civil war, but no one wants to lose control over all that oil money. Most Nigerians are upset over the politicians stealing so much of the oil money. But many Nigerians are not against making money working for one of these corrupt politicians. Mobs can be hired for rioting, or peaceful demonstration. Everything has a price in Nigeria, and that's the biggest problem.

December 4, 2002 Fundamentalist Moslems have threatened to kill 16 journalists for writing stories they feel showed disrespect for Islam.

December 11, 2002 The final tally for the "Miss World Riots" was 220 dead, more than 1,500 injured. Property damage was extensive with 16 churches, nine mosques, some 200 homes and three schools burned down. Over 30,000 fled their homes. More ominously, Christian groups are now saying out loud that they are tired of this Islamic violence and will organize to counter it.

December 13, 2002 In central Nigeria, fighting between Moslem Fulani nomads and Christian villager flared up over land use rights. Armed Fulani attacked Christian villages and killed 13, losing one of their own in the process.

December 17, 2002 Rival political gangs in Niger state fought for several hours, leaving five dead. The two gangs represented rival candidates for governor in the upcoming elections. Whoever gets elected governor has access to large sums of money and cash. This provides supporters of candidates with an enormous incentive to get their man elected.

December 18, 2002 While the northern, majority Moslem, states implement Islamic law, they do not talk about setting up a separate Islamic state. This is because the oil is in the largely Christian south. The northerners are not militarily strong enough to conquer the south. In fact, more and more, the national police and army jobs are going to southerners. The Moslems are noticing this when the army and police are called in to stop religious fighting. The police and troops often side with the Christians.

December 27, 2002 Police arrested the leader of an anti-government movement (YDM, the Youth Democratic Movement) as responsible for the fire earlier in the week that destroyed the headquarters of the national oil company. Many organizations are fighting the government over the corruption that sees most of the revenue from oil exports stolen. The YDM, which had not been heard from before, claimed responsibility for the fire on December 25th.

January 2, 2003 The president apologized for the October, 2001, incident when soldiers retaliated against a tribe, killing over 200 people, after 19 soldiers had been killed.

January 7, 2003 Kaduna, the largest city in the Moslem north, has had a curfew listed. Over 200 people were killed in religious riots last month because of a beauty contest that was to be held in the south. The strife between Christians and Moslems has calmed down as political parties maneuver for this years presidential elections.

January 22, 2003 Although the Bakassi Boys militia was broken up by the police last September, the violence surrounding the group continues. Three former members were killed today, along with three unidentified people, by masked men. Some of the former Bakassi Boys were criminals, and returned to that after the group was broken up. In many parts of the country, criminal gangs virtually control neighborhoods, villages or stretches of road. Police and army troops have been fighting a low level war with these gangs, particularly those that interfere with road traffic.

February 2, 2003 In Lagos, a multistory building containing a bank and apartments exploded. At least thirty people died, and police had to deal with hundreds of looters going after the cash thrown out of the bank. The explosion was probably an accident, the result of compressed gas and explosives illegally stored in the building. There was apparently a fire in the building before the explosion.

February 4, 2003 Three days of ethnic fighting in the southern city of Warri have left at least twenty dead, including two policemen.

February 5, 2003 Nigeria continues to throw its weight around in territorial disputes with Cameroon and the tiny island nation of Sao Tome (population 150,000). In both cases, Nigeria claim territory containing potentially large oil deposits.

February 6, 2003 Nearly a week of tribal violence in the Niger delta ended as troops moved in. Several people died, but hundreds of homes were burned down. Members of the Itsekiri and Urhobo tribes have long fought when either disagreed with the results of a local election.

February 7, 2003 An army patrol seized a truckload of illegal weapons in central Nigeria. The truck had been involved in an accident. Increasingly, weapons (assault rifles and older weapons) are being smuggled into the country to arm growing political militias. Every year, election violence grows, as parties try to intimidate voters.

February 14, 2003 Lawlessness, caused by ethnic disputes or just banditry, continues to grow. In central Nigeria, an armed gang raided the town of Takdam in central Nigeria, leaving seven dead and many more wounded. Twenty homes were burned and at least twenty cattle, and other goods, were stolen.

February 19, 2003 Police say they have found traces of explosives in the rubble to the February 2nd blast, but have not been able to build a case for terrorism, or anything else, against several suspects being held.

February 23, 2003 New outbreaks of tribal violence in the southwestern city of Warri have left at least six dead.

February 26, 2003 Unrest grows over scandals involving a fuel shortage (despite Nigeria being a major oil producer) and several hundred million dollars stolen by the previous management of the state oil company. Added to this volatile mix is increasing anger at the growing crime rate, with more kidnapping and armed robbery.

February 28, 2003 In the north, where Islamic Sharia law has been installed, there is increasing violence between groups of volunteer Sharia law enforcers and National Police (who are often Christians from the south) involved in smuggling beer into the north. Sharia law prohibits alcoholic drinks.

March 4, 2003 Over the weekend, tribal violence in the northeast has left over a hundred dead, over 500 wounded, at least 120 houses destroyed and 21,000 people have fled their homes. The fighting was over use of farming land and grazing rights.

March 5, 2003 Four gunmen burst into the house of leading opposition politician Harry Marshall and killed him. This was considered a political killing and lots of people are upset.

Troops and police arrested a group of 13 Chadians in the northeast, in the wake of tribal violence that has left at least 110 dead. The mounted Chadians were taken after a brief gun battle, in which their leader, a woman, was killed.

March 7, 2003 Tribal unrest in the last month has left over 100,000 refugees still afraid of returning to their homes.

March 12, 2003 Violence between competing political parties in the northwest left two dead and dozens of homes burned. The political parties are usually based on tribal membership.

March 14, 2003 Tribal and religious fighting in central and northwestern Nigeria has sent nearly 60,000 people fleeing their homes and left over thirty dead. The battles in central Nigeria are between Christian and Animist farmers against Moslem herders. They are fighting over land use, a battle that has been going on for centuries.

March 15, 2003 Violence continues in the southern oil region, as gangs of local young men interfere with pumping and pipeline operations. The navy has sent in armed sailors to confront the gangs, but this has made matters worth, with several gang members being shot dead and sabotage increasing. Each of the dozens of gangs, which are usually content to extort payments from the oil company, has a tribal affiliation and there is an increase in tribal conflicts.

March 17, 2003 Factional fighting over upcoming elections led to over 200 homes being burned down, and an indeterminate number of dead and wounded.

March 19, 2003 Tribal violence in the southern oil region, between the Ijaws and Itsekiris, has left seven dead. The battles are over tribal fears that others are getting more benefit from the oil.

March 20, 2003 Demonstrations by angry locals in the oil rich delta area have turned into a rebellion against the government (demanding more autonomy and control over the local oil production) and the oil companies (demanding a cut of the oil revenues).

March 21, 2003 Oil companies began to shut down operations in the delta area as tribal violence makes it difficult to move the oil from wells to tankers off shore.

March 22, 2003 Several hundred soldiers are in the delta area, trying to defend oil facilities from mobs of angry locals bent on looting and destroying the oil company property. The death toll in going up, as the troops have guns and most of the rioters do not.

March 24, 2003 Oil companies continue to shut down operations in the delta area as tribal violence makes it difficult to move the oil from wells to tankers off shore.

March 26, 2003 In the delta area, more troops have arrived to try and stop armed activists from Ijaw, Itsekiri and Urhobo tribes from fighting each other. The Ijaw have done most of the attacking over the last two weeks, leaving over a hundred dead (including at least ten soldiers and sailors) and several thousand refugees. The violence has also shut down about a third of Nigeria's two million barrel a day oil production. Electricity production has also been cut in half because of the violence and looting. The people in the delta area are angry over years of oil production and no economic benefit for them. Moreover, building and running the oil facilities has disrupted their traditional way of life (farming, hunting and fishing.) Earlier governments were corrupt and brutally put down any protests.

March 27, 2003 Police and troops have stopped, for the moment, the violence in the Delta. But armed groups still exist and appear ready to resume the fighting.

March 30, 2003 In the southeast, Biafran separatists fought with riot police, leaving seven separatists dead.

April 1, 2003 Members of the Ijaw, Itsekiri and Urhobo tribes resumed fighting each other and police and troops sent to stop the violence. Dozens have been killed and nearly a million barrels a day of oil production has been halted in the Delta area as a result.

April 3, 2003 The US delivered the first two of seven 180 foot coast guard patrol ships. The vessels formerly served in the American coast guard and have been refurbished for use in patrolling the coastal and river delta region where most of Nigerians oil industry is.

April 4, 2003 Oil workers returned to the nations main oil shipping terminal after a twelve day absence. This was made possible because a one week truce by the Ijaw tribal militia has held.

April 7, 2003 The Ijaw tribe in the coastal delta oil field area demanded that the government put some of the oil money back into Ijaw inhabited areas. If not, the Ijaws threaten to not just shut down the oil facilities, but to destroy them. In the past, the oil money was largely stolen and distributed to politicians throughout the country. Very little money reached the people in the oil producing areas.

April 10, 2003 Many Nigerian naval officers are accused of making millions by turning a blind eye to oil smuggling, while the Nigerian Navy remains dilapidated and ineffective, to the point that they have requested the assistance of a Lagos warship. Only two of their four helicopters still fly and the gun boats deployed to the area seem unable to quell the fighting. - Adam Geibel

April 12, 2003 Oil workers continue to work at getting production back up to normal levels. The situation with the tribal gangs is still tense.

April 14, 2003 Legislative elections have given incumbent president Olusegun Obasanjo's party a majority in parliament.

April 20, 2003 In the Niger river delta, police shot dead six men belonging to an opposition political party. This was part of the violence related to today's presidential elections. The incumbent appears likely to win, even without cheating. But old habits die hard, and some parts of the country have a long history of intimidation against political opponents. This often results in battle, and casualties. In the southwest, police arrested 30 members of the former dominant party for trying to rig elections. Last weeks legislative elections also caused violence, but less than for the presidential elections.

April 21, 2003 President Olusegun Obasanjo, a southern Christian, got 90 percent, or more, of the vote in the Christian south, but also picked up as much as 15 percent in the Islamic north. His main opponent (one of 19), Muhammadu Buhari, who is also a former general and military leader, has not been able to impress voters that he brings anything different to the race. It looks like Obasanjo will win with about 70 percent of the vote. This is an important event, as there has never been a successful democratic transfer of power in Nigeria. Earlier elections were overturned with a coup. Many people speak of shunning the "old fashioned tribal politics", but the corruption stemming from all the oil revenue has led politicians to using tribal politics, or any other edge, to help them grab a portion of the nation's wealth.

April 22, 2003 Election related violence left at least 16 dead over the weekend.

April 24, 2003 A former ambassador, Obi Odu, was arrested in the southeast as he was caught leading a group of 22 young men who were burning down the houses of people who were thought to have voted against Odu in recent provincial elections. Odu was running for governor. Nigerian politics still has elements of tribal warfare in it, especially since the winner is expected to plunder the public assets for his followers. Thus cheating at elections is seen as legitimate because the stakes are winner take all.

April 25, 2003 Hundreds of Christians are fleeing northern cities, as Moslem radicals talk of taking action against Christians who stole the presidential election from the northern (Moslem) candidate. In fact, the majority of corrupt military dictators in Nigeria's history have been Moslems from the north. For centuries, the better organized Moslems in the north have dominated Nigeria, even though all the oil is in the Christian south.

April 26, 2003 Incumbent president Olusegun Obasanjo, a southern Christian and his reform party, won re-election and his party won a majority in parliament and most of the governor posts. This is seen as threatening to the many politicians who live off massive corruption. The question is, will the corrupt politicians take up arms and fight for the right to steal.

In the north, many corrupt politicians and their well organized parties lost of Islamic radical candidates.

May 2, 2003 After 13 days, some 80 Nigerian oil workers continue to hold 170 Nigerian and 97 foreign (including 35 Britons and 21 Americans) oil workers hostage on four off shore oil rigs. The hostage takers are demanding that five of their union leaders, fired for corrupt practices, be rehired, and that the workers be paid large bonuses. Such extortion is common in Nigeria, as are corrupt government and union officials. Nigerian warships are standing close to each of the rigs, but the hostage takers threaten to set the rigs on fire if force is used to free the hostages.

May 3, 2003 Disillusioned at reports of election fraud in two earlier rounds of elections, far fewer people are turning out for local elections held today.

In the coastal oil city of Warri, tribal violence merged with attempts to intimidate voters to produce several gun battles.

May 5, 2003 In the central state of Nasarawa, tribal violence led to a mob killing a senior state official and two of her aids as the state commissioner tried to vote in local elections.

May 6, 2003 In the north, soldiers trying to prevent some young men from voting twice in local elections, were attacked by archers and one soldier was killed by an arrow.

May 7, 2003 The last of the 260 hostages have been freed from four offshore oil rigs.

May 13, 2003 Nigerian Navy warned Niger Delta ethnic militia groups to lay down their arms and desist from attacking any military base or oil installation or suffer the consequences. Nigerian Navy Rear Admiral Bob-Manuel, commanding Western Naval Command, promised to return fire on Ijaw youths terrorizing their Itsekiri neighbors in the Delta State. The militias' favorite tactic is to attack on small swift boats, with AK 47 assault rifles and other light weapons. The Navy also confirmed that nine Army and Navy security personnel had been killed in the Warri area.

Siphoning off crude oil (or 'bunkering') is estimated to be about 10 per cent of Nigeria's total oil production (or more than US $1 billion). Last week, the Shell Petroleum Company of Nigeria disclosed that the company loses about 100 barrels of crude oil per day, while oil spills and pipeline fires arising have created serious environmental problems. This volume of stolen goods has enabled the guilty parties to bribe their way through all tiers of the Nigerian government, including military personnel stationed in the country's oil producing areas.

Earlier on the 8th, the navy impounded two vessels believed to be involved in crude oil theft on the Sombreiro River. The intercept of the MT Frances (600 metric tons) and MT Evivina (500 metric tons) was made south of Awoba, between Rivers and Bayelsa states. The two ships were believed to be chartered by three Nigerians and one expatriate, making this arrest the third this month alone. The Navy impounded 12 barges on May 6 and 7. Five barges were transporting crude oil and three diesel.

In 2002, the Nigerian Navy also reported intercepting the MS Abebi and MS Fari, both involved in crude oil theft. One officer claimed that this proved the Navy's commitment to fighting theft, but he chose to remain anonymous.

Two naval ratings remain in the hospital, wounded during the May 2 attack on the naval base (NNS Umalokun), when militiamen attempted to invade Warri through the waterfront near the base. More troops and even armored vehicles were moved up to protect the base's perimeter.

On March 22, an attack on the Army/Navy security team at Total Fina Elf Tank farm at Upomani village killed five and destroyed a substantial amount of equipment. Militiamen in 17 speedboats attack a Joint Nigerian Army/Navy Task Force patrol at Oprosa on the Escravos river on the 21st, killing three soldiers and one naval rating. - Adam Geibel

May 14, 2003 A spokesman for Shell's Nigerian subsidiary said workers had found signs of "excavations" and "disturbed vegetation" surrounding a broken pipeline at Ubianuge village, near the oil port of Warri. The spillage was first reported on 9th and had been brought under control by 11th, although an unknown amount of crude oil had contaminated surrounding farm fields and into a creek.

This is just the latest in a string of incidents, where vandals and criminal gangs siphon off the crude into buckets, barrels, and tug boats. Shell estimates the practice (known in Nigeria as "bunkering") cost nearly 100,000 barrels of crude a day. Combined with the other companies, the oil industry in Nigeria loses nearly 10 percent of the 2 million barrels daily to theft. Nigeria is Africa's largest oil producer and the fifth-biggest supplier of oil to the United States.

Gangs also sometimes sabotage company facilities in a bid to extort money from oil workers who come to clean up the mess. In April, sections of two major pipelines carrying crude from ChevronTexaco's Escravos oil terminal to two refineries were blown up and yet no one claimed responsibility.

President Olusegun Obasanjo is supposedly reticent to order reprisals as a solution to the problem, fearing that it could encourage a cycle of fighting. Military sources claimed a proposed offensive was made to the president, who reportedly rejected it on the ground that he would be unable to justify it.

This may turn out to be a short-sighted approach to the situation. When the commander of the 7th Battalion told the Warri business community of a possible pending attack on May 6, commercial activity ground to a halt.

Obasanjo might be playing a waiting game, trying to keep his military from being decisively committed while letting the oil companies take on the burden of solving the problem.

Striking Nigerian oil rig workers had held 100 foreign workers captive on the M.G. Hulme rig from April 16 until May 3, when a settlement was released. The Hulme is operated by Houston-based Transocean Inc. and on contract to the French firm TotalFinaElf.

However, shortly after the agreement was announced, two planes with former British special forces set off for Nigeria on what a Private Military Company said was a rescue mission at the four rigs. Andrew Williams, London director of private military company Northbridge Services told Reuters that the company had been contacted on on May 1, to obtain two C-130s and prepare them for action. Citing security reasons, Williams declined to name the teams' airfield of departure or the interim destination.

Williams told the press that "we brought in a representative of the hostage takers and showed him the guys and their equipment waiting to go in. He got the message" and Northbridge's mission was aborted as the hostages were released without a shot being fired.

However, forming a company (albeit of commandos) and moving them over 1,000 miles in the space of two days is hard enough to do with a standing Rapid Deployment Force like the 82nd Airborne, let alone private contractors. British diplomats in Nigeria and London also expressed shock at the rescue mission and a Transocean spokesman said his company was not involved with the British group.

So this leaves open several questions - was Northbridge just hired for this project too late and the press release a chimera designed to force a reaction from the strikers? Or was the oil rig strike simply an excuse for Obasanjo to allow the oil companies to pre-place some professional soldiers in Nigeria to solve the Ijaw problem? With all that profit being lost, the oil companies working in Nigeria have a lot to lose if they (or Obasanjo) do nothing. Stay tuned, this story might get weirder. - Adam Geibel

May 15, 2003 Down in the southeast, four days of fighting between supporters of the Alliance for Democracy (AD) and Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) in Effurum near Warri left 18 to 25 persons dead, scores injured and 20 to 27 houses burnt down. The dead and injured were caught in the crossfire between the two militias and then the troops sent to put the situation under control on the night 12-13 May, following the alleged killing of an AD chieftain by suspected PDP sympathizers. Local youths then seized the opportunity to embark on massive looting and robbery. Tribal leaders in Warri had ordered their warring youths to cease fire and lay down their arms, to no avail. - Adam Geibel

May 16, 2003 The oil companies are coming up with new ideas for dealing the unique conditions encountered in Nigeria. The basic problem is that everyone seems to be running a scam. The workers steal and run extortion schemes. The local civilians break into pipelines to steal oil, or to get hired as part of clean up crews. Local civilians also demonstrate for compensation for the damage done to the land from the oil spills. Bringing in mercenary soldiers and hiring foreign oil workers instead of locals will not make the oil companies more popular, but it will make it possible for them to pump oil efficiently. Their next problem is dealing with the enormously corrupt government officials.

May 23, 2003 The re-election of president Olusegun Obasanjo is being rejected in the Moslem north. Not just among many of the voters up there, but also among religious leaders. There was voter fraud, but even with that, Obasanjo appears to have won a majority of the votes. Since independence, most of the nation's leaders (both elected and generals who took over by force) have come from the Moslem north. The Moslem candidate who lost to Obasanjo is a former general who once ran the country as a dictator (after a coup.) This cost him votes in the recent election. Political corruption is widespread in the country, with local political groups fighting each other for control, and the ability to loot local government revenues. The local politicians have armed and unarmed thugs on their payroll to help with the process of molding public opinion.

May 25, 2003 The main pipeline near the oil town of Warri that has been supplying natural gas to Nigeria's biggest power station was ruptured by explosives planted by suspected Ijaw tribal militants. ChevronTexaco's Escravos gas plant supplies the Egbin thermal power station, near Nigeria's biggest city, Lagos.

May 29, 2003 Nigeria's waters are unsafe places for merchant ships. The Nigerian Navy has impounded two ships and 12 barges impounded in the past month, with over 2000 metric tons of stolen Niger delta crude oil. The crude oil was handed over to the Shell Petroleum Development Company (SPDC), while all of the suspects were handed over to the police for prosecution. However, a Shell Oil spokesman overflew the area earlier in the month and counted 33 barges loaded with stolen oil in the waters.

During the May 20th renaming ceremony of the NNS Delta naval base, Navy Captain Olufemi Ogunjimi told the Delta State that the Navy was committed to making Nigeria's waterways safe for navigation. He vowed that the men under his command would not allow miscreants, sea pirates, thieves and illegal bunkerers to seize the waterways as that is the only link between here and the hinterland.

The latest incident saw the 16-man crew of the offshore support ship MAERSK SHIPPER freed on 4 May, having being held hostage since being boarded on April 15 off the Nigerian Coast and only after paying a $2,500 ransom in local currency. Hostage taking involving the Nigerian oil industry and foreign employees has become commonplace and while ransom payments have probably been made in the past, the Maersk incident is unusual and could possibly set a bad precedent.

Most of the incidents are fairly stupid larceny attempts, but the crews are generally unarmed and left in more dangerous positions than if they were issued pistols. In the early morning hours of April 28th, an unidentified tanker anchored off Lagos port was boarded by three persons from a 14 ft boat (who threw threw empty glass bottles at the watchman when discovered). One of the intruders had earlier been observed to board the ship under the pretext of selling goods.

Intimidation sometimes works as a deterrent. The Royal Dutch/Shell company reported on April 27, they received threats from "criminal elements" to blow up their storage and processing vessel "SEA EAGLE". The company retaliated in the past by placing notices in local newspapers announcing that the criminals' plans were well known, a tactic which has reportedly worked in the past to prevent damage.

Armed guards can make a difference. Twelve persons in a speedboat attempted to board an unidentified offshore support vessel at 8.30 AM on April 25, off the coast. The guard on board fired warning shots and the intruders withdrew. Later that afternoon, another unidentified cargo ship was subject to five unsuccessful boarding attempts, using gunfire to try and stop it, while underway along part of the Benin River. Despite the reported failure to stop the vessel, the would-be pirates were reportedly paid off in cash, provisions and diesel oil from the ship.

The last string of ship-jackings was back in November 2002, when at least five fishing trawlers were attacked in the space of one week by pirates operating in Nigeria's coastal waters. Around 20 men in masks and painted faces on two high speed power boats boarded the fishing trawlers when they were at anchor. - Adam Geibel June 8, 2003 Nine students in central Nigeria were arrested for making illegal firearms and trying to import more advanced weapons. The students were going to sell the weapons to ethnic militias and criminal gangs. The tribal unrest has caused a strong demand for weapons.

June 12, 2003 Fighting between Christians and Moslems in the northeastern town of Numan has left at least fifteen dead in the last week. The fighting was triggered by a Moslem trader killing a Christian for stealing. Local criminals then joined in to loot and chaos followed. Homes and Mosques have been burned down. Police reinforcements have been sent, but have been unable to stop the unrest.

June 18, 2003 Local elections have been delayed once more, because of fear of corrupt influence by local politicians. Currently, the 700 local officials are appointed by state governors. The appointed officials are generally out to steal all they can, and in return they do whatever their governor tells them. Attempts to elect people to these posts have run afoul of local politicians rigging the elections to get the corrupt officials installed despite what the voters want.

June 27, 2003 Three more foreign oil workers (two Filipinos and a German) were kidnapped, by a group of 45 armed men, and held for $197,000 ransom (plus $3,152 to cover the cost of food for the victims.) The oil companies will not admit to paying ransom, but apparently they are, or more of the locals believe they are.

June 28, 2003 The government is facing nationwide strikes because it proposes to raise gasoline and kerosene prices by 50 percent. The old prices (less than a dollar a gallon) were below the cost of producing the fuel and cost the governments $1.9 billion a year. But there is widespread hostility towards the government run oil industry, because most people see the oil business as a major source of corruption. Most of the government revenue from oil has been stolen by government officials over the years and this does not appear, to most Nigerians, to be changing.

July 7, 2003 The strike in protest of the fuel price increases has turned violent as rioting and looting have replaced demonstrations. The police have killed at least ten rioters so far.

The three foreign oil workers (two Filipinos and a German) kidnapped by a group of 45 armed men, and held for $197,000 ransom (plus $3,152 to cover the cost of food for the victims) have been released. Apparently the ransom was paid to the local tribesmen who were holding the hostages. But no one will admit it.

July 8, 2003 The nine day national strike to protest the 50 percent increase in fuel prices ended via a compromise. The fuel price increase was cut to only 31 percent.

July 9, 2003 The government has not been able to substantially reduce corruption and the diversion of oil income. This has caused increasing unrest and threatens a complete breakdown in public order. Attempts to obtain income for needed repairs on public infrastructure and oil production facilities by raising the domestic price for fuel merely led to civil disorder. While the majority of Nigerians realize that clean government is the only solution to the economic and political problems, not enough politicians want to actually apply the solution.

July 11, 2003 In the southern state of Anambra, there was apparently a coup attempt by the deputy governor and his allies in the state legislature. A fake letter of resignation was sent to the legislature and the members were asked to accept it and confirm the deputy governor becoming the new governor. But the governors allies in the legislature got the police to provide protection for the governor as he denied signing a letter of resignation. However, the situation is still murky, as it is alleged that newly elected (last April) governor signed an undated resignation letter for his main backer, a wealthy local businessman. This was to insure that the governor would properly show his appreciation by sending a lot of government business to his backer. This kind of corruption fuels growing discontent in the country.

July 15, 2003 The army says that its contingent of 750 peacekeepers for Liberia are ready to go. But departure is being delayed until Ghana has it's 250 troops ready, and Mali its contingent of 150. It is also expected that the US will contribute troops and logistical support.

July 19, 2003 The government insists that it had nothing to do with the recent coup in the tiny island nation of San Tome and Principe (off the Nigerian coast.) The two countries have a deal to develop oil fields in the waters that separate them. But the terms are unfavorable to San Tome and many feel that the now deposed president of San Tome was bribed by the Nigerians.

July 20, 2003 The recent coup attempt in the island country of San Tome, off Nigeria's coast, was suppressed largely via threats from Nigeria. The coup was partly a protest against allegations that corrupt San Tome leaders had been bought off to grant Nigeria a favorable deal to exploit underwater oil fields between San Tome and Nigeria.

July 25, 2003 Tribal fighting between Ijaws and Itsekiri continues, with armed groups from each tribe raiding the others villages. The two tribes also compete with each other to run extortion scams on the oil companies running operations in the area.

The oil companies are being beset by more and more extortion and kidnapping attacks. The companies have always negotiated settlements, but have begun to threaten the use of mercenaries (implying that these will be former SAS troops).

July 29, 2003 Tribal fighting between Ijaws and Itsekiri, 300 kilometers east of the capital, continue, leaving at least twenty dead. Meanwhile, Ijaws kidnapped another oil company employee and held him for ransom.

July 30, 2003 Nigeria and the US are haggling over how much money America will give to Nigeria before Nigeria sends peacekeepers to Liberia. The US is offering $10 million, the Nigerians want $50 million. Nigeria also wants the warring parties in Liberia to work out a peace agreement before peacekeepers go in. This attitude, in addition to being prudent, also comes from earlier experience. Nigeria sent peacekeepers to Liberia in the 1990s, where nearly a thousand of their troops were killed, while also being accused of looting and abusing Liberian civilians. This time, the Nigerian peacekeepers have been trained by US Army Special Forces in more effective peacekeeping techniques.

August 1, 2003 The government is, once more, going to go after the criminal gangs that steal about 100,000 barrels of oil a day. This is a billion dollar a year business, and police and local government officials are often involved. Pipelines are tapped into, the oil pumped into a barge, which then gets the crude oil to a tanker which buys it and steams off to foreign refineries. Nigeria legally exports about two million barrels a day.

August 4, 2003 Tribal unrest in the Niger Delta left 20 Ijaw dead when Itsekiris tribesmen attacked three villages. The two tribes have been fighting for years over real estate and political power.

August 5, 2003 Unrest continues in the Niger Delta oil fields. Local tribesmen (and sometimes women) occupy oil facilities and demand payoffs before they will leave. Today, local men occupied a pumping station, that usually moves 90,000 barrels a day (worth over $2.5 million). The police are reluctant to intervene, fearing that such action might spark more violence incidents.

August 8, 2003 Nigeria is worried about getting stuck with most of the peacekeeping costs for the operations now unfolding in Liberia. ECOWAS estimates that six months of peacekeeping will cost $104 million. Nigeria is contributing 1,500 troops to the peacekeeping effort. The US has put up $10, but Nigeria wants non-African nations to pay half the cost. So far, only the United States has kicked in. Western nations are reluctant to get involved in African peacekeeping because of the chaotic nature of the situations, the inability to get the locals to make and keep peace deals, and the rampant corruption.

August 15, 200 Fighting broke out in the city of Warri, in the oil region of the Niger river delta, between men from the Itsekiri and Ijaw tribes.

August 18, 2003 Fighting in the city of Warri, in the oil region of the Niger river delta, has left at least ten dead. The main protagonists are men from the Itsekiri and Ijaw tribes.

August 19, 2003 Tribal violence in the city of Warri, in the oil region of the Niger river delta, has left at least 30 dead and created over 3,000 refugees. Another battalion of soldiers has been sent to the area to help restore order. Part of the problem is caused by the growing oil smuggling activity which now moves at least 30,000 barrels of stolen oil a day to neighboring Ivory Coast. The two countries are beefing up their land and naval border patrols to interrupt the smuggling. Tribal factions in the Niger delta are fighting over who should control the oil racket.

August 20, 2003 The government has sent 900 riot police to Warri to try and restore order. The entire Niger delta area, covered as it is by oil production and transportation facilities, is populated by tribes that feel they have nothing to show for it. The government would rather send soldiers and police than money, so the unrest grows.

August 25, 2003 Tribal violence in the city of Warri continues, with at least four people killed when an Ijaw town was attacked. The fighting has been complicated by the involvement of criminal gangs that specialize in stealing crude oil. This has been going for almost as long as oil has been pumped in the Niger river delta. But in the last few years, the tribe based gangs have gotten more ambitious and started to trespass on territory (parts of pipelines easy to tap into and oil storage facilities) claimed by other tribes.

August 26, 2003 After years of looking the other way, the navy is cracking down on ships that smuggle stolen oil out of the country. Gangs steal the oil from storage areas and pipeline and move it by truck or barrel to ships or motorized barges that take the oil to nearby countries and sell it. An estimated 6-7 million gallons of crude oil a day are thought to be stolen in this way. The smugglers can get 10-30 cents a gallon for the crude, and even more for refined oil (gasoline or kerosene), which sells for about a dollar a gallon. This makes such theft attractive for many Nigerians (who are lucky to live on a few dollars a day.) In the past three weeks, four ships and one motorized barge have been seized, and many more vessels checked.

September 4, 2003 The air force has sent helicopters to the Niger delta town of Warri to assist army troops in controlling tribal and gang violence. Oil production has been interrupted by the five months of sporadic violence.

September 6, 2003 The navy has increased patrols in coastal areas off the Niger river delta. This is to try and stop the growing smuggling of stolen oil. The money from this trade has been found to be supporting tribal militias and criminal gangs with more modern weapons, and larger quantities of them. Gun runners from around the world have been discovered doing business in the area, because the word is out that people have lots of cash to spend on the latest lethal toys.

September 7, 2003 Nigeria received a third US warship (the NNS 'Nwambe'), one of seven former Coast Guard cutters being refurbished by the US Department of Defense and sent to Nigeria. The first two of the $3.5 million ships arrived in March and the rest are scheduled for delivery before the end of this year. All of the vessels arrive without arms and ammunition but were fitted with cannons and machine guns by the Nigerians before deployment. The crew compliment of each is 42.

This aid is part of a security cooperation program aimed at ending crude oil theft and civil unrest in the Niger Delta. Fighting in the area has forced Shell, ChevronTexaco, and Total to shut down most of their oil wells in the western Delta. Nigeria is Africa's biggest oil producer and the fifth-biggest supplier of U.S. oil imports.

Armed gangs of pirates using barges prowl the Niger Delta swamplands, tapping into pipelines to steal 200,000-300,000 barrels per day of crude oil (about 10-15% of Nigeria's daily production). This liquid gold is transferred tanker trucks or ocean-going vessels, for sale abroad. While much of the stolen oil goes to west African refineries, some cargoes get as far as Europe (in particular to the Dutch port of Rotterdam).

Ten sailors from Senegal, Gambia and Ivory Coast were arrested by the Nigerian navy during an operation to halt oil smuggling over three weeks in August. Navy patrols also seized four sea-going tankers and a motorized barge involved in smuggling. - Adam Geibel

September 12, 2003 Nigeria continues to be plagued by serious corruption. The Army recently asked the public to turn in neighbors they knew were driving around with fake military stickers on their cars, in order to bypass security checkpoints.

Furthermore, the latest victim of the infamous Nigerian "419" scam was Egyptian Army General Abdul Azeez. He told a Nigerian court how he was duped of over $300,000 by Alumile Adedeji (aka Ade Bendel). Azeez was made to part with the money at various times in Lagos (Nigeria), London (United Kingdom) and Cotonou (Benin Republic). While in Nigeria, Azeez was lodged at the Federal Government Special Guest House, as patrol vehicles filled with men in police and army uniforms were stationed nearby, to give the impression that the deal was real. - Adam Geibel

September 15, 2003 A groups of young criminals burnt ten houses near Warri, and attempted to extort a local pastor. The clergyman shot and killed one, then fled to a police station. Antiriot police then hunted down the criminals and killed three more. The Nigerian Army's 7th Battalion had moved into the area to separate the battling groups and the military was committing ten aircraft to help with operations. Local activist groups have called on the central government to figure out a way to disarm these groups.

However, the Nigerian cops and troops don't always get along. On September 5, residents of one of the capital's upscale neighborhoods said soldiers arrived outside the elite Mobile Police force barracks and start shooting in the air, after a soldier had been arrested on suspicion of beating to death a local transport worker. Sporadic gunshots continued over the next hour. - Adam Geibel

September 17, 2003 Violence continues in Warri as police and soldiers try to break the power of gangster militias that have been using tribal tensions to expand their power. The gangs are opposed by local civic groups, often organized around church congregations, and merchants groups, organized around major markets. But the gangs have lots of teenage gunmen and the kids have a well deserved reputation for being reckless and ruthless. The army reinforcements, especially the additional machine-guns, has given the police enough firepower to face off against the gangs. Usually, after a few of the kid gunmen are shot down, the rest decide that it's time they got back to video games.

September 24, 2003 In addition to the tribal conflicts, which have been gradually escalating over the last few years, is added a potential for religious war. Several states in the Moslem north have imposed Sharia (Moslem religious) law in the last two years. According to the national constitution, citizens are supposed to be protected from religious persecution. Christians in the north see themselves as being vulnerable to harm from the broad application of Sharia law. Even people in the largely Christian south see the government's tolerance for Sharia law as opening up the possibility of Sharia going national. This would definitely touch off religious violence on a wide scale. Tribes tend to be either Moslem or Christian, and the religion angle has provided yet another reason for the formation of more tribal militias. The national government has tried to avoid involvement in the Sharia law issue, knowing that it could spark wide spread violence. And the situation is headed in that direction anyway.

October 4, 2003 The popularity of Sharia (Islamic) law in the northern Moslem states has proved to be a failure and a fraud. Few (less than half a dozen) of the savage punishments (amputation for theft, death for adultery) have been applied. No one has been executed. Perhaps most telling, Islamic scholars have declared that politicians stealing public money is not theft, but breach of trust (a much lesser offense under Sharia law). The crime rate is still high and the politicians are still corrupt. People are now looking towards vigilante or tribal militias for peace and justice, but these organizations tend to get taken over by crooks. Despair is widespread, as is the popularity of separatism. But the desire by the less corrupt and better organized tribes to form their own nation is one act that will unite the rest of the country to oppose it.

October 11, 2003 The latest worldwide survey of corruption again puts Nigeria near the bottom (but not at the bottom, a position now occupied by Bangladesh). The new, democratically elected government that was installed in 1999 promised to address the corruption issue. There have been attempts to do this, but there have been no results. The climate of theft and dishonesty still extends throughout society. Only within ones family or tribe is a measure of honesty expected. As a result, government does not really function, it only provides the spectacle of elected and appointed officials getting rich by looting the public treasury. The huge oil revenues disappear into a the pockets of government officials and don't reach the bulk of the citizens. Increasingly, violence is seen as the only way to enforce reform or, more often, to get a share of the loot. Such an atmosphere is common throughout Africa, and often leads to bloody, endless civil wars. As Africa's most populous nation, a civil war in Nigeria would be horrendous. But that's where the nation is headed.

October 21, 2003 Tribal violence in the oil producing Niger delta region has left at least four more dead. Some ten percent of the nations oil production remains shut down because of the armed bands roaming the area. Six months ago, some 30 percent of the nations oil export capacity was shut down. But the army has sent more troops in the area in an attempt to suppress the tribal unrest. This has proved difficult, as the armed groups are basically criminal gangs fighting over territory and lucrative smuggling rackets.

November 1, 2003 The country is still losing $3-4 million of oil shipments a day because of unrest in the Niger river delta oil fields and shut down pumping and pipeline facilities. While the army and navy are in the area trying to deal with the tribe based pirates and smuggling gangs, those activities have not caused the bad guys to move away or go into hiding.

Meanwhile, in the north, the growth of Islamic conservatism took a macabre turn when the governors of three northern states have banned any further efforts to immunize children against polio. The governors reacted to the charges from Islamic scholars that the polio immunization program was an effort by Christians to poison Moslem children. That sort of rumor has been common in Islamic countries, apparently in reaction to the fact that nearly all the medical (and other) cures come from Christian countries. To many Islamic conservatives, Christians are infidels (non-believers) and capable only of evil actions against Moslems. These rumors are generally ignored by parents eager to keep their children healthy. But the anti-Christian attitudes in northern Nigeria have become stronger and more bizarre because of the popular revulsion against government corruption (the federal government is now dominated by Christians from the south) and the efforts of northern (Moslem) politicians to shift blame for corruption and lawlessness from themselves to somewhere else. So the children are sacrificed. Refusal to have kids immunized is causing northern Nigeria to become a region that is "exporting" polio and other diseases.

November 4, 2003 Pirates killed five 'mobile' policemen in a raid on the Nun River between Otuan and Oporoma in the southern Niger delta. The ten policemen were caught unawares while they were busy checking a passenger boat and initially waved at the gunmen, mistakenly believing they were soldiers because they wore camouflage uniforms. The pirates moved in fast on a speedboat and sprayed them with automatic weapons. The cops jumped into the river, but only half survived. Commercial boat operators promptly abandoned the route when news made the rounds that pirates were in the area.

Prior to this incident, over 30 people (including eight policeman) had been killed by Nigerian pirates in 2003. On October 24 the Bayelsa State government announced that they were fielding the "Bayelsa Volunteers", a 400-man group of volunteers complementing police efforts in Nigeria's oil-rich Niger Delta region. In addition to combating piracy, they would help secure oil pipelines against thieves. While several vehicles had been bought for the "Bayelsa Volunteers", not a single marked boat had been sighted on the state waterways. The locals now doubt the government's intent and figure that it's political propaganda.

Nigerian waters rank pretty high in the global scourge of piracy. At the end of October, the International Maritime Bureau (IMB) said that during the first nine months of 2003 there had been 344 attacks (or attempted attacks) on ships at sea, at anchor or in port were reported worldwide compared to 271 in 2002 and 253 in 2001. The IMB said "the increase in violence is of great concern," and identified Indonesia, Bangladesh, Nigeria and the Malacca Straits (between Indonesia and Malaysia) as the prime hunting grounds of modern day Blackbeards. - Adam Geibel November 6, 2003 Offshore violence continues as police battle armed oil smugglers.

November 17, 2003 A dozen oil workers were released by Ijaw tribesmen who had seized last week. The oil companies paid off the tribesmen with cash and jobs (some real, some just make-work). The oil companies in the Niger delta spend over $60 million a year on bribes and social welfare programs to try and keep the peace in an area that gets little attention from the federal or state government. The locals know that the oil brings much wealth to someone, and that they don't get any of the benefit, but do have to put up with the smell and disruption of oil drilling. But even the social spending has not been able to buy protection for oil workers. So about 140,000 barrels a day of production has been halted for four months so far with no resumption in sight. Police and troops have not been able to insure peace, for the tribesmen operate in the jungles and marshes that security forces from outside the area are unfamiliar with. Another problem is that the corruption is so widespread that even government efforts to spend more of the oil money on local needs doesn't work. Most of the money is stolen before it can get to the villages, and the people who are carrying out the attacks against the oil operations.

November 20, 2003 The health crises continues in northern Nigeria, where Moslem leaders have been urging their followers not to let their children take polio vaccine. Years of anti-Christian, and especially anti-American Moslem propaganda has resulted in a widely believed fear that the vaccine actually makes the female children sterile and is part of a plot to kill off all Africans. Some of the Moslem religious leaders have admitted that this is absurd, but it is what many northern Nigerians believe and few leaders are willing to preach against it. Islamic religious leaders also have problems (as do their Christian compatriots) with the persistence of belief in magic. This is common throughout Africa, and is often used by local leaders to control populations. For example, an accusation of witchcraft can get you killed (often in a gruesome fashion) or driven from your village. This belief in magic plays an important role in African warfare and military affairs, usually to the detriment of the practitioners (as there have been no verified instances of magic making anyone bulletproof, while Western protective vests will.)

Since a lot of the hostility is directed against the US (which supplies most of the vaccine, and many of the field workers who help to deliver it), it has been suggested that if Americans were withdrawn from the program, it might be possible to convince Moslem parents to allow their children to be vaccinated. Polio outbreaks still occur in northern Nigeria, killing and crippling thousands of children each year. While this is tragic enough, the resistance to vaccination in northern Nigeria is preventing an attempt by the World Health Organization to wipe out polio completely.

November 21, 2003 Another instance of hostage-taken ended badly for the Ijaw pirates, which may mean that the Nigerian government has gotten fed up handing out concessions. The navy stormed ChevronTexaco's Middleton and Pennington oil platforms, freed all fourteen employees and arrested 30 hostage takers. The pirates (calling themselves ``Bini-Oru Security'') were armed with automatic weapons and hand grenades, submachine guns and AK-47 rifles. They used the creeks in the swampy waters leading to the flow station undetected.

Four other workers were released by their captors late on the 19th, but nothing is known about the fate of a number of others. In another incident on the same day, two naval officers were kidnapped and the Nigerian navy dispatched a warship to the remote area of the Niger delta.

Armed members of the Ijaw community attacked the two oil platforms in the southern Niger delta region on the 18th, and took eighteen Nigerians hostage (four were later released). The hostage takers had a laundry list of demands, all financially related. Meanwhile, the seizure of the platforms would cost Nigeria about $290 million in income daily.

Last week, a group from the same community took employees of ChevronTexaco hostage for a short time. - Adam Geibel

November 22, 2003 Oil production (23,000 barrels per day) was halted on four off shore platforms because of the kidnapping of 18 oil workers. Although the navy has retaken the platforms, two of the oil workers are still missing.

November 24, 2003 More on the ChevronTexaco hostage incident - the pirates put up more of a fight than usual when the Nigerian warship NNS Kyanwa swooped down on them. One was killed and a Chevron employee was seriously wounded in the course of the operation

The well-armed river pirates are becoming so prolific that local law enforcement is choosing discretion over valor. Police in Nigeria's Bayelsa State narrowly avoided combat with some of them on the 9th. The police began to mobilize for an assault on a group sighted on the Forcados River, when they were allegedly warned by local villagers that the "pirates" were really political thugs abandoned by their patrons and carrying weapons given to them by the military. However, the cops can't be blamed for be cautious, considering that eight policemen were mowed down on November 4.

Back in October, Nigeria created "Youth Vigilante" groups to combat piracy and pipeline vandalism, in the hope that peer pressure would limit other criminals. The groups supplement marine police patrols, which themselves were created to supplement failed Navy units' attempts to control crime on the area's waterways.

What effect does this have on America? The Nigerian oil platform drama (along with the multiple explosions in Istanbul, Turkey and reports of a possible decline in US crude oil stocks) sent oil prices to a high $32.92 per barrel at the New York Mercantile Exchange. Meanwhile, OPEC's Secretary General said the group will produce a half million barrels more per day per day, if prices remain above the $22-$28 a barrel band or drop it by the same volume if prices fell below the $22 mark. - Adam Geibel

November 25, 200 The Rivers State Governor condemned an outbreak of local violence between different "cult" groups that left 20 people dead in Port Harcourt City and it's suburbs. He promised that the state government would do everything possible to bring the perpetrators to justice. A member of the Nigerian House of Representatives has even advocated deploying the Nigerian armed forces for peace time duties curbing armed robbery. He somewhat cynically pointed out that since the military didn't have proper peacetime duties assigned to it, the Nigerian government was ever so willing to dispatch them to any peacekeeping operation in any part of the world. Apparently, the government is wary of deploying troops inside the country since there's a temptation that they would take that as an opportunity to meddle in civilian affairs.

While Nigeria still has the appearance of a unified country, there are plenty of brewing feuds and private armies that would gladly snap up illicit ammunition stockpiles. For instance, the governor of Anambra State accused the Federal Government of using the Federal police to destabilize the state. Apparently, the governor's estranged political godfather has been pulling strings to intimidate him, which has inspired the governor to start talking about forming his own state police force. - Adam Geibel

November 26, 2003 Senior customs officials have apparently grown apprehensive over the rising number of smuggling incidents involving arms and ammunition. The Nigeria Customs Service seized 38,000 cartridges being smuggled in a truck along Ore-Benin Expressway on the 24th, after seizing a similar shipment of 170,000 cartridges on the 17th. In both instances, the drivers of the cargo trucks ran off before the police were able to take them into custody.

Meanwhile, the Nigerian Army contingent manning the disputed Bakassi Peninsula has publicly complained about their inadequate pay. So have Nigerian military pensioners, who have not been paid in the last nine months. One of the worst things an African government can do while faced with internal strife is to alienate it's military by failing to keep them financially satisfied. - Adam Geibel

November 29, 2003 Two more kidnapped foreign oil workers have been released, another six are thought to be held captive for ransom or other concessions. The kidnappers are thought to be Ijaw tribesmen, organized into smuggling gangs.

November 30, 2003 The foreign oil companies are finding that they cannot depend on the Nigerian government (federal, state or local) and are increasingly depending on private security forces and hired diplomats (to deal with local groups.) While the federal government tries to assert it's authority in the oil producing delta region, these efforts are increasingly unsuccessful.

December 5, 2003 Tribe based criminal gangs continued to fight each other over control of smuggling and other lucrative rackets. At least fifty have died in battles involving Itsekiri and Ijaw tribesmen and police. In one case, Itsekiri men in up to three dozen speedboats fired on a coastal Ijaw village, causing many casualties. Police helicopters raided an Itsekiri village suspected as the source of the attack, and Itsekiri and Ijaw gunmen shot it out in various locations. It's like Chicago in the 1920s, except here the liquid lubricating all the violence is oil, instead of alcohol.

December 6, 2003 Moslem organizations have long dominated politics in the north, but are now being threatened by better organized and financed Christian missionaries advancing from the south. Nigeria has been a battleground for religions for centuries. First, Islamic missionaries from Arab lands to the north came south to convert followers of ancient animist religions. Two centuries ago, Christian missionaries entered from the coast. Since then, as most (but not all) of the animists in the coastal area became Christians, the missionaries began of both religions have been bumping into each other in central Nigeria. Islam sees itself under siege by stronger Christian missionary efforts. There is increasing violence as young Moslem men attack local churches and missionaries. Christians organize militias to defend themselves. The government, often unable to muster sufficient police or troops to put down the violence, tolerates the militias. But these organizations of armed men are the beginnings of private armies. And this is an essential element in any future civil war.

December 25, 2003 Fearing that Islamic radical gangs are organizing in the north, earlier this week, police raided two Islamic schools in the central Nigerian city of Jos. Three people were killed and two wounded in the operation. Central Nigeria is now the scene of the most violence between Christians and Moslems, as this is where you have the largest amount of mixing between Christian and Moslem populations. Further south, oil, gangsters and tribal rivalries continue to cause death and mayhem. Heavily armed young men from the Ijaw and Itsekiri tribes travel through the coastal delta region, stealing oil and shooting at each other. In nine months of this violence, the government has sent in over 3,000 soldiers. This has reduced the mayhem to the point where oil production is at 90 percent of capacity, rather than 60 percent last Summer, before most of the troops arrived. The government is still inefficient and corrupt when it comes to spending its oil revenues. So a drop in oil revenues hurts corrupt politicians more than ordinary citizens. The tribes of the Delta region have found that they can get benefit from the oil by stealing it. Tapping into pipelines, the crude oil is put in small boats or trucks and brought to larger ships where middlemen buy the crude and then bribe their way out of the area (if they encounter the Nigerian navy) and sell the crude oil at ports in neighboring countries. It's estimated that about ten percent of Nigeria's oil production is lost this way. That's a billion dollars a year at current oil prices, although the Delta gangs get as little as half of that. Still, that's a lot of money for an unemployed teenager with an AK-47 and a speedboat (the two things a young Delta guy wants to get a hold of.) That much money is also worth fighting and dying for. The Ijaw have taken the lead in organizing oil stealing gangs, giving them a numbers and firepower edge over the other tribes. But the gangs also battle each other, regardless of tribal affiliation. There are dozens of gangs and thousands of gang members, although for many the participation is part time and sporadic. The oil gang violence has left several hundred dead in the past year, but has made many more rich, or much better off economically. The country is in danger of being torn apart by disputes over oil wealth and religious supremacy.

December 30, 2003 Some 200 Islamic militants attacked two police stations in northeastern Nigerian state of Yobe. Hundreds of civilians and police fled, but the government sent police and army reinforcements. Islamic radicals have been demanding the use of Islamic law for years, and some states in the Islamic north have complied. But enforcement has been lax. This is the first time that Islamic radicals have taken up arms and attacked the police (which are controlled by the national government.)

January 1, 2004 Small scale fighting continues in the north between police and Islamic radicals. There appear to be few casualties, but much posturing and firing of weapons at nothing in particular.

January 4, 2004 After five days of fighting, police have put down a rebellion by Islamic radicals in the north. Two police and at least six of the 200 Islamic radicals were killed. Several of the Islamic radicals were arrested and it appears that they belong to an Islamic radical group composed largely of college students. The group, calling themselves the Muhajirun, based their activities on the Taliban of Afghanistan. Most Nigerian Moslems are not keen on radical Islam. The wide popularity of Islamic (Sharia) law in northern Nigeria was as a possible solution to the crime and corruption that has crippled Nigeria for decades. Faced with this reaction, groups of more determined Nigerian Moslems are organizing and arming so that they can impose Sharia by force.

January 5, 2004 Niger arrested seven suspected Islamic militants on charges of complicity in an uprising in neighboring Nigeria and has offered to extradite them. Meanwhile, the Yobe State governor claims that other suspects have been rounded up and a Nigeria police spokesman noted that they had brought the remote northeast region under control. Whether merely wishful thinking or actual success, the government's proclamations can't erase the potential problem of Islamic radicals and if left to fester, this group (and others) could severely affect Nigeria's economy and American oil supplies.

Contrary to earlier reports that it was Nigeria's old "Maitatsine" group, this newer group has been described as university students from Maiduguri, the capital of neighboring Borno state. Their Al Sunna Wal Jamma ("Followers of the Prophet") sect has been active for the past two years in northeastern Nigeria, preaching strict adherence to Islamic Shari'ah law and professing admiration for the Taliban movement in Afghanistan. After seizing guns and ammunition from police posts near the northern border with Niger, they raised flags with "Afghanistan" written on them at a nearby primary school.

They then passed out flyers printed with their goals: to carve out the areas of Kanamma, Yunusari and Toshiya from Nigeria and create an Islamic state, to place these areas under the leadership of Mullah Umar (the fugitive former leader of the Taliban movement), to kill any 'unbeliever in uniform' (presumably policemen and soldiers) and to call on the Muslims in the country to rise up for Jihad (Holy War) to defend Islam and establish justice.

The local press also reported that they are called "Hijrah", which means 'migration' and refers to the Prophet's migration from Mecca to Medinah. Despite their ability to cause a week-long panic, the military potential of these new group is pretty weak. They obviously lack a cache of arms and munitions, as well as any external source.

Unlike the Taliban, these Nigerian radicals don't have decades of combat experience nor as children of Nigeria's privileged, were they raised in a gun culture like Afghanistan's. Furthermore, the only casualties they have inflicted have been amongst Nigerian police caught by surprise.

While the Nigerian military has it's share of drawbacks, it currently remains in a position of strength and is moving with determination. An armored battalion of 500 just entered the area, reinforcing elements of the 21st Armored Brigade, the Recon Battalion and police units already searching for these former students.

So what set off these supposedly peaceful fundamentalists? No one gave it a second thought several months ago, when the Hijrah moved out into a rural part of Yobe State to "live in peace and engage in studies and farming," so as to alleviate themselves from the 'burden' of interacting with a 'sinful' Nigerian society.

Prior to last week's attack, the group had been approached at their bush commune by a committee made up of a number of religious scholars (and encouraged by the local government) to persuade the fundamentalists to leave the area. The public had apparently been grumbling, a predictable reaction by poor farmers to wealthy new neighbors. The Hijrah had initially agreed to disperse but then made an about-turn and attacked the local police post.

Nigeria's population of 126 million is roughly split evenly between Muslims and Christians. Discontent has increased since a dozen northern states began to adopt strict Shari'ah law, since radical Muslim groups have accused the state governments of less-than-zealous implementation of these laws.

Nigeria has been plagued by heretical Muslim sects before. The Maitatsine movement of about 3,000 believers, led by Alhajji Muhammadu Marwa (aka Maitatsine), precipitated an eleven-day emergency in late December 1980 that saw over 4,000 deaths and 1,000 arrests, including 224 foreigners. The Kano riots were suppressed by the army and the air force, after the police failed to restore order. - Adam Geibel

January 7, 2004 A few Islamic radicals continued to fought police in northeastern Nigeria, and at least seven more radicals were killed. Another 47 radicals were arrested over the past few days. Apparently some 200 armed Islamic radicals, trying to bring a little Taliban type activity to Africa, were involved. Over 10,000 civilians fled the fighting between the radicals and police.

January 12, 2004 In southwest Nigeria, rival clans fought over who would be provide the new tribal leader, leaving 22 dead before police could intervene.

January 15, 2004 In the central Nigerian state of Minna, seven people died as political party militias clashed over accusations of voter fraud. The Moslem area has recently seen organized opposition to the traditional political groups that have long ruled through a traditional emir. Throughout Nigeria, traditional leaders, often hereditary, have also been historically corrupt. Reform minded Nigerians are organizing local political parties to try and change this. But politics in Nigeria is also fought with fists and weapons, and the reformers are dealing with that as well.

January 16, 2004 In the Delta region, police clashed with one of the tribe based criminal gangs, leaving ten Ijaw men dead. The army and navy have been cracking down on the gangs, and their main source of income; smuggling stolen (from pipelines and storage areas) oil. In the last week, nearly three dozen gang members have been arrested and many weapons seized.

January 25, 2004 Moslem religious leaders in northern Nigeria continue to urge their followers not to let their children take polio vaccine. Because of this, polio has killed or crippled hundreds of children in the last year, and the disease, which was on the verge of being wiped out (like smallpox was in the 1970s), is spreading to neighboring countries. Years of anti-Christian, and especially anti-American Moslem propaganda has resulted in a widely believed fear that the vaccine actually makes the female children sterile and is part of a plot to kill off all Africans. Some of the Moslem religious leaders have admitted that this is absurd, but it is what many northern Nigerians believe and few religious leaders are willing to preach against it. The government organized tests of the vaccine to disprove the accusations. But some Moslem leaders refuse to believe any test results that contradict their beliefs.

Much of the anger up north is really all about money and power. For decades, northern men ran the national government, and funneled much of the stolen oil wealth up north. But the current government, an anti-corruption one, is largely southerners. While the corruption is still there, all that cash flowing north is not there any more. That money is missed.

February 1, 2004 Three oil workers were kidnapped for ransom in the Delta region. This is increasingly common, as the kidnappers have a good chance of getting some money and escaping capture and punishment.

February 5, 2004 Fighting between tribe based criminal gangs continues in the Delta area. Shooting has been heard for most of the last week. Most of the gun battles are taking place in villages, and the dead bodies disposed of before journalists or police arrive. This violence was apparently sparked by a dispute over who would represent some Ijaw tribe villages who were claiming compensation from oil companies for an oil spill. Who to pay compensation too is a tricky business, as the local civilians are sometimes cowed by local criminal gangs into letting the crooks take the money.

Other groups have threatened sabotage of oil facilities if the government does not remove government officials in the oil region who are thought to be corrupt.

February 6, 2004 The navy recovered the body of the sailor abducted on the 1st by criminal youths, while on duty to escorting a barge carrying oil equipment valued at $50 million. Local leaders were considering taking legal action against the Naval authorities, for linking them with the abduction of the sailor, three Nigerian oil workers and the barge. The crew members had been released earlier and the tug boat recovered. Nigeria, the world's seventh biggest oil exporter, has lost billions of dollars over the years to ethnic fighting, hostage taking and the seizure of oil facilities. - Adam Geibel

February 7, 2004 Nigeria has rejected a North Korean offer to buy missiles, after Washington raised concerns over the possible purchase from a nation it has labeled part of an "axis of evil". Nigeria did not immediately reassure the US it would turn down the offer when North Korea first made it the week before and US diplomats then met with the Nigerian government and hinted at possible sanctions.

During discussions between the Nigerian and North Korean Vice Presidents at the end of January, North Korea offered to assist Nigeria in the area of missile technology and defense technology. The Nigerians initially insisted that the North Korean offer had been on the table for a while and included training of army personnel, defense cooperation and missile technology, but definitely nothing to do with nuclear weapons or weapons of mass destruction.

After the imposition of sanctions by many Western nations, Nigeria turned to North Korea (as well as China, Russia and India) for military equipment and training. Nigeria already had a supply of Soviet surface-to-air missiles, but that they were in a poor state of repair. While Nigeria is now a key ally of the United States in Africa, they have also been reaching out to Asia in an effort to attract investment and alliances. The government has assured that its weapons are needed for security and peacekeeping.

Nigeria's Vice President has attached a great deal of importance to the second Nigeria/North Korea Joint Commission's outcome scheduled for March. Both countries want to develop economically viable projects in agriculture, solid minerals, small scale cement and state industries, foundry, housing, small scale hydroelectric generating stations as well as culture and tourism.

Whether North Korea offered the Nigerians short ranged ballistic missiles or simply to repair their SAMs is immaterial. The simple fact that North Korea wants to get cozier with Nigeria could indicate consequences for America if the situation ever got hot along the 38th Parallel again. The North Koreans would be in a position to sabotage the local oil industry. Nigeria is America's fifth-largest oil supplier. - Adam Geibel

February 14, 2004 At least nine people were hacked to death when a mainly Christian tribal militia group attacked a rival Muslim village, the latest outbreak of communal violence in central Nigeria. The immediate cause of the violence was unclear. - Adam Geibel

February 19, 2004 As a reminder of how vulnerable Nigeria's oil industry is, an oil spill involving four flow stations in Bayelsa State led to the closure of Shell Petroleum Development Company's 420,000 barrels per day production facility in the area. The oil company quickly cried sabotage and an investigation revealed three holes drilled in the top of the pipeline by oil thieves.

Meanwhile, Elf Petroleum Nigeria Limited has undergone a major restructuring in order to boost the French company's crude oil and gas production in 2004. The company also said it was hoping to develop deep offshore projects to improve on its daily crude oil production capacity. - Adam Geibel

February 20, 2004 Nigerian secret police arrested the Sudanese head of a Saudi-funded charity and accused him of funding a short-lived but bloody Islamic rebellion. The arrest comes amid growing evidence of foreign involvement in Islamist militancy in Nigeria, which Osama bin Laden once claimed was being ripe for an Islamic revolution.

In late December 2003, a group of young Nigerian Muslims launched a small-scale uprising in northeastern Nigeria, calling for an Islamic state.

They fought a series of clashes with security forces, but were apparently dispersed after about two weeks of fighting left at least two police and more than a dozen rebels dead. Around 47 of the Islamists were taken into custody. - Adam Geibel

February 24, 2004 Almost 900 policemen have been dismissed for corruption and extortion within the past two years, as part of an exercise to clean up the police force. These corrupt cops were arrested in various parts of the country, tried, found guilty and sacked by the police authorities. By flushing law enforcement of it's bad apples, Nigeria is strengthening it's ability to deal with internal concerns before they boil over into exchanges of gunfire.

Four Nigerian riot police were ambushed on February 19 by a Muslim militia in tit-for-tat sectarian fighting in the central state of Plateau, bringing the death toll from two weeks of violence to 14. However, these lethal disagreements were for more mundane reasons that politics or Islamic fervor.

But Islamic insurgency is still a cloud on Nigeria's horizon. Last week, Chief of Army Staff warned that some religious insurgents are plotting to unleash fresh havoc and advised those behind the plot to drop the idea or face the Army's wrath. This threat was uncovered after the recent uprising in Yobe State, whereby some religious bigots overran some villages and killed dozens of people. However, he also lamented that security agents had failed to identify problems before they get out of hand and the lack of cooperation between security agencies. - Adam Geibel

February 28, 2004 At least 40 people have been killed in fresh round of sectarian fighting in central Nigeria, bringing the death toll in two weeks of tit-for-tat violence to 150. Christians in Plateau State turned on their Muslim neighbors on the 26th, to avenge the killing of about 90 people on the 24th by Islamic fighters in a nearby town (including 48 butchered at a church). The attackers in both incidences used cutlasses and swords, slashing their victims' throats and then burning their bodies. There were also reports of AK-47 toting youths in the area, adding to the mayhem.

The army and police units had moved into the area to evacuate about 3,000 Muslims from Gerkawa to Yelwa, now deserted by Christians who have fled to Shendam for fear of fresh attacks. Troops and riot police also put up roadblocks, to try to stop the fighting from spreading as threats of more reprisals raised the potential for fresh violence. An estimated 10,000 people have been killed in communal and religious violence in Nigeria since 1999, 15 years of military rule ended with President Obasanjo's election. - Adam Geibel

February 29, 2004 Police arrested 59 suspects over the bloody attack on a farming community in central Nigeria's Plateau State. The situation in Yelwa was reportedly calm, days after the attack by nomadic fighters who slaughtered residents who had taken shelter in a church. The fighting was triggered by tribal and religious feuds between Hausa/Fulani and Taroh (who are doing the raiding recently).-- Adam Geibel

March 1, 2004 Religious violence is getting more organized in central Nigeria, along the invisible border that separates the largely Moslem north from the largely Christian south. While over 10,000 have been killed in religious strife since 1999, most of that was during riots and general disorder. What's happening now is an organized Moslem group in the Plateau State that is going around massacring dozens of Christians at a time. At least a hundred are known dead so far. Four police have been killed by this group as well in the past month. The Islamic group has not identified itself, but Christians in central Nigeria are terrified.

March 9, 2004 Gunfire broke out in the Delta town of Warri. Soldiers and members of local Ijaw gangs apparently had a dispute over drugs some soldiers had bought, but refused to pay for. Things escalated into a major fire fight that left as over 20 dead and many more wounded. Police arrested 79 people. Thousands of troops and police have been sent to the oil rich Delta region to pacify the tribe based criminal gangs. But discipline among the soldiers is often lax, leading to problems with drunkenness, drug use and violence against civilians.

March 10, 2004 A sharp increase in lethal attacks on senior politicians and government officials has caused panic among the nation's leadership. No one has announced a program to go after national leaders. If these attacks are coordinated, it could mean an operation trying to frighten rivals of the ruling party (the PDP) and those who are campaigning against corruption. This is all speculation, but the attacks are real.

March 12, 2004 Thanks to recent kidnappings, British underwriters have classified Nigeria as a War Zone. The implication of the notice for cancellation is that ships sailing to Nigeria would pay higher premium to get cover from underwriters. Local marine underwriters said it was not right to classify the whole country as a war-prone zone, suggesting that the area in question should be defined by latitude and longitude. - Adam Geibel

March 14, 2004 Two warships recently acquired from the United States are to be deployed to Warri to fight bunkering, pipe-line vandalizing and other violent activities, while the three warships formerly deployed in Warri are now to be deployed to Calabar for a more effective policing of the entire Niger-Delta and the nation's Maritime resources.

Nigerian troops denied a claim by an activist group that a special military task force stationed in the volatile region near the southern oil town of Warri opened fire on unarmed villagers, killing at least 51 people. The

March 9 incident occured only hours after a soldier was killed in a clash with an armed gang. - Adam Geibel

March 16, 2004 The Minority Leader of Nigeria's State House declared that dismissed armed forces members may be responsible for the spate of political killings ravaging the country. Last week, the convoys of the Governors of Benue and Lagos States were attacked by large groups of armed men, four days apart. - Adam Geibel

March 21, 2004 Plateau State, in central Nigeria, has been pacified as additional troops and police have forced tribal militias to back off or disperse. But there are still 60,000 refugees from the weeks of unrest who have yet to return to their homes. This will cause problems, because bands of armed tribal militiamen are still wandering around, looting abandoned homes and attacking any civilians they find.

March 26, 2004 In Plateau State, Christian tribesmen attacked a Moslem village. Nearby security forces intervened, and the ensuing violence left at at least twenty dead.

March 31, 2004 The recently completed national elections left at least 46 dead, and complaints in many states that local strongmen had rigged elections in their favor.

April 2, 2004 Government investigators have interviewed 28 military officers after receiving reports that officers were trying to organize a coup and take over the government. Since 1966, there have been five military takeovers of the government. Most of the officers investigated were Moslem. About half the population is Moslem, most of them in the north of the country. Most of the governments since 1966 have been dominated by Moslems, but the current one is largely run by Christians.

April 6, 2004 Weekend violence in Kaduna state left a police station vandalized and ten Christian churches destroyed by Moslem mobs. A Christian teenager was accused to tearing a page from a copy of the Koran. Additional police were sent to Kaduna. The Christian minorities are at more risk in the north, than are the Moslem minorities in the south because the Moslem conservatives are preaching violence against non-Moslems.

April 7, 2004 In the northeast, political violence in Taraba state left at least 30 dead over the last week. The election was held March 27, and young men of the losing party went on a murderous rampage to protest their loss.

April 14, 2004 Religious and tribal violence continued in central Nigeria's Plateau state. Three died when Moslems attacked a Christian village. In the last two months, 223 have died in the fighting between Moslem and Christian tribes.

April 15, 2004 For the last two weeks, the government has been investigating the activities of several hundred military officers and civilians, who are suspected of planning a coup to take over the government. There have been six such coups in the past four decades.

April 16, 2004 The campaign by some Moslem clerics in the north to forbid polio immunization has led to the spread of the disease to previously polio-free areas in west and central Africa. Among the countries seeing their first cases of polio in many years are Benin, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chad, Ghana, Ivory Coast and Togo. The Nigerian mullahs insisted that the immunization was a Western plot to sterilize Moslem women with contaminated polio vaccine. It has taken nearly two years to deal with these absurd accusations, and in the meantime thousands of children in Nigeria and neighboring countries have gotten polio. Although the local governments in northern Nigeria now allow the vaccinations, some Islamic activists still preach avoidance of the polio vaccine.

April 17, 2004 Attacks by bands of Ijaw men on other tribes have left some fifty people dead. The Ijaw claim to be the largest tribe in the Niger delta oil region, and say that they are not getting their fair share of benefits from the oil production. Actually, few locals got much benefit from the oil operations. Most of the profits were stolen by government officials. For years, most of that money went to Moslems officials from the north. But now, less of the money is being stolen, and what is taken is going more to corrupt Christian officials from the south. But the tribes in the delta have become more militant in demanding a share of the wealth. The cutting edge of this has been gangs of young men who also engage in stealing oil (by tapping into pipelines), smuggling and other scams.

April 30, 2004 Gunmen ambushed a boat in the Niger Delta, killing three navy personnel and two American oil workers. The army and navy have been battling heavily armed tribal gangs in the delta. As a result of the violence, about ten percent of oil production (worth nearly five million dollars a day) has been suspended.

May 1, 2004 Over the last week, tribal violence has resumed in Nigeria's Plateau state. There, Moslems and Christian tribes battled over land use (Moslem herders versus Christian farmers.) This time there were about 1,100 casualties, including a hundred dead. Some 25,000 people fled the area, although 80 percent of those have since returned. Plateau state, in the center of the country, is where the largely Moslem north meets the largely Christian south. The tribal animosities are compounded by the religious and lifestyle (herder versus farmer) differences. The local and national governments have been unable to effectively deal with the disputes, which are becoming more violent as more people purchase cheap weapons. Since the 1990s, millions of Cold War surplus AK-47s and other weapons have been pouring into Africa, mainly from Eastern Europe. Tribal violence, which previously had been mostly shouting, shoving matches and brawls, are not deadly gun battles or one sided massacres.

May 3, 2004 Oil companies in the Niger delta are shutting down pumping operations rather than continue to deal with violence and extortion by local tribal gangs. The tribal violence is partly directed at the government, whose officials have stolen most of the oil profits and not shared much of the oil revenue with the tribes in the oil region. The oil companies have tried to make deals, spending millions of dollars on public works and bribes, but it has not stopped the violence. The government, alarmed at the oil company plans (which will cut government revenue by millions of dollars a year), has sent more troops and police into the area. But this has just given the tribe based gangs more targets.

May 4, 2004 Police used violence to put down anti-government demonstrations in the capital. Corruption and government ineffectiveness is a growing source of disconte.

May 5, 2004 Fighting between Christian and Moslem tribes in central Nigeria continue, leaving nearly a hundred dead so far this week, with many more wounded and thousands fleeing the violence.

May 7, 2004 Government workers and journalists finally reached Moslem villages in central Nigeria that had been the scene of an attack by Christian gangs. Apparently, over 500 Moslem civilians were killed. This was the largest death toll in the series of tribal raids against Christian and Moslem villages in the area that has left thousands dead in the past few years.

May 12, 2004 Additional police arrived in the northern city of Kano and restored peace after two days of attacks by Moslem mobs against any Christians they could find. The attacks, which left at least ten dead, were in retaliation for the hundreds of Moslem dead in religious strife in central Nigeria. While there is some fear that Christian mobs, in the largely Christian south, will retaliate against their Moslem majority, most of the violence has been coming from the Moslems. Islamic clerics have been preaching against infidels (non-Moslems) and the need to adopt Sharia (Moslem religious law) for all Nigerians. Some states in northern Nigeria are trying to do that, but are meeting resistance from Christians who still want to enjoy their pork and beer.

May 14, 2004 The senior Islamic cleric in the northern city of Kano ordered all Christians to leave the city immediately. Violence against Christians in Kano has already caused more than 30,000 people, mostly Christians, to flee the city.

May 17, 2004 Fighting broke out along the Cameroon border, between troops and tribal militia. There were also several gun battles between police and gangs in the Delta area, which left half a dozen dead.

May 20, 2004 Anti-Christian violence in the northern city of Kano has left over 500 Christians dead, and twelve churches destroyed. The Moslem mobs doing all the dirty work insist they are part of a Jihad (holy war) against non-Moslems in Nigeria.

Meanwhile, the president has replaced the elected governor of Plateau State with a retired general and ordered the new governor to quell the violence between Christians and Moslems there. This angered the Christians in Plateau State, who see the removal of their governor as a concession to Moslems, who the Christians see as the aggressors. A lot of the religious violence goes back to ancient tribal conflicts between the Fulani tribes, who are largely herders and Moslem, and other tribes who have come into contact with the Fulani, but are farmers and largely Christian.

Christians are also angry over the use of Islamic law in northern, largely Moslem, states. This religious law is being imposed on non-Moslems, despite protests from the federal government and the non-Moslems involved. There is growing fear of a civil war along religious and tribal lines.

May 22, 2004 Plateau state, wracked by tribal and religious violence, is trying to buy weapons from the tribal warriors. It is offering $730 for each rifle, and $180 for home made rifles and pistols (lengths of pipe modified to fire bullets short distances). There will also be rewards of $140 for tips that lead to hidden weapons and ammunition. The gun buyback program ends on June 7. After that, aggressive search operations will go after illegal weapons. The introduction of cheap (as little as a hundred bucks for an AK-47) weapons in Africa during the 1990s made these tribal conflicts much more deadly. No longer did just the biggest and strongest men go on these raids, armed with bows, spears and machetes. With AK-47s, slightly built teenagers could go along and mow down big men armed with spears. The casualty rate has increased because of all the firearms. Moreover, with so many tribesmen equipped with the guns, the police and army no longer had a firepower advantage over the rampaging tribes. In Plateau state, for example, soldiers sent to guard villages often rush back to their military compounds at night, rather than risk a night time raid by teenagers with guns.

May 25, 2004 Over 30,000 civilians have fled their homes in Plateau state, to avoid religious conflict. The most common form of violence is a night time raid on a village by a few dozen men. Those who cannot flee are killed and the place is looted. Over 3,000 people have died in Plateau state this way in the last three years.

May 27, 2004 The last holdout state governor in northern Nigeria has agreed to allow polio immunization to proceed. Last year, Islamic clerics demanded that polio immunization cease because of rumors that the vaccine would make female children sterile. This was seen as a plot by infidel Westerners to destroy Islam. As a result, hundreds of children in Nigeria and neighboring countries have been killed or paralyzed by polio. This kind of paranoid rumor is a direct result of the sensationalistic and anti-Western style of the Islamic mass media. For those who doubt the damage that the sensationalistic, distorted and hateful style of Islamic journalism does no harm, take a look at the polio victims in northern Nigeria.

May 28, 2004 In central Nigeria, raids by Christian and Moslem tribes against each other continues, with several dozen dead and wounded each week. Similar violence is taking place in the southern delta region, as tribe based gangs battle police and each other over the illegal (by tapping pipelines) oil trade. In the north, the Moslem majority has become increasingly intolerant and violent with the Christian minority. State governments in the north are still trying to impose Sharia (Islamic) law on everyone. This contradicts the federal constitution, and remains unresolved. These ethnic and religious disputes were largely suppressed during decades of military rule. But in five years of democratic rule, the ethnic and religious violence has left at least 12,000 dead, and many more wounded and homeless. The religious issue, in particular, threatens to split the country.

June 4, 2004 At dawn, soldiers and sailors fought several battles with tribe based criminal gangs outside Port Harcourt, the main city in the Niger Delta's oil region. Several dozen people were killed, both gangsters and civilians. The military won't admit anything, but it is suspected that armed military speedboats attacked a village controlled by one of the Ijaw gangs.

June 5, 2004 In the north, police are trying to stop gangs of young Moslem men from attacking Christian neighborhoods in the city of Kano. Demonstrations have been banned and police patrols increased. Violence four weeks ago left dozens dead and over 20,000 refugees (most Christian.) Kano has a population of about seven million.

Tribal violence has died down in central Nigeria's Plateau state, but this is mainly because of the thousands of additional police and troops sent to the area. The tension, and thousands of armed civilians, are still there.

June 6, 2004 Police operations against pirate gangs in the Delta region left at least 17 alleged pirates dead.

June 10, 2004 Religious violence continues in northeast Nigeria, with several dozen dead in Adamawa state. Christians attacked a mosque construction project, angered that the minaret was being built too high. Last year, religious violence caused another mosque on the same site to be burned down.

June 13, 2004 Police operations against pirate gangs in the Delta region left at least five pirates and one soldier dead.

June 15, 2004 The theft of oil in the Delta region is a big business. Currently, about 100,000 barrels a day are taken by gangs that simply punch a hole in one of the pipelines, fill up barrels or tanker trucks, and sell the oil to brokers for $22 a barrel. That's $800 million a year going to tribe based gangs. But the money is spread around among a population of several million people in the areas where most of the oil is stolen. The gangs buy consumer and luxury goods, weapons, vehicles and boats. The current military offensive against the gangs is a government attempt to get on top of the situation before the gangs become the de facto government in many areas. There's also a problem with gangs fighting each other over access to areas, crossed by pipelines, that are less frequently patrolled by the police.

June 16, 2004 Tribal land disputes in the southeast have left eight dead, and nearly 30,000 homeless as they fled the violence.

June 20, 2004 In northeastern Nigeria, nine Islamic radicals tried to break out of prison. Three were killed and the rest captured.

June 21, 2004 Political violence in Nigeria's central Benue state has killed another 14 people in the last week. In the last three months, the violence has killed over 150. Tribe based parties used militias to intimidate and kill opponents during elections.

June 23, 2004 Over a week of gang violence at the country's leading university (Ibadan), has left nine students dead. The student gangs are considered cults, and constantly menace each other, and university staff, with weapons.

June 27, 2004 Plateau State, in central Nigeria, has thousands of soldiers and police searching for illegal weapons. One such search party attracted a large crowd of angry villagers. The soldiers, thinking they were about to be attacked, opened fire and killed two civilians, and wounded several others. The Christian and Moslem gangs in Plateau state have refused to give up their weapons, even after the government offered a generous buy-back program ($1,515 for an automatic weapon, like an AK-47, and and $189 for home made rifles.) The buy-back program ended on June 7th, with only a few weapons being turned in.

July 3, 2004 Armed resistance is growing in the oil rich delta region. The armed resistance is financed and motivated by about 100,000 barrels of oil that is stolen each day from the pipelines that crisscross the region.
With the world oil price at $35 or higher, the delta region oil thieves can get $20-25 a barrel from middlemen who smuggle the oil out of the country in small tankers. The thieves use trucks with oil tanks mounted in the back, and just drill a hole in a oil pipeline and grab as much oil as their tank will hold, and then take off before the police and pipeline repair crew shows up. The thieves are making enough money to buy fast trucks and plenty of weapons. The thieves are also getting organized, and fighting over control of territory. But the leaders of these oil stealing gangs are becoming quite powerful, as some of them control over a thousand gunmen. The government was slow to send additional army and navy units into the delta, and the oil thieves are holding their own against government forces. The oil gangs have no political ambitions, aside from tribal loyalties and a general hatred of the federal government (which for decades has taken the oil profits and gave little of the money back to the people of the oil region.) But that could change as the oil warlords begin to realize how powerful they are.

July 13, 2004 The United States has offered military training and special equipment to Nigeria, to support the efforts to bring peace to the increasingly unstable oil region along the coast. Much of that oil goes to the United States, and the unrest increasingly threatens to stop the flow of oil.

July 15, 2004 In the last 24 hours, fighting between police and oil theft gangs in the delta region has left at least a dozen dead. Gang boss Dokubu Asari, who claims to be leading an Ijaw tribal militia (fighting for Ijaw rights), has some 2,000 armed men at his disposal. But what really keeps the Asari gang going is stealing oil from the hundreds of kilometers of pipelines crisscrossing the delta region. The current fighting arose when police and troops raided gangster armories to seize illegal weapons.

July 19, 2004 The northern state of Kano has ordered polio immunizations to resume, after a ten month halt because of rumors that the vaccine was actually a Western plot to make Moslem women sterile. The halt in vaccinations led to thousands of additional cases of polio, 77 percent of them Nigerian, but most of the remainder in ten other African nations, and with a strain of polio from Nigeria. Many Moslem religious leaders in northern Nigeria still believe that the vaccine is "tainted" and should be avoided. So it's uncertain how effective the vaccination campaign will be in stopping the polio outbreak. This part of Africa is one of the few places in the world where polio is still common, and the vaccination campaign was an effort to wipe out polio completely.

July 20, 2004 Religious violence has flared up again in central Nigeria's Plateau State as refugees return. More police are being sent to insure that the refugees can return peacefully.

July 21, 2004 With one of the highest crime rates in the world, the police have become rather casual in handing out the death penalty on the spot. So have vigilante groups, some of them sponsored by local politicians. Every month, 100-200 people, often very bad people, are killed on the spot for actual or suspected criminal activity. But many of the dead are simply people who had a dispute with the police or vigilantes. Deaths often result when the police and vigilantes use their license to kill to enhance their fund raising activities (extortion being a favorite technique.)

August 13, 2004 With over 5,000 troops stationed in the oil rich Niger river delta area, the battles with the local criminal gangs continues. There are also tribal conflicts between the Urhobos, Itsekiris and Ijaws. The rising price of oil has made the gangs wealthier, better armed and bolder in their oil stealing operations. The gangs use their speedboats and automatic weapons to terrorize other tribes. Drive by shootings, and occasional raids, make everyone nervous.

American army and navy forces will be holding joint training exercises in the Niger delta area. No dates have been set.

August 20, 2004 In the Delta region, a dispute over who would become chief of a tribe led to violence that left at least 22 dead over the past week. Oil companies make royalty payments to the tribes in the Delta, and the chiefs handle the money. So becoming chief is a big issue, that sometimes leads to violence.

August 31, 2004 Additional police patrolled the coastal oil city of Port Harcourt, after weekend gang violence left at least three dead. Gang related feuds are getting out of control, because many of the young men belonging to these gangs are heavily armed, feckless and fearless.

September 2, 2004 A group of men armed with automatic weapons, walked into a crowded Port Harcourt restaurant and opened fire. They killed nine people, then got into their cars and drove away, shooting at people on the street, killing another nine. This took place in the middle of the coastal oil producing region, where heavily armed criminal gangs make millions of dollars a year stealing oil from pipelines, extorting the oil companies and other criminal activities. Police have been unable to put a stop to the mayhem. The gangs are tribe based, as are many of the neighborhoods and rural districts. This leads to bloody raids as the tribe based gangs try to take over new territory and intimidate their rivals.

September 3, 2004 Fighting between heavily armed gangs is increasing in the oil rich Delta region. Many of the armed gangs were formed, and armed, last year by politicians competing for provincial office. The political gangs were used to intimidate voters who supported rivals. Voting is often along tribal lines, so the political gangs are tribal as well. However, some of the political gangs did not receive the promised cash payments after the election, refused to turn in their weapons, and went into business as criminal gangs.

September 4, 2004 Joshua Dariye, the elected governor of Plateau State, which has been the scene of bloody tribal conflict most of this year, was arrested in Britain and questioned about criminal activity. Police found over three million dollars in cash in his apartment. Nigeria's president suspended Dariye for six months in May, for not responding to the tribal problems in Plateau State. In fact, when fighting broke out there earlier this year, Dariye was in Britain, and refused to rush home right away. Dariye has apparently been involved in the usual theft of government money, and money laundering in Britain. The extent of this corruption in Nigeria is a major cause of tribal, and general, unrest with the government. The corruption also encourages fighting between tribes, religious groups and political parties, because not everyone believes they are getting their fair share of the loot.

September 15, 2004 A small team of American sailors and SEAL commandoes trained with the Nigerian navy along the coast of the oil producing Delta region.

September 17, 2004 Oil thieves triggered another explosion in the coastal oil region, as they assembled to take oil leaking from a pipeline the thieves had punched holes in. A spark or open flame ignited the oil fumes and killed at least thirty people, while injuring many more.

September 18, 2004 Fighting between competing gangs, and the police, in the coastal oil region has left over 500 dead in the past month. The fighting is getting worse, as the gangs take a lot of the money they earn (over a million dollars a day) and buy weapons, vehicles and speedboats. The mobile and armed gangs then fight each other for control of territory, and the oil pipelines that run through it. Punching holes in pipelines, the thieves steal over 4 million gallons of crude oil each day, and waste even more (which also pollutes the area around each leak).

The army, navy and police have become more aggressive attacking the bases of these tribe based gangs. These raids often results in a lot of dead bodies, as the government forces tend to go in with guns blazing, knowing that the gangs are heavily armed and will quickly return fire. But the gangs also have more fast cars and speedboats, and the key people often escape.

September 21, 2004 The twelve northern Nigerian states that adopted Islamic (Sharia) law since 2000 have found that this did not change much.

Justice is still corrupt and crime still thrives. The politicians and crime bosses quickly gained control of the Islamic clerics and scholars who conducted the Sharia courts and made justice as unfair as ever. The people in the north are disillusioned with the Sharia law experiment, and with Islam as well.

September 22, 2004 In the northeast, at least two dozen members of an armed Islamic group, Al Sunna wal Jamma, attacked two police stations, and killed four policemen and two civilians. Police and armed civilians went after the attackers, chasing them across the border into Cameroon. The Islamic group first showed up last December, when two hundred armed members went on a rampage. But police and the army broke up the group. But now the Al Sunna wal Jamma has returned, although in smaller numbers.

September 26, 2004 Police caught and killed at as many as 30 members of the Islamic radical Al Sunna wal Jamma group. Several policemen and armed civilian volunteers were also killed. The running battle took place along the Cameroon border. The Islamic group identifies with the Afghan Taliban. The leaders of the Islamic group are largely middle class university students from northern Nigeria. The Islamic radicals do not have much popular support. It is suspected that foreign money has helped buy the groups weapons. Saudi Arabian Islamic missionaries have become increasingly common in northern Nigeria. These missionaries have plenty of cash.

September 27, 2004 Mujahid Dokubo-Asari, leader of one of the largest oil stealing gangs in the delta region, threatened to attack oil facilities on October 1st, if the army and police did not stop attacking his gang. Dokubo-Asari belongs to the Ijaw tribe, the largest in the delta area. Dokubo-Asari's gang has been a major target of army and police attacks because it is the largest gang in the area. Dokubo-Asari calls his gang the Niger Delta People's Volunteer Force.

September 28, 2004 The government is trying to work out some kind of deal with Ijaw tribal gang leader Mujahid Dokubo-Asari, to reduce the violence in the delta oil region. The Ijaw have long resented that the oil was pumped out of their traditional territory, but the Ijaw receive little benefit.

September 29, 2004 Ijaw tribal gang leader Mujahid Dokubo-Asari got the government to agree to a "truce". This means that the armed forces and police would stop their attacks on strongholds of the oil stealing gang led by Dokubo-Asari. The government feared that Dokubo-Asari was turning his oil gang into a popular rebel movement, mobilizing unhappy Ijaws to attack oil production facilities throughout the delta region.

October 1, 2004 The government has ordered the military to halt aggressive patrols against oil gangs in the delta region. This is being done so negotiations can proceed, and attacks on the numerous oil facilities won't be made.

October 2, 2004 The NDPVF, and rival militia Niger Delta Vigilantes (NDV), worked out a disarmament agreement with the government. Money will be paid to the gang leaders, some weapons will be surrendered, and no one is sure that this deal will actually go through.

October 6, 2004 The peace deal with oil gangs in the delta is expected to fall apart when the government does not deliver the expected (but not specified) benefits to the gang members. The gangs have numerous factions, some of them not interested in peace deals, and demanding some kind of benefit now, not later.

October 8, 2004 Labor unions threatened to begin a four day strike on October 11th to protest the government increasing the price of gasoline from $1.19 a gallon to $1.50. The government had long kept the price of petroleum prices artificially low as a popular measure. But this led to a large amount of oil smuggling to neighboring countries, where the prices were much higher. This, in turn, led to shortages in Nigeria. The government solution, raising the price, while logical, is not very popular.

October 9, 2004 In the northeast, near the Cameroon border, a 60 man police unit searching for Islamic rebels, was ambushed by members of the radical Al Sunna wal Jamma group. These radicals had fought with the police last month, and fled towards Cameroon. Today's attack saw several policemen being wounded, and some taken prisoner by the rebels.

October 11, 2004 The union inspired strike, to protest the fuel price increase, has led to violent demonstrations. So far, at least one demonstrator has died, and many more wounded. Pro-union demonstrators have been attacking people who try to go to work.

October 12, 2004 The four day strike has shut down the capital and crippled economic activity throughout the country. The threatened oil strike in the delta region has not happened, but the threats continue.

October 13, 2004 A government commission found that the death toll in tribal and religious fighting in Plateau state has been 53,000 (17,459 children, 17,397 women and 18,931 men) over the last three years. This is far more than earlier estimates, which put the death toll at 10-15,000 for the entire country. The lower figure came as a result of police and government officials reporting lower figures in order to downplay the extent of the violence. Plateau state is in central Nigeria, and there has been similar violence throughout northern Nigeria, and in the south, especially in the delta region, where the oil facilities are. This would indicate that deaths nation wide are in excess of 40,000 a year for the past three years.

October 14, 2004 Labor unions have suspended their nationwide strike, and given the government two weeks to lower gasoline prices. Most gasoline is still imported, despite government pledges to get Nigerian refineries working again. The gasoline import program was begun in the 1990s because it made it easier for government officials to steal money (from the exported oil sold, and the imported gasoline being bought.) The two weeks of negotiations will involved government discussions with labor union leaders over how large a bribe will be required to make the strike go away permanently.

October 18, 2004 Ijaw tribal gang leader Mujahid Dokubo-Asari, and his "Niger Delta Peoples Volunteer Force" (NDPVF), continue negotiating with the government. Rebels like this can be dealt with two ways in Nigeria. Either you kill them, or pay them off. Dokubo-Asari would prefer the latter outcome, but this has not yet been decided. Meanwhile, Dokubo-Asari threatens to shut down most of Nigeria's oil production, which comes out of the delta region. Over 80 percent of the governments income is from oil revenues, and most of that is stolen by corrupt politicians, or used to pay corrupt government employees. But if the flow of oil is interrupted, so is the supply of money used to keep the governments supporters (politicians, police and the army) loyal. Mujahid Dokubo-Asari says he can call on 200,000 armed tribal warriors. The government is trying to get an idea of exactly how many of these promised warriors are real. If they number is too high, Mujahid Dokubo-Asari gets paid off. Otherwise, he dies.

October 19, 2004 Police sent to the northern Moslem city of Kaduna to deal with strike related unrest now have a real riot on their hands. The rumor that police had murdered and buried 17 people they had arrested has caused crowds to assemble and march on police stations. Once these things get started, days of violence and destruction usually follow.

October 21, 2004 Three senior army officers were arrested for plotting to kill president Olusegun Obasanjo, and taking control of the government.

October 23, 2004 Members of oil stealing gangs, in the Delta region, have begun turning in their weapons for cash. An assault rifle brings $1,800. While this will get some of the young men out of a life of crime, others will go buy another weapon and be back in the crime business. In fact, the largest gang, the Niger Delta People's Volunteer Force, has not turned in any weapons, while smaller gangs have offered up 600 weapons so far.

October 24, 2004 In the past four years, the navy has seized three ships and fifteen barges that were caught moving stolen oil. There are nearly 400 breaks in 5,000 kilometers of oil pipelines each year. But no matter how hard the government tries to suppress the oil stealing, bribes and violence by the oil gangs keeps the law from stamping out the thefts.

October 28, 2004 Increased police activity in the oil rich Delta area has made public the degree of connivance by political, police and military officials with some of the oil stealing gangs. A World Bank report shows that in the last two decades, more and more of Nigeria's oil wealth is being stolen. Currently, about one percent of Nigeria's population gets 80 percent of the oil revenue. The people at the top make payoffs as far down as neccessary to keep themselves out of prison, and their money safe in local or foreign banks. Attempts to reverse these trends have failed, including quite recent ones backed by democratically elected reformers.

October 29, 2004 Niger Delta Peoples Volunteer Force (NDPVF) have handed in 196 assault rifles and two machine-guns, for cash payments, in the last week. A rival group, the Niger Delta Vigilantes (NDV), have turned in 600 assault rifles. However, there are over 5,000 weapons out there. The government is paying up to $1,800 for each assault rifle. However, AK-47s can be bought on the illegal arms market for $100 or less.

November 5, 2004 The ceasefire in the Delta oil region was upset as two NDV militia members were killed by NDPVF rival.

November 12, 2004 Political violence in the Nigerian state of Anambra has led to several days of rioting, and the destruction of the state owned police station. Political rivals have unleashed mobs of supporters to battle in the streets. The police will often stay out of the way, lest everyone turn on them.

November 14, 2004 Hundreds of political thugs raided and damaged radio and TV stations in the Nigerian state of Anambra. This is all part of an ongoing political battle between tribe based political parties.

November 25, 2004 While members of the Niger Delta Peoples Volunteer Force (NDPVF) have turned in over 800 weapons, and been paid for that, there is still much unrest. There are still a lot of weapons around. The NDPVF is upset because the disarmament deal included more jobs and economic development for the delta region. But little is happening in that area, and many delta inhabitants believe that money the government has allocated for delta development will be stolen by politicians. This is how "development" us often done in Nigeria, and nothing appears to have changed. The government is under a lot of pressure to at least appear like they are doing something positive, or face growing armed unrest in the delta area.

November 27, 2004 The Yoruba Council of Elders is meeting for the fourth time, a disturbing event for the government. The Yoruba tribes are Christian and the dominant ethnic group in the south. The Moslem Hausa tribes are dominant in the north. Both groups have many members all over the country, which often contributes to ethnic and religious misunderstandings, and result in violence. The Hausa have been uniting behind religious leaders, while the Yoruba are forming along tribal lines.

December 1, 2004 Gang, protester and government, violence in the delta region is killing about a thousand people a year. Some of the violence is mislabeled, as the deaths from oil theft accidents (fires) are included. But most of the dead were killed by firearms or other weapons.

December 7, 2004 A quarter of the 240 policemen killed in the past year, died dealing with tribal and religious fighting in central and northern Nigeria. The army has been brought into these areas to discourage civilians from resorting to violence. But the tensions remain. However, this should be put in perspective. Each year, several hundred thousand Nigerians die from Malaria and other tropical diseases.

December 15, 200 The tribal militias in the Niger delta still hold many of their weapons, and are still trying to extract more benefits from the government. The gunmen started out years ago as oil thieves, tapping into pipelines and then selling the crude to black market oil brokers for less than half the world price. As the world price of oil rose to $50 a barrel, the oil gangs got richer, and are now heavily armed. The gangs are led by men who sense that more power is to be had. By playing the tribal angle, the gang leaders increase their local support. The gang chiefs are generous with their money, giving them a Robin Hood image. Now the gangs are demanding money from the government and the oil companies. Government officials have, for a long time, stolen most of the oil revenue, and the tribes, especially the Ijaw, in the delta, have gotten little benefit from all the oil wealth. The oil companies have been more generous, but see these payments as bribes to the locals, as cost of doing business.

December 19, 2004 Criminal gangs have become larger, better armed and bolder. Gangs are now attempting robberies which, if interrupted by police, sometimes turn into firefights that go on for hours.

December 23, 2004 An illegal oil tapping operation resulted in an explosion, leaving at least 26 dead.

December 26, 2004 Government attempts, to negotiate a peace deal with tribal militias in the Niger delta oil region, have failed. Meanwhile, the two major militias (NDPVF and NDV) have been fighting each other more often. The two groups have grown wealthy by tapping the oil pipelines and selling the crude oil on the black market. Navy attempts to stop the movement of this stolen oil, by middlemen with small tanker ships, has not been completely successful.

January 6, 2005 In a rare case of prosecuting corruption, two navy admirals were dismissed from service for their role in the theft of a confiscated oil tanker (and 11,000 tons of oil, worth about $3 million) in August, 2003. The tanker had been caught smuggling, and the admirals arranged for the sale of the ship and its oil, and pocketed the money. This was the first time such high ranking officials have been convicted of corruption.

January 26, 2005 A tribal gang in the delta region shut down two oil pumping stations, halting the flow of 35,000 barrels per day ($.15 million worth). The tribal gangs demand payoffs, although the army and navy have been making threats as well.

January 28, 2005 There's a deceptive quiet in the north. But police report that Islamic radical groups are planning more major attacks this year on Christians. Meanwhile, the Christian minority in the north is arming and organizing. The next round of religious violence is likely to be a lot deadlier.

February 3, 2005 In the Delta, soldiers killed four Itsekiri tribesmen while dealing with a violent demonstration outside an oil loading terminal on the coast. Local civilians are demanding some of the oil income.

February 4, 2005 Fighting with Itsekiri tribesmen in Delta state continued, leaving one security guard dead.

February 6, 2005 In the oil rich Delta, nine civilians died as two villages fought over ownership of a piece of land that was being used to an build oil production facility. Whichever village can claim the oil facility is within its territory will obtain economic benefits from the oil company and government. The violence has been going on for a week.

February 9, 2005 The government has sent another battalion of infantry to Delta state, in order to deal with violence by civilians protesting their meager share of the oil wealth.

February 10, 2005 Sixty police have been sent to northern Nigeria, where violence between farming and herding tribes has left at least two dead in a week of violence. There may be as many as three dozen dead, but hard information is difficult to come by. Most of the violence takes place in the bush. The region is just sough of the Sahara desert, and there's never enough water. Whenever there is a drought, the herders try to move in on farming land farther south.

February 11, 2005 Government plans to build an LNG (liquid natural gas) plant in Ondo state, next to the main oil producing Delta state, are opposed by the people of Delta state. The government plan would make Ondo an "oil producing state" and move some of the oil revenue from Delta to Ondo. The people of Delta don't want to lose the business (especially thousands of jobs), but the government does not want to risk problems with local unrest by building the plant in Delta state. The LNG plant would chill natural gas to a liquid state so it can be carried on refrigerated ships to foreign customers.

February 13, 2005 The navy has four new patrol boats to police the oil smuggling along the coast of Delta state. Another 11 patrol boats are being delivered this year.

February 26, 2005 Soldiers raided a village in the Niger Delta, looking for a local gang that had been attacking civilians and stealing oil. The subsequent fighting left 14 dead, and several hundred civilians fled the area. Oil theft is growing, with 100,000 barrels a day being stolen by gangs that puncture pipelines carrying the crude, transfer the oil to trucks and then to small ships that sneak it out of Nigeria and sell it to brokers in nearby countries at a discount. Even so, with oil now at over $50 a barrel, the various gangs can realize several million dollars a day from these thefts.

March 12, 2005 Violence in universities is getting out of hand, with at least ten students killed in the last few days. Student social groups, that began forming in the 1960s, have since turned into quasi-religious cults and paramilitary organizations. The groups are now called cults, and are formed around students from the larger tribes. The cults mix ethnic and religious ceremonies to form strong bonds among members. But rival cults often get involved in bloody feuds with each other. This violence insures that ethnic and regional differences are carried over to another generation.

March 24, 2005 More sailors were caught stealing oil in a Niger River Delta port. The sailors arrested two photographers trying to take pictures of the theft, but news got out anyway, and led to the arrest of the sailors. Despite several recent arrests of naval personnel, some sailors continue to steal oil, especially since the price of oil has gone over $50 a barrel.

March 25, 2005 The foreign oil companies say that damage caused by oil thieves and protesting locals has caused $600 million worth of damage to oil facilities in the last two years.

March 26, 2005 Oil companies estimate that that between 275,000 and 685,000 barrels of oil a day are being stolen in Nigeria. This was providing the thieves with nearly five or six million dollars a day. The official estimates of oil theft are less than 100,000 barrels a day, but these estimates ignore what is stolen with the cooperation of military and government officials. In the last four decades, some $300 billion in oil revenue has been received by the government. Most of it has been stolen, but now corrupt officials are stealing oil even before it can be sold through legal means. The thieves in the government cannot agree on who gets what, so more officials are going freelance. But in the Niger Delta, where most of the oil production is, local gangsters are becoming more of a force. While the tribe based gangs preach a "Robin Hood" philosophy, this is mostly for public relations. The oil gangs are out to get rich, and have a good time doing it. They buy guns, booze, drugs, speed boats and all manner of goodies. They also buy lots of guns.

April 10, 2005 The anti-corruption effort appears to be another bit of window dressing, with government officials as rapacious as always, and the population as angry at it as ever.

April 17, 2005 Tribal and religious violence continues. In central Nigeria, Fulani tribal militias have been attacking villages belonging to the Tiv tribe. The tribal feuds over land are made worse by religious differences. The local governments have so far kept a lid on the violence, but national tribal and religious organizations are forming, and arming.

April 27, 2005 In central Nigeria, fighting between Fulani and Tiv tribal militias continue to battle each other, leaving over a hundred dead in two weeks of fighting. The government has been unable to get sufficient troops or police to the area to stop the violence. Most of the government's mobile reserves are tied up in the Niger delta oil fields. There, tribe based oil stealing gangs have armed themselves and presented the military with a major challenge. The inland tribes are poor, and are often armed mainly with spears and bows.

April 29, 2005 In southeast Nigeria, tribal disputes over land have left over a hundred dead. Police reinforcements and troops have arrived to stop the fighting. But once these forces leave, the tensions will remain.

May 8, 2005 Over a hundred police have been fired, in the past year, for corruption. But this is considered a mere gesture, as the corruption continues. In the last few weeks there have been several large scale riots by people upset over police killings. The police often kill civilians because the victims did not submit to police demands for bribes, or other illegal acts. The general disdain for the police has crippled the ability of the police to maintain order. Tribal and political party militias, as well as criminal gangs, are becoming more powerful as police capabilities shrink. Foreign aid donors are dismayed at the squandering of Nigeria's oil wealth, with much of it stolen by government officials. It is difficult to justify foreign aid for Nigeria when it is likely the aid will be stolen by corrupt government workers.

May 18, 2005 Most Islamic clerics in the north now approve of polio immunization, but many still insist that the vaccine is "contaminated." However, they cannot dismiss the return of polio, which cripples young children. It's also obvious that all the cases are in Moslem neighborhoods, among children who were not vaccinated. Some two thirds of all the cases of polio in the world are now found in Nigeria. This is a rare case where one of the conspiracy theories Islamic radicals are so fond of was rather starkly refuted, for all to see. This has been a setback for the Islamic radicals, but has not put them out of business. There are still those preaching jihad, and attacking Christians and other non-Moslems. But the Christian minority in the north has shown they are willing to arm themselves and fight back, so there is a stalemate in the religious wars at the moment.

May 30, 2005 In the Delta region, the navy continues to increase its operation against oil thieves. Armed sailors in small boats are going after the thieves that tap into pipelines that cross waterways. The thieves put the oil into small barges, which are then towed away to the coast, and larger tankers run by gangs that smuggle the oil out of the country. The navy is making life more difficult for these smugglers as well. But corruption is showing up more often. Naval officers who stop smuggling ships are more likely to face a bribe offer, than gun fire. But either is possible.

June 3, 2005 Some 500 troops and policemen were sent to the northeastern city of Sokoto, to try and stop violence between Sunni and Shia Moslems. A group of Sunni Islamic radicals, inspired by al Qaeda, have used violence to keep Shia from praying in the main Mosque. At least two Shia have been killed, and many more injured. Under pressure from the Islamic terrorists, some 200 Shia have agreed to convert to Sunni religious practices.

June 4, 2005 The oil companies in the Delta region are building new off shore facilities, that will increase production from 2.5 million barrels a day, to 4.1 million. The offshore gas and oil wells will be less subject to thieves tapping into pipelines and stealing. The offshore facilities will also be less exposed to kidnapping, blockades and other forms of extortion from local groups. Meanwhile, the oil companies continue cutting deals with the tribe based oil stealing gangs. It's easier to negotiate and pay what amounts to bribes, than to risk interruptions to pumping operations. Some of the rebels are allied with environmental groups that want to stop oil exploration. But too many locals are too poor, and too much money is at stake for there to be large support for shutting down the oil operations. The locals just want a larger share of the proceeds. So do the Moslem tribes way to the north. They are upset at no longer being in charge of the government, and the oil wealth. Some $300 billion in oil revenue has gone to the government since oil operations began half a century ago. But the northerners no longer control the army, and are having increasing problems in their own neighborhoods with Islamic radicals.

June 8, 2005 In the Delta oil region, battles between rival oil stealing gangs and the police have left several gangsters, a policeman and a soldier dead.

June 11, 2005 In the Delta oil region, a conflict between two former generals over which of them would become the new head of the Okpe tribe, led to the death of two policemen, who were trying to restore order.

June 14, 2005 Off the coast of the Delta oil region, fifty local tribesmen, armed with clubs, knives and guns, seized control of an oil platform, and the 40 men working on it.

The government has ordered the destruction of several illegal oil refineries in the Delta region. The previous government has prohibited the construction of legal refineries, so that government officials could profit by skimming money spent on gasoline imports. The country is still spending over two billion dollars a year on gasoline imports, and the illegal refineries are turning stolen oil into gasoline for sale on the black market.

June 15, 2005 In the Delta oil region, two German and four Nigerian oil workers were kidnapped by a local gang. The four hostages were taken from a boat, transporting them to an oil facility.

June 17, 2005 The United States and Britain closed their embassies and consulates to the public in response to intelligence information about Islamic terrorists operating in the area. Al Qaeda supports Islamic militants in northern Nigeria, who are trying to establish Islamic rule for the region.

June 18, 2005 The international oil market fears that the Nigerian government is losing control of its oil producing region. Criminal gangs and tribal militias continue to battle police and troops in the area. The locals are demanding a larger share of the oil wealth, and increasingly are using force to get it.

June 19, 2005 Gangsters in the Delta oil region released two German and four Nigerian oil workers they had kidnapped. Ransom, in the form of cash and other favors, was paid. The kidnappers, The Iduwini National Movement for Peace and Development (INMPD), was more interested in jobs, as these provide long term benefit, and locals who feel constantly beholden to the gang. More kidnappings are promised. These gangs take advantage of the fact that government corruption has denied local people any benefits from the oil production, and created a lot of popular unrest.

June 23, 2005 Cameroon accused Nigeria of using violence to maintain claims to disputed, oil rich, land on their common border. Cameroon says several of its soldiers had been killed or wounded by Nigerian troops. But Nigeria said the violence was between feuding fishermen.

June 25, 2005 Police have only recaptured a dozen of the 166 prisoners who escaped from a Delta region jail last week.

June 26, 2005 Violence in the Delta oil region is increasing, with nearly 200 people a month getting killed in the area. The violence is being fueled by the millions of dollars a months in profits from stolen oil. This enables the gangs to buy guns, and corrupt officials. The situation is getting out of control.

July 4, 2005 Police seized a truck, its two man crew, and 32,510 round of ammunition they were smuggling to criminal gangs. Smuggling ammo is a big business in Nigeria, and last year the police managed to intercept 420,281 rounds of ammunition before it reached its destination. Gun battles between police and criminal suspects are common, so much so that the police tend to be rather trigger happy. Even the UN has complained, after an investigation, that the Nigerian police frequently shoot innocent civilians, and then try to cover up their actions by claiming that the victims were criminals.

July 5, 2005 In the north, thousands of refugees are fleeing neighboring Niger, to escape a famine that has left over three million people in danger of starvation. Because the people on both sides of the border tend to be from the same tribes, there is no attempt to stop the movement. But if the number of refugees continues to arise, there could be unrest on the Nigerian side, as some Nigerians resist the burden of dealing with so many destitute people. Niger has no oil, and is thus less capable of dealing with the drought and locusts that caused the current famine.

July 6, 2005 In the Niger delta oil region, a gang of young men shut down an oil pumping station for a day, and left only after extracting money and jobs from the oil company. This kind of extortion is becoming more frequent, despite the larger number of police and security guards employed in the region. For decades, most of the oil income has been stolen by politicians, and little of the benefit has reached the people living in the oil producing areas.

July 8, 2005 MASSOB (Movement for the Actualization of the Sovereign State of Biafra) survives, despite six years of government efforts to stamp it out. Forty years ago, the Igbo (or Ibo) people of southeastern Nigeria attempted to establish the separate state of Biafra. Over a million died before the separatist movement was put down. Down, but not gone. MASSOB arose in the late 1990s, trying to revive the separatist movement. Some 600 MASSOB members have been killed, and nearly 400 imprisoned, while the government insists that Biafra is gone forever. But as details of the extent of government corruption during the last few decades come out, Biafra again looks like something worth fighting for.

July 9, 2005 The government has finally agreed to withdraw its troops from the disputed (with neighboring Cameroon) Bakassi Peninsula. An international court agreed with Cameroon, but Nigeria refused to withdraw from the area, mainly because of the oil deposits, and thousands of Nigerians who had moved in.

August 28, 2005 The government has managed to get open violence under control. Feuding tribes and gangs (criminal, political and religious) have been persuaded to keep the body count down. But the violence and fighting continues. The oil stealing gangs in the Niger river delta oil region are still in business, and under attack by security forces in plainclothes. In the north, Islamic conservatives continue to impose new lifestyle laws on the population, as part of their plan to turn the majority Moslem northern areas into a de-facto Islamic republic. The federal government is ignoring this, for the moment. In the central part of the country, the feuding Moslem and Christian tribes have been compelled to calm down by large numbers of police and soldiers.

September 1, 2005 Nationwide riots over a 30 percent rise in fuel prices left at least three dead and dozens injured. Fuel prices are subsidized, and were $1.43 a gallon for gas. This cost large losses for the government, which has to import refined gasoline at world prices. The new price is $1.86 a gallon.

September 7, 2005 A violent demonstration, in the southeast, by MASSOB (Movement for the Actualization of the Sovereign State of Biafra) and police left seven dead and many injured. A similar separatist movement in the 1960s led to a civil war that killed over a million.

September 11, 2005 Government efforts to keep the lid on separatism are faltering. In the southeast, the Ibo tribes are demanding their own state, as are the tribes in the oil rich delta region. Up north, the Moslem states are passing laws that make them different from the rest of the country. In the north, adoption of Islamic (sharia) law continues to be popular. Corruption at the national level has caused widespread demoralization, and lack of faith in the idea of a Nigerian state.

September 17, 2005: The governor of the southern Beyelsa state, Diepreye Alamieyeseigha, was arrested in Britain on money laundering (of over $30 million) charges. The Economic and Financial Crimes Commission had been investigating Alamieyeseigha for several months, and had asked the British to make the arrest. Beyelsa state contains much oil wealth, and has long been known for its high rate of corruption. British police found nearly two million dollars in cash when they searched Alamieyeseigha's London home.

September 20, 2005: Police arrested Niger delta gang leader Moujahid Dokubo Asari. His followers, members of the NDVF (Niger Delta People's Volunteer Force), threatened action if their boss was not released. Asari was arrested in the capital, after being quoted in a newspaper interview calling for the breakup of Nigeria. Asari also freely admitted that his gang prospered by stealing oil from pipelines.

September 21, 2005: The oil companies are negotiating and signing economic aid deals with local tribal leaders in the Niger delta area, in an attempt to fill in for the lack of government aid programs. The corruption in the local and national government prevents much of the oil revenue from reaching the people in the oil producing areas, which creates a lot of political unrest.

September 24, 2005: Over the last few days, followers of arrested NDVF leader Moujahid Dokubo Asari have seized several oil pumping stations, and cut about one percent of the country's oil production. The NDVF is demanding that Asari be released by the police. The army and police are mobilizing forces to put down the insurrection. Gangs like the NDVF have become wealthy, and well armed, from stealing oil. The NDVF has also taken up the complaints of the civilian population their members come from, who want some of the oil wealth (aside from stolen oil), to stay in the area. Officials in the national government prefer to steal most of the oil profits and keep it for themselves.

September 28, 2005: Eleven policemen have been arrested for sexual crimes while serving as peacekeepers in Congo, while another six were arrested for belonging to an oil stealing gang in the Niger River delta area. Police corruption has long been a problem and has not responded to several reform efforts.

September 29, 2005: In the delta region, police freed two foreign oil workers who had been kidnapped the day before. A gang of seven Nigerians had planned to hold the men for ransom. This is another indicator of the increasing lawlessness in the Niger river delta oil region.

October 4, 2005: Nine people died when police tried to extort a bribe from an off-duty soldier at a checkpoint. Both sides called in reinforcements (including some 200 soldiers), and a battle ensured. Nine people were killed and a police station was burned down, along with several dozen vehicles. Such incidents between soldiers and police have happened before, and the two forces are usually wary of each other.

October 5, 2005: The navy has bought some high speed boats to help go after the gangsters in the Niger River delta region, who use similar high speed boats to move about and escape the navy and police.

October 6, 2005: Alhaji Mujahid Dokubo Asari, leader of the NDPVF (Niger Delta People's Volunteer Force), was charged with treason. The NDPVF is a wealthy oil theft gang that has gotten into tribal politics. This has brought down the wrath of the central government, in form of more military and police forces in the delta region, and prosecution of the gang leaders.

October 7, 2005: Oil theft has made the gangs in the delta region richer, but not smarter. For example, two boatloads of gang members, intent on making the first amphibious back robbery in Nigerian history, came ashore next to a Lagos office complex containing three bank branches. It was a clever idea, for making a getaway on land is often foiled by traffic jams. The bank robbers, however, had not scoped out their target very carefully, and were spotted by the building security force, which promptly closed all the doors leading to the banking area. The robbers, noting this, began firing their guns in anger, while police and army reinforcements began to arrive. The bandits quickly took to their boats and sped off, empty handed. Meanwhile, all the gunfire panicked drivers on nearby roads, causing a traffic jam, and many drivers abandoned their vehicles. It took several hours to get traffic going again. Building complexes have anticipated these kinds of raids, noting how the gangs have become more numerous, better armed and bolder. Politicians fear that some of the gangs may decide to take over the administration of areas, by intimidating elected and appointed officials into doing what the gang leaders want. Some of the gangs already act as hired muscle for some politicians, and there have already been cases where the muscle makes political, not just monetary, demands.

October 20, 2005: In Lagos, two factions of the OPC (Odua Peoples Congress) fought over control of a business site, leaving ten dead. OPC is a tribal advocacy organization that also engages in criminal activities to raise cash.

October 23, 2005: Ten leaders of the Odua Peoples Congress (OPC) were arrested for involvement in an OPC feud that left ten dead.

October 25, 2005: In the oil rich delta region, factions of the Ijaw tribe fought over how to distribute payments from an oil company. At least two were killed and several wounded. The oil companies often pay local tribal leaders to keep the peace, especially after tribal gangs have interfered with oil operations. The local police are poorly paid and corrupt, and unwilling to get involved in a feud with tribal gangs.

October 27, 2005: In the southeast, police arrested Ralph Uwazuruike, a leader of the Biafran separatist movement. In the 1960s, the Ibo tribe led a Biafran separatist movement that resulted in a civil war that left over a million dead.

October 28, 2005: The government ordered the navy to crack down on smugglers, after it was discovered that at least 2,500 AK-47 assault rifles were brought into the country illegally, and are now in the hands of criminals and tribal militiamen. The government also noted that it losses billions of dollars a year in customs revenue, because of the wide scale smuggling. Customs officials and naval officers, however, have also been bribed to overlook smuggling, and it's not known how this problem will be overcome.

November 7, 2005: In the southeast, Biafran separatists clashed with police for the second time in two weeks, and burned down the house of a former president of Nigeria.

November 8, 2005: Ralph Uwazurike, the leader of MASSOB (Actualisation of the Sovereign State of Biafra), and six of his followers, have been charged with treason. The government fears that the separatist group could spark another civil war, like the one in the 1960s that left over a million dead. In the southeast, 20 more members of MASSOB were charged with crimes related to separatism.

Police found rifles and ammunition in the home of the leader of the NDPVF (Niger Delta People's Volunteer Force.) The organization was supposed to have disarmed, but is widely believed to have kept their weapons.

November 10, 2005: The government has recovered $700 million, from Swiss banks, that was stolen from Nigeria by former dictator Sani Abacha. However, the former president and his cronies stole billions, and most of that will probably never be recovered.

November 12, 2005: Alhaji Mujahid Dokubo-Asari, leader of the NDPVF (Niger Delta People's Volunteer Force) is fighting treason charges, and years of prison. The government apparently believes that if they put Dokubo-Asari away for ten years or so, his organization will wither and fade away. That's unlikely to happen, because NDPVF thrives on stolen oil, and the armed forces have been unable to halt the thefts (usually by punching holes in pipelines).

December 1, 2005: The government disowned a state governor, Diepreye Alamieyeseigha, who was arrested in Britain three months ago, for money laundering. Free on bail, last month Alamieyeseigha slipped out of Britain, disguised as a woman. This shocked most Nigerians, who have seen a lot of corruption in their elected officials. However, state governors have immunity from prosecution. But the federal government has sent troops to Alamieyeseigha's state capital, and frozen state funds in Alamieyeseigha's Bayelsa state. That's a lot of money, because Bayelsa produces 30 percent of the nations oil, and, by law, 13 percent of that income comes back to the state that produced it, for development projects. But in Bayelsa, the governor steals a large chunk of the state income. Members of the Bayelsa state legislature are trying to impeach their governor.

A few senior officials have been arrested for corruption, but this has not slowed the shady dealings. Nigerians are still dismayed at the extent of corruption among politicians and businessmen. It strangles the economy and is fueling separatism.

December 3, 2005: In an admission that the police are often out of control, the government has offered cash compensation to the families of six people shot dead by police last June. The police claimed the civilians were criminals, when in fact they were a group of people coming home from a party, who got into a verbal dispute with the police.

December 4, 2005: In the oil rich Delta region, police and troops have cowed the large, tribe based, oil stealing gangs into backing off on aggressive operations. Following up on that, the courts have gone after the leaders of the two major gangs (Oodua Peoples Congress, and the Niger Delta Volunteer Force). For the moment, this is working. In the north, Islamic radicals have been quiet lately.

December 19, 2005: The government has grounded most of its civil aviation fleet, because of concerns over flight safety.

December 21, 2005: An oil pipeline in the Niger delta area was dynamited, killing eight people in the process.

December 23, 2005: Several airliner crashes over the last few months has reminded Nigerians that the aircraft are often maintained with counterfeit parts and bribed safety inspectors. Corruption is common in Nigeria, and people cope by looking the other way. But it's hard to avoid all those airplane crashes. As a result, the normally heavy use of air travel during the Christmas season is down by more than half. Those aircraft that are operating, are taking off mostly empty. This makes the corruption an open issue once more. Everyone will talk about it, but so far, no one has been able to do much about it.

December 24, 2005: Both of the bombed oil pipelines, in the Niger delta region, have been repaired and put back into service. About eight percent of the country's oil production was interfered with while the two pipelines (one 24 inch, the other 28 inch) were repaired.

December 25, 2005: A new terrorist group, calling itself the the Martyrs' Brigade, has taken credit for at least one of the recent bombings of oil pipelines in the Niger delta area. The twenty million people living in the delta have long resented the damage the oil operations have done, and the lack of benefit from the oil sales. But there has been economic benefit. Over a billion dollars a year flows into the area via illegal tapping of the oil pipelines, and selling the oil to smugglers. That has created dozens of powerful gangs, and thousands of well armed, and wealthy, oil gangsters. These are local guys, and all the money and power has led some of the lads to think big. As in revolution, and taking control of the oil. The government has brought in thousands of additional troops and police. But all those well paid, well armed and determined gangsters are not easily cowed, or pushed aside.

December 31, 2005: Soldiers on patrol caught twenty men tapping into a pipeline. Rather than flee, as is the usual custom with oil thieves, this bunch decided to shoot it out with the soldiers. Twelve of the thieves were shot dead, three wounded and five arrested. The police have also made arrests in the case of recent pipeline fires.

January 5, 2006: The army and police have increased patrols of the oil pipelines, and have apparently cut the amount of oil stolen by about 80 percent (to 20,000 barrels a day). Some of the oil thieves have been fighting back at the army and police patrols. But the military has reinforcements on call, and the oil gangs have not yet been able to defeat the troops. The loss in income has apparently caused some of the oil thieves to deliberately sabotage oil operations, usually by using explosives to destroy a section of pipeline.

January 9, 2006: Another major brawl between police and soldiers was averted in Lagos.

January 11, 2006: Gangsters apparently kidnapped four foreign oil workers (an American, a Briton, a Bulgarian and a Honduran) and are holding them in a boat offshore. The kidnappers also damaged a pumping facility. Another attack combined to cut Nigerian oil production ten percent.

The kidnappers of the four foreign oil workers are demanding the release of tribal warlord Mujahid Dokubo-Asari, held since last September on treason charges for his activities in the Niger Delta. The kidnappers claim to be members of a new group, "Movement for the Freedom of the Niger Delta."

January 13, 2006: A second state governor, Rashidi Ladoja, of the south-western state of Oyo has been removed from office for corruption. This was more a case of the governor and his political backers having a disagreement over corruption, and who really runs things, with the governor losing.

The kidnappers of four foreign oil workers now want a state governor, jailed on corruption changes, released. Negotiations are just getting started, so it's not clear what these guys want, or if they even had a plan when they seized the four oil workers.

January 14, 2006: The navy has sent a helicopter to the Niger river delta, to work with gunboats already there, to search for, and catch, gangs engaged in stealing oil from the many oil pipelines in the area. Other reinforcements are on the way, to deal with increased gang violence. The oil gangs are not happy with the interference in their oil theft, and are fighting back any way they can.

January 15, 2006: Several dozen armed men, in speedboats, attacked an oil rig and employee housing area. The attack was defeated by soldiers, with at least a dozen attackers, soldiers and civilians dead.

January 20, 2006: The kidnappers of four oil workers are demanding that the foreign oil companies pay $1.5 billion to Bayelsa state to compensate for pollution, and that the government free imprisoned gang leaders from the Delta.

January 21, 2006: More troops were sent to the Niger Delta, to aid in the search for the hostages taken from an oil platform. Secret negotiations were said to be underway with the kidnappers, but the government is also committed to crushing the gangs, which have prospered for years from stealing oil. The gangs have gotten political because the tribes in the Delta have gotten lots of pollution and no money from all the oil fields, and people are unhappy about this. The corruption that permeates the government, and much of Nigerian society, makes negotiation futile and armed violence more attractive.

January 22, 2006: Kidnappers issued a photo of their four foreign oil worker captives, proving they were alive.

January 24, 2006: In Port Harcourt (in the Niger River Delta region), 30 gunmen arrived by speedboat, killed nine (8 police, 1 civilian) people while robbing a bank and the offices of an Italian oil company. The gangsters then escaped in their speedboats with some $22,000, firing their AK-47s as they fled.

January 29, 2006: Soldiers, sailors and police are swarming around the Niger River Delta, looking for the kidnappers of oil workers, and members of oil stealing gangs. The four foreign oil workers have been held for three weeks, with their captors demanding $1.5 billion and other items. Some gang members have been arrested, but there are only rumors of getting the captives released. Meanwhile, oil production is down at least ten percent and the government exposed as not of in complete control of the oil region. The oil gangs are at war with the government, and have shown they can at least hold their own.

February 10, 2006: Kano State, one of the northern Moslem states that introduced Islamic Sharia law in 2000, is under investigation by the federal government for trying to get foreign money to fund an Islamic militia. The Kano state government had set up an organization, Hisbah, of men who would go around enforcing Islamic law. For example, in the last two months, Hisbah has seized over 2,000 motorcycles from men who were caught carrying a woman on the back. This was declared "unIslamic," and punishable by confiscation of your motorcycle or moped. Hisbah is not popular, partly because the group cracked down on alcohol and prostitution as well. The federal government is now trying to shut down Hisbah, a move that is resisted by the state government.

Meanwhile, the governor of Plateau state said that he had taken $10 million from his budget and used it to pay for campaigning expenses in the recent national elections. The governor is making these allegations in reprisal for his getting indicted for corruption.

February 11, 2006: The tribal rebels, in the Niger Delta oil region, are threatening a major offensive this month. The rebels say they can shut down oil shipments. The army, navy and police have reinforced the region, and doubt that the rebels have the numbers to really make a difference. Most of the armed men in the Delta are keen on protecting their oil stealing business. The rebels, who are calling for overthrow of the government, are at odds with the oil gangsters who don't want to ruin the good deal they have going. But the rebels believe the locals should get a legitimate cut of the oil revenue. However, the real problem is corrupt government officials, who can be quite ruthless in holding on to what they got.

February 16, 2006: Governor Joshua Dariye of the Plateau state, was charged with taking part in stealing over six million dollars of government funds. Because governors have immunity, he cannot be arrested until he is impeached, or his term of office ends. Six others, who don't have immunity, were also charged. Such corruption costs Nigeria (and most other African countries) a large chunk (if not most) of their government income each year.

The air force used helicopter gunships to attack the barges, used by Niger Delta oil stealing gangs, to move their loot to the brokers who buy it and get it out of the country. This is an escalation of the battle between the oil gangs and the police. During the raid, at least eight people were killed, and ten buildings burned down. But hitting the illegal barge traffic, the military hopes to force the gangs to move their stolen oil covertly, and in smaller quantities. This means less profit for the gangs, and less money to use for buying weapons. The oil gang sent an email to the press insisting they had driven the helicopter off, and that it was actually an oil company helicopter equipped with rockets and a machine-gun.

February 17, 2006: The Niger Delta oil gangs have retaliated by setting fire to a pumping station, forcing the armed forces to divert resources to guard the oil company crews putting out the fire and making repairs.

Another increasingly popular angle is kidnapping, and today, nine foreign oil workers were seized from an off-shore barge. The captors belonged to one of the oil gangs, and they are looking for ransom.

February 18, 2006: The new tactic of using helicopter gunships, to attack oil gang barges (full of stolen oil), has brought to the surface a new organization; MEND (The Movement for the Emancipation of the Niger Delta.) This is another combination of ethnic politics (the Ijaw tribes in the delta region suffer most from the oil production, and do most of the stealing) and gangster theatrics (the oil gangs are trying to use ethnic movements for cover.) MEND is making the usual demands; more oil money for the Ijaw people in the oil production areas. The oil gangs don't want to shut down production completely, because then there won't be anything to steal. One way or another, the locals are getting a piece of the action. February 19, 2006: The oil gangs have refused to negotiate with the government on the release of the nine foreign oil workers they hold.

February 19, 2006: The oil gangs have refused to negotiate with the government on the release of the nine foreign oil workers they hold.

February 20, 2006: The Danish cartoon dispute came to Nigeria, and Moslem mobs not only demonstrated, but attacked Christians, and Christian churches. Over a dozen Christians died and 30 churches were burned down. The country is about half Christian and half Moslem. Most of the Moslems are in the north, most of the Christians in the south. But there are many areas where mixed communities exist, and these often become targets of Islamic radicals. It's largely the Moslems who attack Christians, because of the popularity of Islamic radicalism in the past few decades. .

February 21, 2006: In the Niger Delta, oil gangs blew up an oil pipeline. As a result of all the violence, about 20 percent of the nation's oil production has been halted.

February 22, 2006: Nigerian Christians are fighting back, in response to Moslem attacks over the Danish cartoons (that depicted the Prophet Mohammed in unflattering situations). In this case, Christian mobs went after Moslems and mosques, killing over a dozen Moslems and destroying over half a dozen mosques. Nigerian Christians have found that the only way to stop Moslem attacks, is to fight back. This usually works. February 23, 2006: In the Niger Delta, the oil gangs are in a quandary. For years, they have grown rich from stealing oil from pipelines. Many of these gangs are clearing over a million dollars a year. You can see evidence of this in the new cars, speedboats, clothes and homes. But for the last year, the government has been hitting back. Armed sailors in small boats are going after the thieves that tap into pipelines that cross waterways. The thieves put the oil into small barges, which are then towed away to the coast, and larger tankers run by gangs that smuggle the oil out of the country. The navy is making life more difficult for these smugglers as well. But corruption is showing up more often. Naval officers who stop smuggling ships are more likely to face a bribe offer, than gun fire. But either is possible. The oil gangs don't like the interference, and the increased pressure from the national government to shut down the oil thieving completely. So the new nationalism angle is an attempt to get a share of the oil money legitimately. But this won't be easy. The national government has been taking nearly all the oil profits since oil pumping began in the Delta decades ago. The politicians in the capital don't want to give it up, but may have to compromise if military and police forces cannot shut down the tribe based oil gangs. The gangsters know the territory, as they are locals, and they have spread the money around. That makes these guys Robin Hood like figures. Fellow tribesmen of the gansters will not help the cops. The oil companies are caught in the middle, although for years they have paid off locals, and written off the oil thefts as a cost of doing business. But now production is shut down in some areas, and no money is being made at all, by anyone.

February 24, 2006: Christian mobs, responding to Moslem mob violence against Christians in the north, killed nearly 200 Moslems in the south. Some of the bodies were burned in the street. The Moslem violence, against cartoons published in Denmark, and distributed worldwide by Islamic radicals, died down in response to the Christian reaction in the south.

March 1, 2006: Six foreigners were released by gangsters in the Delta region. Three men are still being held.

Some 20 percent of Nigerian oil production, from the western portion of the Delta, is still off line. The oil that is getting out is coming from the more peaceful eastern portion of the Delta region.

In response, the government has removed the head of the military unit assigned to end the Delta hostage crises. Brigadier general Elias Zamani, and his deputy were removed. This was another of the demands of the Delta gangs, but Zamani was sacked mainly because he has been unable to deal with the gangs. Journalists have been able to meet with the gangsters, and reported that they are a ragtag, informal group. This led the government to fire Zamani, and bring in someone who will go after the gangs.

March 8, 2006: The gangsters holding three foreigners in the Delta region have made four demands. They want a gang leader (accused of rebellion) and a former governor (accused of corruption) released, the share of oil revenues paid to the provincial government increased, and $1.5 billion in compensation paid (by the oil companies) to the communities in the Delta who have suffered damage from oil operations. Something for everyone. The gangs threaten more attacks after March 10th, if their demands are not met by then. They let an earlier, March 6th, deadline, go by with nothing more than a four day extension.

March 9, 2006: Niger Delta tribal rebels have demanded compensation, for a 1998 oil spill, be paid to them within 21 days. The government, which has long ignored the people living in the oil producing region, does not want the foreign oil companies to pay lots of money to the rebels, as that only makes the rebels more powerful. Elsewhere in the delta, a dozen people were killed when rebels attacked a fuel tanker guarded by soldiers and policemen. The rebels say an army gunboat attacked them first.

March 15, 2006: The Niger Delta tribal rebels have separated the three foreign hostages they hold, complicating government efforts to carry out a rescue.

March 16, 2006: Stalemate continues in the Delta region, where growing unrest among local Ijaw tribes has become too much for the army, navy and police to handle. The rebels threaten more attacks and kidnappings, and the government is reluctant to either negotiate a deal with what they consider oil thieves, or order more violent methods by the security forces against people on the verge of large scale rebellion.

March 24, 2006: In the Niger delta, soldiers clashed with rebels, leaving three soldiers dead. The army reported that three soldiers, and their boat, were missing. The rebels say they killed the troops and captured the boat.

March 25, 2006: Former Liberian warlord and dictator, Charles Taylor, who has been allowed sanctuary in Nigeria in 2003, will now be extradited to Liberia and charged with war crimes. Taylor lives in a government guest house, and is not closely guarded. It is feared he will flee. Taylor still has many supporters in Liberia, and could revive the civil war there.

March 26, 2006: The first census in fifteen years is being met with hostility in many parts of the country. After the first week of counting, about half a dozen census workers have been killed, and many others attacked or intimidated. Many Nigerians are hostile to a census, because they fear it may cause their tribe or religion power. It is believed that there are between 140-160 million people in the country. Voting and distribution of oil profits are determined by census results. Both Christians and Moslems believe they are the majority.

March 27, 2006: In the Niger delta, rebels released the last three of their Western (one Briton, two American) hostages, after five weeks of captivity. None of the kidnappers demands were met, and they released the captives so that rebels could concentrate on more attacks on oil facilities. The rebels have managed to avoid army and navy patrols, and are considered a real threat to oil production in the oil region.

April 3, 2006: In the Niger Delta, troops and rebels fought a day long gun battle over possession of an oil pumping station.

April 6, 2006: The new commander of troops in the Niger delta has backed off from having his men fire on sight when encountering rebels. The problem is that the army and navy are outnumbered. Years of oil theft have left the local gangs well armed, and equipped with fast boats and plenty of land transportation. With nearly 500,000 barrels of production halted because the gangs have seized the facilities, the government appears willing to cut a deal, to give local officials, and gang leaders, part of the oil revenue, if the gangs will let full production resume. It's extortion, but that sort of thing is a common occurrence in Nigeria.

April 7, 2006: The Niger Delta oil gangs have threatened to kill anyone returning to oil facilities that have been recently abandoned because of the violence. About a quarter of Nigerian oil production is shut down because of the violence, and the armed forces say they will protect the closed facilities, and the oil companies are going to reoccupy one oil rig to see if that security guarantee is worth anything. Everyone is waiting for word from the capital that a deal has been struck.

April 8, 2006: President Obasanjo is trying to amend the constitution so that he can run for a third term. The constitution limits a president to two terms because of the tendency of presidents to want to be "president-for-life." Opponents to Obasanjo's plan are threatening civil war over it. Obasanjo was elected in 1999 as a reform candidate, after 15 years of military dictatorship.

April 10, 2006: The oil gangs have threatened a large scale attack on the oil facilities in the Delta, but the military and police doubt that the gangs have the manpower, firepower, or nerve to launch large scale attacks.

April 18, 2006: The government has promised an economic growth program in the Delta region, one that would create some 20,000 jobs. The oil gangs complained that this was another false promise.

April 19, 2006: For the first time, the Delta oil gangs have used a car bomb, setting one off inside an army base, killing two and wounding six. This is the first rebel action since February, aside from defending themselves when attacked by military and police patrols.

April 21, 2006: In response to the army base car bombing, the military and police have increased their patrols, arrests and use of force against suspected oil gangsters (young guys, openly displaying guns, in speed boats.)

April 25, 2006: Despite damage done by the oil gangs, all of the oil facilities in the Delta are under government control, and repairs to damaged equipment are almost complete. Only about 380,000 barrels a day of oil are still offline, and that is expected to be fixed in a week. The oil gangs have not tried to take down more oil production, but they could. The most common form of damage continues to be punctures in the pipelines, so that oil can be stolen for the black market. The oil gangs now like to announce these thefts as "attacks on the oil companies," but the gangs have a payroll to meet, and the only source of money is stolen oil.

April 30, 2006: A group of Delta rebels tried to take over an offshore oil platform, but the sailors guarding it rebuffed the attackers, arresting six of them.

May 1, 2006: Street gangs clashed in the suburbs of Lagos, leaving two dead and over 30 wounded. These gangs, drawing on a huge pool of unemployed youths, terrorize the populations in most urban areas. Politicians hire these gangs to support their election campaigns.

May 2, 2006: Troops and demonstrators (demanding jobs) clashed at an oil facility in the Delta, leaving two civilians dead.

May 9, 2006: Government discussions with Delta region tribal rebels have failed, with the rebels proclaiming that a ceasefire will not happen. The rebels are actually oil stealing gangs (which are composed of unemployed members of local tribes that have suffered much as the oil was pumped out of their neighborhoods.) But the gangsters now have political aspirations, noting that most of the politicians in power are crooks. While the gangs have some power, the government has more. The military and police have been bringing more people into the Delta region, and are ready to have it out with the gangs.

May 10, 2006: Delta region rebels denied responsibility for the killing of a oil company official. It is likely that the rebels didn't have anything to do with it. Criminal activity is high in the country, and especially in the Delta region.

May 11, 2006: In the Delta region, three oil workers were kidnapped.

May 12, 2006: Some 200 civilians died when oil ignited, after thieves had cut a hole in an oil pipeline in order to steal it. Nearby villagers often rush in to collect whatever the thieves miss, or after the thieves have filled their tanker truck and left. Occasionally the fuel ignites and kills dozens, sometimes hundreds, of people scooping up the oil.

May 14, 2006: President Obasanjo's attempt to get the constitution amended to allow him to run for a third term, has failed. Not enough members of parliament would vote for it, and an investigation has begun against politicians who were offering bribes to members of parliament if they would vote for the change. Obasanjo got elected as a reformer, but now he is trying to become "president for life," and using bribes to do it.

May 17, 2006: The oil companies operating in the Delta region and off the coast, are increasing their own security forces, rather than depend on the police and armed forces. The police and military have been inept in going after the tribal rebels in the region. The oil companies are bringing in for foreign security experts to supervise their efforts.

May 18, 2006: The government is buying a dozen F-7 fighters and three FT-7NI jet trainers from China, for $17 million each. The aircraft are most useful for ground attack, as they are basically Chinese copies of the 1950s era Russian MiG-21.

May 22, 2006: Some of the oil pipelines in the Delta, previously shut down by local gangs, have been reopened. Apparently deals have been made with the oil companies, to pay off the gangs to allow this.

May 25, 2006: The army and navy forces in the Delta Region are facing better armed and equipped local gangs, and are not able to shut the gangs down. Tapping into oil pipelines and stealing oil continues, and this provides the gangs with a steady cash flow. The better armed gangs are branching out into more ambitious attacks on oil company operations in the Delta. Payrolls are a favorite target. The region is becoming more dangerous, and unruly.

May 28, 2006: A large fire, caused by oil thieves, also damaged nearby power lines, which have resulted in the loss of about half the electrical power for six states in the south. It will take weeks to make repairs and restore power levels.

May 29, 2006: A military task force invaded Okochiri Island, in the Niger delta, made over a dozen arrests, killed five rebels and seized weapons.

May 31, 2006: President Olusegun Obasanjo has removed the head of the armed forces and replaced him with the head of the army. The air force chief was also removed. Obasanjo has accepted that he won't be able to get the constitution changed so that he can run for a third term.

June 1, 2006: On Okochiri Island, in the Niger delta, a soldier was killed by rebels still operating on the island.

June 2, 2006: A gang raided an offshore oil platform and kidnapped sixteen oil workers. Eight of the captives are foreigners (six British, one American and one Canadian).

June 2, 2006: The oil war in the Niger River Delta remains a stalemate. The military has been raiding known gang locations, but the gangs have plenty of boats, money, people and guns, and move around a lot. The military has plans to try and make it more difficult for the gangs to plunder the oil pipelines, but has not made much progress yet. The gangs continue to talk of forming a united front against the government, but ego, tribal politics and mistrust have prevented it so far.

June 4, 2006: In the Delta region, unidentified kidnappers released the eight foreign oil workers nabbed two days earlier. Apparently a ransom had been paid. The kidnappers are believed to be locals who believed they were promised jobs by the oil company, but never got them. The oil company says that it operates 70 kilometers off the coast, and is under no obligation to provide jobs for any coastal village that demands it.

June 7, 2006: Five South Korean oil facility technicians were kidnapped by a gang from the Delta region. The kidnappers would free the South Koreans if the government released the gang's leader, a tribal rebel held for treason since last September. The raid left five soldiers dead, and much property damage to an oil facility and support structures.

June 8, 2006: The five kidnapped South Koreans were freed when the imprisoned gang leader told his men to release the captives. This is expected to make it easier for the gang leader to beat the rap when he goes on trial.

Fortunately for the government, the gunmen are more interested in making money than in actually setting up a separate country. But the gangs, which are tribe-based, maintain their popular support with kidnappings and demands that locals be given more jobs. Meanwhile, the gangs get rich stealing oil, in addition to other criminal scams (robbery, extortion, smuggling).

June 9, 2006: The problem in the Delta oil region is that there are 3,500 oil and gas facilities (wells, pumping stations, workshops, warehouses and so on) in an area covering 75,000 square kilometers. The armed forces and police don't have enough manpower to guard all of these targets. The Delta region has ample waterways for the gangs, using speedboats, to concentrate on a facility, carry out a violent attack, and get away before government reinforcements can arrive.

June 10, 2006: Increased attacks by political and criminal gangs against the Delta oil facilities has shut down some 800,000 barrels a day of production. That's about $55 million a day ($20 billion a year), and enough of a loss to sharply reduce national economic growth. The biggest problem is the kidnapping, which is making it difficult for the oil companies to get people to man hundreds of isolated facilities.

June 12, 2006: Once more, the government has agreed, after much pressure from the UN, to withdraw its troops from the disputed (with neighboring Cameroon) Bakassi Peninsula. An international court agreed with Cameroon, but Nigeria refused to withdraw from the area, mainly because of the oil deposits, and thousands of Nigerians who had moved in. Last Summer, the government, under public pressure, backed off from it's agreement to withdraw. It's feared that the same thing will happen this time.

June 13, 2006: Despite by the democratically elected officials, a recent survey indicates the public believes crime and corruption have increased since 1999.

June 17, 2006: In the last week, police in the southeast clashed with Biafra separatists several times, and in one case seven separatists were killed and two armored vehicles destroyed. About twenty members of MASSOB (Actualisation of the Sovereign State of Biafra) have been arrested. Last Fall, seven MASSOB leaders were charged with treason. The government fears that the separatist group could spark another civil war, like the one in the 1960s that left over a million dead.

June 25, 2006: Two Filipino oil workers were released after being held for five days. Negotiations with tribal elders, who represented the kidnappers, led to an agreement on how much would be paid for the release of the two men.

June 26, 2006: The corruption and ineptitude of the police has made it possible for criminal gangs to take over and loot hospitals and colleges. While these institutions have security personnel, the gangsters arrive in overwhelming numbers, intimidate or kill security personnel, then loot the place, robbing students, patients and anyone else on the premises. This sort of thing only adds to the general lack of respect for government.

June 28, 2006: Opinion surveys indicate that 78 percent of Nigerians believe that corruption has increased since democracy was restored six years ago. Everywhere you turn, someone wants a bribe, or is willing to break the law for a price. While Nigerians recognize the problem, there has not been a massive movement to actually deal with it. Too many people talk of ridding the nation of corruption, but too few will take a stand and refuse to participate in these crimes.

June 28, 2006: MEND (The Movement for the Emancipation of the Niger Delta) has declared war on the Delta region police. The MEND separatists are angry because the police killed three armed robbers last week, men that MEND considers members of MEND, at least on a part time basis (when they aren't engaged in armed robbery activities).

June 30, 2006: Once again, international health organizations are launching a mass immunization campaign, in an effort to eliminate the last major pool of polio cases. If all children can be immunized, polio can be eliminated. But two years ago, when this was attempted, Islamic clerics halted the immunizations, by claiming that the effort was an attempt to poison Moslems with Western medicines. Paranoia and suspicion are common in the Moslem north, and in this case enormously self-destructive as well. Immunizations were halted for eleven months, and during that time there were several outbreaks of polio. The disease then spread to other Moslem countries, where successful immunization programs had eliminated polio. Hundreds of children were killed, or paralyzed for life by polio, as a result. There was some backlash against the Islamic clergy in the north, but in the largely Christian south, there was much anger. Eventually, government officials convinced the Moslem clerics to shut up (some still believe that the immunizations are an attack on Islam).

July 1, 2006: So far this year, about 20 percent of the nation's oil production (500,000 barrels a day) is off line because of rebel violence in the Delta region. This includes the kidnapping of 29 foreign oil workers, blowing up of pipelines and pumping stations and a bad attitude in general. The lost oil production is worth about $12 billion a year. Some 95 percent of the foreign exchange earned by Nigeria comes from oil exports. No other export even comes close. July 14, 2006: In the Delta region, more angry tribesmen are organizing resistance to oil operations, and attempts by the military and police to provide security. Already 20 percent of oil production is shut down, and increasing pressure from the angry tribal groups is pushing that to 25 percent. The resistance is widespread, so the military does not have large targets to go after.

July 7, 2006: In the Niger delta, two speedboats full of tribal militants attacked a dredging operation, disarmed the two soldiers guarding it, and kidnapped a Dutch worker. Meanwhile, in the north, an Islamic scholar was arrested and charged with trying to organize a "Taliban" group.

July 10, 2006: After negotiations, and payment of some kind, the Dutch oil worker was released.

July 11, 2006: In the southeast, renewed fighting with Biafran separatists has left at least eleven dead.

July 12, 2006: There were two explosions at an oil facility, plus spillages elsewhere. Sabotage is suspected, but not proven, and were later dismissed as exaggerated. Elsewhere in the Delta, several boats of gunmen attacked eleven boats carrying supplies to off-shore facilities. The four sailors guarding the boats were killed, and 40 people on the boats taken prisoner, but released the next day. .

July 13, 2006: In the Niger river delta, fighting between rival religious cults has left at least a dozen dead so far.

July 16, 2006: The army is building bases in the Niger Delta, with the attention of basing more brigades there permanently. The Delta is where the oil is. It's also where local tribes are becoming increasingly violent about the corruption, and not getting a share of the oil wealth.

July 18, 2006: In the south, a combination of party politics, cult religion and land scams led to violence, at least three dead.

July 21, 2006: In the Moslem north, several thousand Nigerian Shia demonstrated against Israel, for fighting back against Hizbollah attacks on Israel.

July 22, 2006: Violence continues in the Delta, with increased numbers of troops and police unable to stop the kidnapping of oil workers, and damage to oil production facilities. The government has lost 20 percent of its oil revenue because of the violence, and GDP has dropped six percent as a result. The tribal rebels finance themselves by stealing crude oil from the many pipelines that crisscross the Delta, them smuggling the crude to neighboring countries, where it is sold. Meanwhile, with the government more broke than usual (because of corruption), the armed forces are clamoring for new equipment, so they can fight the Niger Delta rebels (who can afford superior weapons and gear).

July 25, 2006: So far this year, 25 security personnel have been killed defending oil facilities in the Niger Delta. Oil and tribal gangs currently have interrupted some 650,000 barrels a day of production (a quarter of the total). That's about $48 million dollars a day in revenue. Some 32 foreign oil workers were also taken hostage, and released, after the oil companies paid ransom (often in the form of jobs or construction projects.)

July 31, 2006: Most recently, an oil platform and a pumping station have been seized by tribal gangs, and held until the oil companies paid up. These seizures have a lot of popular appeal because many of the demands are for things that will benefit the community (jobs, scholarships, construction, cleaning up oil spills) and not just the gunmen involved.

August 2, 2006: Swiss banks said they had complied with legal demands and returned $700 million stolen by former Nigerian dictator Sani Abacha, and deposited in Switzerland. This is believed to be only a quarter, or less, of what Abacha and his cronies stole.

August 4, 2006: In the Niger Delta, four foreign oil workers (three Filipinos and a German) were kidnapped. The military and police have been able to stop a lot of the kidnappings and attempts to seize oil facilities, but not all of them. The oil gangs are still making money, and growing in strength.

August 5, 2006: With oil export revenues of $45 billion last year, the tribes of the Niger Delta, where most of the drilling takes place, are increasingly unhappy, and violent, about their tiny share of the wealth.

The active rebels are formed from are oil theft gangs, who tap into pipelines and sell the stolen crude at a discount to brokers. The gangs have gotten rich at this, and been able to arm thousands of young men with high quality weapons. The stolen oil has also led to the purchase of many speedboats, that allow the oil gang gunmen to get around the maze of waterways faster than the soldiers and police who try to catch them.

August 7, 2006: While the north has problems with Islamic radicals getting violent over Christians drinking alcohol, or women not piling on sufficient clothing, in the south there are armed Christian cult gangs. These armed groups are willing to settle theological disputes with AK-47s. Police recently intervened against such a gang in the town of Asaba, killing two cultists, arresting four, and pursuing a dozen others, some of them armed with automatic weapons. Fortunately, neither the Christian cultists, or the Islamic radicals, like to travel long distances, because a meeting of these two groups would surely be explosive. However, in central Nigeria, where many towns with mixed Christian/Moslem populations, and the potential for a Christian cult gang forming on one side of town, and an Islamic radical gang on the other.

August 8, 2006: Four foreign oil workers were kidnapped when their boat was intercepted as it moved towards an offshore oil rig. There were eleven Nigerians on board as well, but the bandits usually release Nigerians, and negotiate ransoms for the foreign workers. So far this year, about thirty foreigners have been kidnapped in the Niger Delta oil region. The increased security costs, and interruptions to operations, have made it unprofitable for some foreign companies to operate in the Niger Delta. As a result, some foreign companies are pulling out of Nigeria, or threatening to do so. Some 20 percent of the nation's oil production is still blocked by tribe based gangs demanding a larger share of the oil revenue. The government cannot muster military or police forces capable to shutting down the growing power of the criminal gangs in the Niger Delta.

August 13, 2006: Nigerian troops have withdrawn from the disputed Bakassi peninsula, and police from Cameroon have entered for the official transfer of control tomorrow. UN mediation awarded the disputed, and oil rich, area to Cameroon, but Nigeria resisted complying for several years. Most residents of Bakassi consider themselves Nigerian, but do not want to move. The Bakassi decision was part of a UN mediation that covered several other disputed bits along over a thousand kilometers of the border with Cameroon. Nigeria got some small areas as well.

August 14, 2006: So far this month, 14 foreign oil workers have been kidnapped in the Niger Delta oil region. The kidnapping are moving from the oil fields to urban areas, with a gang of gunmen invading a nightclub to snatch two foreigners. The victims are held for ransom, and apparently the success of such ventures is attracting more players.

August 15, 2006: Political violence is increasing as another election season approaches. At least three candidates for various important offices, have been murdered recently.

August 16, 2006: The government has ordered a crackdown on the kidnapping of foreigners. This is to include an intensive search for kidnappers, and pressure on the oil companies not to pay ransom.

August 20, 2006: The crackdown on kidnapping has resulted in a hundred arrests. Of the fifteen foreigners taken this month, ten have been released. All of these arrests have been in urban areas, in the slums where the oil gangs do some of their recruiting. But the police and soldiers have yet to move on the oil gang camps, which are in the swamps, and heavily defended. The government knows that if it escalates the war with the oil gangs, more oil production could be cut off. Currently, violence in the oil region has cut off about twenty percent of oil exports.

August 21, 2006: Police and separatists clashed in the Niger Delta, leaving eleven dead (most of them rebels).

August 23, 2006: In the Delta, six foreigners were released, after being held for ten days. Ransom of about $26,000 was paid for the release of each man. Another ten captives were released recently as well, but little is known of their ransoms.

August 24, 2006: Two more foreigners were kidnapped in the Delta. Gunfire is increasingly heard, as security forces skirmish with separatists and oil theft gangs. Increasingly, the foreigners are being napped for ransom, not for jobs or other concessions to nearby tribes.

August 25, 2006: Police attacked a settlement near an Italian oil company in Port Harcourt in the Delta, near where two foreigners had recently been kidnapped. The police burned down the settlement, destroying several hundred homes in what was basically a slum. The inhabitants were suspected of being involved in the kidnappings.

August 28, 2006: Four kidnappers were arrested as they picked up the ransoms. MONDP (The Movement of The Niger Delta People), one of the main separatist gangs in the Delta, wants to negotiate a ceasefire. Apparently they feel the escalating violence will do the separatists more harm than good.

August 29, 2006: The Delta region is becoming a more dangerous place. The separatist rebels have kidnapped 19 foreigners so far this month, with most quickly released after payment of ransom. But more and more locals are using the money to buy guns. This is leading to more gun battles. It goes on day and night, because soldiers, cops and gunmen often go to the same bars and clubs after the sun goes down.

August 31, 2006: The increased number of soldiers and police in the Niger Delta region has greatly reduced the oil theft problem. In 2005, 150,000 barrels a day were being lost, while currently the loss is only 20,000 barrels a day. The reduction in income has angered the thousands of thieves who were making most of that money. Despite over 3,000 weapons seized by the army and police in the last two years, replacement weapons have been smuggled in by gunrunners.

September 1, 2006: A kidnapped Lebanese man was freed by police in the Delta. The victim had been taken on August 18th, and was freed with the help of villagers who feared retribution from the military.

September 3, 2006: A battalion of 700 soldiers departed for peacekeeping duty in the Sudan.

September 4, 2006: Some 250 American military trainers have set up a training program for military medical personnel, to show them how to deal with disaster relief situations. The two week training course will cost $4 million and involve the actual treatment of about a thousand patients. In the past few years, the Nigerian armed forces has failed to deal adequately with medical care at disasters (like plane crashes or natural disasters). The training will be held in northern Nigeria, in an attempt to reach out of Moslem Nigerians.

September 5, 2006: Police have broken up two kidnapping gangs, both of them connected with tribal separatist groups in the Niger Delta. The police tracked down the gangs through the middlemen who negotiated the ransoms. The recent increase in kidnappings, brought about a sharp increase in military and police activity to find and take down the kidnapping gangs. That resulted in hundreds of arrests and at least two dozen deaths. Tribal leaders have complained that the troops were trigger happy and capricious in their search for the kidnappers, which was probably true. That's how the army and police tend to operate.

September 10, 2006: An international survey found Nigeria ranked 108 out of 175 nations in "ease of starting a business." The numerous regulations a new business must navigate are there mainly to provide government officials with opportunities for stealing money (bribes and embezzlement). This sort of thing creates unemployment and resentment towards the government and is a principal cause of violence and unrest throughout the country.

September 11, 2006: Government corruption investigators seized $13.5 million from Patience Jonathan, the wife of the governor of Bayelsa State (Goodluck Jonathan). The money was being laundered and is believed to be stolen oil revenue that should have gone to the public treasury. The previous governor of Bayelsa State had been arrested in Britain on corruption related charges, returned to Nigeria, impeached (governors cannot be prosecuted) and prosecuted. Goodluck Jonathan is the new governor, and is now being investigated for corruption. The culture of corruption is entrenched, and taken for granted by most government officials. Nigeria has earned over $400 billion in oil revenues since 1960, and most of it has been stolen by corrupt officials.

September 12, 2006: In the Delta oil region, local gangs are refusing to allow repair teams to fix damaged (by thieves or rebels) pipelines. It used to be that you could pay off the local thugs, but now the rebels are not allowing repairs as a way to pressure the government to hand over more oil money to tribal chiefs and gang leaders. The military does not have sufficient troops to provide security teams for all the repair personnel.

September 13, 2006: Oil worker unions staged a one day strike to protect a lack of security. Bandits and political gangs are increasingly going after oil workers. While kidnapped foreign workers get a lot of attention, the Nigerian workers are more frequently attacked (often fatally) and robbed. Thousands of Nigerian oil workers are out and about every day, in trucks and small boats, tending to the huge oil infrastructure in the Delta. These men are increasingly seen as lucrative targets for criminals and rebels.

September 17, 2006: Foreign oil firms are passing on their increased security costs to the government. The foreign companies are threatening to pull out, which is another way of saying the government must pay the firms more money, or see oil production shut down. This is another cost of the corruption and bad management that has stirred up a growing rebellion in the Niger Delta region. The worst aspect of this situation is that the rebels are getting better organized, and have so far created a standoff situation with the military and national police.

September 18, 2006: An air force transport crashed in the south, killing 17, including eight major-generals and two brigadier-generals. This was a serious blow to the military, as the dead were among the most able officers in the armed forces. Poor discipline in the military has led to lower maintenance standards for military aircraft, than civilian aircraft.

September 19, 2006: Government plans, to cut civil service jobs from 1.5 million to a million, are likely to cause some civil disorder. Government jobs have long been regarded as a source of patronage and corruption, and government reformers see the cuts as long overdue. This is likely to enflame many of those being dismissed, along with family members (which makes for several million unhappy people.)

September 22, 2006: Over the last week, Moslem mobs have burned eleven Christian churches in the north, and caused thousands of Christians to flee their homes. Moslems were protesting alleged disrespect by Christians, and recent remarks by the pope, in which Islam was called a violent religion.

September 23, 2006: Vigorous military and police efforts in the Delta region have reduced kidnappings and anti-government violence. But these actions have not captured many of the rebels, just chased them to new hiding places. The violence is expected to resume soon. September 24, 2006: Despite an effort to vaccinate all children against polio (and complete a worldwide campaign to destroy the disease), more cases of polio have appeared in the north. This is more a political and religious, than a medical problem. Moslem religious leaders have asserted that the vaccinations are a Christian plot to poison Moslems, and this delayed vaccinations for over a year, which allowed the disease to spread into areas where it had previously been eliminated. Despite government success in getting the major Moslem leaders to back the vaccinations, some clerics still believe the paranoid version of what the vaccinations are all about. Such attitudes fuel continued support of Islamic radicalism, including terrorism and hostility towards the Christian south.

September 24, 2006: The multi-billion dollar UN effort to eradicate polio is being stymied by paranoia and religious prejudice in Nigeria, and the Moslem world in general. Conservative Islamic clerics adopted the idea that the polio vaccination program, since it was medicine from the infidel (non-Moslem) West, must contain something bad for Moslems. The most common accusation is that the vaccine will make Moslem girls sterile. Over the past three years, failure to completely vaccinate everyone in Nigeria, mainly Moslem areas of the north, has allowed the polio virus to survive. Then, each year, Nigerian Moslems infected with the virus travel. This is especially true of those who go on the Hadj pilgrimage in Saudi Arabia, where they pass the virus on to Moslems from other parts of the whole, who carry it back and re-introduce infection in areas where the virus had been eliminated by the vaccination campaign. The UN World Health Organization must spend an addition several hundred million dollars a year, to keep the vaccination program going, while they continue to try and convince all Nigerian Moslems to allow their children to be vaccinated. There is also the additional cost of again vaccinating other Moslem nations that were free of polio, but were re-infected with polio from Nigeria. This year, there were 800 cases of polio in Nigeria (most of the victims were children), and nearly as many on over twenty countries that were re-infected with strains of polio from Nigeria.

September 26, 2006: Corruption and violence have taken root in the universities. Once the pride of Africa, Nigerian universities have been debased by corruption and lower standards. Over the last decade, student gangs, called "cults," have become more of a problem. Local politicians now use them to mobilize, by force if necessary, votes at election time. On campus, the cults generate violence (often in the form of gruesome murders) as well as other crimes (prostitution and gambling being favorites.) Educational standards have fallen so low that degrees from many schools are worthless.

September 27, 2006: In a worldwide ranking of nations on their economic global competitiveness, Nigeria fell 18 positions to 101st. The main reasons for the slide are corruption, inefficient business practices and government mismanagement. This leads to more poverty and unrest.

September 29, 2006: Nearly every state governor in Nigeria is being investigated for corruption. Some of those investigations are having an effect, with governors being removed. However, there are too many other corrupt politicians ready to take the place of those who have been prosecuted.

October 1, 2006: In the Niger delta, politically astute oil gangs are aligning themselves with local politicians. This is in anticipation of national elections next April. The oil stealing gangs have not been able to stand up to the military and police crackdown. However, the armed forces and police have not been able to put the gangs out of business either. The gangsters are locals, who know the complicated waterways of the Delta better that the sailors, soldiers and police. The security forces can hurt the gangs, but they cannot kill them off.

October 2, 2006: Several dozen rebels in speedboats, attacked troops in boats guarding a shipment of supplies to an oil production facility in the Niger delta. Two army boats were sunk, and four soldiers and one civilian were killed. The rebels took prisoner 25 oil workers, but soon freed nine of them. In a separate attack, a boat carrying oil workers and supplies was attacked, resulting in several wounded, but no dead.

October 3, 2006: Four foreign oil workers were kidnapped in the Niger delta.

October 4, 2006: Rebels attacked an army patrol, sinking two boats and killing nine soldiers in the Niger delta. The rebels say they are moving several hundred gunmen into position to make more attacks.

October 5, 2006: The Niger delta rebels declared a unilateral ceasefire, after several days of attacks on the army and oil workers.

The basic problem in the Niger delta is oil money and corruption. The rebels are armed locals who steal oil from pipelines, buy weapons, and are trying to get the government to clean up the corruption and spend more of the oil revenue on basic services for Nigerians living in the region. The government has agreed, but, as usual, that's all. The corruption and government incompetence goes on. The government and oil companies throw some money at the rebels and protesting civilians, putting out the small fires of anger as they crop up. But by not dealing with the underlying problems, you still have all those angry Nigerians in the Niger delta, stealing oil, buying guns and getting more aggressive.

October 7, 2006: Rebels are demanding $10 million each for the four British oil workers they kidnapped four days ago. The men were seized in a saloon, inside a residential compound for foreigners. Other rebels accused the army of burning down a village, suspected of supporting the rebels, after all the inhabitants had fled. The army denied this. But in the past, when civilians killed soldiers, usually in the midst of some tribal war, the soldiers would retaliate savagely against local civilians. Apparently the rebels hope that their unilateral ceasefire will interrupt army retaliation plans. That may not work, as individual soldiers, in small groups, often strike out at civilians suspected of connections with the rebels. The army has already destroyed, in an organized fashion, villages believed to harbor rebels or, more correctly, gangsters who moonlight as rebels.

October 10, 2006: A gang of armed men forced their way into an oil pumping facility on the coast of the Niger delta, and took sixty oil workers hostage. Three Nigerians (Defense Ministry employees), and three foreigners (from Ireland, Israel and Romania) were charged with spying for Russia.

October 12, 2006: All but about 15 of the hostages taken in the Delta on the 10th, have been released. The kidnappers are mad at the oil company for not providing enough jobs and other goodies that were provided in response to past attacks by the tribal gangs.

In central Nigeria, supporters of a state governor, impeached for corruption, gathered to protest this treatment. Police responded with their weapons, shooting two men.

October 13, 2006: Saudi Arabia has imposed strict rules on visitors from Nigeria. Children under 15 must provide polio vaccination certificates before they arrive. This is to try and halt the spread of polio during the annual Hadj (pilgrimage to Mecca). Polio has not been wiped out in Nigeria because many Islamic clergy believe the vaccination program is an infidel plot to poison Moslem children. Some parents respond to this idea, keep their children from getting vaccinated, and the kids continue to get polio. These parents take their kids on the Hadj and spread polio to Moslem children from other countries.

October 14, 2006: In northern Nigeria, an Islamic religious leader, accused of murder and supporting terrorism, was sentenced to death by hanging. The condemned man, Musa Ali Suleiman, is a leader of a radical sect that is not affiliated with al Qaeda, and is antagonistic to the current crop of Islamic radicals. The sect Musa Ali Suleiman led has been around for generations, and condemns luxuries and modern technology. This is a common pattern in Islam, with sects like this becoming more popular every few generations. But they are always out there.

October 15, 2006: Most of the state governors have been accused of corruption by a government investigation, but attempts to impeach and prosecute them have run up against accusations that the entire process is a political ploy. Normally, corrupt governors protect themselves via corrupt allies in the state legislature (which have to impeach governors before they can be prosecuted) and judiciary. The current conspiracy theory is that president Obasanjo, who cannot run again, is using the corruption campaign to control who will be president next. This battle over who is stealing could trigger a civil war, since the money is very important to a lot of people.

October 16, 2006: The government is prosecuting three Nigerians (employees of the Defense Ministry) and three foreigners (a Romanian, Israeli and Irishman) for spying for Russia. This case is believed to really be about Russian oil companies looking about for opportunities to get a piece of the action in Nigeria.

October 19, 2006: The Economic and Financial Crimes Commission (EFCC) has calculated that corrupt officials have stolen over $500 billion since the 1960s. That's about a billion dollars a month. In the past two years, the EFCC has made over 2,000 arrests, launched 306 investigations and obtained 90 convictions. Some $5 billion has been recovered. Since the corrupt officials hold most of the senior positions in the government, they are increasing their defenses. Thus they can protect themselves from well-documented corruption charges by using allies in the legislature, courts and bureaucracy, as well as the demands of legal due-process. If the corrupt officials prevail, the only cure for the economic and social malaise will be a revolution. Nigerians are really getting tired of hearing about all that oil wealth, and seeing nothing but poverty and decay about them.

October 22, 2006: Seven foreign oil engineers, kidnapped 19 days ago in the Niger Delta, were released. No mention was made of ransom, but it is usually paid in these cases. The men were taken from a guarded residential compound, when a gang of 18 armed men invaded. This has not happened before, and the kidnappers appear to have been common criminals.

October 25, 2006: Local tribesmen seized three oil facilities in the Niger Delta, forcing a shutdown. The oil company now has to negotiate a payment, to get the tribesmen out.

October 28, 2006: Unrest in the Niger Delta oil fields this year, has cut about a quarter of the country's oil production. Most of the attacks on oil facilities are by locals, angry at the government for mucking up their neighborhood, then stealing all the oil revenue. The unrest is too widespread to deal with using police and troops (who are not very efficient in the best of times.) But paying off each violent group of tribesmen, while expensive, works.

November 6, 2006: In the Niger Delta, a gang of armed and unarmed tribesmen overwhelmed security guards and took control of an oil facility, taking 48 oil workers prisoner. November21, 2006: Islamic terrorists have not been able to establish bases in Moslem northern Nigeria, and Islamic conservatism is losing some of its appeal as well. The criminal gangs and corruption, although under attack, continue to flourish. The corruption supplies money for state level politicians to maintain private militias, but none of these personal armies have been put forward as a player in a potential civil war. The country is divided, but not in an organized way. Thus there is lots of chaos, but much less threat of a civil war. Anti-corruption efforts are forcing many potential warlords to spend a lot of their time avoiding jail.

November 7, 2006: Two foreign oil workers, seized last week, were released, apparently after payment of a ransom.

November 9, 2006: Six of the 48 captive oil workers escaped from the oil facility held by armed villagers. Some $75,000 in ransom is being sought for the remaining captives, and five of the remaining captives were released to facilitate thenegotiations. Soldiers and police have surrounded the oil facility.

November 10, 2006: China is offering loans and technical assistance to rebuild railroads and other infrastructure. China wants to appeal to the government for a larger share of Nigeria's oil sales.

November 16, 2006: In the Niger Delta, about a dozen gunmen attacked a oilfield logistics base, but were repulsed by sailors guarding the facility. Two of the attackers were killed and one was captured. This was the first time a navy security force has managed to repulse such a major attack.

November 18, 2006: A man was caught trying to smuggle 11 pounds of explosives aboard an airliner. Airport security was increased. Nigeria has had a number of crashes lately, caused by poor maintenance. But airport security is pretty sloppy as well, and the smuggler they caught may have been one of many who were not detected.

November 19, 2006: Rebels left an offshore oil platform, and freed 40 hostages, after occupying it for two weeks. Apparently a payoff was made.

November 22, 2006: Seven foreign oil workers had been kept after a rebel raid, on the 19th, of a oil company supply ship. The navy located where the hostages and staged a raid today. A sailor, a hostage and two rebels were killed during the operation.

November 24, 2006: The government has worked out payoff deals for all of the Ijaw tribal groups in Delta, so that damaged oil facilities can be put back into service. Normally, the oil companies handle the payoffs, but in this case, the Ijaw unrest was so widespread, that the oil companies withdrew and told the government to calm down the area, if they wanted to see oil production resume. This took about 20 percent of the national oil production off-line.

November 30, 2006: The peace deal with the Ijaw tribal gangs in the Delta region is notworking because additional groups have shown up looking for part of the payoff. Government negotiators are trying to resolve this, and get the oil facility repairs underway.

December 2, 2006: Tribal violence in the Delta oil region has halted about 39 percent of the national oil exports. The tribal communities are fed up with decades of government corruption, and economic and ecological disaster for the Delta population. The government is trying a combination of carrot (payoffs to groups that will leave the oil facilities alone) and stick (military and police action against groups that will not make deals.) The government talks tough, but the police and military are pretty incompetent, and generally unable to stop all the attacks. Nigerian law prohibits the oil companies from forming their own armed security force, so the oil companies have to hire off-duty cops if they want any armed protection for their people and facilities. Payoffs are, increasingly, not enough, because more and more local groups see violence as a way to make some money. The government is losing millions of dollars a day in oil revenues because of the Delta violence, and that is putting pressure on the politicians to try new ideas. Honest and efficient government is not among the suggestions.

December 7, 2006: In the Delta region, MEND rebels kidnapped four foreigners and demanded that two rebel leaders be released, and a large ransom paid, before the foreigners would be freed. The MEND raid was made at 5:30 AM, and the military guard was asleep.

December 8, 2006: The navy now has one frigate and 15 smaller warships (many of them just patrol boats) in the Niger Delta, trying to provide security for the thousands of oil production facilities in the area. The navy is concentrating on the oil stealing (called "bunkering") operations, which fund the many criminal gangs, and rebel movements, in the area. Oil pipelines are punctured, the oil is transferred to larger and larger containers, until it ends up in small coastal tankers, that take the stuff to nearby countries, where oil brokers will buy the oil (at a discount, because it is stolen.) The navy is out looking for those small coastal tankers, and confiscating the ships, and the oil, and arresting the crews. Sometimes, the gangster tankers have very convincing counterfeit documents, which makes the policing job even more difficult. So far, the oil stealing gangs are winning, but the navy is taking tankers out of the illegal trade.

The Ijaw MEND rebels are still holding four foreigners in the Delta. MEND does not want a cash ransom, but the release of two of their leaders, and aid projects for the Delta region. MEND expects the hostages to be held through Christmas, and probably much longer, as the government has resisted giving into the MEND demands.

The police force is also corrupt, and the source of some pretty atrocious behavior. There's currently a lot of unrest in central Nigeria, because of a recent police operation that resulted in ten dead civilians. December 15, 2006: Over 70 foreigners, mostly oil workers, have been kidnapped for ransom so far this year. Most of these kidnappings were committed by Ijaw rebel groups. There are eight million Ijaw people in the Niger Delta, where most of Nigerias oil is. The Ijaw believe they have not gotten a fair share of the oil revenue. They are probably right, because there has been little public investment in the area, and it's now known that most of the government oil revenue, over the last few decades, was stolen by corrupt government officials. Nigeria is widely recognized as one of the most corrupt nations on earth.

December 15, 2006: Over 70 foreigners, mostly oil workers, have been kidnapped for ransom so far this year. Most of these kidnappings were committed by Ijaw rebel groups. There are eight million Ijaw people in the Niger Delta, where most of Nigerias oil is. The Ijaw believe they have not gotten a fair share of the oil revenue. They are probably right, because there has been little public investment in the area, and it's now known that most of the government oil revenue, over the last few decades, was stolen by corrupt government officials. Nigeria is widely recognized as one of the most corrupt nations on earth.

December 18, 2006: Car bombs, triggered by cell phone, went off in two oil company compounds in the Niger Delta region. There were no casualties, and that was on purpose, as the MEND rebel group said they did want to kill anyone. MEND said they called off a third bombing because of the possibility of fatalities. MEND wants more oil money going to the people in the Niger Delta.

December 21, 2006: Three policemen died repulsing attacks on two oil facilities in the Niger Delta. As a result, the oil company closed the facilities, halting 96,000 barrels of daily production (about two billion dollars a year in oil sales.)

December 22, 2006: MEND rebels will not accept ransom for the four foreign oil workers they are holding. This time, MEND wants its political demands (release of two of their leaders, and aid projects for the Delta region) met. Negotiators are confident they can eventually buy the freedom of the four captives, because the government is very unlikely to release the imprisoned MEND leaders.

December 23, 2006: A car bomb went off outside the governors office in the Niger Delta. There were no injuries, but this was the first time a government facility was attacked by MEND. A second bomb malfunctioned, according to an email from MEND.

December 25, 2006: Responding to the increased rebel violence in the Niger Delta, some oil companies are evacuating the families of foreign workers. Rebels attacks are, month by month, shutting down more production. MEND is getting more skillful and better organized in their attacks. The use of cell phone triggered car bombs, and the ability to get these vehicles into heavily guarded compounds, are examples of this. MEND is also refraining from killing innocent civilians, which means they remain popular, while still terrorizing the government. The bombs destroy the luxurious cars and facilities of the government and oil companies. Pictures of the bomb effects in the media make it clear where the oil money is going. The Ijaw tribes that MEND represents live in extreme poverty, amidst billions of dollars worth of oil production facilities. The government has a hard time addressing this problem, because local officials (often Ijaws) who get money for local projects, too often steal it. Corruption is a major problem, and MEND is no paragon of virtue either. The key people in MEND are leaders of criminal gangs (that steal oil) and politicians who, in most cases, would be as corrupt as the others, if they got into power. That's the real tragedy of Nigeria, the shortage of honest politicians. At least more Nigerians recognize this problem now, but getting enough honest politicians to show up and run the government efficiently, is another matter. Currently, corrupt politicians think nothing of just switching parties, or forming new ones, and running for office again, while they fight off weak prosecutions for past crimes. Nationwide, however, there is growing popular anger at the corruption and poverty, and the fact that, "we have met the enemy, and it is us."

December 25, 2006: Outside Lagos, a large group of people were stealing petroleum from a punctured pipeline, when the fuel caught fire, and killed 248, with several hundred receiving non-fatal burns.

December 30, 2006: Partial results of the census held earlier this year, were released. The population has doubled, to 140 million, since the last census in 1991. Information on the current size of each of the country's 250 tribes, will not be released until the April elections. The tribal numbers are crucial as they give each group a number to use when demanding a share of oil wealth, or political representation.

December 31, 2006: MEND rebels moved their four foreign hostages deeper into the jungle waterways of the Niger river delta, suspecting that the military was planning a rescue mission.

January 3, 2007: The oil company that employed the four foreign workers held captive by MEND, tried to use $545,000 to obtain the release of their men. But the rebels kept the cash, saying they had foiled a bribery attempt, and kept the hostages.

January 5, 2007: Five Chinese telecommunications workers were kidnapped in the Niger delta. China, which is a growing investor, trading partner and supplier of weapons in Africa, demanded that Nigeria recover the men quickly.

January 6, 2007: Over the last two weeks, violence between the military and the oil gangs in the Delta, has risen sharply. At least a dozen soldiers have been killed, with even more gang members dead or missing. Some of the gang dead are the result of gangs fighting each other. The disputes are often over money. While the government has troops all over the Niger delta trying to restore order, and free kidnapped foreign workers, most of the violence is about money, not politics. About 70 percent of Nigeria's population lives at poverty level, with income of under $500 a year. Thus stealing oil, armed robbery and burglary are all attractive enterprises for young men in the Niger delta, and elsewhere in the country as well.

January 7, 2007: In the Niger delta, a navy patrol boat was attacked by seven rebel speedboats, abducting at least two security personnel (as the others fled.) Attacks on security personnel (police, soldiers, sailors) are becoming more common.

January 8, 2007: An increasing number of civil aviation accidents brought to lightthe fact that 85 percent of the 165 commercial aircraft in the country are 21 years old or older, and usually poorly maintained. Corruption and bribery has made it impossible to maintain aviation safety standards. Military aircraft are in no better shape, and most rarely, if ever, fly.

January 9, 2007: In the Niger delta, armed gangs, loyal to rival politicians, clashed several times, leaving at least ten dead, and many more wounded. Such violence was not just in support of upcoming elections, but also because of tribal disputes over land and religious issues.

January 10, 2007: Over a dozen men, in six speedboats, invaded a residential compound in the Niger delta, overpowered 45 security personnel, and kidnapped nine South Korean oil workers. So far this year, 18 foreign oil workers have been kidnapped by gangs. In the past year, sixty foreigners, mostly oil workers, have been kidnapped.

January 11, 2007: A local chief in the Delta, obtained the release of the nine South Koreans who were kidnapped yesterday. Some money probably changed hands.

January 14, 2007: By unwritten (but not unspoken) agreement, all the major political parties have nominated a Moslem to run for president in the April elections. This is because for the last eight years, a Christian president has been in power. The nation is split in half by religion. The south is Christian and the north Moslem. Thus the unwritten understanding that the presidency will alternate. Actually, it is believed that the recent census showed that the Moslems were now at least 55 percent of the population. This doesn't matter much, as Christian and Moslem politicians are equally corrupt. Attempts, in the past few years, to impose Sharia (Islamic law) in largely Moslem northern states, have failed to stem the corruption and crime.

January 16, 2007: Additional troops were sent to the Niger Delta, after a dozen people were killed over the weekend due to fighting over tribal politics.

Fear of rebel attacks have caused an oil company to shut down another pipeline, which normally moved 12,000 barrels of oil a day. That's about a quarter billion dollars worth of oil a year.

January 17, 2007: A newspaper editor was arrested and accused of receiving $300,000 from al Qaeda sources in Sudan, for the purpose of assisting Islamic terrorism in Nigeria. It's common for editors to take bribes, but the terrorism angle is unusual. However, the evidence against the editor is quite extensive, and connects him with a Nigerian "Taliban" group that was put down bythe government three years ago.

January 18, 2007: Niger delta rebels released six foreigners (five Chinese and an Italian). The foreign oil workers apparently were ransomed, although there is rarely public acknowledgement of ransom (as this encourages more kidnappings.) Two Italians and a Lebanese are still being held by a group that is more political. The Chinese were held by a gang that was mainly in it for the money. The Italian released was ill.

January 19, 2007: India is providing counter-terrorism for select officers and NCOs. The training is being provided free.

January 20, 2007: Rebels kidnapped 24 Filipino sailors from a German cargo ship at anchor in the Niger Delta.

January 22, 2007: The navy assembled 13 ships, four helicopters and two boats in the Niger Delta for a training exercise. This is a major portion of the fleet, and cannot be sustained in the Delta because of a shortage of spare parts, money and fuel.

January 23, 2007: Two foreign engineers (British and American) were seized in the Niger Delta, and held for $11 million ransom.

January 24, 2007: Kidnapping foreigners is becoming the new get-rich-quick scheme. Police appear unable to stop it, or recover the victims. Colombia and the Philippines both underwent a similar outburst of kidnapping in the past decade. In both cases, it was a few gangs that were specializing in it, and accounted for most of the people taken. Once the police were able to take out the key players, the kidnapping stopped. Nigerian police have been unable to deal with gangs so far, so this will be a crucial test if order can be restored.

January 25, 2007: In the Delta, a police killed a rebel gunman. One group of kidnappers are demanding over $500,000 ransom, each, for foreigners they are holding captive. The government confirmed that nine Chinese oil workers were kidnapped in the Niger Delta on the 22nd.

January 26, 2007: In Port Harcourt, the largest city in the Niger Delta, several hundred MEND rebels attacked police headquarters and freed over a hundred prisoners (including a MEND leader). There were about five dead, after several hours of shooting and the use of an armed helicopter.

February 1, 2007: Despite the unrest in the Niger Delta, the national police are preoccupied with the prospect of political violence nationwide over the next two months, before the presidential elections in April. Some 78 percent of the 320,000 national police are being mobilized to deal with political violence.

February 2, 2007: It's becoming more difficult to get kidnap victims freed. Cash ransom is no longer enough, as the kidnappers are increasingly demanding political concessions (mainly spending government money on infrastructure projects, instead of seeing the cash stolen by government officials.) The foreign governments trying to get their citizens freed can put pressure on the Nigerian government to placate the kidnappers, but that rarely works.

February 4, 2007: Factions of the ruling PDP party fought at political rallies, leaving at least four dead. Getting elected means getting rich, because politicians steal all they can while in office. Getting elected is worth killing for.

February 6, 2007: In the Niger Delta, a Filipino oil worker was kidnapped, and one of the two policemen escorting him was killed. That makes thirty foreigners being held for ransom in the oil region. There are some 4,000 Filipinos working in Nigeria, most in the Niger Delta. The Filipino government has forbidden anymore of its citizens from working in Nigeria, after ransom was paid to free 24 Filipinos last month.

The state assembly in the northern state of Adamawa has voted to remove their governor for corruption. Only then can a governor be prosecuted for corruption. In such cases, the corrupt officials often fight back, with lawsuits, bribes and physical violence.

The anti-corruption agency released a list of 135 politicians believed to be too corrupt to run for office. Among them was the current vice-president, who is running for the office of president. Opposition party members comprised 61 percent of those on the list.

In the Niger Delta, the first female foreigner was kidnapped. The victim was a Filipina, married to an Iranian (who owns a construction company.) In another incident, a Frenchman was seized. The gangs in the delta are becoming aware that kidnapping is easy money, if you don't have to fight your way past a lot of bodyguards.

February 7, 2007: The northern and southern states are starting to argue over the recent census. Southern Lagos state insists its population is 17 million (in line with UN estimates of 14 million) and not the 9 million shown in the census. Oil money is distributed to the states in proportion to their population.

February 8, 2007: In the Niger Delta, several thousand oil workers have lost their jobs because of the violence, and interruption of oil pumping and pipeline operations. Thousands more locals will be out of work, and the workers threaten violence if the government doesn't do something about the violence (of the separatists and oil stealing gangs) that shut down oil production in the first place. Thousands more are out of work because the threat of kidnapping has kept many Nigerian and foreign oil workers away from the bars and clubs, or even from shopping. The foreigners stay in their heavily guarded compounds, and the local workers stay home. Some 90 percent of Nigeria's export income comes from oil sales. The government has most of the oil facilities under heavy guard, and still operating. But growing violence in the delta could cause most of the oil operations to stop.

February 9, 2007: Oil companies are losing a lot of key foreign workers, who are fleeing the increasing violence in the Nigerian oil region (the Niger river delta). By the end of the year, this labor shortage will reduce the amount of oil that can be shipped, as facilities break down. The oil companies have also made plans for complete evacuation of foreigners. There are not enough Nigerian citizens, with the necessary skills, to keep the oil facilities going for long. Thus if the government doesn't calm things down in the Niger delta this year, there will be no more oil money for the politicians to steal. Already, about 20 percent of oil production has been halted by gang violence.

February 11, 2007: The introduction of Sharia (Islamic law) in the Moslem north did not have the desired effect. About fifty people were convicted of serious offenses (that could result in an amputation or death). None of these punishments have been carried out in the last six years (and very few in 2001, because of the uproar from the non-Moslem half of the Nigerian population.) What dismayed Moslems the most was that none of the biggest crooks, the corrupt politicians, had Sharia law applied to them. Only the powerless were prosecuted for Sharia law offenses. While this included some common criminals, it also hauled in women who had been raped, or unmarried couples. Sharia law is pretty much a dead issue now up north.

February 12, 2007: MEND (Movement for the Emancipation of Niger Delta) rebels say that some of their foreign hostages will not be released until after the elections in April. That will bring in a new government, which could repudiate any deals the current government might make to get foreign hostages released.

February 13, 2007: The 24 Filipino sailors seized on a ship in the Niger delta, have been released. A ransom was apparently paid, but no one will say anything.

February 16, 2007: The United States has warned that Niger Delta gangs are planning to take their kidnapping operations to other parts of Nigeria. The U.S. has been very interested in what's happening in the Niger Delta, mainly because about ten percent of the oil imported into the United States, comes from Nigeria. The Niger Delta gangs, particularly MEND (Movement for the Emancipation of Niger Delta), have not announced any such plans. But, then, it is not in their interest to do so. Security in the Delta is much stronger, making it more difficult to snatch foreigners. So moving beyond the Delta makes sense. If outfits like MEND can successfully operate outside the Delta, the federal government is in big trouble.

February 1 8, 2007: In the last year, rebels in the Niger Delta have kidnapped about sixty foreigners, and killed about a hundred police, troops and civilians. The gangs in the Niger Delta are different from the armed militias found throughout the country. The Delta gangs have grown wealthy tapping into oil pipelines and smuggling the oil across the border to brokers who buy it. In the rest of the country, the gangs are basically enforcers for local politicians. Street level muscle, if you will. The muscle is paid for by money the politicians have looted from the government. With elections coming up in April, these political gangs are staffing up and are much more active. But the leaders of these militias are getting more ambitious, and demanding, after seeing what the Niger Delta gangs are getting away with. Politicians are expected to keep their militias/gangs under control, but it appears that some of these armed organizations are out of control.

February 25, 2007: A dispute over land ownership in the Niger Delta, led to clans of the Ogoni tribe to mobilize and battle each other. At least ten people are dead, and over 200 homes burned down.

February 26, 2007: In another part of the Niger Delta, villagers clashed over who should get jobs offered by the oil companies. Over a dozen people died in these battles.

February 28, 2007: In the last year, the violence in the Niger Delta has left nearly a hundred people dead, and halted up to a quarter of the 2.6 million barrels a day of oil production. The latest impediment to production, the kidnapping of foreign oil workers, is making oil specialist jobs in Nigeria hard to fill. The military has army and navy patrols out chasing down the kidnapping and oil theft gangs, but even with helicopters and aircraft overhead, the gangs usually slip into the swamps and jungles and get away. Meanwhile, the payoff from stealing oil or kidnapping is large enough to attract a growing number of young guys with poor job prospects, and a willingness to do anything for a buck. The kidnappers are becoming more violent. A Lebanese oil worker was killed recently, during a kidnapping attempt. Another foreigner was killed when kidnappers barged into a saloon with guns blazing, looking for hostages.

March 2, 2007: In Port Harcourt, the largest city in the Delta, a group of unidentified gunmen opened fire in a crowded district, killing or wounding 17 people. No rebel group, or anyone else, took credit for the incident. MEND (Movement forthe Emancipation of Niger Delta). the largest rebel group in the Delta, has promised more violence.

March 5, 2007: The National Police are importing 40,000 AK-47 rifles and 20 million round of ammunition, to arm additional police and paramilitaries. The growth of crime, especially in the oil producing areas of the Niger River Delta have led to an expansion of security forces.

March 6, 2007: In the Niger River Delta, a dispute over how to share money and jobs from an oil company, led to a dispute among local tribesmen, and left at least 13 dead. The violence went on for several days. The government is trying to negotiate peace deals with tribal elders in the Niger Delta. But the elders have limited influence on the wealthy, and well armed, gang leaders in the delta.

March 8, 2007: The navy has brought in several more gunboats, to patrol the numerous waterways in the Niger River Delta. Oil stealing gangs have been tapping into more pipelines, in order to steal oil. The gangs usually hit the pipeline where it crosses a waterway. A hole is made in the pipe, and barrels filled with oils. The thieves get about $20 a (43 gallon) barrel.

The barrels are later emptied into small tankers or barges, which then go to neighboring countries, where oil brokers will buy the stolen oil and "launder it" so that it can be sold to legitimate customers. The cash from this stolen oil is buying boats, guns and other goodies for the thieves, but is causing even more oil to be lost. The thieves don't plug up the pipeline when they are finished filling their barrels, but just take off. It may take repair crews days to find and fix the leak. The leaks are costing nearly 200,000 barrels a day to be lost. The additional navy patrols will seek to catch the oil thieves in the act. The navy has greatly expanded its force of patrol boats in the last few years, with over 40 now in service. Five years ago, the navy had less than a dozen.

March 9, 2007: Damage to pipelines and pumping stations has halted the export of 664,000 barrels of oil a day (worth about $40 million). Most of the damage is done by gangs stealing the oil, at least until the army and repair crews show up.

March 12, 2007: Police raided a neighborhood in Port Harcourt (in the Niger Delta) and rescued three foreign oil workers (two Croats and a Montenegrin)who had been kidnapped last month.

March 15, 2007: After long negotiations, kidnappers released two Italians who had been seized last December.

March 17, 2007: Over the last month, 31 foreign oil workers have been freed, apparently after the payment of ransom. The government usually denies that ransom is paid, but that is hard to believe. The prisoners are not freed until after long (sometimes months long) negotiations. Some of the kidnapping gangs make political demands, and these are rarely met. So the only incentive to free the captives is ransom, and that is apparently being paid with the condition that the details be kept secret. Europeans and Americans are apparently worth several hundred thousand dollars each, captives from other parts of the world, much less. In the last fifteen months, about a hundred foreign oil workers have been taken by gangs in the Niger Delta. The oil companies have beefed up security, but it's become difficult to recruit the skilled people needed to run the oil operations. About a quarter of production is currently halted because of criminal and terrorist activity. Government attempts to negotiate a peace deal have failed because there are too many tribal chiefs and gang bosses to get a comprehensive deal with. But the locals are increasingly insistent that they get their share of the oil being extracted from their neighborhood. The current anti-corruption drive has revealed that about 40 percent of government expenditures is stolen by officials. Most of the government's revenue come from oil taxes and fees (about $40 billion last year). But the government is losing at least 20 percent of that, so far, this year because of the unrest in the Niger Delta. The coming elections are likely to put a Moslem northerner in office as president. That would mean a less sympathetic attitude towards the troublesome tribes of the Niger Delta.

March 18, 2007: Three more people were kidnapped in the southeastern Nigeria. Two were Chinese oil workers, and the third a Nigerian. Police blame local tribal separatists (Biafrans) for the kidnapping.

March 20, 2007: In northeast Nigeria, a Christian high school teacher was beaten to death by her male students, who accused her of desecrating the Koran. Local Christians have also been complaining about Islamic radical groups kidnapping Christian children, so the kids could be raised as Moslems. More police have been sent to the area, to prevent the outbreak of more religious riots.

March 21, 2007: Several hundred police reinforcements were sent to southwestern Nigeria, were a tribal dispute over land led to battles that left over twenty casualties (including five dead.)

March 23, 2007: Three more foreigners have been kidnapped in the Niger Delta oil region.

March 27, 2007: In northern Nigeria, over seventy people died as they tried to retrieve fuel leaking from an overturned fuel tanker truck. Despite warnings from the driver, that the leaking truck was about to explode, people kept trying to retrieve the fuel.

March 30, 2007: The army admitted that its soldiers had accidentally shot and killed four policemen on March 27th. The deaths were originally reported as the work of gangsters or rebels. The army says their soldiers thought the police were bandits, and opened fire on their car at about 3 AM. The army says that the police, when approached by the soldiers, drew their weapons and began firing. There are conflicting accounts of exactly what happened, as well as accusations that the police were involved in some sort of corruption. The army and police do not always get along, and there have been fatal battles between soldiers and police in the past. The government is trying to prevent this incident from turning into the spark for another outbreak of violence.

March 31, 2007: Gunmen in speedboats boarded an off shore oil rig and kidnapped a British oil worker. This one was not political, but for ransom. This makes four foreign oil workers (two Chinese and one Dutch) held captive in the Niger Delta.

April 2, 2007: Two more foreign workers were kidnapped in the Niger Delta. Over 70 have been grabbed so far this year.

April 4, 2007: Four kidnapped foreigners were released after ransoms were paid. April 5, 2007: In the Niger Delta, the oil companies, particularly Shell, have reached agreement with tribal, political and criminal organizations, so that they can resume production in the western part of the Niger Delta. Over the last year, 500,000 barrels a day of production has been halted. This was mainly because of attacks on oil facilities by political organizations like MEND. But the halt in production did not help the locals, or MEND. Thousands of locals lost their jobs because of the suspended oil extraction and pumping to the coastal terminal, where tankers pick it up. MEND supports itself through oil theft (by punching holes in the pipelines, and stealing the leaking oil), as do many purely criminal gangs. But with no oil being pumped, there was none to steal. The lost production also meant that the oil companies and the government were losing $30 million a day in revenue. The government was unable to must sufficient military, police or political power to pacify the area. So the oil companies went and negotiated their own deals. The pitch was pretty blunt, if you want the oil flow turned back on, the tribes, rebel organizations and gangs will have to agree to allow that to happen. How much money this is costing the oil companies is not known. The oil companies believe it will take about five months to repair damage and get full production going again. What is ominous here is that the government had little to do with this deal. In the past, the oil companies have made many similar, but smaller, deals with unhappy locals. But now the oil companies are doing this sort of thing on a much larger scale. The locals prefer to work with the foreign oil companies because the company executives are not corrupt, as well as being more efficient that government officials.

April 7, 2007: There are a growing number of stories in the Nigerian media expressing doubts about the ability of Nigerians to solve their political and economic problems. The major problem is corruption, and the eagerness of even the best regarded elected leaders, to shirk their responsibilities and concentrate on stealing the wealth they have been entrusted with. A recent example of this can be seen in the provincial and national elections scheduled for April 14 and 21. Preparations are apparently poorly organized. This is believed the result of incumbent politicians trying to insure they will be reelected. There is a growing use of heavily armed gangs to coerce people to vote for the guy who sponsors the gang with stolen public money. Public utilities don't work, the most noticeable being the electricity supply, which regularly goes off for hours at a time. Crime is rampant, and many of the police are more interested in stealing, than in catching crooks. There are efforts to curb the corruption, and each successful move in that direction is big news. But overall, the crooks appear to be winning.

April 9, 2007: The Niger Delta separatist group MEND says it has two Turkish engineers who were kidnapped two days ago. MEND wants a ransom, not political demands (like freeing jailed MEND members).

April 11, 2007: Political violence leading up to state and local elections this weekend have left at least seventy dead. That number will probably double by the day after the election. The violence stems from the custom of politicians hiring local thugs to intimidate opposition voters, break up rallies and generally interfere with the other sides efforts. To remain competitive, all the major parties get themselves gangs. The national and state governments have not been able to shut down this practice. The thugs are often criminal enterprises that tend to their usual felonies (theft, extortion, prostitution, you name it) the rest of the year. The politicians use a lot of the money they steal, to pay off the gangsters. The thugs don't just intimidate voters, but will often go to polling placed on election day and forcibly cast votes for their guy.

April 13, 2007: Unidentified gunmen killed a prominent, and conservative, Islamic cleric in the northern city of Kano. Ustaz Jaafar Adam was shot while leading early morning prayers. The cleric had been a supporter of the Kano state governor, but had recently turned on the governor. The government immediately mobilized additional police and troops, as they expected Adams followers to turn violent.

April 17, 2007: In the northern city of Kano, Islamic militants attacked a police station, killing twelve policemen and the wife of one of the cops. The police blame the spread of Islamic fundamentalism on radical clerics, and their followers, coming from nearby Chad.

April 18, 2007: In the northern city of Kano, police and soldiers killed at least 25 people as they sought those responsible for yesterday’s attack on a police station. Kano is one of twelve northern states, where the Moslem majority has voted to use Islamic law (Sharia). But there are numerous Islamic groups that battle each other over exactly how Sharia should be interpreted and enforced.

April 19, 2007: The government is using the police and army to assist political gangs that are attacking opposition campaigning efforts. Last weekend local elections were often invalid because of the intervention of the more powerful government backed gangs. This weekend presidential elections appear to be headed in the same direction. If that is the case, the country will have un-elected government at the state and national level. That, plus the usual corruption, could be enough to trigger the long feared civil war. Then again, Nigerian politics has evolved into a "survival of the fittest" contest, and that would mean just another African dictatorship. This is far more common than civil war in Africa.

April 20, 2007: Two Turkish engineers, kidnapped in the Niger River Delta oil region, were released, apparently after a ransom was paid.

April 21, 2007: The election campaign left over 400 dead, and many more wounded. Gangs hired by candidates used violence to intimidate opposition voters and party workers. The local (April 14) and national (April 21) elections were to be the first peaceful transition from one elected civilian government to another in Nigerian history. The vote, however, was not "free and fair" with all the muscle being applied.

April 23, 2007: A brazenly fraudulent vote elected most of the candidates the ruling party put up. This included the new president, Umaru Yar'Adu, a Moslem from the north. Opposition parties are demanding a new vote, but are unlikely to get it unless they fight for it. And even then, the effort is likely to fail.

April 25, 2007: Violence in the Niger River Delta oil region continues to increase, with 18 major attacks on oil facilities so far this year. The oil companies and the government are laying on more security, but the local gangs are still powerful enough to launch large enough attacks to overwhelm the defenses of many oil company facilities. The gangs are looking for foreigners to kidnap, and the oil companies are now forced to pay higher and higher "danger bonuses" to attract needed technical personnel. Not all the violence is directed at the oil companies and government forces. Tribes will fight each other over jobs and other benefits handed out by the oil companies. One such conflict today left five dead and over a dozen wounded.

April 27, 2007: The government used the oil revenue, which is over two-thirds of of government income, to buy the recent elections. At the lowest levels, local operatives were offered a few dollars for each "vote" they delivered. Methods were left to the local party members, who did everything from having pre-marked ballots printed, then seizing polling places by force, to paying off individual voters to cooperate. With over $50 billion in oil revenues to play with each year, politicians can easily justify spending a billion or so on rigging elections. The stolen oil money is spread around, with about ten percent of the population getting some of it, and doing what needs to be done to keep the thieving politicians in power. The majority of Nigerians get nothing, and the better armed politicians dare anyone to do anything about it. But the current government claimed to be reformers, and blamed all the former problems on corrupt military dictators. With it now obvious that, as the generals so often claimed, that civilian politicians are no better than the military dictators, what is to be done? The ruling party believes that, as long as they keep spreading the oil money around, the senior politicians can get rich and ignore the needs of population. The election was stolen fair and square, and the thieves are going to get away with it.

April 28, 2007: Some $13 billion in oil sales are being lost each year because of the unrest in the Niger River delta.

April 30, 2007: There is general unrest over the recent elections, which were considered rigged.

May 1, 2007: MEND rebels seized six foreign (five Europeans, one American) oil workers from a ship off the Niger Delta. A sailor was killed during this operation. MEND says it will hold them until May 30th, then release them, and will not negotiate for ransom. Earlier, unidentified gunmen kidnapped the mother of the the newly elected governor of Rivers state. This is one of the three oil producing states (Niger River delta).

May 3, 2007: Kano state, in the north, has ordered non-Moslem school children to dress as devout Moslems, or face punishment. Kano is one of the northern states that has adopted Sharia (Islamic) law. This has caused some unrest, over the issue of whether non-Moslems were subject to Sharia. While only about ten percent of the people in the north are non-Moslem, there is often violence against the Moslem minority in the Christian south when Christians in the north are abused. The idea behind introducing Sharia was to reduce corruption and street crime. It hasn't.

May 4, 2007: In two raids in the Niger River Delta, 17 foreign oil workers were kidnapped. Eight were released later in the day

May 5, 2007: Armed men came aboard an offshore oil rig and kidnapped a British oil worker.

May 6, 2007: Kidnapping in the Niger River Delta has become the second largest source of income (after stealing oil) for political and criminal gangs. But the government cannot afford to lose control of the oil production, and is just sending more troops and police to the region, to try and keep the criminal activity under control. So far, the criminals are winning.

May 7, 2007: A Belorussian woman was kidnapped, and $1.2 million ransom is demanded. The woman, married to a Nigerian, works for an oil service company. Belarus doesn't even have an embassy in Nigeria, and Russia is handling the negotiations. The kidnappers may get $100,000 or more for the victim, which is a lot of money (more than a hundred times the average annual wage in Nigeria). In the last week, at least 28 foreigners were kidnapped in the Delta.

May 8, 2007: MEND, and other rebel groups in the Delta, have now shut down 850,000 barrels a day of oil production in the Delta. That's $19 billion dollars a year worth of oil sales, and 30 percent Nigeria’s total oil output. It's a big deal. While many other armed groups have been bought off by the government, MEND is out of control and determined to get control.

Eleven kidnapping victims (three South Koreans and eight Filipinos) were released, after the payment of ransoms. The amount was not announced, in an attempt to not encourage kidnappers. But word on the street is that you get at least $100,000 if you can grab a foreigner. There are lawyers, businessmen and politicians who are making big commissions by brokering these deals.

May 9, 2007: Local rebel group MEND has openly called for its followers to create mayhem in the Delta. There has been at least one attack on oil facilities a day over the past ten days. There were three explosions that cut oil pipelines. An oil company barge off the coast was attacked by speedboats full of armed men, and four Americans kidnapped. There were soldiers guarding the barge, but they were driven back by gunfire, and several of them wounded. So far this year, over a hundred foreigners have been kidnapped in the Delta. In the last eight years, over 250 foreigners have been kidnapped in the Delta.

May 10, 2007: In the northern state of Kano, Islamic militants have destroyed four movie theaters. Islamic militants accused the theater owners of supporting homosexuality and prostitution.

May 12, 2007: The government keeps sending security personnel and bribes to the Delta, but this has not stopped MEND from shutting down oil facilities. Now MEND is calling for all the oil wealth to stay in the Delta. The rest of the country would not tolerate this, and would be willing to attack the general population in the Delta to prevent this from happening. This could get very ugly.

Nigeria, with a population of 135 million, has about 250 tribes speaking over 400 different languages. In the Delta, there are 40 tribes, speaking over 200 languages and dialects. Armed militias are an ancient tribal tradition, and the tribes have aligned themselves with their own politicians and political parties. The Niger River Delta is special, though, because it contains 7.5 percent of Nigeria’s land area, fifteen percent of the population, and over 40 percent of the GDP (because that's where most of the oil is). The oil industry in the Delta is now half a century old, and the people in the Delta believe they have been screwed. Most of the money from the oil (nearly half a trillion dollars worth) has left the Delta, and what little oil money that remained, has been stolen by local politicians. The standard of living in the Delta has actually fallen since the oil was discovered. This was followed, in 1960, by the departure of the British colonial government. Nigerians in general, and the Delta peoples in particular, now realize that the problem is local. It's Nigerians that have stolen or misused the oil wealth. Organizations like MEND want to make things better, although MEND is run by the same kind of thieves and crooks that run the government. Given a choice, MEND appears as the lesser of two evils. Not much of a choice, but people are angry, and out of patience. It's an ugly situation, and not likely to turn out well. This is especially true because there are now splinter groups in MEND, largely the result of arguments over how ransom money should be split up. While attacking oil facilities gets the most attention from the government, MEND gets most of its revenue from ransoms, followed closely by selling stolen oil and various criminal scams.

May 13, 2007: MEND is not the only armed militia to come out of the 20 million people living in the Niger River Delta. But it is the most militant, determined and effective. After only a year, MEND has cut nearly a third of the country's oil production. That's a big deal, and the rest of Nigeria is paying attention.

May 14, 2007: China launched a communications satellite for Nigeria. China is a major supplier of launch services for other nations satellites, but this is the first time that China supplied the satellite as well. The NIGCOMSAT 1 satellite cost $311 million to build and launch and provides expanded cell phone and Internet services in Africa.

May 15, 2007: The continuing attacks and kidnappings have caused the oil industry to keep increasing their security. There are fewer supply boats going out to offshore rigs, but they are carrying more stuff per trip, including more armed guards. This leaves it to the kidnappers to come on in larger numbers, and with more firepower.

May 16, 2007: The newly elected vice-president, Goodluck Jonathan, is from the Delta oil region, and a large group of armed men attacked his mansion and blew it up. Jonathan, the local governor, is considered one of the corrupt politicians responsible for the sorry state of the country.

May 19, 2007: Despite increased security, kidnappers grabbed three more foreign oil workers. So far this month, 30 foreign oil workers have been kidnapped. This has been accompanied by more attacks on the police, leaving several dozen dead this month alone, mostly in the Delta region.

May 20, 2007: The newly elected government is generally considered illegitimate, because of the rigged recent elections. No one expects the corruption and weak economic growth to go away. But the corrupt leaders believe they can keep the game going, by buying the support of some, and using violence to keep everyone else in line. This works in Africa, except in places where the opposition get enough money to buy lots of guns. The Niger delta bandits, however, are piling up lots of cash from kidnapping and theft (mainly of oil). A lot of that money goes into buying guns, cars and speed boats. That might seem scary for the politicians, except that the oil producing region only contains fifteen percent of the nation's population. The rest of the country would meet violence with violence is it came to a fight over the oil. This is not speculation. There have been civil wars in Nigeria before, and the outnumbered rebels lost.

May 24, 2007: Government attempts to privatize refineries are causing unrest. The state owned refineries are run by corrupt, and incompetent, government appointed managers. They are overstaffed, often by employees who only show up to collect their pay, or protest a change of ownership. Despite all the oil produced, refined products tend to be exported, rather than supplying local needs. This creates lots of gasoline shortages for Nigerian motorists, who are fed up with it.

May 26, 2007: Oil workers in state owned organizations, got a 15 percent pay raise, after ending a two day strike.

May 27, 2007: The recent elections put a Theodore Orji , held in jail on corruption charges, into office as the governor of Abia State, in the southeast. He was illegally released on bail to be sworn in, and thus became immune from prosecution. However, this was done before the official date for assuming power, and is not considered legal. The reason for this maneuver was that the guy he was replacing was also being investigated for corruption, and wanted to flee the country quickly after he was out of office (and no longer immune from prosecution). Just about everything is for sale in Nigeria..

May 30, 2007: In the Delta oil region, two of the major criminal gangs got into a gun battle over how much they should be paid for fixing recent elections for various candidates. These payments are still a major source of income for the gangs. After several hours of shooting, at least fifteen people were dead.

June 4, 2007: The kidnapping of foreign oil workers has increased in the last month, despite police and military efforts to stop it. Nearly 150 have been taken so far this year, yielding at least $100,000 per captive in ransom. No one ever says anything, on the record, about ransoms. However, the money is simply too good, and has attracted some well run criminal organizations. The oil companies and kidnapping gangs have got it all organized, with negotiators showing up at the oil company headquarters, within hours of a kidnapping, proof-of-life in hand, along with ransom demands. Negotiations now usually take days, instead of weeks. The flow of ransom money has attracted more kidnappers, and attacks on foreigners working at non-oil industry firms. Six Russians were recently seized from a smelter, and all foreigners are getting nervous. Even the heavily guarded residential compounds will not keep the gangs out. In a recent incident, the kidnappers simply shot their way into a compound, killing two policemen, and driving the rest away. Women and children are now being taken as well. While the oil companies are trying to treat the ransoms, "danger pay" and additional security, as a cost-of-doing-business in Nigeria, it is reaching a point where is simply is not worth the extra effort. Nigeria is in danger of seeing its primary source of income (mainly for corrupt politicians), shut down by the cost of dealing with criminal activity.

June 5, 2007: Most of the rebels in the Delta are giving the newly elected president a month to give them something. Ideally, the rebels want some of their imprisoned leaders freed,troops withdrawn from the region, and lots of money. But if the past is any indication, the government will try to buy off the more powerful gangs, and crush the weaker ones.

June 8, 2007: Britain has advised its citizens to leave the Niger Delta area because of the kidnappings of foreigners, and lawlessness in general. In the last year, 31 British citizens have been kidnapped in the Delta, along with over 150 other foreigners. Currently, there are believed to be about 800 Britons living in the Delta region.

June 9, 2007: Two policemen, caught taking $168,000 in cash out of police headquarters in the capital, said they were following orders. Investigators quickly questioned a chain of officials involved in the theft, and it eventually led to Chief of Police who was forced to retire by the newly elected president. Also in trouble is a Ministry of Defense official, who was caught trying to enter India with a large amount of cash. But all this may be mainly for show. Many of the ex-governors are still powerful and influential politicians, who can call people to the streets, to cause disorder. Most major politicians also maintain armed gangs, of anywhere from a few dozen, to a few hundred, men. More can be called in, if the politician wants to spend the money. The unrest in the Niger Delta is partly the result of the a local governor getting into a dispute with his militia leader over money. The feud escalated, and the militiaman went rogue, setting themselves up as freedom fighters for the people, as well as major bandits.

June 10, 2007: The new president has encouraged anti-corruption officials to be particularly aggressive against crooked politicians who have just left office, and thus lost their immunity from prosecution. Fifteen former governors are being sought, and an effort is being made to prevent any of them from fleeing the country. But between the corruption, and large amounts of cash the corrupt ex-governors have, most of these guys will probably escape. Some may be extradited from foreign refuges, but that takes time and money. Some of them may stand and fight, using political influence, and guns.

June 11, 2007: As a good-will gesture, or perhaps part of some secret deal, Niger Delta rebel groups released twelve of their kidnap victims. There are still at least 18 foreigners being held captive, but that's because there are many purely criminal gangs now getting in on the kidnapping for money game.

June 12, 2007: Police encountered some armed men in a speedboat, outside an oil facility, and the gun battle resulted in eight dead gunmen. It's unclear if these were criminals, or rebels seeking better conditions in the region. This apparently had no impact on the current ceasefire, indicating that these guys were common criminals.

June 14, 2007: Oil companies are being forced to change the way they operate in the Niger River Delta oil region. The growing power of heavily armed criminal gangs has made it more difficult to hire foreign technicians needed to keep the operation going. About a quarter of the national oil output is now stopped because of rebel activity. The oil companies are still making money, but profits are down and senior management is demanding some solutions. One proposal is to move as many oil company people as possible, out of the Delta. Some support jobs can be done elsewhere in Nigeria, or outside the country. More automation is another option, and more security equipment. The government insists none of this will be necessary, and that a deal is in the works.

June 15, 2007: The Joint Revolutionary Council, which says it speaks for all the rebel groups in the Niger Delta, said rebel operations would be suspended because the government had released a senior rebel leader, and was now willing to talk peace. But five more foreigners were kidnapped in the Niger Delta, despite increased security measures. The ransoms are attracting more kidnappers, and many of these gangs answer to no one. Meanwhile, unions are planning a national strike, to get fuel price increases reversed, to begin on the 20th. Some truck drivers, particularly those who move fuel, have already gone on strike. Because of corrupt politicians who wanted to sell gasoline, oil rich Nigeria has little refinery capacity, and imports most gasoline, and other refined petroleum products. The government loses money on that, because the prices are too low. Recent eight cent gasoline price increases, to about $2.23 a gallon, has caused massive unrest.

June 18, 2007: Gunmen attacked and captured an oil camp in the Niger Delta, taking 27 employees captive. The oil camp operates wells that produce 40,000 barrels of oil a day.

June 21, 2007: The army attacked a rebel held oil production camp, killing twelve rebels and freeing 27 hostages.

June 22, 2007: Russia has sent some of its Special Forces commandos to Nigeria, to assist in freeing kidnapped Russian citizens.

June 23, 2007: The nationwide strike is causing oil exports to decline. There is a nationwide fuel shortage because the fuel truck drivers have been off the roads for a week. If the government rescinds the increase, the government will have to pay for it, because refined fuel has to be imported at a higher price than it is sold for. That argument doesn't fly with the unions or most Nigerians, because they know that most of the oil revenue, over the last half century, has been stolen by corrupt government officials. Cheap gasoline is one way to get some of that oil wealth, if the price is low enough.

June 24, 2007: The national strike ended after four days. There was a compromise, with the price of fuel going up only 8 percent (to about $2.15 a gallon.) The government oil price hike united the country like nothing else. But the national strike was even more unpopular, shutting down many essential services.

June 26, 2007: It's all about money now. Alhaji Mujaheed Dokubo-Asari, leader of the NDPVF (Niger Delta Peoples Volunteer Force) demanded $1.1 million before his group would surrender their weapons. That sum would compensate the rebels for what it cost them to buy they weapons. The NDPVF has not gone into the kidnapping business, but insists on more corruption prosecutions.

June 27, 2007: The NDMFS (Niger Delta Militant Force Squad) admitted it had kidnapped six Russians, and was demanding $471,000 for their release. Another group has grabbed the three year old son of a Niger Delta politician. The kidnappers invaded the nursery school the boy was attending.

June 29, 2007: The three year old son of a politician was released after a ransom of $102,000 was paid.

June 30, 2007: The mayhem in the Niger Delta is costing about $4.4 billion in damages and lost revenue each year. But the loss is just shrugged off as a cost of doing business. The corrupt leadership is nothing if not adaptable. The Nigerian people are still doing most of the suffering. The shutdown oil production means there is less money to steal. The growing number of kidnappings means more jobs for bodyguards and security personnel. The tribe based gangs in the Niger Delta are evolving into businesses, based on intimidation, theft and corruption. The inability of anyone to get really organized means there is unlikely to be a unified and effective rebellion. The system just staggers, with individuals and small groups grabbing what they can. July 1, 2007: Nearly 24 hours of fighting between gangs in the Niger Delta, left at least nine people dead. The breakdown of law and order in the Delta has made it easier for gangsters to get rich. Now the gangs are fighting over territory, and sources of income.

July 2, 2007: The Niger Delta has become a magnet for arms dealers. Smuggling is a popular activity in Nigeria, so getting weapons in is no problem. There is definitely a demand, especially for high end weapons costing a thousand dollars or more. At the low end, the price of a machete has fallen from six to three dollars, now that the election season is over.

Machetes are the favorite tool of the thugs hired by politicians to intimidate those who support their opponents. Speedboats are also a big item in the Delta, as this is the favored way of getting around for gangsters.

July 3, 2007: The 30 day ceasefire by MEND is over and navy patrols of the Delta are again being fired on. At least two sailors are dead, killed by heavily armed gang members in speedboats.

July 4, 2007: Five foreign oil workers were kidnapped for ransom after their offshore oil rig was attacked by gunmen in speedboats. Over a hundred foreigners have been grabbed so far this year, and about fifteen are still being held.

July 5, 2007: For the second time in two weeks, kidnappers have grabbed a three year old child. This time it’s the daughter of a British couple. Ransom is demanded. MEND insisted it was not involved in kidnapping children, and would assist in the search for the British child. While separatist groups like MEND may publicly abhor kidnapping children, the increasingly lawless atmosphere in the Delta region has led to many freelancers joining in a feeding frenzy of crime. It's going to get worse.

July 7, 2007: The separatist movements in the Niger Delta are not making much progress, but the copycat gangs that have emerged to join in the growing banditry and mayhem, are. Gangs of robbers roam the main highways, some of them in police uniform (and some of those may actually be police). More gangsters are demanding protection money from businesses, and that leads to gangs fighting over control of territory to "protect." The government is concerned because of the billions of dollars in lost oil revenue. About a quarter of Nigeria’s oil production is now shut down by the violence. The government cannot muster sufficient security forces to pacify the Delta, and has been unable to negotiate a deal to get the new players, the Delta gangs, to do it for them.

July 8, 2007: After four days, and a public uproar, kidnappers released a three year old British girl. The parents insisted that no ransom was paid, although money was sought. Meanwhile, two more oil installations were attacked, and two more foreigners (and two Nigerians) kidnapped.

July 9, 2007: Kidnappers were repulsed by soldiers guarding an oil installation, with one killed and two arrested.

July 11, 2007: For the fourth time in two months, kidnappers have grabbed a three year old child in the south. This time, it's the son of a local chief.

July 13, 2007: The latest three year old kidnap victim was released. A $390,000 ransom was demanded. The kidnappings are not slowing down, despite government efforts to stop it. Oil companies are hiring their own security, and offering bonuses to soldiers and police assigned to guard company facilities. If the security forces keep the kidnappers out, they get their bonus. Otherwise, the soldiers and cops will often run away if a kidnapping gang shows up.

July 16, 2007: AIDS is spreading rapidly through the armed forces. This is as a result of East African peacekeepers, infected with AIDs, serving with Nigerian troops, in Liberia. All the soldiers used the same prostitutes, and soon everyone had AIDS. Nigerian soldiers are dismayed at this aftereffect of peacekeeping duty, and blame their commanders for allowing it to happen. About four percent of Nigerian adults have AIDS, but the rate in the military is believed to be over ten percent. It's much worse, often over 50 percent, in other African armies. Only Uganda has managed to bring its military AIDS rate down below ten percent, and that involved more discipline among the troops than most African armies are capable of.

July 17, 2007: Five former governors have been jailed, and are being prosecuted for corruption. Several dozen lesser officials are also accused. The anti-corruption force is under great pressure from corrupt officials still in office (and thus immune from prosecution) to back off. So far, the prosecutions are moving forward.

July 18, 2007: The growing kidnappings in the south has become another source of corruption. Some of the kidnappers are complaining that government officials, who usually negotiate the ransoms, are taking too large a cut for themselves, leaving the kidnappers with too little. There is even competition among government and military officials to become the negotiator, because of the easy money. Thus corruption even gets to rebels fighting to free their people from corrupt rule.

July 19, 2007: In the north, an anti-Shia Sunni cleric was shot to death, and the Sunni majority responded by seeking out and attacking Shia. The violence between Sunni and Shia has been around for centuries, and has become more violent in the last decade, as al Qaeda encouraged more violence against Shia (who Sunni extremists consider to be heretics.) Police eventually arrested over a hundred people in an effort to short circuit the violence. The violence eventually left at least half a dozen dead, and dozens wounded. Islam, despite describing itself as the "religion of peace," it is actually the most violently intolerant religion around these days. Violence against other religions, and even between different sects of Islam, is common. Iraq is not an exception, it is the rule.

July 25, 2007: It's becoming more common for kidnapping attempts to fail, as more numerous, better armed and steadfast bodyguards fight back. This has led to gun battles in crowded cities, as kidnappers often like to grab their victims and get away in the chaotic traffic. The gangs in the Niger Delta oil region are becoming more numerous and bolder.

There's easy money to be made, and the major gangs no longer act with restraint. Most of these large gangs got their start as hired muscle, and were organized by politicians to intimidate opponents and help rig elections. But in the Delta, there were other sources of income, and the gangs have become independent of the politicians, and now challenge their former masters. At least some of the time. A lot of the strife is about how to share the large amount of money still being plundered from the government.

July 26, 2007: The government is prosecuting former governors for corruption, but it appears that the thieving politicians are getting off easy. They are sentenced to time served (while awaiting trial) and a return of some of the money they stole.

July 28, 2007:Ten navy officers, including an admiral, were retired, because they were suspected of involvement in oil smuggling. The navy has been trying to halt the illegal oil stealing and smuggling business. When these efforts appeared to fail, an investigation revealed evidence indicating that the oil stealing gangs had gotten to navy commanders with large amounts of cash. But this could not be conclusively proved.

July 31, 2007:In the oil rich Niger Delta, a coalition of 25 tribal rebel groups are negotiating with the government over how to conduct discussions aimed at settling differences. The biggest beef is how the oil wealth is divided. The locals want more of it.

August 1, 2007: The newly elected president is enforcing retirement guidelines and regulations in the armed forces. As a result, at least a dozen senior generals have retired, and dozens more, who have at least 35 years of service and are over age sixty, are being urged to retire. Over twenty younger generals and colonels have been transferred to new jobs. Some of the newly appointed commanders are being sent south, to try and use troops to restore order in the oil producing region.

August 2, 2007:With foreign oil workers either gone, or better protected, in the Niger Delta, the kidnapping gangs have turned to wealthy Nigerians for victims. Security firms are doing a booming business. But, as happened in other parts of the world (most recently Colombia and the Philippines) the kidnapping will rapidly increase until the population rebels, and the police are able to wipe out the kidnapping gangs. This can take several years to play out. Meanwhile, life will become a lot more uneasy in the Niger Delta. There's also increasing religious violence throughout the country. Not just between Christians and Moslems, but between other factions. There are a growing number of religious cults, which tend towards violence when challenged. In the Moslem north, militant Shia and Sunni sects are increasingly turning to violence. It's believed that Saudi Arabian religious charities are backing radical Sunni clerics, while Iran supports radical Shia preachers and communities.

August 9, 2007:Police and military forces have been unable to halt the spread of kidnapping activity in the Niger Delta oil region. With security forces and civilian body guards tied up protecting officials and foreigners, the kidnappers have switched to grabbing family members (children, parents, and so on) of prominent Delta politicians. The ransoms aren't as large, but the money is still good by Nigerian standards.

The navy is spread so thin that it cannot protect commercial traffic, particularly ferries and regular passenger runs, from pirate attacks. The criminal gangs have been doing so well that they have taken to fighting each other over territory. In the past week, at least a dozen people were shot dead in Delta cities, as gangs fought each other in the streets. The government is barely in control in the Delta, and a coalition of gangs is offering the government a deal to ease up attacks on oil production, in return for a cut of the oil profits. In theory, these diverted oil profits would go to "the people," but the gangsters would grab most of it, emulating the gangsters that have long been passing themselves off as politicians and elected representatives of "the people."

The government issued a statement in many areas of the country, urging people not to panic if they saw troops movements in the next few months. This is not a coup or some counter-terror movement, but merely the movement of troops in support of rotating peacekeepers in Liberia and Sudan (Darfur).

Pressure from the newly elected president, and the media, has forced many prominent politicians to reveal their wealth. Most are millionaires, who claim they either inherited their millions, or had a few very successful years in private business. Most Nigerians recognize the money as stolen from the government.

August 10, 2007: Two gangs have been fighting for control of territory in the Port Harcourt, the largest city in the Niger Delta oil region. It took police several days to figure out that the various gun battles were connected.

August 13, 2007: Soldiers and police regained control of Port Harcourt, driving hundreds of gang gunmen into hiding, or out of the city. A week of fighting between the two gangs caused over a hundred casualties, about a third of them dead.

August 14, 2007: Equatorial Guinea, the smallest country in Africa (in terms of population, with fewer than 600,000 citizens) will have its armed forces trained by the Nigerian army. Oil was discovered in Equatorial Guinea during the 1990s, and 350,000 barrels a day (about $25 million worth) are currently exported. But most of the money is stolen by government officials. The Nigerians will train Equatorial Guinea soldiers, who will help keep the current rulers in power.

August 16, 2007: Soldiers and police attacked the headquarters of one of the gangs that had recently terrorized Port Harcourt in a battle to control criminal activities. The raid left over a dozen gangsters dead, and even more under arrest. Many fled, however, including most of the leaders.

August 17, 2007: The kidnapping continues, despite heavy security for foreign oil workers. The kidnappers are now going after family members of government officials. There are too many of these to guard. This has also gotten the attention of the politicians, who are now more involved with trying to stem the growing criminal activity in the Niger Delta oil region. The union representing Nigerian oil workers is threatening to strike, and shut down most oil exports, if something is not done about the growing violence. Currently, about 25 percent of oil exports are blocked by gang violence. The gangs are out of control, and it's largely the fault of local politicians. It's long been customary for Nigerian politicians to hire a crew of thugs to try and disrupt the campaigning efforts of rival. The political gangs are also used to intimidate voters on election day. Over the years, some of these gangs became year round operations. The gangs branched out into other criminal activities, besides election fraud. In the Niger Delta, the gangs got into stealing oil from pipelines. This proved more lucrative than whatever local politicians paid. Now the gangs are rich enough to buy plenty of weapons, transportation and other gear. The gangs are on a roll, and no one has a solution.

August 25, 2007: The army will keep several thousand soldiers in Port Harcourt, the largest city in the Niger Delta, for at least six months. The troops are taking on the local gangs, which have become stronger than the local police. Last week, soldiers and police shattered one major gang, leaving at least 40 people dead in the process. The presence of the army has enabled the police to crack down on the oil thieves, who tap into pipelines and steal millions of barrels of oil a year. The proceeds from this arms and equips the gangs, giving them a firepower edge over the cops. The government has identified over a hundred gangs in the Delta region. Soldiers and police are also going after gang bases outside the city, in the many waterways of the delta. One such recent operation left fifteen gang members dead. The gangs will strike back, and the fighting could get pretty intense. The army and police do not have an overwhelming advantage.

In addition to the gangs there are spontaneous local acts of criminality. For example, entire villages have organized to prevent oil companies from extinguishing pipeline fires (started when villagers tapped in to steal oil), until a payment is made. Extortion has become a popular regional activity.

Part of the problem is corruption in the police. To that end, some reform have been implemented. Some are quite simple, if far reaching. Like having all police cars marked with the name of the division (locality) they belong to. This makes it more difficult for rogue police, and impersonators, to operate. This simple change is also expected to reduce kidnappings, which are often carried out by police, or with police help. Moreover, many of the gangs work for local politicians, at least during election campaigns.

September 2, 2007: The military occupation of Port Harcourt, the largest city in the Niger Delta, has reduced the amount of street crime. But out in the marshlands, the oil theft goes on. In the last year, the government has lost over $4 billion in revenues because of the interrupted oil operations, and theft of oil from punctured pipelines. The oil thieves pocketed over a hundred million dollars last year, by selling the oil to other gangs that smuggled it to nearby countries and sold it. There are several major gangs (out of hundreds of oil stealing crews) that took in millions of dollars each last year, and these are the ones the army wants to bring down. But these larger gangs have powerful backers among local businessmen and government officials. The gangs pay bribes to the bureaucrats, and do the dirty work for anyone who can afford to pay. You can't survive in the Delta without your own, heavily armed, muscle. The gangs provide these services, or demonstrate to the unprotected, why such security measures are absolutely necessary.

The corruption is also hurting the gangs and rebel groups. Everyone is for sale, and the tribal rebels are the most common victims. The government and oil companies are always offering tribal rebels special deals, in return for "cooperation." The sold out followers do not take it kindly when they find out. Leaders have to spend a lot of time reassuring their followers that there has not been a sellout. Even so, most criminal bosses are hard to buy. Power is a heady drug, and in Nigeria, the "Robin Hood" type of gangster or corrupt politician is fondly remembered. That's a form of incentive for the bad guys, to be remembered, not as a crook, but as a generous benefactor to the poor and downtrodden. However, more Nigerians are coming to realize that the crooks are stealing from the poor (by plundering oil revenue and government assets), and not the rich. Getting a little of that money back in the form of well publicized handouts is no benefit.

At the very top, Nigerians realize the current system isn't working. The government is trying to clean up the corruption and get officials (elected and appointed) to perform efficiently. To that end, civil servants are getting raises (to discourage corruption), more efforts are made to prosecute crooked politicians, and more suspicious behavior is being punished. That's apparently the reason for the string of military commanders who have been replaced in the Delta. Few have been accused of corruption, apparently because senior commanders are simply yanking brigade and battalion commanders if there's a whiff of corruption, or a sustained lack of performance. The government is also reorganizing, officially to make it more efficient, but also making it easier to detect corruption. Making government operations "auditor friendly" has some deterrent effect on officials tempted to steal. There are a lot of officials in this category, as well as many completely honest ones. But the thieves comprise a large minority, and their numbers have to be substantially reduced before all that oil money can be put to good use.

The situation in the Niger River delta region, where most of the oil is, has gotten so bad that Nigerian and foreign businesses are leaving the area, or holding off on expansion plans. The criminal gangs (including rogue soldiers and cops being bandits on the side) have been forced from the daytime streets by all the additional cops and soldiers. But the bad guys are still there, more discrete, but just as vicious and heavily armed as ever.

September 14, 2007: Unrest continues in the Moslem north, where religious fanatics are becoming more violent, and in the oil rich Niger River delta, where locals are trying to gain control of more of the oil revenue. In the north, politicians are using religion to deal with the general disgust with corrupt officials. People are urged to go after Christians and those who are not religious enough. The government corruption continues, and it's difficult to argue with the call for "more religion." This is an old scam, worldwide, and works particularly well in Moslem countries, because Islam is quite explicit about how the religious should get involved in secular government, especially if there is corruption and bad rule in general.

Meanwhile, in the south, tribe based groups continue to demand, or just take, a larger cut of the oil wealth. Most of the violence is more criminal than political, with immediate economic gain taking priority. The gangs that politicians long subsidized, for attacking opponents and intimidating voters, are increasingly independent. Recently, in the south west, one of these gangs kidnapped eleven local politicians and are holding them for $4 million in ransom. The greed of the gangs works in the governments favor. As long as the gangs are intent on getting rich, they aren't trying too hard to replace the government. But at the same time, government control grows weaker as the anarchy spreads. Government anti-corruption and reform attempts are crippled by the extent of the corruption throughout the government.

September 23, 2007: The political violence, by gangs of thugs employed by politicians as their private armies, is growing. The problem is that the gangs are often separate, from the politicians that employ them, operations. The gangs have goals that often conflict with what the politicians want.

Since democracy was restored in 1999, there have been hundreds of murders by these gangs, including over 30 politicians. The gangs are a product of the pervasive corruption. These gunmen are not full time employees of politicians, but members of local criminal organizations that receive cash, and intervention with the police and courts as needed by local politicians, in return for applying force to prevent political opponents from getting elected. Politicians use "their" gangsters for all manner of dirty work. The widespread corruption makes it very difficult to dismantle this system. Meanwhile, the use of thugs can sometimes backfire. For example, the newly elected governor of Oyo state refused to implement a pay raise, approved by his predecessor, for the 34,000 state employees. So the state employees have been out on strike for a month, and the governor has fired them, but has not started hiring replacements. The new governor was elected in a tainted election, and is believed stealing so much money from the government that, as he says, there is not enough to pay the raises. The governor is tempted to try using his private army to break the strike, but the state employees have their own gunmen. The pay raise itself was a bit of political theater. The head ofthe state employees union is himself a politician, and the pay raise (50-100 percent for most employees, and up to 300 percent of the top ones) itself was meant to torment the national ruling party that has been fixing elections with growing frequency. Opposition politicians have managed to convince those 34,000 state employees to stay off the job for a month now, and the situation could get very violent before it gets resolved. These jobs are a big deal, because the economy is such a mess, and there is much underemployment, even though the official unemployment rate is about six percent. The lowest paying government jobs (before the raise) pay about $800 a month, while the top jobs are over $15,000 a month.

Meanwhile, Jomo Gbomo, the head of the Niger Delta tribal separatist group MEND, was arrested in Angola earlier this month. Gbomo was traveling on a false passport and attempting to negotiate a large purchase of weapons. Gbomo had entered Angola from South Africa, were he had met with other Nigerian gang leaders and at least one convicted (for corruption) Nigerian politician. They were discussing gang business, apparently trying to settle a dispute over payment for an earlier shipment of smuggled arms. MEND, and the other Niger Delta gangs, are well armed, largely because of the millions of dollars the gangs make each year from stealing oil from pipelines. The government is trying to extradite Gbomo back for trial, but that may not be possible. Gbomo has access to lots of cash for bribes, and officials in Angola and South Africa are vulnerable to that.

October 2, 2007:The military, noting how important oil theft profits are to the Niger Delta rebels, has stepped up efforts to cut off that source of cash. Now that the navy has taken care of its corruption problem, most of the oil smuggling ships are captured or in hiding. Oil theft is still a big business, but now the stolen oil has to be trucked out, cutting deeply into profits. The army is also seizing trucks suspected of moving stolen oil. The police are also exploiting widespread fear of the oil theft gangs. This is the result of many illegal pipeline taps catching fire, killing nearby civilians and sometimes burning down villages. The villagers are willing to provide police with information about the oil theft gangs, and that has led to more oil gangsters getting arrested, and their bases raided. The increased police activity also led to the arrest of two German and one American aid workers, who were assisting one of the criminal gangs (MEND) in their political activities. At the same time, MEND is issuing a stream of press releases that deny responsibility for various crimes in the area, especially kidnappings of foreigners.

The growth of the separatist groups in the Niger Delta has been accompanied by a growing number of criminal gangs. Many of these specialize in things like kidnapping or bank robbery. The police have responded with special police units to go after the specialized gangsters. Some of the gangs are apparently composed of recent deserters from the army, who saw all the money being made with kidnapping and oil theft, and decided to join in. These troops skipped off with their uniforms, weapons, and, in some cases, vehicles.

The gangs are not going to give up their wealth, power, and guns, so easily. But at the moment, the gangs are on the defensive.

October 3, 2007: In the north, anti-Christian violence continues. The most recent outbreak came about when paranoid Moslem high school students accused Christian students of planning an attack on a mosque. This led to attacks on the Christian minority in the northern Kano state (which is mostly Moslem), the death of nine Christians, the wounding of 61 others. Some 500 Christians were forced to flee their homes, and nine churches were burned down. Islamic radical preachers in the north are constantly preaching against the Christian "war on Islam," even though nearly all the religious violence in the world is Moslems attacking non-Moslems.

October 6, 2007: A British kidnap victim was freed by police, after a member of the gang was arrested and provided information on where the gang hideouts were. In the meantime, kidnappers are turning more to relatives of corrupt politicians, as these are easier targets, and likely to result in a substantial ransom payment.

The oil money has become a curse for Nigeria, as has been the case in most poor countries similarly "blessed." Politicians that get into office, particularly at the state level (there are 36 states, containing 140 million people), tend to begin stealing on a large scale. State boundaries tend to incorporate a minimal number of tribes, and the citizens are easy to manipulate if you buy off some people, and terrorize the rest. Moreover, state governors are immune from prosecution while in office. So the governors hire local thugs to do their dirty work, and order the corrupt cops to leave the governors thugs alone. The federal government, which is nearly as corrupt, as begun to go after corrupt governors, especially the more notorious ones, after they have left office. Western countries have cooperated by not allowing former governors from fleeing Nigeria, to a comfortable (thanks to all the stolen public money) exile. Increasingly, Nigerians are becoming violent over the bad government. But the corrupt officials, knowing that vast wealth is theirs if they can only deal with the unruly populace, have been coming up with new tricks to do just that. It's an incentive system from hell.

October 11, 2007: The military has restored peace to much of the Niger River area, at least as far as oil facilities are concerned. As a result, oil companies are returning to abandoned oil operations and putting the equipment back in working order. This is expected to increase oil production by 23 percent over the next twelve months. That's about half a million more barrels a day. At $80 a barrel, that's a lot more money for government officials to steal.

October 15, 2007:A defense treaty was signed with India. There was not much to this deal, it was mostly for show, and to give Indian arms manufacturers an edge when trying to sell to Nigeria. The treaty also encourages more Nigerian officers to be sent to India for training, and more cooperation in preparing for peacekeeping operations.

October 17, 2007: Kidnappers in the Niger Delta have been put off by the increased security for foreigners, and switched to taking parents and children of wealthy politicians. Many politicians are corrupt, and rich, so the kidnappers have hundreds of wealthy men to target. The security forces, however, are stretched thin, and this has allowed criminal gangs to run wild. Common crimes, like robbery, piracy and burglary, are rising. The pirates are particularly embarrassing, but the navy was under tremendous pressure to crack down on oil theft and smuggling (aboard small coastal tankers that moved the stuff to adjacent nations for sale to brokers).

October 19, 2007:The increased revenue (from oil theft and kidnapping) of gangs in the Niger River Delta oil region, has led to a lot more weapons, particularly cheap AK-47s, being available in the area. This has led to an increase in tribal violence. All that firepower gives the weaker, but now better armed, side in many of these ancient feuds, the attitude that they can just blow away their opponents if they act decisively. The body count is increasing, and there are not enough police to keep all this violence in check.

October 27, 2007: Some serious moves are being made against corrupt politicians. In the last week, judges have annulled the recent elections of two state governors, in addition to two more removed earlier. State politics is the most corrupt, with politicians forming their own armies and fixing the elections any way they can. All this is pretty blatant, and the federal government is finally cracking down on it. That has caused some problems at the national level. The national legislature is paralyzed by corruption charges against senior members. The problem is that the corruption is so pervasive that nearly everyone is tainted to some degree. Thus the policy is to go after the worst offenders, and try real hard to ignore the lesser thieves.

Corruption also causes major problems at the grass roots. For example, a group of soldiers in the Niger Delta, recently went to a fuel depot and demanded fuel for their vehicles. The attendants told them to see the manager, because there was paperwork associated with providing the military with "free" fuel. The soldiers were incensed, and began beating the attendants. Fuel truck drivers came to the aid of the attendants and the soldiers started shooting. Nine fuel trucks were destroyed by fire, and several civilians shot. In retaliation, fuel truck drivers throughout the region then went on strike, causing a fuel shortage atthe gas stations. The fuel truck drivers are demanding restitution and punishment of the soldiers.

In the Niger Delta oil region, the local separatist groups are back to kidnapping. Family members, and even pets, of corrupt, but wealthy, politicians are a favorite target. But attacks on oil facilities have increased as well. The U.S. embassy warned Americans that oil facilities were going to be attack by MEND, the largest tribal separatist group in the delta. And this is exactly what happened, with boats full of armed men overpowering security at two offshore oil rigs, and taking away foreigners. Oddly enough, seven who were taken on the 21st, were freed onthe 23rd. It's unclear why the men were freed so quickly. The army and navy have been quick to go after kidnappers, and they may have caught some of this particular crew, and quickly cut a deal.

In the Moslem north, famine and religious violence is added to the political corruption. Drought has destroyed much of the current crop, requiring food to be imported. Corrupt politicians usually grab much of the aid in situations like this, and everyone is watching to see what will happen. Islamic militants are attacking, and even killing, Christians in the north. It's not widespread, but it is happening, and happening more frequently.

October 30, 2007: After a month of debate and and arm-twisting, the speaker of the House of Representatives, and her deputy, resigned. They were charged with corruption (stealing several million dollars in a scam involving inflated contracts.) Such scams are all too common with Nigerian politicians, and it was considered quite bold to go after the speaker of the House. Meanwhile, police arrested five people who were plotting the murder of a senior officer of the anti-corruption police.

October 31, 2007: A navy patrol boat rebuffed a rebel attempt to attack fishing boats. One sailor and seven rebels were killed, and many more were wounded. Several speedboats full of rebels were involved.

November 5, 2007:Tribal rebel group MEND has threatened to destroy some of the Niger River Delta oil fields if the government does not meet rebel demands for greater political power. MEND has made threats before, and proved unable, or unwilling, to follow through. MEND does, however, have some degree of control over several hundred gunmen in the oil producing region.

November 6, 2007:After four years of effort, the EFCC(Economic and Financial Crimes Commission) has been increasingly successful at bringing senior government officials to justice. Many such officials have fled the country, and those imprisoned are expected to use their stolen money to try and buy their way out of jail. Meanwhile, the legislature has not done anything but argue over corruption since it began work last June. The elections that created this legislature were considered suspect, with the ruling party cheating in order to stay in power. However, corrupt politicians generally act alone, so they are easier to take down. But if the corrupt officials get organized, there could be more violence.

November 12, 2007: Police in the largely Moslem north, arrested at least ten members of the "Nigerian Taliban" and accused them of consorting with al Qaeda and planning terrorist operations. The "Nigerian Taliban" have no connection with Afghanistan, but for the last five years have been trying to impose a strict Islamic lifestyle on Nigerian Moslems. This has been unsuccessful, but the group has also made several attacks on the police, and the police have retaliated. Dozens have been killed or wounded in these actions. Now the police believe the group was planning a bombing campaign against the government.

November 13, 2007: In the Bakassi region of neighboring Cameroon, 21 police were killed when their boat was attacked by men wearing Nigerian army uniforms. Ten of the attackers were killed, and one of their boats sunk. Nigeria said the attackers were probably tribal separatists from the nearby Niger River Delta. UN mediation awarded the disputed, and oil rich, area to Cameroon, but Nigeria resisted complying for several years. Most residents of Bakassi consider themselves Nigerian, but do not want to move. The Bakassi decision was part of a UN mediation that covered several other disputed bits along over a thousand kilometers of the border with Cameroon. Nigeria got some small areas as well. Bakassi, however, contains a lot of oil.

November 14, 2007: Additional army and police units in the Niger River Delta area have reduced the violence between gangs, but not eliminated it. A fifth of the nation's oil shipments are still blocked by violence in the region. The major problems are caused by the gangs that work for politicians (especially during election time). In the Delta, these gangs are rewarded with security contracts by oil companies. These political gangs sometimes fight each other for turf, insults or possession of a security contract. The "enemy" is the oil stealing gangs, who also fight each other over control of territory (which oil pipelines, that can be tapped, pass through).

November 15, 2007: Another pipe line was blown up in the Niger River Delta. Up to 50,000 barrels a day in exports are halted until repairs can be made. The MEND rebels took credit for the attack. Such attacks have cut production by nearly half a million barrels a day.

November 16, 2007: The navy has seized 260 ships and barges in its campaign to shut down oil theft and smuggling. This criminal enterprise still goes on, although at reduced levels. The navy did not mention how many sailors have been bribed by oil thieves, to let the oil racket continue.

November 17, 2007: No one has taken responsibility for the November attack on the Cameroon border, that left 21 Cameroonian police dead. Locals insist the attackers were Nigerian soldiers. Nigeria denies involvement, but Nigeria does not have control over all those who wear Nigerian army uniforms.

November 18, 2007: In the Moslem north, fighting broke out in Kano, as gangs representing opposing political parties fought over accusations of vote rigging in recent local elections. At least six died before police, and a battalion of 500 soldiers, arrived and dispersed the crowds. This sort of violence is common throughout the country.

November 22, 2007: Five suspected al Qaeda terrorists arrested last month, were charged with belonging to terrorist organizations. Three of the five Nigerian Moslems were accused of receiving terrorist training in Algerian camps. The five are accused of being sent to attack Nigerian oil production.

November 23, 2007: The former (1999- May 2007) governor of River State (the Niger River Delta), James Ibori, is under investigation in Britain, where bank auditors have found he had opened bank accounts containing nearly $40 million. Nigerian governors are paid about $25,000 a year. In Nigeria, corruption investigators have established a paper trail between money intended for education and health care in River State, being transferred to James Ibori, and thence to banks in Britain. This sort of blatant theft has become less possible as corruption investigators have become more active, and more resistant to bribes and intimidation.

In the Niger River Delta, about fifty separatist rebels, in seven speed boats, attacked a large oil shipping facility. One civilian bystander was killed, and the rebels managed to steal a police patrol boat and a two machine-guns before being driven off.

December 1, 2007: While the growing rebellion in the Niger River Delta oil region gets most of the headlines, the violence is increasing everywhere. Crime, especially armed robbery, is growing. In the last three months, police confronted thousands of armed robbery gangs. While most of these suspects fled, 785 of them were killed (along with 62 police)in gun battles, while 1,857 were arrested. But the police are so inept and corrupt, that more armed robbery gangs appear, and look for unguarded, and lucrative, places to rob. This has led to a sharp increase in the use of private security. The robbers will go elsewhere if they see armed guards. This has worked for oil operations in the delta. Every week there are reports of a few attempts to raid an oil facility (for loot and hostages to ransom.) The raiders get shot at, maybe lose a few people, and are forced to flee.

December 3, 2007: Discipline has been increased in the army, especially for officers. The latest round of promotions were touted as fair and honest, and not just favoring friends, or someone offering a bribe. Without naming names, the army announced it was holding officers responsible for the loss of weapons in some areas. It's been widely known, for years, that officers at some bases were willing to "lose weapons" and sell them out the back gate. The government ignored this until recently. But too many bandits and rebels were being caught with weapons that could be traced back to the military, and voters were losing confidence in the military, and politicians who looked the other way. It remains to be seen if the current enthusiasm for cleaning up the mess, makes a difference.

December 5, 2007: While the violence in the oil producing areas has shut down daily production of 900,000 barrels (worth about $30 billion a year), Nigeria has still been able to use excess capacity to continue shipping its agreed OPEC production of 2.1 million barrels a day.

December 6, 2007: The government has signed a peace deal with twelve smaller resistance groups in the Niger Delta. The largest separatist group, MEND, was not part of this deal. The problem is a lack of trust. For over four decades, the oil money has been going to about twenty percent of the population, leaving most of the rest worse off today than they were half a century ago, before the oil was discovered. The people in the Niger

Delta are up in arms because most of them have not benefited from the oil production, but have suffered from the oil spills and other disruptions that accompany oil drilling and shipping. Groups like MEND are no longer willing to take the word of government officials that the Niger Delta will get more money, but want direct control over a share of the local oil. Even then, the lack of civil society (fair and corruption-free government administration) is still something only a minority of Nigerians buy into. Most people still believe in grabbing all you can when the opportunity presents itself.

December 8, 2007: The Niger River Delta has become heavily armed. The country, as a whole, is believed to contain over seven million illegal weapons, and a disproportionate number of them are in the delta. Anything connected with the oil business (facilities, boats, trucks) is accompanied by armed men. This has reduced the violence, but not eliminated it. The gangs just do the math and hit targets with enough manpower to, hopefully, overwhelm the security. But the sailors, soldiers and police are less likely to flee when attacked, and the bandits don't fight to the last man when their attacks initially fail. Usually the criminals accept defeat, and run away if they meet resistance.

While tribal and political violence kill about 2 per 100,000 people a year, crime kills more than ten times that. Still, the death rate is less than in South Africa (50 per 100,000), which is about what it is in Iraq right now. Islamic terrorism never took off in Nigeria, while in southern Thailand it kills 80 per 100,000 people a year. The most dismal aspect of life in Nigeria is the corruption, and high crime rates. The failure of government doesn't kill as much as it demoralizes. Even the attempt in the Moslem north, to use strict application of Islamic law to clean things up, failed. Popular opinion turned against this attempt to impose virtue, and laws were passed limiting the power of religious (Sharia) law and its enforcers.

The government continues to have a hard time getting police and military to put criminals out of business, and not compete with the crooks. Additional Navy investigators are constantly being sent to the delta to look for officers and sailors who are stealing from the oil thieves and kidnappers, rather than arresting the criminals. Army troops have similar problems with gangs that are ready to offer bribes to be left alone. It's easy money and hard to resist.

In the Niger River Delta, theft of oil (tapping into pipelines moving crude to the coast) has enriched dozens of gangs, and led to an arms race. The gangs buy assault rifles and pistols for their members, the better to protect their territory (and access to an oil pipeline). In the last few years, 50-100,000 additional firearms have come into the region. These have had an unpleasant side effect, as the newly armed gangster often uses his weapon to take whatever he wants. Theft, robbery and burglary have increased. The culprits are usually young guys with guns. The police are reluctant to go after these criminals, unless with lots of manpower. The gangsters have plenty of ammo, and will usually put up quite a fight if cornered. The increased number of gun battles produces many civilian casualties, as the fights frequently occur in crowded neighborhoods. The police are often not much better behaved, conducting "raids" or "investigations" that are little more than excuses to steal. In an effort to cut back on this, the government is more than doubling the monthly salary of police. For the lowest paid cop, this means a boost from $84 a month to $220. At the same time, more police will be prosecuted for corrupt acts, including holding commanders responsible to blatant bad behavior by their subordinates.

December 15, 2007: In north-central Nigeria, the city of Bauchi suffered several days of religious violence. Christians and Moslems fought over whether a new mosque could be built in a mixed neighborhood. About a dozen people have died, several dozen more were wounded, and over 3,000 fled their homes to avoid the violence. Dozens of homes and businesses were burned down. The problem is usually Islamic radicals among local Moslems, usually led by a cleric influenced by Saudi Wahhabi missionaries. While Islam has always been more militant than Christianity, this has gotten worse because of the Saudi religious organizations that encourage more militancy and violence against non-Moslems. In Nigeria, this is often made worse because Christians and Moslems are often from different tribes, which sometimes have long standing disputes over land or whatever.

In the Niger River Delta, theft of oil (tapping into pipelines moving crude to the coast) has enriched dozens of gangs, and led to an arms race. The gangs buy assault rifles and pistols for their members, the better to protect their territory (and access to an oil pipeline). In the last few years, 50-100,000 additional firearms have come into the region. These have had an unpleasant side effect, as the newly armed gangster often uses his weapon to take whatever he wants. Theft, robbery and burglary have increased. The culprits are usually young guys with guns. The police are reluctant to go after these criminals, unless with lots of manpower. The gangsters have plenty of ammo, and will usually put up quite a fight if cornered. The increased number of gun battles produces many civilian casualties, as the fights frequently occur in crowded neighborhoods. The police are often not much better behaved, conducting "raids" or "investigations" that are little more than excuses to steal. In an effort to cut back on this, the government is more than doubling the monthly salary of police. For the lowest paid cop, this means a boost from $84 a month to $220. At the same time, more police will be prosecuted for corrupt acts, including holding commanders responsible to blatant bad behavior by their subordinates.

December 17, 2007: The anti-corruption campaign is making progress. Another former state governor, this one from the oil producing region, was arrested. While governors cannot be arrested while in office, once they are out, they are vulnerable. The anti-corruption commission is monitoring the performance of current governors, with plans to arrest those engaging in corrupt practices. This has forced many governors to be more discreet, and try to hide some of their stealing. That has at least reduced the extent of the corruption.

December 29, 2007: The behind-the-scenes effort to foil the anti-corruption effort has succeeded. The chief investigator, Nuhu Ribadu, has been ordered away to a yearlong "training course" that senior police commanders like himself are assigned to periodically. But to most Nigerians, this assignment is an indication that the corrupt politicians have gotten through to the new president, and gotten this very effective corruption investigator off their backs. At the same time, the national police agreed to re-hire 3,109 policemen fired for corruption.

Because of corruption investigator Nuhu Ribadu, governors from seven of the 36 states have been indicted for corruption. One of those, from the wealthiest state (where all the oil is) offered police a $15 million bribe to back off. But there was too much attention being paid to this case, and the cops knew they could not get away with it. However, the accused governors from the Niger Delta have another ally in the ethnic rebels that are interfering with oil production, and demanding more autonomy and oil money for "the people." It's not as simple as that. Many of these armed gangs have long been hired by politicians to help manipulate elections. A lot of the organized crime in the country has evolved from these politically connected thugs. Now the gangsters are returning the favor, and demanding the release, from prison, of a former oil region governor. If their former employer is not released, the rebels threaten even more damage to the oil production facilities. Currently, about two million barrels of oil a day are being shipped. Rebels have managed to keep another half million barrels a day off the market, because of attacks on pipelines and pumping stations.

The army, navy and police have developed defenses for the oil infrastructure, and have made it much more difficult for the rebels to take out key sites, or kidnap foreigners. The government had to do this, or the foreigners that run the oil operations threatened to pull out, and let oil shipments collapse to practically nothing.

The main problem for Nigeria, and the major contributor to instability, is the corruption. Most of the oil wealth has been stolen by politicians and gangsters. The population is left with very little, and the people are growing more and more angry. That has led to more cases of civil disorder and outright insurrection. A minority of elected officials, and a majority of the voters, favor a vigorous anti-corruption campaign. But at the moment, it appears the good guys are losing.

January 8, 2008: The highly effective Economic and Financial Crimes Commission (EFCC), which was putting many senior politicians in jail, or at least in court, is being dismantled. The corrupt politicians had more power than those being pressured by the public to really do something about corruption. The government is describing the destruction ofthe EFCC as a "reorganization." Meanwhile, in the Niger Delta oil region, the military is going after the many private armies that exist there. Most are aligned with politicians, and the army is taking down those groups that are least popular, or most unruly, at the moment. Raids are particularly keen on seizing stores ofweapons and ammo. With these, a warlord can quickly expand his force by arming many temps.

Some of the political gangs in theDelta region have not responded well to recent police attacks. On New Year's Day, there were a series of deadly attacks in Port Harcourt, the largest cityin the Delta. At least 18 were killed. Two of the targets were police stations. Several groups of gunmen entered the city at the same time, shot up their targets, and sped away.

The separatist groups like MEND have threatened to shut down the entire oil operation this year, if the government does not grant the tribes in the Delta a larger share of the oil wealth. Thepoliticians don't want to do this, but they don't want to admit that either. However, it all comes down to the money, and people will kill for a share ofthat oil revenue.

January 20, 2008: The main rebel group in the Niger Delta, MEND, has offered a ceasefire, if their leader, Henry Okah, was released from prison. Okah was arrested last year in Angola, where he had gone to buy weapons for MEND. Okah was arrested on gunrunning charges and is still imprisoned in Angola. MEND is the most visible rebel group, but not theonly one. There are over a dozen groups, most of them based on one (of many) clans of the Ijaw tribe (which predominates in the oil producing areas.) These "rebels" engage in many criminal activities (stealing oil from pipeline being the most lucrative one), and attack oil facilities. Recently, this included a fire on an oil tanker (which appears to be an accident that MEND simply took credit for, claiming having agents on the ship) and an attack on a supply boat going to an offshore oil platform. All this is having an impact. Over the last two years,these attacks halted 20 percent of daily oil shipments (about half a million barrels per day). So far this year, another 100,000 barrels a day has been halted, and an increasing number of foreign suppliers have either raised their prices, or refused to do business in Nigeria until the violence is reduced. For example, Nigeria was second only to Somalia in pirate attacks last year.

But MEND threatens to use new weapons.There has been one crude roadside bomb attack this year (which wounded two and damaged a vehicle). The local state government is not intimidated, and has refused to comply with any rebel demands, and will only agree to a ceasefire ifthe rebels disarm. The rebels would only do this if the government paid them enough money. In effect, the government would buy the rebels weapons, and would have to pay much more than market value. The government believes that many ofthe rebels would go right back to lawless behavior. The ceasefire deal is basically MEND demanding a bribe to quiet down for a while.

Meanwhile, a tribal war has broken out on the Cameroon border, with tribes on either side of the frontier battling over land ownership. The fighting is taking place in a very remote area (no roads, for example), and information is spotty.

February 4, 2008: It's more common to hear gunfire in the Niger Delta, especially near oil production installations.The gangs are bolder and better armed, and are increasingly taking on thetroops and security guards protecting the oil facilities. Shell Oil, thecompany that has run the production and shipment of oil in the delta for half a century, is pessimistic about restoring half a million barrels in lost production. Shell is running out of ideas. They tried using the stick (more security), then they tried using the carrot (hiring the gangs to guard facilities and do some maintenance work). But there are too many criminal gangs to pay off. Moreover, gang rivalries often result in continued attacks even if one gang is given a security contract. The theft of oil (by just tapping into pipelines) is too big a business, especially with the sharp rise in the price of oil in the last five years. The gangs get more for their stolen oil (which is smuggled to neighboring countries and sold to oil brokers who get the stuff into the global market). That enables the gangs to buy more guns, speedboats and barges (to haul oil) and hire more unemployed guys who are eager to steal more oil. The army and navy are barely holding their own in trying to protect oil facilities in the delta. On top of all this, some of the gangs have a political agenda as well, and want political power, so they can steal oil money with a wire transfer, rather than by punching holes in pipelines. Government attempts to negotiate with the gangs are hampered by the fact that no one gangs speaks for all of them, and the main goal of the gangs is making money, not politics.

An eighth governor has been arrested and charged with corruption in office. Currently, nearly all of the 36 state governors face prosecution for corruption when they are out of office (and losetheir immunity from prosecution). Most of the corrupt politicians belong to thePDP, which backed the election of the current president, Umaru Yar'Adua. Ominously, the Yar'Adua has removed the chief anti-corruption investigator from office. The Ministry of Justice has interfered with corruption investigations and Yar'Adua is under tremendous pressure from political allies to provide protection from prosecution for corruption. The corruption is so widespread in Nigeria, that any effort to curb it is going to arouse a lot of opposition from a lot of powerful, and wealthy, people.

The newly elected president won on his pledge to go after corruption. The president has asked that the law be changed so that state governors are no longer immune from prosecution while in office. This has allowed governors to loot freely, then flee the country, if need be, shortly before their term expires. The president is caught between his campaign promises and the demands of his close political allies. It's unclear which way this is going to go. In most cases, it's not a good idea to bet against corruption.

Nigeria is another example of how natural resource wealth can be a curse. The billions in oil wealth require little from the locals. Most of the technology, and many of the technicians, are imported. The politicians of nations without much of a democratic tradition (that is, civil society and accountability of officials), quickly realize thatthey can steal most of that wealth. As long as they share it out with their tribe, and members of the police and armed forces, they will never be held accountable. This scenario has played itself out in dozens of countries. Indeed, it's rare that oil wealth benefits the country it comes from. This generally happens only in developed nations. Norway being a recent example. Norway discovered oil a decade after Nigeria, and pumped about as much, but did much more for Norwegians with the resulting revenue, than did Nigeria. There was very little corruption in Norway, and that made the difference.

For a long time, countries like Nigeria officially denied that corruption was a problem. But after half a century of vast oil income, and no social progress, it's pretty much impossible to deny theconnection. Now the problem is doing something about it.

February 7, 2008: The rebel groups in the Niger Delta have split. Many of the Ijaw (the majority group) tribal leaders want to negotiate. But several factions of MEND (a coalition of local criminal gangs seeking political and economic benefits) want to continue attacks on oil facilities.

February 10, 2008: In the north, Islamic radicals have instigated mobs to attack Christians (who are accused of mocking the prophet Mohammed, or trying to marry Moslems, or just being there). Several churches were destroyed and dozens of Christians killed or injured. Over a thousand Christians have fled their homes. The Moslems always insist they are defending Islam from attack, but it's almost always the Moslems who are doing the attacking.

February 22, 2008: The government has extradited a MEND leader, Henry Okah, who had been arrested, five months ago, for trying to illegally buy weapons in Angola. The government was not eager to take custody of Okah, because his followers like to kidnap people, often kin of politicians, and demand that MEND prisoners be released. But MEND is not winning its war in the Niger Delta. The violence is there, with dozens of casualties a week, but the government has managed to secure the oil facilities. And the growth in oil gang violence has spilled over into everyday life, making the "rebels" unpopular with most residents of the delta. That doesn't make the corrupt government officials any more popular, however. It's still a mess.

March 9,2008: Last April's elections were marked by violence (by armed gangs supporting candidates) and fraud. The anti-corruption movement had the support of the courts, and dozens of those elections have been challenged, many successfully. The political gangs have backed off, not willing to test the resolve of the police and army. Seven of 36 state governor elections have been overturned because of vote rigging.

Up north, Islamic radicals are on the defensive, as polio cases declined 75 percent in the past year, the result of the vaccination campaign. Islamic radicals had, over thepast few years, gotten many conservative clergy to preach against allowing children to get polio vaccinations. This interrupted a world wide effort to wipe out polio. Like smallpox (which was wiped out in a similar campaign three decades ago) the polio virus can only survive in human hosts. If enough vulnerable people (mostly kids) are vaccinated against polio, then polio has nowhere to survive, and joins smallpox as an extinct disease. The Islamic campaign against vaccinations (which were accused of being a secret plan to sterilize female children) caused a resurgence of polio cases worldwide, and a major loss of credibility for the Islamic radicals. The vaccinations resumed last year, after vigorous efforts by Nigerian politicians, and the sharp drop in polio cases, is yet another setback for the Islamic conservatives who thrive on anti-Western paranoia.

The IMF (International Monetary Fund) has come out and stated what most Nigerians already know, that Nigeria has wasted the first three decades worth of oil income. Corruption and ineffective spending decisions, up through the late 1990s, left the country with little or no infrastructure (roads, water works, power plants), and halfthe population still living in poverty. While the corruption has declined, poor spending habits persist. Using government "do-nothing" jobs as patronage (which is actually a form of corruption), is considered a useful make-work program, and is difficult to go after.

Attempts to negotiate a peace deal with militants in the Niger Delta have failed because the various tribal militants cannot agree on who represents who. Because the delta militants are based on criminal gangs (whose main source of income is stealing oil, robbery and kidnapping),their priority, if they wish to maintain their fighting strength, is making money. Fighting for "the people" is all well and good, but if you don't meet the payroll, you have no one to do the fighting. The war in the delta goes on quietly, with the government building up security that the gangs are having a harder time breaching. The gangs are getting more violent, as it becomes more difficult to make a dishonest dollar. Kidnappings, for example, are way down. While 150 foreigners (mainly oil technicians) were kidnapped last year. So far this year, only one has been taken (and quickly released.)

Royal Dutch Shell, a major oil producer in the delta, has recovered from attacks on its production and pipeline facilities, which had shut down a lot of oil shipments over the last month. While you still hear gunfire and explosions around oil facilities, these now tend to be failed attacks, or the sound of army and police raids on the gangs.

March 11, 2008: A volunteer UN human rights investigator reported that Nigerian police treat prisoners very roughly. Most Nigerians agree with this, and wish the cops used the violence on more criminals, and didn't take as many bribes. Nigerians would also like the police to refrain from the traditional "eye for an eye" attitude when police are killed during tribal disputes. The police have a tendency to come back and kill a lot of the civilians involved, to encourage people to refrain from killing cops.

March 12, 2008: Police seized a base, in the Niger Delta, used by Ateke Tom, the head of an Ijaw vigilante group. The base featured a large stockpile of arms and ammo, as well as an illegal pipeline, plugged into a legitimate one. This made it easier to steal oil.

March 21, 2008: Growing population in northern Nigeria has led to more violence between tribes that farm and those that tend herds. Both are competing for the same land, and everyone has weapons. The violence is now constant, with a dozen or more casualties a month.

March 23, 2008: A fire at a naval base in the Niger Delta, which destroying two gunboats. Separatists gang MEND claimed they had launched an attack on the base, which the navy denied.

The navy shot four pirates, as they caught them trying to move a boat that had recently hijacked.

March 24, 2008: Anti-corruption efforts have led to revelations that there were many questionable government actions when former president Olusegun Obasanjo was in power. Obasanjo was elected on an anti-corruption platform, and actually did much to catch crooked politicians.

March 25, 2008:In a surprising move, the president fired two ministers for corrupt practices. It was believed that the new president would go easy on corruption in order to please political allies.

March 26, 2008: Piracy off the Niger River Delta is way up this year, partly as a result of increased army and police activity on land. There are now 5-10 ships attacked a week. In most cases, all portable valuables are taken, but in some instances, crews will be beaten or shot for no reason. Sometimes, smaller ships are taken into the swamps and held for ransom. This is dangerous, as the armed forces can often find the ship from the air.

March 29, 2008: Anti-corruption investigators are accusing the daughter of former president Olusegun Obasanjo were involved in stealing at least four million dollars from the Health Ministry. Obasanjo was elected on an anti-corruption platform.

March 31, 2008: Nearly 200 children have died in the north, from measles. This is another aftereffect of an earlier campaign by Islamic conservative clerics up there, to get parents to refuse vaccinations for their children. The clerics believed theanti-polio vaccinations were actually a Western plot to poison Muslim children (and make the girls sterile, or something like that). The government eventually got the clerics to back off on the polio vaccinations, but there was continued reluctance to get vaccinations in general.

April 7, 2008: Several days of tribal strife in the southwest have left seven dead and dozens wounded. The fighting was largely about which faction would get their guy into a tribal leadership job.

April 11, 2008: The violence in the Niger Delta oil region continues to grow. More people with grievances have more guns and less patience. The gangs are targeting their kidnapping victims more carefully, going after businessmen and governmentofficials that appear to have money (and can afford a high ransom). Armed robberies are more ambitious, elaborate and deadly. Fortunately for thegovernment, the many tribe based gangs are not organizing a coalition capable of actually taking control of the region. But the rising crime rate is pretty bad, and increasing military and police activity is doing more for the body count than it does for law and order.

April 12, 2008: Tribal activists were persuaded to leave a pipeline control facility, restoring 5,000 barrels a day of production.

April 15, 2008: Chinese and Indian oil companies have agreed to build two refineries, so that refined product can be exported, rather than bulkier crude oil. Nigeria only has four refineries, which are unable to produce enough gasoline and other products for the domestic market. This was done on purpose by Nigerian military dictators, in order to provide opportunities to steal more money via refined imports.

April 18, 2008: MEND (Movement for the Emancipation of Niger Delta, a coalition of local criminal gangs seeking political and economic benefits) took responsibility for blowing up a section of a pipeline two days ago. More attacks are promised if their leader, Henry Okah, is not released.

April 21, 2008: Up north, Islamic radicals are on the defensive because of an increase in polio cases. While polio declined in some areas, overall it has nearly doubled nationwide compared to last year. The vaccination campaign has not been able to undo the damage done by religious fanatics. Islamic radicals had, five years ago, gotten many conservative clergy to preach against allowing children to get polio vaccinations. This interrupted, for over a year, a world wide effort to wipe out polio. Like smallpox (which was wiped out in a similar campaign three decades ago) the polio virus can only survive inhuman hosts. If enough vulnerable people (mostly kids) are vaccinated against polio, then polio has nowhere to survive, and joins smallpox as an extinct disease. The Islamic campaign against vaccinations (based on the accusation that it was all a secret plan to sterilize female children) caused a resurgence of polio cases worldwide, and a major loss of credibility for the Islamic radicals. The vaccinations resumed, after vigorous efforts by Nigerian politicians, and the sharp drop in polio cases, is yet another setback for the Islamic conservatives who thrive on anti-Western paranoia. But the lapse in vaccinations has allowed polio to spread again, and it will take a year of two of vigorous vaccination activity to reduce polio activity.

April 23, 2008: Parliament is investigating the previous president, Olusegun Obasanjo, for corruption involving the national oil industry. Obasanjo was elected on an anti-corruption platform, but apparently he was unable to resist demands from family and friends for access to oil deals, and suspected cases of outright theft. This is the curse of Africa, where family and tribal obligations often trump national responsibilities. Other parts of the world have less corruption because they have already gone through the transition, which can take centuries, from tribe/clan/family based government, to truly national ones where public service is relatively corruption free. Thus a quick fix for the African corruption problem is not likely.

April 24, 2008: Some of the senior staff (technical and managerial) in the oil industry are on strike for more money. These are Nigerian workers, not the foreigners brought in for many technical and managerial jobs.

April 27, 2008:The government is prosecuting the extradited MEND leader, Henry Okah. He had been arrested, last year, for trying to illegally buy weapons in Angola. The government was not eager to take custody of Okah, because his followers like to kidnap people, often kin of politicians, and demand that MEND prisoners be released. Now they have Okah, and are prosecuting him, rather than releasing him. As a result, MEND has taken credit for four bombing attacks on oil pipelines in the Niger Delta in the last week. These attacks are believed to have halted another 200,000 barrels of daily oil production. That means about a quarter of the 2.5 million barrels of daily potential production has been stopped by MEND attacks and operations by oil thieves (who puncture pipelines and take the oil that leaks out.) MEND wants Okah freed and more money for the Ijaw people in the Niger Delta. The Ijaw tribes don't always get along, but MEND's populist position and Robin Hood tactics, have made the rebels very popular. However, thousands of Ijaw work for the oil companies, and take a hit when oil operations are shut down because of MEND violence.

May 10, 2008: Strikes by oil workers has halted more oil production than years of theft and attacks by gangsters and tribal separatists. An eight day strike shut down 800,000 barrels a day, while years of efforts by gangs and militants cut about 500,000 barrels. The strike ended after the workers, already the highest paid group in the oil region (except possibly or the oil thieves) got a raise.

The most dangerous losses are the 100-200,000 barrels a day stolen by gangs that tap into pipelines and sell the crude to brokers who smuggle the stuff out of the country. Some of the oil gangs have branched out into politics, using their tribal connections to claim the status of political activists (to get more of the oil money for the local Ijaw tribes.) That aspect of the unrest in the oil region is more posturing for the media (as the MEND organization), than actions that actually halt oil production. The government has sent thousands of soldiers, sailors and police to the Niger Delta region to guard oil facilities.

The newly elected national government has accused former president Olusegun Obasanjo's government of being corrupt, lawless and inept. Obasanjo's daughter, Iyabo Obasanjo-Bello, has been indicted for corruption, and many other instances of government funds disappearing have come to light. Olusegun Obasanjo was elected in 1999 to revive the country after decades of corrupt military rule. He left office last year. Obasanjo did have to deal with a lot of corrupt politicians, and a culture of corruption, that is now starting to fade under pressure from reformers.

The basic problem is the lawlessness and inability of elected officials, or government employees, to deliver services. Too much, if not most, of the oil revenue is stolen, creating family fortunes that fund gangs of armed men, lawyers and publicists who will fight to defend the corrupt system. The anti-corruption/good-government crowd is making progress, but there is resistance, and the corrupt practices are still in place.

May 13, 2008:Pirates seized a supply ship (that services offshore oil platforms) and demanded $260,000 ransom for the boat and its 11 man crew (two foreigners and nine Nigerians.)

May 19, 2008:The hijacked supply boat has been located (it's difficult to hide), and police have surrounded it and are negotiating with the pirates. During the first three months of the year, 20 percent of pirate attacks worldwide, took place off Nigeria, mainly in the Niger River delta. The country has 850 kilometers of coastline, but the navy has only 17 ships, and many are out of action because of poor maintenance. Moreover, in the delta, there are some 3,000 separate waterways emptying into the ocean, giving pirates plenty of hiding places. The navy has only eleven ships patrolling the delta.

In addition to the deliberate violence, Nigeria has an accident rate that is several times that found in Western countries. Recently, 43 soldiers, returning from a peacekeeping mission overseas, were killed when their convoy collided with a fuel tanker. The roads are bad and the driving habits are worse. This applies to construction equipment as well. Recently, an excavator hit a fuel pipeline while working on a road, causing an explosion that killed 15-100 people (depending on who you believe, getting accurate information if often a problem as well.) The pipelines are poorly maintained by the state owned oil company.

May 22, 2008: In the Niger River Delta, MEND, the tribal rebel group, has rejected a government proposal to end the violence against the oil production facilities. The government suggested that various factions of MEND incorporate and take government contracts to provide security for portions of the oil facilities in the delta region. MEND called this an outright bribe, and reminded the government that MEND wanted to improve living conditions for all the people living in the delta. The government just wants to stop the violence which has halted about a quarter of the nation's oil production.

May 23, 2008:Two foreign oil workers were kidnapped in the Niger Delta. The two are being held for ransom, the initial demand is for over 8 million dollars per man. That will be negotiated down, but it still will be expensive to get the men free. The government, and the oil companies, are spending more on security, but the high ransoms are making it worthwhile for the larger criminal gangs to launch elaborate operations to grab foreigners.

May 26, 2008:MEND destroyed an oil pipeline pumping station, and then defeated an army patrol that attempted to interfere.

May 30, 2008:The government is trying to appoint a former police commander, with ties to corrupt politicians, as the new head of the anti-corruption commission. The former head of the commission, regarded as highly effective, was "transferred" to another job six months ago by the newly elected president.

June 1, 2008: Northern Nigeria is still suffering an increase in polio cases. While polio declined in some areas, overall it has nearly doubled nationwide compared to last year. The vaccination campaign has not been able to undo the damage done by religious fanatics who, five years ago, spread rumors that polio vaccinations were a Western plot to poison Moslems. This interrupted, for over a year, a world wide effort to wipe out polio. Like smallpox (which was wiped out in a similar campaign three decades ago) the polio virus can only survive in human hosts. If enough vulnerable people (mostly kids) are vaccinated against polio, then polio has nowhere to survive, and joins smallpox as an extinct disease. The Islamic campaign against vaccinations (based on the accusation that it was all a secret plan to sterilize female children) caused a resurgence of polio cases worldwide, and a major loss of credibility for the Islamic radicals. The vaccinations resumed, after vigorous efforts by Nigerian politicians. This effort is being thwarted by the lingering effects of the Islamic conservatives in northern Nigeria. Currently, about four percent of the Nigerian population refuses to let their kids be vaccinated because of the five year old anti-vaccination rumor campaign. The rumors have acquired a life of their own, and just might be able to prevent the complete eradication of polio. So far, the Islamic conservatives actions five years ago have resulted in some 2,000 children getting polio and becoming paralyzed. Some 400-500 children, mainly in Nigeria, are still catching polio because of the Nigerian parents who refuse to allow vaccinations.

June 3, 2008: The government is not making much progress in shutting down the tribal rebels, particularly MEND, in the Niger Delta. Stealing oil and kidnapping foreign oil workers for ransom has become too lucrative for too many people for the police and military to cope. About a quarter of the nation's oil production has been halted by the unrest. A newly president, who promised to crack down on corruption and ineffective government, is showing signs of tolerating the same old bad habits.

June 4, 2008:The kidnappings in the oil region (Niger Delta) continue, with over 200 foreigners taken in the last 30 months, and many more Nigerians (usually family of prominent politicians or businessmen.)

June 9, 2008:In the Bakassi peninsula, which was recently taken over (after years of lawsuits and negotiation) by Cameroon, from Nigeria, a Cameroonian official (and his security detail of five soldiers) were ambushed and abducted by Nigerian gangsters. Bakassi is near the Niger Delta, and one of many parts of the Gulf of Guinea that are now suffering attacks by armed gangs that got their start in the Niger Delta violence.

There is nearly 4,000 kilometers of coastline in the Gulf, and impossible to patrol or police with the forces currently available.

June 11, 2008:Cameroonian troops moved into Bakassi, seeking the kidnapped officials and soldiers. Hundreds of Nigerian residents of the area fled, fearing what the Cameroonian soldiers might do to them. About 90 percent of the Bakassi population is still Nigerian. Last Fall, a Nigerian gang attacked a Cameroonian army outpost, killing twenty soldiers.

June 17, 2008:The new head of the Anti-Corruption Commission has removed the Director of Department of Petroleum Resources (who approves oil industry contracts) as part of a corruption investigation into activities last year.

While the MEND organization says it speaks for the tribes in the Niger Delta, that outfit is led by gangsters who have grown wealthy by stealing oil for years, and has other interests as well. The stealing continues, in addition to increasing kidnapping and other forms of crime. The gangs are still making money, and the politics is a sideline. Because of this situation, the government has a tough, seemingly impossible, time calming down the Delta. The money is an excellent incentive, and the added sense of oppression just gives the gangs a political and recruiting boost. Now thus there are several major incidents a week, including more attacks on sailors, troops and private contractors guarding oil facilities. Attempts to arrange peace talks have failed because of disagreements who the government negotiators will be, and what will be up for negotiation.

June 18, 2008:Nigeria reached a peak daily production of 2.5 million barrels in 2005. Since then, a third of oil production has been shut down by criminal gangs and tribal violence in the Niger Delta. As a result, Angola, by producing 1.87 million barrels a day has, for the first time passed Nigeria.

June 19, 2008: For the first time, rebels (MEND took credit) attacked one of the offshore oil well complexes. The Bonga complex is 120 kilometers offshore, and the attack caused it to be shut down. That stopped 220,000 barrels of oil a day, nearly ten percent of Nigeria's production. That's a loss of over $25 million a day. The attackers sought to destroy the control room, but security measures kept them from getting in. So, instead, the rebels blew up some of the pipeline system used to move the oil around. Oil companies had been building more of their facilities on off-shore pipelines, because of the improved security. Even though MEND demonstrated it could come out this far to attack, the offshore facilities remain easier to defend. During the Bonga raid, an American oil worker was kidnapped, but released a few days later.

June 20, 2008: In the Moslem north there has been a nine-fold increase (over last year) in polio cases. Nigeria now accounts for over 80 percent of the cases of the wild strain of polio. Cases caused by this strain of the disease have shown up in neighboring Benin and Niger, and further spread is feared. The vaccination campaign has not been able to undo the damage done by Moslem religious fanatics who, five years ago, spread rumors that polio vaccinations were a Western plot to poison Moslems. This interrupted, for over a year, a world wide effort to wipe out polio. Like smallpox (which was wiped out in a similar campaign three decades ago) the polio virus can only survive in human hosts. If enough vulnerable people (mostly kids) are vaccinated against polio, then polio has nowhere to survive, and joins smallpox as an extinct disease. The Islamic campaign against vaccinations caused a resurgence of polio cases worldwide, and a major loss of credibility for the Islamic radicals. The vaccinations resumed, after vigorous efforts by Nigerian politicians. This effort is being thwarted by the lingering effects of the Islamic conservatives in northern Nigeria. Currently, about four percent of the Nigerian population refuses to let their kids be vaccinated because of the five year old anti-vaccination rumor campaign. The rumors have acquired a life of their own, and just might be able to prevent the complete eradication of polio. So far, the Islamic conservatives actions five years ago have resulted in over 2,000 children getting polio and becoming paralyzed. Some 400-500 children, mainly in Nigeria, are still catching polio because of the Nigerian parents who refuse to allow vaccinations.

June 21,2008: President Umaru Yar'Adua ordered the military to shut down MEND using any means necessary. The government was preparing for peace talks with MEND next month, and sees the Bonga attack as not in the spirit of peace negotiations.

June 23, 2008: The navy has sent two patrol boats (each armed with two 30mm automatic cannon and a crew of fifty) to patrol the waters between the mainland the offshore oil facilities. These two boats don't make a huge difference, as MEND speedboats are faster.

June 24,2008: Oil region rebels group MEND has declared a unilateral ceasefire, effective today, apparently in reaction to the new military offensive against them. The military is still going after the gangs.

June 25,2008: Repairs have been made, and oil shipments have resumed from the Bonga offshore platform that was attacked last week.

June 30,2008: In the Niger Delta, a boatload of gunmen went on a rampage, firing at other boats, and people on land, leaving at least nine dead and many more wounded. The gunmen escaped by taking their boat into the complex system of waterways in the Delta swamps.

Meanwhile, northern politicians blame southern leaders for allowing the situation to get out of control in the oil region, losing billions of dollars worth of oil exports, money that is shared by all. Corrupt politicians cannot steal money for oil that is not exported. Currently, oil exports, worth over $20 billion a year, are halted because of MEND attacks and theft from pipelines. MEND (a coalition of gangs who have prospered stealing oil) and local tribal chiefs want more of the oil money. State and national politicians have been stealing most of it for decades, and the tribes are fed up with the pollution and poverty. Armed with guns, and equipped with boats and radios bought with stolen oil, the gangs are a power to be reckoned with. The army and navy have not been able to destroy the gangs, or prevent all attacks on oil facilities. The gangs threaten to try and take down all oil production if they don't get a piece of the action.

July 2,2008: The newly elected government is paying more attention to legal procedure in its pursuit of corrupt officials. But everyone is finding that the previous president made a virtue of cutting corners and getting things done (like cutting inflation, paying off the foreign debt, eliminating legal and financial obstacles that hobbled agriculture, and building power plants). But the cut corners allowed a lot of the corruption to go on, and the new government is less interested in continuing economic reform, than in seeing that the legal process is strictly followed. Maybe that's what Nigeria needs, but the corrupt politicians have proved remarkably adaptive.

July 5, 2008: Hundreds of police reinforcements were sent to the southeast, where tribal battles over land has left nearly a hundred people dead or wounded.

July 10, 2008: MEND said it was abandoning its ceasefire, and resuming attacks on oil facilities.

Meanwhile, off the coast, the navy halted and seized an oil tanker carrying about a million barrels of stolen oil. This is a new development, because in the past the oil thieves had moved their oil to neighboring countries (for sale to shady oil brokers) via barges and small ships. It was a bold and dangerous move to try and use an ocean going tanker for this. But the stolen oil business is booming, with over $5 billion worth of oil a year being stolen. This is sold at a discount to smugglers, who get it to neighboring countries for sale to brokers. The actual thieves, who punch holes in pipelines and collect the oil in buckets and in tanks in the backs of trucks, get about ten cents on the dollar (of the world price of oil). But that means the pipeline tapping gangs are getting over half a billion dollars a year. That's big money for impoverished tribesmen, and pays for new SUVs, trucks, clothes, guns and aggressive attitudes.

July 11, 2008: Two German oil engineers were kidnapped at Port Harcourt. Their employer, a major German oil firm, threatened to pull out of Nigeria if this sort of violence was not halted.

July 14, 2008: Government attempts to negotiate peace deals, in the oil rich Niger delta, with tribal rebel groups like MEND, ignore the fact that more and more of the violence is generated by smaller, independent, and purely criminal gangs. These independents are interested in striking it rich stealing oil from pipelines, or kidnapping foreigners or rich Nigerians (or, as in a recent case, the brother of a wealthy Nigerian football player, who was living and playing in Britain.)

July 20, 2008: The MEND rebels in the Niger Delta are trying to position themselves as a provider of law and order. They are doing this by acting as an intermediary in finding, and getting released, foreign kidnap victims. Many kidnappings are done by criminals, not operations like MEND (which are still financed by oil theft, and some kidnappings.) MEND prefers to use its kidnap victims first to try and get something from the government (like the release of MEND members) and to only take ransom as a backup plan.

The government admits that it could ship another 1.2 million barrels of oil a day if the unrest in the Niger Delta would go away. It's believed that about 100,000 barrels of oil are actually stolen daily in the delta. At current prices, that comes to $13 million worth a day, and over $4.7 billion a year. The oil thieves get only about ten percent of that (and various middle men 30-40 percent), but that still comes to nearly half a billion dollars a year for gangs that concentrate on stealing oil. That buys a lot of guns, speedboats, cars and consumer goods to encourage recruitment. So far, the army has not been able to halt the oil theft (usually accomplished by just punching a hole in a pipeline). Thus the numbers of well paid gangsters and rebels in the region increases month by month.

MEND leaders were indignant at accusations that they had accepted a $12 million bribe from the government to refrain from attacking oil facilities. MEND now threatens to destroy several main pipelines in the next month, to prove they were not bought off. But government and oil company officials insist that large payments were made to criminal gangs, to help with pipeline security. Paying off locals to prevent damage to oil facilities is an old custom in the region. The rumors also indicate that much of the $12 million was pocketed by government officials, which further enrages the locals. I

In the Niger Delta, Bonny Island, the site of a gas liquefaction (for shipment in refrigerated boats to foreign customers) plant being built, is filled with soldiers, and armed local rebels. The rebels had told non-Ijaw people (Nigerian and foreign) to get off the island, or be attacked. Many complied, and troops were sent in to restore order. But the rebels would not cooperate, avoiding the troops, but not leaving the island (which many of them were native to.) The government fears that disruptive confrontations like this will spread, further limiting oil production.

July 24, 2008: The government has accepted a British offer of military trainers and security advice. The Nigerians consider their armed forces one of the better trained and led in Africa. But that's not saying much, as the military training and leadership levels in Africa are very low, often to the point of complete ineffectiveness. Nigeria uses Britain as a model for its military, as Britain was the former colonial power in the region and helped establish the Nigerian military half a century ago. But the corruption that is endemic to the region eventually had its way with the armed forces. Leadership and training have suffered. But U.S. training teams (to improve peacekeeping and counter-terror skills) have been in Nigeria during the last decade, and report that the armed forces are not completely demoralized and debilitated by the corruption, and with some intense training, and elimination of the most corrupt officers, combat capabilities would be much improved.

July 25, 2008: Eleven foreign oil workers were kidnapped in three incidents. Over 200 have been taken, for ransom, in the last two years.

For the second time in a week, an armed Nigerian nationalist group attacked Cameroonian troops in the Bakassi peninsula. This oil rich area used to be Nigerian, but an international court awarded it to Cameroon. Nigeria handed it over two years ago, but some Nigerian groups have continued to fight for a return to Nigerian rule.

July 28, 2008: Two more attacks on Niger Delta oil pipelines, and MEND took credit, while promising more damage to the pipelines.

July 29, 2008: In the Niger Delta, fighting broke out between rival oil stealing gangs. At least two gangsters, and one policemen, have died so far. The police tried to break up the fighting, which involves a lot of shooting and threatens innocent civilians.

August 2, 2008: Two more foreign oil workers were kidnapped in the Niger Delta.

August 3, 2008: News that the government had paid $25 million to Niger Delta gangs, to assure the safety of oil pipelines, turned out to be a scam. Most of the money was stolen by security officials, who said they were handling the negotiations with the gangs (who insist they didn't get the money, and make a lot more just stealing oil.) Efforts to halt the corruption, that cripples the economy and impoverishes most of the population, are not going well. The corrupt politicians have money, and incentive, to defeat the anti-corruption forces. This is being done by bribing as many government officials as possible, in order to get anti-corruption officials harassed, demoted or fired. This is working. Money talks, even dirty money.

August 8, 2008: A top development official was arrested for stealing $4 million for an effort to use magic against a rival bureaucrat. Half the money was burned in a ceremony meant to insure that even more money would be obtained. Magic is very popular in Nigeria, despite the fact that the majority of the population are Christian or Moslem. People are regularly murdered because they are suspected of using black magic to harm others.

August 9, 2008: The number of polio cases tripled in the last year, to over 500. This is the result of a five year old effort by Islamic radicals in the north to halt polio vaccinations. The radicals insist that this is actually a Western plot to poison Moslem children. Religious and political leaders have denounced this, but many superstitious parents continue to prevent their kids from getting vaccinated. This is interfering with a decades old effort to totally eliminate polio (which only survives in a human host) from the planet, as was done to smallpox three decades ago.

August 11, 2008: For over two weeks, fighting between rival oil stealing gangs has raged in the Niger Delta. Eventually, the fighting, mainly a turf war, spread to Port Harcourt, the largest city in the region. Oil theft is big business, with several hundred million dollars a year reaching the gangs, and providing lucrative employment for thousands of young men. There's so much money involved, and so many competing gangs, that battles over lucrative pipeline locations (which are less guarded, and closer to roads or waterways for moving the stolen oil) are increasing. The current fighting has left dozens dead.

August 12, 2008: Britain, like many other Western nations, continues to warn its citizens to stay away from Nigeria's oil region (the Niger river delta), because of the threat of kidnapping and crime in general.

August 14, 2008: Despite recent attacks, by armed Nigerian nationalist groups, on Cameroonian troops in the Bakassi peninsula, the two year process of turning it over to Cameroon has completed. This oil rich area used to be Nigerian, but an international court awarded it to Cameroon. Nigeria began handing it over two years ago, but some Nigerian groups have continued to fight for a return to Nigerian rule.

August 15, 2008: In the Niger delta, rebels ambushed to navy gunboats, which immediately returned fire. When the action was over, one sailor and twelve rebels were dead. MEND denied that the attackers were theirs.

August 19, 2008: Near Port Harcourt, in the Niger delta, a battle broke out between criminal gangs. Hundreds of civilians fled, and there were several dozen casualties. The millions of dollars made each month by stealing oil has left thousands of young men in the delta region armed, and organized into highly competitive, and trigger happy, gangs.

August 24, 2008: Newly elected president Umaru Yar'Adua has replaced the senior leadership of the army. This was partly in response to the failure of the army to deal with the armed rebel groups in the Niger river oil region. There was also criticism of troops performing poorly, and misbehaving (rape, robbery and murder) against civilians. The government is also keen to reduce corruption in the army. Earlier this year, the army appointed a new commander for the Niger delta region, with orders to crack down on the oil theft. This was followed by accusations, by civilians in the oil region, that the army has often become partners with some of the oil theft gangs. Last month, Britain agreed to send a major army training mission, to upgrade the leadership and management skills of Nigerian NCOs and officers.

August 25, 2008: In the Niger river delta, rebels seized an oil company supply ship, and its eight man crew. Much of the transportation needs of the oil industry in the delta is by ship.

August 26, 2008: An Israeli businessman was kidnapped in Port Harcourt (in the delta). Such kidnappings are common enough, but the Israeli embassy is all over this because Islamic terrorists have been seeking to kill or kidnap Israelis overseas. So the Israeli government is interested in finding out who did the kidnapping, as well as getting the victim released. The kidnappers soon demanded a $12 million ransom. The victim was released a week later, after a ransom was apparently paid. Hezbollah was not involved.

August 28, 2008: The new commander of the armed forces has pledged to restore the discipline in the military. This was lost in the 1990s, during the military dictatorship. The army was used to keep the generals in power, and given the authority to do whatever it took. Many soldiers became little different than bandits. They took what they wanted, and were above the law. It was hard to re-adjust after democracy returned in 1999. Now, nine years later, the army is trying to get its act together.

August 29, 2008: A tenth former state governor has been arrested for corruption while he was in office (from 2002-2007).

September 2, 2008: Police arrested an American film maker in the Niger river delta oil region, and accused him of spying. The government is hostile to foreign journalists and film makers who want to publicize what is going on in the delta. The American was later released after U.S. diplomats raised a stink.

The recent kidnapping of an Israeli businessman in the delta got a lot of publicity, because of the possible Islamic terrorist connection. But this was one of some 200 kidnappings of foreign workers in the delta in the last two years. Foreign business are less eager to operate in Nigeria, because of the growing crime rate, and the higher costs of dealing with it.

Christians, who comprise about half the population, are pressing the government to do something about Islamic militants, who have recently burned down another church in Kwara State. There, more Moslems are converting to Christianity, angering Islamic conservatives. In this case, Islamic militants complained that a new Christian church was too close (about 500 meters) to a mosque.

In the Niger river delta oil region, the oil theft gangs have become more violent, and are demonstrating their wealth by using more advanced weapons (machine-guns, RPGs and anti-tank missiles). Apparently the gunrunners have established lucrative connections with the gangs, and business is brisk. Casualties are up as well, with some days seeing several dozen dead and wounded because of clashes between security forces and oil gangs.

September 6, 2008: Many Nigerians despair of ever having honest and efficient government. After decades of trying to get honest leaders, the murderous response of so many senior politicians, to anti-corruption efforts, is demoralizing. While many politicians are being prosecuted, too many are successfully using bribes, threats or violence to avoid conviction or punishment. Then there was the recent dismissal of eleven members of the anti-corruption commission (the EFCC, or Economic and Financial Crimes Commission), for corruption.

September 13, 2008: MEND has ordered oil companies to withdraw all their personnel from the Niger delta within 24 hours, or risk having their personnel kidnapped or killed. This is in response to a new military offensive against MEND camps in remote areas of the Niger delta waterways.

The military has increased its attacks on rebel (usually the MEND organization) camps, using helicopters, gunboats and landing craft. The gangs, which can disperse in their speedboats, and stay in touch via their cell and satellite phones, are fighting back. The rebels can afford plenty of speedboats and guns, and can muster ten or more speedboats and several dozen armed men for pre-dawn attacks on pipelines and pumping stations (that keep the oil moving through the pipelines). In the last week, over a hundred people (most of them MEND) have died from the violence in the delta. The military is making it more difficult for MEND, and non-political gangs, to steal oil (by punching holes in pipelines), thus cutting into the revenue of the gangs. The outcome of this new escalation won't be known for a few weeks. If oil exports (currently about two million barrels a day) decline, the rebels are winning. If oil production remains the same, the rebels may be losing. If oil production goes up, the rebels probably are losing. But until the government does something to reduce the poverty in the delta, the angry armed men will still be around.

The violence in the delta has hurt the local economy as well. The reduction in oil exports means that oil companies shut down some of their operations and put thousands of Nigerians out of work. This has a ripple effect, pushing the unemployment rate up several percent, to nearly 20 percent.

September 17, 2008: In the Niger River Delta oil region, gangs have expanded their kidnapping operations to include more politicians and businessmen. The foreigners are more lucrative, but too well guarded and too risky to go after. The gangs and separatist rebels (many individuals do both) have halted 25 percent of oil exports, costing the government over $20 billion in revenues this year. The government still has nearly $70 billion coming in, but the missing revenue is a large number, and it is noticed. With that kind of incentive, the government is sending more troops, and making more efforts to improve the lives of Niger Delta people. A new government ministry has been established, whose only purpose is to solve problems in the Niger Delta. The delta rebels see the new ministry as a PR effort, mainly intended to hand out more lucrative jobs to friends of the government. The extensive corruption in Nigeria continues to hobble any economic and social revival efforts in the delta. There are about 30 million people living there, and they are not happy.

September 18, 2008: A week of attacks by tribal rebels in the Niger Delta has halted shipment of 150,000 barrels of oil a day. The army has responded by sending five battalions of infantry into the delta, seeking out and attacking rebel bases and wanted individuals.

September 19, 2008: The new commander of the army has sent investigators to the Niger Delta, there being suspicions that some soldiers have been corrupted (paid off) by rebels (who have made a lot of money stealing oil.)

September 20, 2008: Rebels in the Niger Delta bombed another oil pipeline. The attacks in the last week have reduced oil shipments by 280,000, and only about 1.8 million barrels a day (from a potential max of 2.6 million barrels) are being shipped. The army has counterattacked, and at least ten rebels were killed today by these operations, along with three speedboats sunk.

September 21, 2008: Faced with a growing counteroffensive by the army, Niger Delta rebel group MEND has declared a unilateral ceasefire. The military said they would ignore the ceasefire.

September 26, 2008: Despite rebel protests (and their unilateral ceasefire), the military continues to seek out and attack rebels in the Niger Delta. Over 200 suspected rebels have been arrested, and several dozen killed or wounded. The new commanders of the army are under orders to shut down the rebel activities, and clean up the corruption and inefficiency in the military.

September 30, 2008: The army has arrested several hundred suspected rebels in the Niger River delta in the last week. This was in response to earlier attacks on oil infrastructure which cut 40 percent of the nations potential 2.5 million barrels of oil a day of shipments.

October 2, 2008: Troops were sent to the southeast, to stop five months of tribal violence (over land disputes). At least 18 people have died, and many more wounded. Over the last decade, about a thousand people a year have died in tribal strife, usually over land rights or leadership disputes (who shall be the chief). When police appear unable to contain the violence, the army is called in. This often leads to more deaths, as the army tends to come in shooting.

In the Niger River delta, army and police operations over the last three weeks have destroyed all known rebel (largely MEND) bases. It is believed that there are dozens of unknown bases and safe houses. Several hundred rebels have been killed or wounded so far, and over 500 arrested. During this offensive, the troops have also shut down over a hundred oil theft operations (sites where a pipeline was punctured and oil collected, or the barges that take the oil out of the country). The oil is brought to barges or small tankers, where it is taken to neighboring countries and sold, at a discount (50-70 percent off the current world price), to brokers who sell it as legit stuff to refineries or exporters. That's over a billion dollars a year coming back to dozens of gangs in the delta. Army commanders have received death threats from gangster chiefs who have had their smuggling operations damaged. No one is sure exactly how much oil is stolen, or exactly how much cash the gangs get. But there are a lot of gangs, and they have guns, speedboats, cell and satellite phones, luxury cars and all manner of consumer goodies. Many gangsters have built impressive looking houses (walled compounds in many cases), and some of these were raided recently, as soldiers and police rounded up the usual (or at least known) suspects. There's a lot of crime in the delta, not all of it oil related. There are also many government officials on the gangsters payroll, and some of these are being sought as well. The corrupt officials have a tendency to beat the charges, eventually. But in the short term, politicians and civil servants get arrested. Then they use lots of their ill-gotten gains to hire lawyers and bribe members of the judicial system. Collectively, the corrupt officials are getting organized and fighting back against the clean government movement.

October 7, 2008: The new government announced it had recovered $3.4 billion of embezzled government funds in the past 16 months. The anti-corruption effort is very popular, and dozens of senior government officials have been arrested and charged. In the last 37 years, the government has earned over a trillion dollars ($1,190 billion) in oil revenue, most of which has been stolen or misused. This corruption is the main cause of the unrest in the country, especially the oil producing areas.

October 15,2008: In the Niger Delta, six speedboats full of pirates attacked a navy gunboat, with the object of capturing it and stealing its machine-guns and other weapons. The dusk attack failed, as the patrol boat crew sank two of the speedboats and forced the others to flee. One soldier was killed and two wounded.

Cameroon is increasing its defenses along the 1,700 frontier with Nigeria. This is in response to a September 28 attack by Nigerian criminals. Storming ashore from speedboats, heavily armed Nigerian gangsters robbed four banks (using explosives to get at the cash), killed one person and roared off. Cameroon will install radar along the coast near Nigeria and increase naval patrols. There will also be cooperation and coordination with the Nigerian military and police, to fight the seaborne gangsters. The new violence comes in the wake of Cameroonian troops moving in to the Bakassi peninsula. This is the final part of a two year process of turning Bakassi over to Cameroon. This oil rich area used to be Nigerian, but an international court awarded it to Cameroon. Nigeria began handing it over two years ago, but some Nigerian groups have continued to fight for a return to Nigerian rule. The Nigerian gangs are taking advantage of the less well armed and numerous Cameroon security forces.

Oil exports for this month are averaging about 1.89 million barrels a day. If there are no major new attacks on the oil industry, production next month should go to 1.95 million barrels a day. It will be a year or more before production gets back to the potential max of 2.5 million barrels a day.

Meanwhile, the government officials are as corrupt as ever, despite the many senior officials who are being prosecuted. The problem is that few, if any, of these officials will go to jail. They will spend their stolen money on bribes and lawyers, and get off. The lower level officials, who do a lot of the stealing (you need to bribe most civil servants to get anything done), are still very much in business.

Over the last year, the oil industry has bought dozens of patrol boats, and paid the military to supply weapons and crews. The companies decide where the boats will operate, which is basically around the company facilities. Although the government has a program to build new patrol boats locally, this is not expected to produce additional boats any time soon. The companies cannot wait, and went to Western boat brokers to buy second-hand military boats. The Nigerians are particularly hostile to foreign military contractors, so there are few of those, and used mainly to supervise the Nigerian officers and troops who are hired (while still receiving their military pay) to guard specific oil production facilities.

October 18,2008: The oil stealing gangs in the Niger Delta have not been able to build wide support, mainly because the gangs are criminals and often act that way towards locals. Increased police and military activity, and the plunging price of oil has sharply cut the income of the gangs. This has led many of the gang members to supplement their income by stealing other stuff, usually from the easiest targets. That means the banks and big companies, with all their security guards, are avoided in favor of stealing from the less well off. This is bad for the public image of the oil gangs. But there is no high command of the gangs, no way to control the thousands of young gunmen looking to replace lost oil income. For example, gangs are running a protection racket on the larger fishing boats, forcing them to pay a fee for the right to fish in an area without being attacked. The navy has been unable to provide enough patrol boats to protect all the fishing boats (who then continue to pay the extortion fees.)

October 20, 2008: Cameroon is sending more soldiers and police to defend its 1,700 kilometer frontier with Nigeria. This is in response to attacks by Nigerian gangs, including one (the NDDSC, or Niger Delta Defense and Security Council) that claims to represent the interests of the200,000 Nigerians who are being forced to leave the Bakassi peninsula. Cameroon is installing radar along the coast near Nigeria and increasing naval patrols. The new violence comes in the wake of Cameroonian troops moving into the Bakassi peninsula. This is the final part of a two year process of turning Bakassi over to Cameroon. This oil rich area was long controlled by Nigeria, but an international court awarded it to Cameroon. Nigeria began handing it over two years ago, but some Nigerian groups have continued to fight for a return to Nigerian rule. The Nigerian gangs are taking advantage of the less well armed and numerous Cameroon security forces. Most of the inhabitants of Bakassi do not want to become Cameroon citizens and must move to Nigeria. Some of the gangsters from this population of over 200,000 people. Gunmen in speedboats have been clashing regularly with Cameroonian security forces.

October 24, 2008: In the Niger delta, the government of Rivers state has offered amnesty to several of the larger and better organized of the rebel groups. The rebels responded with a demand that the security forces withdraw from the rural areas the gangs claim as their own, before the amnesty offer will be considered. Thusthe amnesty effort appears headed nowhere.

October 25, 2008: Gunmen boarded an oil company support boat, robbed the 17 crew members, and took whatever loot they could carry, and left.

A second oil company boat was also attacked, but managed to speed up and escape with only a few bullet holes.

October 26, 2008: In the Niger delta, navy patrol boats encountered three speedboats full of gunmen. Shooting broke out, and five of the gunmen, who belonged to one of the many gangs in the region, were killed. The police and military armed boat patrols are forcing the gangs to be more cautious, but that's it.

October 29, 2008: The president fired twenty ministers, in an attempt to find officials who could get things done. Most ministries are inefficient, or prone to inaction. Corruption is widespread, and any officials who try to clean things up, is overwhelmed by the larger number of officials who like things as they are.

Corrupt officials have used their power and influence (especially bribes) to largely cripple anti-corruption efforts. Officials who have clearly stolen large amounts of government money are avoiding prosecution. Those that do get convicted, serve only a few years, and some that are getting out, are successfully suing to get some of their seized money (stolen from the government) and property (bought with stolen funds) back. The good government crowd is losing ground. Much of the best political talent in the country goes over to the Dark Side, and uses their skills to steal government money, and hold on to it.

The legislature has established a committee to investigate what happened to the $42 billion that has been spent, in the Niger River delta oil region, over the last eight years, on development projects. Nothing appears to have been developed, and the money is unaccounted for (and presumed embezzled or otherwise diverted.) The usual routine with this sort of thing is for the corrupt officials who stole the money, to use some of it to bribe whoever needs bribing to make sure the investigation goes nowhere.

November 2, 2008: While northern Somalia is the site of much pirate activity, Nigeria has also suffered a growing number of attacks on its fishing fleet that, so far this year, 64 Nigerian coastal fishing boats have been attacked by pirates. Currently, eight of these fishing boats are being held for ransom. Unlike the oil companies, the fishing boats cannot afford to hire armed guards, and a very vulnerable to attack by seagoing bandits. The dozens of ships that service the offshore oil facilities now have armed guards most of the time. So the pirates go looking for less dangerous prey.

November 3, 2008: A foreign engineer was kidnapped from a construction site in Port Harcourt (the major city in the Niger River delta oil region.)

Marines found and attacked a kidnappers camp near the Bakassi peninsula, and attempted to rescue ten oil workers that had been kidnapped from a boat near the Cameroon border a week earlier. One of the hostages was killed. Rebels belonging to the NDDSC (Niger Delta Defense and Security Council) were responsible. The NDDSC wants the Bakassi peninsula returned to Nigerian control, and compensation paid to the Nigerians who left the Bakassi peninsula after Cameroon took control of the area last year.

November 5, 2008: The rebel group MEND said it had rescued the foreign engineer who had been kidnapped on the 3rd. The MEND rescuers also freed a second man, a Nigerian, who was also be held by the kidnapping gang. The engineer was then released by MEND.

November 6, 2008: In the Niger Delta, some twenty speedboats full of armed oil thieves, attacked a military camp. The only injury was to a civilian killed in the crossfire. The gang was apparently trying to intimidate the military into staying away from the oil stealing operations that finance the gangs.

November 7, 2008: Six sailors died, along with several gang members, when the navy tried to intervene and stop a gun battle between two rival gangs in the Niger delta.

November 15, 2008: Niger delta rebel group MEND has been rescuing people from kidnapping gangs, and letting most of them go free. But foreigners, especially Britons, are being kept in an attempt to force the government to do right by the people of the Niger delta (who have gained little from decades of oil field operations.) MEND is also demanding that Britain stop training the Nigerian military. In response, the military is preparing major assaults on two known MEND camps. This is no secret, and MEND threatens another wave of attacks on oil facilities if the military moves on the two camps. The military and MEND have been dancing around each other for months, unwilling to go head-to-head. Apparently that is about to change.

There are growing public displays of outrage at the corruption among public officials, but little action to stop it. A few corrupt officials have been removed from office, but the large scale looting of the oil revenue continues.

November 16, 2008: MEND rebels seized a cargo ship, and its ten man crew, in the Niger river delta. This is believed in retaliation for the recent government seizure of a tanker carrying 28,000 tons of stolen (by gangs that tap into pipelines) oil. As much was MEND wants social justice for the people of the Niger delta, they also want to maintain their lucrative oil stealing operation. The ship and its crew were released a day later.

November 17, 2008: The government has been forced to investigate the assault on a woman by soldiers. The video of the incident got onto the Internet. The soldiers involved were the bodyguards for a major general, and the woman was attacked because she did not get out of the way of the generals convoy fast enough. Normally, the woman would have no recourse, but because of the video, the army will go through the motions of convening an investigating panel which will dither until public attention dies down. This will serve as another irritant for an increasingly angry public.

November 18, 2008: A secret military trial has sentenced six soldiers to life in prison for selling weapons to Niger Delta criminals from 2000-2006. This proceeding was kept secret because of growing public anger against the government, which seems incapable of dealing with growing corruption and poverty. That facts are these. In the last 37 years, the government has earned over a trillion dollars ($1,190 billion) in oil revenue, most of which has been stolen or misused. This corruption is the main cause of the unrest in the country, especially the oil producing areas. Since 1980, the poverty rate (the percentage of people living on less than $400 a year) has gone from 28 percent to over 60 percent today. About five percent of the population lives on over $1,000 a year, and these are usually connected with the corrupt politicians who have stolen all that oil wealth.

November 19, 2008: A senior anti-corruption official was forced to resign, after being caught accepting a bribe. The official was investigating the chief-of-staff for the governor of Rivers state, one of the states in the Niger delta oil region, for stealing $40 million.

November 20, 2008: Ten speedboats, each carrying several armed men, attacked an oil facility with gunfire, but sped away when soldiers guarding the place returned fire. This incident was believed to be another retaliation, with the implied threat that things could get worse, for the recent military seizure of a tanker carrying millions of dollars worth of stolen (by the local gangs) oil to a neighboring country.

November 21, 2008: Another oil facility was raked by gang gunfire, as another retaliation for the seizure of a gang tanker full of stolen oil.

November 22, 2008: A former anti-corruption official was arrested, for no particular reason, at the graduation ceremony for a training ceremony for a course he was forced to take. The chief investigator for the national anti-corruption commission, Nuhu Ribadu, had been ordered, late last year, to stop investigating and take a yearlong "training course," that senior police commanders like himself are assigned to periodically. But to most Nigerians, this assignment was an indication that the corrupt politicians have gotten through to the new president, and gotten this very effective corruption investigator off their backs. While taking the course, at least one attempt was made on Ribadu’s life, by gunmen that missed.

The police also demoted him, without giving a reason why. But most Nigerians believe corrupt politicians are trying to get rid of Ribadu permanently.

November 25, 2008: Some 30 speedboats full of gunmen clashed with soldiers in the Niger delta. The gangsters retreated, after losing at least two dead. This was apparently connected with the recent seizure, by the army, of three small refineries the gangs had set up, to refine stolen oil for their own use and sale on the local black market. The army also raided a gang camp and seized weapons and ammo. The gangs have apparently not offered a large enough bribes to military commanders, thus the attacks continue. Meanwhile, another corrupt scam has been revealed when it was publicized that a $7.6 billion contract for the construction of a major railroad line, was padded with an additional $800 million (for bribes to government officials), and $250 million was paid out, without authorization from the legislature. This occurred last year, as former president Olusegun Obasanjo was about to leave office. Obasanjo had pledged to clean up corruption, but he was surrounded by aides who had other ideas.

November 26, 2008: The oil stealing gangs in the Niger delta have obtained heavy (12.7mm and larger) machine-guns, and are using them to keep military helicopters away from major gang camps in remote areas.

November 27, 2008: A Nigerian firm that supplies ten percent of the world's supply of LNG (liquefied natural gas) has told its customers that it will have to shut down ones of its largest liquefaction plants because thieves have tapped gas lines so often that that major parts of the system have to be shut down for a month or more of major repairs. The extensive gas and oil pipelines in the Niger River Delta are under increasing attack by thieves, as stealing gas and oil are two of the easiest (and most dangerous) ways to make money in the otherwise poor region.

November 28, 2008: Nearly a thousand young men in the Niger Delta have accepted the amnesty program, turned in their weapons, and will receive job training. Many will be sent overseas (to South Africa, Norway and the United States for the training. While most of the subjects taught will be directly applicable to getting a job (welding, carpentry and the like), there will also be anger management classes.

November 29, 2008: Religious violence has broken out in Jos, the capital Plateau State, in the center of the country. It started as street battles over a disputed election (the first local elections in a decade), but quickly escalated.

December 2, 2008: A government commission recommended that the best way to deal with the growing violence in the oil producing Niger Delta was to divert about a quarter of the oil revenue to the region, and release the leader of the largest rebel organization, MEND, from prison. In effect, the commission is saying, pay them off. MEND and other gangs have grown rich from stealing oil. But if the Niger Delta states got a lot more money (and most of it was not stolen by corrupt politicians, and that's a big "if"), there would be more local incentive to not steal oil, and to go after those that do. The rest of the country may not be too enthusiastic about giving up 10-15 percent of their current share of oil revenues. Meanwhile, the kidnappers of a British oil worker in the Niger Delta, are demanding a $2.4 million ransom.

Vigorous government intervention four years ago halted three years of violence that left over 50,000 dead (17,459 children, 17,397 women and 18,931 men). This sort of conflict is common the world over. During the late 19th century, the United States suffered several local outbreaks ("Range Wars") between groups of farmers and ranchers. Religion (between Protestants and Christians) was sometimes a minor factor, but it was mostly about land and water rights. Tribal and religious animosities in Nigeria only make the Range Wars there more deadly.

The religious violence in Plateau State goes back to ancient tribal conflicts between the Fulani tribes from the north, who are largely herders and Moslem, and other tribes from the south, who have come into contact with the Fulani, but are farmers and largely Christian. Christians are also angry over the use of Islamic law in northern, largely Moslem, states. This religious law is being imposed on non-Moslems, despite protests from the federal government and the non-Moslems involved.

December 3, 2008: Police and soldiers in Jos, the capital Plateau State, have stopped the violence. But at least 400 were killed, and the death toll will rise as more bodies are found. A curfew was imposed, and ringleaders of the mobs were being tracked down and arrested.

December 5,2008: In the central Nigerian city of Jos, recent tribal and religious violence has left over a hundred thousand people short of food and other supplies. That's because the fighting destroyed the major market in the town, and new supplies have to be trucked in for the 7,000 refugees from the violence living in camps outside the town, as well as for those who did not flee.

The 2007 presidential elections were widely seen as dirty, with corrupt politicians uniting to get Atiku Abubakar elected, and obligated to them. In the past week, supreme court narrowly (4-3) defeated an attempt to nullify the election. Abubakar says the right things, but his actions leave the major corrupt politicians alone. But this means that no progress is being made it dealing with the unrest in the Niger Delta, and that oil exports will continue to decline because the security forces are unable to destroy the oil stealing gangs.

Mallam Nuhu Ribadu, the highly successful anti-corruption official, who was removed from his job by the newly elected government last year, has apparently fled the country, fearing for his life. The influence of so many corrupt politicians, and former politicians, was greater than the support of anti-corruption groups inside and outside the government. This is a clear defeat for efforts to prosecute corrupt officials, and use the oil wealth for useful purposes, rather than just making a few thousand politicians rich. The corruption manifests itself in so many ways, like the lack of good roads or irregular electricity supply. Corruption in the educational sector results in most Nigerians being illiterate, even though most, on paper, have access to school. But primary school funds are often stolen, and the schools a sham. At the university level, grades are for sale, and a third or more of the graduates are unqualified (as foreign employers are constantly reminded.)

While the government talks of spending more money in the Delta, there has been no visible evidence of increased spending over the last few years. These have been no more arrests of senior government officials for embezzlement. There is also very visible affluence among senior officials, in the form of luxurious new homes being built, and new cars to move their guys, their families and bodyguards, around. But the oil gangs can also afford new trucks and SUVs, and sometimes fill them with gunmen, drive to some public event, put on a firepower display, and drive off before the police can do anything about it.

Piracy has become a major problem, with officials able to identify nearly 300 attacks in the last five years. Many of the attacks are on the fishing trawlers that work along the coast, and as a result, over 40 percent of these trawlers have gone out of business (reducing the trawler fleet from 250 boats to 170). In the last year, there have been some weeks in which there were over a dozen boat attacked. The media makes much of attacks on oil industry boats, but the most frequent targets have been the unarmed and unguarded fishing boats.

December 15, 2008: The oil companies in the Niger River Delta, despite hiring thousands of security guards, are still suffering attacks on their boats and having foreign workers kidnapped. There are several attacks a week, and one or two foreign oil workers is kidnapped for ransom each week. The oil stealing gangs are growing in size, and that means more young men moving about the Delta in speedboats, armed with AK-47s, machine-guns and RPGs. These guys are poorly trained as fighters, but believe their own PR and are fearless, at least initially, when they run into military or police patrol boats (which usually have more, and larger caliber, machine-guns, and personnel better trained to use them.) The surviving gang members will usually get away, but will not be discouraged. This aggressive attitude makes it difficult for the security forces to control the gangs, who are also very popular with the local population because the gangs spread their millions around, and hire locally. Many of the military personnel are from other parts of the country.

December 16, 2008: In the Delta, two foreign (and one Nigerian) oil workers were freed after 12 days captivity. It is assumed that ransoms were paid, but the oil companies never discuss such matters. Electricity is in short supply because the companies that supply natural gas for the generators, have not property maintained the pipelines. There are also petroleum fuel shortages in some major cities because the tanker truck drivers are striking over the growing number of bribes that are being demanded by police and other government officials.

Anti-corruption efforts fail because the culture of stealing is supported by a huge network of local politicians, and their gangs of thugs. Even an attempt, in the north, of using Sharia (Islamic) law to deal with the corruption failed. The corrupt politicians bribed, intimidated or ignored the Islamic clergy attempts at introducing clean government. The number of Nigerians calling for clean government increases, as does the education level of the population. But the corrupt officialdom is strong, and not willing to give up their thieving ways without a fight.

Corrupt government officials have succeeded in halting anti-corruption efforts. Judges and prosecutors have been bribed, along with legislators, who are preventing new anti-corruption legislation. One former state governor (of Edo) who was convicted, ended up paying only a fraction, of the millions he stole, in fines and restitution. His legal fees and bribes must have been expensive, but still, he got away with millions, and served no jail time.

December 27, 2008: Along the coast, particularly between the Niger river delta and the Cameroon border, there has been an increase in pirate attacks. Gunmen in speedboats attack ships, as well as settled areas along the coast. Police and military forces are tied down guarding the essential oil pumping and pipeline facilities, and cannot provide many patrols. The oil facilities are where the money is. Meanwhile, Germany has offered to help Nigerian police cripple the Niger delta gangs by going after the financial system that supports the illegal oil trade.

The army says it knows of a rebel training camp in the Niger delta, where hundreds of new recruiting are learning how to shoot and blow things up. This is in preparation for the end of the three month ceasefire. The camp is also believed to be where some of the current kidnapping victims are held. Some 250 foreign and local oil workers have been kidnapped this year. The oil stealing gangs are not particularly well trained in the use of weapons, but they are vicious. Terror is used to intimidate local police. If the gangs cannot catch a particular cop, they will go after any members of his family they can find, and injure them (cutting off a hand, for example.) National police also believe that MEND (the main political group among the delta oil stealing gangs) plans to attack senior government officials in the federal capital. This is unlikely, but makes it easier for the police to justify arresting anyone from the Niger delta, that they find in the capital and don't like.

The religious violence in Central Nigeria (the city of Jos) continues to simmer. Most of the police reinforcements were Christian, as are most of the police in Jos. Reprisals against the Moslems were particularly lethal. The town was originally Christian, but many Moslems have moved in during the last decade. This kind of population movement usually causes problems when the differences in tribe, religion and place of origin combine. The 1999 constitution made into law, the customs of discriminating against migrants economically and politically. The religion angle has become more dangerous with the growth of Islamic conservatism in the north. While there has been no al Qaeda activity, there have been a few pro-Taliban cases, where local religious leaders sought to force everyone (including non-Moslems) to conform to proper Islamic lifestyle, This has led to suspicious of foreign Moslems. Earlier this month, eight such foreigner Moslems (six Gambians, two Indians) were arrested near the capital for preaching religious hatred. Such arrests usually turn out to be mistaken, for Islamic terrorist groups find Nigeria too wild and unstable to work from.

January 2, 2009: In the Niger Delta, someone blew up an oil pipeline. This attack appears to be the result of a feud between two towns over the ownership of the land the pipeline runs through. Such attacks on pipelines are often made by oil thieves, who collect oil before the police and repair crews arrive. All it takes is a few sticks of dynamite, which can be obtained easily on the black market.

January 3, 2009: The religious violence in Central Nigeria (the city of Jos) continues after the assassination of a prominent Christian by unidentified gunmen.

January 4, 2009: Pirates in five speed boats surrounded and seized an oil company supply ship off the coast. The pirates seized the ship and its crew of five Nigerians and four foreigners (from Cameroon, Ghana and Lebanon).

January 9, 2009: In the northwestern town of Zaria, fighting between members of a radical Shia group, and more moderate (and representing the majority of Moslems) Sunni group left at least five dead and over 30 wounded. The Shia movement in Nigeria began about 25 years ago, with little help (but much inspiration) from Iran (where a religious revolution in 1979 put Shia clergy in charge of the government by the mid-1980s).

There are 5-10 million Shia in Nigeria and most of them want a religious dictatorship like Iran, run using Islamic law. While many in the Sunni majority agree with this, the religious differences between Shia and Sunni causes tension and violence. There have been assassinations (of Shia and Sunni leaders) as well as riots and some battles. While the Nigerian Shia are considered less-than-orthodox by the senior Shia clergy back in Iran and Iraq, they are still recognized as Shia, and Iran has provided some support (most of it illegal, in the form of cash smuggled in to help sustain Shia organizations.)

Members of the national legislature are trying to reboot the anti-corruption drive by demanding new management for the Central Bank and government owned companies that deal with oil and utilities. There is much evidence of corruption in all these organizations, and that makes it difficult to clean them up. All that money provides the incumbent officials with the ability to hire lots of lawyers, and pay lots of bribes to court officials and potential witnesses.

January 11, 2009: The government has another MEND leader, Sobomabo Jachrich, in jail, and MEND wants their guy out. Arrested at the end of December, MEND has promised increased violence if Jachrich is not released. The military, however, are finding that MEND is not the biggest obstacle in the delta. Corrupt officials, businessmen and gangsters are a larger part of the local problems than MEND (who sustain themselves by stealing oil, and explain themselves by demanding less corruption and more oil money for the people living in the Niger river delta.) The problem is that no matter how much oil money you direct to the delta states, most of it will be stolen by corrupt officials. The population will remain poor and unhappy, and that will sustain groups like MEND. And groups like MEND are not going away, mainly because the living conditions in the country, not just the Niger delta, continue to get worse. For example, the government corruption has destroyed the national health system to the point where, in the last few years, the average lifespan of Nigerians has declined from 52 years, to 49 years. This is just another example of how the corruption in government and business is literally killing the population. MEND is simply the population trying to fight back.

January 12, 2009: Two soldiers were killed and one wounded in the Niger delta, after rebels retaliated for the seizure of a ship to transport a stolen oil.

January 13, 2009: Tubotamuno Angolia, one of the MEND leaders in the Niger delta, was killed by soldiers.

January 17, 2009: Troops attempted to rescue two British oil workers, who have held four months. The rescue attempt failed and the hostages were moved deeper into the Niger delta swamps. The two Brits are being held in an attempt to obtain the freedom of MEND leader Henry Okah.

January 18, 2009: In the Niger delta, two oil company boats were attacked, killing one person and kidnapping six others on board.

January 21, 2009: In the Niger delta, gunmen attacked a Romanian tanker, carrying 4,000 tons of diesel fuel, and tool one of the crew captive. The tankers was shot up pretty bad by the attackers.

January 22, 2009: The military believes that most of the violence against the oil companies is being carried out by a MEND group operating out of a camp in Ajakaja, in Rivers state in the Niger delta. The military is trying to obtain a precise location and launch an attack. But MEND has learned to move around. With all the money the rebels obtain from stealing oil and kidnapping, they can afford lots of fast boats, and cash to pay for local accommodations wherever they need to go. While MEND is making little progress in their campaign to be more government money to improve the lives of people in the Niger delta, the rebels continue to grow rich from criminal activities, and react particularly violently if the military interferes with oil theft and oil smuggling. Mostly, MEND steals from the rich and gives to the wicked.

January 23, 2009: In the Niger delta, pirates attacked two oil company boats. In both cases, the gunmen in speedboats looted the captured ships and robbed the crews. There was no attempt to hold the captured ships for ransom, because the pirates have no secure base where they can stash hijacked ships.

January 31, 2009: The rebel group MEND has declared its ceasefire over, and threatens to shut down oil production if the government does not release their leader, and withdraw military forces from the Niger delta. The government won't, and MEND won't. But MEND might try.

Increased attacks on oil company ships has reduced the rate at which oil can be pumped. Last year, there were 68 attacks on offshore oil facilities (ships and rigs), In 2007, there were 31. In addition to the greater police and military presence in the area, the oil companies have increased their own security spending (which has increased oil production expenses by 30 percent in the last few years), to about $3 billion a year (for civilian security guards and security systems.) As a result, oil companies have delayed drilling more offshore wells. Thus the Niger delta unrest has not only cut current production by 20 percent, but prevented expansion of potential production.

February 3, 2009: Gangs are now targeting key Nigerian employees of oil companies, and kidnapping them. Ransoms of $50,000-100,0000 are demanded, and the oil companies pay in order to maintain morale among their skilled Nigerian workers. Foreign oil company employees are heavily guarded, as are foreigners in general. So more Nigerians are being taken. Recently, a Catholic priest was grabbed, which was a first for the Niger delta. Clergy are usually left alone. But crime in general is on the increase in the delta, as money from stealing oil puts guns into the hands of more young men.

February 5, 2009: At 3 AM, two boats of gunmen attacked an oil company security boat, killing the boat commander (a retired army officer) and wounding another crew member. The two attacking boats then retreated when the security boat returned fire. The need for private security forces has increased oil company operating costs to the point where many foreign firms will simply not consider working in Nigeria.

February 6, 2009: MEND rebels attacked a natural gas plant in the Niger delta. Three attackers and one soldier were wounded. MEND had said it would resume such attacks after the recent end of its ceasefire.

February 10, 2009: An army patrol found 22 barges full of stolen oil hidden in a Niger delta backwater, waiting for boats to haul the oil to a neighboring country for sale. The loss of these barges will cost the oil theft gang involved over a million dollars. But this seizure is a rare event. Most of the stolen oil is still getting out of the country. The military and police are accused of ineptitude and corruption, as reasons for the oil theft continuing.

In the Niger delta itself, security forces repulsed a MEND attempt to attack an oil production facility.

February 17, 2009: Two boatloads of Nigerian gunmen attacked the seaside presidential mansion in neighboring Equatorial Guinea. Security guards repulsed the attack, and captured 16 of the attackers. Such attacks are increasingly common, mainly because Equatorial Guinea is just 200 kilometers from the Niger delta, and Nigerian criminal gangs are increasingly coming across the water to raid and plunder. The presidential palace attackers are said to belong to MEND, but MEND denies this. It may have been MEND members moonlighting, a not uncommon event.

February 18, 2009: In the Niger delta, security guard repulsed a MEND attack on an employee housing compound.

Although the government found $2 billion in stolen (by former dictator Abacha) government funds in Swiss bank accounts, and convinced the Swiss to give the money back, most of the cash remains in Switzerland. That's because the $290 million that has been returned so far, appears to have disappeared. The Swiss believe that the recovered stolen money is being stolen again, and will not resume payouts until assured that the money will be put to legitimate uses.

The army has ordered courts martial for officers in charge of security during a December 20 attack on a Niger delta housing compound for oil company personnel. An investigation revealed that the officers completely failed to take charge of the defense of the ALSCON facility.

Government corruption and inefficiency manifested themselves recently when a local drug company was caught shipping teething medicine for infants that contained an industrial chemical. So far, 84 infants have died. The government recalled all the medicine, or at least tried to, and about a dozen people were arrested. There is a longer term problem, in the north, where Islamic conservatives continue to discourage parents from allowing their children to be vaccinated against polio. As a result, about half the polio cases on the planet occur in Nigeria. This resistance to vaccination (which some Islamic conservatives insist is really a Western plot to sterilize Moslem children) has stymied the planet wide effort (costing over $5 billion so far) to eradicate polio (which can only exist in a human host).

Employees of the oil companies, and their families, are also increasingly favored targets of kidnappers. You don't get as large a ransom from these working stiffs, but you don't run into as much security, or risk of a large scale police reaction. Ransoms for these victims are usually $100,000 or less. There have been so many kidnappings among oil company employees (Nigerian and foreign), that the Nigerian employees have threatened to strike. Management pointed out that there is great demand for oil company jobs (in a region of high unemployment and low pay), and the strike threat faded. The union leadership backed down, but many of the workers walked out for three days as a "warning" anyway.

February 20, 2009: Kidnappings are on the increase, and the targets tend to be the families of corrupt former government officials. The kidnappers know these families have money, and no longer have access to government security forces to provide guards for family members. Women and children are increasingly favored as victims. You can threaten to rape female captives, to encourage payment, and children are easier to handle and more likely to get a prompt payment. Ransoms of over a million dollars are common here. This is a more dangerous way to make money than stealing oil from pipelines, but the payoffs are larger. The number of criminal gangs is increasing, because of the growing number of lucrative opportunities. While the government has sent thousands of additional police and military personnel to the Delta, most of those are being used to supplement the private security (often former police and military) guarding government and oil company facilities.

February 21, 2009: In the northern city of Bauchi. Moslems and Christians attacked each other, burning down three mosques, 14 churches and several hundred homes and businesses. At least 15 people were killed and over a hundred wounded. Nearly 5,000 were forced to flee their homes.

The violence is basically caused by politicians and tribal leaders using religious differences to increase their power. Fearful people are more prone to strongly support their political leaders. Another reason for the violence is the attempt by Moslems to impose religious (Sharia) law in the north. Sharia is seen as an antidote for the endemic corruption (it isn't), and Moslems try to impose many Sharia rules on Christians.

In the south, well armed (from stealing oil) gangs went to war over sports. Fans of different football (soccer) teams used firearms against each other, leaving at least 13 dead and dozens wounded.

February 27, 2009: The army has found and destroyed another rebel camp hidden in the tangle of waterways that make up the Niger river delta. The military has become more active and aggressive in patrolling the many waterways in the delta, making it more difficult for the rebels to launch attacks, and move stolen (from ruptured pipelines) oil.

March 4, 2009: Another ex-state governor has been arrested for corruption (stealing $171 million in state funds). In fact, the government is just going through the motions with its anti-corruption campaign. The dozens of arrested officials end up being fined a small percentage of what they stole, and set free to enjoy their plundered millions.

Piracy is a growing problem. In 2006, there were nine attacks on ships for the entire year. But there have been more than nine ships attacked so far this year. Large fishing boats, coastal freighters and oil company boats are all targets. The oil company boats tend to have armed guards, but the others do not. In the pirates just robbed the crew and carried off any portable gear. Now they are holding ships for ransom. The navy has been tied up dealing with tribal rebels in the Niger delta, and protecting oil facilities. This gives the pirates a free ride along the rest of the coast.

The government sent more police and soldiers to Bauchi, to take over from local police, who tend to be partisan (side with the Moslem rioters). A curfew was imposed and peace restored. This is the usual drill, and the violence will occur again in the future.

March 8, 2009: The war between tribal rebels and the military in the Niger delta oil region, is going against the rebels. The military, police and private security have been sufficient to repel rebel attacks on oil facilities. The rebels and oil thieves have not been happy with this new efficiency by the security forces. In retaliation, the oil stealing gangs are blowing up pipelines, just to interrupt oil shipments.

March 16, 2009: For the second time in four days, several boatloads of gunmen attacked a oil facility in the Niger Delta. These facilities are well guarded, and these attacks usually just result in a lot of gunfire, and some bullet damage. But the bullets, and the growing kidnapping activity, make it increasingly difficult to recruit foreign technicians to keep the oil flowing. Even with a growing global recession, Nigeria has a reputation as a lawless place where the risk isn't worth whatever the oil companies are paying. At least not for the people with the skills that are needed.

March 21, 2009: A oil services boat was attacked by two pirate boats and 30 pirates. The four foreigners running the oil services boat were kidnapped.

March 22, 2009: An oil pipeline had to be shut down because of sabotage, or oil thieves getting sloppy while drilling into the pipe to steal oil.

Growing shortages of petroleum products in the Niger Delta are largely the result of delivery pipelines being shut down because of the damage done by thieves drilling holes. Thus the petroleum products must be delivered by barge or tanker. These vessels must be closely guarded, as they are prime targets for gangs of bandits.

After six years of rising polio cases in the north, Islamic conservatives are on the defensive, and no longer openly discouraging parents from allowing their children to be vaccinated against polio. The problem began in 2003, when some conservative Moslem clerics in the north decided that the polio vaccinations (administered by putting a drop of vaccine on the tongue) were actually a plot to make Moslem women sterile and to spread AIDS. Thousands of kids did not get vaccinated. After a year of that, about half the polio cases on the planet occurred in Nigeria. This resistance to vaccination has stymied the planet wide effort (costing over $5 billion so far) to eradicate polio (which can only exist in a human host). But if the Islamic clerics continue their support for vaccinations for a few years, the disease could be completely destroyed.

Many of the gangs in the Niger Delta have been tamed by the payment of monthly "allowances." But the current global recession, and decline in oil prices, has led to a sharp reduction in the amount of money available to bribe gangsters to behave. So the Bayelsa state government has requested more troops be sent, as the seven gang camps that have been receiving the $700,000 in monthly allowances, will soon not be getting them, and the thousands of gunmen will not be happy.

The lawlessness is common throughout the country, spurred by high unemployment, an abundance of attractive consumer goods on sale for those with jobs, and a shortage of well trained, incorruptible police. In response to this, there have been more vigilante groups appearing. Some of these hunt down and punish (torture or kill) known criminals. Other vigilante groups are officially recognized, sometimes receiving a few days training from the police. These vigilantes turn captured criminals over to the police, with the unspoken threat that the vigilantes will impose their own form of justice if the courts do not. The vigilantes have reduced crime in many parts of the country. But not in the chaotic and violent Niger Delta oil region. And in places where the vigilantes succeed, corruption often eventually weakens the volunteer groups, and destroys their effectiveness.

March 23, 2009: The oil stealing gangs in the Niger Delta are increasing their attacks on the military, in response to unusually high police and military activity against the oil gangs last month. What really has the oil bandits stirred up was the loss of 24 barges last month, to navy and army raids on oil gang operations. While the military crackdown in the Niger Delta has been going on for five years, bribes, stealth and intimidation have limited the success of the military. But lately, pressure from politicians and the media has motivated the troops to actually do some damage on the oil theft gangs. And now the gangsters vow to strike back.

March 25, 2009: China has agreed to replace, at no cost, a communications satellite it launched for Nigeria in 2007. The satellite failed a year later. This is largely a good will gesture, and avoids a legal battle over whether China should pay. China has been developing economic ties in Nigeria, and throughout Africa. Unlike Western countries, China will do whatever it takes to obtain resources and economic opportunities, and the generally corrupt African officials like that just fine.

March 28, 2009: In an increasingly common event, police freed a foreign worker from a kidnapping gang. The Lebanese construction worker had been held outside Lagos by a criminal gang. Six of the kidnappers died fighting the police raiders. While MEND and the oil gangs also kidnap, they have more secure facilities to stash their victims.

The government has proposed amnesty for the Delta rebels, but most of the gangs there, especially MEND, turned down the offer. MEND wants autonomy, and more oil money. The local politicians don't like the idea of being replaced, or at least having to compete with, a new bunch of populist politicians, and support trying to defeat the gangs. There are no clear winners one can see, and it's a bloody and expensive stalemate. This is especially true as rebel activity still keeps over 20 percent of potential oil exports from leaving the country. That, plus the falling price of oil, has meant less money for the rest of the country, and politicians nation-wide. The government is trying to break this deadlock by giving the JTF more money, and more authority, in the Niger Delta. Many politicians have been able to get their own gangsters exempted from JTF raids, but this will be ending. Throughout the country, politicians are patrons of criminal gangs which, during elections, do street level dirty work to ensure that their patron gets elected, or re-elected. A lot of the stolen (by politicians) government funds goes to pay off these gangs. This is not a unique situation. Saddam Hussein, and many other dictators, had street gangs on the payroll. Even the Soviet Union, one of the more "professional" police states, had many gangsters working for the secret police.

Meanwhile, the JTF (Defense Ministry Joint Task Force) is going after the large oil stealing gangs, including at least one operated by a former army general. The JTF is not large enough to shut all the gangs down any time soon, and is accused of taking bribes to leave some criminal operations alone. That is unproven, but certainly possible considering the amount of money in play in the delta and past performance of police and army units there.

April 3, 2009: A government committee, set up last year to study all past studies of the Niger Delta problems, has reported its findings. Not surprisingly, it advocates more oil money for the Niger Delta (25 percent, up from the current 13 percent), and that more jobs be allocated for the unemployed young men (who otherwise tend to become criminals). It was also suggested that MEND rebel leader Henry Okah be granted bail, and an open trial on treason (rather than the secret one now planned). Okah is very popular, although he is also a gangster and, if elected as a state (there are several states in the Niger Delta) governor, he would likely be as corrupt as past governors. Thus allocating more oil money to the Niger Delta states would probably just mean more for the local officials to steal. The main problem has always been the corruption that prevents government revenue (mostly from oil), from getting to the people.

April 5, 2009: The U.S. State Department warned that there might be attacks on diplomatic targets in Lagos. Rebels in the Niger Delta denied being the cause of these warnings.

April 6, 2009: In the Niger Delta city of Port Harcourt, kidnappers grabbed a British citizen, killing the policeman guarding him. Some 80 kilometers off the coast, gunmen attacked and destroyed a pipe laying ship. No one took responsibility.

April 8, 2009: An Italian man was kidnapped in the southeastern town of Abakaliki, outside the oil region.

April 12, 2009: In the central Nigerian towns of Gwada and Minna, mobs of Moslem men attacked Christian Easter activities. This led to a prompt police investigation and the arrest of over a hundred Moslem men. Clashes like this are common in central Nigeria, where many Moslems and Christians live together, but don't get along.

April 14, 2009: In the Delta, rebels attacked an oil facility, killing one sailor, and stealing four speedboats belonging to an oil company. This was believed in retaliation for an earlier navy operation where the rebels had four speedboats sunk. The rebels are mostly concerned with stealing and selling oil, not fighting with the police and military. But in some cases, the rebels take the effects of a military operations personally, and seek revenge.

Kidnapping is a growing crime in the Niger Delta, with about 128 (mostly Nigerians) taken in the last year, and most of them in the Delta. Fewer foreigners have been taken, because of better security. The problem is not huge by world standards, where the number of people taken a year has been over 3,000 (like Colombia, before a recent crackdown greatly reduced that rate).

The military and Delta rebels continue to clash, with the rebels usually being the loser. But the rebels, gangsters and oil thieves are too numerous to wipe out with the security forces available. But the military presence has reduced the attacks on the oil facilities, but a quarter of the national oil production is still shut down because of rebel and criminal activities in the Delta.

April 17, 2009: The government offer of amnesty to Niger River Delta rebels was largely refused by those it was aimed at. The rebels are making good money stealing oil, kidnapping and other criminal enterprises. The police and military are not numerous to destroy the rebels, although damage is being done.

April 18, 2009: In the northern city of Kaduna, a Canadian women, there to attend a Rotary International meeting, was kidnapped at gunpoint and held for ransom. Rotary International is a charitable organization whose members are largely responsible for the $5 billion effort to eradicate polio. That effort has run into problems in northern Nigeria, where conservative Islamic clergy spread the rumor that the polio vaccine was actually a plot to poison Moslem children. This has delayed eradication of polio in Nigeria for the last few years.

April 19, 2009: In the Niger Delta, oil thieves created a leak in an oil pipeline, and local villagers rushed to scoop up oil. But the oil caught fire, and over 40 people died in the inferno.

April 20, 2009: In eastern Anambra, a gang of robbers in three vehicles went on robbery spree, starting on an attack on an armored car, and left over 30 people dead over several hours of shooting, in several locations. Police recovered the bodies of several of the criminals, but most of the robbers got away.

April 21, 2009: A Turkish tanker, the Ilena Mercan, was attacked by pirates off the coast, and two of its officers kidnapped. Unlike Somalia, Nigerian pirates cannot take ships and hold them for ransom, because there is no safe (from the police) port where they can hold the stolen ship. The two officers of the Ilena Mercan were later released, apparently after payment of a ransom.

April 25, 2009: Army troops raided two MEND camps, killed some of the inhabitants (most fled) and destroyed what they found.

April 27, 2009: A military court sentenced 27 soldiers to life in prison, for protesting the theft, by their superiors, of money the UN paid the government for soldiers service as peacekeepers. The four officers who stole the UN funds were prosecuted three months ago, and received much lighter punishment.

April 29, 2009: After 13 days of captivity, the Canadian women kidnapped in the northern city of Kaduna, was freed, and the gang of seven kidnappers arrested. There was great public uproar in the north over the kidnapping, as the organization the woman represented, Rotary International, had long operated charitable efforts in Nigeria.

A bribery trial in the U.S. led to convictions, and the admission that the American firm, KBR, paid $180 million in bribes to Nigerian government officials between 1995 and 2004, to facilitate the construction of a $6 billion gas liquefaction plant. Some of the bribed officials are still in office, and the government has demonstrated great reluctance in pursuing the matter. In comparison, kidnapping is believed to have yielded about $100 million in ransoms over the past three years.

The army has responded by trying to make it more difficult for highly visible gangs in the Niger Delta, like MEND, to operate openly. Camps, and other locations where MEND members openly congregate, are being raided by platoon or company size units of heavily armed troops, and MEND has not got the numbers, firepower or training to resist that kind of force. But the larger and better organized gangs have taken to ambushing army and navy patrols. The patrols usually consist of one speedboat, or slightly larger craft, with half a dozen soldiers or sailors on board. While heavily armed, the military personnel can be overwhelmed by four or five speedboats full of gunmen. So far, these attempts to wipe out patrols have been thwarted by the better discipline and accuracy of the soldier's fire. But it's getting more dangerous for the military in the thousands of kilometers of May 2, 2009: Despite the thousands of additional police, soldiers and sailors sent to the Delta region, most of these security personnel are assigned to guarding oil facilities. The dozens of gangs that have grown prosperous stealing oil, are free to rape, rob and kidnap without much fear of capture. Kidnappers have a large number of wealthy targets, including retired politicians and army officers (especially generals, who get the most bribes). The military, as a result, is under a lot of pressure to do something about the growing crime rate. waterways in the Niger Delta.

May 13, 2009: In the Niger Delta, local rebel group MEND gave foreign oil companies in the area 24 hours to evacuate their staff, or face attack and more kidnappings. MEND is reacting to increasing army and police attacks on MEND camps, and the arrest and killing of MEND members. Pirates also captured two ships near the delta coast. MEND has made these demands before, and the oil companies don't take them seriously.

May 15, 2009: MEND has given the oil companies another deadline (until tomorrow) to evacuate the oil fields. The oil companies continue to ignore MEND. In the last two days, the army says it has killed over 200 MEND rebels, during attacks on MEND camps.

May 16, 2009: MEND said they had blown up two pipelines. The oil companies have repair crews ready for this sort of thing, as there are numerous instances of pipeline damage from oil thieves punching holes in the pipelines. Even blown up portions of pipelines are quickly repaired.

While the violence in the Niger Delta oilfields gets most of the headlines, an outbreak of meningitis has killed over 2,000 Nigerians in the last few months. Many more healthy Nigerians die from a wide variety of curable diseases and avoidable accidents. Local groups in the Niger Delta, like MEND, have escalated the war by threatening any Moslem northerners working in the oil region. This could trigger violence against Christian southerners living in the north.

The violence in the Niger Delta has made it difficult for the country to meet its OPEC quota of 1.67 million barrels a day. Shipments are now closer to 1.5 million barrels a day, and have recently dipped to 1.2 million barrels a day, as repair teams rushed to fix pipelines damaged by oil thieves and militants. If there was no violence and large scale oil theft, Nigeria should be able to ship 2.5 million barrels a day.

May 19, 2009: In the last week, the army has destroyed two gang (rebel group MEND) camps, killed over 200 gangsters (and several times as many civilian bystanders as well). The army likes to keep its casualties down, so it uses helicopter gunships (or just transport helicopters armed with a machine-gun or two), and lots of long range machine-gun fire by ground troops. The army has more firepower than MEND or the gangsters, and always wins. With their camps, and most of their possessions, gone, many of the organized gangsters have fled and gone freelance. The crime rate will decline somewhat, but there's still too much money to be made stealing oil from punctured pipelines. Shipping more oil does not help most Nigerians, since corrupt politicians continue to steal most of the oil revenue that flows to the government.

May 20, 2009: The army and navy continue their offensive against gangs in the Niger Delta oil fields. Troops began attacking gang hideouts in the coastal town of Warri. Most of those living along the coast belong to the Ijaw tribe, and tribal leaders are complaining that the anti-gang operations are basically ethnic cleansing of the Ijaw.

May 26, 2009: Another MEND camp in the Niger Delta was found and destroyed by the military. The rebels have been trying to attack oil facilities, but are being defeated by the security detachments assigned by the military and civilian security firms.

May 27, 2009: In the Niger Delta Bayelsa state, police captured and turned a MEND leader, Ken Niweigha, who was then killed in the crossfire as he led police to a MEND safe house.

Military operations in the last few weeks have caused about 10,000 civilians to flee their homes. The violence has further cut oil production to less than 1.5 million barrels a day. A few years ago, before the attacks became more frequent three years ago, production was 2.5 million barrels a day. This is causing the government to lose about $60 million a day in revenue. The theoretical production capacity of Nigeria is 3.2 million barrels a day.

May 28, 2009: Since the 15th, the oil stealing gangs in the Niger Delta have declared war on the military, in reaction to the growing number of raids on gang camps. The military has succeeded partly because they have recruited many useful civilian informants. This is done by letting people know that if they provide information where the gangs are based, there will be less damage, and injuries, to nearby civilians when the troops go in. These raids have not only killed or captured hundreds of gang members in the last few weeks, but have freed dozens of foreign and Nigerian kidnapping victims. The informants are useful in urban areas, but for rural hideouts, civilians are much less willing to talk, and the troops have to search the thousands of kilometers of waterways in the Delta. This is done largely by boat, because many of the camps are hidden, by the forest, from air reconnaissance. The military offensive has been relentless, with a new camp (often quite small, like an early warning outpost) every day. MEND, which still finances itself by stealing oil, is being forced to fight for survival.

May 29, 2009: The government again offered amnesty for rebels in the Niger Delta. Again, MEND, the principal rebel group, rejected the amnesty offer.

May 31, 2009: Troops destroyed another MEND camp near Buguma creek in Rivers State of the Niger Delta. In the last month, the military has found and destroyed about one camp a week. Up until now, MEND has been defiant after each such defeat. But now the rebels are offering to negotiate a ceasefire. MEND denies that the loss of the camps is hurting them, but MEND fighters are suffering morale problems. All this army and navy activity.

June 1, 2009: Too many tribes, not enough oil money and too much corruption creates growing violence. The tribes and gangs (both criminal and political) in the oil producing region (the Niger Delta) are getting organized, and a lot more violent. The northern Moslems want more control over the federal government (and the oil money). Local rebels threaten loss of most oil revenue, which is getting the governments attention. The situation is sliding towards regional civil wars, over money and political power. The military has been more active in the oil region (the Niger river delta), and the gangs are not as much of a threat as the gang leaders thought they were. But the violence has cut oil production by over a third.

June 2, 2009: Navy patrol boats were called to rescue three passenger boats captured by MEND rebels near Buguma creek in Rivers State of the Niger Delta. Seven rebels were killed, and their boats and weapons captured.

June 5, 2009: The military destroyed two more MEND camps.

June 6, 2009: MEND has given oil workers (local and foreign) 72 hours to leave their jobs, or risk injury and death. MEND has issued these kinds of threats before, and has never been able to follow up with much more than token violence.

June 7, 2009: In central Nigeria (Plateau state), more tribal violence broke out, leaving at least three dead.

June 8, 2009: The Joint (army-navy-air force) Task Force (JTF) in the Niger Delta believes that a month of intense operations have broken the power of MEND. Maybe, but the major problem in the delta is the oil stealing gangs, who have reduced oil production by about 50 percent over the last four years. While MEND wants justice for the people of the delta, the gangs just want to punch holes in the pipelines, steal the oil and smuggle it out of the country (and sell it). The JTF has damaged some of the oil gangs, and arrested tribal separatist leaders not associated with MEND. But oil production is still down.

June 9, 2009: MEND attacked a pipeline flow station in the Niger Delta, interrupting the flow of 10,000 barrels of oil a day.

June 11, 2009: MEND released a British oil worker, who had been kidnapped and held captive for nine months. The British man was held for so long as MEND was trying to get their leader out of jail in an exchange. The government refused, so MEND got tired of waiting and just let the British man go. In the Niger Delta, MEND blew up an oil pipeline.

June 12, 2009: MEND rebels blew up an oil well and a natural gas pumping station.

June 15, 2009: MEND rebels attack an oil flow station in the Niger Delta.

June 17, 2009: MEND rebels attacked a pipeline in the Niger Delta. MEND fighters were apparently encountered near the Cameroon border. In the northern city of Kano, a Ukrainian cargo aircraft landed to refuel, and police found it carrying a cargo of weapons, apparently headed for Equatorial Guinea. The aircraft was coming from Croatia, and police impounded it to double check documents (which appeared to be in order.) The police want to make sure the weapons are not really headed for Nigerian rebels or gangsters.

Yet another parliamentary commission is investigating corruption, and this time has let loose accountants to audit where all the oil money has gone in the last decade (since the dictatorship was overthrown and democracy restored in 1999.) Some embarrassing details are getting out, but it remains to be seen if names will be named, along with the amounts they stole.

The government is trying to put more pressure on China to halt the growing number of counterfeit goods being exported to Nigeria. A recent case involved a shipment of fake malaria drugs, labeled as "Made In India." Marking the drugs as "Made In China" labels is avoided, because Nigerians have already become wary of fake good from China, where the government has had little success in halting the counterfeiters. As in Nigeria, corruption is the big problem in China, as the counterfeiters pay off government officials. Diplomatic and legal pressure has forced the counterfeiters to increasingly stay away from Western nations, so they are joining the flood of goods headed for Africa.

June 19, 2009: MEND attacks on oil facilities have, in the last few weeks, halted production of about 100,000 barrels of oil a day. The increase in MEND attacks has been prompted by the military offensive against MEND camps five weeks ago. In effect, MEND has been forced to show they are still alive, or else be seen as on the run and defeated. Actually, MEND is on the run, because the government operations are interfering with the oil stealing activities that have sustained the armed gangs in the Delta. The military considers MEND a bunch of gangsters and oil thieves. While that's true, many locals see MEND as legitimate rebels. Meanwhile, most of the military operations in the last month have been against the oil theft gang led by Government Tompolo. This guy has been responsible for more oil losses than MEND (which is basically a smaller oil theft operation with a political agenda on the side.) MEND is also a coalition of several groups, some more gangster, or more political, than the other. The MEND attacks interrupt some of the oil shipments, but not all, and the government can live with that.

June 19, 2009: MEND claims another pipeline destroyed in the Niger Delta, along with the capture of seven soldiers they encountered.

June 21, 2009: MEND claims three attacks on oil facilities, resulting in 185,000 barrels a day not getting shipped.

June 22, 2009: Several hundred oil company workers have been evacuated from facilities threatened by MEND attack.

June 25, 2009: The government offered a new amnesty deal to Niger Delta rebels. Many rebels will not accept it. The reason is the way it is worded. For example; " The unconditional pardon granted pursuant to this proclamation shall extend to all persons presently being prosecuted for offences associated with militant activities" still allows people to be prosecuted for crimes not associated with "militant activities." Amnesty offers to Niger Delta rebels are often refused because some of those who came forward to accept the amnesty, were arrested anyway (either by corrupt cops, or because there were other crimes, outside the amnesty offer, that some rebels were wanted for.) Many of the current Delta rebels were, or still are, gangsters of long duration.

June 26, 2009: World oil prices rose to over $71 a barrel because of increased attacks on Nigerian oil facilities in the Niger Delta.

Oil production is down by over a million barrels a day, because of MEND attacks on pipelines, and now two Nigerian oil refineries have shut down because their supply of oil has been halted by a MEND attack. The government cannot guard all the pipelines, because there are so many of them.

Some rebel groups were quick to accept the amnesty, but MEND is holding out for a larger agreement. This has split the Ijaw tribes, who are a majority group in the Delta. Many Ijaw want to accept the amnesty in order to stop all the violence, but many in MEND will only settle for more oil money, not more empty promises.

July 3, 2009: Leaders of most of the Niger Delta rebels have agreed to discuss with the government how the most recent amnesty offer will be implemented. The government also offered to release MEND leader Henry Okah, if he accepts the amnesty. Previously, the government had refused MEND demands that Okah be released. MEND, however, refuses to participate in an amnesty deal without also taking care of the needs of the Niger Delta population, who live in poverty and pollution amidst all the oil wealth. The government says the amnesty will run from August 4 to October 6. During that time, the government and rebels can negotiate the precise terms of the deal, and take or reject it.

July 4, 2009: The latest round of attacks on pipelines and pumping stations has halted movement of a million barrels a day of oil. This puts the government under a lot of pressure to make a deal. This is even more urgent because the government has just signed on to help build (with Niger and Algeria) a $10 billion natural gas pipeline from the Niger River Delta to Algeria, for shipment to Europe. MEND threatens to sabotage this project unless the government pays off the rebels and improves conditions in the delta.

July 5, 2009: Rebels attacked a major oil pumping facility in the Niger Delta. Meanwhile, about 30 kilometers offshore, a chemical tanker was attacked by rebels in speedboats. The disruptions to oil production operations has put over 10,000 oil workers out of work.

July 8, 2009: MEND has continued its attacks on pipelines, setting off bombs at key locations in the pipeline network that takes the oil to loading sites for tankers.

July 9, 2009: The navy has recovered a chemical tanker that MEND gunmen seized four days ago. While MEND has not accepted the government's amnesty offer, some armed men in the Delta are willing to do it now. The amnesty terms have been left a bit vague, but generally involve the government paying hundreds of dollars to men who turn in a weapon and promise to behave. The number of those eligible for amnesty is put at 10,000-20,000. But more knowledgeable analysts believe that the actual number of MEND gunmen is less than a thousand, and perhaps only a few hundred.

July 10, 2009: Jailed MEND leader Henry Okah has accepted the government amnesty offer. In his case, this means he would soon be freed from jail (after two years), which has long been a MEND demand. Meanwhile, MEND claims to have destroyed a pipeline section that they had just been repaired (after an earlier attack). This was done to show that the security forces could not stop MEND from cutting the pipelines that take oil to tankers offshore. MEND said they waited until repairs were completed before blowing up the pipeline again.

July 13, 2009: MEND leader Henry Okah has been freed from jail after accepting the government amnesty. All charges were withdrawn. Just before this happened, MEND fighters attacked an oil facility inside Lagos (the largest city in the Niger Delta), and blew up a loading dock. At least five sailors guarding the facility were killed trying to stop the MEND group. The problem with the military operations against MEND was that, while MEND camps could be found and attacked, MEND members also had access to the homes and commercial buildings owned by supportive friends, family and tribal allies. MEND could thus hide speedboats, guns and explosives, and still make attacks on the pipelines and oil loading facilities.

July 14, 2009: MEND leader Henry Okah told the government that MEND attacks would continue until the government negotiated a better economic deal for the people in the delta.

July 15, 2009: MEND declared a 60 day truce so that peace negotiations with the government could be conducted. In response, the military called off their operations (mainly searching for MEND camps and safe houses.) MEND later complained that some military units had apparently not gotten the message.

The four decades of theft have left the national infrastructure (roads, water supplies, power production, etc) in ruins. There is a very real fear that even if MEND gets a large concession out of the government (as in 25 percent of oil revenue), the MEND leaders and the politicians will steal most of it. It's suspected that this has already started, as government officials are talking about up to 20,000 rebels participating in the amnesty program (and receiving over $1,000, plus some other benefits.) But people who have been watching this rebellion regularly believe that there are, at most, a few thousand armed gangsters and "rebels" in the Delta, and that the amnesty is shaping up as another scam where government officials will walk away with most of the money (over $120 million has been allocated for amnesty expenses). Unless there is a dramatic change in government behavior, this amnesty program and peace negotiation will fail, and the fighting will resume before the end of the year.

In the last 38 years, the government has earned over a trillion dollars ($1,190 billion) in oil revenue, most of which has been stolen or misused. This corruption is the main cause of the unrest in the country, especially the oil producing areas. Since 1980, the poverty rate (the percentage of people living on less than $400 a year) has gone from 28 percent to over 60 percent today. About five percent of the population lives on over $1,000 a year, and these are usually connected with the corrupt politicians who have stolen all that oil wealth. For over four decades, the oil money has been going to about twenty percent of the population, leaving most of the rest worse off today than they were half a century ago, before the oil was discovered. The people in the Niger Delta are up in arms because most of them have not benefited from the oil production, but have suffered from the oil spills and other disruptions that accompany oil drilling and shipping.

July 20, 2009: The government and the MEND rebels have two months to implement an amnesty and negotiate a peace deal. Currently, the government in the Niger Delta gets 13 percent of oil income. the oil producing region only contains fifteen percent of the nation's population. MEND wants more of that money, at least 25 percent. Moreover, MEND wants most, if not nearly all, of the money to actually get to the people in the Niger Delta. That is not likely to happen.

July 26, 2009: There has been another outbreak of pro-Taliban violence in the Moslem north. It all began with a group of "Nigerian Taliban" attacked a police station, apparently with the intention of stealing weapons and police equipment. The police defeated that attack, leaving 42 dead. More attacks against government buildings and Christians (churches and businesses), followed. The Islamic radicals belong to a group called Boko Haram (translates as "Western education is sinfull"), which is following in the footsteps of an earlier group called Al Sunna wal Jamma. But many young Nigerians, angry at the corruption and resulting economic malaise (and unemployment) have joined in the violence, and some light looting.

All this has happened before. The pro-Taliban Al Sunna wal Jamma group was founded five years ago by Moslem university students, apparently with some foreign money. But it was mostly just another expression of the Islamic radicalism that was becoming popular up north. This movement pushed the imposition of Sharia (Islamic) law in the north, as a means of dealing with the corruption in government, and society in general. Many northern states actually switched to Sharia law, but the corruption remained, now cloaked in Islamic rectitude. Thus the Islamic radical movements survived, but were unable to muster the armed strength to take on the police or army. The last flare up was in late 2007. Earlier that year, a northern newspaper editor had been caught taking $300,000 in payments from Sudanese sources, to publish pro-Islamic radical material. There have been few attempts by Islamic radicals to move into Nigeria, and all have failed so far. The government has generally ignored the religious activities of the "Nigerian Taliban", and their efforts to get people to live a righteous, austere, Moslem lifestyle. That don't really fly in Nigeria, much to the frustration of local Islamic radicals. An armed uprising in 2004 left several hundred dead, and the Nigerian Taliban broken, but not entirely destroyed. The current violence is their attempt at a comeback.

July 27, 2009: The fighting against the pro-Taliban radicals in the north continues, with over a hundred dead and many more wounded and arrested. Thousands of civilians, mainly Christians, have fled the violence. The Islamic radicals have been a constant, but not particularly threatening, problem in the north for years. To date, the biggest problem caused by the Islamic radicals was their halting of the polio eradication campaign several years ago (by spreading the rumor that the polio vaccine was actually part of a Western conspiracy to sterilize Moslem children.) This caused the polio to spread again in Nigeria, and several other countries. Thousands of additional Nigerian children got the disease, and hundreds were crippled or killed. Most parents figured out what was going on, and the vaccinations were allowed to continue. Although discredited by this, the Islamic radicals were undeterred, and have now gambled big on establishing an Islamic state by force.

July 28, 2009: The violence in the north has died down, with the arrival of more police and troops and the imposition of a curfew.

July 29, 2009: The most recent attacks have cut Nigeria's oil production nearly in half (from a potential 3.2 million barrels a day to an actual 1.8 million.) This has gotten the attention of the government, which depends on oil revenue for most of its income. For over a year, actual production had been 2.4 million barrels, and the government thought it could defeat the rebels in the Niger Delta. But the rebellion, against the corruption, and declining living standards in the delta, kept growing. The violence was financed by tapping into pipelines and stealing oil (which was consolidated on small tankers or barges and smuggled into neighboring countries for sale.) The growing violence in the delta has led to a general rise in crime. Kidnapping has become particularly popular, with a doubling of the rate this year (500 so far, nationwide) compared to last year. Kidnapping is seen as a Robin Hood thing, with the families of corrupt businessmen and government officials being popular targets. Robberies are up as well, and these are directed at anyone who has any wealth (a bike, a car, an iPod). The rising crime has further discouraged investment by Nigerians or foreigners, thus further depressing the economy in the Niger Delta. The current ceasefire with the rebels is supposed to result in some meaningful reform. But that has rarely happened in the past, and is not likely to happen now, despite the great need for some big changes.

July 30, 2009: Mohammed Yusuf, leader of the Boko Haram sect, was captured and killed by police in the northern city of Maiduguri (the capital of Borno state). Yousuf was said to have been killed while trying to escape custody. He died with handcuffs on. About 800 of Yusuf's followers, civilians caught in the crossfire, and initial victims of the radical's attacks, were killed. Police and troops moved quickly to crush the Taliban-like Islamic radical group, and the violence was over in about a week. Nearly 4,000 people fled their homes during the fighting.

In the Niger Delta oil region, the amnesty program for anti-government rebels begins today. While this may reduce the violence for a while, it does not address the core problems (government corruption, and officials who steal the oil money and leave most Nigerians in the delta with nothing, except the pollution and disruption of the oil fields.) Most of the MEND rebels are merely complying with a 60 day ceasefire, and waiting for the government actually do something for a change. There is not a lot of optimism about the government.

The government has ordered an investigation into the high (about 800 people) death toll from the Boko Haram attacks, and the security forces response. Meanwhile, police are still seeking out Boko Haram members. It's believed that over a hundred Boko Haram followers are still out there, including some of the leaders. Many clerics in the north believe that organizations like Boko Haram will rebuild, and make another attempt to drive out the police and corrupt politicians. People throughout the country are angry at the corruption and inefficient government. But in the north, many Moslems believe that imposition of Sharia (Islamic law) will solve the problem. It won't, and it hasn't where it has been tried. But the belief persists, with some Islamic conservatives clinging to the idea that more Sharia will eventually work. But lots of Sharia is unpopular, among most Moslems, as well as nearly all non-Moslems.

Most northerners oppose Boko Haram, which is a Taliban-like organization that believes Western education and lifestyle must go and a religious dictatorship established in Nigeria, to deal with the corruption and crime. Nigerians agree on the need to deal with criminals in government, and on the street, but not at the cost of their freedom.

August 6, 2009: In the north, over fifty Moslem clerics complained that they had repeatedly complained to the government and police about Boko Haram, but were ignored. The police insist that they were monitoring the radical group, but missed any indications that attacks were planned, at least for a specific date (July 26th).

August 7, 2009: MEND sent 32 leaders to meet with the Nigerian president, to confirm the truce, and warn the president that past deals like this had failed because corrupt officials failed to carry out government promises. In the north, police continued to seek out Boko Haram members, and arrested fifty suspects.

August 8, 2009: A group calling itself the Ughievwen Youth Body Fighters, blew up a natural gas pipeline in the Niger Delta.

August 9, 2009: A new rebel group, the NDPF (Niger Delta Patriotic Front) has been formed in the Niger Delta. The NDPF is out to destroy the criminal organizations that have made life worse for everyone in the delta. In other words, the NDPF is a vigilante organization, that will attempt to do what the generally corrupt and inept police cannot do. Similar vigilante groups have been formed in other parts of the country before, but have eventually become corrupt themselves.

August 13, 2009: In the Niger Delta, a natural gas plant was blown up by someone (no one has claimed credit). This plant supplied fuel for electric power generation, and this has resulted in a sharp drop in the availability of electric power in the area.

The largest city in the delta, Port Harcourt, is threatened with large scale violence as police begin to evict several hundred thousand people from prime waterfront property (to allow for new construction.) Courts have halted the evictions, but the process is going ahead anyway. To most Nigerians, it appears that bribes have been paid and the fix is in. But this time, the unrest in the city is widespread, and could escalate into violence.

August 14, 2009: Some MEND factions are accusing the military of continuing to launch attacks on them. The military denies this, and refuses to pull their patrols out of the creeks that crisscross the delta. Moreover, few rebels are showing up at the demobilization centers to turn in their weapons, take the loyalty (to the government) pledge and get paid. The process is less than two weeks old, and there have already been several clashes between police and rebels, and one rebel leader (albeit an unpopular one) has been killed. Several others have been arrested, under false pretenses.

August 16, 2009: In the Niger Delta, a small passenger boat was attacked by pirates, who robbed the passengers. The pirates said they were hungry, as the recent military offensive in the area had destroyed their homes and businesses.

August 23, 2009: Although a thousand MEND members have turned in their weapons and equipment (including 16 speedboats.). But most MEND leaders insist that the amnesty program is a fraud, will not work, and that the fighting will resume soon (after the ceasefire expires on September 15th).

In western Nigeria, police have arrested and questioned 3,900 members of another Islamic conservative group; Darul Salam. After than 300 members of Daryl Salam were deported to neighboring Niger. Meanwhile, police continue to round up members of Boko Haram, and at least 30 of those arrested have confessed to having received terrorist training abroad (in places like Afghanistan.)

The Economic and Financial Crimes Commission (EFCC, the anti-corruption organization) recovered $320 million, and convicted 70 people, in the last year. Another 40 politicians are being prosecuted. But the EFCC has been weakened, as has its work. Much of the recovered money gets stolen again, and many, if not most, of those convicted, manage to bribe their way to freedom. The most recent corruption scandal involves five large banks, which nearly went bankrupt because they allowed lenders to steal billions via bad loans. The government put up $2.5 billion to keep the banks alive. The EFCC recovered $170 million in these fraudulent loans and has arrested 16 bank officials and 60 people who got over $5 billion in fraudulent loans. EFCC is also going after the auditors working for these banks, who are supposed to spot criminal activity and report it. Interpol is assisting in finding, arresting and returning some of the bank officials who managed to flee.

August 28, 2009: In the Niger Delta, the military has retreated from most of the territory it had occupied earlier this year, as remote camps used by rebels and oil theft gangs were raided and closed down. Meanwhile, the army set up 27 camps in the delta, to process rebels who would surrender and accept amnesty. This sort of thing was tried in 2004, and failed.

September 10, 2009: The 60 day amnesty period ends on September 15th, and only a small fraction (less than ten percent) of the armed rebels in the Niger Delta, have turned in their weapons. The relative peace of the amnesty period has enabled the oil companies to repair a lot of rebel damage, and the country is now exporting 1.7 million barrels a day (up from the pre-amnesty low of 1.2 million). But the peace is not expected to last. The rebels who already accepted the amnesty are loudly letting everyone know that the promised cash payments, and "transition training" have not appeared yet. Many rebels believe that the amnesty deal is just another scam, where government officials promise a lot, then steal most of the goodies for themselves.

The Economic and Financial Crimes Commission (EFCC, the anti-corruption organization) is now going after corrupt bankers who facilitated much of the fiscal corruption in the country. Four senior bank officials have been charged, but dozens more have not. Five banks, accounting for 40 percent of the nations banking activity, are under investigation. According to a World Economic Forum survey, Nigeria has slipped in the Global Competitiveness rankings (from 95 to 99, out of 133 nations). Nigeria's low ranking is largely the result of corruption and poor government.

The Niger Delta violence is almost certain to return this month, and anti-corruption efforts are having a minor impact on the thieves in government and business.

September 24, 2009: The government is losing a billion dollars of revenue a month (over a million barrels of oil not shipping each day) as long as the rebels and oil thieves in the Niger Delta continue to exist. This gets the governments attention, but not necessarily enough to produce a workable solution. The amnesty deal, which has an October 4th deadline (to surrender and get paid) is being ignored by most of the rebels. They want more money, and they want further benefits guaranteed. The rebels believe, with some justification, that most of the amnesty benefits will be stolen by corrupt officials. That's what usually happens with government benefit programs, and the amnesty program seems headed in the same direction. Several rebel leaders are demanding that the amnesty deadline be extended three months and peace talks commence to insure that terms of any deal are met. The rebels do not trust the government to deal with them honestly, and are willing to keep fighting if a mutually agreeable deal is not negotiated, and carried out.

A rapidly growing Nigerian export are sex slaves. Young women are deceived or coerced into being smuggled into Europe or the Persian Gulf to work in brothels. Several thousand women are shipped north each year, up from a few hundred per annum a few years ago. The smuggling gangs find that sex slaves are more profitable than drugs and guns, and entail less risk from the police.

In an attempt to curb oil theft, the government is now demanding that all ships in coastal waters carry an AIS (Automatic Identification System), which is similar to the transponders that all commercial (and many private) aircraft carry to identify them to ground controllers. International treaties mandate AIS for all oceangoing (300 gross tons or more, and all passenger vessels of any size) ships, in international waters. Nigeria wants to crack down on smuggling, particularly oil smuggling, by mandating AIS in their coastal waters. The military would then be able to concentrate on ships without AIS as suspicious and probably up to no good. But the likely outcome that most ship owners will ignore the order. AIS units can be bought for under $1,000 dollars, but that is a lot of money for Nigerian owners of small ships. Meanwhile, the government has ordered the military to use more violence against oil smugglers, who have taken more frequent use of more firepower to escape capture. This is especially true with the small oil tankers and barges that transport the stolen oil to adjacent countries for sale to brokers who will "launder" the oil into the international oil market.

There are still several thousand followers of (now dead or imprisoned) Shia religious radicals in the north. A recent Shia religious celebration turned violent, and at least one worshipper died when the police intervened. Although deprived of their senior leaders, the radical Shia are developing new leadership. But at the moment, there are several factions, with many wannabe leaders maneuvering for the top spot. Some of these factions are believed to be planning more violence. These Nigerian "Taliban" are down, but not gone.

Anti-corruption forces are coming to acknowledge that there will be no quick fix. Right now, most of those who are prosecuted, buy their way out of any serious punishment. Looking at successful anti-corruption efforts in the rest of the world (especially East Asia and Europe), the Nigerians have concluded that it will probably take more than a generation (several decades) of intense effort to clean up the mess in Nigeria.

September 25, 2009: The navy has begun enforcing a six year old law that reserved most coastal shipping jobs for Nigerian ships. In the last two month the navy has seized five foreign tankers it caught moving oil products along the coast. Two foreign ships were pursued, but got away. The foreign ship owners, mainly Indian and Pakistani, claim that their coastal ships are safer, cheaper and more efficient. There's some truth to that, but the sabotage (coastal shipping) law was passed because countries have the right to reserve coastal shipping business for local firms. By providing legitimate work for Nigerian ships, there is less temptation for these ships to get involved in illegal activities (like moving oil stolen from Niger Delta pipelines).

September 26, 2009: The government refused to extend the October 4 amnesty deadline.

September 30, 2009: Rebel groups in the Niger Delta oppose government plans to allow Chinese companies develop new oil fields. The Chinese have a bad reputation in Africa, as they bring in many of their own workers, and accompanying traders drive locals out of business. Chinese efforts to get oil deals in Angola and Libya were recently turned down.

The amnesty effort is another triumph of hope over experience. Success is a possibility, but a slim one based on past performance of the government bureaucracy. The government estimated that there were 10,000 armed rebels out in the delta backwaters, living in 50-60 camps. By this calculation, there are still several thousand outlaws still in play.

Ten percent of more of the 6,000 rebels who have accepted the amnesty, have not been paid their monthly allowances. There have been several demonstrations by the unpaid men, and threats that they would return to violence. The government can keep these guys quiet for a few months, by making the $866 in cash payments to those who accept the amnesty, and provide some job training. But finding jobs for over 6,000 former rebels will be difficult. If attractive jobs are not found, a lot of these fellows are going back to the gangster life. Moreover, if the amnesty does not work, and it probably won't (based on past government performance), making a future amnesty deal work will be much harder. But the government sees that as an acceptable risk, as the current amnesty has crippled MEND, perhaps for several years, and this will allow more oil to flow, and give the government back the billion dollars a month in oil revenue it has been losing.

October 4, 2009: MEND leaders Ateke Tom, Government Tompolo and Farah Dagogo have accepted the amnesty, but MEND has not. Farah Dagogo claims to speak for all of MEND, but there are still several factions out there, containing a thousand or more gunmen, who vow to continue the fighting. But the government forces have not diminished, thus the remaining MEND fighters are at a much greater disadvantage than before.

October 6, 2009: Customs officials discovered and seized a 40 foot cargo container full of weapons. It was apparently intended for some politician, so he could arm the criminal gangs that are used to coerce voters to elect corrupt politicians. The cargo container came from the United States. Four months ago, two small cargo ships full of weapons were seized off the coast, while a third ship escaped. There's big money to be made smuggling weapons into Nigeria, as a large chunk of the oil money stolen goes to buy weapons, so the thieves can hang on to their loot.

While some MEND factions refused to surrender, and threaten to resume attacks when the ceasefire ends on the 15th, the rebels will be at a big disadvantage. The amnesty brought in a lot of fighters, along with nearly 3,000 guns and dozens of speedboats. Meanwhile, the military has brought in reinforcements, and is stronger than ever. Thus any MEND resumption of attacks would lead to even more damaging military operations in response. But that may not last, as the usual ineptitude of the government is manifesting itself in how the amnesty and rehabilitation program is being run. The former rebels are not all being provided with the housing and cash they were promised, and many are already muttering about going back to "the creeks" (of the Niger Delta) and resuming their precarious life of stealing oil and crime in general. While a major resumption of MEND violence would see the rebels operating at a disadvantage because of the amnesty, there are still millions of unemployed young men in the Delta, who might see the gangster life as a viable option. If the government does manage to screw up the amnesty program, it will be another case of snatching defeat from the jaws of victory.

The amnesty program brought in over 14,000 fighters. The government was not prepared for that many (10,000 was the official goal). Only 35-40 percent of those surrendering, brings along a weapon, indicating that many of the amnesty seekers are very recent recruits for the rebels. The larger number of people surrendering will mean delays, of up to six months, in processing them and paying the benefits.

October 13, 2009: The amnesty program is having an effect on oil production, with it increasing each week. Officials soon expect to be able to ship Nigeria's current OPEC allocation of 1.8 million barrels a day. This would mean several hundred million dollars of additional revenue to the government each month.

October 14, 2009: The government granted amnesty to about 8,000 rebel fighters in the Niger delta. Nearly as many are still being investigated to insure that they are not bogus, and just trying to get the amnesty benefits. The government has expected as many as 15,000 armed men to accept amnesty, so they believe at least 5,000 armed men are still out there. MEND has threatened to resume attacks if the government does not come up with an acceptable peace deal.

October 16, 2009: MEND announced that it was resuming hostilities as of today. But there was no unusual increase in violence in the Niger delta.

October 19, 2009: In order to achieve peace, the government has proposed to give people living in oil producing areas, be given ten percent of oil revenues (that the government normally gets). This would amount to $338 million the first year, and money would be paid to residents through a trust. This would be subject to possible corrupt practices and theft, but if money did get to the villages, it would quiet down the unrest.

October 23, 2009: A group of rebel leaders who accepted the amnesty have given the government two weeks to make good on their promises to improve the lives of people in the Niger delta, or face a resumption of widespread violence in the area.

The ICC (International Chamber of Commerce), which keeps track of pirate attacks worldwide, believes that half the attacks in Nigeria go unreported. Only 20 attacks (out of 306 worldwide) were reported in Nigeria during the first nine months of this year, mostly against oil service boats in the Niger delta. Apparently the oil companies find it cheaper to repay the crews for lost stolen belongings, rather than deal with the insurance companies. Not reporting pirate attacks also makes the area seem safer, and thus it is easier to hire foreign oil workers.

October 24, 2009: Things have quieted down over the last few months, as many rebels ceased fighting. Oil shipments in September were 1.805 million barrels a day, up 1.4 percent over August. Three years ago, before the rebel groups like MEND began attacking the oil facilities, Nigeria shipped 2.6 million barrels a day. Some months, during the last years, were so bad that shipments fell to 1.1 million barrels a day. But many rebels, including those who accepted the amnesty, and those who did not, have made it clear that if the government did not quickly get money to the villagers in the polluted oil production areas, the violence would resume.

October 25, 2009: MEND agreed to restore the ceasefire, and have peace talks with the government. Too many rebel groups accepted the amnesty program, thus sharply reducing the number of rebel gunmen. MEND realized that if they continued to fight, they would be at an even greater disadvantage versus the armed forces.

Growing religious intolerance in the north, where Islamic conservatives are pushing the use Islamic law (Sharia), and insisting that it apply to non-Moslems as well. After independence in the 1960s, northern leaders stressed separation of church and state and tolerance for all. This led to millions of Christian and Moslem Nigerians migrating to parts of the country where they were a religious minority. But in the last decade, with the rise of Islamic radicalism, this has backfired. A dozen (all in the north) of Nigeria's 36 states have adopted Sharia. This was done by popular demand, as a way to deal with the corruption and government inefficiency. But Sharia did not solve those problems, and has created new ones. More people want to get rid of Sharia (as was done a century ago), but many still want to keep Islamic law.

The war in the Delta will start up again if the government does not bring some economic improvements to the region real quick. So far, there has been little economic progress. If this continues for a few more months, there will be blood. Already, many of the former rebels are returning to crime. Kidnapping is way up, as are most other types of crimes.

Despite several years of energetic anti-corruption efforts, the situation appears to be getting worse. The latest international corruption rankings show Nigeria falling from 121st least corrupt, to 142nd.

November 19, 2009: The end of the fighting has allowed oil shipments to increase from 1.8 million barrels a day, to 2.2 million. With a year or so of peace, that could be increased to 3.7 million barrels a day. The previous peak was 2.6 million barrels a day three years ago. It's going to be difficult to get back to 2.6 million, because many of the oil stealing gangs have not accepted the amnesty. These fellows have grown rich by stealing oil, and staying out of the revolution business. While MEND and their ilk stole oil to finance their revolution, the hard core oil thieves stole oil to make lots of money. The military concentrated their efforts on the oil thefts by the rebel groups, giving the non-political oil stealing gangs an edge. So oil facilities are still being damaged, so the gangs can steal oil.

December 15, 2009: The truce in the Niger Delta appears to be holding. Many of the gunmen have been disarmed, and their leaders bought off (and allowed to concentrate on stealing oil). The increasing violence of separatists and oil theft gangs has subsided for some four months now. But many of the now peaceful "rebels" have turned to more mundane crimes. There are more robberies and kidnappings. And the oil gangs continue to tap into pipelines and steal crude oil. Incidents of pipelines being damaged (either by taps, for stealing the stuff, or explosions to damage the pipe and make a political point) are down by more than half in the last four months. In the last year, most (about 60 percent of some 500 attacks) of the damage was done by terror attacks, the rest by thieves. The terror attacks have disappeared over the last four months, but the damage from thieves has increased a bit. Stealing oil is still a big business, but it does not interfere with oil company efforts to increase production.

The kidnapping is increasingly about locals, as the more lucrative foreigners are much better protected now. The navy has had mixed success against the pirates, and waterborne crime in general. The government has tried removing officers who are clearly incompetent, or unwilling to make an effort. Corruption is a problem in the military as well, and some officers have been caught taking bribes from the people they are supposed to be fighting.

One bit of good news is the reduction in polio cases this year (to 349, from 789 last year). Islamic conservatives up north have been preaching against polio vaccinations for years (on the assumption that the medicine is actually a Christian plot to poison Moslems). Polio can be wiped out, like smallpox was back in the 1970s, if you can vaccinate everyone in areas where the disease still exists (as polio and smallpox are diseases that can only live in human hosts). But the Islamic conservatives have been a major barrier to eliminating polio. The current wave of Islamic conservatism was only getting started back in the 1970s.

The anti-corruption effort is having more success overseas, than at home. The network of banks, lawyers, accountants and other Westerners who helped hide the stolen Nigerian billions, are being uncovered and prosecuted. The banks and guilty agents are giving up large sums of money. But one concern is preventing the money from being stolen again once it is returned to Nigerian control. There's certainly little visible evidence that the recovered cash is doing anything useful. The most visible evidence of this is in the nation's 200,000 kilometers of roads. As the corruption got worse over the last few decades, road building and maintenance spending declined. The evidence is very visible if you try to drive anywhere. The government has promised to spend more on roads next year, but the amounts promised will not stop the decline, only slow it down a bit. That's assuming the money allocated for road work actually reaches the roads. While there are some alternatives to the roads, like waterways and air travel, these also have growing problems. The coastal seas are increasingly threatened by pirates. African air travel is the most dangerous in the world, because of low standards in maintenance and aircraft operation.

December 19, 2009: In the Niger Delta, about 35 MEND gunmen attacked a pipeline, but did no serious damage. The attack was caused by frustration at the suspension of peace talks while the president is out of the country getting medical treatment. MEND quickly realized that the mood in the Delta was against renewed violence, and no more such attacks occurred for the rest of the year.

December 25, 2009: In the United States, a Nigerian man, Umar Farouk Abdulmutallab was arrested as he tried to detonate a bomb, while his airliner was about to land in Detroit. Last month, Abdulmutallab's father had warned the United States that his son had been radicalized, but the U.S. intelligence bureaucracy dropped the ball, and Abdulmutallab got on at least two airliners, undetected, with the powdered explosives sewn into his underwear. Despite being home to over 70 million Moslems, Nigeria has produced very few Islamic radicals or terrorists. It turns out that Abdulmutallab was radicalized while attending university in Britain. There he was recruited as a terrorist, and sent to Yemen for training.

December 29, 2009: In the north, fighting broke out between factions of the Kala-Kato Islamic sect. Over the next few days, more than 70 people were killed, and many more wounded. Police arrested dozens of teenagers, in addition to adults, and charged them with murder. Cults and religious sects are a constant source of violence in the country. Witchcraft is also a source of violence.

January 8, 2010: For the first time this year, and the first time in several months, someone bombed, and breached, an oil pipeline. About 20,000 barrels a day of oil shipments will be lost until the broken pipe can be fixed. No one claimed responsibility for the attack, and the usual suspects (like MEND) denied having anything to do with it.

January 11, 2010: Four foreign oil workers were kidnapped. The police guards were killed, and it's believed that the foreigners will be held for a large ransom. J

January 13, 2010: President Yar'Adua went to Saudi Arabia in late November to get medical treatment. He has been gone ever since, and has ignored pleas that he turn over his power while he is incapacitated. MEND rebels in the Niger Delta were particularly unhappy with peace talks being suspended while the president is out of the country. The president has recently sent a video explaining that he is recovering and will return soon, but does not say when. This has caused much unhappiness back in Nigeria.

January 14, 2010: The kidnappers of four foreign oil workers (three Brits and a Colombian) are demanding a ransom of $2 million. This is the first major (foreigner) kidnapping in the Niger Delta oil region since last Summer, and is apparently just criminal, not political.

In the capital, a court ruled that vice president Goofluck Jonathan could take over the presidential powers, seven weeks after president Yar'Adua went to Saudi Arabia for medical treatment. Yar'Adua did not implement any transfer of power when he left, and the government has been increasingly adrift because of this. Yar'Adua survived his medical treatment and says he will return to work as soon as possible. But no date was set. Yar'Adua did not officially turn over power to his vice president because the two men are at odds, and the president feared what Mr. Jonathan might do with presidential powers.

January 15, 2010: Violence broke out in city of Jos, with religion based gangs of young men battling each other in Christian neighborhoods.

January 18, 2010: The four kidnapped foreign oil workers were suddenly released. It's unclear if ransom was paid.

Vigorous government intervention five years ago halted three years of violence that left over 50,000 dead (17,459 children, 17,397 women and 18,931 men). This sort of conflict is common the world over. During the late 19th century, the United States suffered several local outbreaks ("Range Wars") between groups of farmers and ranchers. Religion (between Protestants and Catholics) was sometimes a minor factor, but it was mostly about land and water rights, and economic issues in general. Tribal and religious animosities in Nigeria only make the Range Wars there more deadly.

The religious violence in the area (Plateau State) goes back to ancient tribal conflicts between the Fulani tribes from the north, who are largely herders and Moslem, and other tribes from the south, who have come into contact with the Fulani, but are farmers and largely Christian. Christians are also angry over the use of Islamic law in northern, largely Moslem, states. This religious law is being imposed on non-Moslems, despite protests from the federal government and the non-Moslems involved. Islamic radicalism also adds to the tensions, as the Moslems tend to be the be more aggressive in dealing with real, or imagined, insults to their religion.

January 21, 2010: Less than a week of tribal/religious violence in the central Nigerian city of Jos has left nearly 500 dead, and thousands wounded. This is nothing new. Similar violence broke out 14 months ago, leaving over 700 dead. Thousands of soldiers and police were required to restore order. The current mayhem arose, in part, out of disputes over how rebuilding was done in some neighborhoods (as in putting a new mosque in a Christian neighborhood.) This time, some 10,000 people have fled their homes to avoid the violence.

January 28, 2010: In southern Bayelsa State, 25 children have died in a measles outbreak. The victims belonged to a fundamentalist Christian sect that believes in faith healing, and avoids vaccines and other medications. Thousands of unvaccinated children caught measles during this outbreak.

January 29, 2010: MEND, and a several former rebel leaders, have declared the ceasefire is ended. The rebel group is angry at the government, which has been unable to do much for the last two months because the president, who negotiated the peace deal, has been in Saudi Arabia getting medical treatment. Technically, MEND did not participate in the peace deal, but most of the MEND leaders and their followers did. Thousands of rebels turned in their weapons, and the security forces are still all over the Delta. If the rebels resumed the fight, they would do so at a big disadvantage. Most people in the Delta are still hoping the government will come through with what was promised in the peace deal.

January 30, 2010: In the Niger Delta, an oil line was ruptured. At first it was believed to be a resumption of rebel attacks on the oil companies, but was later found to be a botched attempt to tap into the oil pipeline in order to steal oil. No group took responsibility for attacking the pipeline, which got authorities to suspect that it was thieves, not terrorists, at work.

Meanwhile, in Jos, over 300 people were arrested, and 108 charged with conspiracy and weapons possession. Nearly 400 people were killed in the recent ethnic/religious violence. This was the latest clash between Christian and Moslem Nigerians, which in the last decade has left over 13,000 dead. There are still over 15,000 refugees from the Jos violence, living in camps outside the city.

February 6, 2010: President Umaru Yar'Adua remains hospitalized in Saudi Arabia, refusing to turn over presidential power to the vice president. Meanwhile, the courts and state governors have called for declaring vice president Goodluck Jonathan as acting president. But it hasn't happened yet. Yar'Adua has many supporters in the government, including most of the ministers, who fear losing their jobs if the vice president takes over. There is also fear of increased violence in the Niger Delta, where local rebels are waiting for benefits Yar'Adua promised and Goodluck Jonathan may not be inclined to deliver.

February 8, 2010; In the Niger Delta, a little known rebel group (Joint Revolutionary Council, or JRC) claimed they destroyed a pipeline, but the oil company denied that any facilities had been disabled.

February 9, 2010: Parliament has approved the transfer of presidential power to vice president Goodluck Johnson. The courts had earlier approved, and senior police and military commanders said they had no objection. But there's nothing in the constitution that allows this, and a group of corrupt presidential aides are opposing Johnson for personal (not wanting to be prosecuted for corruption) reasons.

February 18, 2010: In neighboring Niger, the military attacked the presidential palace and removed president Mamadou Tandja from power. The army justified this because Tandja had been increasingly acting like a dictator.

February 23, 2010: President Umaru Yar'Adua returned from Saudi Arabia, where he has been receiving medical treatment since last November. But no one actually saw Yar'Adua return, and a group of government ministers, who have insisted Yar'Adua was still in control of the government, announced that the president would soon appear in public. Meanwhile, vice president Goodluck Johnson continues running the country (or at least trying to) as acting presidents, as he has done for the last two weeks.

March 1, 2010: At least 17 policemen were arrested after a video appeared on al Jazeera, showing the cops shooting unarmed members of Boko Haram (a Taliban like group) in northern Nigeria last year. Boko Haram staged an uprising last July, and the police were sent in. Some 800 people died in the subsequent violence. The police have long been accused of executing, rather than arresting, suspects.

March 2, 2010: In the Niger Delta, a previously unknown rebel group (The People's Patriotic Revolutionary Force of the Joint Revolutionary Council, or PPRF) claimed they set off explosives near an oil pipeline pumping station. The facility was unused and unmanned, so there were no injuries and no interruption of oil shipments.

Refugees from the religious fighting in central Nigeria (Jos) are leaving camps set up for them outside the city. The camps, set up two months ago, never received much food, medical or other aid, and poor sanitation has led most of the 20,000 refugees to move onto other places for shelter.

March 4, 2010: The government remains paralyzed, as one group of government ministers has brought back president Umaru Yar'Adua from Saudi Arabia, and announced that he was resuming presidential power. But Yar'Adua has not appeared in public, and is apparently still, at best, incapacitated by his heart condition. Most of the government backs acting president, vice president Goodluck Johnson. But a group of ministers and state governors back Yar'Adua. The head of the armed forces says there will not be a coup, so the politicians will have to sort it out. That's not happening so far. Thus the peace deal in the delta, which Yar'Adua helped broker, continues to slip away. New efforts to battle corruption are stalled, by government ministers who oppose shifting power to the vice president. It's unclear if Yar'Adua is even alive or conscious.

March 7, 2010: Hundreds of Moslem men, armed with machetes, axes, knives and bows, attacked Christian villages outside Jos, in central Nigeria. The attacks were at night, and the attackers had the advantage of surprise. Over 500 men, women and children were slaughtered. Thousands more were able to flee the killers. The attacks were revenge for Moslems killed in religious violence in February and January.

President Umaru Yar'Adua has been back from Saudi Arabia for a week now, but he has not appeared in public. Even vice president Goodluck Johnson has not been able to see Yar'Adua. The presidential handlers announced that Yar'Adua was resuming presidential power. But Yar'Adua is apparently still incapacitated by his heart condition. The parliament, army and courts back the vice president. In an attempt to get to Yar'Adua, the vice president is dismissing pro- Yar'Adua officials.

March 11, 2010: About a thousand people have died from tribal violence in central Nigeria so far this year. The violence has caused over three thousand such deaths in the area over the last decade. The violence is caused by a combination of tribal, religious and economic disputes. The growth of Islamic radicalism in the last few decades has not helped, nor has rapid population growth in the past few decades, which has made land ownership or use disputes more frequent, and bloody. In the wake of the March 7 massacres, Christian mobs are forming in the city of Jos, seeking more revenge. Additional police and soldiers have been sent in to keep armed Christians and Moslems apart. Hundreds of arrests have been made in the search for those responsible for the March 7 killings. The security forces will be able to calm things down, as they have done in the past. But the fundamental causes are still there, and the violence will eventually break out again.

March 12, 2010: In the southern city of Port Harcourt, an Air Force G-222 twin engine transport ran off the airfield while landing during a disaster exercise. There were no fatalities, but ten of the 52 people on board were injured, and the 25 year old aircraft was heavily damaged. The air force is in the process of refurbishing its five G-222s.

March 15, 2010: Niger Delta rebel group MEND claimed responsibility for two car bombs going off in the southern town of Warri, where talks on amnesty (for local rebels) continue. Six people were wounded by the remote control explosions. The amnesty negotiations have been stalled because president Yar'Adua negotiated up with the terms, then took sick and has been incapacitated eversince. Acting president Jonathan is trying to get the amnesty process working again.

Outside Jos, another village was attacked by Moslem zealots, and at least 13 Christians were killed. Halting this violence is complicated by the fact that the hostility is not just religious, but also tribal and economic (the Moslems are herdsmen, while the Christians are farmers, and there are frequent disputes over land use.)

March 17, 2010: Acting President Goodluck Jonathan has dismissed the cabinet of president Umaru Yar'Adua, and appointed his own. Jonathan's choices include known reformers and reliable technocrats. President Yar'Adua, while back in the country, is too sick to govern, or even meet with acting president Jonathan. This leads many to believe that Yar'Adua's treatment in Saudi Arabia left the president incapacitated. Yar'Adua's term is up next year, giving Jonathan 14 months to implement any reforms he has in mind. It was noted that 21 of the 42 ministers in the new cabinet, had been in the old one.

In the south, rebel groups MEND and JRC claim they are attacking oil facilities again. But it's hard to verify the claims, because most of the rebels have accepted the amnesty, and oil thieves continue to damage pipelines in a way similar to rebel attacks. It's believed that a diehard group of rebels are trying to get the violence going again, but are creating more press releases than damage.

In the central Nigerian city of Jos, where recent religious and tribal violence left nearly a thousand dead, police have recently arrested nearly 200 suspects, and several of these have agreed to testify against others. Total arrests for these killings now total about 400.

Anti-corruption efforts have included enforcing skill standards for civil servants. But during recent examinations for 880 senior civil servants, 17 percent failed. Normally, everyone is expected to at least pass, and those with the highest scores are the prime candidates for promotion. But many officials are in high places because they have a senior politician to back them. In turn, the favored civil servant will assist in corruption schemes.

March 24, 2010: Religious tensions continue to grow in the Moslem north. This is complicated by most of the Moslem majority states in the north adopting Sharia (Islamic) law. This has led to violence, as lifestyle police have been more active enforcing lifestyle rules stipulated in Islamic law. But now the Sharia courts have gone online, issuing a decree banning Moslems from participating in online chats and message boards criticizing the recent (and first) amputation of a thief's hand. A lot more of these amputations were expected in the north, because of the Sharia law being adopted. But there was much public anger against such punishments, and the Sharia court in the city of Kaduna saw that anger being stoked in certain online venues. The court can arrest and punish anyone in Kaduna, who has been caught online disobeying the ban. But the main effect of the ban is to increase resistance online, and throughout Nigeria, to Sharia law and religious intolerance. Meanwhile, Islamic websites are featuring more videos calling for religious war in Nigeria, and forcible conversion of that half of the population that is not Moslem.

March 25, 2010:A Turkish cargo ship, waiting to be unloaded in Lagos, was attacked by ten pirates, who robbed the crew and stole portable electronic equipment. The crew resisted, and three were injured. These robberies are increasing, with at least one a week.

March 30, 2010: In the Moslem north, a Sharia court ordered a Nigerian NGO (The Civil Rights Congress of Nigeria) to not discuss the use of amputations (as part of Sharia law) in Nigeria via the Internet (chat rooms, Facebook, Twitter). The court ruled that such discussions might lead to bad things being said about Islam, and this could not be allowed. Several states in the Moslem north have adopted Sharia law, and ten years ago, the first thief had his hand amputated according to Sharia law. The adoption of Sharia was initially popular in the north, as it was supposed to reduce crime and corruption. If did neither, and has added lifestyle police, and court rulings like this, to the list of things Nigerians don't like.

In the central Nigerian city of Jos, religious violence continues, as groups of armed men continue to kill, largely at night (to avoid the many police reinforcements sent to the area), and usually as revenge for family or friends killed earlier. The religious strife is compounded by tribal differences, political problems (newcomers versus established communities) and economic disputes (herders versus farmers). So far, police have arrested 163 people, and intend to prosecute at least 41 of them for terrorism or murder.

In the Niger Delta, the tribal rebels are not happy with the slow pace of the amnesty program. The amnestied gunmen are not getting paid, and many are talking about heading back to the swamps, stealing oil and fighting the government. There is already an increase in the kidnapping of foreigners, with five taken in the last few weeks.

April 14, 2010: Acting president Goodluck Jonathan is trying to reinforce his position by saying all the right things. He will increase anti-corruption efforts and insure that next year's national elections are clean. Jonathan wants to run for president, and is using his current situation to help make that happen. Meanwhile, the ailing president's aides invited two groups of clergy (five Moslem, five Christian) to visit the president. Those two visits were announced as proof the president was nearly ready to return to power. But the clergy were sworn to secrecy about what shape the president was actually in, so it still looks like the president isn't coming back, and his staff doesn't want to admit it.

April 16, 2010: In central Nigeria, Christians are enraged over the kidnapping and murder of a Christian clergyman and his wife by Moslems. More police and soldiers are being deployed to prevent revenge attacks.

April 19, 2010: Soldiers in central Nigeria detected and halted an attack, by a Moslem mob, on a Christian village.

April 20, 2010: Former Delta state governor James Ibori is accused of corruption, but avoided arrest by having a mob of his supporters confront the police. Ibori is accused of stealing nearly $300 million while governor of the oil rich Delta state. He was a major supporter of disabled president Umaru Yar'Adua (who has not been heard from in five months) and the Peoples Democratic Party. There have already been arrests of men who used to work for Ibori, who are charged with helping him steal all that money.

April 21, 2010: In central Nigeria, nine more died from ethnic and religious violence in the last few days. Theses killings occurred out in the countryside.

April 22, 2010: The ruling People’s Democratic Party has expelled 19 prominent (former government officials) members for their reform efforts.

The expelled members of the PDP Reform Forum were being punished for openly criticizing senior policy officials on how the party was (or, rather was not) dealing with corruption.

April 26, 2010: Over the weekend, three journalists were killed while trying to cover ethnic and religious violence in central Nigeria (in and around the city of Jos). At least five others died in that violence, and dozens were injured, as mobs of Moslems attacked Christians. The Moslems were seeking revenge for a dead Moslem teenager who was found dead. Christians were blamed. Police and soldiers intervened to prevent even more violence.

In the central Nigerian city of Jos, several hundred more people are fleeing their homes after weekend violence. In the last few months, there have been over 500 deaths (40 percent Christian, 60 percent Moslem) in the area.

April 27, 2010: The head of the ruling party (Peoples Democratic Party) has been indicted for corruption (stealing over a million dollars in 2001). Acting president Goodluck Jonathan is making himself very unpopular with the political elite by backing more aggressive prosecution of the more blatant cases of corruption (usually including stealing public funds and trying to hide the money overseas.) Corruption is a root cause of much of the civil disorder in Nigeria, but increasingly vigorous attempts to reduce the stealing have been foiled by the wealthy, desperate and well connected thieves.

May 4, 2010: Quick intervention by senior commanders averted gun battles between police, and soldiers who had set up several illegal roadblocks outside Lagos. Soldiers do this to extract illegal "tolls" from motorists. Police have been ordered to be more aggressive in shutting down any illegal roadblocks.

May 5, 2010: Ailing (since last November) president Umaru Yar'Adua has died and his vice president Goodluck Johnson, sworn in as president. Johnson had to work with the legislature to get sufficient power (three months ago) to run the country. Yar'Adua's cronies were trying to use presidential power, because Yar'Adua had not signed the document turning power over to the vice president when he took ill last year. Yar'Adua is a Moslem from the north, while Johnson is a Christian from the south, and this had something to do with it. Yar'Adua's term is up next year, and there will be scheduled elections. There has long been an understanding that Moslems and Christians would take turns holding the presidency. Many Moslem politicians are pushing for Googluck Johnson to not run for election, as his one year of presidential power should be followed by another Moslem president. The Christians disagree with this, especially since the corrupt Yar'Adua government (which began as one promising reform) is being cleaned up by an energetic, and clean, Jonathan.

May 10, 2010: The leader of the ruling PDP party, Vincent Ogbulafor, was arrested on corruption charges. Despite spirited resistance from powerful politicians, the anti-corruption is nailing big shots who thought their money and connections could protect them.

May 12, 2010: Admitting that the amnesty program in the oil rich Niger Delta has failed, the government pledged to re-launch it next month. There are still over 20,000 armed men in the Delta, most of them belonging to rebel and oil stealing gangs. Only about 8,000 men disarmed for the amnesty last year, and many complain that the government did not hold up its end of the deal. The new president, Goodluck Johnson, is putting his reputation on the line to make this work.

Things are looking up for anti-corruption efforts. Nuhu Ribadu, the former (very effective) head of the anti-corruption agency, was cleared of trumped up charges that had removed him from his job. Even those who flee the country are in danger. James Ibori, who ran oil rich Delta province from 1999-2007, was recently arrested in Dubai. Many corrupt Nigerian politicians are fleeing, often to neighboring countries. But the government has ordered its diplomats to negotiate deals to have these fugitives arrested and returned to Nigeria for prosecution.

May 14, 2010: Oil stealing gangs continue to damage oil pipelines in the Niger Delta, and prevent oil companies from meeting their oil export targets. The gangs punch holes into the pipes, steal oil, and then leave the oil flowing. One recent leak caught fire, causing greater damage to the pipeline. Last year, these criminal activities led to over 14,000 tons of oil being spilled, most of it ending up in the waters of the Niger Delta. Since the failure of last year's amnesty deal, crime is on the rise in the Niger Delta. This includes kidnapping and robbery, as well as oil theft. Some of the rebel groups are reviving, although these groups do not appear to have returned to their former power, yet.

May 21, 2010: Two Russian officers (the captain and chief engineer), kidnapped from a Greek merchant ship off Cameroon on May 16th, are believed to be held inside Nigeria. This is an escalation of pirate activity off the west coast of Africa, especially Nigeria (where most of the foreign ships operate.) Until the recent kidnappings, the pirates basically robbed the crews and looted anything they could carry off in their speedboats (usually electronics and other small valuables). Unlike Somalia, there are no pirate safe havens on the west coast of Africa. But there are places where pirates can take their captives, especially in Nigeria, where gangs rule many coastal areas.

Near the coast, four Lebanese construction workers were freed, a week after they were kidnapped in Port Harcourt. No word on ransom paid.

May 22, 2010: In central Nigeria, there was another outbreak of religious/ethnic violence around Jos, as three Moslems were killed. Police arrested fifteen Christian suspects within days.

May 23, 2010: Three more people have died in religious/ethnic violence around Jos, in central Nigeria.

Chinese firms have agreed to build and operate three refineries (in Bayelsa, Kogi and Lagos states), at a cost of $28.5 billion. These will eliminate a major source of corruption, because lack of refinery capacity causes 750,000 barrels of petroleum products a day have to be imported. The government will have no financial stake in these refineries, which will make it easier to monitor and control corruption related to the refineries. This is all part of a larger Chinese effort to establish economic, diplomatic and military relationships in Africa, and access to many raw materials, and export markets.

President Goodluck Jonathan, who has a thin political history and no track record of corruption, has also had his anti-corruption officials go after the foreign firms offering the bribes. This involves providing foreign nations with evidence that their citizens violated anti-bribery laws, and letting the foreign nations prosecute their own. In another bold move, Johnson has ordered that a prominent foreign accounting firm be hired to audit the finances of NNPC (Nigerian National Petroleum Corporation), which controls the national oil resources, and is believed to be responsible for the theft of over $300 billion in oil revenues over the decades. The stealing was supposed to have stopped after the corrupt military government in 1999, but, as many knew, it did not. The people who received that money, including many senior politicians, will be creative in trying to stymie this audit. The very wealthy, very corrupt and very powerful officials who are under attack have proved capable of defeating anti-corruption efforts.

May 29, 2010: Tribal rebels in the Niger Delta have largely agreed to wait and see if newly sworn in president Goodluck Jonathan will make good on the amnesty deal his predecessor negotiated late last year. If Jonathan does not come through, the rebels promise a resumption of the violence.

June 10, 2010: The army and MEND rebels give differing reports of what happened during a recent gun battle near a oil pipeline facility in the Niger delta. MEND say they attacked the facility, killed six soldiers, and left. The army says a patrol drove off a group of MEND men who were trying to tap into the pipeline and steal oil. Some of the thieves were arrested. The army account sounds more plausible, as oil theft is far more common than attacks on guarded oil facilities.

June 11, 2010: Violence continues in the central Nigerian city of Jos, but this time it's about a ban on motorcycle taxis. Several clashes with police have left at least six dead.

The fight against government corruption is being most effectively fought in foreign courts, where foreign lawyers and prosecutors go after stolen money and those who have helped try and hide and launder it. The foreign operatives are largely incorruptible, while Nigerian officials can more easily be reached with bribes or threats.

The recent deaths in Jos, as police broke up demonstrations by motorcycle taxis drivers (angry that their machines were now banned), is yet another example of police misconduct that is a major source of unrest throughout the country. The police are generally seen as inept, corrupt and for sale (usually to wealthy politicians, who pay the cops to do whatever has to be done). The police regularly assault civilians, using extortion, rape and murder to "maintain order" and supplement their pay. Controlled by the central government, senior positions in the police are often sold to the highest bidder.

June 20, 2010: MEND kidnappers are demanding $1.5 million ransom for two officers that were taken from a Russian merchant ship last month. If the pirates get a ransom, this will set off a wave of kidnappings. Heretofore, the pirates merely robbed the ships (and crews). The kidnapping is a new, and much more lucrative, angle. MEND is holding the two hostages in a remote mangrove swamp, and the military would have a hard time finding them. With so many MEND members disarmed (or less well armed) by the recent amnesty (which is also failing because of corrupt officials administering it), kidnapping for big ransoms seems like a splendid opportunity.

July 4, 2010: Pirates off the coast, released their 12 foreign kidnap victims, to a fishing trawler. The twelve had been kidnapped from a German cargo ship two days earlier. It's unclear if a ransom had been paid, or the pirates had been threatened, or what. Attacks on merchant ships off the coast are on the rise, as the Nigerian criminals can obtain higher ransoms for the foreign sailors (who are held prisoner in remote coastal areas.)

July 7, 2010: China and Nigeria agreed to allow a Chinese firm to build an $8 billion oil refinery in the coastal city of Lagos. This, and two other refineries, will be able to refine 750,000 barrels of oil a day. Nigeria already has four refineries, that can handle 445,000 barrels a day. But only a third of that capacity is used because of mismanagement and corruption. But the Chinese built refinery will be run by the Chinese, who are expected to get the most out of their investment (80 percent of the money for construction is coming from Chinese sources.) The Chinese often bring in their own security personnel in such situations, and obtain license to kill from local authorities.

Responding to threats to resume fighting, the government is hustling to deliver promised benefits to 20,000 rebels in the Niger delta oil region. A ceasefire deal was worked out late last year, but since then, few of the promised benefits have arrived. The former rebels suspect corruption and threaten to resume the violence (even though the military and police are better prepared to deal with it if they do.)

The Nigerian football (soccer) team did badly at the World Cup, not winning a single game and being eliminated in the first round. The government vowed to investigate those in charge of the team, and examine the financial records for signs of corruption.

In the Niger delta, where the oil business results in a lot of wealthy (by Nigerian standards) people, there has been an explosion in kidnapping. Until the ceasefire deal in the delta last year, some of the organized gangs found that kidnapping foreigners would usually result in a ransom of over $100,000 per victim. But the ceasefire coincided with much improved security for foreigners. Wealthy Nigerians had long been accompanied by serious security, so the kidnappers have turned to any Nigerians with money, and come to accept ransoms as small as a few hundred dollars. This growing plague of kidnappers is spreading fear throughout southern Nigeria. The police are corrupt and ineffective (and believed involved in some of the kidnapping) so many cases are not even reported. But there are currently believed to be several hundred a month. If the trend continues, Nigeria will soon be the kidnapping capital of the world.

July 9, 2010: The religious violence in central Nigeria has calmed down, after nearly 500 people were killed this year. The religious, and tribal, tensions remain, and all the government can do so far is urge people not to kill over religious differences. That has not changed many minds at the village level, but Christian and Moslem politicians have shown an increasing willingness to work together.

July 15, 2010: In eastern Nigeria, violence broke out between Christians and Moslems. Eight people were killed and over 40 wounded. Six mosques and a church were set on fire.

July 18, 2010: In central Nigeria, outside Jos, a Moslem mob attacked a Christian village and killed eight people. A church and seven homes were burned down. The dead included four members of a Christian clergyman's family. So far this year, over 1,500 people have died in and around Jos, because of religious violence.

July 23, 2010: In the Niger Delta, armed men attacked the waterside home of the Bayelsa state deputy governor. Arriving in four speedboats, a security guard was killed and the attackers placed and detonated explosives that damaged the home. This attack is the result of growing violence between political parties in Bayelsa. Elections are being held next year, and whoever wins, has access to lucrative corruption opportunities.

There are over a million Nigerians who have emigrated, mostly to the West. Most of these migrants are highly educated, and unable to find work in Nigeria. Meanwhile, over a million less educated people from neighboring countries have migrated to Nigeria, looking for work. Despite the corruption, the Nigerian economy continues to grow. This is mainly because of the oil income. Although much of this cash is stolen by corrupt politicians, not all of it is shipped to foreign bank accounts or investments. Much of it is spread around inside Nigeria, to ensure the loyalty of supporters.

July 26, 2010: The amnesty deal negotiated in the Niger Delta last November, is coming apart because many of the gangs involved work for local politicians. This is common throughout the country, and these gangs are put on the politician's payroll before elections in order to intimidate voters who support other politicians. It's now election season. While the voting isn't until next year, the gangs are already being put to work, and that means several gangs in the Niger Delta, that accepted the amnesty, are getting together again to kill for one local politician or another.

July 28, 2010: Police seized .45 ton of cocaine, which was found in a cargo container that came from Chile, by way of Peru, Bolivia and Belgium.

July 30, 2010: The police finally released the names of policemen killed a year ago fighting Islamic radicals in the north. The police were reluctant to admit that 32 of their personnel were killed by the Islamic rebels. The general religious violence a year ago left over 500 dead, mostly Moslem and Christian civilians killing each other.

August 2, 2010: Nigeria has threatened to pull its troops from UN peacekeeping operations if the UN does not change its ROE (Rules Of Engagement) and allow peacekeepers more freedom to defend themselves and go after local armed groups that threaten, and sometimes attack, peacekeepers. Nigerian troops comprise about five percent of over 100,000 UN peacekeepers deployed worldwide.

August 5, 2010: In the north (the town of Tafawa Balewa), religious and political disputes led to a mob marching on a police station to demand the release of five prisoners. The police opened fire to disperse the mob, killing three people.

Religious tensions continue to simmer in the north, where some states are increasing pressure on non-Moslems to adhere to Islamic (Sharia) law. For example, some officials are no longer taking bribes to allow southern breweries to truck in beer for Christian (and Moslem) customers in Christian neighborhoods. This makes Christians, who are not supposed to be subject to Sharia, angry, thus laying the groundwork for another round of religious violence.

Most Nigerians acknowledge that the corruption is the root cause of its problems, and agree that something has to be done about the stealing and general dishonesty. More corrupt officials are being prosecuted, including more senior ones. But the number of corrupt officials is vast, and they are fighting back with lawyers, bribed judges and armed thugs. It's going to be a long war, and victory is not assured.

The general climate of corruption affects everything. For example, there is so much corruption, and delays, in running the ports that importers are diverting shipments to neighboring nations, and trucking the goods into Nigeria. And then there is the declining availability of Internet service. Higher government fees (and bribes demanded), plus more irregular electricity supply, are causing Internet cafes and ISPs (Internet Service Providers) to go out of business because of a lack of customers. The corruption and lawless attitude have been an even bigger tragedy in the oil producing region (the Niger river delta.) In the last four years, there have been over 3,000 oil spills, ruining farmland and killing people when they catch fire. Most of the oil spills are caused by oil theft (cutting or drilling into the oil pipelines and stealing the oil for sale to smugglers who take it to neighboring nations and sell it.)

August 9, 2010: Nigeria has been an independent nation for fifty years, and it's been downhill most of that time. Economists point out that half a century ago, Nigeria had higher per capita income than many East Asian nations, like South Korea, Malaysia and Singapore. Now, Nigeria is far behind these nations. Many blame it on oil. In the last 38 years, the government has earned over a trillion dollars ($1,200 billion) in oil revenue, most of which has been stolen or misused. This corruption is the main cause of the unrest in the country, especially the oil producing areas. Since 1980, the poverty rate (the percentage of people living on less than $400 a year) has gone from 28 percent to over 60 percent today. About five percent of the population lives on over $1,000 a year, and these are usually connected with the corrupt politicians who have stolen all that oil wealth. For over four decades, the oil money has been going to about twenty percent of the population, leaving most of the rest worse off today than they were half a century ago, before the oil was discovered. The people in the Niger Delta are up in arms because most of them have not benefited from the oil production, but have suffered from the oil spills and other disruptions that accompany oil drilling and shipping. The four decades of theft have left the national infrastructure (roads, water supplies, power production, etc) in ruins.

August 13, 2010: Pirates attacked another merchant ship off Nigeria, stealing portable items and taking the captain and first officer with them. The two officers will be held for ransom.

August 16, 2010: Shell Oil Company declared force majeure (acts beyond their control) because recent oil thefts had damaged several pipelines so badly that Shell will not be able to deliver the amounts of oil it had agreed to ship. The force majeure clause gets Shell off the hook (for fines and such) if criminal activity interfered with moving the oil.

August 22, 2010: In the southwestern city of Ibadan, at least 13 people were killed when rival Islamic radical groups clashed.

August 24, 2010: In the Niger Delta, a gang leader, Soboma George, who had accepted amnesty (as the leader of a rebel group) last year, was shot dead during a gun battle with rivals. Although the criminal gangs these men belonged to have been disbanded, many of the men who accepted amnesty still have weapons and still hang out with each other. Some are believed to have quietly returned to crime.

In the last two months, heavy rains in the north are flooding latrines and spreading cholera. Over 5,000 people have the disease and at least 200 have died.

The government has been unable to come up with a plan to reform the national police. Corruption, incompetence and misuse of their authority have made the police very unpopular and undependable. The cops are easily bribed, and only able to act effectively in major emergencies. The police often clash with soldiers who are sent in to carry out police functions. Many politicians don't really want police reforms, because politicians can hire their own private security forces, and bribe the police as needed.

August 25, 2010: Oil theft, by punching holes in oil pipelines, is on the increase in the Niger Delta. A recent UN survey found that over ninety percent of the oil leaks in the area were caused by oil thieves. The money earned from selling the oil (to brokers who smuggle it to nearby nations where it can be sold) buys more weapons (plus lots of consumer goods). The amnesty last year was supposed to put many of the oil stealing gangs out of business, but new ones appeared. It's too lucrative a business to pass up. But the lack of attacks on other oil company facilities allowed the oil companies to increase production to about 2.1 million barrels a day. Meanwhile, local leaders in the Delta hold the oil companies responsible for the pollution caused by the oil thieves and demand compensation. The government ignores such demands, but the oil companies sometimes respond. Many of these compensation campaigns are pure extortion, but the oil companies have to proceed carefully, to avoid bad PR.

September 6, 2010: Four officials for the Nigerian football (soccer) effort in the recent World Cup completion, were arrested. The four were accused of stealing $8.5 million, money that was meant for the effort to win World Cup games. The Nigerian team did very poorly.

In the Niger river delta, police raided a gangster hideout in the swamps, and freed two Russian sailors who had been kidnapped from their ship last month, and were being held for ransom.

September 7, 2010: Over 40 members of Islamic radical group Boko Haram attacked a prison in the north. After a gun battle with the guards, nearly 800 prisoners were let loose. These included over 120 members of Boko Haram. The attackers had assault rifles, explosives and pistols and killed five people (soldier, a police officer, two prison guards and a civilian) during the attack. They set fire to part of the prison and released most of the prisoners.

September 8, 2010: In northern Kano state, officials have banned the use of motorcycles after dark. Gunmen, believed to be Boko Haram members, used motorcycles for drive by shootings of police, businessmen and government officials in the last few weeks.

September 13, 2010: Over the weekend, police in the north arrested ten members of Boko Haram, as the search went on for the 120 Boko Haram who escaped from a prison on the 7th. Only a few of these have been recaptured.

A two month old cholera epidemic has killed nearly a thousand Nigerians so far, and is now spreading into Cameroon, Chad and Niger, where several hundred more have died from the waterborne intestinal disease.

September 16, 2010: So far, about 300 of the 800 prisoners freed by Islamic radicals on the 7th, have returned. Most of these men had nearly completed their sentences, and realized that, technically, participating in a prison break constituted another crime. But about 120 of the escaped prisoners were Boko Haram members, and they have not returned. In July 2009, there was an armed uprising in the north by Boko Haram (translates as "Western education is sinfull"), which consisted of an attack on a police station, to steal weapons and other attacks on non-Moslems and local officials. The police station attack was repulsed and at least 40 of the attackers were killed. Boko Haram was following in the footsteps of an earlier group called Al Sunna wal Jamma. In the aftermath of the attack, many young Nigerians, angry at the corruption and resulting economic malaise (and unemployment) joined in the violence, and carried out some looting. The police retaliated, arresting thousands of suspects.

The police ended up killing 800 people, some of whom were innocent bystanders. But during the interrogation, over 30 Boko Haram admitted that they had travelled to Afghanistan and Pakistan to receive military training from the Taliban. Boko Haram wants to establish a Taliban-like government in Nigeria. This has proved difficult, because half of Nigerians are Christian or Pagan, and most of the Moslems are not interested in anything as strict as what the Taliban practice. Thus the Islamic radicals up north are a nuisance, not a threat. Since last year, Boko Haram was believed to still be active, and it was. The police have since discovered that the prison attackers were organized by some of the 95 Boko Haram members who were arrested last year and then granted bail. Since 2009, especially in the last two months, there have been attacks on the police and government officials, that were believed to be the work of Boko Haram. But some of this violence is the result of the usual pre-election violence. Major politicians, especially those trying to get elected governor of states, hire criminal gangs to intimidate, kidnap or kill political rivals and their supporters.

September 21, 2010: Off the Niger delta, four foreign oil workers (three French, one Thai) were kidnapped from work ships off the coast. This form of piracy (kidnapping, and looting ships of portable goods) is growing more common off the Nigerian coast.

In the north, two attackers on a motorcycle murdered a local chief, and another man, with gunfire. The attackers were believed Islamic terrorists belonging to the Boko Haram group (which has become more active in the past few months.)

September 27, 2010: In the southeast (Abia State), gunmen kidnapped fifteen 3-10 year old students (in a school bus) and held them for $130,000 ransom. This is a prosperous Christian area, and the locals raised a stink with the government. Thus 5,000 soldiers, and more police, were sent in to hunt down the kids and kidnappers. The children were rescued four days later. There were no arrests, and officials said no ransom was paid. Abia state is adjacent to the Niger delta, and the kidnappers are suspected of being rebels from the delta area. But the kidnappers could be locals, because kidnapping is becoming a more common crime.

Most Nigerians acknowledge that the corruption is the root cause of its problems, and agree that something has to be done about the stealing and general dishonesty. More corrupt officials are being prosecuted, including senior ones. But the number of corrupt officials is vast, and they are fighting back with lawyers, bribed judges and armed thugs. It's going to be a long war, and victory is not assured. MEND is mainly concerned with gaining some relief for the people in the oil production areas of the Niger delta. The government promised all sorts of relief last Fall, to gain a truce. But the government did not deliver, so MEND is on the move again.

The general climate of corruption affects everything. For example, there is so much corruption, and delays, in running the ports that importers are diverting shipments to neighboring nations, and trucking the goods into Nigeria. And then there is the declining availability of Internet service. Higher government fees (and bribes demanded), plus more irregular electricity supply, are causing Internet cafes and ISPs (Internet Service Providers) to go out of business because of a lack of customers. The corruption and lawless attitude have been an even bigger tragedy in the oil producing region (the Niger river delta.) In the last four years, there have been over 3,000 oil spills, ruining farmland and killing people when they catch fire. Most of the oil spills are caused by oil theft (cutting or drilling into the oil pipelines and stealing the oil for sale to smugglers who take it to neighboring nations and sell it.)

October 1, 2010: Three bombs went off in the capital, killing fifteen people, during celebrations of the 50th anniversary of Nigerian independence. Niger delta rebel group MEND took responsibility. MEND pointed out that life in Nigeria has gotten worse in the past half century. Half a century ago, Nigeria had higher per capita income than many East Asian nations, like South Korea, Malaysia and Singapore. Now, Nigeria is far behind these nations. Many blame it on oil. In the last 38 years, the government has earned over a trillion dollars ($1,200 billion) in oil revenue, most of which has been stolen or misused. This corruption is the main cause of the unrest in the country, especially the oil producing areas. Since 1980, the poverty rate (the percentage of people living on less than $400 a year) has gone from 28 percent to over 60 percent today. About five percent of the population lives on over $1,000 a year, and these are usually connected with the corrupt politicians who have stolen all that oil wealth. For over four decades, the oil money has been going to about twenty percent of the population, leaving most of the rest worse off today than they were half a century ago, before the oil was discovered. The people in the Niger Delta are up in arms because most of them have not benefited from the oil production, but have suffered from the oil spills and other disruptions that accompany oil drilling and shipping. The four decades of theft have left the national infrastructure (roads, water supplies, power production, etc) in ruins.

The government has deployed thousands of its best troops and intelligence operatives in the delta, where they have used patrols and other intelligence collecting efforts to find out where MEND camps tend to be out in the delta marshland. This was followed by an increasing number of attacks on rebel camps. That sort of thing convinced many rebels to accept the amnesty offer last year. But now the most dangerous MEND operatives have apparently moved outside the delta. They will be hard to find, and even more difficult to stop.

October 2, 2010: The government is in a panic because yesterday's terror attack was well planned, and it was not against a target in the Niger delta, but in the capital. The delta rebels have threatened for months that government failure to hold up their end of the deal would lead to a resumption of violence. Although some 20,000 rebels surrendered in the past year, many thousands of the hard core rebels either did not surrender, or kept some of their weapons. The current violence is also the result of corruption in the rebel leadership. Some of the money provided by the government for the rebels, never went beyond the leaders that were supposed to distribute it. Rebel leaders have warned that some factions are more intent on resuming attacks than others. Meanwhile, many rebels continued to earn money by stealing oil from pipelines. Some rebels have obviously changed tactics. This included attacks outside the delta using car bombs, and, many government officials fear, the assassination of corrupt members of the government.

October 3, 2010: The State Security Service (SSS) claimed to have detected and aborted several additional terrorist attacks. But there is still no hard evidence of who carried out the October 1 attacks, or subsequent ones that were apparently planned.

October 9, 2010: In the northeast, unidentified gunmen murdered a moderate Islamic cleric. The victim had preached against pro-Taliban Boko Haram.

October 11, 2010: In the northeast, near the Chad border, a mob attacked and burned a police station. Islamic radicals were suspected, as Boko Haram is popular in the area.

October 13, 2010: In the Niger delta, gunmen kidnapped the foreign born headmaster of an oil company sponsored school. Two police bodyguards were killed in the process. Kidnapping is a growing crime problems, most of just for the cash, not to make a political point.

In the north, Islamic radical group Boko Haram admitted responsibility for the recent bombing of a police station, and the assassination of religious leaders and government officials. But at the same time, Boko Haram is demanding an amnesty deal similar to what MEND, in the southern oil producing region, got. Boko Haram wants nearly 200 of their members freed from jail, charges against hundreds of others dropped and mosques and other assets returned. Boko Haram wants to be free to practice its radical (Taliban-like) form of religion and local government. Both state and national governments are hostile to this, or any amnesty. The growing Islamic radical violence in northeastern Bono state has led to over a thousand army and police reinforcements being sent.

The government claims to have rehabilitated 5,300 of the 20,000 Niger delta rebels who were offered amnesty. But many of these MEND members have returned to crime, especially stealing oil.

In South Africa, exiled MEND leader Henry Okah was arrested on October 2nd in conjunction with the car bomb blasts in Nigeria the day before. Okah's diary and other documents were also seized, that indicated he was still involved in terrorist activity inside Nigeria. This included documents from a Chinese arms exporters offering to make illegal weapons sales to Nigerian rebels. A prominent MEND leader, Okah had been freed from a Nigerian jail in July, 2009, after accepting the government amnesty. All charges were withdrawn, but he fled to exile in South Africa a few months later. Okah denies any involvement in the recent bombings, and police now believe MEND has split into factions, some of which are defying orders from MEND leadership, and continuing attacks. Many MEND members feel that Okah is an opportunist, who imported guns for criminal gangs, as well as MEND, and stole a lot of MEND money for himself.

October 15, 2010: Two weeks after the independence day car bombings, it's still unclear who was responsible. MEND denies involvement, although someone claiming to be from MEND called in a warning an hour before the October 1st explosions in the capital that killed twelve. Unable to make much visible progress against corruption, the government is under increasing attack from tribe-based rebels in the oil producing districts of the Niger delta, and radicalized Moslem men in the north. The southern rebels are largely Christian, but do not use religion as part of their rebellion.

October 22, 2010: In the north, Boko Haran posters are appearing in some towns, warning people not to work with the police against the Islamic radical group. Boko Haran fancies itself an African Taliban, determined to establish a religious dictatorship that will eliminate corruption and force Nigerian Moslems (and maybe Christians as well) to live virtuous lives. This is a popular appeal with many Nigerians, but most people want nothing to do with more extremists.

October 24, 2010: In the north, Islamic radical group Boko Haran attacked a police station, causing a gun battle, but few casualties. One of the attackers was killed, and others may have been wounded. Boko Haran is being blamed for some robberies, and attacks on police, as the extremist group attempts to fund itself anyway it can. After the attack on the police station, more than a hundred additional police were sent to the area to search for the terrorists.

In the north, Islamic terror group Boko Haran is believed responsible for killing a policeman manning a checkpoint.

October 25, 2010: Niger delta rebel group MEND not only took responsibility for bombings in the capital earlier this month, but threatens more. The government believes that only a small number of MEND members are involved in this violence, but it uncertain about when, or if, the bombers will be captured.

October 27, 2010: Another flare up of violence in central Nigeria left six women and children dead, as Moslem raiders attacked a Christian village and looted it. There have been several such incidents this year, and hundreds of additional police were moved to the city of Jos and the surrounding area to help prevent a cycle of revenge attacks from spiraling out of control. October 29, 2010: In the Niger Delta, explosives were used to attack a major oil pipeline. This was the first major attack since the amnesty program and peace agreement went into affect a year ago.

October 30, 2010: In the port of Lagos, police opened 13 sealed containers, that had been there since July, and found them full of weapons. The shipping documents said the contents were supposed to be buildings materials. Further investigation found that the containers originated in Iran, and it was suspected that they were ultimately headed to the Palestinian radical group Hamas, in Gaza.

October 31, 2010: In the Niger Delta, the navy blocked an attack on an oil facility by members of MEND, and arrested 18 of the attackers.

November 3, 2010: In the Niger Delta, troops were sent into Warri, where there has been an increasingly violent struggle between corrupt politicians and anti-corruption groups. The latest surveys of international corruption put Nigeria even closer to the bottom (where the most corrupt nations reside), at 134 out of 178 countries. Anti-corruption efforts in Nigeria has met stiff resistance (lawyers, guns and money, as appropriate) from corrupt officials. Prosecutions are few, and convictions even more rare.

November 8, 2010: MEND rebels attacked an oil rig off the Niger delta, and kidnapped seven oil workers.

November 9, 2010: In the north, police have arrested 23 more suspected members of Boko Haran, an Islamic radical group that likens themselves to the Taliban. In the last few months, police have made 128 such arrests.

In the north, Islamic terrorists (Boko Haran) were believed responsible for killing a soldier.

November 13, 2010: The army has begun operations to shut down MEND, and other rebel group, camps deep in the swamps. These camps can be found from the air, or by interrogating enough people who have been to the camps.

November 14, 2010: In the Niger delta, an oil facility was attacked and eight workers kidnapped.

Nigeria is generally friendly with Iran, a country that has been generous with bribes, and other favors, for Nigerian officials. The two Iranians who arranged the shipment are hiding in the Iranian embassy, are believed to be members of the al Quds Force (which supervises Iranian sponsored terrorism overseas).

November 15, 2010: The government reported to the UN that Iran had illegally smuggled weapons to Nigeria. Iran first insisted that it was all a misunderstanding, and that the weapons were actually purchased by an unnamed Nigerian politician. Most Nigerian politicians maintain private armies. These forces are illegal, and are usually criminal gangs in the pay of local politicians. Iran then changed its story and denied that the arms shipment was from Iran at all (despite all the shipping documents and witnesses indicating otherwise.) Another claim was that the arms were actually legal exports headed for Gambia (about a thousand kilometers up the coast from Nigeria). But some believe that Gambia was but another stop on the way to Egypt, where the weapons would be smuggled to Iranian supported Hamas in Gaza via tunnels under the border.

Russia has agreed to build nuclear power plants in Nigeria, if acceptable terms can be worked out.

November 17, 2010: In the Niger delta, a force of soldiers attacked a MEND camp and freed 19 kidnap victims, with only a few being lightly injured. This interrupted ransom negotiations for the largely foreign captives.

November 18, 2010: Acting on intelligence, police found 130 kg (286 pounds) of heroin hidden in aircraft parts that were packed inside a shipping container carried by ship from Iran to Nigeria. Iran is a major transshipment point for heroin coming out of Afghanistan.

In the north, Boko Haram Islamic terrorists fired on worshippers at a mosque, killing two men. This was the first daytime Boko Haram attack. The terrorists are trying to terrorize more moderate Moslems into supporting them, or not at least opposing them.

November 19, 2010: The latest round of attacks on Niger delta oil facilities has reduced shipments, the first time this happened in over a year.

November 20, 2010: MEND (Niger delta rebels) are demanding that the army withdraw and all prisoners be freed or else there will be a new wave of attacks on oil facilities. The rebels want the terms of last year's amnesty deal kept, and corrupt officials running the program removed. In the past week, the military has attacked over half a dozen MEND associated camps in the Niger delta, seizing lots of weapons and equipment, but not making many arrests. The rebels tend to hear the troops coming (usually by boat, and preceded by aerial reconnaissance), and slip away into an area of numerous creeks and islands they know well. This operation was part of a larger police anti-kidnapping effort in the Niger delta which has, in the last two months, made nearly 500 arrests. Kidnapping has become a big business in the Niger delta, with criminal gangs as well as with the rebels. Most of those arrested were soon released, but about a quarter of them appear involved in criminal activity. Many criminals in the delta also support rebel goals (for more autonomy in the delta, less corruption and spending additional oil money locally). Even through the government has screwed up their end of the amnesty deal, they insist that the rebels keep the peace. But corruption and mismanagement have kept many rebels from getting the amnesty benefits, and the government is seen as unreliable, corrupt and a hostile force.

November 21, 2010: In the north, police have arrested 152 suspected Boko Haran Islamic terrorists. This was in response to recent Boko Haran attacks. Boko Haran is suspected of killing at least 25 people in the last few months, most of them fellow Moslems who did not support Boko Haram.

November 22, 2010: Niger Delta rebels claimed responsibility for an attack on an oil pipeline. Meanwhile the army attacks on gangster camps in the area resulted in the capture of gang leader Obese Kuna, and 62 of his followers, along with large quantities of weapons and ammunition.

November 25, 2010: An Iranian and three Nigerians were charged with illegally importing 13 cargo containers of weapons from Iran. Earlier in the month, the government reported to the UN that Iran had illegally smuggled weapons to Nigeria. Iran first insisted that it was all a misunderstanding, and that the weapons were actually purchased by an unnamed Nigerian politician. Most Nigerian politicians maintain private armies. These forces are illegal, and are usually criminal gangs in the pay of local politicians. Iran then changed its story and denied that the arms shipment was from Iran at all (despite all the shipping documents and witnesses indicating otherwise.) Another claim was that the arms were actually legal exports headed for Gambia (about a thousand kilometers up the coast from Nigeria). But some believe that Gambia was but another stop on the way to Egypt, where the weapons would be smuggled to Iranian supported Hamas in Gaza via tunnels under the border. However, Gambia believed that the weapons were part of an Iranian plot of overthrow the Gambian government. In response to this, Gambia cut diplomatic ties with Iran.

November 26, 2010: A major police/army operation against a gang leader Obese Kuna, who specialized in kidnapping, has resulted in the capture of him, his camps, and the arrest of over 400 suspected criminals.

December 1, 2010: The military began to advance on three gangster camps in the Niger Delta.

The UN Human Development Report for this year ranked Nigeria at 142, out of 162, in terms of how well it measures up in terms of life expectancy, literacy, education and standard of living. This is a major complaint of most Nigerians, who have seen hundreds of billions of dollars of oil revenue stolen by politicians, and moved overseas or spent on luxurious living in Nigeria. Since independence in the 1960s, living standards have declined, despite all the oil wealth, and because of the corruption and incompetence of government officials.

December 3, 2010: Violence continues in central Nigeria as Christian and Moslem tribesmen continue to attack each other's villages, in a cycle of revenge and religious hostility. Today's attacks left eight Christian farmers dead, killed by Moslem Fulani. The religious violence in the area (Plateau State) goes back to ancient tribal conflicts between the Fulani tribes from the north, who are largely herders and Moslem, and other tribes from the south, who have come into contact with the Fulani, but are farmers and largely Christian. Christians are also angry over the use of Islamic law in northern, largely Moslem, states. This religious law is being imposed on non-Moslems, despite protests from the federal government and the non-Moslems involved. Islamic radicalism also adds to the tensions, as the Moslems tend to be the be more aggressive in dealing with real, or imagined, insults to their religion.

December 4, 2010: Over the last week, the army has launched a major offensive against gangster bases in the Niger Delta. One gang leader, Obese Kuna, was believed responsible for most of the kidnapping activity. Another gangster, John Togo, portrays himself as the leader of a rebel organization, the NDLF (Niger-Delta Liberation Force), which the government says is simply a front for criminal activities. The NDLF was created by John Togo last month after the government announced that the army would go after the major gangster bases in the Niger Delta. These large gangs, in addition to serving local politicians during elections (to intimidate voters), have also grown wealthy stealing oil from pipelines and from kidnappings. Those taken are often held in these camps, which are too strongly defended for the local police to go after. An attempt to take Togo's camps last month led to ambushes, and at least nine soldiers killed. The army pulled back and planned the more massive and efficient attack underway now. While the troops managed to capture Togo's camps this time, Togo himself is still at large, and hundreds of civilians were killed or wounded by the troops, who appeared to be chasing civilians away so that the gangsters would be easier to find. Any civilian found with a weapon was a target, and at the very least, these tactics are forcing the criminals to toss their weapons and abandon their camps. Lots of ammunition, explosives and weapons have been captured. The army denied that any civilians had been killed, but in past operations the soldiers have frequently killed innocent civilians while looking for rebels or gangsters.

December 9, 2010: In northern Borno State, troops staged an early morning raid on a village where Islamic militants were believed to be. There were indeed several armed members of Boko Haran, who fired on the troops and retreated. There were no deaths and few wounded, as the Islamic terrorists fled by hiding the crowd of civilians trying to get away from the shooting.

December 19, 2010: A Niger Delta gang leader, and official in separatist group MEND, Obese Kuna, has disappeared from prison (along two of his lieutenants). The government cannot explain what happened to the three men, nor can the lawyers defending the three against criminal charges.

While oil production has climbed back to 2.2 million barrels a day, increased violence by the new the NDLF (Niger-Delta Liberation Force) has forced the shutdown of some pipelines, and if the army cannot halt the violence, shipments will against fall below two million barrels a day.

December 21, 2010: The army has cancelled training and deployed over 17,000 troops for a major offensive against criminal gangs (mainly kidnappers) and religious extremists (mainly Boko Haram). Kidnapping has become a big business in the southeast, and the army has arrested nearly 400 of the 2,000 gang members believed involved there. Soldiers have also seized hundreds of firearms and lots of ammunition. In the Niger Delta, the main target has been the oil stealing gangs, and several raids have resulted in dozens of casualties each, and large quantities of weapons seized. But the soldiers are accused of being trigger-happy, and shooting lots of civilians who get in the way.

December 24, 2010: In the northeast, about 30 armed members of Islamic radical groups Boko Haran attacked three Christian churches and killed six people. Boko Haran is trying to emulate the Taliban, and that means attacking non-Moslems as much as possible. In the central Nigerian city of Jos, long the scene of violence between Moslems and Christians, another Islamic radical group claimed responsibility for several attacks that left over 30 dead.

December 28, 2010: In the last few days, community unrest in the Niger Delta left at least 18 dead and many more wounded. The fighting, between factions of the Ogoni tribe, began when an argument over football (soccer) escalated. Heavy handed police response made it worse.

December 31, 2010: Several bombs went off in a military compound in the capital city Abuja (central Nigeria, not far from Jos), leaving at least 30 dead. Most of the victims were wives and children of soldiers, gathered for a New Year's celebration.

After three months of quiet, last month saw two pirate attacks on merchant ships off the coast. One attack, on a large container ship, failed. But the other assault, on a smaller cargo vessel, led to the robbing of the crew and theft of whatever portable goods (mostly electronics) the pirates could carry away in their small boat. For the last year, mariners have been warned to be on the lookout for pirates, and police have rounded up gangs that were kidnapping officers of cargo ships and holding them for ransom. So the kidnapping appears to have abated for the moment.

In the Niger River delta, troops and police continue searching for members of the NDLF (Niger-Delta Liberation Force), which the government says is simply a front for criminal activities. The NDLF appears unable to resist the security forces, and does not appear to have a lot of popular support.

January 2, 2011: Islamic radical violence against Christians in the last ten days has left over 80 dead, hundreds wounded and over a hundred suspects arrested. In the northeast, police have arrested nearly a hundred actual or suspected members of Boko Haran. In the process, eight people have died, including three policemen. Police believe they have the chief financier of Boko Haran, and several other members of the group's leadership. Security forces tactics often backfire, as many army and police commanders allow their personnel to loot homes that are raided, and raid any home they want. The police and troops will often release suspects if a large enough bribe can be arranged. Troops and cops also tend to be pretty brutal, and at times trigger-happy.

January 4, 2011: Twenty recently transferred Boko Haran members tried to escape from Jimeta prison (in the north, near the Cameroon border). Some of the other prisoners helped prevent the breakout. Boko Haran is seen as a general menace to society, even in the Moslem north. In the nearby city of Maiduguri, police arrested the chief fundraiser for Boko Haram, Alhaji Bunu Wakil, and captured weapons, documents and bomb making material.

January 6, 2011: The vote for governor in oil-rich Delta State was rerun, with police and poll watchers carefully observing to avoid another tainted election.

January 7, 2011: In the Central Nigerian city of Jos, a Christian mob killed a car full of seven Moslems. A Moslem mob later responded, killing one person.

January 8, 2011: At a political meeting in Central Nigerian city of Jos, violence broke out and three people died.

January 9, 2011: In the northern city of Maiduguri (near the Cameroon border) four Boko Haran gunmen killed a policeman guarding a church, and wounded the church watchmen.

January 10, 2011: In Central Nigeria, Moslems seeking revenge attacked Christian villages, killing 18, most often using machetes.

January 11, 2011: Additional troops arrived in Central Nigeria, to guard Christian villages from further attacks, and to track down those who committed recent killings.

Although piracy had declined from 114 attacks in 2008 to 58 last year, this kind of violence is expected to increase this year. That's because successful pirates are sharing knowledge of the techniques that work. There are two kinds of attacks. One just robs the crew and ship of portable valuables. The more ambitious gangs also kidnap the captain and other officers from large ships, and hold them for ransom. This requires more teamwork and resources. But apparently some existing criminal gangs are organizing for more of these kidnapping attacks (setting up hideouts deep in the swamps, arranging for middlemen to handle the negotiations and money transfer.)

In Central Nigeria, some Islamic religious leaders are blaming political gangs for the Christmas attacks on churches in the capital. Such duplicity is not unknown in Nigeria, but murderous religious animosities are real, and have been around, and active, for centuries.

January 12, 2011: Violence continues in the Niger Delta, although more of it seems to be directed at political parties, rather than oil companies. The oil production facilities are well guarded and dangerous to attack. The politics in Delta State is as corrupt as they come, so much so that the governor's election was rerun. Various political gangs again tried to rig the vote, and so far 67 of these thugs have been arrested.

January 17, 2011: In central Nigeria, around Jos, a Christian mob killed a Moslem election worker (handing registration for upcoming elections). In response, police and soldiers were given a shoot-to-kill order (against anyone seen threatening violence). In the last year, religious and ethnic violence in and around Jos has left over 500 dead.

January 20, 2011: Responding to a threat of more MEND attacks, troops were sent to guard key oil facilities. MEND later denied that it had made any threat.

January 22, 2011: In the northeast, two soldiers were killed at roadblock by Boko Haran gunmen. There are apparently still several hundred armed Boko Haran out there. Since this Taliban-like group is on a mission from God, they are drawn to extreme actions and resistant to calls for negotiations or peace.

The army is unhappy about being accused of tolerating rogue troops, who take part in ethnic/religious violence, rather than halting it. The army would much prefer more media attention be given to the professionalism of Nigerian Army peacekeepers currently working in Sierra Leone, Liberia and Sudan. Corruption and misbehavior is more attractive to a journalist than a well-behaved peacekeeper. That won't change any time soon.

The EFCC (Economic and Financial Crimes Commission) has been increasing its raids and arrests, seeking to prosecute members of foreign oil companies who pay bribes, as well as Nigerian officials who take (and often demand) them. While much of the government corruption occurs when national oil revenue is simply stolen by senior officials, there are plenty of other opportunities to grab some oil money. But now there is fear that the EFCC has been corrupted, with some of the EFCC raids seen as supporting one corrupt faction or another.

January 26, 2011: In central Nigeria, around Jos, two Christian villages have been attacked five times in the last two weeks, leaving 34 villagers dead. Villagers accuse Moslem police and soldiers for many of the attacks. Police and army commanders deny this, although allow for the possibility of Moslem security personnel acting as vigilantes. The violence in central Nigeria is also ethnic, economic and political.

January 28, 2011: The religious/tribal conflict in Central Nigeria has killed over 200 in the last month, and the violence is continuing.

January 29, 2011: More religious violence broke out in the Central Nigerian city of Jos.

January 31, 2011: Violence in Central Nigeria continued, with at least fifteen killed in and around the city of Jos over the weekend. In response, another battalion of soldiers arrived in Jos today. Police did find and disarm a bomb in a church, avoiding dozens of injuries.

In the Niger Delta, another group of tribal rebels accepted the amnesty. The 94 men surrendered their weapons (16 guns) and pledged to fight no more. But if politicians continue stealing the money for the amnesty program, guys like this will be back in action before long.

February 3, 2011: In the north, Islamic radical group Boko Haram claimed responsibility for more than a dozen recent killings. These were mostly attacks on police and government officials, and Boko Haram was suspected. Police have arrested about twenty people as suspects, including Boko Haram members.

February 4, 2011: In central Nigeria, nearly a hundred more people died in religious violence over the last week. Government efforts to get the Christian and Moslem tribal groups to make peace have not succeeded. More troops and police arrive, but corruption and poor training often result in these security forces making things worse.

The organized violence in the Niger Delta has been greatly reduced by military and police action. But many of the armed men have simply gone back to purely gangster activities, leaving politically motivated violence behind. Thus there is a lot more crime in the Delta, which the police have a lot more difficulty dealing with. The big development projects promised by the government, have not yet shown up. There's still a lot of anger in the delta.

February 8, 2011; Islamic radical group Boko Haram has demanded that the army withdraw from the northeast, and stop searching for Boko members. If the troops do not leave, Boko Haram will continue its assassination campaign (which concentrates on politicians and security force commanders, not troops and street cops.) The government refuses to back down, and more troops are being sent after the pro-Taliban terror group.

February 12, 2011: Outside of Jos, in Central Nigeria, nine people were killed, and two beheaded, in the last few days. But police concluded that the deaths were either the result of a cattle ownership dispute, or black magic (the case were two heads were taken, but the cattle left behind.) It's a rough neighborhood, made deadlier by cheap AK-47s and religious enmity. About a thousand people have died in and around Jos in the last year because of religious and tribal violence.

In southern Imo State, a police reward program produced a tip that led to the arrest of a local arms dealer, and the seizure of seven assault rifles and over 4,000 rounds of ammo for them. The informant receive $6,500. The man captured with the weapons claimed he was only hired to move the cargo, and gave up information about who hired him. The illegal arms business is widespread and thriving. This is especially true in the months leading up to elections, when politicians seek to expand the number of armed men they have working on their election campaigns.

February 17, 2011: In the Niger Delta (Ondo State), a group of Ijaw tribesmen invaded a town, killed five people and kidnapped a tribal leader. The raiders believed some other tribal faction had killed one of their group, but the cause of that was still unclear. In this part of the country, tribal politics is rough, and often fatal. In the Niger Delta, the Ijaw are seen as aggressive and expansionist.

February 19, 2011: In the southeast (Enugu State), a bomb was found, and disarmed, at the scene of an upcoming political rally. Hundreds of lives were thus saved. The bomb plot is believed an attempt by rival parties to demoralize the opposition. Politics is very much a blood sport in some parts of the country.

February 20, 2011: In the northeast, soldiers found an abandoned vehicle containing three assault rifles, ammo, grenades and explosives. The vehicle and weapons were apparently owned by a group of gunmen who earlier encountered troops and were all killed. Lots of troops are in the northeast, searching for Boko Haram gunmen, but are sometimes encountering bandits or some armed tribal crew. The encounters often end in gunfire and dead bodies.

Despite repeated demands by Islamic radical group Boko Haram, police in northeast refuse to negotiate with the Taliban-like organization. Police are waiting for the results of the April elections, to see what newly elected politicians want to do with the growing number of armed Islamic militants in northern Nigeria.

February 21, 2011: In the Niger Delta, part of the peace deal with the tribal rebels was jobs. One of the largest job programs is 5,000 positions as oil pipeline watchmen. Several problems have developed. First, there are disputes between Ijaw and Itsekiri tribal groups over who should get more of these jobs. Then there are accusations that politicians are giving some of these jobs to supporters, rather than rebels who accepted the amnesty. Then there are disputes among the leaders of rebels who accepted the amnesty. Many of the former rebel leaders dispute how many of these watchmen jobs their crew are to receive, and there are threats to take up arms again if demands are not satisfied.

February 22, 2011: Outside of Jos, in Central Nigeria, a dozen people were killed during a nighttime raid. It's a rough neighborhood, made deadlier by cheap AK-47s and many old animosities. About a thousand people have died in and around Jos in the last year because of religious and tribal violence. There are also family feuds, some of them quite old.

February 24, 2011: In central Nigeria, Fulani tribal militias are again attacking villages belonging to the Tiv Tribe, leaving nearly 40 dead, and over 10,000 refugees. The tribal feuds over land are made worse by religious differences. The local governments have kept a lid on the violence for the last few years, but the unresolved land disputes, plus cultural differences between the Fulani herders and Tiv farmers, kept the animosity alive.

March 2, 2011: In northern Borno State, three armed members of Boko Haram fired on two policemen and killed them.

March 3, 2011: A bomb (apparently a grenade) went off at a PDP (ruling party) election rally in the Niger Delta (Niger state), killing ten. Boko Haram denied responsibility, and the motive was probably connected to the upcoming elections. Opposition politicians were suspected.

March 10, 2011: Ghana and Nigeria are developing joint plans to deal with the growing power of Nigerian oil smuggling gangs in Ghana. The oil is taken from punctured pipelines, into barrels, small barges or tanker trucks, and then transferred to small coastal tankers, which evade or bribe navy patrols to get their cargo to Ghana, where the oil is sold into the legitimate market, and exported. The income from this trade supports many of the criminal gangs in the Nigerian oil region (the Niger Delta). But increased military and police pressure in the last few years has put the Nigerian gangs on the defensive, forcing them to move some of their operations to Ghana.

March 11, 2011: In Central Nigeria, police found and seized a truck loaded with bomb making materials. Three months ago, there were a number of bombings in the area, because the truck full of explosives and other materials escaped detection.

March 13, 2011: In Central Nigeria, six Christians were killed in two attacks. In the northeast, gunmen killed an Islamic cleric who has been critical of Boko Haram.

March 15, 2011: In the Niger Delta, there was an explosion at an oil facility, which interrupted production. Rebel group MEND took credit for an attack, while the government insisted it was an accident.

March 20, 2011: In central Nigeria, two bomb attacks on Christians were avoided. In one case, the two men placing the bomb, set it off while arming it. In the other case, two men were spotted arming their bomb, and chased away. The bomb was captured and disabled. There are growing rumors of international terrorist organizations recruiting suicide bombers in Nigeria. Mostly, this appears to be rumor and gossip, but it's something the media love to keep after.

March 27, 2011: In the northeast, a Boko Haran death squad killed local political candidate who opposed Islamic radicalism.

March 31, 2011: Two bombs were found and defused at a rally for presidential candidate Muhammadu Buhari.

Failure to complete preparations on time have caused upcoming elections to be delayed a week. Thus on April 9th the vote for parliament will be held, April 16th for president and April 26th for governors and state legislatures. Parliament votes have been delayed once already. The inability to properly organize elections is seen by most Nigerians as an example of how incompetent so many of their government officials are. Millions of voters were already at the voting places, or on their way, when they heard the vote would be delayed.

April 2, 2011: In the last two days, three villages and a police station in the northeast were attacked by Islamic radical group Boko Haram. At least three people were killed, and many more wounded.

April 5, 2011: This time around, voting related violence is still high, but police have been more successful at stopping bomb and gun attacks. Police have managed to halt most of the religious violence in Central Nigeria. In the last hundred days, about 200 people have been killed in the area, mostly around the city of Jos.

April 8, 2011: A bomb went off in Central Nigeria, killing about twenty people preparing for the national vote.

April 9, 2011: In the north, a man was killed when the bomb he was carrying went off prematurely. The victim was believed to be the bomb builder responsible for constructing several bombs used to attack rival political party campaigns.

April 14, 2011: A terrorist bomb, directed at disrupting the vote, went off in the northern city of Maiduguri.

Another terrorist bomb, directed at disrupting the vote, went off in the northern city of Maiduguri. Police went after groups seeking to disrupt the election, arresting hundreds, and scaring off thousands of the usual election "enforcer" thugs. But there have been several bombings throughout the country.

April 15, 2011: The People's Democratic Party (PDP), and its presidential candidate, incumbent president Goodluck Jonathan, won 57 percent of the vote. There were several Moslem candidates, but the most successful of them, Muhammadu Buhari of the Congress for Progressive Change (CPC), got only 31 percent of the vote. Buhari supporters are behind most of the violence that broke out in reaction to the vote. The PDP has a long history of rigging votes, and Buhari supporters used this to justify their violence. But foreign observers declared this vote honest, and this is expected to eventually curb the violence. One reason Johnson got so many votes was because voters were aware that, for once, the government had made a real (and effective) effort to curb the vote rigging that had been so common in the past. Today's vote was supposed to take place earlier this month, but was halted when it was clear that there was too much rigging, and outright incompetence, for a fair vote. Thus the delay, and successful elimination of most of the rigging. About 73.5 million Nigerians were registered to vote for the president, as well as 109 senators and 360 members of the House of Representatives.

April 18, 2011: The Commonwealth Observer Group concluded that the April 15 elections were generally free and fair.

WikiLeaks documents indicate that American diplomats believed that most of the oil theft in the Niger Delta was done by, or with, gangs controlled by military or political leaders. This was seen as yet another example of government corruption, and many of the gangs that stole oil, also served as enforcers (especially during elections) of politicians and political parties.

April 19, 2011: Dozens of violent riots have broken out in northern cities, as angry Moslems protest the failure to elect a Moslem president in the recent elections. The violence has been going on, and growing, for three days. Churches and mosques in the Moslem north have been burnt. More police and troops have been sent to the most violent areas. The government believes that it will be able to contain the unrest. For decades, there has been an unofficial agreement that Moslems and Christians would alternate as president. Many Moslems are angry that Goodluck Johnson, who took over when the previous Moslem president died in office, should now be president for a full term. Johnson has won a fair election, with many Moslems voting for him. But control of the presidency is worth a lot of money and power, and many Moslems are angry that they have not got the presidency back after Johnson's abbreviated rule as a Christian president.

April 22, 2011: In the north, Boko Haram gunmen raided and prison and freed 14 men. This is the latest of several Boko Haram prison raids.

April 23, 2011: In the northern city of Kaduna, two bomb makers died when the devices they were building accidentally went off. These two were supplying gangs trying to influence the upcoming parliamentary elections. It turned out that this was also a bomb building school, and one of the students had screwed up.

April 24, 2011: In northern Kaduna State, police arrested eight men, including a Boko Haram leader, and accused them of building and placing bombs.

In the Niger Delta, police found and defused three bombs, apparently related to gangs hired by politicians to influence voting.

April 25, 2011: Three bombs went off in the northern city of Maiduguri, the capital of Bono state. Three died and 14 were wounded. These were believed the work of Islamic radical group Boko Haram.

April 26, 2011: Three more bombs went off in the northern city of Maiduguri.

April 27, 2011: In Delta State, the heart of oil country, the incumbent governor (Emmanuel Uduaghan) was reelected. This was seen as a defeat for tribal rebels, who promised more unrest. Many in Delta State consider Uduaghan corrupt, but many others see him as a reformer, particularly in light of his long career as a medical doctor.

May 9, 2011: Boko Haram denounced an amnesty offer by the government. But some members may accept it, which is how these things usually work.

May 11, 2011: In Delta State, troops clashed with NDLF (Nigeria Delta Liberation Force) gunmen, resulting in ten or more casualties. These rebels are led by John Togo, a former leader of MEND, the now defunct coalition that fought for reform in the oil region. Togo now leads NDLF which is similar, but much smaller, than MEND.

May 12, 2011: Thousands of additional police have been sent to the northern states of Borno, Bauchi, Kaduna, Niger, Plateau and Kano to deal with increased terrorist activity by Boko Haram.

May 14, 2011: A roadside bomb went off in the northern city of Maiduguri, killing two people. This was believed the work of Islamic radical group Boko Haram.

May 15, 2011: In the northern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram gunmen fought a 30 minute battle with troops.

May 16, 2011: As more troops go looking for members of the rebel NDLF in Delta State, NDLF has agreed to negotiate, and discuss accepting amnesty. NDLF considered the recent elections rigged, but their threats against the government had no effect, other than to bring more troops and police into the area they operated in.

May 17, 2011: In the northern city of Maiduguri, police have arrested over 150 people suspected of belonging to Islamic terror group Boko Haram. Heavily influenced by the Taliban, Boko Haram has been trying to establish a religious dictatorship in the north, but without much success. Nevertheless, Boko Haram has attracted new recruits, and increased the number of attacks they carry out. Many Moslems in the north believe that only the adoption of Sharia (Islamic law) will solve the problems caused by corruption and bad government.

May 18, 2011: Anti-corruption officials are planning to indict nine state governors at the end of the month, when the terms of office (and immunity from prosecution) for outgoing governments expires. Police are on alert, as some of these men may attempt to flee the country, and all will use the millions they stole to avoid punishment. Often that succeeds, but at least the anti-corruption commission is allowed to go after the worst cases. These investigations and prosecutions are increasingly successful. But at this point, the corrupt politicians are still winning.

May 19, 2011: In the northeast, three soldiers and two policemen were injured by bombs. Boko Haram was suspected.

May 23, 2011: In the south (Lagos) a soldier refused to let police search his vehicle at a checkpoint, and was shot dead. Police are seen as much more corrupt than soldiers, and often demand bribes before letting vehicles through roadblocks.

In the south (Lagos) angry soldiers, seeking revenge for one of their own killed by police the day before, killed ten policemen, including two commanders.

May 24, 2011: In the northeast, Boko Haram members murdered a policeman.

May 26, 2011: In the northeast, Boko Haram members murdered a prison guard.

May 28, 2011: In northern Borno state, Boko Haram Islamic terrorists attacked two police bases and a bank, leaving four policemen and nine civilians dead.

May 29, 2011: Hours after president Goodluck Johnson was sworn in, five bombs went off in the north, killing 16 people and wounding many more. Islamic radical group Boko Haram took credit.

June 5, 2011: Anti-corruption officials arrested the former speaker of parliament, who just left office and lost his immunity. It was feared that the former speaker, who is accused of stealing more than $60 million over four years, would flee the country.

June 6, 2011: : In the northwest, a imam of a large mosque was assassinated for preaching against Boko Haram.

June 7, 2011: In the northeastern town of Maiduguri, Boko Haram members attacked three police stations, leaving at least ten police and attackers dead.

Since the April 15th national elections, political violence has left 520 dead, nearly all of them in north central Kaduna state. Property damage was also extensive, with 157 churches, 46 mosques and 1435 houses destroyed, along with over 650 vehicles. The politically motivated violence was largely carried out by Moslems angry that they did not gain the presidency. When attacked, local Christians often retaliated.

June 8, 2011: The government is willing to negotiate with Boko Haram over the demand that Sharia (Islamic law) be enforced more vigorously in the north. The problem with such negotiations is that the more radical members of Boko Haram want more (turning the country into a religious dictatorship) than the government can afford to give. Boko Haram has been waging a terror campaign for eight months now.

Four months ago, the police and military made a major effort to shut down the oil stealing operations in the Niger River delta. These were seemingly successful, with hundreds of illegal mini-refineries shut down and dozens of barges and small coastal tankers (for moving stolen oil to neighboring countries for sale to brokers) seized. But most of the oil thieves, especially the gang leaders, got away. Now many are getting back in business. It will take a while for the security forces to organize another major operation. Aware of that, the oil stealing gangs are out to make what they can in the meantime.

Although anti-corruption arrests and prosecutions increase, politicians still plunder the public purse with impunity. This is because only a small percentage of corrupt politicians are being prosecuted. The others can do the math and calculate that the risk of getting punished is still quite small.

June 9, 2011: Most of the violence is now in the north, caused by Islamic radicals. Heavily influenced by the Taliban, Boko Haram has been trying to establish a religious dictatorship in the north for several years, but without much success. Nevertheless, Boko Haram keeps attracting new recruits, and has consistently increased the number of attacks they carry out. Many Moslems in the north believe that only the adoption of Sharia (Islamic law) will solve the problems caused by corruption and bad government. Police have arrested hundreds of suspects, but the violence continues.

June 10, 2011: In response to attacks on three police stations on the 7th, police have arrested hundreds of suspected Islamic militants, especially men thought to be attracted to Boko Haram.

June 16, 2011: In the capital, a suicide bomber attacked police headquarters, killing five people. The bomber was believed to be a foreigner (Sudanese or Somali). In the north, near Maiduguri, a bomb went off near a church, killing four children. This was believed to be another Boko Haram attack.

June 18, 2011: Boko Haram took credit for the recent suicide bomb attack in the capital.

June 19, 2011: Over the weekend, police raided known Boko Haram hideouts and meeting places in the northern city of Maiduguri and arrested 58 suspects (including some Somalis). Elsewhere in Maiduguri, Boko Haram gunmen fired on a group of men playing cards (something seen as un-Islamic), killing two people.

In the Niger River delta, two policemen were ambushed while patrolling in a rural area.

June 20, 2011: In the northern city of Kankara, on the Niger border, a dozen armed men (believed to be Boko Haram members) attacked a bank, took a large quantity of cash, gave a lot of it out to civilians before attacking a police station. All this left five policemen and one civilian dead.

Vigorous anti-corruption efforts have been underway for eight years now. Some $11 billion has been recovered, and over 600 people have been prosecuted. But much more money has been stolen in the past eight years (not to mention the decades before that) and most of those prosecuted escaped punishment. The corrupt officials are being hurt, but they are still winning.

Boko Haram violence is not widespread in the north, and is increasingly carried out more for media attention, than to actually threaten government control. Islamic radicalism has proved incapable of ending corruption in the north, and its use to ban certain entertainments has caused growing anger.

June 21, 2011: The June 16 Islamic militant bombing attack was the first in Nigeria using suicide bombers. Boko Haram, the most active Islamic militants in the north, have, despite intense police pressure, promised more bombing attacks. The police say they will crush Boko Haram, but the Islamic radicals have been active for two years and have expanded the number and intensity of their attacks. Boko Haram is willing to negotiate a peace deal with the government, but only if Sharia (Islamic) law is strictly enforced in 12 northern states (out of 36 in Nigeria). This demand has been causing religious tensions in the north for most of the last decade. Some northern states are increasing pressure on non-Moslems to adhere to Islamic law. For example, some officials are no longer taking bribes to allow southern breweries to truck in beer for Christian (and Moslem) customers in Christian neighborhoods. This makes Christians, who are not supposed to be subject to Sharia, angry, thus laying the groundwork for another round of religious violence.

June 22, 2011: Troops were sent to Ekpan, a town in the Niger Delta, where youth gangs sponsored by rival politicians have gone to war with each other. Several dead and many wounded so far, and the troops were called in before the violence grew. Sponsoring and financing youth gangs is a common practice, but sometimes gang rivalries get out of control (of the sponsors) and the police or army has to intervene.

The commander of the army announced that training had been modified for troops headed north to deal with Islamic terrorists (mainly Boko Haram). The army has a reputation of getting out-of-control when dealing with civilian unrest or counter-terrorism. Even the army brass realize that good relations with civilians is essential if the army is to cope with Islamic terrorists. The question is, can new training change the savage army traditions? The police are no better. Two police commanders are currently being prosecuted for executing two Boko Haram leaders two years ago.

June 26, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram bombed a beer garden, killing 25 and wounding many more. Boko Haram believes everyone in the Moslem north should obey Islamic (Sharia) law, and that means no alcohol. Christians in the north don't go along with this, nor do many Moslems. But Boko Haram is willing to kill to get their way, but now, so are many of the beer drinkers.

June 27, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram set off another bomb, killing three more.

June 28, 2011: About 3,000 soldiers have arrived in the northeastern city of Maiduguri, to deal with the increased Boko Haram violence.

June 29, 2011: In the capital (Abuja) a curfew has been imposed, forcing bars and clubs (favorite Boko Haram targets) to close at 10 PM. The government believes that terror attacks in the capital are the logical next step for Boko Haram and many new security measures are being implemented to prevent this.

Even outlaws have problems with corruption. For example, since last year, five leaders of Niger Delta rebel gangs, who accepted the amnesty, have been murdered. Other leaders feared a secret army program to murder the rebel leaders to prevent them from discarding the amnesty and going back to their evil ways. Further investigation revealed that the dead leaders had been killed by followers who believed their bosses had stolen amnesty funds lower ranking rebels were to have received.

The police have, without success, tried to establish communications with Boko Haram. This is to be expected. Two years ago, Boko Haram launched an even more ambitious uprisings, with large scale attacks on police stations and other government facilities (as well as churches). The police put that down by seizing hundreds or real, or suspected, Islamic militants. The police tortured many, and summarily executed suspected leaders. This led to a lot of public outrage up north, and some police commanders were arrested and prosecuted. All this aided Boko Haram in rebuilding themselves. Boko 2.0, however, is more into terror than insurrection, partly because it is not as large as the 2009 version, and expects the worst if caught by police or soldiers.

But these terror tactics, new to Nigeria, have failed everywhere else. The problem is that the use of bombs kills the civilians that the Islamic militants depend on for support and protection (that is, not giving information to the police.) Normally, Nigerians avoid the army and police. But when they fear Boko Haram terrorism more, they will tip off the security forces, and that is a death sentence for the terrorists. Boko Haram is depending on the army and police to continue being savage and corrupt, even though army and police commanders insist that new, and effective, counter-terror techniques will be employed. Time will tell, and quickly.

Boko Haram is popular because it fights to eliminate the corruption that stifles the economy, and much else, in Nigeria. While the Christian southerners (and many Moslems) believe that clean government will solve the problem, Boko Haram wants a religious (Islamic) dictatorship, such as the one the Taliban established in Afghanistan in the 1990s. That approach has never worked, but for the Islamic fanatics, on a Mission From God, such realities don't matter. Killing unbelievers is fulfilling, and demonstrates that something is being done.

June 30, 2011: Islamic militant group Boko Haram has gotten everyone's attention with a string of bombings. But the group has been around for nine years, in the northeast, and grew slowly. Four years ago, the violence began to grow, and two years ago, hundreds of Boko Haram members were making attacks on police and government targets. That uprising was savagely put down. The new one will be more difficult to deal with.

July 1, 2011: After more than two weeks, oil shipments have resumed in the Niger Delta. The two week halt was needed to repair damaged (by oil thieves) pipelines, and improve security.

July 3, 2011: In the north, police arrested over a hundred people believed to be members of Boko Haram. Over the weekend, at least ten people died from Islamic terrorist violence In Maiduguri.

July 6, 2011: In the northeast, Boko Haram men raided a police station and looted it of weapons and ammunition. In Maiduguri, four policemen were killed by Boko Haram.

July 7, 2011: To eliminate Boko Haram's favorite mode of transportation, police banned the use of motorcycles in the northeastern city of Maiduguri. Boko Haram adapted, but several thousand people were put out of work by the ban.

July 9, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, raids on suspected Boko Haram hideouts left at least 17 terrorists and civilians dead.

In the northern town of Suleja, Boko Haram bombed a church, killing four Christians.

July 10, 2011: In the northern city of Kaduna, Boko Haram bombed a beer garden, killing ten and wounding many more. Boko Haram believes everyone in the Moslem north should obey Islamic (Sharia) law, and that means no alcohol. Christians in the north don't go along with this, nor do many Moslems. But Boko Haram is willing to kill to get their way, but now, so are many of the beer drinkers.

July 12, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Islamic terrorists made at least four attacks, killing fifty people.

July 15, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, a bomb was thrown at a police vehicle. Elsewhere in the city, a car bomb wounded seven civilians. To the south, in the national capital, police intercepted a truck carrying bomb making materials.

July 16, 2011: In the Niger delta town of Oha, police found and disabled a bomb outside the compound of a local leader.

Decades of corruption has crippled the economy and made crime an attractive career choice for young people. Thus the popularity of oil theft in the Niger delta, and sale of drugs countrywide. The most successful criminals join (often via a bribe) the police or army, or get themselves elected to a job that controls money. All this has produced increasing calls to deal with the corruption. The Boko Haram violence is an approach common in Moslem countries. It appeals to many Moslems, because nothing else has worked.

In the Niger delta, there are continuing demonstrations against the oil companies, who usually respond with something. Demonstrating against the government can get you beaten up or killed. Meanwhile, the security forces are increasing their efforts against gangs that steal oil and sell it locally or in adjacent countries. Throughout the country, there is a steady increase in vigilante violence, as criminals are chased down and killed by mobs of people fed up with the growing crime.

Meanwhile, Boko Haram offers a ceasefire, if all soldiers are withdrawn from the north. Local politicians are trying to work out peace deals with Boko Haram, but the Islamic militants want control of the north, and the imposition of strict Islamic law (Sharia). This is unacceptable to the politicians, who would be out of a job, or in prison, if that happened.

July 17, 2011: The Islamic terror group Boko Haram have become a major problem in northeastern Borno State, and especially its capital Maiduguri. Over 40,000 people (out of 1.2 million) have fled the capital, and local leaders believe that the corrupt and violent police are part of the problem. Many of those who fled had businesses or lucrative jobs. Boko Haram violence in the city has killed over 150 so far this year. The government has sent thousands of police and army reinforcements. Most of these security forces just stand guard, hoping to discourage an attack, or catch some Boko Haram in the act. In addition, there are hundreds of plain-clothes police sent to the city, where they have had some success in collecting information on who the terrorists are and where they live. But the regular police and soldiers are prone to robbery and rape, and the locals don't like it. The federal, and state, government know the security forces are part of the problem, but fear withdrawing them from the city will just hand Maiduguri over to Boko Haram. A growing number officials in Borno are admitting that the security forces are criminally violent against innocent civilians, and this just creates more support for Boko Haram and criminal gangs. Changing the culture of the security forces is a formidable task, and there's no prospect that the government is willing or able to deal with the problem.

July 21, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, a bomb went off near a police vehicle, injuring no one. But then there was gunfire, and two people were wounded.

July 23, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, a bomb went off near the compound of a tribal leader, killing eight civilians. Troops responded by going to a nearby market place and killing more than twenty people. The troops said they were fired on, civilians say the soldiers just began shooting.

July 24, 2011: At the site of a terrorist bombing in the northeast, police report they were fired on, and returned fire, killing a suspected Boko Haram terrorist. Meanwhile, a Boko Haram splinter group, Yusufiyya Islamic Movement, announced that it was opposed to large scale attacks on civilians. Boko Haram responded with declarations that there were no splinter factions and that the Yusufiyya Islamic Movement was invented by police. What is known is that Boko Haram has gone through some violent leadership changes in the last few years. The current leadership survived all that, mainly by being more ruthless and homicidal. But leaders of this group are not noted for their long tenure.

While job training and amnesty defused the rebellious gangs in the delta, those solutions are not working against Boko Haram. These guys are on a Mission From God and will not be bought off. It's a fight to the death, and local civilians worry that they will provide most of the dead bodies. The army and police talk about a kinder and gentler campaign against the Boko Haram, but there's only been a little evidence of that.

Despite retraining programs and amnesty, the gangs are making a comeback in the Niger Delta. Oil companies say they are losing over 100,000 barrels a day to organized oil theft gangs (who get less than $20 a barrel). But that's over a million dollars a day to the gangs, and that buys a lot of weapons and gunmen. When there are enough gangsters active, some of them get into politics. It's the Nigerian way.

Part of the Boko Haram problem is political. As is the case in many Moslem areas, local politicians seek to gain votes by being more Islamic than their rivals. This does not lead to supporting Boko Haram, but it does extend to praising some Boko Haram goals (less corruption, more prayer and virtuous living). Many of the politicians using this approach are still corrupt, both professionally and personally, but appearing more Islamic and radical is undeniably popular.

The army also has a reputation for brutality, and not getting along with the police. But the troops are better disciplined, and easier to adapt to new techniques. For that reason, army commanders are confident that they can shut down Boko Haram. All of this talk from the police and army is just that. Boko Haram is still out there terrorizing and recruiting.

July 30, 2011: In the northeast, Maiduguri, the state capital of Borno, is in a state of panic because of frequent Boko Haram terror attacks. At the same time, the police have admitted they have a problem with being too brutal and corrupt, and not sufficiently professional. This has been hurting the police in their efforts to track down and destroy Boko Haram (an organizations that exists, in part, to oppose brutal and corrupt police.) Now that everyone is in agreement about police shortcomings, police commanders are declaring that they will reform the police even while Boko Haram is being run down and destroyed. No one, including Boko Haram, believes that is possible. But the cops are demonstrating better behavior of late, and are getting more leads from civilians as a result. That is largely because Boko Haram is, in many ways, more unpopular than the police. Boko Haram will terrorize civilians it believes are hostile to Islamic radicalism, and are cooperating with the police. Boko Haram also seems unconcerned with civilian deaths as a result of bomb attacks on security forces or government officials. Also unpopular are the lifestyle rules Boko Haram intends to enforce. Already, many schools in the northeast have been forced to close because of terrorist threats. Even religious schools are not allowed if they do not teach the very conservative Islam that Boko Haram espouses. Thus while Boko Haram has many supporters in the Moslem north, it turns them into opponents the longer the Islamic radical group is in an area.

July 30, 2011: In the central Nigerian city of Jos, a bomb went off, causing no injuries.

July 31, 2011: In the central Nigerian city of Jos, a bomb went off, causing no injuries. Jos has, for months, been the scene of deadly violence between Moslems and Christians.

August 2, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, gunfire and an explosion left two people dead and two wounded. Boko Haram was apparently responsible.

In northern Bauchi State, four policemen were wounded when someone, apparently Boko Haram members, threw a crude bomb at them.

August 8, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, near Nigeria's border with Cameroon, Chad and Niger, Boko Haram gunmen killed a prison official and a schoolteacher. Such attacks are meant to terrorize the city, a tactic which has been successful. But the Islamic terrorists do not have the manpower to actually take over the city. Terrorizing is the worst they can do.

In the Niger Delta, fifty years of oil production has left millions of barrels of oil spilled into the local waterways and, increasingly, in the drinking water. Most of this leakage was the result of oil theft (tapping into pipelines, and stealing some of what gushed out, leaving the rest to flow into the waterways of the delta). Most of the oil revenue has been stolen by corrupt government officials, leaving very little to pay for over a decade of cleanup efforts (which will apparently never happen.)

Boko Haram has taken advantage of the fear they have created to threaten more attacks in the Christian south. This increases their popularity in the Moslem north (because of the ancient north/south, Christian/Moslem rivalries). But it also spurs the government to actually do something to destroy Boko Haram. This usually ends up as a lot of heavy handed army and police operations, which leave the bad guys dead, along with a lot of innocent civilians.

August 12, 2011: The government has no fix for the Boko Haram Islamic terror group in the north. Negotiations are unlikely to solve anything, because Boko Haram is all about establishing a religious dictatorship in northern (Moslem) Nigeria, and eventually throughout the entire region. Boko Haram is sustained by popular opposition to the widespread corruption in the country. Even the adoption of Islamic law (Sharia) in the north over the last few years has not done much for the corruption problem. Too many leaders, both political and religious, are corrupt. The north is worse off because it has higher illiteracy and a weaker economy. Under these conditions, Islamic radicalism is always a tempting solution to many. But most northerners do not back the Boko Haram solution. At the same time, few in the north trust the army or police to cope with the Boko Haram violence.

August 15, 2011: In the northwest, five armed men attacked a police station, killing four policemen and two civilians caught in the crossfire. One of the attackers was captured, and it’s believed the gunmen were criminals, not Boko Haram.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, police shot and killed a man driving an explosives laden car towards the local police headquarters. It was apparently a suicide car bombing attempt.

August 16, 2011: For the second time this year, the army is trying military personnel for assisting Boko Haram members to escape from military jails. Earlier this year, it was NCOs being tried, but this time the court martial is for a brigadier general.

August 19, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, police arrested a man suspected of supplying explosives to Boko Haram for suicide bombing attacks.

August 20, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, gunmen entered the home of a policeman, and shot the home owner, two other police and a civilian who were watching television together. Boko Haram is believed responsible, although it could have been a criminal gang dealing with a troublesome policeman.

August 21, 2011: In central Nigeria, Moslems attacked a Christian village and killed two people.

August 26, 2011: In the capital, a car bomb went off in a UN compound, killing 19 people. Boko Haram claimed credit, and said they did it to punish the UN and the United States for aiding the Nigerian government in oppressing Moslems.

August 27, 2011: Off the coast, pirates boarded a Cameroonian passenger ship (carrying 150 people) and took the captain away. Inspired by the Somalia pirates, the Nigerian pirates have been increasingly kidnapping senior officers on ships, in addition to their usual theft of whatever they could carry away. These kidnappings do not always work, as the police know many of the usual suspects, and where they hang out on the coast. So the pirates have developed other ways to make money. In this case, the armed men appeared to be operating an extortion scam, and argued with the captain over non-payment of the "monthly security tax." The captain said he had already paid; the armed men disagreed, and took the captain with them.

It is generally believed that Boko Haram is using suicide bomb attacks outside the Moslem north in an attempt to cause widespread chaos. With the federal and state government distracted by this, Boko Haram could take control of large areas. This is fantasy, as Nigeria is already largely chaos. Boko Haram's official goal is the imposition of Islamic law (Sharia) on the country, in order to eliminate the chaos and corruption. Most Nigerians are opposed to the use of Sharia like this. Boko Haram is not the only Islamic radical group to show up in Nigeria, but it is the first one to possess the ability to carry out numerous suicide bomber attacks. The government still has a task force studying Boko Haram and figuring out what to do. If they ask the Americans or Israelis, they will discover that you can stop the bombings by hunting down the few Boko Haram members who know how to build the bombs.

August 29, 2011: Although the government has arrested over 200 suspected Boko Haram members, there have been few prosecutions. Apparently many judges refuse to try Boko Haram members, because the Islamic radicals have a reputation for murdering those involved in opposing them. These attacks include family members. Judges either do not believe the police can protect them, or do not wish to live under threat of attack.

September 4, 2011: Moslem mobs began attacking Christian churches in central Nigeria (around Jos). The Moslems claim that some of them were attacked at recent end-of-Ramadan celebrations, but Christian leaders deny this. The attacks went on for several days, causing over fifty casualties, most of them Christian and fourteen of them fatal.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, someone shot to death an Islamic scholar. Boko Haram is suspected, as these Islamic terrorists often murder religious leaders who preach against terrorism.

September 5, 2011: Religious violence around the central Nigerian city of Jos in the last week has now killed more than fifty people, most of them Christians.

September 6, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, two bombs went off. There were no deaths.

September 7, 2011: The government said it had arrested 300 of 500 known Boko Haram members, and was pursuing key members (leaders, fund raisers, bomb builders) of the Islamic radical organization.

September 8, 2011: Police in the capital have found a Boko Haram bomb building workshop, and arrested six people associated with it. One of those arrested was from Niger. However, this operation apparently had nothing to do with the bombing of a UN compound last month.

Government efforts to halt oil thefts in the Niger River delta has also exposed the fact that a lot of these oil thefts (from tapping into oil pipelines) are carried out under the protection of military and political leaders (who get a cut of the proceeds). All forms of oil theft are believed to account for about ten percent of oil production each year.

The inability of the government to quickly and accurately collect information on Boko Haram, and other Islamic radical operations, is apparently due to morale problems inside the main intelligence gathering agency; the Department of State Security. Poor leadership at the top, and what appears to be corruption are major factors. Intelligence agents complain that much of their pay (bonuses, vacation pay and clothing allowances) has disappeared without explanation. This sort of thing is all-too-common in government agencies. Plundering payroll funds is a favorite scam of corrupt officials and politicians. Recent wikileaks revelations detailed how many of the first Boko Haram members arrested for terrorism 3-4 years ago, were released because of political pressure from northern politicians (who wanted to conceal the outbreak of Islamic radicalism in the Moslem north.) Now, many of those who were released are under arrest again, or being sought, for more recent attacks and terrorism deaths. In addition, one of the Boko Haram leaders being sought was believed to have returned from Somalia recently, and played a key role in the UN compound bombing last month. Somalia has become a base for many al Qaeda members chased out of Pakistan and Arabia. Boko Haram has taken credit for that UN bombing, and says it was done because the UN oppresses Moslems worldwide. This is a favorite al Qaeda theme.

September 9, 2011: The army continues to have problems controlling its troops. For example, when a civilian, usually Boko Haram, shoots a soldier, and is not caught, local troops will often go to the town or village where it happened and shoot civilians while looting and burning property. The army sometimes threatens to unleash this kind of mayhem as a weapon. Such is the case in the central Nigerian town of Jos, where Moslem violence against Christians is out of control.

September 10, 2011: Outside the central Nigerian city of Jos, Moslem tribesmen attacked a Christian village and killed 14 people from the same family.

September 11, 2011: In the central Nigerian city of Jos, two bombs went off. With so much religious violence in Jos, it was assumed the bombs were planted by one religious faction or another.

September 12, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram gunmen entered a tavern and killed four men and wounded another. Boko Haram wants all alcoholic drinks banned from the Moslem north.

September 14, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram gunmen killed three and wounded two.

September 18, 2011: In northern Kaduna state, Moslem tribesmen attacked a Christian village, killing three and wounding eight.

September 19, 2011: The government offered a $160,000 reward for information leading to the mastermind of the August 26 terror attack on the UN building in the capital (which killed 23). So far, the government has only arrested four lower-ranking Boko Haram members, who appear to have had something to do with the attack. Over a dozen others were arrested most of them had nothing to do with the attack.

September 22, 2011: While rebellion and unrest still simmers in the Niger Delta oil region, most of the current violence is in the Moslem north. There, increasingly militant Moslems have been attacking Christians. The fanatics are a minority, who hope to inspire wider acceptance of Islamic radicalism. So far, that has not happened, and the federal government is trying to suppress the Islamic radicals without making their cause any more popular. One thing that makes the Islamic radicals popular is the widespread corruption. The Islamic radicals insist they are the cure. That has not been the case elsewhere, and many Moslem Nigerians distrust the radicals on this point. But corruption remains a big issue for the government, because reducing the stealing has proved more difficult that many expected.

September 23, 2011: Customs inspectors in the port of Lagos discovered a 40 foot shipping container that was supposed to contain industrial equipment, actually was filled with explosives and detonators. It's not known if this was for terrorists, criminals or just another bit of smuggling.

September 26, 2011: In the Niger River Delta, an oil field has been shut down indefinitely until police can eliminate the oil thieves operating in the area. The oil thieves punch a hole into an oil pipeline, catch oil in barrels or tanker trucks, and then leave without plugging the hole. Thus the surrounding area becomes polluted until the puncture is detected, the oil pumps turned off and the pipeline repaired. This can take hours or days, and much damage is done in the meantime.

September 28, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, police said they had arrested a senior Boko Haram commander. Police have closed universities and banned motorbikes (frequently used for terrorist attacks) in the city.

September 29, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram attacked an army patrol, but killed three nearby civilians.

October 3, 2011: In the northeast, Boko Haram attacks left three dead in the last two days.

October 4, 2011: In Central Nigeria, two more people were shot dead, in what is believed to be another bit of religious violence.

In Northern Zamfara State, police have arrested seven men in an attempt to stop a cycle of revenge attacks that has left over a hundred dead in the last two months. The seven suspects were believed responsible for a recent attack that left 19 dead. The attacks began last August, and have turned into a deadly feud. This kind of communal violence is common in Nigeria, and the cause of thousands of deaths a year.

The federal government has decided not to try and negotiate with Boko Haram. This decision was driven by Boko Haram's determination to overthrow the democratic government in Nigeria and establish a religious dictatorship. Arrested Boko Haram members have said that if there were negotiations, they would be used mainly for propaganda.

October 6, 2011: In the north, tribal rulers, who still exercise a lot of influence, are being urged by politicians to be more outspoken against Boko Haram. But the tribal rulers realize that Boko Haram expresses a popular dissatisfaction with the way the country is being run. It's all about the corruption and mismanagement. The tribal leaders share in some of the corruption, but also stay in touch with the people they represent. Boko Haram is hostile to some tribal leaders, but is mainly targeting politicians and corrupt officials.

October 7, 2011: Three former state governors were arrested for stealing over $600 million. The accused will use a lot of that money to defend themselves, and this strategy often works.

October 9, 2011: Outside the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram is believed responsible for setting off a bomb outside a church. There were several wounded. Anti-Christian violence has been growing in the Islamic north, along with anger against government corruption. Islamic conservatives insist that Islamic (Sharia) law would solve the corruption problem. This has not worked elsewhere, but hope springs eternal.

Pirates released a 35,000 ton tanker, and its crew of 20, that was taken on the 8th. It's unclear if ransom was paid, because, unlike Somalia, there is no safe place for Nigerian pirates to park a stolen ship while ransom is negotiated. What exactly went on here is murky. Normally, pirates board ships, carry off whatever is portable and take a few senior officers to hold for ransom. But in this case, the pirates may have offloaded some or all of the 30,000 tons of oil the ship carried before the police and navy were aware that the tanker had been taken.

October 13, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram is believed responsible for the murder of a prison guard. By intimidating prison guards, it becomes easier to break Boko Haram men out of jail.

October 14, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram is believed responsible for the murder of a policeman.

October 15, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram murdered the head of a pro-government vigilante group.

October 16, 2011: In northeastern Borno State, Boko Haram apparently assassinated a member of parliament. Earlier in the day, in neighboring Gombe State, a police barracks was attacked with bombs and gunfire, with three attackers and one policeman killed. This was also attributed to Boko Haram.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, police are accused of attacking innocent civilian and destroying property as the security forces seek out Boko Haram members.

October 18, 2011: Islamic terror group Boko Haram continues to carry out terror attacks. Despite a massive military and police response, Boko Haram has plenty of new recruits. That's because Boko Haram is against the corruption and inept government that has gotten worse every year for decades. While many Nigerians are repelled by the doctrine (Islamic dictatorship) and tactics (terrorism) of Boko Haram, many young Moslem men are drawn to the organization anyway.

October 19, 2011: Self-styled defenders of Christians in the Niger Delta issued a letter ordering all Moslems to leave the area. Boko Haram terror attacks and Moslem violence against Christians was mentioned as the reason. Police insist that the letter, left at a Delta area mosque is a hoax, or just the ranting of a few southerners. However, hundreds, if not thousands, of Delta Moslems were seen to flee their homes. The violence up north has sent many Christians south, to areas where Moslems are not the majority. This religious (and tribal) violence has been present for decades, but Boko Haram is trying to turn it into a wider Moslem war of conquest.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram murdered four more people.

October 20, 2011: In the Niger Delta, police caught over fifty oil thieves (and arrested 46) in the act of loading stolen oil from 14 small boats to a seagoing tanker. A week earlier, 50 oil thieves were captured in a similar situation. In the last three months, over 2,000 small, improvised oil refineries (that produced kerosene) were found and shut down.

October 22, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, a Boko Haram killed a TV journalist at his home. This was the first journalist (actually, a TV cameraman) killed by the Islamic terror group.

October 23, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, a Boko Haram roadside bomb went off near a police vehicle, causing damage and light injuries.

October 27, 2011: Boko Haram threatens to kill more journalists, unless the media shows the Islamic terror group some more respect. The terrorists were also angry about journalists getting information from people, who said they represented Boko Haram, but did not. While the police and army are energetically seeking out and arresting suspected Boko Haram followers and leaders, some members of the group are still carrying out one or two attacks a week. The basic problems (corruption and government mismanagement) that gave rise to Boko Haram are still there, and it's expected that the Islamic radical movement will persevere.

October 28, 2011: The government admitted that illegal gold mining in northern Zamfara state had killed at least 400 children, and made over a thousand more very sick. This was because the illegal mining operations used poisonous chemicals to extract the gold from the mined earth, and the lead that was also extracted ended up in the local water supply. Children are most vulnerable to the lead contaminated water. Parents have often refused to help the government find and shut down the illegal gold mining, because the parents themselves were involved, and willing to make money even if it killed their children.

November 1, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, soldiers began house-to-house searches for illegal weapons. All such weapons were to have been turned in by the end of October. A Boko Haram spokesman denounced the weapons searches and urged people to resist. In the first day of these searches in Maiduguri, over a thousand weapons were seized. Many of the illegal weapons were for protection against the criminal gangs that, unmolested by the police, can pretty much do as they please.

November 3, 2011: Pirates seized a small oil tanker off the coast, and are apparently holding it for ransom. There are plenty of waterways along the coast, especially in the Niger River delta, where things can be hidden. If pirates can get away with hiding larger ships here, seizing ships will become a big business. The military, especially the air force, can stop this with an effective air search effort. The military may not be able to muster this kind of effort.

November 4, 2011: In Damaturu, capital of northern Yobe State, Boko Haram set off bombs in police stations and Mosques. These were accompanied by attacks by gunmen. Over sixty people were killed. At the same time, smaller, and much less lethal attacks took place in Maiduguri, the capital of neighboring Borno State, and two small towns in the area. By far, most of the violence was in Damaturu, where a large number of Boko Haram had apparently set up shop. Boko Haram was long prominent in Maiduguri, but months of massive police activity there have, as the police expected, driven most Boko Haram operatives out. Now the police know where the Islamic terrorists went.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram gunmen killed a police commander as he drove to a Mosque to pray. Attacks against the police are meant to intimidate, and discourage efforts to hunt down Boko Haram.

November 6, 2011: the U.S. government warned its citizens (and especially diplomatic personnel) to stay away from the luxury hotels in the capital for the next week. It is feared that Boko Haram may be planning another round of bombings in the capital, despite strenuous government efforts to keep the terrorists out.

The Nigerian government, largely because of the corruption (many senior jobs are bought, not earned through merit) has not been very successful in identifying who the key Boko Haram people are. Worse, Boko Haram will kill those informers that it can identify. And given the corruption, information about police informants can be bought. Some Boko Haram are susceptible to bribery, but they, unlike the police, do not wear uniforms and are hard to find. The northern governors, alarmed at the Boko Haram threat (to them personally and to their families and fortunes) have been scrambling to put together effective police and intelligence units. The governors also have large networks of criminal gangs (used during elections to control the vote) at their disposal, and these are being unleashed as well. But while most Moslems up north abhor Boko Haram, some do support the terror group, and that's enough to keep Boko Haram hidden. Boko Haram is thus able to recruit, train and carry out more attacks.

The religious violence in the north has been increasing since the late 1990s, along with the popularity of Islamic radicalism throughout the Moslem world. But most of the population opposes the Islamic radicals. Most Nigerian Moslems have turned away from the "religious solution" as well. That's mainly because a decade ago the northern Moslem states, due to popular pressure, introduced Sharia (Islamic) law. This was supposed to take care of corruption, and some Islamic conservative politicians were elected. This did not work. The Sharia laws were ignored just like the previous ones were, and the Islamic conservative politicians turned out to be as corrupt as their predecessor. But some Moslems were undeterred, and have doubled down by backing Boko Haram. The idea is that if the Islamic violence is sufficiently extreme and widespread, the corruption and bad government will be eliminated.

November 7, 2011: The government's inability to deal with Islamic terror group Boko Haram is no surprise to most Nigerians. Gangsters have long taken advantage of the fact that the court system does not work (it's overwhelmed with cases and bribes can set you free). The prisons are similarly subject to bribes for those who want to get out, or just stay in touch with the outside. If the police really want to nail someone, they just quietly catch up with them and kill them. All this doesn't work against Boko Haram, which has a lot of popular support from Moslem Nigerians fed up with an ineffective and corrupt government. The problem here is that Nigerians will mobilize and defeat a threat to things they hold dear, like some degree of democracy and economic opportunity. Boko Haram is not just against corruption (which several Islamic radical groups before them have been), but calls for the establishment of a religious dictatorship, led by Moslem clerics. Boko Haram compares themselves to the Taliban. The half of the population that is Christian (or animist) is against this, and many of the Moslems are as well. In the end, Boko Haram can make a mess, which it is doing, but in the end will be crushed, and many innocent civilians will die along with the Islamic radicals. Long term, this probably won't change much. The civil war in the 1960s was far more destructive than Boko Haram, and it changed little. It's going to take more than a bunch of murderous Moslem zealots to solve Nigeria's problems with corruption.

November 9, 2011: In the northern areas where Boko Haram is most active, thousands of Christians and people from tribes not native to the area are fleeing. Boko Haram considers churches prime targets. The ultimate goal is to drive all infidels (non-Moslems) out of the north, along with most elements of Western culture (especially Western education, as Boko Haram translates as "Western education is unclean for Moslems".)

November 14, 2011: The government is reactivating 22 border posts on the frontiers with Chad, Niger, Benin and Cameroun. In addition, intelligence services will cooperate more with their counterparts in Mali to help with tracking Islamic radicals in the region. The government believes Boko Haram is receiving help from other Islamic radical groups in the region. There have been rumors and chatter of Nigerians travelling to al Qaeda camps in Mali, near the Algerian border, to learn how to make bombs. Then again, there is also evidence that the Boko Haram members learned how to build bombs from miners, or men who were miners. The mining operations use a lot of explosives, and there is a lot of opportunity to learn how to use this dangerous stuff. While explosives are supposed to be tracked and controlled, the ever-present corruption means that if you have the cash, you can get explosives and detonators. Note that mining is not a major industry in Nigeria and most of it is in the Christian south.

November 17, 2011: Pirates attacked an oil company ship off the Niger Delta, and took three foreigners away, to be held for ransom.

Another problem for the government is that the insurrection they have been fighting in the Niger River Delta for decades is little like the Boko Haram situation. The Niger Delta was a combination of oil thieves and tribal groups demanding less damage, and more benefit, from all the oil production activities. This includes reducing corruption and government incompetence. While Boko Haram wants less corruption and inept government, they also demand adherence to strict lifestyle rules and the use of violence against non-Moslems. This makes non-Moslems, and many Moslems, hostile to Boko Haram. Another difference is Boko Haram's more frequent use of terror attacks, especially against non-Moslems. This risks starting a civil war between the Moslem north and Christian south. This is especially the case because Boko Haram has called for dividing the country, with an Islamic state in the north. But all the oil is in the south, and the Christian south does not want to share with a separatist Moslem state in the north. Lots of grounds for a civil war here.

Algerian intelligence claims that Boko Haram has established connections with the Algerian branch of al Qaeda. No proof was offered, other than the fact that the Algerian/North African branch of al Qaeda now runs a major drug smuggling operation (moving cocaine from Guinea-Bissau, where it is flown in from South America, to the Mediterranean coast). But those smuggling routes are over a thousand kilometers from Nigeria and there is no other evidence that North African Islamic radicals have been in Nigeria. While these terrorists have been seen in northern Niger (along the Algerian border), police and counter-terror activity has made it difficult for the al Qaeda groups to move away from the Algerian border region. So, aside from some Nigerians visiting the al Qaeda groups, there is not much of a connection.

November 21, 2011: While the government assembles security forces, intelligence capabilities and popular opinion to use against Boko Haram, it is less enthusiastic about dealing with the main reason the Islamic radicals have gained a foothold in the north; corruption and inept government. Boko Haram says that a religious dictatorship in the north would solve all these problems. While many northerners know better (religious governments have failed in Sudan, Iran and Afghanistan), there is tremendous anger at the thieving and incompetent government officials. As long as that situation persists, there will always be angry (and usually unemployed) young men willing to join the terrorists. This is especially true because the police and army tend to be vicious and undisciplined when dealing with what they consider a hostile population. This is an old problem in Nigeria, that never gets solved.

November 25, 2011: Outside the central Nigerian city of Jos, Moslem and Christian tribes clashed again, leaving at least fifteen dead. Two churches and an Islamic school were destroyed, along with twenty other buildings. Over sixty people were arrested.

Boko Haram denied that recent arrests of politicians, accused of working with Boko Haram, had anything to do with them. Boko Haram insisted that they had no affiliations with political parties, and those men recently arrested were not, as some claimed, members of Boko Haram.

November 26, 2011: Boko Haram destroyed eight churches and killed four people after invading the northeastern town of Geidam (near the Niger border) for several hours. The Islamic terrorists also destroyed a police station and set fire to several businesses. A smaller attack was made in the northeastern city of Maiduguri.

In the Niger River Delta, the government has bought peace, by spending $10 million a month to pay young men not to attack the oil companies and government facilities. Over 23,000 men are receiving $410 a month to keep the peace. But some of them have gone back to criminal activities, and the widespread violence is expected to return. Meanwhile, the government considers the payments a bargain. In the last full year of violence (2008), gang activity cost over $23 billion in damage and lost oil revenue. But there is still a lot of popular anger in the Delta at the oil companies and corrupt government officials.

December 1, 2011: Islamic terror group Boko Haram claimed that its recent attacks in the northeast were a protest against government arrests of its members. The government insists that it has Boko Haram on the run, yet some armed members of the group are still operating. Boko Haram wants to drive all non-Moslems out of northern Nigeria and turn the place into a religious dictatorship. Christians, and many northern Moslems, object to this plan. They do, however, appreciate Boko Haram efforts to go after corrupt politicians.

December 2, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri Boko Haram gunmen used a bomb and gunfire to attack a police post. There followed several hours of fighting.

December 3, 2011: In northern Bauchi State Boko Haram terrorists attacked a police station, leaving a soldier, a policeman, and a civilian dead.

December 8, 2011: In the Niger Delta dozens of former rebels barricaded a key bridge holding up traffic for hours. The former rebels were protesting the poor treatment they have received since accepting the amnesty. Even though the government has screwed up their end of the amnesty deal they insist that the rebels keep the peace. But corruption and mismanagement have kept many rebels from getting the amnesty benefits and the government is seen as unreliable, corrupt, and a hostile force.

In the central Nigerian state of Jos three bombs went off near where people had assembled to watch sports on television. Boko Haram considers such recreational activities un-Islamic. There was one death and over a dozen wounded.

December 10, 2011: In the Niger Delta a bomb went off in a mosque. This was the first attack on a mosque in the south but there was doubt that it was retaliation for the many attacks on churches in the north. The bombed mosque had been in the midst of an internal dispute about how prayers should be conducted. Islamic conservatives demanded that all prayer be in Arabic, while the chief cleric wanted to pray in local languages and Arabic.

December 12, 2011: Government efforts to destroy Boko Haram are crippled by the fact that the Islamic terror group is supported by popular anger at decades of lawlessness and corruption. While officials have made efforts to deal with the bad government and disrespect for the law it's not enough to make a dent in Boko Haram's popularity. The Islamic radicals promise a cure for corruption (Islamic law). This has been tried and failed several times in the last few decades but most Nigerians are desperate for some help here. This Boko Haram, which seeks to emulate the 1990s Taliban and take over the country, continues to grow. But unlike the Taliban Boko Haram is operating in a country where only about half the population is Moslem.

December 13, 2011: The government proposes to spend $5.6 billion in the next year to deal with Boko Haram, as well as the remaining rebels in the Niger Delta area.

December 16, 2011: In northern Kano, fifteen Boko Haram gunmen attacked an Air Force College on the outskirts of the city, killing four air force personnel. There was another attack in the city that left two policemen dead.

December 17, 2011: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, an accidental explosion in a Boko Haram bomb building workshop left at least three terrorists dead. In the northern city of Kano, three police raids resulted in the arrest of 14 suspected members of Boko Haram. In one raid there was a gun battle that left four terrorists and three policemen dead. The raids captured large quantities of weapons, ammunition, documents, and bomb making materials. Boko Haram has apparently shifted dozens of men to Kano, along with a lot of weapons, with the intention of launching a lot of terror attacks. This violence is not popular with the public, leading to tips given to the police from civilians. The subsequent raids have done a lot of damage to the terrorists.

December 19, 2011: In the northern city of Kano, police received a tip which led to the discovery of a Boko Haram bomb building workshop and the arrest of four Boko Haram members. The four had recently come to Kano to carry out a bombing campaign.

December 22, 2011: In northeastern Yobe State (on the Niger border) police found and attacked a main base of Boko Haram in the town of Damaturu. The battle killed 59 terrorists, along with three soldiers. Elsewhere in the northeast, clashes with Boko Haram left another 19 dead.

December 23, 2011: Fighting continued in the northeastern town of Damaturu, leaving over 20 dead.

In the Niger River Delta, police are finding many rebels who had accepted amnesty had gone on to become gangsters. Those responsible for the increased number of robberies and kidnappings are often these amnestied rebels. Police are going into old rebel bases and hideouts and finding hundreds of weapons that were not surrendered during the amnesty, or have been obtained after the amnesty.

December 24, 2011: In the north, fighting continued in Maiduguri and Damaturu as police seek to find more Boko Haram hideouts and capture or kill more of the Islamic terrorists. Boko Haram has suffered a major defeat with the loss of several bases but the Islamic radicals are scrambling to recover. The widespread Boko Haram violence in the last two weeks has made the Islamic radicals appear to be a public menace, which the police exploit to get more tips from the public. Boko Haram prefers to cultivate the image of rebels against a corrupt government and society. While most Nigerians support that, they are put off by the seemingly random violence and all the dead civilians. But as long as there are enough young Nigerian men willing to join Boko Haram the violence will continue. The Islamic radical group raises money by demanding payment from businesses for "protection" from attack, along with voluntary donations. Unless the government can do something about the corruption and inept government this war will go on for a while. Government officials say they understand this dynamic but doing something about it may prove very difficult. That's because many Nigerians openly acknowledge that the pervasive corruption and incompetent government are a major source of unrest, yet attempts to deal with these two problems are constantly frustrated.

December 25, 2011: In the Moslem north, several attacks on Christian churches today and yesterday left over 40 dead and many more wounded. Boko Haram took credit for the attacks. Similar attacks by Boko Haram last year killed twice as many people. This year's attack came a few days after an army operation in the north that killed fifty Boko Haram members and captured bombs and bomb making workshops.

December 27, 2011: The Sultan of Sokoto, the senior Nigerian Moslem cleric denounced Boko Haram as outlaws and a fringe religious group that does not represent mainstream Moslems. Other senior clerics agreed, and many were particularly critical of attacking churches. A madrassa (Moslem religious school) in the south was attacked, apparently in retaliation for the Christmas Day (25 December) attack on Christian churches. No one took credit for the madrassa attack.

December 28, 2011: Meanwhile, thousands of Christians have fled the northern Nigerian city of Damaturu because of recent Boko Haram attacks.

December 31, 2011: The government declared a state of emergency in the parts of four northern states where Boko Haram is most active.

In the southeast, Ezza and Ezilo tribesmen battled each other over an old land dispute, leaving over fifty dead.

As part of a government spending cut program, decades old subsidies on fuel were eliminated. This doubled the cost of most fuels, with petrol (gasoline) going from 45 cents per liter ($1.70 per gallon) to at least 94 cents per liter ($3.50 per gallon). The subsidies consumed $8 billion a year, about a quarter of government spending. Other cuts will involve the pay of senior officials and their fringe benefits (especially overseas travel). The fuel subsidy cuts caused demonstrations and attacks, but the government did not back off.

January 1, 2012: Boko Haram announced that Christians living in the Moslem north had three days to leave, or face attack by the Islamic radicals. Most northern Christians stayed put and organized local security.

January 3, 2012: The army has moved two brigades (over 6,000 troops) into northern areas where Boko Haram has been active.

January 4, 2012: In the north, four bombs went off in the northern cities of Maiduguri, Damaturu causing at least one death. A gun attack left two dead in Damaturu.

January 6, 2012: In the northeast, Boko Haram attacked a church and killed ten people.

Israel has offered medical assistance to deal with the growing number of terror-related injuries. Nigerian officials have also asked Israel for counter-terrorism help and Israel has agreed to provide intelligence gathering and analysis assistance.

January 7, 2012: In the north-eastern town of Potiskum, Boko Haram attacked a police station and at least one bank. There were several dead and over a dozen wounded.

Because of the Christmas attacks, and Boko Haram's threat to kill any Christians who do not leave the north (where the Islamic radicals want to establish a religious dictatorship), the government has ordered the security forces to do whatever it takes to shut down the Islamic terror group. This means a lot of northerners will be mistreated as the police seek out Boko Haram hideouts. Nigerians are already unhappy with the violence, corruption, and incompetence of their police and northerners will be angrier still. But most Nigerians do not want a tribal/religious war. That's what Boko Haram seeks, as a way to get more popular support as the "defender of Islam." So far, southern Christians have not made many attacks on Moslems in the south, but that could change, and that is what Boko Haram is hoping for, a religious war.

The police responded savagely in 2009 to the first outbreaks of Boko Haram violence and killed over 800 people (many of them innocent). That shut down Boko Haram for a while, but the group reappeared in 2010. Last year, Boko Haram related violence left at least 550 dead. In the last week, over a dozen casualties a day have been attributed to the Islamic terrorists.

Boko Haram members have been difficult for the police to find, especially in rural areas. That's because out in the country, Boko Haram tell village leaders that the Islamic radicals will live peacefully, but if anyone in the village informs on them the village leadership will suffer. Very effective, and it's very difficult for the police to penetrate that sort of thing. But the police are aware that the Boko Haram is out there and they also know roughly where. The police also know of the increased arms smuggling from neighboring Niger, where many of the weapons stolen from Libyan military bases last year are ending up. The government also openly admits that it has not got the resources to properly police the entire nation. The police are not numerous enough, as well as being corrupt and poorly trained. This is a tragic situation, but not one that is denied. It is obvious in Nigeria and all through Africa.

The usual pundits insist that the government is responding all wrong (with troops and police) and should instead address underlying social, economic, and political problems. But the government is such a mess and has such a poor reputation because of their inability to solve all those underlying social issues, economic, and political problems. Any solution to Boko Haram is going to require the use of the tools that are available. That involves incompetent police and unruly soldiers. It will be ugly, but then anything the Nigerian government gets involved in usually is. Nevertheless, some officials speak of using more effective methods to deal with this problem. But the way the government operates, such encouraging words are always followed by the same old incompetent crap.

January 9, 2012: Christian religious leaders doubt the government's ability to protect Nigerian Christians (about half of the population) from Islamic radical group Boko Haram. Christian leaders (clerics and elected officials) are calling on Christians to organize and defend themselves, but not to attack Moslems. Since Christmas day, Boko Haram violence has left nearly a hundred Christians dead. Some Christian leaders are talking civil war. This Moslems do not want to hear, if only because the oil is in the south, and that gives the Christians a major advantage. While Boko Haram is only a small minority in the Moslem community, it is a militant and fanatic group that will quickly kill any Moslems that oppose them. Moreover, many Moslems approve the Boko Haram goal of reducing corruption. Turning Nigeria into an Islamic religious dictatorship is less popular.

January 10, 2012: Boko Haram gunmen attacked a pub in the northern state of Yobe, killing five policemen and three civilians (including a ten year old girl). In the south, a bomb killed five people outside a mosque.

January 16, 2012: Responding to over a week of protests, the government agreed to restore a third of the fuel subsidies that were cut on January 1. As part of a government spending cut program, decades old subsidies on fuel were eliminated at the start of the year. This doubled the cost of most fuels, with petrol (gasoline) going from 45 cents per liter ($1.70 per gallon) to at least 94 cents per liter ($3.50 per gallon). The subsidies consumed $8 billion a year, about a quarter of government spending. The fuel subsidy cuts caused demonstrations and attacks, but the government did not back off at first. This compromise is supposed to halt the strikes and demonstrations that have been going on since the first week of January.

January 17, 2012: : In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram gunmen attacked a police checkpoint. Four of the attackers were killed. Elsewhere in the city, another attack left two soldiers and four civilians dead.

January 18, 2012: Boko Haram gunmen freed Kabiru Sokoto, the deputy commander of Boko Haram and planner of a Christmas Day attack on a church. Sokoto was being moved to another prison. Sokoto had been arrested the day before (at the home of the governor of Bomo State) and police corruption was immediately suspected in the escape. A senior police commander was quickly arrested, on suspicion that he let Boko Haram know the details of Sokoto being moved.

January 20, 2012: In the northern city of Kano, four bomb attacks by Boko Haram on police and media targets, followed by gun battles, left over a hundred dead. In the south (the Niger Delta) gunmen kidnapped an American citizen and demanded $333,000 ransom.

In the northern city of Kano a 24 hour curfew was declared in the wake of yesterday's Boko Haram bomb attacks.

Over the last week, petrol (gasoline) supplies have dried up, for no apparent reason. But most Nigerians suspect corrupt officials in the national petroleum company seeking to frustrate anti-corruption efforts by the government. President Goodluck Johnson has made some unusually vigorous efforts to identify and prosecute corrupt officials, and the many corrupt politicians and bureaucrats are fighting back. The fuel price increases were hugely unpopular, in part because all the corruption associated with fuel production and distribution and these artificial fuel shortages apparently hope to benefit from that anger. Fuel price increase unrest began right after January 1st and grew until the government backed off on the 16th

January 21, 2012: In the wake of a growing number of Boko Haram attacks on Christians, some religious leaders are urging Christians to do whatever it takes to defend themselves. So far this year Boko Haram violence has killed about 70 people, most of them Christian. Earlier this month Boko Haram began distributing a video in which the Boko Haram leader makes it clear that his organization was at war with Christians. This alarmed political and religious leaders, who pleaded with their constituents to refrain from religious violence. Last year, Boko Haram violence left about 500 dead. Tribal violence left about a thousand dead. On the positive side, the Boko Haram video made it clear that the Islamic radicals were concentrating on Nigeria (and making the entire nation an Islamic religious dictatorship) and apparently not concerned with international terrorism. Boko Haram has always made a point of describing itself as modeled on the Taliban, not al Qaeda.

January 22, 2012: The Boko Haram attacks in Kano two days ago killed and wounded far more people than originally believed. There were over 500 casualties, including about 180 known dead.

January 24, 2012: In the northern city of Kano Boko Haram attacked another police station with gunfire and explosives.

In the northern city of Kano someone kidnapped a German engineer, who worked for a company in the city. Kidnapping is popular with criminal gangs and the recent Boko Haram attacks have driven the police from the streets. This makes it easier for gangs to carry out kidnappings.

January 26, 2012: In response to the January 20 attacks in Kano (which killed nearly 200) soldiers and police have arrested over 200 suspects. Most of them were described "mercenaries" from Chad (which has been suffering civil war for years). The government believes Boko Haram has camps in Chad, which would not be difficult. There's not much government or policing in Chad.

The governors of the 19 northern (Moslem) states met with federal officials and agreed that Boko Haram must be destroyed. The problem is that the governors and state officials are seen as corrupt and inept by most Nigerians. Thus few people are willing to risk anything to protect these politicians (who win elections via corruption and coercion).

January 27, 2012: Boko Haram announced that it would not negotiate, would continue to attack in Kano, and would extend their terror to another major city. The Boko Haram leader (identified as Abubakar Shekau) accused the United States of attacking Islam and said his group would continue attacking soldiers and police and kidnap their families as well. Boko Haram's objective is to establish a religious dictatorship in Nigeria and to convert (or drive out) all Christians (who are half the population, mainly in the south, where the oil is.)

January 28, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri 11 Boko Haram men were killed at an army check point.

January 29, 2012: In the northern city of Kano Boko Haram attacked another police station.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri Boko Haram attacked an air force barracks and a police station. An airman, two policeman, and two civilians were killed.

January 30, 2012: In the northern city of Kano Boko Haram attacked another police station, and two civilians were killed in the crossfire.

Boko Haram has developed internal dissent and produced its first known splinter group. Calling themselves Ansaru (for Ansarul Muslimina Fi Biladis Sudan or "Vanguards for the Protection of Muslims in Black Africa"). Ansaru objects to the many Moslems who are being killed by Boko Haram attacks. It is unclear how large Ansaru is and how much violence within Boko Haram, if any, will result from the split. It is believed that there is considerably more strife between Boko Haram leaders, with many strong-willed men, each with an armed following, trying to control the entire movement. At the moment, Boko Haram is on a roll and most of these disagreements are put aside. But with the appearance of Ansaru that appears to be changing.

Christian clerics and politicians in the south are urging people to refrain from religious violence. In fact, there has not been much "revenge" violence in the south as there usually is when there is another outbreak of anti-Christian violence in the north. As is the custom in most of the world most of the religious violence is instigated by Moslems, who are obsessed with the idea that Islam is under attack. But most of the problems found in the Moslem population (corruption, little education, poverty) are self-inflicted. Nearby Christian populations tend to be better educated and thus wealthier. This is considered anti-Moslem and obviously the result of some Christian conspiracy against Islam.

The violence in Kano, and breakdown in what little law and order there was, has caused a growing number of people to flee. Most of the refugees are Christians, a group Boko Haram has openly declared that it will attack. At least 10,000 have left this month, either to areas outside the city or in the Christian south.

February 1, 2012: Boko Haram has killed nearly 300 people so far this year, compared to only about 700 during the previous three years. Most of the violence has been in Kano, a northern, largely Moslem, city of nine million. In the last two weeks half a dozen police stations and facilities have been destroyed in Kano. The police have suffered several hundred casualties (dead, wounded, deserters). The police in Kano, like the rest of Nigeria, are corrupt and incompetent. The public generally considers the police a public menace and the Boko Haram attacks are popular for that reason. But the cops do suppress some crime and maintain some order. Since the Boko Haram attacks most police are staying off the streets. The only security forces you see on the streets are army patrols. The army is less corrupt than the police but more violent. The criminals are taking advantage of the situation, causing civilians to be wary and stay off the streets more often.

February 2, 2012: Police arrested the spokesman for Boko Haram.

February 3, 2012: In the northern city of Kogi Boko Haram men attacked a police station and a bank, leaving four dead.

February 4, 2012: In the Niger River Delta an oil pipeline was ruptured by a bomb, halting 200,000 barrels a day of production. Members of the old tribal rebel group MEND took credit.

February 5, 2012: In the northeastern city of Damaturu gunmen killed a member of police intelligence.

Elsewhere in the Delta a hotel was bombed as part of a dispute between former rebels who had accepted amnesty, who were demanding cash instead of career training and temporary housing.

February 6, 2012: Rebel group MEND took credit for the recent bombing of an oil pipeline. The last time MEND made this kind of announcement was last March. But the government insisted it was an accident, as it only briefly interrupted production.

In the northern city of Kaduna Boko Haram carried out three bombing attacks, two of them against military bases, but only killed the attackers.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri several Boko Haram bombs went off, leaving three dead.

In the northern city of Kano police and Boko Haram gunmen fought for several hours. The police won, and eight rebels were killed and several arrested. Many weapons and some bomb making materials were captured.

February 7, 2012: Boko Haram has now offered to negotiate with the government but not until all imprisoned Boko Haram members are freed. The government refuses to do this, and other Boko Haram factions deny there is any willingness to negotiate. Basically, Boko Haram wants to convert all Nigerians to Islam and replace the elected government with a religious dictatorship.

For the last two years MEND (Niger Delta tribal rebels) has been demanding that the army withdraw and all prisoners be freed or else there will be a new wave of attacks on oil facilities. Not much has come of these threats. The MEND rebels want the terms of the 2009 amnesty deal enforced and corrupt officials running the program removed. In response to those threats the military keeps attacking MEND associated camps in the Niger delta, seizing lots of weapons and equipment, but not making many arrests. The rebels tend to hear the troops coming (usually by boat and preceded by aerial reconnaissance) and slip away into an area of numerous creeks and islands they know well. Many criminals in the delta also support rebel goals (for more autonomy in the delta, less corruption, and spending additional oil money locally). Even though the government has screwed up their end of the amnesty deal they insist that the rebels keep the peace. But corruption and mismanagement have kept many rebels from getting the amnesty benefits and the government is seen as unreliable, corrupt, and a hostile force. The MEND threats have been much more ambitious than the actual attacks and it is believed that only a few people are involved in making attacks on oil facilities (which are well guarded these days).

The government said it has arrested over a hundred foreigners (mainly from Niger, Chad, Mali, and other African nations) as terrorism suspects.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, six Boko Haram members were found dead, apparently after a factional dispute within Boko Haram. Elsewhere in the city several terrorist bombs went off but caused no casualties.

February 10, 2012: Months of Boko Haram violence in the north has not only disrupted the economy up there, but also the economies of neighboring Chad, Niger, and Cameroon. Islamic leaders in the north have demanded that Boko Haram halt its terrorism, in part because of the economic damage all the violence is doing. The religious leaders also speak out against Boko Haram assassinations of their critics, especially clerics. The economic disruptions have cost Boko Haram a lot of public support. The government is pressuring the police and army to tone down the random violence that is usually employed when suppressing rebellions.

February 10, 2012: Police recaptured Boko Haram leader Kabiru Sokoto, who had escaped from custody a month ago (a day after he was arrested). This was Boko Haram's first major operation in the Christian south.

A Boko Haram spokesman said the group would be willing to negotiate with the government but only after arrested Boko Haram leaders were released from prison. The government refused this condition.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri two bombs went off, killing four terrorists and wounding two soldiers.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri troops fought an extended gun battle with dozens of armed Boko Haram. A dozen of the terrorists were killed. Meanwhile, a Boko Haram member called on cell phone companies to stop cooperating with police (to trace terrorists via their phones). Otherwise, the terrorist group will attack cell phone company facilities and personnel.

Off the coast near the Niger River Delta pirates attacked a bulk cargo ship. The gunfire killed the captain and chief engineer, but the rest of the crew made it to the safe room, where they stayed until police showed up. This was the second such unsuccessful pirate attack off the coast in a week.

February 13, 2012: Government investigators have traced Boko Haram funding to al Qaeda sources and Islamic charities in Britain and Saudi Arabia. Interrogations of arrested Boko Haram members and captured documents have provided a lot of information on how this terrorist group operates.

In the central Nigerian city of Kaduna a policeman was killed by a roadside bomb.

February 14, 2012: Information from cell phones seized from Boko Haram leader Kabiru Sokoto, and subsequent interrogation of Sokoto, found that Boko Haram had made secret alliances with several political, business, and tribal leaders. It also appears that Sokoto's escape in January was aided by corrupt cops. Sokoto is now being held by the less corrupt Special Forces (State Security Services). In fact, the SSS has increased security around Sokoto as the Boko Haram has revealed more details about how the Islamic terror organization operates.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri police found and defused a car bomb.

February 15, 2012: In south-central Kogi State, at least 20 Boko Haram gunmen, travelling in eight vehicles, attacked Kogi Prison with dynamite and gunfire. At least one guard was killed and over 110 prisoners were set free. The raiders escaped with seven Boko Haram members that were held in the prison. Most of the local prisoners were recaptured in the next few days.

February 16, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram ambushed an army patrol, killing one soldier and wounding another. The shooting went on for an hour before the terrorists escaped.

February 19, 2012: A bomb went off near two Christian churches in central Nigeria (Suleja), wounding five people.

The government is also trying to reform the national police, another shamefully corrupt institution. Newly appointed senior police officials are at least admitting that the force is in bad shape. That's a start. Meanwhile, the police, and other security service, are getting a lot more money (20 percent increase since 2010), in large part because of the growing Boko Haram violence.

The government is making yet another attempt to reduce corruption in the oil industry. New heads of the Oil Ministry and anti-corruption organization have been appointed. But many Nigerian oil companies are owned by prominent politicians, or such companies have politicians as major shareholders. It's generally agreed that what is needed most is transparency (audited financial records that are free for anyone to examine on the Internet). This is something the politicians and government oil bureaucrats always oppose, or sabotage, for obvious reasons. There is a lot of smoke about stopping corruption but not much fire.

February 20, 2012: Boko Haram violence has left nearly 300 people dead so far this year. Weeks of energetic police work has left thousands of civilians terrorized by raids and questions but has put several hundred suspected Boko Haram members in prison. Many of these raids yielded tangible evidence of Boko Haram activity and leads to other members of the group. A lot more is known about the Islamic terror group. But the government does not have a solution to the growing unrest, which is driven largely by the persistent corruption and government mismanagement.

February 20, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri Boko Haram set off several bombs at a market place. Soldiers showed up and a lot of shooting took place. The army said it killed eight Boko Haram but local hospitals received over two dozen bodies with gunshot sounds. Witnesses say that most of the shooting victims were civilians caught in the crossfire.

February 22, 2012: In the northern city of Kano men on a motorcycle shot dead two policemen. Before dawn there were several explosions and four suspects were arrested.

February 23, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri police found the body of a 79 year old Christian woman with her throat slit. There was a note on the body that said (in Arabic), "we will get you soon." Elsewhere in the north, four policemen were killed in two separate incidents.

In the northern city of Kano a Mosque was attacked with gunfire, leaving five dead. This was believed to be a Boko Haram effort to intimidate Moslems who oppose Islamic terrorism.

February 24, 2012: In the northeastern city of Gombe Boko Haram attacked a prison and several other targets, leaving 14 dead and five wounded. The prison attack failed to free any inmates.

In the northern city of Bauchi police arrested eight Christians and seized explosives the men were going to use to bomb the church of a rival Christian group. The police fear that this will happen more frequently as criminals, and other religious, tribal and political groups with a grudge will stage terror attacks that will initially be blamed on Boko Haram. That makes it harder to identify and catch the real culprits.

February 26, 2012: In the Central Nigerian city of Jos Boko Haram set off a bomb at a church killing the suicide bomber and one worshiper and wounding 38. Later that day groups of young Christian men attacked Moslems, killing two and wounding several more. This is what Boko Haram wants, a civil war between Christians and Moslems.

In the north, and in the national capital, increased security measures have made it more difficult for people to visit police stations and other government buildings. Vehicle traffic is greatly restricted because of the Boko Haram use of car bombs.

Not surprisingly, police have found that Islamic terror group Boko Haram is suffering from tribal and clan tensions. Leaders of the several Boko Haram factions tend to favor men from their own tribe or clan. It's only natural that sect leaders should recruit people they know and trust them more. More ominously, Boko Haram imposes strict rules on how members should behave. This includes execution for those who try to leave the group. This discourages some from joining but does not stop people from changing their minds and trying to leave. These are typical problems with violent radical groups.

Unlike the Taliban, that Boko Haram models itself on, the Nigerian Islamic terrorists do not use suicide bombers much. That's because of a shortage of volunteers and people skilled in recruiting and handling suicide attackers. Boko Haram is supposed to be getting assistance from al Qaeda, which would include training in selecting and handling suicide bombers, but there's not much evidence of that so far.

The U.S. government refuses, so far, to designate Boko Haram an international terror organization. The designation makes it easier to pursue international operations of terror groups, including fund raising. While the U.S. ambassador to Nigeria and many American terrorism experts consider Boko Haram eligible for the designation, many academics and State Department Africa experts believe the designation would offend Nigerian Moslems and make Boko Haram even more violent. Boko Haram makes no secret of its goal; to establish a religious dictatorship in Nigeria and forcibly convert all Nigerian Christians to Islam. Boko Haram arose out of frustration among Nigerian Moslems over the failure of Sharia (Islamic) law to cope with the crippling, and very unpopular, corruption and government mismanagement. A decade ago the northern Moslem states, due to popular pressure, introduced Sharia (Islamic) law. This was supposed to take care of corruption and some Islamic conservative politicians were elected. This did not work. The Sharia laws were ignored just like the previous ones were, and the Islamic conservative politicians turned out to be as corrupt as their predecessors. Some Moslems were undeterred and have doubled down by backing Boko Haram. The idea is that if the Islamic violence is sufficiently extreme and widespread the corruption and bad government will be eliminated. Most northerners do not agree with this but Boko Haram is willing to kill for its beliefs and that gets everyone's attention.

Over 300 have died from Boko Haram violence so far this year. That's some 38 percent of all Boko Haram related deaths in the last few years. The headline grabbing Boko Haram attacks has increased religious tension but not to the point where there are a lot more religious clashes. It's possible that this may change as more Boko Haram attacks kill more Christians. Most Moslems do not want this because there are many Moslems living in the south who would be overwhelmed by their more numerous Christian neighbors. Moreover, such a war of religion would more likely lead to partition, than the establishment of a religious dictatorship. Since most of the oil, and Christians, are in the south this would only favor the Christian half of the 160 million Nigerians.

February 27, 2012: In the Moslem north police and soldiers are conducting raids and making arrests of suspected Boko Haram members or sympathizers. There are neighborhoods and villages known to contain a lot of Islamic conservatives sympathetic to Boko Haram and these areas are the usual targets. Nigerian police (especially) and soldiers are known more for corruption than discipline and professionalism. The security forces will open fire at the least provocation and fire wildly. The government is trying to eliminate this problem but there is no quick fix. The solution is more training and better selection of officers and NCOs. That takes time and resolve. Many leadership positions in the police and even the army are for sale.

February 28, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri Boko Haram bombed a primary school, which scared many parents into keeping their kids from school.

February 29, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram set off a bomb and wounded a soldier. There was also a 30 minute gun battle.

March 1, 2012: MEND (Movement for the Emancipation of the Niger Delta) took credit for an attack on a police checkpoint, which left four policemen dead. Nearby, four soldiers were killed when they were ambushed by the pirates they were searching for.

March 2, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri police caught four armed Boko Haram members and killed them in a gun battle. In the outskirts of the city a Boko Haram bomb workshop blew up killing four terrorists in what was apparently an accident. Locals revealed that the four men had been extorting money from neighborhood businesses and set up their bomb making operation.

March 5, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri police killed three Boko Haram men and captured two others, who were trying to destroy a secular school.

March 6, 2012: Boko Haram was suspected in the killing of the new chief customs inspector in the north. The attack on the man's home in Potiskum (Yobe state) left Customs controller Adamu Ahmadu and five bystanders dead. Ahmadu, a Christian, had imposed strict enforcement of regulations at the borders. This angered smugglers and anyone else who used bribes to get forbidden material (like weapons or explosives) across the border.

In central Nigeria Fulani tribal militias are again attacking villages belonging to the Tiv tribe, leaving nearly fifty dead in the last week and thousands of refugees. The tribal feuds over land are made worse by religious differences. The local governments have kept a lid on the violence for the last few years, but the unresolved land disputes, plus cultural differences between the Fulani herders and Tiv farmers, keep the animosity alive. The Fulani are more heavily armed and use force to drive the Tiv from land the Fulani want to use to graze their animals.

In the north at least 11,000 migrants from Niger and Chad have returned to their home countries to avoid the Boko Haram violence and accusations that the foreigners were involved (they apparently are not).

The government response to Boko Haram is to establish hundreds of checkpoints and run heavily armed patrols in areas the Islamic terrorists were known to operate in. There are also more armed guards at government building facilities. While Boko Haram declares it is at war with non-Moslems, the chief targets are secular and mainly the security forces and government operations. That is largely because the government is seeking out Boko Haram as the Islamic group threatens government control in the north.

The cause of most problems in Nigeria is corruption. Most everyone admits that corruption is the nation's major problem and there is much popular enthusiasm for halting corrupt practices. But this is happening very slowly. Too many people, including judges, prosecutors, and anti-corruption officials, are willing to take a bribe. Corruption is like a drug that most Nigerians agree is harmful, but not enough people have the willpower to get away from.

While the government admits that corruption and lack of economic development in the north is what sustains support for Boko Haram, efforts to invest in more economic development are stymied by corrupt politicians and business magnates. Most of the northern leadership is corrupt and would rather pay for more security to fight Boko Haram than to clean up their corrupt practices.

March 7, 2012: Boko Haram says it will continue to attack secular schools in the northeastern city of Maiduguri as long as the government shuts down Islamic schools operated by Islamic radicals. Northerners fear that the attacks on secular schools will continue no matter what because "Boko Haram" means, literally, "Western education is forbidden." So far, at least 10,000 students are being kept home because parents fear more Boko Haram attacks on schools. Seven schools have been burned or blown up so far.

March 7, 2012: In the northern town of Zaria a police raid captured s group of Boko Haram members, some of whom admitted to being involved in the kidnapping of two foreigners last May. The arrested kidnappers also told police where the captives now were, which led to a failed raid to free them.

In the northern city of Sokoto a hundred Nigerian and British commandos sought to free two foreigners (a Briton and an Italian). The kidnappers had shot the captives dead before the commandos got there.

March 8, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri Boko Haram attacked a police station and two banks, leaving four policemen and three civilians dead.

March 9, 2012: In the northern city of Kano Boko Haram gunmen attacked a police station but were repelled.

March 11, 2012: In the central Nigerian city of Jos a car bomb went off outside a church, killing six people.

March 12, 2012: In the northern city of Kano Boko Haram gunmen attacked a police station but were repelled.

March 13, 2012: In the northern city of Kano Boko Haram gunmen attacked a checkpoint, killing three policeman and a soldier. Elsewhere in Kano there was a gun battle with Boko Haram men but no casualties.

March 14, 2012: Boko Haram has offered a four week cease fire but only if all Boko Haram held in prison are freed and many other Boko Haram are given immunity from arrest during negotiations. The government is not interested.

Boko Haram is increasingly practicing what its name ("Western education is forbidden") implies by destroying secular schools. As many as a dozen schools a week are being attacked, and many of them are destroyed. Most northerners oppose this but Boko Haram come armed, and usually at night, to do the deed. Most neighborhoods are unable to muster an armed night watch and the police are, as usual, not very helpful.

The army revealed that Boko Haram violence has left over 1,200 dead in the last three years. Police say they have identified the kidnappers of the two foreigners killed on the 7th while a rescue force was on the way. Police say the kidnappers belonged to a Boko Haram faction, while the Islamic terrorist organization denies it. The army also claims that the hostages were murdered before the rescue raid even got going. The two captives were dead when the rescuers arrived, and the kidnappers had fled.

Many in the north believe that Boko Haram is being corrupted and used by criminal gangs and corrupt politicians for their own ends. There is a feeling that if you want to get revenge on someone in the north, now is the time to do it and blame it on Boko Haram (not more likely culprits like a political or business rival or a gangster refused cash or favors). There is growing evidence to support this.

March 15, 2012: Boko Haram has made it clear that it wants to drive all Christians out of northern Nigeria and then convert the south, by force if need be, to Islam. Boko Haram said they would start the process by kidnapping Christian women and forcing their families to leave the north or the captive would be killed. This would likely lead to a violent reaction in the Christian south where many Moslems live. All that could lead to civil war because the oil is in the south. For over half a century a lot of the oil money has gone north. But much of the oil income has been stolen, more of it by Christians (who are closer to the oil) than northerners. This has always been a source of contention and a factor in the 1968 civil war. A lesser threat is local al Qaeda goals of establishing a multistate religious dictatorship stretching from Mauritania on the Atlantic coast to Somalia on the Indian Ocean coast. Too many tribes and nations are involved for any such unification to succeed but it motivates a lot of the al Qaeda violence in the region.

March 17, 2012: In the north (Kaduna State) dozens of Boko Haram gunmen attacked three villages and killed ten Christians, including a cleric. The Boko Haram then attacked a police station, causing some casualties.

March 18, 2012: Boko Haram announced that it would halt peace talks with the government. Boko Haram is demanding the release of many imprisoned Boko Haram members before any real negotiations begin. Boko Haram is on a mission from God, to impose a religious dictatorship over all of Nigeria and convert, expel, or kill all non-Moslems. All this makes negotiations difficult.

An al Qaeda spokesman in Mauritania announced that his group had a German man who was kidnapped in Nigeria two months ago and were holding him for ransom (cash and the release of al Qaeda men held in Germany). Most likely, criminals kidnapped the man and then sold him to al Qaeda (which was safer, if less lucrative, than trying to get a ransom themselves).

March 21, 2012: Outside the northern city of Kano, Boko Haram gunmen attacked a bank and police station with bombs. The bank was destroyed but the money was not taken. The assault on the police did not work out well, and the police counter-attack left nine Boko Haram suspects dead and two captured. Earlier in the day gunmen, believed to be Boko Haram, shot dead three people.

To no one's surprise, the large quantities of money the government has appropriated recently to provide security in the face of Boko Haram violence has led to more corruption. A lot of this money is not creating a lot of additional security but is promoting more opportunities to steal. Many security programs are announced but never happen.

March 23, 2012: Boko Haram is a serious problem for the Nigerian government because the national police are incompetent and the military, which is somewhat more competent, is not trained or equipped for police work. Thus defeating a better organized and motivated organization of religious zealots will be very difficult and time consuming. The prospect of Boko Haram establishing a religious dictatorship is not popular with most Nigerians. Even many Moslems (who are about half the population) oppose this. All the Christians are opposed to Islamic rule (and forced conversion). But it's difficult to get behind the government, which is corrupt, inept and dominated by liars, thieves, and people pretending to be virtuous. The best most Nigerians can hope for is the elimination of Boko Haram without too much collateral damage. The police and soldiers tend to shoot randomly and loot at every opportunity, so collateral damage is certain. In addition, local self-defense forces will increasingly go after Boko Haram and anyone else they don't like. Hard times are coming.

March 24, 2012: In the north (Kano and Maiduguri) vigorous searches for Boko Haram gunmen resulted in several clashes, which left five Boko Haram members dead.

Al Qaeda claimed responsibility for kidnapping a German man last January. Al Qaeda wants cash and the release of a Moslem woman imprisoned in Germany for terrorism.

March 26, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram gunmen killed two retired policemen. Related gun battles left four more dead, including three of the terrorists.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram gunmen killed a police commander.

March 28, 2012: In the north (Yobe State) Boko Haram attacked a police station (with a bomb and guns) and freed a dozen prisoners. Three of the attackers died.

The police and army have warned people up north not to provide shelter or support for Boko Haram. This may scare off some but many northerners support anyone fighting back against what is perceived as a corrupt and brutal government. Police are searching a lot more known pro-Boko Haram neighborhoods and finding guns and bomb making equipment. People are arrested and some of them talk, leading to more searches. The police are creating more Boko Haram supporters with these rough tactics but the terrorists are being hurt.

Boko Haram is having its own civil war. Two major factions are feuding with each other. The animosity is so great that the factions are providing police with information about where the leaders of the other faction are likely to be. This has resulted in the arrest or death of several Boko Haram leaders recently. But many of the tips are not credible, and the security forces tend to overreact, as they usually do. Many of those arrested are soon released, once it is realized that there is nothing connecting them to the Islamic terror group (as happens when Christians are picked up in these sweeps.) The increased police searches are also uncovering evidence of al Qaeda activity in the north, or at least people who are in contact with al Qaeda operations in other countries.

The traditional tribal and religious leaders are alarmed at Boko Haram, because the Islamic radicals provide opportunities for reform minded (or opportunistic) clerics and minor tribal leaders to seek more power. Thus the traditional leaders are meeting quietly to try and develop tactics to deal with these upstarts. Many of the traditional leaders are corrupt, but most of them take seriously their responsibilities to their tribe or religious followers.

March 30, 2012: The government announced that it plans to have crushed Boko Haram by June. That optimism is based on politics (the need to defeat the greatest security threat the nation has faced in decades) and smugness (substantial police and army forces have been sent north, with orders to do whatever it takes to get the job done.) On the downside, the northerners are, in general, still angry with the persistent corruption, and many Moslems tend to blame Christians, and southerners in general for all the bad stuff (corruption and inept government). This is partly a religious thing, because Islam holds that Moslems are good and all evil comes from infidels (non-Moslems). The Christians, in contrast, are more into personal responsibility and self-help. This is all part of the ancient culture clash between the north and the south, which was only made worse when the north adopted Islam centuries ago. The government really wants Boko Haram gone by June, because otherwise the nation is a lot closer to civil war.

March 31, 2012: An army raid on a Boko Haram bomb workshop in northern Kogi State. The gun battle left a policeman, a soldier, and nine Islamic terrorists dead.

April 2, 2012: In the northern city of Kano two Boko Haram men were seized by civilians when the Islamic radicals attempted to terrorize a neighborhood. But before the police arrived several other Boko Haram gunmen came and killed the two captured men, apparently to prevent them from revealing any information.

Security forces in the north warned civilians to be on the alert for Boko Haram attacks on Easter Sunday. The army and police are setting up additional security near Christian churches in the north.

April 4, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram gunmen killed nine people in a market. This was probably part of the Boko Haram intimidation campaign to prevent civilians from informing to the police and to encourage people to donate money to the Islamic terrorists. Later that day two Boko Haram men were killed, along with a policeman, as the Islamic terrorists unsuccessfully attacked a police station.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, three Boko Haram men were killed and two arrested after a brief gun battle with police (who had received a tip from local civilians). Elsewhere in the city soldiers found and dismantled a roadside bomb. In the central Nigeria city of Jos, another bomb went off near a Christian church, wounding several people.

April 8, 2012: In the northern city of Kaduna a Boko Haram car bomber, turned away from a Christian church by security forces, detonated his bomb in traffic as police approached, killing 38 people in the blast.

April 9, 2012: Boko Haram has become increasingly aggressive but at the same time has angered most of the Moslem population. While most Moslem Nigerians approve of Boko Haram goals (to eliminate corruption), they are appalled at the methods, as well as the Islamic radicals' goal of establishing a religious dictatorship. This popular anger can best be measured by the growing number of tips police are receiving, providing details of where Boko Haram men are and what they are doing. In response to this Boko Haram men are torn between terrorizing civilians and preaching to them. Neither approach is working and Boko Haram finds itself working in an increasingly hostile atmosphere. Another problem is a lack of bomb building skills and experienced leadership. Many of the Boko Haram attacks are poorly planned and bombs often do not go off, or explode before they are supposed to. But as long as there are enough young men willing to join Boko Haram the terror will continue.

April 11, 2012: In the northeastern town of Banki (on the Cameroon border) several dozen people have been killed or wounded by Boko Haram violence in the last few days. The Islamic radicals attacked border posts and police stations.

The commander of the army issued a message for the troops pointing out that negotiations with Boko Haram had not worked and that now the military was at war with the Islamic radicals and that it was a fight to the death. Many Christian troops are enraged at the Boko Haram attacks in the north on Easter Sunday, that left 40 dead and many more wounded. Moslem troops are also angry because most of the Boko Haram victims tend to be Moslem civilians.

In the north Boko Haram shot dead two men for ignoring orders to stop attending public places where televised football (soccer) games are shown. Islamic radicals considered such sports un-Islamic. Over the last few days Boko Haram activists had been distributing pamphlets warning people to stop attending the community center where the matches were shown. The viewing centers are a popular attraction in Nigeria and often the only way for people to see European soccer games (where teams often feature hugely popular African players).

April 12, 2012: In an Internet video Boko Haram responded to president Goodluck Johnson's promise to defeat the Islamic radical group by June. The Boko Haram video warned that the Islamic radicals would overthrow the government in three months and kill any Christians and Moslems who were trying to fight Boko Haram. This apparently rules out any negotiations in the near future.

April 13, 2012: MEND (Niger Delta tribal rebels) threatened to attack South African companies if South Africa does not halt the prosecution of the MEND leader Henry Okah. He was arrested on October 2nd, 2010, in conjunction with the car bomb blasts in Nigeria the day before. Okah's diary and other documents were also seized, they indicated he was still involved in terrorist activity inside Nigeria. This included documents from Chinese arms exporters offering to make illegal weapons sales to Nigerian rebels. Okah had been freed from a Nigerian jail in July, 2009, after accepting the government amnesty. All charges were withdrawn but he fled to exile in South Africa a few months later. Okah denied any involvement in recent bombings, and MEND then split into factions, some of which defied orders from MEND leadership and continued attacks. Many MEND members feel that Okah is an opportunist who imported guns for criminal gangs, as well as MEND, and stole a lot of MEND money for himself. As a result, many MEND members have since accepted the government amnesty but the MEND hard core is still in business, and this group contains a lot of Okah followers. MEND has been demanding that the army withdraw from the Delta and all prisoners be freed or else there will be a new wave of attacks on oil facilities. Not much has come of these threats. The MEND rebels want the terms of the 2009 amnesty deal enforced and corrupt officials running the program removed. In response to those threats the military keeps attacking MEND associated camps in the Niger delta, seizing lots of weapons and equipment but not making many arrests. The rebels tend to hear the troops coming (usually by boat, usually after some aerial reconnaissance) and slip away into an area of numerous creeks and islands they know well. Many criminals in the delta also support rebel goals (for more autonomy in the Delta, less corruption, and spending additional oil money locally). Even though the government has screwed up their end of the amnesty deal they insist that the rebels keep the peace. But corruption and mismanagement have kept many rebels from getting the amnesty benefits and the government is seen as unreliable, corrupt, and a hostile force. The MEND threats have been much more ambitious than the actual attacks and it is believed that only a few people are involved in attacks on oil facilities (which are well guarded these days).

April 14, 2012: The new spokesman for Boko Haram (Mohammed Anwal Kontagora) was executed by his fellow Islamic radicals on the orders of the Boko Haram leader. Kontagora was being pursued by the security services and Boko Haram leadership believed that he might turn against the Islamic radicals if captured. Apparently Kontagora had expressed some unease at the use of terror attacks that killed Moslem civilians. The previous Boko Haram spokesman had been arrested three months ago, and Kontagora was not enthusiastic about taking over the job. Finding a replacement for Kontagora will be difficult, since whoever takes the job becomes a target for the security forces. The death of Kontagora also spotlights the internal divisions Boko Haram suffers from. There are several factions, caused by tribal and doctrinal differences. The attitudes range from reform to revolution and the latter group is willing to kill lots of people in order to establish an Islamic state. The reformers point out that this has not worked anywhere but that reform has a better chance of success. Since the revolutionaries tend to be fanatics these appeals to reason have little impact.

April 15, 2012: In the northern city of Kano a Boko Haram bomb wounded three people.

April 16, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri Boko Haram killed two people as part of an attempt to deter informers.

In Britain a notoriously corrupt former governor of Delta State (James Ibori) was convicted of corruption (and money laundering in Britain) and sentenced to 13 years in prison and forfeiture of the stolen money (or at least as much as can be found). Ibori has been prosecuted for corruption in Nigeria but was able to bribe his way out of it. He fled the country but was arrested in the Persian Gulf (Dubai) and extradited to Britain. Nigeria encourages foreign countries to prosecute its corrupt officials, who are vulnerable to this once they have left office (like Ibori did five years ago after serving for eight plunderful years).

April 17, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri four Boko Haram men were killed and 13 arrested.

April 18, 2012: While Boko Haram demonstrates its use of terrorism quite openly the security forces, especially the army, are more discreet about their use of kidnapping (illegal arrest) and murder. People tend to disappear when soldiers are on a mission and in a bad mood. Often there are witnesses to the troops taking someone away for questioning. People have learned that complaining to the army when the arrested don't return can get you picked up (and disappeared) as well. For many Nigerians the battle between the army and Boko Haram is just two terrorist groups killing each other and random civilians. But the fanaticism of Boko Haram is more feared than the corruption of the security forces. While politicians and media keep calling for reform of the military there is no hope of "reforming" Boko Haram.

April 19, 2012: Piracy is on the increase off the coast. Ships are not being taken, as off Somalia, but instead the crews are robbed and anything valuable and portable is taken. Sometimes senior officers are kidnapped and held for ransom. In the first three months of this year, there were ten of these attacks off the Nigerian coast. For all of last year there were only ten such attacks. At the same time oil revenue last month was down five percent because of attacks on oil facilities in the Niger Delta.

April 20, 2012: In the north Boko Haram killed seven people in several attacks during the last 24 hours.

An air force raid on a Boko Haram bomb workshop in northern Kogi State destroyed the facility. While the terrorists were able to escape before troops could get to the remote area, much evidence of bomb making and Boko Haram was found.

In northeastern Borno State an explosion in a Boko Haram bomb workshop killed at least five.

April 21, 2012: The government is establishing a special prison for senior Boko Haram. This will make it easier to interrogate the prisoners and analyze the information. The new prison will also be more resistant to Boko Haram attempts to free their fellow terrorists. Other prisons are vulnerable to such attacks because of bribery and incompetence.

In the northern city of Kano police raided a Boko Haram bomb workshop and found six assembled bombs and one under construction. The Islamic terrorists use these bombs to attack the security forces, intelligence services, and government offices. But most of the casualties tend to be nearby civilians. This increases the willingness of people to tell the police (who are generally hated for their corruption and cruelty) about Boko Haram activity they have spotted.

April 24, 2012: An audit of the fuel subsidy program (which keeps vehicle and other petroleum fuels very inexpensive) found that someone stole nearly $7 billion from the program in just three years (2009-11). Legislators are calling for identification and prosecution of those that took the money. But the guilty will, as usual, use their stolen wealth to bribe police, prosecutors, journalists, and politicians to avoid punishment. It's very difficult to get through these defenses and actually convict and imprison these thieves.

April 25, 2012: Tribal violence continued in the Central Nigerian city of Jos, leaving six dead in two incidents.

April 26, 2012: Suicide car bombers in the capital and the northern city of Kano attacked the offices of a major newspaper, leaving 40 dead and hundreds injured. Boko Haram took responsibility and warned that if news media continued to say unflattering things about the Islamic terrorists the attacks would continue. This is a standard tactic of terrorists.

One of Boko Haram's main goals (as its name implies) is to prevent Nigerian Moslems from getting a Western education (despite that being what most parents want). So far this year 14 schools have been destroyed, leaving 7,000 students without an education. The threat of attack on schools and teachers has kept over 100,000 other students away from class at least some of the time.

April 27, 2012: Senior members of the government, from both north and south, fear that continued Boko Haram terrorism could cause civil war. Nigerians and foreigners have been predicting that for years, but the Islamic radicals have indeed terrorized Nigeria, especially the Moslem north, and politicians are under pressure to do something about it. So far this year Boko Haram violence has left about 1,100 dead.

April 29, 2012: In the northern city of Kano Boko Haram gunmen attacked a Christian worship service, killing 15 people.

April 30, 2012: In the north a suicide bomber attacked the convoy of a senior police commander, killing 11 (only one of them a policeman) but leaving the commander unharmed.

Boko Haram released a video on the Internet taking credit for a recent attack on the main office of the nation's largest newspaper and threatening similar violence against any other media outlet that published anything the Islamic terrorists disagree with. This is classic terrorism, Islamic or otherwise. Intimidate the media in order to weaken the government and any popular opposition.

May 2, 2012: In the northeastern city of Potiskum a criminal gang attacked a cattle market and killed over 40 people.

In the northeastern state of Borno some Boko Haram gunmen attacked a police station and were repulsed but then went to a nearby town and attacked another police station, killed two policemen and freed several prisoners.

In the northeast criminals dressed as soldiers killed five people in a village.

May 4, 2012: The government announced that 50,000 police would undergo training to make them less corrupt and more effective.

May 5, 2012: In the northeast a raid on the wedding of a Boko Haram man left eight dead.

In the northeastern city of Potiskum thousands came out to protest the recent attack on a cattle market that left over 40 dead. Since the violence was partially fueled by tribal and religious differences there were also mob attacks that damaged a church and a school with fires. Criminal gangs were believed responsible for the cattle market attack. The protestors want better police protection.

May 8, 2012: May 7, 2012: In the northern city of Kano soldiers raided a Boko Haram safe house and killed four Islamic terrorists. In Kano's Bayero University three bombs were found and disabled.

The government is alarmed at the support Boko Haram is receiving in the north. While many northerners oppose the Islamic terrorists, enough support them to make it difficult for the police to hunt the terrorists down. In response to this the president is replacing ten of his ministers, mainly those tainted with corruption. Others are being replaced in an attempt to make the security services more effective. But it’s the widespread corruption, and growing anger against it, that fuels Boko Haram.

May 9, 2012: In the last two years Boko Haram has made random violence against Christians and the security forces fashionable. Unemployed teenagers and young men are attracted to the organization, which encourages members to steal for the cause and kill policemen, or anyone who gets in their way.

May 10, 2012: In the northern city of Kano, Boko Haram gunmen killed a local Shia leader. Many Sunni (over 80 percent of Moslems) believe Shia (about ten percent of Moslems) to be heretics and to be converted or killed.

Tribal violence continued in the Central Nigerian city of Jos, leaving seven dead in several incidents.

May 11, 2012: In the northeast police arrested the Boko Haram commander (Suleiman Mohammed) for Kano along with his wife and five children during a raid. Suleiman Mohammed was then flown to the national capital for interrogation. The raid was made possible by a tip from a local and also led to the seizure of explosives and other bomb making materials.

May 12, 2012: In the northeast Boko Haram gunmen attacked a police station and burned it down, killing two policemen and a civilian in the process.

In the northern city of Kano, Boko Haram gunmen killed three men who were playing cards. Boko Haram is trying to impose a strict Islamic lifestyle, which means no cards, music, video, booze, and so on.

May 13, 2012: In the northeast, near the Cameroon border, a tribal feud left twelve dead (including one policeman) and most of a village burned down.

Government efforts to halt oil thefts in the Niger River delta led to the discovery that a lot of these oil thefts (from tapping into oil pipelines) are carried out under the protection of military and political leaders (who get a cut of the proceeds). All forms of oil theft are believed to account for about five percent of oil production each year. That's half of what it was a few years ago, and the oil theft is still a major activity for the criminal gangs in Niger Delta.

The battle against rampant crime is crippled by the corrupt police. A major reason for this corruption is the poor, and very corrupt, leadership in the police. The rot begins at the top and moves down the chain of command.

May 17, 2012: Intelligence efforts have found Boko Haram to be in regular contact with other Islamic terror groups in the region. One reason for this is fund raising, as the al Qaeda and Algerian Islamic groups have more money and Boko Haram has received large donations (several hundred thousand dollars so far). Boko Haram also raises cash by extortion (imposing "Islamic taxes") and sometimes outright theft. But Boko Haram tries to avoid anything similar to the criminal behavior Nigerians face every day when dealing with gangsters or, to many, the biggest criminal organization of all, local and federal government. The federal government is considered the biggest thief because they control the oil income. Very little of that oil money has been applied to the general welfare and Nigerians are fed up with decades of stealing and abuse of power. While there are major efforts underway to reduce corruption, those families that have stolen all that money are ready to spend a lot of it to defeat the prosecutions against them. This includes bribing judges, witnesses, and doing whatever it takes to make Nigeria safe for corrupt politicians.

May 18, 2012: A government study concluded that theft of oil from pipelines (from tapping into oil pipelines) is costing the government $9 billion a year. Since government income from oil is about $4-5 billion a month that is a major problem. Over the last decade the government made a major effort to curb oil theft by tribal gangs in the Niger Delta. These gangs were preaching rebellion and more oil money for the locals. The government put down this movement by cracking down on the oil theft efforts of these gangs. This led to the discovery that a lot of these oil thefts are carried out under the protection of military and political leaders (who get a cut of the proceeds). All forms of oil theft are believed to account for 5-10 percent of oil production each year. Oil theft is still a major activity for the criminal gangs in Niger Delta. The theft not only reduces government income, it leaves a lot of spilled oil on the ground and in the waterways of the Niger River Delta. The problem has been so bad recently that oil production was down 14 percent in April.

May 19, 2012: In the central Nigerian city of Jos, a police raid uncovered a bomb making workshop. Jos has, for the last few years, been the scene of deadly violence between Moslems and Christians.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, two Boko Haram attacks left five dead.

May 21, 2012: In the capital police arrested a Boko Haram man trying to enter a government building carrying concealed weapons.

May 26, 2012: In the north Boko Haram shot dead three card players. Boko Haram considers card playing and most forms of entertainment as sinful and punishable by death.

May 28, 2012: In the northeast Boko Haram shot dead four Christian merchants. Boko Haram wants to drive all Christians out of the Moslem north and eventually turn the north into an Islamic religious dictatorship.

Decades of effort to eradicate polio are still being compromised by Islamic radicals. There are only small populations in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Nigeria where polio is still found. In Nigeria Islamic conservatives up north have been preaching against polio vaccinations for years (on the assumption that the medicine is actually a Christian plot to poison Moslems). Polio can be wiped out, like smallpox was back in the 1970s, if you can vaccinate everyone in areas where the disease still exists (as polio and smallpox are diseases that can only live in human hosts). But the Islamic conservatives have been a major barrier to eliminating polio. The current wave of Islamic conservatism was only getting started back in the 1970s, and it continues to grow. The government is making yet another effort to wipe out polio in the Moslem north. It's unclear if Boko Haram will actively oppose this. Apparently, some in Boko Haram do see the polio vaccinations as part of a war against Islam.

The police are very corrupt and often violent. This means that sending additional police to the Moslem north is likely to cause more violence, rather than reduce it. Curbing police corruption has long been a popular cause but no politician has ever managed to make a dent in the problem.

May 29, 2012: The war against Boko Haram is very visible in the Moslem north. There are roadblocks everywhere and a lot more soldiers and police. This is hurting Boko Haram, which has suffered some serious losses (of leaders, bomb making supplies, and technicians) in the last few months. But the Islamic terrorists retain a growing popularity among many Moslems because of the promise to eliminate the corruption that strangles the economy and oppresses every Nigerian every day. President Johnson has been in power for a year and was elected on the promise of making a major effort to curb corruption. There has been a lot of noise about suppressing corruption but little result. Those corrupt officials who are indicted tend to bribe their way past judge, jury, and jailers. There is still lots of crime and not much punishment.

May 31, 2012: In the northern city of Kano, a police effort to rescue a German man being held for ransom for five months failed, with the hostage, as well as four other people dying. The German was being held by a group affiliated with al Qaeda. The German government complied with one of the kidnapper's demands and freed a convicted Islamic terrorist in April. But this was not sufficient and al Qaeda demanded more.

June 2, 2012: Tribal violence in central Nigeria (Nasarawa State) has left at least 20 dead and over 50 wounded.

June 3, 2012: In the north (Bauchi State) a bomb went off in a church, killing 21 and wounding nearly 50. Boko Haram later took credit for the attack. Boko Haram has long pledged to drive all Christians out of the Moslem north and eventually conquer the Christian south and force everyone there to convert to Islam.

June 5, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, troops raided a neighborhood used as a base for Boko Haram and killed at least 16 of the Islamic terrorists.

Meanwhile, many foreign nations are assisting Nigeria to upgrade its security and counter-terror forces. This includes donations of equipment and providing training.

The government has asked the U.S. for help in dealing with Boko Haram. Major assistance (UAVs, Special Forces) can't be provided unless the U.S. can declare Boko Haram a Foreign (international) Terrorist Organization (or FTO). The U.S. is still debating that. So far, the only foreign nation Boko Haram has operated in is Mali. Since northern Mali is on its way to becoming another terrorist sanctuary, this may be all that is required to bring American counter-terrorism forces to Nigeria.

June 7, 2012: Boko Haram mocks the government for the ineptitude of the police and army, as well as the general inability to crush the Islamic radicals. While all that is largely true, Boko Haram is itself not very rational, killing many civilians and attempting to trigger a civil war between the Christians (who occupy the oil fields) and the Moslems (largely in the more arid north). While most Nigerians agree with Boko Haram on the need to eliminate corruption and incompetent government, few Nigerians, even among the Moslems, believe Boko Haram has the solution. This is especially true in light of Boko Haram's insistence on imposing Islamic law (Sharia) on all Nigerians. Boko Haram causes chaos and disrupts the economy in the north, which creates more popular anger at the group. The police and army are trying to operate in a less brutal and callous fashion but old habits are hard to change. Boko Haram is already seeking to limit civilian (at least Moslem civilians) deaths but is not having much success. Long-term, Boko Haram seems headed for defeat. But to get there thousands will die and the economic damage (mainly in the north) will be enormous.

June 8, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, a suicide car bomber attacked police headquarters, leaving five dead (one policeman, four civilians). Elsewhere in the north someone shot and killed a policeman.

June 9, 2012: In the north two shooting incidents left two policeman and a civilian dead.

In the north Christian and Moslem (Fulani and Bachama) tribesmen resumed fighting over land use disputes. This round of violence left 13 dead and over 50 wounded.

June 10, 2012: Boko Haram attacked churches in central and northern Nigeria leaving five dead and over a dozen wounded. Christian mobs seeking revenge then went out and killed six Moslem men. Christian and Moslem religious leaders called for calm, warning that widespread religious violence would cause large scale deaths and property losses. Boko Haram wants religious war, believing such chaos would enable them to seize control of the north and then the country. The Boko Haram leadership has not been paying attention to what happened to similar Islamic radical groups elsewhere. In short, large scale religious strife tends to leave groups like Boko Haram crushed and marginalized. True believers are not discouraged by this sort of thing.

June 12, 2012: Al Qaeda announced on a web site that the May 31, death of a German hostage during a rescue attempt by Nigerian police was all the fault of Germany. Al Qaeda gunmen killed their prisoner rather than risk having him freed. Al Qaeda believes they are on a Mission From God and non-believers should just pay the ransom demanded and, in general, submit to Islamic rule. Kidnapping for ransom has become a big business in the north and south. Last year there were 366 kidnappings, but only 140 of those victims were freed. The number of kidnappings is higher this year.

Journalists are also in great danger up north. Boko Haram has made it clear that any journalist that does not write favorably about the Islamic radicals is considered an enemy and subject to attack. Many journalists are leaving the north. Some of these reporters now work from the Christian south, or anonymously in the north, using the Internet and cell phones. Boko Haram goes after the media outlets (including cell phone and Internet providers) if they cannot reach the reporters. Although the attacks have been relatively few, they have gotten a lot of attention and caused much fear in the north.

The Boko Haram violence is still but a fraction of the usual criminal activity by tribal militias and criminal gangs. But the Boko Haram gets more publicity and has the potential to escalate into nationwide religious war. Few Nigerians want this but there are radicals throughout the country who back such a solution to the Boko Haram threat.

June 15, 2012: In the north political, tribal, and religious leaders called on Boko Haram to join peace negotiations. The Islamic radicals have not responded well, as they consider these leaders part of the corruption and mismanagement problem. Religious leaders in the north are in big trouble as if they back Boko Haram because then the police come after them. If they back the government, Boko Haram comes after them. Remaining neutral is difficult and always dangerous. The government is trying to attack Boko Haram as a police matter (with lots of raids, deaths, and arrests) as well as political one (increased prosecution for corruption, which goes very slowly).

June 17, 2012: In northern Kaduna State bombs in three churches left 16 dead.

June 18, 2012: In the northern city of Damaturu, police responded to Boko Haram attacks and fought Boko Haram fighters. All this left at least 40 dead.

June 19, 2012: In the northern city of Damaturu, Boko Haram gunmen continued to fight with police.

June 20, 2012: In the northern city of Kano, nearly 200 casualties resulted as police fought Christian and Moslem mobs. The Christians are attacking Mosques in retaliation for Boko Haram attacks on Christians.

President Goodluck Jonathan dismissed his national security adviser and his defense minister. Both men were from the Christian south. A northerner (a retired army colonel and cousin of a major Moslem leader in the north) was promptly appointed as the new national security adviser.

June 21, 2012: The U.S. has declared the three top leaders of Boko Haram to be international terrorists. This will make it more difficult for these three to travel outside of Nigeria and make them a target for American counter-terrorism forces. The United States did not designate Boko Haram as an international terrorist organization, something Nigerian leaders wanted.

In northern Kano State police imposed a curfew.

In the northern city of Kano, police arrested four men who were trying to plant a bomb at a major mosque.

In the northern cities of Damaturu and Kaduna over a hundred people have died as Christians retaliated for three attacks on churches last Sunday. Boko Haram took credit for the church attacks.

June 22, 2012: A bomb exploded outside a nightclub in the capital, causing no injuries. Nightclubs are a favorite Boko Haram target but extortionists often make the same kinds of attacks.

June 24, 2012: In the Moslem north a week of violence has left over 200 dead and more than a thousand wounded. Boko Haram attacks on churches got the violence started, as Christians then attacked Moslems in retaliation. Boko Haram continued to attack police and soldiers who tried to suppress the unrest. All this is concentrated in a few northern cities where there are large Christian minorities and plenty of churches to attack. Much of the violence occurred in Kaduna, a Moslem city in central Nigeria that contains a large Christian population. Moslem and Christian religious leaders called for calm but Christian clerics made it clear that Christians had the right to defend themselves. At the same time Christian leaders spoke out against reprisal attacks in the largely Christian south (against the Moslem minority there).

June 26, 2012: President Goodluck Jonathan fired the head of the state-owned oil company and several other senior executives as well. Replacements were quickly appointed and warned that corruption would not be tolerated. The firings were mostly about the ability of the dismissed executives to eliminate the massive corruption that has always existed in the state owned oil operations.

June 27, 2012: In the northeast two days of violence left four policemen, four civilians, and 19 Boko Haram members dead. Recently Boko Haram has taken to making larger attacks, employing several dozen gunmen to attack police stations.

June 29, 2012: With great fanfare police in the Niger Delta arrested Seifa Gbereke, leader of a small oil stealing gang, who was responsible for several explosions that shut down oil pipelines. Gbereke and his gang of eight men did not play well with others and thus had to be taken down. Oil thieves that keep a low profile and pay their bribes on time are rarely arrested. The security forces in the Niger Delta are believed to be largely compromised and exist mainly to arrest those oil thieves who refuse to pay for protection from the police and military.

June 30, 2012: In the northeastern city of Damaturu, police raided a Boko Haram hideout and killed three Islamic terrorists and arrested another. In the central Nigerian city of Jos, police disabled and removed a large bomb on a major road bridge outside the city.

July 2, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram is suspected in the murder, at night, of nine construction workers at a mosque.

Military and police efforts against Boko Haram in the north are putting a lot of strain on the security forces. So the army is moving thousands of additional troops to the north. Supplying troops for all the additional checkpoints and patrols, plus the growing number of raids, is wearing down the troops and police already there.

A side effect of the growing oil thefts is the increased amount of oil spilled into the Niger Delta waters during the process of tapping the pipelines. This is causing more poverty (fisherman cannot work) and illness (from drinking tainted water) and corrupt local officials have found it impossible to suppress news of these problems. The oil stealing activity has more than doubled in the past year, making the activity more obvious and increasing public outcry and calls for the government to do something.

Government and independent investigators find that oil theft is increasing and is now costing the government over a billion dollars a month in lost revenue. It was government efforts to halt oil thefts in the Niger River delta that led to the discovery that a lot of these oil thefts (from tapping into oil pipelines) are carried out under the protection of military and political leaders (who get a cut of the proceeds). All forms of oil theft are believed to be well protected by millions of dollars a month in bribes to police, military, and government officials. Oil theft is still a major activity for the criminal gangs in Niger Delta and their secret allies in the government are not happy with the publicity.

July 3, 2012: Before you can fix a problem you must admit it exists. Thus the growing mention of corruption in Nigerian media is a positive sign. On the down side, all that reporting of inept and thieving government officials is disheartening. But at least it's no longer popular to blame "foreign colonialists" for all the bad habits (which existed before the colonial period and were largely suppressed while the colonial officials were in charge). Thus the more honest and efficient colonial era government is now seen by many as something to be emulated: but how? No one is going to invite foreigners back to run the place. Finding enough honest and capable Nigerians to do it is proving to be a very difficult chore. Increasingly, Nigerians are taking a close look at their habits and customs and are not pleased at what they see.

July 5, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram assassins killed two people by slitting their throats.

In the capital prosecutors accused two men of being al Qaeda members and trying to recruit people to go and fight in Yemen.

July 7, 2012: In the northeastern city of Damaturu, Boko Haram gunmen fought with police. At least one Boko Haram hideout was raided. There was also a large explosion. At least one death was reported, along with several other casualties.

July 8, 2012: Over the last two days, in central Nigeria (Plateau State), Moslem tribesmen raided Christian villages outside the city of Jos and over a hundred people died. The raiders, who were mostly Fulani tribesmen, also attacked funerals for some of the first victims, which also left two senior politicians dead. Boko Haram claimed involvement. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers).

July 13, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, a teenage Boko Haram suicide bomber attempted to kill an Islamic cleric (Umar Garbai el Kanemi) who preached against Islamic terrorism. The attack failed but the bomber and five civilians died. Kanemi is the Shehu of Borno and a major tribal and religious leader. Boko Haram has tried to kill him before. Kanemi is on good terms with many Christian religious leaders, who promptly condemned the suicide bomber attack.

July 15, 2012: In Okene (central Nigeria) a bomb went off near a church. There were no casualties.

The army has moved more troops into central Nigeria (especially around Jos) and announced that there will be raids on Boko Haram hideouts. There has been a lot of ethnic violence (between Moslem and Christian tribes) in Jos but now Boko Haram has moved in to side with the Moslem Fulani tribesmen.

July 16, 2012: Boko Haram related violence has left nearly 700 dead so far this year. Boko Haram keeps warning Christians to either convert to Islam or die. Moslem and Christian leaders are giving more speeches about avoiding religious warfare. The Christian majority in the south has restrained itself and not retaliated (much) against their Moslem minority. But in the north, Boko Haram is making, and encouraging, more attacks on Christians. Nearly all the deaths have been in the north, or around the central Nigerian city of Jos.

July 17, 2012: In Jos (central Nigeria) two more people were killed in tribal violence. Elsewhere around Jos over 5,000 Christians have fled their homes to escape weeks of attacks by Moslems.

July 22, 2012: In the north (Bauchi State) a bomb went off near a beer garden, killing a nearby child but not harming those drinking beer. Boko Haram did not immediately take credit for this poorly carried out attack, apparently because it did not work and only a child was killed.

July 24, 2012: In central Nigeria the army has allowed thousands of Moslems to return to their villages after troops searched for weapons and other evidence of organized violence against Christians.

The government will increase the defense budget from its current $2.2 billion a year to $4.8 billion over the next four years. The budget will go up about 20 percent over each of the next four years. About 89 percent of the military budget will go to personnel (pay and benefits) while the rest will go for equipment, weapons, and construction.

The U.S. has offered Nigeria assistance in going after drug smuggling and distribution gangs. Nigeria has accepted, in part because al Qaeda, and possibly Boko Haram, have become allies of the drug gangs. This was not done because the Islamic radicals approve of drugs (they don't, officially) but because it’s a quick way to obtain lots of cash to finance terrorist operations. The Taliban, which Boko Haram openly models itself on, has survived on drug gang subsidies for over a decade.

Anti-corruption investigators have compiled considerable evidence that the recently cancelled fuel subsidy program (which saved the government $6 billion a year) had been plundered by corrupt companies and politicians, who stole over $2 billion a year over the last three years (that were audited, the theft apparently went on for a lot longer). No individuals have been identified for prosecution yet but if recent experience is any guide the accused will buy themselves out of being punished.

July 25, 2012: Religious violence has caused nearly a thousand deaths so far this year, nearly all of them in the north, in a few cities where the Islamic terrorist Boko Haram group is active. But about a third of those deaths are not connected with Boko Haram. These have taken place around the central Nigerian city of Jos, where Moslem and Christian tribes have been fighting each other for decades, but the last ten years have been particularly bloody, with over 4,000 dead. Boko Haram encourages the Moslem attackers around Jos but apparently has no formal relationship with them. Moslem and Christian leaders throughout the country are urging their followers to not carry out revenge attacks. This is particularly important for Christians because nearly all the violence in the last few years had been directed at Christians by Moslems. So far there have not been a lot of revenge attacks, but this could quickly change because the anger at the Boko Haram and Jos violence is causing increasing anger among Christians. The government is sending lots of soldiers and police against Boko Haram and that is having some impact. But the soldiers and police are seen as corrupt and recklessly violent and their presence is causing more anti-government anger against the government. This anger often becomes support for Boko Haram.

July 26, 2012: In northeastern Bauchi State Boko Haram gunmen killed three policemen at a highway checkpoint.

July 27, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri a police raid killed two Boko Haram members and led to the arrest of 26 others. This operation was in response to a Boko Haram attack on a factory three days ago, where two Indian managers were killed and $600 was stolen.

July 28, 2012: In the north two shooting incidents left two policemen and two Boko Haram members dead.

July 29, 2012: In the northern city eight people were killed during three incidents involving Boko Haram gunmen opening fire. Four of the dead were Boko Haram attackers.

July 30, 2012: In the north Boko Haram launched suicide bomb attacks on two police stations in Sokoto and an attack on the country estate of vice president of Nigeria Namadi Sambo in Zaria. The suicide bomb attacks killed the attackers and two policemen. One bystander was killed in the Zaria attack.

In the northeast, a combined operation with troops from neighboring Chad and Cameroon, police killed two Boko Haram who were smuggling in a large quantity of weapons from Chad. The destination was the northeastern city of Maiduguri.

July 31, 2012: Police arrested two of three men believed responsible for the attack on the vice president's compound in Zaria yesterday.

Off the coast of the Niger River Delta, attacks on service boats (for offshore wells) are increasingly common. Usually the gunmen in speedboats just rob those on the service boats but occasionally they take someone to hold for ransom. The security forces do not have enough personnel for all those boats and it would be very expensive to put armed guards on all those boats, especially since only a very small percentage of boat trips are attacked.

August 2, 2012: The army is providing equipment and advice to churches and mosques to assist in defeating terror attacks. Keeping suspicious vehicles away is important because Boko Haram is increasingly using car bombs. Meanwhile, a growing number of Christian leaders are calling for Christians to organize for self-defense. This is already happening to protect northern churches during prayer services. But now there is a call to form militias to defend Christian neighborhoods in the north and to seek out Boko Haram groups in the Christian south. The government is discouraging the formation of armed militias, but if the army and police cannot protect Christians in the north, those people will either defend themselves or flee to the Christian south.

August 3, 2012: In the north a Boko Haram suicide bomber attempted to murder a tribal leader (the Emir of Fika who was also the head of the Council of Leaders in Yobe State). Tribal leaders tend to be part of the establishment, even though most oppose the corrupt government bureaucracy, and are hostile to Boko Haram. Thus the Islamic radicals want these Islamic leaders dead or coerced into compliance. This attack, outside a mosque, and was foiled by the Emir's bodyguards. The bomber was killed and three people wounded.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri explosions and gunfire could be heard as police searched for Boko Haram and found some of them.

August 4, 2012: Pirates attacked an oil company barge off the coast, killed the two sailors guarding it and kidnapping the four foreign (Indonesia, Iran, Malaysia and Thailand) workers on board.

August 5, 2012: In the north (Yobe State) Boko Haram gunmen went to the home of a state official and killed him, and then went to the nearby home of a retired official as well. Police arrived and the gunmen fled the neighborhood. Elsewhere in Yobe, (Damaturu) a suicide car bomber attacked a checkpoint, killing six policemen, two civilians and himself.

Boko Haram released a video on the Internet where is claimed that someone was committing crimes (unspecified) in the name of the Islamic terror group. Boko Haram also said it would not negotiate with the government and called on the Christian president of the country to convert to Islam. President Johnson refused to convert and insisted that Boko Haram would be crushed. But the president is under growing political pressure because of the growing violence and failures in fighting corruption.

August 6, 2012: In the south (Kogi State) gunmen attacked a church and killed 19 people.

August 7, 2012: In the south (Kogi State) gunmen killed three people in a mosque. This was believed to be a revenge attack for a recent attack on a church in the north. Nearby, an army patrol was attacked and two soldiers killed, along with two of the attackers.

In southern Kogi state police have imposed a curfew in an attempt to halt Boko Haram violence.

August 9, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri police raided a Boko Haram safe house and seized several assault rifles, a machine-gun and much ammunition.

August 11, 2012: In the north (Kano) police found a Boko Haram bomb workshop and seized twelve bombs, bomb making material, ammunition and some weapons. The police received a tip from one of the many Moslems up north who oppose the Islamic radicals.

As expected, police in the north are being accused of brutality as they search for Boko Haram. The cops will try and beat information out of civilians on the spot and will often steal items while searching homes or vehicles. The police also have an attitude that they are above the law, which is usually true. Soldiers are not much better, but the police are the worst, especially after some of them have been killed.

In southern Kogi state police have arrested at least twenty people in connection with recent shootings at a church, a mosque and a police checkpoint. Those arrested include government employees and local politicians. Boko Haram has not claimed responsibility for these attacks. Boko Haram does not usually operate in this largely Christian area.

U.S. officials are urging Nigeria to reorganize its counter-terrorism effort and combine their intelligence collecting. Currently, several different intelligence agencies (for the army, the police and so on) operate independently and only occasionally pool information. The U.S. also urges the government to do more about corruption, especially in the north, where the pervasive corruption sustains support for Boko Haram. While Nigeria is inclined to accept the "intelligence fusion" idea (especially since the U.S. will provide equipment and advisors), cracking down on government corruption will cause morale problems in the civil service (especially the police and army). Nevertheless, a growing number of Nigerians are convinced that only a reduction in the corruption and criminal behavior in general will save the country from disintegration and chaos.

August 12, 2012: The Boko Haram violence (which has left over 1,600 dead in the last three years) has caused a national uproar over the general lack of law and order throughout the country and the continuing government corruption that is at the core of all that is wrong in the country. Over 40 percent of the Boko Haram related deaths have occurred this year and there is growing popular anger all over the nation.

August 12, 2012: In the north (Borno State) soldiers raided a Boko Haram base, killing at least twenty people. One soldier was killed.

August 14, 2012: In the northern city of Kaduna a Boko Haram bomb went off prematurely outside a mosque, killing two terrorists and a bystander. The bomb was apparently intended for a prominent Moslem cleric who preached against Boko Haram.

August 15, 2012: In the north police attributed 14 deaths (in several incidents) to Boko Haram activity.

August 19, 2012: In the northeast (Yobe State) Boko Haram gunmen attacked a Catholic church and a police station. The attackers were repulsed.

It was recently revealed that Shell Oil, the largest foreign firm operating oil fields in the Niger River delta, paid over $30 million a year to the Nigerian military, during 2007-9, for additional security on oil facilities. That was about a quarter of what the company was paying for security. Tribal rebels and oil stealing gangs had shut down much of the oil production in the Delta, forcing the government to send thousands of additional soldiers and police to the delta to protect their main source of income (oil sales revenue). The security forces are notoriously corrupt, so the additional payments from the oil company were meant to insure protection. After 2009 an amnesty deal broke up most of the gangs while the oil theft continued in a more organized form, controlled by politicians and senior government officials. Anti-corruption efforts were making it more difficult to steal oil money after the government received it, so politicians went into the oil theft business. This is now an open secret and there is pressure to shut down this form of corruption. But with all that oil income each year, it's difficult to keep corrupt politicians away.

August 22, 2012: The government admitted that it had begun secret peace negotiations with senior Boko Haram earlier this month. The talks are being held in Saudi Arabia and were arranged by Saudi political and religious officials. The government wants to stop the violence but knows that it cannot deliver the main Boko Haram demand: an end to corruption (especially among government officials). But the government can pay off senior Boko Haram leaders, make cosmetic changes, and declare victory, as long as the terror attacks stop. The government has the backing of the traditional Islamic leadership in the north, which sees Boko Haram as murderous rivals. The Boko Haram clerics represent a small percentage of the Moslem clergy in the north and Boko Haram considers any Moslem clergy that do not back them to be heretics and subject to assassination if they do not back Boko Haram. A growing number of clerics are being killed by Boko Haram death squads and that has alarmed Saudi Arabia, which has long had to deal with similar extremism (al Qaeda and many other similar groups). The Saudis know that these groups eventually burn out because their terror tactics ultimately anger the majority of Moslems.

August 23, 2012: In the Niger Delta bandits kidnapped 28 oil workers and held them for ransom. The captives were found and freed the next day by the navy.

August 27, 2012: The government announced that it has opened informal talks with Boko Haram. Some Boko Haram factions are opposed to any discussions with the government, other than to accept its surrender.

In the Gulf of Guinea a Russian operated tanker anchored off neighboring Togo, carrying 56,000 tons of diesel and petrol (gasoline) was hijacked by pirates. The crew was locked up and all portable valuables were stolen. Before the pirates left two days later, another ship came along side and pumped off 3,000 tons (about 21,000 barrels) of the cargo. This sort of attack was alarming and will apparently happen again. The gang knew how to operate the ship and disable the tracking (via satellite) device. There are always hundreds of ships, including many tankers, anchored or moving through the Gulf of Guinea (most of which is off Nigeria) and now all these ships are at risk. The ship was eventually found off the Nigerian coast and the pirates are believed to be Nigerian.

August 28, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, a Boko Haram man was killed when the bomb he was transporting in a wheelbarrow apparently exploded as soldiers fired on him. Only the terrorist was killed, although some claim a nearby civilian was also killed.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, police raided the home of a Boko Haram leader and seized three AK-47 assault rifles, 306 rounds of ammo for the rifles, and 39 small bombs. Also taken was a laptop computer (which contained bomb making instructions and names of Boko Haram members) and 54 SIM cards for cell phones. Police attributed the success of the raid to tips from civilians.

September 3, 2012: In Damaturu, the capital of Yobe State in the north, panic has broken out because of numerous Boko Haram attacks in the last ten days. More than twenty people have been killed. The local leaders are largely inactive, mainly because the state governor and his key aids are off on a pilgrimage to Saudi Arabia. Those state officials left in charge are reluctant to make decisions about what to do to deal with this outbreak of terrorist violence. Thousands of people are fleeing their homes in neighborhoods where Boko Haram has been attempting to gain control. The federal forces (soldiers and police) say they are in control but without some help from state forces, that assertion is not convincing.

The SSS (State Security Service, in charge of internal intelligence collecting) suffered a major embarrassment when, in early August, someone began posting personal details about 60 current and former agents. The data was accompanied by threats from Boko Haram against SSS personnel. It took several days for someone in the SSS to notice and order the records removed from Nigerian websites. But it was too late and the data was out there for good.

For Boko Haram it's also about domination. While Boko Haram wants control of the oil, they also insist on changing the secular constitution and imposing Islamic law (Sharia) on all Nigerians. The ultimate goal is to force all Nigerians to convert to Islam, flee the country, or die. The problem is that the Christian southerners would rather die fighting such a conversion effort. That's one problem with the Boko Haram plan; the other is that the oil is in the Christian south and the Christians definitely control that resource.

September 4, 2012: A major reason for the support Islamic terror group Boko Haram receives in the north is the widespread belief that the Moslem north is not getting its fair share of the oil income. This has always been a contentious issue that has long been kept under control with an informal agreement. For decades there has been an understanding that Moslems and Christians would alternate as president. That way the Christian south and Moslem north would alternatively have access to most of the oil money. That's because the president and his ministers are best able to steal most of that oil income and share it with their families and tribes. Many Moslems are angry that Goodluck Johnson, who, as vice president, took over when the previous Moslem president died in office, should not be president for a full term. Johnson won a fair election for a full term, with many Moslems voting for him. But control of the presidency is worth a lot of money and power, and many Moslems are angry that they have not got the presidency back after Johnson's abbreviated rule as a Christian president. It's all about oil money and long has been.

September 4, 2012: Pirates attacked a small (30,000 ton) tanker off the coast and seized it. But the crew had a secure safe room prepared and all 23 crew members locked themselves into the safe room and got in touch with the Nigerian Navy. The pirates fled before a warship showed up after midnight. Normally the pirates seek to take the crew by surprise at night, cut all communications, and turn off the satellite transponder (which shows the owner where the ship is at all times). The pirates then lock up the crew, steer the ship towards a waiting tanker, steal as much of the cargo as they can, and then depart with all the portable valuables. The stolen oil is sold, at a big discount, to oil brokers who specialize in stolen oil. The ship is usually soon found and the crew released. Attacks like this have happened three times in the last two weeks, all in the same area (the Gulf of Guinea).

Over the last two days Boko Haram gunmen have destroyed 24 cell phone towers and other facilities, killing 16 people as they did so. Boko Haram also threatened to kill members of local and foreign media who publish unfavorable items about Boko Haram. The Islamic terror group accuses the cell phone companies of cooperating with the government in tracking down Boko Haram members. The government has since assigned security personnel to guard all cell phone company facilities, but this will not stop attacks because there are not enough guards to go around and Boko Haram can still mass larger numbers of attackers. These attacks have made Boko Haram even more unpopular because Nigerians are quite fond of their cell phones and have come to depend on them. The cell phone system attacks may have had something to do with the sudden increase in citizen tips the police have received about where Boko Haram hideouts are.

September 7, 2012: Near the northeastern city of Maiduguri troops clashed with Boko Haram gunmen, killing three and capturing 13.

September 10, 2012: In the north (Borno State) police raided what turned out to be a Boko Haram headquarters and arrested five terrorist commanders and seven other Boko Haram members. Also seized were 36 bombs, bomb making materials, weapons, and ammo plus computers, radios, and documents.

September 11, 2012: Near the northeastern city of Maiduguri police raided a Boko Haram base and arrested eleven suspected terrorists and seized 19 bombs, seven assault rifles, and over 1,500 rounds of rifle ammo.

Five of nine Nigerian airlines have collapsed this year, in part because of corrupt practices and in part because many Nigerians are afraid to fly Nigerian owned airliners because there have been so many crashes (the result of hiring the wrong people and managers stealing money meant for maintenance).

September 13, 2012: Oil has been discovered in the northeast, near the Chad border (where oil has already been discovered and wells are producing). The problem will be enticing foreign oil companies to drill and develop oil production. The north is suffering from an outbreak of Islamic terrorism and the local officials are, in the best of times, very corrupt and uncooperative. Then there are the many problems oil companies have had in the south (Niger Delta) where the corruption and chaos have been so bad that some foreign oil companies have given up and left.

September 13, 2012: In the south (Ondo State) police raided several locations and arrested 16 people for piracy and oil theft.

September 14, 2012: A former oil minister was arrested and charged with financing oil stealing gangs and sharing in the profits.

September 16, 2012: In the north (Kano and Bauchi states) Boko Haram gunmen killed ten people who were drinking or playing games. Boko Haram forbids both activities and uses murders like this to encourage not doing this sort of thing, at least in public. Boko Haram continues to send death squads after members of the police, especially commanders it is trying to intimidate into inaction or collaboration.

September 17, 2012: In the north (Kano State) police killed the chief Boko Haram spokesman and arrested two of his companions. In a separate raid in Kano police seized 36 bombs, five rifles, ten walkie-talkies, and a lot of other material. In the northeastern city of Maiduguri troops clashed with Boko Haram, leaving at least ten dead.

September 18, 2012: In the north (Borno State) Boko Haram killed the state attorney general.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, troops killed two Boko Haram leaders. In a separate raid eight Boko Haram men were arrested.

September 19, 2012: Police arrested the chief Boko Haram financial man (called "the accountant"). He was carrying $28,000 in cash with him. The man was travelling on a bus, on a trip that had him going to several cities to leave cash with various Boko Haram groups. The money guy was identified when one of his subordinates made some cash transfers in Kano that raised suspicions among bank officials. This was reported to police, who hunted down the suspect and got him to identify his boss and where he was travelling to.

September 20, 2012: The U.S. has designated the three top leaders of Boko Haram as international terrorists. But the Americans are not assigning the designation (which makes those designated subject to U.S. counter-terrorism efforts) to the entire organization because only international terrorists are of interest. The United States considers Boko Haram, for the most part, a domestic problem. The three top leaders, however, are believed to be involved with international terrorism.

September 22, 2012: Thousands of Shia Moslems demonstrated in the northern city of Kano to protest an American movie critical of Islam. There are about seven million Shia in Nigeria. Many Nigerian Shia belong to groups supported by Iran. While relations with Sunni Moslems are generally good, Sunni radical groups like Boko Haram contain many members who accept the anti-Shia attitude so common in Sunni terror groups like al Qaeda and the Taliban.

September 23, 2012: In the north (Bauchi) a car bomb went off outside a Catholic cathedral during mass, killing at least three people and wounding dozens of people outside the church. Security around Christian churches in the north is intense because of the Boko Haram threat, making it difficult for the terrorists to make effective attacks.

China is offering a $1.1 billion loan, at low rates, to be used for building infrastructure (commuter rail, an airport terminal). Many Nigerians are uncomfortable with this because of the Chinese willingness to deal with corrupt officials in Africa and make deals that help China at the expense of Africans.

The security forces are most intent on reducing the Boko Haram terror attacks. So far this year Boko Haram attacks have killed nearly 700 people. Intelligence efforts have revealed the names of many of the leaders and tips from Moslem civilians has made it possible to track down a growing number of key Boko Haram people. Boko Haram is still active but becoming less effective as these losses at the top disrupt operations.

September 24, 2012: The army is waging a war against oil thieves and pirates in the south (Edo, Delta, and Ondo States). Over the last two months troops have shut down primitive refineries, seized over a hundred speedboats, a dozen small tankers, nearly 400,000 drums of diesel oil, and a lot of other gear. Despite this, stealing oil is still a big business down south. Troops and police have found that most of the piracy off the coast was carried out by members of oil stealing gangs.

September 25, 2012: In the last week army raids in northeastern Adamawa State a senior Boko Haram leader was killed and 156 suspected terrorists arrested. Large quantities of weapons and bomb making equipment were seized. In nearby Damaturu gun battles with Boko Haram left 35 of the terrorists dead.

In Niger police arrested five Boko Haram suspects near the Nigerian border.

September 29, 2012: An immigration official was arrested and charged with working for Boko Haram. He confessed and named other officials who were also rounded up.

September 30, 2012: In the north (Zaria) Boko Haram apparently attacked a religious school run by a cleric critical of Boko Haram. Security forces intercepted the attackers and killed two of them but not before some bombs were set off, wounding three civilians.

Boko Haram announced that there would be no peace talks. Apparently some factions of Boko Haram want such talks, but the most senior Boko Haram leaders appear to have agreed that there will be no talks.

October 1, 2012: In the northeastern town of Mubi (Adamawa State) a group of gunmen attacked a student residence of a local college and killed 22 students and three others. This took place over several hours and that was possible because the local cell phone system was down, partly because of recent Boko Haram attacks on cell phone towers. These killings were apparently not carried out by Boko Haram but by a student faction upset at losing a recent student government elections. Student politics in Nigeria often gets nasty like this, partly because student factions form along tribal lines and partly because a tradition of fatal student violence has developed over the decades.

October 1, 2012: Nigeria: South eastern presidency to bury the 1967 Biafra war hatchet' The grievances of Nigeria's 1967 civil war still linger in the country's south eastern provinces and they can only be atoned by the election of a president hailing from the region, a former governor has warned. The war between the government and the Biafra secessionists ended in 1970. Orji Uzor Kalu, a former governor of the south eastern state of Abia has vowed to lead the campaign for a Nigerian president from the Igbo ethnic group by in 2015. Kalu said the time had come for other regions to give the south eastern region a chance to lead the vast country. "The country is in trouble because the God's anointed people are not there yet, until they take over the mantle of leadership, Nigeria will not have a pride of place in the world," he said. "Forty eight years after the civil war it is an insult for somebody to tell you that Igbos cannot be president. "If all these tribes can be president, who among them is more qualified than an Igbo man; we are the salt of this nation, we are the best thing that happened to this nation." Analysts blame Nigeria's frequent power struggles hinging on ethnicity on its colonial past where the British rulers used divide and rule tactics. Nigeria, Africa's most populous country celebrates its 52nd independence anniversary on October 1, 2012. "Anything good comes from the east and we are the genuine easterners; unless we rule this country the country will never be okay," Kalu said. "Nigeria will continue to wobble on her journey to nationhood and socio-economic prosperity unless an Igbo is given an opportunity to lead the country." Kalu's rhetoric follows a history economic, ethnic, cultural and religious tensions pitting Nigeria's various ethnic groups. Only Nigeria's founding president Nnamdi Azikiwe hailed from the south east. Kalu believes current President Goodluck Jonathan must be succeeded by an Igbo when his term ends in 2015. The Africa Report, Konye Obaji Ori

October 4, 2012: In the east (Taraba State) a bomb went off in a beer garden, killing one and wounding 14 others. Boko Haram was suspected, even though this is a mixed Christian/Moslem area.

Shell Oil Company declared force majeure (acts beyond their control) because recent oil thefts had damaged a key pipeline so badly that Shell will not be able to deliver the amounts of liquefied natural gas (LNG) it had agreed to ship. The force majeure clause gets Shell off the hook (for fines and such) if criminal activity interfered with moving the LNG. Two months ago Shell did the same thing for oil deliveries, and for the same reasons.

October 5, 2012: In the Niger River Delta civilians seized four students and burned them to death. A video of the incident ended up on the Internet. Police arrested 13 people in response to the video. Such killings are usually vigilante justice for criminals the police won't go after.

In the east (Taraba State) a bomb went off next to a TV station wounding eight people. Boko Haram was suspected, even though this is a mixed Christian/Moslem area.

October 6, 2012: Near the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram attacked a market place and killed at least three people, including a Chinese man.

October 7, 2012: In the northeast (Yobe State) an army raid killed a senior Boko Haram commander (in charge of combat operations). Another ten Boko Haram members were arrested and many weapons and other equipment was seized.

October 8, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram set off a bomb next to an army patrol and killed seven troops. The surviving soldiers went on a rampage and killed at least 30 people (most or all of them civilians) and set fire to over a hundred buildings and some 40 vehicles.

October 9, 2012: The army has been more successful finding Boko Haram bases in the north but has continued to allow undisciplined and poorly led troops to attack civilians. This sort of violence is all too common when the troops suffer losses and cannot find the enemy. It's been a problem for a long time and the army has been unable to get all of its officers and NCOs onboard with the need to stop this sort of violence from happening in the first place.

October 9, 2012: In the northern city of Kano, gunmen killed two policemen who were guarding medical personnel giving polio vaccinations. Many radical Moslems see these vaccinations as a Western plot to poison Moslems.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram made three attacks and killed an Islamic leader who opposed them. Three others were Christians killed while leaving a church.

October 14, 2012: In the north (Kaduna State) a village was attacked by a gang of armed men, who killed 23 people. The attack was apparently carried out to free four men who had been seized by local vigilantes. Survivors of the attack insist that the leader of the gang was a local policeman, who has since disappeared. Police often work with or even organize and lead criminal gangs. In this case the police were apparently upset with success of the local vigilantes against police-backed criminal gangs.

October 15, 2012 Nigeria - Cameroon: Bakassi self-determination mirrors Biafra war' After the Nigerian government's failure to appeal an October 9, 2002 ruling of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) that ceded the disputed oil-rich Bakassi Peninsular to neighboring Cameroon, the people of Bakassi who do not wish to be under that country's government could seek self-determination. The people of Bakassi who have often protested the alleged ill-treatment they receive from Cameroonian security forces, and feeling of rejection by Nigeria, after The Green Tree Agreement ceded the area to Cameroon, have threatened to form a country of their own. "What is happening in Bakassi may turn out to be four times that of Biafra. Our interaction with the people of the peninsula has revealed that they are talking of self- determination," Senator Ewa Henshaw, a lawmaker under the auspices of the Bakassi Support Group told reporters on Sunday. "Though the people in the Bakassi Peninsula have been jettisoned by the Nigerian government, they have a right to seek self-determination as provided for in the Green Tree Agreement," Henshaw added. Nkoyo Toyo, another lawmaker under the auspices of the Bakassi Support Group asserted that the Nigerian government failed to consider the security implications of ceding the peninsula to Cameroon. Toyo, who is a former ambassador, said although the option to file for a review had been lost, the Bakassi people still had an option of self-determination under international law. "The Green Tree Agreement still has a year to run and we have time to file. There are two Bakassis: One is in Nigeria and there is a Bakassi Peninsula, which is now in Cameroun through the ceding of the Bakassi. We have asked the Bakassi people and they are interested in self-determination under international law," Toyo said. The Nigerian senate also expressed disappointment with the Nigerian Federal Government for its indifference toward Bakassi Peninsular. The Deputy Chairman of the Action Congress of Nigeria (ACN) in Cross River State called on the resignation of the Nigerian President Goodluck Jonathan. Bakassi people have often expressed their desire to be part of Nigeria, and the Nigerian Senate on September 26, 2012 urged President Goodluck Jonathan to appeal the ICJ judgment based on the unearthing of fresh facts on the matter that some legal experts believed could have overturned the ICJ's 2002 ruling. However, the FG upheld former President Olusegun Obasanjo administration's agreement on the issue which was made without ratification by the Senate as required by law. According to reporter on the ground, the people of Bakassi and Efik kingdom have resolved to team up with Southern Cameroun to form an independent nation because the FG had disappointed them. Efik protesters declared that the battle to reclaim their ancestral home had only begun, saying: "We will stop at nothing in getting our freedom since Nigeria does not want us." A conference under the group Pro-National Conference Organization (PRONACO) has been assembled under intense pressure to undertake a strategic intervention on the side of the people of Bakassi. The Africa Report

October 15, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram set off about a dozen bombs, destroying schools and cell phone facilities. Troops rushed to the scene and encountered gunfire from Boko Haram. The shooting continued through the night.

October 16, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, troops killed 24 Boko Haram men while repelling several attacks by the terrorists.

Tribal violence continues in central Nigeria (Plateau State). Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian farmers outside the city of Jos for years. The violence has gotten worse now and there have been nearly a thousand casualties so far this year. Boko Haram has now claimed involvement. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). So far this month there have been over a hundred casualties and police cannot seem to completely stamp out the violence.

Government efforts to eliminate Boko Haram are not having much success. The police and soldiers often do more harm than good, usually in the form of abusing or killing innocent civilians. This is largely the result of incompetent recruiting and training, as well as a culture of corruption in the leadership (especially in the police). The government has long talked about dealing with these problems but little has been accomplished.

October 17, 2012: So far this year Boko Haram has made nearly 300 attacks and killed over 800 people. That’s more than half the 1,500 people the Islamic terror group has killed in three years of escalating violence. Nearly as many people have been killed by police operations against Boko Haram. These killings have made the police unpopular (they were never very popular to begin with) and helped Boko Haram to recruit.

October 18, 2012: In the northeast (Yobe State) an army raid hit a new Boko Haram hideout as the group was preparing to launch new attacks.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, troops battled Boko Haram attackers, leaving at least six dead (including a Chinese man shot down by Boko Haram).

October 19, 2012: In the north (Borno State) a Boko Haram leader (Shuaibu Mohammed Bama) was arrested in the home of a politician (senator Ahmed Zanna) who had been suspected of supporting Boko Haram. Politicians have long been known to make deals with criminal organizations, and Boko Haram is no exception.

October 21, 2012: In the northeast (Potiskum in Yobe State) the expected Boko Haram attacks took place, leaving over 30 dead and several government buildings burned down over the last two days. Thousands of people have begun leaving the city of Potiskum, which is 230 kilometers west of the Boko Haram stronghold of Maiduguri.

Nigeria and Niger have agreed to conduct joint patrols and coordinate operations along their 1,400 kilometer border, the better to limit Boko Haram movements.

In the north police have uncovered a criminal gang that was pretending to be Boko Haram and killing southerners who refused to pay a large amount of cash to get off the hit list. Most paid but enough did not to leave a suspicious pattern of murdered people.

Investigations into how Boko Haram gets its weapons revealed that many of them come in via southern ports, taking advantage of corrupt customs officials. Smuggling is a big business and the bribed port officials usually don't check to see that they are letting in illegally.

In the north there is more and more popular hostility to Boko Haram. The Islamic radicals, despite pledges to clean up corruption and a lot of other problems, are being seen as a cure worse than the disease. As a result police are getting more tips about where Boko Haram members and equipment are hidden.

In the last year the government tried, for the first time, to accurately count the losses in the oil industry. The conclusion was that the theft, from pipelines and government bank accounts, amounted to over $10 billion a year in the last decade. The annual GDP of Nigeria is $238 billion, for a population of 165 million ($1,440 per capita). Oil accounts for about 14 percent of GDP and unemployment is currently about 25 percent. The report revealed, in detail and for all to see, what a lot of Nigerians had known for a long time. The theft is so pervasive (40 percent of refined petroleum products are stolen) that the activity is hard to miss. Eliminating the stealing will be difficult, because most politicians and political parties are financed by stolen oil money. The well-funded thieves are organized and determined to hang on to their wealth. Judges and police can be bought and many oil thieves have already been prosecuted and escaped. But there is progress. The oil thieves are under attack, some do lose, but the war will go on for years and there will be a lot of defeats.

October 26, 2012: Oil, or any natural resources bonanza, has proved to be a curse to less-developed nations. Nigeria is one of the worst examples. The temptation to steal that money is irresistible to many and the result is pockets of luxury surrounded by a sea of poverty. About half the population doesn't even have electricity. Roads, schools, hospitals and all sorts of infrastructure are in short supply. Even the oil industry infrastructure is plundered, which is why Nigeria only produces about half as much oil (two million barrels a day) that it is capable of. Even that is enough to account for 95 percent of exports and 40 percent of the federal budget.

October 28, 2012: In the northern city of Kaduna, a Boko Haram suicide car bomber attacked a church during services and killed ten worshipers and wounded over 140 people. These attacks usually lead to young Christians going out and killing some random Moslems.

October 29, 2012: In the southern city of Enugu, police arrested 500 people belonging to a separatist group trying to declare a separate state of Biafra in the south. This was tried in the 1960s and led several years of bloody civil war.

October 31, 2012: In Northern Zamfara State gangsters raided a village and killed twenty people. Earlier this month police arrested seven men in an attempt to stop a cycle of revenge attacks that has left over 150 dead in the last two months. Arrests have slowed down but not stopped the violence. The attacks began last August and have turned into a deadly feud. This kind of communal violence is common in Nigeria and the cause of thousands of deaths a year.

In the Niger River Delta a police raid on the base of a kidnapping gang led to a gun battle that left 14 dead. Kidnapping has become a big business in the region, with most of the victims taken by a few large and well-organized gangs.

November 2, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri troops raided several neighborhoods looking for Boko Haram and shot dead at least 30 young men. Witnesses said many of those killed were not members of Boko Haram but were simply the same age as many Islamic terrorists. Elsewhere in the city gunmen killed a retired general who was prominent in the 1960s civil war. Boko Haram later denied responsibility for this attack.

November 4, 2012: In the northeast (Yobe State) Boko Haram used explosives to attack a police station, a school, and two cellphone towers. At least two policemen were killed. Shooting went on for about an hour, until army reinforcements arrived. Boko Haram will usually chase all civilians away before using explosives to destroy structures.

November 6, 2012: A ceasefire and peace talks with Boko Haram are still stalled over the Islamic radical demands for releasing jailed members and other forms of compensation first. Meanwhile, the civilians in the north are caught between the terrorist tactics used by both Boko Haram and the army. Boko Haram will kill anyone seen talking to the soldiers and the soldiers will beat or kill people who refuse to provide information about the Islamic terrorists. Young men are at risk of being killed on the spot if suspected of being a Boko Haram member. Civilians suffer the most from the bombings, and that is apparently why Boko Haram is turning more to death squads that shoot their victims, at least in the Moslem north. Bombs are still favored against targets in the Christian south or churches in the north. The death toll from three years of fighting Boko Haram has now reached 3,000. Most of the victims have been Moslems, either those targeted by Boko Haram (for opposing them) or innocent bystanders to violence by the security forces or the Islamic terrorists. In addition to the seemingly random killings the military curfew (often for 15 hours a day) is crippling the economy in the north.

November 6, 2012: Nigeria: Emotions and the story of Biafra' The emotions of the Igbo peoples of Nigeria when aroused could revitalise memories of Biafra, as those who have found it difficult to bury the hatchet of the 1967 secession war against the Nigerian state continue to cry Biafra.

The birth and death dates of former Biafran leader Chukwuemeka Ojukwu, the memoir of renowned Nigerian author Chinua Achebe, the novel by Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie, and former governor of Abia State Chief Orji Uzor Kalu's presidential demands serve as sensitive tools to the resolute Biafraists.

On 4 November, hundreds of people marched in the streets of the eastern Nigerian city of Enugu, supporting independence for Biafra on the birthday of Ojukwu, who died in November last year and was buried in March 2012. Since the Sunday march, over 100 people have been arrested and charged with treason.

This march follows the release of the long-awaited memoir, There Was a Country, by Chinua Achebe. The memoir which was published in the United Kingdom and released in Nigeria and in the United States last month, some would argue, tampers the emotions of the resolute Biafriaist, as it details the atrocities of the Biafran war.

According to reports the memoir is filled with sadness - sadness at the deaths of so many of Achebe's fellow countrymen and sadness too at the fate that has befallen Nigeria. The book begins by recalling the coup and counter-coup that left Prime Minister Abubakar Tafawa Balewa and the Northern premier Ahmadu Bello dead.

Thousands of Igbo people were killed in retaliation. At the end of May 1967, Biafra declared independence and there was a rapid descent into war.

The Igbo-emotion is appealed to as Achebe portrays the Nigerian government as ruthless in its suppression of the rebellion.

Allen Lane, the publisher of the memoir said of the work: "There Was a Country is a distillation of vivid observation and considered research and reflection."

As the Igbos react to Achebe's memoir, the novel- Half of a Yellow Sun by the author Chimamanda Adichie is being made into a movie. Adichie's film would also capture the upsetting period of Nigeria's history for a wider audience.

More than one million people died during the Biafra-Nigerian conflict in fighting and from famine. Photographs of starving children from Biafra became common in the international media. Adichie's film is expected to elicit emotions, like Achebe's memoir, and Ojukwu's birthday or death day commemoration.

How resolute Biafraists react to these artifacts would predict the future of a country already troubled by an Islamist insurgency in the north.

In 2007, some young men calling themselves the separatist Movement for the Actualisation of the Sovereign State of Biafra (Massob) sought to revive Biafra's crushed 1967 secession bid, citing marginalisation by the Nigerian government.

November 9, 2012: In the north (Yobe state) Boko Haram attacked a police station and killed three policemen.

November 10, 2012: In the north (Yobe state) Boko Haram invaded the homes of Christians and killed five of them. The victims were Igbos from southeastern Nigeria, so the attack will stir up anger in the south, which is mostly Christian.

November 13, 2012: The IEA (International Energy Agency) released a report pointing out that oil theft, and the damage it causes to pipelines, has been the principal reason that Nigerian oil production is declining (from 2.5 million barrels a day to 1.95 million over the last two years). The large scale stealing is now causing annual losses of $7 billion. The IEA is a member organization supported by 28 Western countries that depend on oil imports. The oil thefts have been the main reason for oil pollution, which tends to get blamed on the oil companies (who are foreigners) not the thieves (who are Nigerians). In response to the growing problems with oil thieves and complaints from locals (about the oil spills and other damage caused by the thieves) the foreign oil companies are shutting down land-based wells and putting more effort into developing off-shore wells. Those are easier to guard and much more difficult to steal from.

November 14, 2012: The Boko Haram terror attacks (bombings and assassinations) have made it possible for the Islamic radicals to change behavior via threats. In a growing number of towns and cities Boko Haram is forcing schools (except approved Islamic ones) and businesses (especially those dealing in alcohol, videos and music) to shut down.

Boko Haram continues to offer peace talks, but only if the security forces cease operations against Boko Haram and all imprisoned Boko Haram members are released. Public opinion is overwhelmingly against this, and, so far, so is the government. Even in the north Boko Haram has managed to make itself unpopular, even though many people agree with the Islamic radical groups call for less corruption and crime. Like the Taliban (which they openly model themselves on) Boko Haram appears as killers and gangsters to the people they claim to serve. Boko Haram finances itself by demanding contributions from locals, especially those who own businesses, and try to enforce lifestyle rules (no cards, music, video, booze and so on) and forcible conversion of non-Moslems. The security forces have struck back, killing or capturing many Boko Haram leaders and bases (along with weapons and bomb making equipment). Lots of innocent civilians have been killed or arrested in these operations, which is typical of how the security forces operate. Despite that, Boko Haram still has lots of fans, and potential recruits, among young Moslems (and some Moslem politicians, who see opportunities where others see only senseless violence.)

November 16, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, troops raided a Boko Haram hideout and killed wanted (for killing a retired army general three weeks ago) terrorist leader Ibn Saleh Ibrahim.

The government denied rumors that it was engaged in secret negotiations with Boko Haram. The government insisted there were no negotiations and would not be any.

November 18, 2012: In the east (Taraba State) fighting broke out between Moslems and Christians, leaving at least ten dead and dozens wounded. The fighting began when Christians set up roadblocks to keep Moslems away from churches during Sunday services. This was meant to keep potential terrorists away but sparked violence between Christians and Moslems. The army had to impose a curfew to stop the violence.

November 20, 2012: French oil company Total is selling 20 percent of its Nigerian operations to a Chinese firm for $2.5 billion. The Chinese are willing to move in because they ignore media or diplomatic criticism of whatever harsh (to Westerners) methods they use to run their business operations in Africa. The brutality of the Chinese sometimes angers the Africans but the Chinese shrug it off and keep their business operations going.

November 22, 2012: In the north (near Kano) a Moslem mob killed four Christians, after rumors circulated that Christians had insulted Islam.

Despite the publicity oil theft is receiving (because of new investigations), most Nigerians doubt the revelations will halt the theft, which is a huge business and costing the government over $7 billion a year. Nigerians know that to be a successful thief in Nigeria you must know who to bribe, and the bigger the theft the more bribes you have to pay to more senior people. Nigerians are waiting for prosecutors to go after the senior officials taking bribes to allow the oil thefts to continue. That is not happening, and all the government is doing is ordering the military to arrest the men drilling into the oil pipelines and chase down some of those who illegally gather the oil into coastal tankers to be taken to neighboring countries and sold to brokers that can get the stolen oil into the legitimate market. No one further up the food chain is being bothered.

November 23, 2012: In the north even some soldiers are complaining of the summary execution of Moslem men during operations against Boko Haram. Some cell phone videos of these murders are showing up and the army is denying the accusations. Many of the civilians fleeing areas where the army is most active are young men who fear being killed for just being nearby when the army comes looking for Boko Haram. This sort of behavior has long been common with the army, which has never been able to change this sort of behavior by its junior officers and NCOs.

November 24, 2012: The government is offering $1.8 million in rewards for the capture of the top 19 Boko Haram leaders. The largest individual reward (over $300,000) is for Boko Haram supreme leader Abubakar Shekau.

November 25, 2012: In central Plateau state Moslems attacked a convoy of vehicles and killed ten Christians. This was not Boko Haram, but local Moslem tribesmen feuding with their Christian rivals. This has been going on in Plateau state for generations. In northern Kaduna state Boko Haram got a car bomb onto a military base and detonated it near a Christian church during services, killing ten soldiers and wounding 30. This was an embarrassing failure of security for the military.

November 25, 2012: Nigeria blasts: Eleven dead at Kaduna barracks church'

Suicide bombers have attacked a church inside a military barracks in Kaduna state in northern Nigeria, killing 11 people and injuring 30, officials say. A military spokesman told the BBC two vehicles were driven into the barracks in Jaji in what he described as "surprising and an embarrassment". It is not clear who was responsible for the attack. But the army suspects Islamist militant group Boko Haram, which has recently targeted churches in the state. The group is fighting to overthrow the government and impose an extreme form of Sharia, or Islamic law. The BBC's Will Ross in Lagos says that while Christians and churches are frequently targeted, this incident looks more like a direct attack on the military. On Friday, Nigeria's military offered a reward of 50m naira ($317,000; £197,709) for help in tracking down suspected Boko Haram leader Abubakar Shekau, and 10m each for other suspected leaders of the group.'Curious worshippers' The military said a bus entered the barracks and was driven into the wall of the church where it exploded. Ten minutes later, a car blew up outside the church. "The first blast caused no casualties and curious worshippers gathered around the scene looking at the debris... and that was when the second blast happened," the military spokesman said. Eyewitnesses reported seeing bodies at the scene, and people being carried away on stretchers. At least 50 people were killed in bombings in Kaduna in June and the reprisals that followed. And almost a month ago seven people died in a suicide bombing at a Roman Catholic church in the state. Kaduna is on the dividing line between Nigeria's mainly Christian south and the north, which has a large Muslim majority.

November 26, 2012: Boko Haram leaders have officially asked for peace talks. The government earlier said wasn’t interested just yet. The government believes they can eventually crush the Islamic terror group and don’t believe the religious fanatics would, or could negotiate in good faith.

November 28, 2012: In the north (Borno State) Boko Haram men on motorcycles attacked the government compound of Rann town with gunfire and bombs. Five policemen were killed and the Boko Haram men left after destroying some cell phone towers and stealing three rifles. In the northeastern city of Maiduguri troops clashed with Boko Haram leaving one soldier and three terrorists dead (31 others were arrested)

November 29, 2012: In a 39 minute video released on the Internet, the head of Boko Haram praises global Islamic conquest and names United States, Britain, Israel and Nigeria as the main enemies of Islam and Boko Haram.

November 30, 2012: In northern Bauchi state Boko Haram gunmen killed a local Islamic leader who was opposed to Boko Haram. Religious leaders like this are considered particularly dangerous by Boko Haram because they point out that Moslem politicians and businessmen are as corrupt as their Christian counterparts and it has nothing to do with foreign influences (if only because Christian foreigners tend to be more honest than Nigerians).

December 1, 2012: In Borno state Boko Haram gunmen invaded the village of Chibok and killed ten Christians.

December 2, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri troops cornered and killed wanted Boko Haram leader Abdulkareem Ibrahim along with two of his associates. Weapons and documents were recovered. Near the Borno border with Cameroon, Boko Haram gunmen attacked a police station, killing five policemen.

December 4, 2012: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri the Boko Haram war against Christians has caused over 30 churches to close and over 20,000 Christians to flee the city. At least half the Christians in surrounding Borno state have fled. Some 170 Boko Haram attacks in the last three years have killed nearly a thousand people. Most of the violence occurs in the northern states of Borno and Yobe, especially Maiduguri city (in Borno). There are only a few gangs of armed Boko Haram men operating in the north, but they are mobile and adept at avoiding checkpoints or patrols. These terrorist cells set off bombs and attack with firearms (and sometimes knives and machetes). They have terrorized Borno and Yobe states. While police have arrested or killed hundreds of Boko Haram members this year, the key leaders are still out there recruiting and training new men. The hated corruption (in business and government) is still out there and the Boko Haram explanation (it's all the fault of the West and Christianity) resonates with many northern Moslems.

In the south, oil thefts have increased over last year, despite more efforts by the navy to find and seize the small tankers that collect the crude oil from the thieves and take it to neighboring countries to be sold to brokers who will arrange for the stolen oil to enter legitimate commerce. Nigeria has the dubious distinction of being the only oil-producing nation suffering from large scale theft of crude oil. Not only is this costing the government $7 billion a year in lost revenue, but much of the oil from the plundered pipelines (the thieves just punch a hole to steal the crude) flows into the Niger River delta waterways, polluting the delta and the fishing waters off the coast. The government had hired former local rebels to provide pipeline security, but these lads appear to have gone into business with the oil thieves or joined the theft themselves. Naval officers are suspected of taking bribes from tanker owners, who can afford to pay large sums to avoid seizure.

December 6, 2012: In the northern city of Kano police arrested eight Boko Haram men who sought to attack a police patrol with a bomb. But the thrown bomb did not go off and the police went after the attackers.

December 9, 2012: In the northern city of Kano, several days of raids have led to the arrest of 28 Boko Haram members and the seizure of many weapons and other terrorist material.

In the south (Delta State) the 82 year old mother of the Finance Minister was kidnapped. The victim, who is an MD and college professor, was taken from her home by at least ten armed men. Two days later, in the west (Yobe State), the wife of a retired army general was also taken. These two cases got a lot of publicity but many other kidnappings did not. Taking people for ransom has become a big business in the south and the police are often involved. In the case of the Finance Ministers mother, two policemen were soon arrested and accused of being involved in the kidnapping. This did not lead to the release of the victim and the kidnappers are demanding $1.27 million in ransom (20 percent of their original demand).

December 10, 2012: In the northeast (Yobe state) Boko Haram attacked a police headquarters and were repulsed. A dozen (or more) Islamic terrorists and one policeman died. Yobe state has become one of the main battlegrounds in the campaign against Boko Haram.

The government has asked for American help in dealing with Boko Haram, and the commander of AFRICOM has made it clear that Boko Haram is not going to be defeated by military action alone. If the U.S. provides major assistance to Nigeria it will be via AFRICOM. "Africa Command" (AFRICOM) is similar in organization to other commands (Central, or CENTCOM, for the Middle East, and South, or SOUTHCOM, for Latin America, etc). AFRICOM coordinates all American military operations in Africa. Before 2007, those operations were coordinated between two commands (the one covering Europe and the one covering Latin America). The establishment of AFRICOM meant more money for counter-terror operations in Africa and more long range projects. One thing most African nations wanted from AFRICOM was military and counter-terrorism trainers. The problem with this is that the people so trained are often then employed as enforcers for the local dictator. Even providing training for peacekeepers can backfire, for those peacekeeping skills can also be used to pacify your own people. This will be a problem in Nigeria as well, as long as there is so much corruption in the government and military. But at the same time the U.S. cannot ignore the growing cooperation between Boko Haram and al Qaeda type organizations (especially those in northern Mali, which has become a new sanctuary for al Qaeda). Boko Haram is becoming part of the terrorist threat to the U.S. and the West.

In the north local tribal and religious leaders, who still have some standing among the people, place the blame for Boko Haram on the northern politicians. This is especially true of the state governors, who use fraud and force to get elected and once in office steal as much as they can. Federal level anti-corruption efforts have concentrated on the governors and ex-governors (all of them much wealthier than they were before becoming governors). But these savvy and corrupt politicians have been difficult to prosecute, convict, and jail. The justice system favors those with a lot of cash and few scruples. And that's why you have Boko Haram up north, who exist, by their own admission, mainly to reduce corruption and crime.

Boko Haram is particularly brutal with the national police. In part, this is because the police tend to be quick to kill Boko Haram members along with friends and family of the Islamic radicals. This is illegal but the police are notoriously corrupt and inclined to break the law themselves.

While the government proclaims the massive oil thefts in the Niger Delta and the growing Islamic terrorism of Boko Haram in the north as under control, the reality is quite different. In both cases the federal government sees sending in the military as the solution. But it isn't. The Nigerian military is a blunt instrument. Although well trained and led, at least by African standards, the military relies too much on brute (and often excessive) force and can be bought off by oil thieves and Islamic radicals. In the Niger Delta the military, especially the navy, is being bribed to let the oil theft continue. The government does not want to discuss that problem openly. In the north Boko Haram has much less cash and is instead using terror tactics against the military leadership. Death squads seek out key military leaders and kill them. At the same time, all army commanders in the north are made aware of the fact that the Boko Haram assassins concentrate on the officers who are most energetic and effective against Islamic radicals.

December 13, 2012: Boko Haram members have killed nearly 800 people so far this year. The military and police have killed more in response, but about half the police victims were civilians, the rest were Boko Haram or criminals mistaken for Islamic radicals. As the military and police increase their operations in the north, so does Boko Haram. Northerners are growing tired of all this, even though Boko Haram tries (more so than the security forces) to avoid civilian casualties. This doesn't always work and Boko Haram bombs and gunfire kill a growing number of innocent civilians. Support for Boko Haram is declining, despite all the efforts of the security forces.

December 14, 2012: In the north (Kano) Boko Haram gunmen killed a member of the state legislature.

December 15, 2012: Senator Mohammed Ali Ndume (from Borno state in the north) is on trial for passing classified information to Boko Haram leaders. Ndume says he was only communicating with Boko Haram officials as part of his official duties to investigate the Islamic radical group. The government contends that Ndume was in a traitorous relationship.

December 17, 2012: Four more foreigners (South Korean) and two Nigerians with them were kidnapped in the southern Niger Delta oil region. This was apparently done to try and obtain a large ransom.

December 19, 2012: A French citizen (engineer Francis Colump) working on an energy project near the Niger border (Katsina state) was kidnapped by 30 armed men who attacked his compound, killing a guard and local civilian in the process. Later, Boko Haram splinter group Ansaru took responsibility for this and said it was all about France backing an invasion of northern Mali to shut down a sanctuary for Islamic terrorists there. Ansaru is expected to eventually ask for a ransom, as has been the case with eight other French citizens held captive by Islamic radical kidnappers in Africa.

December 23, 2012: Boko Haram increased its pressure on cell phone companies in the north (Kano) by carrying out two suicide car bomb attacks on the headquarters of two cell phone companies (Indian owned Airtel and South African owned MTN). These two attacks failed. The Islamic terror group accuses the cell phone companies of cooperating with the government in tracking down Boko Haram members. The government has since assigned security personnel to guard all cell phone company facilities, but this has not stopped attacks because there are not enough guards to go around and Boko Haram can still mass larger numbers of attackers. There are, however, enough guards to protect the headquarters of the cell phone companies and that's why today's attacks failed. These attacks have made Boko Haram even more unpopular because Nigerians are quite fond of their cell phones and have come to depend on them. The cell phone system attacks may have had something to do with the sudden increase in citizen tips the police have received about where Boko Haram hideouts are.

Boko Haram splinter group Ansaru (for Ansarul Muslimina Fi Biladis Sudan or "Vanguards for the Protection of Muslims in Black Africa") has become more active recently after first declaring its existence last January (and then largely disappearing from view). Ansaru objects to the many Moslems who are being killed by Boko Haram attacks and wants to concentrate on attacks that only kill foreigners or non-Moslem Nigerians. It is unclear how large Ansaru is and how much violence within Boko Haram, if any, will result from the split. It is believed that there is considerable strife between Boko Haram leaders, with many strong-willed men, each with an armed following, trying to control the entire movement. At the moment, Boko Haram is on a roll and most of these disagreements are put aside. But with the appearance of Ansaru, that appeared to be changing. Ansaru appears to be very small, perhaps only a hundred or so members, and more interested (than Boko Haram) in working closely with Islamic terror groups operating in the new terrorist sanctuary of northern Mali. This may encourage other extremist factions in Boko Haram to split off and create even more radical and violent groups like Ansaru.

Anti-corruption officials are putting the heat on Minister of Niger Delta Affairs Peter Godsday Orubebe. The main accusation is that he has become very wealthy in the four years since he entered government service. Orubebe is close to president Johnson and seemingly unconcerned with this investigation. How this all works out will say a lot about just how much success the anti-corruption effort is capable of.

Boko Haram has been successful with its terror campaign in the Moslem north, where most residents are now afraid to inform on the Islamic terrorists. This is the result of years of threats and occasional violence against civilians inclined to inform on the terrorists. Boko Haram is also trying to intimidate the army and police into inaction by attacking commanders. That is having less success because so many of the security personnel are Christians from the south.

December 24, 2012: Boko Haram has managed to grow stronger, despite more intense government efforts to destroy them. Using the Internet to communicate with the public, as well as using untraceable (so far) phone calls and email with media and officials inside Nigeria, the Islamic radicals group has made the government look inept and incompetent. The government is seeking help from the United States, which is apparently on the way. This will apparently be technical and intelligence assistance.

December 24, 2012: Boko Haram attacked two churches in the north, killing 12 people and burning down one of the churches.

December 27, 2012: In the northern city of Kaduna soldiers attacked and captured a Boko Haram bomb making workshop, killing five of the Islamic terrorists and seizing bomb making materials.

December 28, 2012: In northeastern Adamawa state (near the Cameroon border) Boko Haram attacked a police station, a prison and a government office building, leaving two dead and several buildings burned down. In the northeastern city of Maiduguri Boko Haram gunmen attacked several homes, killing five people. Soldiers quickly responded to these attacks, arresting three suspects and seizing an AK-47.

President Goodluck Jonathan announced that the Boko Haram men responsible for attacks around the capital (Abuja) had been arrested. Johnson also insisted that most members of Boko Haram had been killed or captured. He did not comment on how well, or not, Boko Haram recruiting efforts were going (to replace those lost.)

December 29, 2012: In northern Yobe state police clashed with Boko Haram killing four of them. A policeman also died in the gun battle.

President Goodluck Jonathan announced that the Boko Haram men responsible for attacks around the capital (Abuja) had been arrested. Johnson also insisted that most members of Boko Haram had been killed or captured. He did not comment on how well, or not, Boko Haram recruiting efforts were going (to replace those lost).

January 1, 2013: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri troops found and fought a group of Boko Haram believed responsible for some of the recent attacks on Christians. The gun battle left 13 Boko Haram and one soldier dead. The Boko Haram war against Christians in Maiduguri has caused over 30 churches to close and over 20,000 Christians to flee the city in the last few months.

While many Moslem leaders condemn Boko Haram, most keep quiet and some are responding to the growing Boko Haram violence against Christians by insisting that this is just retaliation for previous plots against Moslems. Few details are given and this sort of talk by Moslem leaders makes Nigerian Christians even more anxious for their safety. Moslem leaders also complain about the tendency of troops and police to shoot first and investigate later. Interrogations also tend to be brutal, and sometimes fatal. But this violence isn't just directed at Moslems, it has been standard practice by the security forces for decades. Few people deny that this brutality exists, but attempts to curb it have largely failed or had much less impact than required. Unleashing police and army against Boko Haram in the north is terrorizing Moslem civilians more than it's reassuring threatened Christians. But these security operations are killing or capturing a lot of young Moslem men with guns. The live ones often boast of their Boko Haram membership while many of the dead ones have incriminating documents on them.

A Boko Haram offensive against Christians that began on December 25th has so far left 21 dead, including 16 Christians attacked in church. The government revised earlier reports that 15 Christians in northern Borno state had been tied up on the 30th and had their throats slit. This happened in a remote village and when police were able to investigate they found that there was an attack but that only two people died from an attack that may not have been Boko Haram related.

January 2, 2013: A Boko Haram offensive against Christians that began on December 25th has so far left 21 dead, including 16 Christians attacked in a church. The government revised earlier reports that 15 Christians in northern Borno state had been tied up on the 30th and had their throats slit. This happened in a remote village and when police were able to investigate they found that there was an attack but that only two people died from an attack that may not have been Boko Haram related.

January 4, 2013: In the north (Zamfara State) seven people died in several incidents of religious violence. In nearby Kano State police found and disabled a car bomb. In the northeast 13 people died in the last two days from Boko Haram attacks.

January 9, 2013: Pirates in the Niger River Delta freed three Italian sailors they had kidnapped off a ship last month. A fourth captive, from Ukraine, was not mentioned. Italy would not comment on whether or not it paid ransom. Nigerian criminals know they can get ransoms of over a million dollars each for Western captives.

In the south (Ogun State) a pipeline exploded in flames while some fifty oil thieves were tapping it and preparing to haul away thousands of gallons of oil. Some 30 of the thieves died in the fire. All this occurred in a rural area of the Niger River Delta, where plundering oil pipelines is big business and often protected by corrupt local government officials and police.

January 12, 2013: The air force has sent a technical team to Mali to help the military there deal with Islamic terrorists who have taken control of northern Mali.

January 13, 2013: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri troops captured Boko Haram commander Mohammed Zangina. Maiduguri has been the center of Boko Haram activity for years and Zangina was known to have been behind several major terrorist operations that were planned and prepared in Maiduguri.

January 14, 2013: Despite government claims that it has crippled Islamic terror group Boko Haram, the violence in the north continues. Boko Haram has suffered some heavy losses but either the government is not certain of the exact size of the organization or they aren't letting the public know because the violence continues. There appear to be more surviving Boko Haram cells than government reports would indicate. The government is also concerned about Boko Haram relationships with the large number of Islamic terrorists in nearby Mali. The connection has to traverse neighboring Niger, which has been quite hostile to the Islamic terror groups in Mali. Nevertheless Niger has long and loosely guarded borders with Nigeria and northern Mali. The Nigerian government is still seeking to discover just how much Boko Haram is involved with the Mali based Islamic terrorists.

January 14, 2013: Two policemen were killed by Boko Haram at a checkpoint in the northern Nigerian city of Kano.

In northern Gombe State police arrested Salisu Mohammed, a Boko Haram leader that was responsible for several major terror attacks.

January 15, 2013: Four policemen were killed by Boko Haram at a checkpoint in the northern Nigerian city of Kano.

January 16, 2013: Off the coast police captured two small tankers carrying stolen oil. At least 23 people were arrested as well. In the last year over 2,000 people have been arrested in the Niger River Delta for oil theft. Police have also seized over 4,000 crude refineries (that convert the oil to kerosene or diesel fuel that can be sold locally) and hundreds of boats involved in oil theft.

In the northern Nigerian city of Kano, two Boko Haram men were killed and five others arrested at a checkpoint.

January 17, 2013: Nigeria has increased its troop deployment to Mali to 1,200 soldiers. About a hundred have already arrived or are on their way, and nearly a thousand are expected to be there within a week. Nigeria has also agreed to command the African peacekeeper force in Mali.

In the northern Nigerian city of Kano, Boko Haram gunmen attacked a convoy carrying the Emir of Kano (the senior Islamic cleric in the area). The gunfire killed four people but the emir was unharmed. Boko Haram does not tolerate criticism from Islamic clerics. These men are warned to change their tune or just shut up. The Emir of Kano continued to criticize Boko Haram and is now the target of attacks by terrorist death squads.

January 19, 2013: In central Nigeria (Kogi state) Islamic terrorists from Ansaru set off a bomb that killed two soldiers and wounded five others. The troops were preparing to leave for Mali and Ansaru said that was why the attack was carried out. Ansaru and Boko Haram both support the Islamic terrorists in northern Mali. Ansaru (for Ansarul Muslimina Fi Biladis Sudan or "Vanguards for the Protection of Muslims in Black Africa") is a Boko Haram splinter group that has become more active recently, after first declaring its existence last January (and then largely disappearing from view). Ansaru objects to the many Moslems who are being killed by Boko Haram attacks and wants to concentrate on attacks that only kill foreigners or non-Moslem Nigerians. It is unclear how large Ansaru is and how much violence within Boko Haram, if any, will result from the split. It is believed that there is considerable strife between Boko Haram leaders, with many strong-willed men, each with an armed following, trying to control the entire movement. At the moment most of these disagreements are put aside. Ansaru appears to be very small, perhaps only a hundred or so members, and more interested (than Boko Haram) in working closely with Islamic terror groups operating in the new terrorist sanctuary of northern Mali. This may encourage other extremist factions in Boko Haram to split off and create even more radical and violent groups like Ansaru.

In the southeast (Anambra state) over 30 bodies were found floating in a river. The bodies could not be identified and the police have offered a reward of $32,000 for information on where the bodies came from. There have been no reports of mass killings in the area.

January 21, 2013: The battle against Islamic terrorists grinds on, with the Boko Haram and Ansaru terrorists attacking troops and police even while they are being sought and attacked. The Islamic radicals are encouraged by the increased activity by Islamic terror groups in nearby Mali.

January 21, 2013: In northern Borno State several Boko Haram attacks killed 23 people who were accused by the Islamic radicals of selling forbidden food or playing games.

January 23, 2013: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram gunmen killed and beheaded five people. Troops showed up and confronted some of the attackers and killed at least two of them and recovered weapons and ammo. Three suspects were also arrested.

January 24, 2013: In central Plateau state continued fighting between local Moslem tribesmen feuding with their Christian rivals left some twenty dead. This violence has been going on in Plateau state for generations.

January 26, 2013: Five Indian sailors who were kidnapped from their ship off the Niger River Delta last December 17th have been freed. The shipping company refused to confirm that a ransom had been paid. If a large ransom was paid (and the pirates won't keep it a secret) more attacks on ships in the Gulf of Guinea (to rob the vessel and kidnap senior officers) will take place.

January 27, 2013: In the north (Borno State) Boko Haram gunmen killed eight, including a senior local official.

So far 300 army and 300 air force troops have been sent to Mali. January

28, 2013: The Boko Haram leadership in northern Borno State

(and the city most hurt by terrorist violence: Maiduguri) have announced a ceasefire and asked for negotiations with the government. This is seen as a ploy to halt the increasingly successful counter-terror efforts in Borno. There is some local enthusiasm for a cease fire but the national government (which controls the security forces) is not so sure. However, the national government earlier said it would be willing to negotiate if Boko Haram leaders revealed themselves so it would be known who the government would be negotiating with. That the Boko Haram Borno faction leadership has done. If nothing else, it confirms suspicions that Boko Haram is actually several factions that are not under any overall command.

January 29, 2013: The national government is only interested in a ceasefire and negotiation deal with all of Boko Haram, not just a faction running things in Borno State. This puts the national government at odds with the government of Borno state, which is eager to make a deal with the Boko Haram within Borno and reduce the violence.

Back in Nigeria the army and police are faced with a Moslem population in the north who hate both the Islamic radical Boko Haram, for their violent terrorism and lifestyle rules, as well as the corrupt and violent government and security forces. The corruption and nasty security forces are also present in Mali but in Nigeria these thugs and crooks look like their victims. This gives Boko Haram more protection and makes the Islamic terrorists more difficult to root out. In other words, for counter-terrorist operations, Mali is easy, Nigeria is hard.

Seven months ago the Islamic radicals in northern Mali split over this ethnic/religious issue, with the black African and Tuareg radicals splitting with the mainly Arab al Qaeda. The Tuareg rebels were driven out of the cities by the better armed and more ferocious al Qaeda men. As a result of this, al Qaeda cannot easily hide among the people of northern Mali, who generally dislike al Qaeda and their attempt to impose a harsh Islamic lifestyle on everyone.

Yet Mali and Nigeria are different in important ways. While the Boko Haram are all black African, most people in northern Mail are lighter skinned Tuareg (ethnic cousins of the Berbers and ancient Egyptians), and most of the Islamic radicals are lighter skinned Arabs. Added to this is the ancient animosity between Arabs and black Africans. Part of it is pure racism, but another element is the annoying tendency of Arab Moslems to assume they are superior to non-Arab Moslems because the founder of Islam was Arab and the Moslem scriptures are written in Arabic and many Moslem scholars believe that the faithful should learn Arabic to pray and study the scriptures.

January 30, 2013: The government is sending 1,200 troops to help drive the Islamic radicals out of northern Mali. The government believes that some Boko Haram members have been trained in northern Mali, where the al Qaeda affiliated groups have been for a year now. Many other Boko Haram members and potential recruits are influenced by the al Qaeda activity in northern Mali. But now the Islamic terrorists there are on the run. Since January 15th France has taken the initiative and sent troops to attack the al Qaeda forces in Mali. This has led other Western nations to contribute troops and support services. African nations in the region are suddenly sending some 10,000 troops to help chase down the al Qaeda fighters, who are seeking sanctuary in the countryside as the French troops, aided by French warplanes and smart bombs, drive the Islamic terrorists from the cities and the roads. Nigerian advice will be valuable in Mali because the Islamic terrorists there are now forced to operate like Boko Haram.

January 31, 2013: In the north five policemen were killed in two attacks by Boko Haram gunmen.

Over the last two days troops raided two Boko Haram camps in a swampy area of Borno State in the north. One soldier and 17 terrorists were killed, while large quantities of weapons, ammo, bomb making material, documents, and other equipment were seized. The camps were fortified with trenches and bunkers.

February 1, 2013: A member of parliament (Farouk Lawan) who led the inquiry that exposed corruption in the oil industry that cost the government $7 billion, is accused of demanding a $3 million bribe from a Nigerian oil company to keep that firm from being prosecuted.

February 5, 2013: Off the coast of the Niger River Delta, two soldiers and one sailor were killed as pirates attacked an Indian oil service ship the troops were guarding. The pirates were repulsed.

The recent defeat of al Qaeda in northern Mali uncovered a Boko Haram camp there. This facility provided military training for hundreds of Nigerian recruits.

February 7, 2013: The government is not sure if the recent offer of a ceasefire by a man claiming to be a Boko Haram leader is authentic. Terrorist attacks continue and the January 28th ceasefire offer requires the government to first release all jailed Boko Haram members. That alone has made many senior officials wary. The ceasefire offer is possibly only the action of a faction of Boko Haram, not the entire organization.

February 8, 2013: In the north three attacks on Polio vaccination operations left ten dead, including three North Korean and six Nigerian vaccination workers. The three North Korean doctors were working as medical contractors supplied by the North Korean government and spent only part of their time on polio matters. North Korea supplies cheap labor all over the world, keeping most of the pay for these people. There are few defections by their overseas workers because the North Korean government holds family members of the workers hostage back in North Korea. If the worker flees, their family goes to prison.

Decades of effort to eradicate polio are still being compromised by Islamic radicals in places like Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Nigeria. There are only small populations in India, Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Nigeria where polio is still found. In Nigeria Islamic conservatives up north have been preaching against polio vaccinations for years (on the assumption that the medicine is actually a Christian plot to poison Moslems). Polio can be wiped out, like smallpox was back in the 1970s, if you can vaccinate everyone in areas where the disease still exists (as polio and smallpox are diseases that can only live in human hosts). But the Islamic conservatives have been a major barrier to eliminating polio. The current wave of Islamic conservatism was only getting started back in the 1970s, and it continues to grow. The government is making yet another effort to wipe out polio in the Moslem north. Boko Haram is actively opposing this because some in Boko Haram do see the polio vaccinations as part of a war against Islam. Some members of Boko Haram understand that the polio vaccination campaign actually reduces the number of children getting polio but are unwilling to get into a fight over this with their more fanatical fellow Islamic radicals.

February 9, 2013: In the north (Kaduna state) police arrested eight Boko Haram suspects at a checkpoint when bomb building materials were found in their vehicle.

February 15, 2013: Four years of growing Boko Haram terrorism has hurt the economy in the north. Fear of going to markets, bars, and cinema plus the curfews and periods of closed borders with Niger, Cameroon, and Chad have cut GDP in some northern cities, like Kano, by over ten percent. All this is causing increasing economic and emotional distress for many northerners. Business has also been disrupted by the departure of many Christians from the north. The violence is not that common in the north as a whole but the shootings and bombings that do occur get a lot of publicity and this creates fear in some major cities. While people are angry at Boko Haram for all of this, there remains much of the older dissatisfaction with the corrupt and inefficient government.

There are a growing number of pirate attacks in the south, against the many cargo and oil-industry ships operating off the Niger River Delta. In one eight day period this month there were three attacks that left three dead. The gunfire is largely the result of many ships having armed guards while operating near the Nigerian coast. Otherwise there would be a lot more robberies and kidnappings. So far the armed guards have largely worked, with many pirate attacks prevented or repulsed because of the presence of armed security.

February 15, 2013: In the northern city of Maiduguri, two suicide bombers attempted to attack some soldiers but only managed to kill themselves and wound a civilian.

Reports from Mail indicate that the first 162 Nigerian troops sent there are not being adequately supplied and have had to ask for food from local leaders. Eventually 1,200 Nigerian troops will be in Mali to help with the peacekeeping.

February 16, 2013: In northern Bauchi State armed men raided a construction site and kidnapped seven foreign workers (a Briton, an Italian, a Greek, and four Lebanese).

February 17, 2013: Pirates kidnapped six crewmen from a commercial ship off the coast and later demanded a ransom of $1.27 million. This is the fifth such incident this month.

February 18, 2013: Ansaru (for Ansarul Muslimina Fi Biladis Sudan or "Vanguards for the Protection of Muslims in Black Africa") claimed responsibility for the recent kidnapping of seven foreign workers in northern Bauchi State. Ansaru is a Boko Haram splinter group that has become more active recently, after first declaring its existence a year ago (and then largely disappearing from view). Ansaru objects to the many Moslems who are being killed by Boko Haram attacks and wants to concentrate on attacks that only kill foreigners or non-Moslem Nigerians. It is unclear how large Ansaru is and how much violence within Boko Haram, if any, will result from the split. It is believed that there is considerable strife between Boko Haram leaders, with many strong-willed men, each with an armed following, trying to control the entire movement. At the moment most of these disagreements are put aside. Ansaru appears to be very small, perhaps only a hundred or so members, and more interested (than Boko Haram) in working closely with Islamic terror groups operating in the new terrorist sanctuary of northern Mali. This may encourage other extremist factions in Boko Haram to split off and create even more radical and violent groups like Ansaru.

February 19, 2013: A French family (parents, an uncle, and four children aged 5-12) were kidnapped in the north of Nigeria's southern neighbor Cameroon. The hostages were apparently taken across the border to Nigeria. There are about 6,000 French citizens in Cameroon, and all were subsequently warned to stay away from the Nigerian border. Boko Haram later denied they were responsible, and no one has yet demanded any ransom or admitted they have the seven.

February 20, 2013: In the northern city of Maiduguri, people woke to find posters in several neighborhoods proclaiming that Boko Haram had not agreed to a ceasefire. Maiduguri is in Borno State and the state government had been reporting negotiations with Boko Haram for a ceasefire. Elsewhere in Maiduguri a suicide bomber attempted to attack some soldiers but only managed to kill himself and two civilians.

February 21, 2013: The government ordered a search in the north, along the Cameroon border, for seven French citizens kidnapped two days ago in Cameroon.

February 22, 2013: Iran denied that it had trained a Nigerian Shia cleric in espionage techniques and asked the man to recruit locals and gather information on the activities of Israelis and Americans in southwestern Nigeria (where the cleric, and many Shia, live). Nigerian police had revealed, two days earlier, the arrest and interrogation of the three Shia Nigerian Moslems. The three had admitted spying for Iran and provided many details.

In northern Gombe State gunmen on motorcycles fired on a group of men playing cards and killed five of them. Boko Haram is violently opposed to playing cards, listening to music, dancing, and many other forms of entertainment.

The government shut down a northern radio station that had broadcast conspiracy theories about polio vaccination being a plot by Christians to poison Moslems.

February 23, 2013: In central Nigeria (Taraba State) a football (soccer) game between a Moslem and a Christian team resulted in a riot that killed at least one person and left several buildings (including a church and a mosque) burned down.

February 25, 2013: More evidence piles up that Boko Haram has been communicating with al Qaeda, particularly the branch in Mali. There were apparently Boko Haram members in Mali before French troops began clearing the Islamic terrorists out of northern Mali five weeks ago. The sources for this (captured documents and interrogations) also revealed a rift within Boko Haram. Many members are angry that the terror tactics have not produced much beyond a lot of mayhem and more Nigerians, particularly Moslems, who hate Boko Haram. That is why calls for peace talks since last November have created public disputes between Boko Haram leaders and factions. While Boko Haram has been able to carry out hundreds of attacks in the last few years, some of them quite spectacular bombings or gun battles, the group is no closer to its goal of ruling the north, much less all of Nigeria. While quite violent and militant, Boko Haram is still a small group, with a few thousand members (of varying skill and dedication) and a few hundred thousand northerners who offer support. Judging from the number of tips the police get and the subsequent raids on Boko Haram hideouts, many northerners are not fans of the ultra violence.

February 25, 2013: The Boko Haram kidnappers who recently seized seven French civilians in neighboring Cameroon released a video on the Internet, in which they revealed what they wanted for the release of the hostages. Nigeria must release all women being held in prison for Boko Haram related activities and Cameroon must release everyone being held for working with Boko Haram. France responded by saying that it would not negotiate with terrorists and is aiding Nigeria in the search for the hostages and their captors.

In the northern city of Maiduguri, police killed a Boko Haram commander and three of his associates.

February 26, 2013: In the northeast (Yobe State) seven men guarding a market place were shot dead. The seven men killed were local security volunteers and the attackers may have been Boko Haram or local gangsters upset at the increased security.

February 28, 2013: In the northern city of Maiduguri three bombs went off, wounding three people.

March 1, 2013: The last of 1,200 Nigerian peacekeepers have arrived in Mali.

March 3, 2013: In the north (Borno State) dozens of Boko Haram gunmen attacked an army base but were repulsed. At least twenty of the terrorists were killed and the army suffered no casualties.

March 4, 2013: As a former British colony, Nigeria retains many official, and unofficial, connections with their former colonizer. Nigerian security forces have, in the last year, consulted with their British counterparts about counter-terrorism tactics and techniques. After all, British troops had recent experience fighting Islamic terrorists in Iraq and Afghanistan. But many British police and military experts are telling the Nigerians that Boko Haram is more similar to the IRA (Irish Republican Army) that Britain spent more than three decades suppressing. Nigerian police and army commanders were not happy to hear this, especially when their British counterparts got into the details. While Boko Haram and the IRA have different origins and goals, they both share many similarities. Both recruit from an oppressed population and both are finding that there is a large supply of angry young men willing to risk death to achieve some change. The Nigerian government has been predicting a quick victory.

March 5, 2013: The top Moslem cleric in the country (Mohammed Abubaka) called for the government to offer a complete amnesty for Boko Haram men who surrender. Abubaka wants a deal similar to that offered to tribal rebels in the Niger River Delta four years ago. That amnesty did not stop the violence in the delta but did reduce it.

Ansaru (a more radical Boko Haram faction) released a video on the Internet showing the bodies of seven foreigners (British, Italian, Greek, and four Lebanese) they had claimed to have killed yesterday. The men were seized last month from a construction site in the north (Bauchi State). The seven were taken from a construction site and Boko Haram splinter group Ansaru demanded all imprisoned Islamic terrorists be freed to get the seven foreigners released. The government refused. Ansaru claimed to have kidnapped and killed the seven foreigners partly in response to the French attack on al Qaeda in northern Mali.

March 10, 2013: The government said it will not yet consider an amnesty for Boko Haram members, at least not yet. Meanwhile, in the last ten days security forces have killed 53 Boko Haram men and arrested 70.

March 12, 2013: In the north (Kano State) someone shot and wounded three teachers at a primary school. Boko Haram wants to shut down all secular schools used by Moslems and allow only religious schools.

Foreign oil companies operating the oil wells and pipelines in the Niger Delta warned the government that continuing oil theft (by tapping into pipelines and then leaving with stolen oil while the leak continues to pollute the waterways) has caused such frequent pipeline shut downs that contractual quantities of oil will not be available for shipment. Four years ago the peace deal in the Niger Delta allowed oil shipments to increase from 1.8 million barrels a day to 2.2 million. The government hoped to increase that to 3.7 million barrels a day. The previous peak was 2.6 million barrels a day seven years ago (before the Niger Rebels got going and oil theft became a much larger problem). It proved impossible to get back to 2.6 million because many of the oil stealing gangs did not accept the amnesty and peace deal. These gangs had grown rich by stealing oil and staying out of the revolution business. While MEND and their ilk stole oil to finance their revolution, the hard core oil thieves stole oil to make a lot of money. The military concentrated their efforts on the oil thefts by the rebel groups, giving the non-political oil stealing gangs an edge. So oil facilities are still being damaged, so the gangs can steal oil. After 2009, many politicians made deals to sponsor oil stealing gangs, using their clout to deflect the security forces from the oil thieves they backed (for a share of the profits). Thus oil shipments are stuck at about two million barrels a day. Moreover, the oil is proving more difficult to sell, because of the huge quantities of oil and gas coming on the market in North America (because decades old fracking techniques had been perfected in the last decade). All this makes little difference to most Nigerians because most of the oil money in Nigeria has been stolen over the last half century.

March 13, 2013: The government has bought 35 special desert terrain vehicles for its 1,200 peacekeepers in Mali. It was also announced that most of these troops would only serve six months in Mali before being replaced. All Nigerian troops sent to Mali would first go through several weeks' of peacekeeper training.

March 16, 2013: The government insisted that no ransom be paid to Boko Haram to gain the freedom of seven French citizens being held by the terrorists.

March 18, 2013: Boko Haram released an Internet video in which they demanded the release of all Boko Haram prisoners in Nigeria and Cameroon, otherwise they will continue holding seven French tourists (including four children) seized in Cameroon. Boko Haram also promised more attacks in Cameroon. Northern Cameroon, which is adjacent to parts of Nigeria suffering the most Boko Haram violence, is sparsely populated and there are few police.In the north (Kano state) five bombs went off in a bus station killing 25 people.

March 21, 2013: Two Boko Haram men were arrested in the southern city of Lagos. Police found the two in possession of explosives. This was followed by a police sweep that arrested over 500 foreigners (most of them from Mali and Chad).

March 21, 2013: Obituary: Nigeria's literary giant Chinua Achebe, passed away at age of 82 at a hospital in the US .

March 22, 2013: In the northeast (Adamawa state, on the Cameroon border) a group of gunmen attacked a jail (freeing 127 prisoners), a bank, a police station, and several taverns in the town Ganye, killing 25 people in the process. It’s unclear if the attackers were Boko Haram or local gangsters. Half the population of Adamawa state is Christian and there has not been a lot of Boko Haram activity in the area, but Boko Haram is known to be operating across the border in Cameroon.

In northern Borno state, where Boko Haram has been most active, the Islamic terrorists have destroyed all but two of the 52 Catholic churches in the state. Boko Haram has been particularly hostile to non-Moslems and southern politicians are having a difficult time restraining southern Christians from retaliating against Moslems living in the largely Christian south. This is what Boko Haram wants, as they see a general religious war as benefitting them. Most Nigerians don’t see it that way. In response to that, Boko Haram is increasingly vocal and specific about its plans to drive all Christians from Nigeria, killing those who resist. Christians are welcome to convert to Islam but going the other way will get you a death sentence from Boko Haram.

March 25, 2013: The U.S. believes that Boko Haram is still moving men to and from (mostly from these days) Mali via Niger. The Boko Haram members fleeing Mali are providing trained (in Mali) men for launching more terror attacks. The U.S. is also not keeping quiet about the fact that the chronic corruption in Nigeria is the main reason for the emergence and persistence of Boko Haram. Most Nigerians accept the corruption angle but the Nigerian politicians are less enthusiastic about losing all that illegal income and prosecuting themselves.

March 28, 2013: France announced that it would keep its 4,000 troops in Mali until July, and at that point half would be withdrawn. By the end of this year there will be only a thousand French troops in Mali. That could change if the UN sponsored peacekeeping force does not show up or proves ineffective.

March 30, 2013: In Timbuktu a suicide bomber attacked a checkpoint outside the city, wounding a Mali soldier. This attack was believed to be a diversion to allow several vehicles carrying other terrorists to get into the city.

March 31, 2013: Inside Timbuktu several Islamic terrorists fired on Malian troops. This led to a day-long gun battle that left four terrorists, a soldier, and a civilian dead. France sent in fifty troops and a warplane to help the Malians. Civilians in the city claim that more civilians were killed by the cross fire.

April 1, 2013: In Timbuktu Malian troops searched several neighborhoods for Islamic terrorist safe houses and weapons storage sites. Over the last few days terror attacks in the city have left seven dead.

Although the Mali government is sending administrators and bureaucrats north to revive local government up north, Tuareg rebels, who have allied themselves with the French, are setting up their own government, especially in and around Kidal. This could lead to a resumption of fighting between Tuareg and Mali troops.

The Mali Army says it has lost 64 soldiers in the north this year and that at least 600 Islamic terrorists have been killed. French troops and their African allies have lost about 40 dead.

French troops have found over seven tons of weapons and ammo in the northern mountains so far. Most of it has been destroyed were found by French engineers. Over half this stuff was stolen from the Malian Army when the Tuareg rebels and their al Qaeda allies took control of the north a year ago, but some of it had been smuggled in from other countries.

The Islamic terrorists are still active in the north. No one knows how many there are but there appear to be several hundred of them, organized into five or more gangs. They are planting mines in roads and launching several terror attacks a week. More peacekeepers would make it possible to put regular checkpoints on the few roads and limit the mobility of terrorists (or the growing number of bandits). The terrorists tend to stay outside the cities, where they find shelter in Tuareg villages. Inside the cities black African residents will report Islamic terrorist activity, even if it involves the few black Islamic terrorists.

The UN wants to expand the Mali peacekeeping force from 7,000 to 11,000. While most of these peacekeepers will be in the north, some are also needed in the south, where the Mali Army still refuses to halt its interference in the government. Getting the money and troops for the larger force may not be possible because donor countries are tired of the constant demands for troops and cash from African countries.

There are still nearly a half a million refugees created by the year of violence in the north. Some 290,000 people fled to other parts of Mali while 177,000 went to Mauritania, Niger, and Burkina Faso. There are still food shortages in the north, caused by the Islamic radicals and their policies. Over a million refugees and inhabitants of the north need food aid.

The Islamic terrorists can still operate in populated areas of the north because most of the population up there is Tuareg and Arab. The Tuaregs predominate but to the blacks the Tuaregs and Arabs are both "lights" and potential enemies. The Tuaregs have actually been in northern Mali longer than the blacks and feel the region belongs to them. But 19th century borders drawn by European colonial governments are considered sacrosanct in Africa, which had few permanent borders before the Europeans arrived two centuries ago (and largely departed fifty years ago). Most Tuaregs didn't like the Islamic radicals, but if some move into your neighborhood and threaten to kill anyone who talks to the military, it will be hard to tell the bad guys from the other Tuareg civilians.

This sort of animosity between dark skinned Africans and lighter skinned people from the north has been around as long as the two groups have been in contact. Arabs first moved south of the Sahara in large numbers over a thousand years ago and often came as conquerors and slavers. Although many of the black Africans encountered converted to Islam, the lighter skinned Arabs (including the Tuareg and Berbers of North Africa) considered themselves superior. This racist attitude has persisted and the black Africans often reciprocate. This is one reason why the largely Tuareg of northern Mali constantly rebel. Not only is the Mali government corrupt but it is dominated by black Africans, which is what 90 percent of Malians are. Officially, Islam and most African governments deny that such ethnic tensions exist. This in itself is progress, but the animosities remain and often become quite deadly. The slaving also continues and often gets into the news. This most recently occurred in Sudan where the government encouraged Arabized tribes to raid non-Moslem black African tribes and take slaves. Retreating al Qaeda men sometimes took newly enslaved blacks with them. Many old customs die hard in this part of the world. Yet there is also a tradition of tolerance between the blacks and the lights, but the corruption of the black dominated elected government has caused growing resentment from the Tuaregs of the north. Al Qaeda does not openly preach racism but it implies that Arabs and other "lights" will prevail over blacks in areas where the two groups are present. In all black countries like Nigeria, all black Islamic terror groups like Boko Haram promise that Moslems will dominate non-Moslems.

Meanwhile, ethnic and racial violence continues throughout the north, especially in the major cities. Black Africans living in the north, usually in the cities, are eager for revenge against Arabs (the most violent Islamic terrorists were Arab) and Tuaregs (the lighter skinned tribesmen of the north who have been regularly rebelling against the rule of the black African majority), and French troops have not been able to stop revenge attacks. Black Africans in the north will single out "light skin" (Arab or Tuareg) neighbors who seemed too friendly with the occupiers and demand that these people be punished. Malian troops have arrested hundreds of these collaborators, who are usually eager to cooperate. But some of the "lights" have been tortured and at least a few killed. The soldiers say they are punishing murderers and rapists. Despite that racial violence continues in the north.

April 3, 2013: President Goodluck Johnathan has made a deal with northern leaders to allow amnesty to be offered to Boko Haram members in return for a peace deal that would end the terrorist violence of the Islamic radical group.

April 4, 2013: French troops continue to be tied down going after Islamic terrorist bases in the northern mountains. Most of the Islamic terrorists up there have fled but they have left behind tons of weapons, ammo, and equipment. The French want to find and destroy that stuff before the terrorists have a chance to move it. This is taking longer than expected, but at least there are still terrorist targets to go after up there.

April 5, 2013: In the north (Adamawa state) armed men attacked the home of the deputy state governor, killed two guards, and burned the place down. The attackers also killed eleven other people in the area and some of them were apparently sought out by name.

There were two other violent incidents believed to be related to tribal feuds. In the north (Katsina state) armed men attacked a village on the border with Niger, burning four homes. The villagers fought back and killed four of the attackers. In central Nigeria (Plateau state) gunmen attacked a village and killed seven people.

April 6, 2013: In the Niger Delta someone attacked a police detachment and killed nine of twelve officers. The police were assigned to protect the funeral of the mother of a former rebel leader who had accepted amnesty four years ago. But he had received death threats from former associates in the rebel movement who were still fighting the government and accusing those who accepted amnesty of being traitors. The rebels who made the threats are believed behind this attack, the worst against the police in the Niger Delta in a long time. The police were in a boat, on their way to their assignment, when they were ambushed.

In the capital police questioned four journalists over a story in a major paper about how president Johnson was planning to disrupt the efforts of his opponents to defeat him. Some of the methods appeared to be of questionable legality. Publishing this sort of stuff was, for a long time, not done. Not because it was illegal but because it was understood that the offended politicians would get revenge, up to and including murder of the offending reporter. But the reform and anti-corruption movement that has been growing for over a decade has changed the rules. The risk of getting killed for reporting the truth is still around, however.

In the north (Borno state) four men were killed by Boko Haram terrorists for operating non-religious educational programs. Boko Haram is very much against this sort of thing.

There are more dirty deeds in Anambra state. Back in January more than 30 bodies were found floating in a river. At first the bodies could not be identified and the police offered a reward of $32,000 for information on where the bodies came from. There had been no reports of mass killings in the area and it was eventually discovered that many of the 30 dead were local political activists who had disappeared over the last year and were believed being secretly held by police. The separatist (pro-Biafra) organization the dead men belonged to accused the police of kidnapping and questioning them via torture, then killing them and dumping the bodies into the river. The government denies everything but the police have been known to do this sort of thing. This is something the government is reluctant to investigate.

April 8, 2013: In the southeast (Anambra state) another man died because of dispute with neighboring Kogi state over where the border is. It's a tribal dispute, as well as men from different tribes. Battles like this because of land or water disputes are common.

April 11, 2013: Christians are openly hostile to government proposals to offer amnesty to Boko Haram, in order to get a peace deal with the Islamic terrorist group. Many northern leaders have been urging the federal government to offer amnesty but admit that this alone is not likely to end the Islamic terrorism up there and increasingly in the Christian south. If there is amnesty, northern leaders feel they will be less vulnerable to personal attack. A growing number of assassination attacks are being made on Moslem leaders up north. Until recently the federal government opposed amnesty because they thought they had Boko Haram on the defensive and felt they could crush the group without any amnesty deals. Christians point out that three years of Boko Haram terrorism has destroyed over a thousand Christian businesses in the north, along with nearly a hundred churches. Christians want justice.

April 12, 2013: In the north (Borno) Boko Haram men attacked a police station at night. The attack failed, with five terrorists killed, along with four policemen.

April 13, 2013: In the north (Borno) Boko Haram attacked a secular school and killed several students. The name "Boko Haram" means, literally, that Western education is forbidden. A

April 17, 2013: The government announced an amnesty program that would give Boko Haram members 60 days to surrender. A committee of 26 northern notables is being formed to develop an amnesty procedure, including suggestions on how to deal with the causes of the northern unrest (corruption and poverty). While anti-corruption efforts have become increasingly popular and energetic, the corruption is very much still there and not much weakened over the last decade. Most northerners do not want to be ruled by a religious dictatorship (which Boko Haram offers as a solution to everything) but would like peace, prosperity, and honest government. The reality is that many federal and northern politicians see the amnesty program as an opportunity to do some more stealing. That's what happened with the recent amnesty program in the southern Niger Delta states.

April 18, 2013: In neighboring Cameroon Boko Haram released a French family (parents, an uncle, and four children aged 5-12) they had kidnapped in the northern Cameroon two months ago. The hostages were apparently taken across the border to Nigeria and later back into Cameroon to avoid police efforts on both sides of the border to find them. Boko Haram at first denied they were responsible. A month ago Boko Haram released an Internet video in which they demanded the release of all Boko Haram prisoners in Nigeria and Cameroon, otherwise they would continue holding the French family. The French and Nigerian government would only say that no ransom was paid to get the family released and that there was no raid involved. Boko Haram has not said why they decided to free their hostages. Eventually it will be known if some kind of deal was made or that the police were closing in and the kidnappers made the best they could of the situation by "releasing" their captives.

Prosecutors charged a man with organizing the 2011 Boko Haram bombing of a church outside Abuja (the national capital) that killed 37. The police are often able to hunt down and kill or capture the Boko Haram men responsible for the major attacks. But because of the widespread popularity of Islamic conservatism (as a cure for the corruption and other ills Nigeria suffers from) in the north, there are always new recruits. It will take a while before it is realized up there that the Taliban approach (which Boko Haram is trying to emulate) is actually a cure worse than the disease.

April 19, 2013: In the northeast (Baga on Lake Chad) 185 people were killed, most of them civilians caught in the crossfire during a Boko Haram attack. It began when troops surrounded a mosque believed to be used as a base by Boko Haram. More Islamic terrorists showed up and attacked the troops. Hours of shooting saw thousands of civilians flee the fishing village as the soldiers chased the Boko Haram men away. The soldiers accused Boko Haram of using civilians as human shields, which may have been the case. The army also has a long history of shooting at everyone in sight when attacked in an urban setting.

Meantime, the battle in the northeast (Baga on Lake Chad) has turned into a major embarrassment for the government. Over 200 people were apparently killed, most of them civilians caught in the crossfire during a battle with Boko Haram. Many of the civilian deaths were the result of enraged and out-of-control troops firing at civilians after the Boko Haram fighters were defeated.

Some of the local oil thieves have turned to piracy, attacking the many commercial ships off the Nigerian coast and the surrounding Gulf of Guinea. Shipping companies are responding by putting armed guards on the most lucrative targets. Eventually the pirates will be left with slim pickings and the piracy will fade. This process will take several years, so piracy will be a growing problem for a while.

Oil theft related arrests in the Niger Delta usually involve shutting down oil theft operations that do not have a politician sponsor (who takes a cut of the profits for providing protection). The foreign oil companies that run the drilling and pipeline operations are threatening to leave if something is not done about the oil theft gangs. The stealing has been so serious that, in the last three months, daily production fell from 2.3 million barrels a day to 2.1 million. This is despite efforts to increase production. The government hoped to increase production to 3.7 million barrels a day. The previous peak was 2.6 million barrels a day seven years ago (before the Niger Rebels got going and oil theft became a much larger problem). It proved impossible to get back to 2.6 million because of the growing oil theft.

April 20, 2013: In the Niger Delta troops seized a tanker carrying 2,500 tons of stolen oil. The tanker was caught while taking on more stolen oil. The entire cargo is normally taken to a neighboring country where criminal oil brokers use forged documents to sell the oil as legitimate and split the profits with the thieves and the middlemen who collect and transport the oil. Some of the stolen oil is refined and sold locally in crude rural refineries. Since the amnesty program in the Niger Delta four years ago broke the power of the tribal oil theft/separatist gangs, local politicians and military commanders have taken control of most of the oil theft operations and organized them more efficiently (so that it is more profitable to the politicians to steal the oil than to steal the government share of the oil profits). The amount of oil stolen has increased and is now 10-15 percent of production. The old tribal gangs never got more than 5-10 percent.

MEND (Niger Delta tribal rebels) has threatened to attack Moslems in the south if Boko Haram does not halt its attacks on Christians in the north. MEND is still around despite the amnesty deal four years ago. While many MEND members accepted the government amnesty, the MEND hard core is still in business. Currently, MEND has been demanding that the army withdraw from the Delta and all prisoners be freed or else there will be a new wave of attacks on oil facilities. Not much has come of these threats despite some MEND violence every week or so. The MEND rebels also want the terms of the 2009 amnesty deal enforced and corrupt officials running the program removed. In response to those threats, the military keeps attacking MEND associated camps in the Niger delta, seizing a lot of weapons and equipment, but not making many arrests. The rebels tend to hear the troops coming (usually by boat, usually after some aerial reconnaissance) and slip away into an area of numerous creeks and islands they know well. Many criminals in the delta also support rebel goals (for more autonomy in the Delta, less corruption, and spending additional oil money locally). Even though the government has screwed up their end of the amnesty deal they insist that the rebels keep the peace. But corruption and mismanagement have kept many rebels from getting the amnesty benefits and the government is seen as unreliable, corrupt, and a hostile force. The MEND threats have been much more ambitious than the actual attacks and it is believed that only a few people are involved in attacks on oil facilities (which are well guarded these days).

Anti-corruption sentiment has been growing over the last decade. Most Nigerians are fed up with the half century of stealing and mismanagement, and even the government has to pay lip service to the movement. Most politicians are dirty and they protect each other. President Johnathan recently pardoned a former state governor who had been convicted of corruption, and the government is trying to ban a 30 minute documentary film that names names and makes it clear how widespread and costly the corruption is.

Northeastern Borno state is where Boko Haram is strongest. This is partly because Borno borders Cameroon, Niger, and Chad, three countries where Islamic terrorists can find sanctuary in thinly populated border areas. The largest city in Borno, Maiduguri, has become one of the main battlegrounds between the Islamic terrorists and the security forces. Boko Haram is holding on in Maiduguri, despite energetic efforts by soldiers and police to shut the Islamic radicals down. Outside of Maiduguri government officials have been driven out of many rural areas by Boko Haram death squads. Thousands of Christians have fled Maiduguri for the same reason. Boko Haram has seized many government vehicles and weapons and are so strong in some rural areas that a major military operation (involving hundreds of troops and dozens of vehicles) must be put together in order to travel there.

Federal level anti-corruption efforts have concentrated on the governors and ex-governors (all of them much wealthier than they were before becoming governors). But these savvy and corrupt politicians have been difficult to prosecute, convict, and jail. The justice system favors those with a lot of cash and few scruples. And that's why you have Boko Haram up north, who exist, by their own admission, mainly to reduce corruption and crime. The tragedy of Nigeria is that the billions in oil income over the last half century did not go to build a better country but to construct a network of private armies created by corrupt politicians, mainly the state governors. The oil money has made a few Nigerians very rich and most Nigerians very unhappy.

In the north, local tribal and religious leaders, who still have some standing among the people, place the blame for Boko Haram on the northern politicians. This is especially true of the state governors, who use fraud and force to get elected and once in office steal as much as they can. Boko Haram got its start as one of these politician supported gangs (used to discourage opposition candidates and encourage voting for their boss) but got out of control when the group became violently anti-corruption. Boko Haram recruited a lot of men who learned how to be gangsters working for these politically connected militias.

April 22, 2013: Boko Haram will not be easy to get rid of because it's not that unusual an organization in Nigeria. It goes like this. Political power is much sought after in Nigeria, especially being governor of one of the states. There are 36 states and the federal capital district. It is a federal system with the governor having a lot of power and most of them abuse it, as well as the electoral process by which they obtain that power. Therein lies the main problem.

April 25, 2013: In the northeast (Yobe state) a gang of Boko Haram gunmen robbed a bank and attacked a nearby police station. The robbery got $56,000 and five of the Islamic terrorists were killed as well as two policemen. A dozen or more civilians were believed to have died as well.

April 26, 2013: In the north (Kaduna State) Boko Haram gunmen attacked a bank (killing two civilians but getting no money) and a police station, where they killed three policemen before fleeing.

In neighboring Borno state two policemen were killed in a Boko Haram ambush.

Off the coast, 14 pirates attacked a container ship, took away portable valuables and five members of the crew, who will be held for ransom.

April 27, 2013: Nigeria: Baga Massacre - Survivors Tell Their Stories'

Baga — Baga, a town in northern Borno State on the Nigerian border with Chad Republic, is famous for its economic potentials in trading in stock fishes, which are produced, processed and transported to places both within and outside the country. But last week, the town made news headlines as a result of the massacre of about 200 people following a clash between soldiers attached to the Multinational Joint Task Force (MNJTF) and Boko Haram insurgents.

The mayhem turned the place into a ghost town after the residents fled to find shelter in neighbouring communities. Weekly Trust visited the community on Wednesday and Thursday and observed that the people of the community are yet to recover from the shock. It was learnt that one of the reasons why the massacre took time before it was known to the public was that the town had been cut off from the rest of the country after telecommunication masts in the area were burnt down by suspected Boko Haram members. Source: Daily Trust

April 27, 2013: In northeastern Borno state police killed a senior Boko Haram leader (Mohammed Chad). This man replaced a Boko Haram commander killed last month. Boko Haram is suffering heavy losses among top leadership and the replacements are getting young and more violent.

April 28, 2013: Apparently someone did pay a $3.15 million ransom to Boko Haram to gain the release of a French family (parents, an uncle and four children aged 5-12) that had kidnapped been in northern Cameroon two months earlier and released on April 18th. The hostages were apparently taken across the border to Nigeria and later back into Cameroon to avoid police efforts on both sides of the border to find them. Boko Haram at first denied they were responsible but a month ago released an Internet video in which they demanded the release of all Boko Haram prisoners in Nigeria and Cameroon otherwise they would continue holding the French family. The French and Nigerian government would only say that they paid no ransom was to get the family released and that there was no raid involved. Nothing was said about a third-party paying a ransom. Boko Haram has not said why they decided to free their hostages but Boko Haram members are already talking about the large ransom payment. Such ransoms are officially discouraged because they encourage the terrorists and enable groups like Boko Haram to make more attacks and kill more people. Thus these ransoms are "blood money" in the worst sense of the word.

April 28, 2013: Nigeria: Baga Massacre - I Counted 228 Graves, 4,000 Destroyed Houses – Senator'

Maiduguri and Abuja — Senator Maina Maaji, who represents Borno North Senatorial District in the Upper Chamber of the National Assembly, has alleged that he counted 228 graves and over 4,000 destroyed houses in Baga his hometown, while on a fact-finding mission. The senator, who spoke to journalists in Maiduguri yesterday, alleged that those killed were defenceless youths, children and women, in what the Multinational Task Force claimed to be a face-off between Boko Haram sect fighters and its men.

On the killings, Senator Maaji alleged that "In the three graveyards that I visited and the ones inside town, the total number of the dead is 228. There is an investigation panel set up by the president. The Senate also set up a joint committee on defense, intelligence and national security and the police panel to assess the situation. I did not want to flog this any further because the outcome of the investigations is going to say which figures are correct. I want a thorough investigation to be done to determine the truth of the matter. Between the senate committee and the president's committee, the truth shall come out because this will guide us in our quest to do things in a civilized way. Speaking further at the press conference, Senator Maaji said, "After the visit, I discovered that what I have seen is far more than the report we have received. The houses destroyed were more than 4,000. Baga is a meeting point. You will find all Nigerians there: Yoruba, Hausa, Ibo, Kanuri, Nupe because of the level of economic activities taking place there. When we are talking of houses we are not talking of mansions. It is the houses of low income people, ordinary Nigerians who are living from hand to mouth that I'm talking about. I have visited four kilometers of continuous carnage. I have seen it while driving in my car; I walked round talking to people, pacifying them. Therefore what I have seen with my eyes outweighed what was reported."

He blamed the military for the use of force to destroy Baga on the excuse that a Boko Haram fighter killed a soldier. (Read an excerpt from the interview on Page 7). In reaction to continued criticism of its operations and a report that it had arrested 15 soldiers in connection with the attack on Baga, the Defense Headquarters yesterday issued a statement, saying that no soldier was arrested over the recent killing of civilians in Baga town. The statement signed by defence spokesman Brigadier General Chris Olukolade said "It is surprising that the atrocities of Boko Haram terrorists are being desperately blamed on the troops even without any meaningful investigations by those promoting these allegations locally and internationally. This tendency is clearly in line with the orchestrated effort by a vested interest, using the press, to whip up public resentment against the necessary military operations in defence and security of the nation. "The series of false claims on the incident in Baga should however not be forced down the throat of well-meaning people of Nigeria and beyond. The DHQ once more, wishes to urge the press to desist from playing into the hands of those who do not mean well for the country in times like this."

On the reported arrest of 15 soldiers, the press statement said, "the DHQ wishes to declare that no soldier has been arrested or detained on account of the incident that happened in Baga last week as reported in certain newspapers today Saturday, April 27. The report, which claimed that 15 soldiers have been arrested in connection with their alleged role in what the medium referred to as 'Borno Bloodbath' is indeed false in its entirety. "At no point did the DHQ or any of the services of the Nigerian Armed Forces order the arrest of any of its soldiers in connection with the incident in Baga. "The Defence Headquarters reaffirms its stand that all lives are precious in the conduct of all operations and the loss of human lives should not be taken with levity or unnecessary sensationalism as some interest groups appear bent on doing. The military has therefore refrained from joining issues on figures being so vociferously presented and believed in certain quarters even when the reports on the ground are indicating otherwise. The untiring efforts by some persons and groups to unduly attribute the killings in Baga to the troops of the Multi National Joint Task Force are however assuming a very unfair and dangerous dimension indeed. A fact finding team led by the DHQ's Chief of Training and Operations Major General Lawrence Ngubane has been dispatched to the town. Source: Daily Trust

April 28, 2013: Nigeria: 1000 Couples Tie Knot in Kano Mass Wedding’

Kano — Kano State Hisbah Board yesterday married off 1,000 couples in the third batch of the Kano State sponsored mass wedding of divorces, widows and spinsters as part of the government's efforts to reduce marital problem in the society. The grand wedding fatiha took place simultaneously at the Emir Palace Central Mosque and the palaces of the District Heads of the 44 local government areas of the state. At the Emir Palace mosque the weddings were solemnized after payment of N10,000 dowries by the representative of the grooms in the presence of Kano State Governor, Rabi'u Musa Kwankwaso. In his brief speech at the occasion, Kwankwaso thanked the Hisbah Board, Islamic scholars and traditional rulers who helped toward the success of the wedding Fatiha and prayed to Allah to make the marriage a means of development to the state and the country at large.

Speaking to Sunday Trust, the Commandant General of the Hisbah Board, Sheikh Aminu Ibrahim Daurawa said the historic wedding Fatiha that saw 1,000 couples married at the same time entered history as the first of its kind on African continent. "We're grateful to Allah for realizing our dream of marrying off 1,000 women as part of our commitment to mitigate the social malaise we're facing in our society," Daurawa said. Daurawa said individuals and groups gave money to the grooms to pay for their dowries and the state government provided the brides with furniture, kitchen wares and foodstuffs as well as N20,000 to each couple to enable them start small businesses. The Hisbah CG thanked individuals and organisations that helped towards the success of the event and enjoined the couples to have fear of Allah in their new life.

One of the beneficiaries, Muhammad Dauda expressed delight and commended the state government and the Hisbah Board for organising and sponsoring their weddings. "Today is the happiest day of my life. I can't thank the governor enough for making me realize my dream of getting married. "All I can say for now is, may Allah bless him and guide him to continue the good work he's doing in Kano State," Dandoya said. The event had in attendance the state governor, commissioners, members of the State House of Assembly, Sarkin Sudan Alhaji Shehu Malami as well as prominent Islamic scholars in the state. The state government also organised a Walima (marriage) bouquet for the brides and the grooms at the Hisbah Board premises and the Kano State Government House respectively. Source: Daily Trust

April 29, 2013: In northeastern Borno state police fought Boko Haram leaving ten Islamic terrorists and seven police dead. Nearby buildings were burned down and local journalists suspect many civilians were killed as happened in Baga on the 19th.

A side effect of increased security in the north is increased delays at border crossings. This has been particularly difficult at the Cameroon frontier, because so many locals on both sides of the line depend on easy border access to make a living. But the effort to deny Boko Haram easy access means that everyone and everything crossing via the roads is checked. The terrorists and smugglers can still take the slower cross-country route.

There is a cultural basis for this kind of retaliation. This sort of group punishment was long a common form of settling disputes between tribes. If a member of one tribe hurt someone from another tribe the response was directed against any members of the attacker’s tribe until tribal elders got together and negotiated a settlement (money, goods, or the life of the attacker). Group punishments were (and still are in many parts of the world) used to gain information about who was guilty of what and where they are. But as the power of tribes declined (and largely disappeared in the West) this approach declined in effectiveness and acceptance. There are still functioning tribes in Nigeria, but the leaders have surrendered most of their powers to the state. Worst of all, Boko Haram is not a tribe but an extremist religious movement that sees itself on a mission from God and immune to any group pressures. So group punishments by the security forces just makes more young men inclined to join Boko Haram.

This sort of thing has long been common with Nigerian police and soldiers. Police and army leadership have continued to allow undisciplined and poorly led troops to attack civilians. This sort of violence is all too common when the troops suffer losses and cannot find the enemy or simply suspect local civilians of sympathizing with the enemy. It's been a problem for a long time and the army has been unable to get all of its officers and NCOs onboard with the need to stop this sort of violence from happening in the first place.

It began when troops surrounded a mosque believed used as a base by Boko Haram. More Islamic terrorists showed up and attacked the troops. Hours of shooting saw thousands of civilians flee the fishing village as the soldiers chased the Boko Haram men away. But there was apparently more to it than that. The soldiers accused Boko Haram of using civilians as human shields, which may have been the case. The army also has a long history of shooting at everyone in sight when attacked in an urban setting. The army says they killed 30 Islamic terrorists and lost one soldier and only six civilians died. Despite government efforts to control information coming out of Baga, it appears that over 150 civilians died as troops fired indiscriminately and set dozens of homes and businesses on fire. While journalists could be barred from the scene, senior politicians could force their way in and they reported seeing over 200 fresh graves and lots of angry and unhappy civilians.

May 3, 2013: In central Nigeria (Taraba state) at least thirty people died when fighting broke out between Christians and Moslems. The trigger was the funeral procession that went through a Moslem neighborhood, some of the young men saw this as a provocation and attacked the Christian mourners. The violence escalated until enough police could show up to calm things down.

May 5, 2013: In the north (Adamawa state) Boko Haram was believed behind an attack on a Christian village, which left six dead in a local market and four dead in a nearby church.

In central Nigeria (Nasarawa state) a tribal militia ambushed a police convoy that was seeking to arrest members of the militia that had been forcing locals to join them. At least twenty policemen were killed.

May 7, 2013: In the northeastern town of Bama, some 200 Boko Haram gunmen attacked the police station and a nearby prison. Some one hundred prisoners were released, most of them Boko Haram men. Over a hundred people died, about 40 of them police, soldiers, and prison staff.

While Islamic terrorists are difficult to find, oil thieves and their collaborators are easier to spot. The oil theft does not just take place in the Niger Delta (where the oil fields are) but throughout the country. There are other pipelines that carry refined product (especially diesel) and these are being plundered. The refined product is more profitable as you can sell it locally. This is risky, as you have to drive around in tanker trucks, always one unexpected encounter with the police away from prison or worse. Sometimes the cops will take a bribe and sometimes they will kill you and steal your stolen oil.

There are over 200 tribes in Nigerian, which adds another level of complexity for any government. While most of the tribes belong to half a dozen ethnically related coalitions, all consider themselves culturally different. Thus some tribes are very eager for Western education, economic progress, and honest government. Other tribes swing in the opposite direction. Local politicians succeed in part by getting to know how each tribe in their area operates and making the most of that knowledge. Boko Haram is exploiting the Islamic conservatism (or fanaticism) of many northern tribes, as well as xenophobia (fear of outsiders) that is common in the north.

Another problem with the Islamic terrorism is that it is largely confined to the Moslem north, where the economy and education levels are not as advanced as in the Christian south. The combination of ethnic and religious differences, in addition to the southerners having been in contact with the West longer, has left the north less educated and less able to deal with modern technological society. Thus the appeal of Boko Haram (whose name means, literally, "Western education is unholy") for many of the tribes in the north.

The war against Islamic terrorists (Boko Haram) in the north is not going well. The problem is with the security forces, which operate outside the law while trying to enforce it. The army and police, when faced with a major emergency (like the Boko Haram terror tactics) will react by arresting and torturing a lot of people (especially young men, the most likely Boko Haram recruits), often killing them and denying what had been done. While Westerners act horrified at such behavior, that sort of thing did not largely disappear from the West until the last century or two. When a Nigerian joins the police or army they tend to accept the "traditional" way of doing things. But there are good reasons why many such traditions have been replaced. Indiscriminate torture and murder is not the most efficient way to deal with an outbreak of Islamic terrorism. Many senior government officials understand this, but getting the security forces to change these deadly customs has been very difficult (as have efforts to root out corruption in the army and police). Meanwhile, the security forces are murdering several hundred civilians a month with these brutal and indiscriminate tactics.

May 9, 2013: In the last month Boko Haram violence in the north has left nearly 300 dead. More worrisome is that some of these attacks involved over a hundred armed men using what appeared to be military tactics and more discipline than the terrorists have demonstrated before. There has been some training going on and a lot of recruiting. The army has responded by being more violent to local civilians.

May 12, 2013: Boko Haram kidnapped the wife and daughter of a Supreme Court judge. This took place in southern Edo State (Benin City). The same judge had a son kidnapped last September and paid $190,000 to get him freed.

May 13, 2013: Boko Haram admitted that it is now deliberately kidnapping the wives and children of government officials (from jail guards to senior officials) to either force cooperation or just to obtain a lot of cash. With this tactic Boko Haram hopes to eventually be able to use the threat of kidnapping to force judges, prosecutors, and security force commanders to back off from going after the Islamic terrorists. Kidnapping, especially when families of corrupt officials are attacked, is popular with most Nigerians, as these thieves always seem to be able to buy their way out of prosecution for their crimes.

In central Nigeria (Kaduna and Benue states) continued violence between Christians and Moslems left at least 23 dead.

May 14, 2013: The government declared a state of emergency in the northeastern states of Borno, Yobe, and Adamawa. This is a form of martial law and makes it even easier for the security forces to do whatever they want. The state of emergency also allows the federal government to temporarily replace elected and appointed government officials. The three states affected are where most Boko Haram violence has been taking place.

May 15, 2013: Another 2,000 soldiers have been sent to the northern city of Maiduguri, which has long been the center of Boko Haram strength. More roadblocks are being established and more raids conducted in neighborhoods suspected of harboring Boko Haram. The problem is that most police and soldiers still use the same old tactics of rounding up young men and killing them because they might be Boko Haram members. This just angers more northerners and makes it easier for Boko Haram to recruit.

More armed members enable Boko Haram to enforce more of their lifestyle rules. For example, in Borno state Boko Haram has, so far this year, forced the closure of 30 percent of the secular schools in the state. Boko Haram has gone from setting fire to schools at night to attacking them during the day and murdering teachers.

May 16, 2013: Boko Haram is making a major effort to get more cash via extortion, kidnapping, and theft. The money is spent on weapons easily smuggled across the borders with Cameroon, Chad, and Niger in the north. Weapons are cheap at the moment because of stolen government stuff still arriving from Libya and al Qaeda Islamic terrorists fleeing Mali, eager to unload weapons they got out with for cash, so they can seek sanctuary somewhere. Boko Haram still has plenty of new recruits, as increased army and police activity in the north, in addition to Boko Haram attacks, has done a lot of economic damage and increased the unemployment rate. Both Boko Haram and the security forces are fighting a dirty war. Boko Haram deliberately hunts down and kills government officials (especially local police, prison staff, border guards, and the like). Soldiers and police are quick to pick anyone suspected (often with very little evidence) of being a member of Boko Haram or a sympathizer and later killing them.

May 19, 2013: The thousands of additional troops sent to Maiduguri have been busy. In the last 24 hours 14 Boko Haram men and three soldiers were killed in several gun battles. The city which has long been the center of Boko Haram strength and air force airplanes bombed suspected Boko Haram bases outside the city, as well as others near the international borders. Roads have been blocked, to prevent Boko Haram from sending reinforcements and twelve neighborhoods believed to be Boko Haram strongholds are cordoned off and being searched. This has triggered some of the gun battles.

May 20, 2013: In the last week security forces have arrested over 200 Boko Haram suspects. Most of those were taken in the last 24 hours.

May 21, 2013: The government announced that it would release all women Boko Haram suspects arrested, as well as some of the men. The government also announced that it is considering an amnesty program for Boko Haram members.

May 22, 2013: Tribal rebel group MEND in the Niger River Delta called off their plan to attack mosques and Moslem owned businesses when Christian religious leaders persuaded the group that this would make matters worse (by making it easier for Boko Haram to recruit among Moslems in the south).

This offensive has made better use of intelligence work and air power. Boko Haram had become bold and sloppy in the last year, often not trying to hide their rural bases. It was the same situation in city neighborhoods where Boko Haram had a lot of supporters, or the locals were too terrified to help the security forces. The police stayed back but took notes. As a result of all the intel the ground and air raids hit many Boko Haram base areas, causing thousands of Boko Haram men to flee with little baggage and few weapons. This is a setback but cell phones and determination will enable the Islamic terrorists to reorganize and resume their attacks.

The offensive in Maiduguri is similar to the one in 2009, that left over 800 dead and reduced Boko Haram activity for a year. But many innocents died in the last offensive and the security forces are under orders to minimize that this time around. There are fewer civilian losses this time around, but it will be a week or more before the exact number is known.

May 22, 2013: Chinua Achebe: Nigeria holds funeral for renowned author'

Obituary: Nigeria's literary giant Chinua Achebe, who died at the age of 82 on 21 March, 2013, was buried with pomp and pageantry in his hometown of Ogidi in Nigeria's South-eastern Anambra state on Thuresday, the culmination of a five-day funeral rites that started on Sunday. The Pan-african News Agency (PANA) reports that Professor Achebe's remains were interred at a private ceremony within his country home, witnessed only by the clergy, Presidents Goodluck Jonathan of Nigeria and John Dramane Mahama of Ghana, other dignitaries as well as his immediate family members. Dignitaries who attended the church service that preceded the burial included President Jonathan, President Mahama, former Nigerian Vice President Alex Ekwueme, Governors of states in the South-east and South-South, including host Governor Peter Obi of Anambra, ministers and other government officials.

Also in attendance was former Secretary-General of the Commonwealth Emeka Anyaoku, as well as a representative of the Archbishop of Canterbury The Archbishop of Aba, Ikechi Nwosu, gave the funeral sermon at St. Philips Anglican Church, the same Anglican church where Prof. Achebe worshipped for many years in his lifetime. Archbishop Nwosu described the late Achebe as 'a giant in the literary world', calling him a Christian, a man of social action whose whole life, from the cradle to the grave, was a parable. He said Prof. Achebe can never be buried, asking rhetorically: 'If you bury him now, what happens to 'Things Fall Apart' (his first novel); If you bury him now, what happens to 'There was a country' (his last novel). In his tribute, President Jonathan said he came to the funeral service to show appreciation to God for creating someone like Achebe, whom he called a philosopher.

President Goodluck Jonathan, who read from Achebe's last book, There Was a Country, announced that the governments of Nigeria and Ghana would rebuild the primary school that Achebe attended, St. Philips Central School in Ogidi, after Archbishop Nwosu had said the school remained the same as when the young Achebe attended President Mahama described Prof. Achebe as an icon of African literature 'who helped to shape my formation years with his epic writing'. He said though he never met Prof. Achebe, the late literary giant agreed to write a quote for his (Mahama's) book. He said he had agreed to deliver a lecture at Brown University in Boston, US, at the end of the year in memory of late Achebe. Chief Anyaoku also paid tribute to the man widely regarded as the father of modern African literature, saying he gave Africa its confidence through his works. 'The legacy of this man for Nigeria and Africa is a legacy that will serve this continent and the world's appreciation of this country for a long time to come,' he said. On behalf of the family, Achebe's first son, Dr. Ike Achebe, thanked all those who attended the ceremony.

The funeral rites for the late Achebe started in the Nigerian capital city of Abuja with a prayer session at the Ecumenical Centre, after which the activities moved to the Enugu Campus of the University of Nigeria, Nsukka, where he lectured before relocating to the United States. A special Senate session of the university was held in Achebe's honour, after which his remains - which arrived in the country on Tuesday - were then taken to Awka, capital of his native Anambra state, for the final rites before the burial. Until his death, Prof. Achebe was the David and Marianna Fisher University Professor and Professor of Africana Studies at Brown University in Boston, US. His most popular book was 'Things Fall Apart', though he wrote many other books. Source: AfriqueJet/News Informations

May 23, 2013: In the north (Borno State) over 10,000 civilians have fled their homes to escape air attacks against suspected Boko Haram camps. Some of these camps are in or near residential areas, and a lot of civilians were very close to the explosions and gunfire from ground troops. Many civilians living near the borders of Chad, Niger, or Cameroon have fled the country, as that is the only sure way to escape the air attacks. Boko Haram violence has caused nearly 4,000 deaths in the last four years, most of that has been in the last 18 months. Over 10,000 have been wounded and thousands are in jail, either convicted or accused of working for Boko Haram. In the northeastern city of Maiduguri a week of traffic blockades has reduced food and other shipments. Prices in the markets are up over 25 percent and there is a lot of unhappiness over this.

May 24, 2013: Pirates attacked another ship (a small tanker) off the coast and are believed to have looted the vessel and kidnapped some of the 17 man crew.

May 25, 2013: In the south police rescued four foreign oil workers (two Russians and two Ukrainians) kidnapped last April 22nd. In the north police have found and freed even more Nigerians who had been kidnapped for ransom (both by Boko Haram and local ghangsters).

May 26, 2013: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri police continue to round up Boko Haram members and confirmed that they had disrupted several planned attacks. In the last few days three Boko Haram men have been killed and 25 arrested in the city.

May 29, 2013: Police arrested three Lebanese men who admitted they were members of pro-Iran Lebanese Islamic terror group Hezbollah. The police also revealed they had seized a Hezbollah arms cache in the northern city of Kano. The police believe Iran is using Hezbollah to provide support for Boko Haram and that one of the three men arrested was caught trying to smuggle $60,000 into the country.

In the north police released 58 women and children taken into custody during recent raids on Boko Haram bases. Some of the children admitted that they had been paid to place bombs and scout for the adult terrorists but all 58 were granted amnesty. This gesture is part of an effort to get Boko Haram to negotiate a peace deal, something the Islamic terror group is still opposed to. Boko Haram leaders are angry about the recent army offensive and the heavy losses they have suffered (but deny and insist that the army was defeated). Admitting defeat would make Boko Haram much less effective because the group has terrorized much of the northeast largely because of its reputation of being able to hit anyone, anytime, anywhere (in the northeast at least). But now the army has killed or captured many Boko Haram members and caused the rest to scatter. That gives the locals some hope and the Boko Haram leadership fits.

May 30, 2013: In the southwest (Oyo State) customs police found over 56,000 rounds of ammunition hidden in goods being brought in from neighboring Benin. Smuggling is big business in Nigeria and the customs police are good at spotting illegal goods. Usually that means a bribe to let the goods pass but in the case of items that might get the cops killed (like ammo), it's more likely that the contraband will be seized (although other corrupt officials might make the stuff disappear from government custody and show up on the black market).

June 1, 2013: It appears that some Boko Haram members may have been involved in an unsuccessful attack on the main prison in the capital of neighboring Niger. Several Boko Haram men are held prisoner there.

What is known is that the army has halted cell phone service in much of the northeast, putting Boko Haram at a disadvantage because the army and police have their own radios to communicate with. The military says they also destroyed a Boko Haram hospital and fuel storage depot, as well as several training facilities. A lots of documents were captured as well, and these are still being studied and exploited. In response the United States has openly, and privately, asked the military to try and control their personnel and avoid the all-too-common killing of innocent civilians during these operations, as well as the frequent looting of their possessions.

The government arrested more than a hundred Boko Haram suspects and many of them did have a connection with Boko Haram, and some were willing to talk about it. By cross-checking the information provided it was possible to determine which was true and to what extent. Arrests are still being made and most Boko Haram members continue to be distracted by the need to avoid getting arrested.

June 2, 2013: Boko Haram is putting out positive spin on the Internet, insisting it was not hurt by the two week old government offensive. But there was a lot of damage and one result was a sharp reduction in Boko Haram attacks and their operations in general. On the down side, the government believes that most of those killed or arrested were new recruits and less skilled Boko Haram operatives. What the army really wants is the few hundred most experience Boko Haram members, who have the skills to build bombs and plan attacks. Over a hundred of these returned from Mali since February. There they tasted defeat by the French/Chad offensive that is still hunting for remaining Islamic terrorists in northern Mali. But for many months the Boko Haram in Mali tasted power as the Islamic radicals ran northern Mali, using Islamic law (sharia) and terror to get things done. Actually, all that sharia and bad behavior ruined the economy and sent several hundred thousand civilians fleeing. It's unclear if that made any impression on the Boko Haram Mali vets. They did return with a sense of urgency and the skills needed to increase attacks inside Nigeria.

June 3, 2013: The June 1st attack on the main prison in the capital of neighboring Niger was apparently a success after all, with at least 22 prisoners getting away. Several Boko Haram men were held prisoner there and Boko Haram was believed involved in the attack. Two prison guards, and several of the attackers, were killed during the fighting.

The U.S. announced $23 million dollars in rewards for senior al Qaeda and Boko Haram leaders in Africa.

In the south police arrested Jackson Fabouwei, the man suspected of planning an April attack in the Niger Delta that killed 11 policemen. Fabouwei is also suspected of stealing money meant for former rebels as part of the 2009 amnesty in the Niger Delta oil producing region.

June 6, 2013: The army believes it killed a Boko Haram leader, Abubakar Adam Kambar fifteen months ago. Kambar is one of three Boko Haram leaders the U.S. identified as international terrorists a year ago. The delay in this announcement was not explained.

June 7, 2013: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri a group of Boko Haram men sought to attack the headquarters of an anti-terrorist vigilante group by staging a fake funeral. They had a coffin full of weapons in the back of a pickup truck. When they arrived at their destination the Islamic terrorists grabbed their weapons from the coffin and began shooting at civilians. Soldiers quickly responded and eight of the ten Boko Haram died fighting. Soldiers then moved into the neighborhood the "funeral truck" had come from and that triggered more gun battles.

June 8, 2013: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri police and troops killed at least 16 Boko Haram men in the last two days. The government accused Boko Haram gunmen of killing 13 civilians in that time although locals said that civilian deaths were higher and many were killed by the security forces. There were some very loud gun battles recently, usually in residential areas. The security forces are searching known Boko Haram controlled neighborhoods for Boko Haram members and their supplies of weapons, explosives and equipment. The roads out of town are heavily guarded, so if any Boko Haram are escaping they are doing it with little of their gear. Even within Maiduguri there are lots of checkpoints, making it difficult for armed men to travel.

Cellphone networks remain shut down in the northeast. Two weeks without cell phones has put the terrorists at a big disadvantage because the army and police have their own radios as well as the ability to listen in to Boko Haram using commercial walkie talkies. Eventually the cell phones will be turned back on, if only to alleviate the economic damage the lack of phones is causing.

All that activity has caused over 6,000 civilians to flee across the nearby border into Niger and lesser numbers into Chad and Cameroon. The soldiers in particular have a reputation for shooting everyone in sight if they encounter resistance. Best to run before that happens to you. The three states comprise 155,000 square kilometers (60,000 square miles) and border Cameroon, Chad and Niger. Some civilians, and Boko Haram members (and their families) have crossed the border and police in those countries have a difficult time preventing it. Much of this area is semi-desert and thinly populated. Boko Haram still controls some rural villages and the security forces have a list of such places they must eventually visit. In the opening days of the campaign the air force bombed known Boko Haram camps out in the desert, and many survivors of those attacks fled across the border.

In the last four weeks the offensive against Boko Haram has led to hundreds of arrests in the states of Borno, Yobe and Adamawa (where a state of emergency still applies). Most of those arrested did prove to have a Boko Haram connection and the army is getting a better idea of the extent of the Islamic terrorist network in the area. Boko Haram has lost about a third of its strength in the area to death, desertion and capture. But potential recruits are still available, because the government isn’t doing much about the problems (corruption, inept government) that led to the growth of Boko Haram in the first place.

June 12, 2013: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri police and troops have allowed the formation of local vigilante groups to help in the hunt for Boko Haram members. These volunteers collect information on where suspected Boko Haram members are and, if the suspects are unarmed, seize and bring them to the police. Civilians don't want armed Boko Haram men in their neighborhoods, because when the soldiers come looking for Islamic terrorists and encounter resistance the entire area gets shot up, including any civilians who could not take cover. The vigilantes aren't pro-government as much as they are seeking to survive all this.

June 29, 2013: In central Nigeria (Jos) at least 48 people died because of violence between Christian and Moslem tribesmen.

June 30, 2013: In the southwest (Ondo state) at least twenty gunmen attacked a prison and freed 175 inmates. Two guards were killed during the attack, which involved explosives used to create a breach in the prison wall.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri vigilantes burned down the home of a senior politician believed to have ties to Boko Haram. Elsewhere in the area troops killed at least 40 men believed to be Boko Haram.

July 1, 2013: In the southwest (Ondo state) police recaptured 49 of the prisoners who escaped yesterday. Over two thirds of the 50,000 people being held in Nigerian prisons are awaiting trial. The Nigerians judicial system is notoriously slow, corrupt, and it doesn't work so well.

In central Nigeria (Jos) police report they have killed at least a hundred armed tribesmen who were on their way to steal cattle and attack villages of a rival tribe.

July 3, 2013: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, Boko Haram set off a roadside bomb, in an attempt to scare off civilian volunteers who were accompanying troops to help identify Boko Haram men in a neighborhood known to harbor many of the Islamic terrorists.

July 4, 2013: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, troops, with the help of local volunteers, prevented a Boko Haram attack on a police station. About two dozen Boko Haram men, disguised as women (wearing hijabs with weapons hidden beneath the layers of cloth) were detected before they could get into position. Three of the attackers were shot dead and twenty others caught and arrested. Boko Haram began trying to hide in female clothing because the civilian volunteers too often pick them out of crowds of civilians. But just wearing female clothing is not a perfect disguise, because men tend to be taller and move differently than women. In addition, wearing female clothing is looked down on by local custom and is seen as cowardly.

July 6, 2013: In the northeast (Yobe state) Boko Haram men attacked a boarding school and killed 42 students and teachers. Most of the students died when they were locked in their dormitory which was then set on fire. Boko Haram shot dead any who tried to get out. This was believed to be in retaliation for an army raid two days earlier that had killed 22 Boko Haram men.

July 7, 2013: In the northeast (Yobe state) officials ordered all high (secondary) schools closed until the new term begins in September. This is to deny Boko Haram any more targets for their school attacks.

July 8, 2013: Britain has decided to ban Boko Haram (and a smaller spinoff group) as international terrorists. This will make it very difficult for Boko Haram to raise money, recruit, or operate at all in Britain.

July 9, 2013: Unable to hit well defended military and government targets, Boko Haram has recently concentrated on schools. In the last month nearly fifty teachers and students have been killed and several schools damaged by fire and explosives. This is not the first time Boko Haram has gone after schools. Last year they burned down several. But those were night attacks that caused few casualties. Now they are going after students and teachers and killing them. Boko Haram literally means "Western education is forbidden" but most Boko Haram members direct their violence against non-Moslems and government officials. Because of several months of intense army and police action in the center of Boko Haram activity in the northeast, the Islamic terrorist organization has lost nearly a thousand members to arrest or combat and most Boko Haram bases and safe houses have been captured. Civilian volunteer groups have become common, and some of them are armed and willing to go after individual or small groups of Boko Haram. Apparently attacking students and teachers engaged in forbidden activity (Western education) is seen as a convenient way to get a lot of attention. But this strategy is backfiring as most northeasterners (and Nigerian Moslems in general) prefer Western education because it helps kids to get ahead in life. Boko Haram initially won wide popular support because of their vows to fight corruption and use Islamic (Sharia) law to prevent corruption. Boko Haram has been largely ineffective against corruption and Sharia law is not all that popular. There is still a lot of anger among the young men in the north, but only a small minority support Boko Haram and that minority is getting smaller as more civilians die from Boko Haram violence. But two months of military activity in the northeast is also unpopular because travel is restricted (by many checkpoints) and wireless phone service has been shut down. There are few landline phones and satellite phones are forbidden (but difficult to police) as well.

Unlike the tribal gangs who were tearing up the Niger River Delta oil region a decade ago, the Boko Haram leadership are much more resistant to working out a peace deal. With the tribal gangs in the delta the government was able to greatly reduce the violence with amnesty and cash payments (many of which continue). Boko Haram are religious extremists and not attracted to that sort of thing. Worse, most Boko Haram leaders will not even agree to talk. They want a religious (Islamic) dictatorship for all of Nigeria and at the moment will settle for nothing less. Many southerners are willing to proceed with a fight to the death, but many northerners are not. That's mainly because the army and police tend to kill a lot of innocent bystanders during their operations. This bad behavior has long been a problem and now that it is getting more international attention the government is putting more pressure on the military commanders to do something about it. Unfortunately, there is no quick fix for a problem that is caused by a long tradition of poor supervision at the lowest levels, inadequate training, and corruption at the top that prevents workable reforms.

The army is having morale problems with its troops assigned to anti-terrorist operations in the northeast. The troops are angry mainly because such assignments are supposed to last only three months at a time before returning them to their bases (and families, friends, and less dangerous duty). Some troops have been in the northeast for eight months and the army has not said when rotations will resume. The troops feel it is unfair because other army units have remained at their bases all through the Boko Haram crises instead of relieving some of the battalions that have gone north and been stuck there. The troops would like to get a few months at home before going north again but the army wants to keep experienced (in operating in the northeast against Boko Haram) troops in action for as long as possible. Many troops appreciate that, but a growing number do not.

July 11, 2013: In the northwest (Sokoto city) police fought a five hour gun battle with Boko Haram members, killing one of them. Sokoto has largely been free of Boko Haram violence in the last year, in part because the senior Islamic clerics are anti-Boko Haram and very outspoken about it.

July 12, 2013: The military announced that they would soon restore cell phone service in Adamawa state, one of the three states that had service shut down as part of the recent offensive against Boko Haram. There was no indication of when cell phone service would be restored in Yobe and Borno states. Adamawa has been pretty quiet since the initial offensive operations but there is still violence in Yobe and Borno. People in all three states want their cell phone service back and a reduction in the number of roadblocks.

July 14, 2013: Boko Haram leader Abubakar Shekau released a ten minute video on the Internet in which he approved of the July 6 Boko Haram slaughter of 42 students and teachers at a boarding school. Abubakar Shekau promised more such attacks and denounced Western education. Shekau did, however, insist that he did not order the July 6 attack and insisted it was not Boko Haram policy to slaughter children. Destroying schools and killing teachers was, however, encouraged.

July 16, 2013: In the north (Jigawa state) soldiers raided a home and arrested three Boko Haram members. Four loaded AK-47 rifles were also found.

Off the coast (in the Gulf of Guinea) kidnapping of sailors (usually officers) for ransom has increased. In the first six months of the year 30 such hostages were taken. These kidnappings are usually part of a robbery of anything portable the gangsters can find on the ship. The Nigerian government is under pressure to increase security off shore and go after the Nigerian gangs more aggressively. If this is not done, shippers will pass on the higher costs to Nigerian customers.

In the northeastern city of Maiduguri police and soldiers continue to search pro-Boko Haram neighborhoods and have found many underground bunkers and tunnels linking several buildings together. There have also been some mass graves found, containing the bodies of Boko Haram victims. There is still a lot of Boko Haram weapons and equipment in these neighborhoods, which is why the security forces continue to maintain their network of checkpoints around the cities. If Boko Haram men can slip back in, there are still caches of weapons and equipment they can use. Finding all the caches may take weeks, or longer. There are still some active Boko Haram members in cities like Maiduguri, as well as people (including women and children) still being held in terrorist hideouts. Finding the armed Boko Haram men results in brief firefights while captives encountered are questioned and released to their families.

The army and police have been raiding the homes of Boko Haram leaders and searching for weapons and terrorism related documents and equipment. Over a hundred of these kin have been arrested, although most were released after questioning. Some of those arrested are believed more involved with Boko Haram than they will admit.

July 17, 2013: The government believes the two month old military offensive against Boko Haram has destroyed most of the terrorist bases and safe houses but most of the full-time Boko Haram and the leadership got away and are rebuilding. Patrols in rural areas are less productive because those areas, especially along the Cameroon border, are thinly populated and forested. There are plenty of places to hide.

July 19, 2013: Because of the need for troops to use against Boko Haram in the north, the army is withdrawing 1,200 soldiers from Sudan, where they have been serving as peacekeepers. A similar number of Nigerian peacekeepers will also be withdrawn from Mali. This is a problem for African peacekeeping missions because Nigeria has long been a supplier of high-quality (by African standards) troops for this work.

July 21, 2013: The government has ordered police and soldiers be assigned to all prisons holding Boko Haram suspects. These forces will be responsible for an outer ring of security outside the prison to make it more difficult to stage raids on prisons. There have been a growing number of these raids, which usually succeed in freeing some or all of the Boko Haram men held in the target prison.

An epidemic of piracy has developed off the Nigerian coast (the Gulf of Guinea) and the criminal gangs expanding their activities or entering the business have more than tripled the number of ships hit this year. There are now two or three attacks a week and the pirates are becoming more thorough in stripping a ship of valuable portable items and even kidnapping ship's officers and taking them to hideouts ashore to be held for ransom. The gangs are apparently advised by expert fences on what equipment to look for because some of these expensive shipboard electronics are showing up for sale in other parts of the world. The fences ship (or sell via the Internet) the stuff out of Africa to where it will get a better price. As a result, the pirates are gaining more money per ship raided and that persuades more land-based gangs to give piracy a try. There are plenty of tankers and other merchant ships in the Gulf of Guinea and not all are paying attention to warnings about improving security. While the Somali pirates could gain larger ransoms (sometimes over $10 million per ship) they have not been able to grab a ship in over a year because of more aggressive naval patrols and tighter security on the big ships. That has not happened on the west coast, and the gangs are happy if they can net several hundred thousand dollars in loot (including cargo transferred at sea to a pirate owned freighter or tanker) and ransoms per ship raided. The shipping companies have to pay higher insurance premiums and deal with lower crew morale and are now incurring higher operating costs because of the need for better security. All these additional costs are passed on to the countries adjacent to the Gulf of Guinea in the form of higher shipping rates.

The military has restored cell phone service to all three of the northern states in the last week. This was in recognition of the fact that Boko Haram had been able to adapt to the lack of cell phones (using walkie-talkies and couriers) while civilians were still at a major disadvantage. Boko Haram was taking advantage of the population not being able to quickly call police and report criminal activity. So the Islamic terrorists are not happy with the restored cell phone service. For most people the return of phone service means life, and the economy, can get back to normal.

July 25, 2013: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri, members of the CJTF caught and killed a notorious Boko Haram member and burned him to death (in retaliation for the Boko Haram man earlier burning a soldier to death). No arrests were made.

July 25, 2013: As Boko Haram was driven from areas they had dominated for years a lot of bad behavior was revealed. These were places where police did not patrol, either because it was one of the many out-of-the-way areas not easy to get to or neighborhoods the police avoid because the locals are hostile and too much trouble. In these suburban neighborhoods and villages all who opposed Boko Haram were killed or forced to flee. With only a pro-Boko Haram population in the area, Boko Haram set up base areas, and when soldiers moved in they found that the Islamic terrorists murdered hundreds in order to compel obedience. Some of the victims were people who had been kidnapped for ransom but the family could not raise the money demanded. Boko Haram simply murdered the hostages (often women and children) and buried the bodies in common graves. Boko Haram was particularly harsh against non-Moslems, including kidnapping teenage girls and forcing them to convert to Islam. The girls were held captive in the homes of Moslem clerics during this process and soldiers freed several of these girls during their house searches.

July 28, 2013: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram surprised a group of pro-government militia who arrived at a village to search for the terrorists. Boko Haram was there all right but they were heavily armed and killed about two dozen civilians (both militiamen and locals). Over the last few months northeastern Borno and Yobe states have seen thousands of Moslem and Christian young men joining a pro-government militia called the CJTF (Civilian JTF or Joint Task Force, after the military organization of the same name) to provide security from Boko Haram violence and provide information to the security forces about where Boko Haram members are and where they are living. In response, Boko Haram openly declared war on Civilian JTF members and threatened to come to their homes and kill them. Most Civilian JTF members cover their faces while assisting the security forces. While this threat certainly terrified some Civilian JTF members (who generally have no firearms), the leadership publicly defied the Boko Haram threats. The Civilian JTF often operate with heavily armed police or soldiers nearby (ready to move in and arrest Boko Haram suspects the vigilantes identify or fire back if Boko Haram attack). The army has begun to use the volunteers to replace troops at checkpoints. There are still some armed soldiers nearby, in case Boko Haram tries to attack the civilians, but this new policy has enabled more checkpoints to be set up and more thorough searches of vehicles to be conducted. This made it more difficult for Boko Haram to move around, plan, and carry out attacks or to resupply the few men they still have in the cities. All this CJTF activity also made Boko Haram very mad and ready to kill CJTF members whenever they had the chance.

July 29, 2013: In the northeast (Yobe state) Boko Haram gunmen raided a construction site at night and made off with 125 kg (275 pounds) of explosives. Over two months of army and police raids in the northeast have captured most of the bomb making materials Boko Haram had accumulated, and more raids like this are expected as the surviving Boko Haram men rebuild their supply and bomb building network. Elsewhere in the northeast (Kano) Boko Haram bombed three churches in a Christian neighborhood, leaving over 40 dead. Attacks like this are part of a Boko Haram effort to drive all non-Moslems from the largely Moslem north.

July 30, 2013: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri the first hundred troops from the Nigerian peacekeeper force in Mali flew in to help with operations against Boko Haram. The Nigerian peacekeeping battalion is being withdrawn from Mali to deal with the Boko Haram problem in areas around Maiduguri. That battalion of 800 troops will be brought back over several weeks. Elsewhere in the northeast Boko Haram death squads in Bui (185 kilometers south of Maiduguri) murdered eight secular teachers and anti-terrorism clerics.

The army has a growing problem with morale among troops who have been deployed in peacekeeping missions and the Moslem northeast for long periods (in some cases two years). These men leave their families and bases behind and are getting homesick. While peacekeeping missions bring with it extra pay, service in the northeast does not. Moreover, the operations against Boko Haram is a lot more dangerous than foreign peacekeeping missions. The army leadership is tinkering with incentives (more leave and money) to deal with this growing problem.

In northeast Nigeria troops from neighboring Niger and Chad are cooperating with Nigerian security forces to make it more difficult for Boko Haram to cross the borders. The Islamic terrorists had been establishing bases in thinly populated parts of Niger and Chad, close to the border, so the Boko Haram men had someplace safe to flee to after an attack. This has led to the destruction of several Boko Haram camps and the arrest of some of the terrorists including, yesterday, one of their leaders in Niger. But these border areas are sparsely populated and have plenty of places to hide.

The crackdown in the northeast has led some Boko Haram members to flee from the region and try to establish themselves in Moslem communities in the south. This has not worked out so well because the Moslems in the south are a minority and have so far been spared much retaliation by Christians angry over the persecution up north. So, the Boko Haram men find local Moslems quick to let the police know terrorists are in the area. Thus, in the southwest (Lagos and Ogun states), over 40 suspected Boko Haram suspects have been arrested in the last week.

August 2, 2013: The twelve week old offensive against Boko Haram has forced the Islamic radical group to depend more on terrorism, often outside major cities like Maiduguri. Schools and Christians in the countryside have been hard hit in the last two months. There are not a lot of attacks, because there aren't many Boko Haram out in the thinly populated countryside. But eventually news of these attacks makes its way back to the mass media and get publicized more widely. In the last few weeks Boko Haram terrorists have been getting back into the cities and resuming attacks on schools and Christians. Over 100,000 Christians have fled their homes in the northeast in the last few years, most of them recently. Many Moslems in the north have turned against Boko Haram because of this anti-Christian campaign, in part because northern Moslems often have kin living (as a Moslem minority) in the south. So far there has not been much retaliation against Moslems in the south, but with each Christian death in the north the outbreak of retaliation in the south becomes more likely.

The military also revealed two Boko Haram revenge attacks over the weekend in the northeast (Borno state). On Sunday a mosque was attacked and 44 civilians were killed because the Islamic radicals believed the mosque members were providing the police with information. The day before Boko Haram attacked a nearby village and killed twelve civilians for the same reason.

August 13, 2013: In the northeast (Adamawa state) troops raided a Boko Haram hideout, killed two leaders, and captured six other Islamic terrorists. Four other Boko Haram were believed to have escaped. Weapons, ammo, and cash were seized.

August 14, 2013: The army revealed that troops had killed the number two leader of Boko Haram during an August 4th clash that left 18 of the Islamic terrorists dead.

August 15, 2013: In the northeast (Borno state) some fifty Boko Haram men drove into the rural town of Damboa and opened fire killing eleven soldiers and civilians before they drove away. The army brought up more troops to find the attackers, who appeared to have dispersed after they left the town.

August 16, 2013: In the northeast (Gombe state) police battled armed Boko Haram men, killing seven of them and pursuing others.

In the Niger River Delta the navy conducted a raid on a remote waterway where pirates were hiding a small tanker they had hijacked. Twelve of the pirates were killed and four captured. The tanker was carrying 17,000 tons of vehicle fuel that the pirates were seeking to sell into the black market. They erred in believing they could keep the tanker hidden from aerial reconnaissance.

August 18, 2013: The army announced it is organizing a new army division (the 7th Infantry Division) that will be stationed in Maiduguri, the capital of Borno state. This indicates the army is treating Boko Haram as a long-term problem while also dealing with the morale problems of troops being away from their home bases for so long.

August 20, 2013: In the northeast (Kaduna state) gunmen battled with police, killing three of them. The attackers were believed to be heavily armed Boko Haram men, apparently seeking to do a little armed robbery for the cause.

August 21, 2013: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked a police station, killing two policemen while losing seven of their own and being repulsed. Elsewhere in Borno Boko Haram gunmen attacked the home of an anti-Boko Haram militia leader killing four people.

The oil industry issued a clarification to the data used by the media and government about how much oil is lost to theft. It is generally believed that 490,000 barrels of oil are stolen from pipelines each day. Oil industry officials point out that their records indicate only about 400,000 barrels a day are disappearing because of the thieves punching holes in the pipelines and most (over 85 percent) of that oil is not taken but ends up in the water or ground. The thieves are only getting away with, at most, 50,000 barrels a day. The wasted oil is a major source of pollution that the oil companies, not the thieves, get blamed for.

The government is under growing pressure in the Christian south to do something about the continuing attacks on Christians in the north. So far, there have been few retaliatory attacks on the Moslem minority in the south. This despite the fact that at least fifty churches have been attacked up there since last year and nearly 400 Christians killed. Outside of churches Boko Haram has attacked Christians over 30 times killing nearly 200.

The army is claiming that troops may have shot the Boko Haram leader (Abubakar Sheka) during one of several clashes with the Islamic terrorists between July 25th and August 3 rd, and intelligence indicates that Sheka probably died of his wounds. In effect, the military is challenging Boko Haram to provide “proof of life” for Abubakar Sheka (as in an Internet video that clearly took place very recently). Not all army intel analysts are convinced that Sheka is injured, but all agree that putting this challenge out there forces Boko Haram to do something that might provide more information on what shape they are in and what they are up to. Boko Haram already released one video on August 13th that featured someone trying to pass himself off as Sheka. This was not widely accepted as authentic. Reports from Cameroon indicate that a badly wounded Sheka was brought to a Boko Haram camp on the Cameroon side of the border in early August. Cameroon security officials are having a hard time following up on that because the border is sparsely populated, the Boko Haram camps hard to find, and the Islamic terrorists are heavily armed and have no problem with killing curious Cameroon police or soldiers who show up uninvited.

August 22, 2013: Boko Haram has been reduced to guerilla tactics and having problems surviving. The three years of violence turned most of the civilian population against the Islamic radicals, who have done little to curb corruption and improve the lives of northern Moslems. Instead, the Islamic radicals have led to thousands of deaths and, worst of all, disrupted the economy. The drier north was always less affluent than the south, even before the discovery of oil. Half the oil wealth was supposed to come north, and it did. But most of that was stolen by corrupt politicians and northerners have little to show for it. Boko Haram was supposed to change this but the Islamic radicals seemed more intent on forcing people to live as medieval Moslems than as more affluent and less corrupt Nigerians. So now Boko Haram is at war with just about everyone up north. They have to steal to survive and are seen as a bunch of religious bigots operating as bandits. There are still lots of unemployed young men willing to join Boko Haram and that won't change until a lot more of the armed Islamic radicals get killed. This may well take several years to work itself out.

August 24, 2013: A court charged two local men with working for Iran to help (with Iranian agents) to plan attacks against Israeli targets in Nigeria. The two were arrested last February.

August 25, 2013: Off the coast a navy patrol boat encountered a boat full of pirates who refused to surrender. After a brief gun battle six pirates were dead and one captured, along with the pirate boat. In the last two weeks police have killed eighteen pirates and arrested five in similar incidents.

August 29, 2013: In Central Nigeria (Jos) a group of armed Boko Haram men stopped a bus and killed five passengers who admitted they were Christian. Some of the killers were Fulani tribesmen. Some of the more radical Fulani have always been attracted to Boko Haram and now appear to have joined, or simply took to calling themselves, Boko Haram.

August 30, 2013: The government believes it is weakening Boko Haram and that by keeping the pressure on they will eventually crush the Islamic terrorist organization.

August 31, 2013: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram made several attacks on pro-government groups in the last few days, killing at least fifty people. The army is encouraging the formation of civilian militias to help find Boko Haram camps. The problem here is that Boko Haram is better armed than these civilian vigilantes and has taken to seeking out and killing the pro-government groups in an effort to discourage such activity. The army advises the civilian militias to not go looking for Boko Haram without armed soldiers accompanying them. The civilian groups sometimes go out without waiting for their armed escort and that does not end well if they make contact with Boko Haram. The vigilante activity has made the cities too dangerous for Boko Haram and most of the Islamic radicals are now out in the countryside. The army can usually kill or capture any Boko Haram group they can find, but the northeast is a big area and there's plenty of forests and bush out in the countryside where the Islamic terrorists can hide.

September 2, 2013: Tribal violence continues. In the north (Kaduna state) a village was attacked by a gang of twenty armed Faluni men, who killed at least ten Atakad people. Police later arrested six Fulani in the area as they shed bloody clothing and prepared to drive off. The tribal violence has been going on for as long as anyone can remember. The Atakad are farmers while the Fulani tend herds of cattle and tend to be Moslem, while the Atakad tend to be Christian. The two groups constantly argue over land and water.

In the north (Kaduna state) civilians are continuing to protest the police practice of randomly making arrests in areas where police or soldiers have been attacked. Even when it's obvious that those arrested could not have had anything to do with a particular attack, the police will not release them or admit making an error.

The outbreak of Boko Haram violence in the north and the documenting of the extent of oil revenue loss ($6 billion a year, at least) from theft down south has caused a split in the ruling Peoples Democratic Party (PDP). There is a lot more enthusiasm about suppressing corruption since decades of dictatorship ended in 1999, but not a lot of progress in curbing this bad behavior. There has been a lot more exposure of the massive fraud and theft, largely fueled by half a century of oil revenue. Many Nigerians take comfort in that trend but are also dismayed at how entrenched the corruption is and how resistant to change many prominent and powerful Nigerians are. Some of the new political parties are run by corrupt politicians while others are reformers and there seems no quick end to this struggle.

Too many oil theft related arrests in the Niger Delta usually involve shutting down oil theft operations that do not have a politician sponsor (who takes a cut of the profits for providing protection). The foreign oil companies that run the drilling and pipeline operations are threatening to leave if something is not done about the oil theft gangs. The stealing has been so serious that daily production fell from 2.3 million barrels a day to 2.1 million earlier this year. This is despite efforts to increase production. The government hoped to increase production to 3.7 million barrels a day. The previous peak was 2.6 million barrels a day seven years ago (before the Niger Rebels got going and oil theft became a much larger problem).

It proved impossible to get back to 2.6 million because of the growing oil theft. Production might get back to 2.4 million barrels a day, but the oil theft is now all the rage in the Niger Delta and the popular enthusiasm for it is not slowing down.

Efforts to halt oil theft in the Niger Delta continue to fail, despite very active military efforts to find oil thieves out in the swamps, arrest them, and seize their boats and crude oil refineries. The problem, as always, is the corruption. Who guards the guards? Boats seized by the troops are sometimes spotted back in use by other gangs of oil thieves. When arrested, oil thieves complain that their efforts are nothing compared to what the politicians and oil companies steal. There's a certain amount of truth to that but the oil thieves who tap into pipelines waste 70 percent of the oil that comes out of those punctures. These oil thieves live in the area and now they are the major source of oil pollution.

September 4, 2013: Because of the continued popularity of Islamic conservatism (as a cure for the corruption and other ills Nigerians suffer from) in the north, there are still new recruits for Boko Haram. But this enthusiasm for Boko Haram is declining and the Islamic radical group is spending more of its time trying to terrorize fellow Moslems (to discourage cooperation with the police). This means fewer attacks on Christians or the security forces. Many Nigerian Moslems are coming to realize that the Taliban approach (which Boko Haram is trying to emulate) is actually a cure worse than the disease. Boko Haram seeks to emulate the 1990s Afghan Taliban and take over the country to cure its problems with a strict Islamic religious dictatorship. Unlike the Taliban, Boko Haram is operating in a country where only about half the population is Moslem and a growing number of those Moslems are becoming very hostile to the Boko Haram solution.

September 5, 2013: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked two towns in the last two days, seeking out and killing twenty men suspected of belonging to pro-government militias.

September 6, 2013: In the south (River state) police claimed major success against kidnapping gangs, which have become a major problem. Police say the crime rate has been reduced because of operations against these specialized gangs. Of 16 kidnappings reported to police recently, police found and rescued nine of the victims, although another two were killed by their captors. The raids seized 38 guns, a lot of other equipment, and twenty stolen vehicles. Sixteen kidnappers have been killed and 63 others arrested.

September 8, 2013: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked a town that had formed an anti-Boko Haram militia, killing twelve of the militiamen. Five Islamic terrorists were killed as well.

September 10, 2013: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram has attacked twice in the last two days, killing 56 civilians in an effort to intimidate civilians and discourage the formation of defense (against Boko Haram) militias.

September 11, 2013: In the north (Borno state) the army found and destroyed two Boko Haram camps and then pursued the fleeing terrorists, calling in an air strike to halt the fleeing gunmen and allow troops to catch up with them. Some fifty Boko Haram members were killed in these operations.

President Johnson fired nine of his ministers because of a split in the ruling party and opposition to him running for another term in 2015. The outbreak of Boko Haram violence in the north and the documenting of the extent of oil revenue loss ($6 billion a year, at least) from theft down south has caused a split in the ruling Peoples Democratic Party (PDP). There is a lot more enthusiasm about suppressing corruption now, especially since decades of dictatorship ended in 1999. People are frustrated because there has been a lot of talk from politicians but not a lot of progress in curbing this bad behavior. In the last few years there has been a lot more exposure of the massive fraud and theft, largely fueled by half a century of oil revenue. Many Nigerians take comfort in that trend but are also dismayed at how entrenched the corruption is and how resistant to change many prominent and powerful Nigerians are. Some of the new political parties are run by corrupt politicians while others are reformers, and there seems no quick end to this struggle. The vice president and seven state governments formed the New PDP in late August. Unfortunately, the New PDP seems more interested in power than in clean government. The corruption provides the cash that enables politicians to get elected (via bribes and intimidation, in addition to advertising and hiring campaign workers). The more you can steal the more secure your hold on power is. Another big problem for corrupt politicians these days is the tendency of courts coming after them when they leave office (and lose their immunity from prosecution). It used to be possible to flee the country with your loot, but now many countries will arrest and extradite you back to Nigeria if a Nigerian court makes a convincing case against you.

Using the many documents seized during the early weeks of the offensive against Boko Haram, the government has sent banks throughout the country a list of people and organizations believed to have opened bank accounts for the terrorist funds (mostly from robbery and extortion). When found the accounts have been frozen. Nigerian, and American, intelligence are going over all the names found during these raids, looking for people with any prior terrorist connections. American assistance is largely limited to intelligence but that is proving very damaging to Boko Haram finances and communications. Boko Haram is not dead, but it is badly hurt and could still recover.

September 12, 2013: Boko Haram related violence in the north has left nearly 200 people dead in the last month. Over 1,700 have died in the last three years. The four month old army offensive in the north has driven Islamic terrorists from the cities and they are now being hunted in the countryside with the help of pro-government militias. Boko Haram quickly sensed that the local volunteers were a major threat, as they were often young men who knew the area around their villages well and thus often knew where Boko Haram was hiding in the forests and bush. That, coupled with the aircraft and helicopters the military had, meant the Boko Haram men have been forced to spend most of their time trying to stay hidden, or raiding rural towns and villages to kill the "vigilantes" (as some call the pro-government militias, who are often unarmed) to discourage this sort of cooperation with the army. That is working in some cases, but in others it just creates more anger. Boko Haram is really polarizing opinion up north, with most people wanting the Islamic terrorists gone or just dead.

September 25, 2013: Boko Haram leader Abubakar Shekau appeared on a new video on the Internet to refute army claims that they had killed him during a June 30th raid. Abubakar Shekau encourages attacks on schools and killing teachers, although he has urged his followers to avoid killing children. The army responded to the new video by pointing out that the man claiming to be Abubakar Shekau was not clearly shown and his voice could not be clearly heard.

In the northeast (Yobe state) Boko Haram attacked a Christian church, killing the clergyman and two children and burning down the church.

September 26, 2013: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen attacked twice in the past two days near the Cameroon border, killing twenty-seven civilians. These were pure terror attacks meant to discourage civilians from opposing Boko Haram or assisting the government.

September 27, 2013: A Nigerian Islamic terrorist group (Ansaru) released a video to prove that a French engineer they had kidnapped last December was still alive and ready to be exchanged for a large ransom. France will not pay because they know the money will fund more terrorism and encourage more kidnappings. Ansaru (for Ansarul Muslimina Fi Biladis Sudan or "Vanguards for the Protection of Muslims in Black Africa") is a Boko Haram splinter group that has become more active recently after first declaring its existence in 2012. Ansaru objects to the Boko Haram tactics of killing lots of Moslems and wants to concentrate on attacks that only kill foreigners or non-Moslem Nigerians. It is unclear how large Ansaru is and how much violence within Boko Haram, if any, will result from the split. It is believed that there is considerable strife between Boko Haram leaders, with many strong-willed men, each with an armed following, trying to control the entire movement. At the moment most of these disagreements are put aside. Ansaru appears to be very small, perhaps only a hundred or so members, and more interested (than Boko Haram) in working closely with Islamic terror groups operating elsewhere in Africa. This may encourage other extremist factions in Boko Haram to split off and create even more radical and violent groups like Ansaru.

In the north (Yobe state) two dozen armed men, dressed as soldiers, arrived at a rural college at night. Students and staff who saw the armed men drive up thought it was soldiers arriving to protect the school from Boko Haram men known to be operating in the area. But the armed men were Boko Haram and they began to shoot at anyone they could find. The gunmen killed forty-two people before all the surviving students and staff had fled into the nearby forests. Most of the students were asleep when the shooting began and some were killed in their sleep. All the victims were Moslem. The gunmen destroyed some school property, did some looting, and left.

September 29, 2013: In the southeast (Benue state) tribal violence left over thirty dead in the last two days. It began on the 28th, when nomadic Faluni attacked a farming village and killed ten. The Idoma farmers got organized and the next day attacked a Fulani camp, killing over twenty. This sort of tribal violence has been going on for as long as anyone can remember. The Idoma are farmers, while the Fulani tend herds of cattle and are usually Moslem, while the Idona are largely Christian. The two groups constantly argue over land and water.

October 1, 2013: The Boko Haram terror campaign in the northeast (mainly Borno state) has killed nearly three-hundred in the last month and is mainly done to discourage civilians from opposing the Islamic terrorists or assisting the security forces or government defense measures (like local armed defense militias). Boko Haram has also been doing a lot of looting. In the last few months this has included thousands of cattle and goats, plus whatever manufactured goods they can haul away. Vehicles and fuel are also sought, as well as young women (for housekeeping and whatever). The army is having a hard time tracking down the Boko Haram camps, although those that are found are destroyed. In those cases the terrorists usually spot the oncoming troops and flee.

October 3, 2013: In the northeast (Yobe and Borno states) troops seeking the Boko Haram men who recently attacked a college campus (and killed fifty students and faculty) killed a few armed men and arrested fifteen suspected Boko Haram members. Also captured were weapons and several bombs, which were later destroyed by engineers (by detonating them a safe distance from anyone).

October 5, 2013: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen attacked a mosque, killing seven worshippers. Nearby soldiers soon arrived, went after the fleeing Boko Haram men, and caught up with them. The ensuing gun battle left about twenty Islamic terrorists dead, although some also got away.

October 6, 2013: In the northeast (Borno state) soldiers pursued Boko Haram gunmen and soon caught up with some of them them. Air force aircraft spotted a Boko Haram convoy and attacked it. Also found was one of the remote camps attackers were operating from. This was bombed from the air and ground troops followed up. All this left about thirty Islamic terrorists dead, although some also got away. Boko Haram losses were heavy in terms of vehicles, weapons, and equipment.

While Nigerian Moslems have turned against Boko Haram, local Christians (half the population, most living in the south where the oil is) have hated Boko Haram from the beginning and are striving mightily to prevent large scale anti-Moslem violence. Boko Haram is quite vocal about its desire to drive all Christians out of the north and force all Nigerian Christians to become Moslems, on pain of death. So far Christian politicians and religious leaders have managed to prevent large scale anti-Moslem violence, but if Boko Haram is able to pull off a few more attacks that produce a lot of dead Christians that might change.

Boko Haram has lost most of the public support it once had and is at war with the people it claims to serve. Many northern Moslems still want less corruption and government incompetence but have come to see the Boko Haram approach as a cure that is worse than the disease. Meanwhile, Boko Haram continues to attract that small percentage of fanatic young men you find in any population. Boko Haram is now forced to use terror to get civilians to cooperate. A nasty side effect of this is a casual attitude towards civilian casualties. Moslem women and children killed in the course of terrorist operations were called "involuntary martyrs" and usually no effort is made to apologize or compensate their families. In most cultures this sort of behavior is considered impolite, and this has not gone over well in the Moslem world at large. Few Boko Haram leaders are able or willing to cope with this popular view of the Islamic radicals being killers and unfeeling brutes. Some senior leaders understand that these thuggish attitudes have to change, but no one has yet come up with a practical way to get it done. It’s not just the many civilian deaths but the inability of Boko Haram leaders to understand the importance of efficiently governing areas they control. It is not enough to impose law and order and Islamic law, you also had to take care of basics like water supplies and sanitation. Ignoring this means that Islamic rule would never last long. This pattern has repeated itself time and again in the last decade and the end result is always growing public rejection of the Islamic radicals who are doing it all "for the people."

The continuing Boko Haram attacks have concentrated on schools, leaving over seventy teachers and a hundred students dead and at least a hundred schools destroyed. Most of this damage has been done in the last few months. This has caused over ten-thousand students to be taken out of school and over a thousand teachers have quit and seek other careers or move out of the area to take a teaching job in a safer area. Boko Haram has also attacked mosques where there is a lot of anti-Boko Haram activity, in an effort to get Islamic clergy that preach against Islamic terrorism to shut up. All this terrorism has had the desired effect on the people in the northeast, making everyone afraid. But many are either quietly informing on the Islamic radicals or joining self-defense and vigilante organizations.

October 8, 2013: Although Boko Haram has suffered heavy losses (in personnel, weapons, and equipment) over the last few months the Islamic terrorists have managed to keep killing and terrorizing people in the three northeastern states where they are most active. The heavy police and military presence in the area has driven the Islamic terrorists from the cities, but now Boko Haram seems intent on disrupting rural life and the roads that connect the major urban areas. All this has disrupted the economy and the daily lives of millions.

October 8, 2013: In central Nigeria (Plateau state) tribal violence left over 16 dead when Fulani cattle thieves raided a village, killed 10 civilians and were in turn attacked by police, who killed 6 of the fleeting Fulani. The victims of these raids are often Christian farmers, while the Fulani, who tend herds of cattle and are usually Moslem, are often the attackers. The Christian farmers and Moslem herders constantly argue over land and water.

October 9, 2013: In the north (Kano state) police raided and destroyed a Boko Haram bomb workshop. In nearby Adamawa state some fifty Boko Haram attacked a village and killed 8 people but fled before the soldiers showed up.

October 13, 2013: In the north (Borno state) the army reported that it repulsed Boko Haram attacks against 3 towns (Bama, Gwoza, and Pulka) and killed at least 40 of the terrorists. Outside Bama troops disabled a truck loaded with explosives, which was apparently to be used by a suicide bomber.

Nine of the 37 states have adopted Islamic (sharia) law and try, with different degrees of success, to enforce it. All 9 sharia states are in the north and attempts to enforce lifestyle interpretations of sharia are unpopular. One example is a recent effort in Kano state to prohibit men who work in public from wearing shorts and tight sleeveless shirts. Some clerics consider this immodest and un-Islamic and in Kano police are going to try and force men to dress in a correct Islamic style.

Oil theft also remains a major problem, about 150,000 barrels a day are taken. About a quarter of that is now converted to kerosene in crude improvised refineries out in the bush. The refinery process used is dangerous for the operators and leaves a lot of pollution behind. These improvised refineries cost less than $5,000 to set up, employ 15-20 people, and generate over $7,000 a month in profit. So the operators don't mind if a lot of them are found by the security forces and destroyed.

Despite increased scrutiny by the navy and police, pirate attacks are running at about 3-4 a week compared to 2-3 a week last year. A quarter of these attacks are major and involve kidnapping or cargo theft or both, as well as the usual taking cash and portable property from the crew and ship. The pirates are operating off the Nigerian coast (the Gulf of Guinea) and in some of the major rivers and estuaries. The pirates are becoming more thorough in stripping a ship of valuable portable items and even kidnapping ship's officers and taking them to hideouts ashore to be held for ransom. The gangs are apparently advised by expert fences on what equipment to look for because some of these expensive shipboard electronics are showing up for sale in other parts of the world. The fences often ship the stuff out of Africa or sell it via the Internet to get a better price. As a result, the pirates are gaining more money per ship raided and that persuades more land-based gangs to give piracy a try. There are plenty of tankers and other merchant ships in the Gulf of Guinea and not all are paying attention to warnings about improving their security. While the Somali pirates could gain larger ransoms (sometimes over $10 million per ship) they have not been able to grab a ship in over a year because of more aggressive naval patrols and tighter security on the big ships. That has not happened on the west coast, and the gangs are happy if they can net several hundred thousand dollars in loot (including cargo transferred at sea to a pirate owned freighter or tanker) and ransoms per ship raided. The shipping companies have to pay higher insurance premiums and deal with lower crew morale and are now incurring higher operating costs because of the need for better security. All these additional costs are passed on to the countries adjacent to the Gulf of Guinea in the form of higher shipping rates.

October 18, 2013: A major oil pipeline was repaired and restored 150,000 barrels a day of oil exports. This pipeline had been shut down 5 times in the last 3 months because of oil thieves and deliberate efforts to shut it down. The local tribes, angry at the government for stealing most of the oil income (little of that money gets back to where the oil is produced) blame the foreign oil companies that handle production. The foreigners are used because a Nigerian run firm would be crippled by corruption and not very productive. But the foreign firms depend on Nigerian police and troops for security and the Nigerians have not been able to prevent the damage. Corruption also reaches into the foreign oil companies with employees (usually locals) taking bribes to assist oil thieves. Nigeria is considered a very difficult and unprofitable place to operate oil fields and the foreign firms are always on the verge of leaving and some have already done so. What keeps some in Nigeria is access to offshore oil fields, which have far fewer security and vandalism problems.

October 19, 2013: The government admits that they have people talking to Boko Haram leaders but don't know when, if ever, any results will be achieved or announced. Boko Haram leadership does not appear to control all groups operating as "Boko Haram" and many Boko Haram want victory (a religious dictatorship for all of Nigeria) or death. Boko Haram gunmen continue to operate in the northeast terrorizing the rural population. Boko Haram is still able to operate in the cities but at a much lower level than before May, when the army began a major offensive against the Islamic terror group. Some local leaders (tribal, religious, and elected) are trying to work with Boko Haram, but that is proving difficult because Boko Haram is dominated by religious fanatics and leaders who are quick to feud with each other. This sort of internal bickering means that Boko Haram has little staying power, but for the next year or two it will remain a factor in northern politics. Boko Haram has already lost much local support because of its seeming random violence. While Boko Haram tries to spare local Moslems and go after only infidels (non-Moslems), enough Moslems get killed and suffer the economic losses to make Boko Haram less a savior and more of a curse for most northerners. Boko Haram won't go away until the angry and usually unemployed and uneducated young men who provide the new recruits get turned off. That hasn't happened yet.

October 20, 2013: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram men wearing uniforms set up fake checkpoints along main roads and killed at least 19 civilians. Some were shot but most were killed with knives or machetes.

October 21, 2013: In the north (Borno state) troops searching for Boko Haram camps in rural areas clashed with Boko Haram gunmen several times, killing at least 37 of the Islamic terrorists. At the same time Boko Haram attacked two villages and killed 10 civilians, including members of local defense militias. The pro-government volunteers provide the army and police with information on Boko Haram activities, and the Islamic terrorists have been retaliating by attacking the villages the volunteers come from. This is meant to create public pressure on the volunteers to cease their anti-Boko Haram activity.

Off the coast pirates attacked a ship and took two of the officers (both Americans) ashore to hold for ransom.

October 24, 2013: In the north the army declared a 24 hour curfew for Yobe state as troops sought out Boko Haram gunmen. This came after hundreds of Boko Haram men attacked the state capital. After a five hour battle the attackers were repulsed. At least 95 Boko Haram were killed, along with 23 soldiers, and 8 policemen. Four police stations suffered heavy damage. Several civilians were believed to have been killed by the heavy gunfire and many more wounded.

The army announced that it is expanding its strength about 10 percent by recruiting 9,000 more troops. The army is stretched quite thin with its peacekeeping duties outside the country, fighting oil theft in the Niger Delta, and now battling Islamic terrorists in the northeast.

October 25, 2013: In the north (Borno state) the army attacked several rural camps of the Boko Haram and killed at least seventy-four of the Islamic terrorists.

October 26, 2013: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram ambushed a police patrol, killed the four policemen and drove away in the police vehicles into the Sambisa Game Forest (a large nature reserve near the Cameroon border that is known to contain several Boko Haram camps).

October 29, 2013: President Johnson visited Israel. This was partly a religious pilgrimage but also an opportunity to meet with Israeli officials and ask for help in dealing with Boko Haram terrorism. Israel and Nigeria have long cooperated on security issues and Israel has provided training and equipment. There is also growing trade between the two countries. The problem in Nigeria is mostly beyond Israeli ability to help. That's because the main problem is corruption and inefficient government.

October 30, 2013: There are still dozens of Boko Haram camps in rural areas of the northeast. Some of these camps host over a hundred men. Most of the Boko Haram men are armed and are local Nigerians, but there are also men from Cameroon, Chad, and Niger. Most Nigerians there are volunteers but some are coerced (usually by kin but sometimes just by other members of the mosque they pray at). While most Moslems in the north have turned against Boko Haram, because of the large number of civilians being killed by the terrorists, the idea of armed uprising to "defend Islam" still appeals to many men. It's mostly young men but even some older married men are attracted to the terror group. The government has been corrupt and inefficient for over half a century and that shows no sign of changing. Most of the local officials are just as corrupt but are still seeking to make deals with Boko Haram to protect themselves, their families, and their stolen fortunes. Even a few Boko Haram have turned out to be corrupt, but compared to the government

(and if you leave aside the terror and mass murder) the Boko Haram are far more virtuous. The way this sort of thing plays out is the Islamic radicals become more and more unpopular as the terrorism becomes worse. Boko Haram has already reached the point where they are using more terror than persuasion to keep the local Moslems in line. That has led to more young men joining pro-government or vigilante groups. The government does not officially arm these anti-Boko Haram groups and security forces tend to look the other way when their civilian allies get violent against Boko Haram. But these militias will get weapons and provide a power base for some new warlords. Some of these armed groups will end up fighting the security forces, if only to try and protect themselves and their families from the random violence the army and police are infamous for. Government efforts to change police and army attitudes towards civilians casualties have not worked very well. None of the likely endings for the situation in the north are positive. No wonder a growing number of Nigerians just want to get out of the country.

October 30, 2013: In the south (Edo state) at least 10 people were killed in another outbreak of tribal violence.

October 31, 2013: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked two towns, killing at least 40 civilians and burning hundreds of buildings. The army went after the fleeing Islamic terrorists and killed at least seven of them.

In the southwest (Osun state) at least two people were killed in another outbreak of tribal violence.

The air force and army continue to search for and raid Boko Haram camps out in the forests and hills of the northeast. The military are depending on tips from civilians, which are then confirmed from the air by the air force. Often the air force will then bomb the Boko Haram camps as soldiers are rushed to the area to search the camp and take care of any Boko Haram men still in the area. The army claims to have killed nearly 50 Islamic terrorists this way in the last few days.

November 1, 2013: In the northern city of Maiduguri troops destroyed two vehicles used by Boko Haram. This was a result of more frequent military patrols on the main roads. This did not prevent Boko Haram from setting up a roadblock outside Maiduguri, stopping a bus and kidnapping two female passengers.

November 2, 2013: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen ambushed several vehicles carrying a Christian man to his wedding, along with other members his family. The Islamic terrorists killed 30 Christians, including the bridegroom during this attack. The Islamic terrorists also made two other attacks in the area, damaging a bridge and burning down a police station (and killing four police). But the attack on the Christians was seen by the southern half of Nigeria as another example of religious intolerance and increased the risk of anti-Moslem violence in the south. Boko Haram is all for this because they believe that Moslems are inherently superior and would prevail in a civil war.

In the north (outside Kano) a clash left five Boko Haram men and two soldiers dead. This was the result of a raid on a house reported to be used by Boko Haram. The Islamic terrorists had not been seen in Kano for several months, and this incident appears to indicate that Boko Haram is trying reestablish itself in Kano.

November 9, 2013: In central Nigeria (Benue State) hundreds of armed Fulani tribesmen attacked seven Agatu villages and killed over 40 people, while losing at least a dozen of their own. Over 6,000 Agatu fled the violence as the army rushed troops to the site of the violence. This follows Fulani raids on two Agatu villages on the 7th. The Agatu are Christians and farmers and have been at odds with the Moslem Fulani since the Fulani began forcing their way into the area during the 19th century. The victims of these raids are often Christian farmers, while the Fulani, who tend herds of cattle and mostly Moslem, are often the attackers. The Christian farmers and Moslem herders constantly argue over land and water.

The piracy problem off the coast is getting worse, in part because some navy personnel have been bribed to assist the pirates. This makes it dangerous for anyone (especially local or foreign journalists) to investigate the situation. People who do so often disappear, although sometimes their bodies are later found off the coast.

Corrupt officials with lots of money and lawyers are not the only problem. The state governors tend to be the most corrupt senior officials and some of them appear to be organizing a legislative effort to make it more difficult to prosecute corrupt politicians. There are many of these local politicians, working their way up in corrupt local political organizations with the ultimate goal of being elected governor of a state and being able to amass a large fortune (and then retire outside of Nigeria, in some place without an extradition treaty). The thieves are getting organized.

November 11, 2013: Anti-corruption investigators are uncovering the details of how so much of the oil income is being stolen. One scam involves foreign oil brokers who arrange for oil exports to be sold at artificially low rates and the difference (between that and the real price) to be shared by the brokers and corrupt Nigerian officials. Nearly $7 billion in stolen oil income has been traced to this scheme so far. Punishing the thieves is time-consuming and difficult because the thieves can afford lots of lawyers and litigation to slow down (or buy off) Nigerian prosecutors.

November 12, 2013: Two American officers from a merchant ship were freed by their kidnappers. The two were taken from an oil company supply ship last month. There was no mention of ransom being paid.

November 13, 2013: The U.S. has officially designated Boko Haram and Ansaru as international terrorist organizations. This makes it more difficult for the two Islamic terrorist groups to raise money outside of Nigeria and for its known members to travel internationally.

In neighboring Cameroon a French priest was kidnapped by Boko Haram and is being held for a large (millions of dollars) ransom. Obtaining these ransoms is crucial to keeping Boko Haram functioning in northeast Nigeria. Since being chased out of the cities six months ago, the Islamic terrorists lost most of their sources of income (from extortion and voluntary contributions).

November 14, 2013: In the north (Borno state) an army raid on a rural camp of Boko Haram left nine of the Islamic terrorists dead. Among the equipment captured were two pickup trucks and two motorcycles.

November 15, 2013: In the north (Borno state) an army raid on a rural Boko Haram camp left 20 of the Islamic terrorists dead. One soldier was killed and three wounded. The fighting destroyed over twenty Boko Haram vehicles and some fifty motorcycles. Pursuit continues as over a hundred Islamic terrorists fled into the forest.

November 19, 2013: A faculty member at a university in the north (Kogi state) has been accused of recruiting students for Boko Haram. Four Boko Haram suspects arrested in the capital recently identified Muhammad Nazeef Yunus, a lecturer in Islamic studies, as the man who recruited them.

November 20, 2013: The legislature extended the state of emergency in the northeast for another six months. The state of emergency began six months ago with a major military operation in the northeast. That offensive, and the Boko Haram resistance to it, has caused over 100,000 people in rural areas to flee their homes. Most have returned but at least 40,000 have fled the country, most of them to Niger.

November 21, 2013: In the north (Borno state) some 30 Boko Haram gunmen in five vehicles raided a village and killed twelve people. The Islamic terrorists then burned many buildings after looting them. The Boko Haram men left with their loot (including several vehicles). Local civilians aided soldiers in tracking down the raiders.

November 24, 2013: Tribal violence continues in central Nigeria (Plateau State), as some 300 Moslem gunmen attacked a Christian village, killing five people and burning over 200 buildings. Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian farmers outside the city of Jos for years. The violence has gotten worse now and there have been nearly a thousand casualties so far this year. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds.

In the south (Niger River Delta) the war against the oil pirate continues with police and naval forces concentrating on the illegal refineries that turn oil into kerosene for local sale and consumption. The navy has made it more difficult to get stolen oil out of Nigeria (by barge or small coastal tanker). Oil thieves who are in business with local politicians are believed to be operating free of police or military interference and most of the oil thieves shut down are those without senior officials as partners.

The feud between Boko Haram and Islamic terrorist rival Ansaru is becoming more public, with criticisms of Boko Haram appearing on pro-terrorism websites. Ansaru (for Ansarul Muslimina Fi Biladis Sudan or "Vanguards for the Protection of Muslims in Black Africa") is a Boko Haram splinter group that has become more active since declaring its existence in 2012. Ansaru objects to the Boko Haram tactics of killing lots of Moslems and wants to concentrate on just killing foreigners or non-Moslem Nigerians. It is unclear how large Ansaru is and how much violence within Boko Haram, if any, will result from the split. Ansaru appears to be very small, perhaps only a few hundred members, and more interested (than Boko Haram) in working closely with Islamic terror groups operating elsewhere in Africa. This may encourage other extremist factions in Boko Haram to split off and create even more radical and violent groups like Ansaru.

November 25, 2013: In the north there are growing complaints that pro-government militias are acting as violently as the soldiers they are working with. The vigilantes are accused of killing unarmed civilians in rural areas while searching for Boko Haram camps. The rural villagers are suffering more from the Boko Haram raids and support army efforts to find and eliminate the Boko Haram in the area, but with the Nigerian security forces, the cure is often worse than the disease. The Islamic terrorists have become a growing problem in rural areas. For example, Boko Haram men have taken to kidnapping Christian women and using them as “wives” (after first forcing them, under threat of death, to convert to Islam). Christians have been fleeing the northeast for over a year but many are too poor to do so and are subject to attack by Boko Haram. The months of military operations in the northeast have chased the Islamic terrorists out of the cities and towns and forced them to set up camps in the hills near the Cameroon border. From here Boko Haram raids local communities for food and other supplies. In effect the army has forced Boko Haram to go from being urban terrorists to rural bandits.

November 26, 2013: Tribal violence continues in central Nigeria (Plateau State) as Moslem gunmen attacked four villages, killing at least 37 people and destroying a lot of property. Most of the victims were Berom, a tribe that has been in the area for centuries. The governor of Plateau state is Beron. Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian and pagan farmers outside the city of Jos for years. The violence has gotten worse now and there have been over a thousand casualties so far this year. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time, and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want.

November 28, 2013: In the northeast (Borno state) the air force bombed a Boko Haram camp in a forest and killed over a dozen of the Islamic terrorists.

November 29, 2013: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked a rural village, killed 17 people and burned down dozens of buildings and vehicles. Two of the attackers were killed by a pro-government militia.

December 1, 2013: In the northeast (Maiduguri) Boko Haram attacked the air force facility at the main airport outside the city. Over twenty air force personnel were killed and five helicopters and aircraft destroyed. The attackers lost over twenty men. The air force said that three of the "damaged" aircraft were not in service anyway. Flight operations at the airport were halted for a few hours and a 24 hour curfew was declared in Maiduguri because the attack on the airport was just one of many attacks around the city by up to 300 Boko Haram men.

December 3, 2013: In the northeast (Maiduguri) the curfew was reduced to 11 hours so people could continue their lives. Cell phone networks were also turned back on after having been shut down since May. This was seen as necessary to make it more difficult for Boko Haram raiding parties to move about undetected. Most people in the area are hostile to Boko Haram (although they agree with the Islamic terrorists' hostility to corrupt and ineffective government).

Piracy off the coast continues to be a problem, as some of the pirates now go after locals in addition to the better guarded foreign ships and oil company service boats. Robbing the locals won't make you rich but it's easier and safer than the foreign owned ships. The navy has responded with more patrol boats and naval bases on the coast and more patrols and quicker reaction to pirate attacks. But so far there are more pirates entering the business than are being taken out by the navy and police.

One of the disadvantages of driving Boko Haram out of the cities is that the Islamic terrorists can now set up camps across the borders in Cameroon, Chad, and Niger. These three nations have far less numerous security forces and Boko Haram tends to behave on the other side of the border so as to avoid antagonizing the local tribes and security forces. So it's up to Nigeria to greatly improve surveillance on its side of the border, and that still leaves a lot of the thinly populated border area unwatched most of the time. There are additional problems with the fact that over 70,000 Nigerian civilians have fled to these two countries to escape the Boko Haram violence. The government is discussing getting some help with this from the United States in the form of American UAVs.

So far this year some 900 Christians have been killed in Nigeria by Moslems. Most of these dead are in the northeast, but over a third have died in Central Nigeria, where Moslem nomads have been pushing south for decades and have been raiding the largely Christian natives in order to obtain access to more water and grazing land. Thus, last month 34 Christians were killed in the northeast while over 40 died in Central Nigeria (Plateau state). The government has promised increased security around Christmas because Islamic terrorists like to make large attacks on Christian holidays. One reason there has not been more anti-Moslem attacks in the Christian south is because nearly all Moslem religious leaders have condemned Boko Haram, often accusing them of not being Moslems but just deranged killers. These denunciations are convincing to most Christians, who also note that most Boko Haram victims in the Moslem north are Moslem and that many Moslems up there have joined anti-Boko Haram militias. A growing number of Christians are fleeing the north, especially if they still have family down south.

December 6, 2013: Boko Haram may have been forced into the countryside but they have not lost their ability to attack. Because of the growing number of soldiers, police, and local volunteers in the northeast Boko Haram has adapted, and they now attack whoever they can, which means most of their victims are civilians and Moslems. This indicates that Boko Haram now considers most of the civilian population hostile to them. The Islamic terrorists do try to concentrate their attacks against Christians and civilians known to support the volunteer anti-terrorist militias, but generally any civilian will do once the Boko Haram gunmen are out and about. In addition to raids on towns and villages, Boko Haram also likes to set up false military roadblocks (using uniforms stolen from living or dead soldiers and police) and murder any civilians who come along. Sometimes Moslems are spared, but usually everyone dies and their possessions, especially vehicles, are stolen.

December 10, 2013: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen have been regularly raiding some highways near the border, forcing the army to increase patrols on these routes.

December 13, 2013: In the north (Borno state) a major army raid left at least Boko Haram gunmen dead and one of their bases captured. The soldiers killed some of the Islamic terrorist before the base was attacked and continued chasing down fleeing Boko Haram men, capturing and killing more of them. The troops had a big edge because they were in contact with air force planes overhead who reported where the fleeing terrorists were and where they were headed.

December 16, 2013: Off the coast ten pirates raided a Greek tanker, looted it and took two officers (the Ukranian captain and the Greek engineer) to hold for ransom.

December 18, 2013: Off the coast the navy caught and arrested four pirates in two speed boats. Some of those arrested were already wanted for piracy.

In the north Christian leaders called on the government to address the social and economic problems (corruption and inept government) if they want to defeat Boko Haram.

The army is adapting more quickly to new Boko Haram tactics. For example, the army is now sending troops to guard border villages on those days when many local farmers bring in products for sale at the market place. These market days are when Boko Haram hiding in nearby forests come out to raid the markets and get the food and other goods they require. The army is also cultivating populations on the border to encourage them to report more often what they might see Boko Haram doing. The army is also supplying pro-government militias with more equipment and cash. The army does not want to supply firearms, but will not take away any weapons the militias may have obtained on their own.

December 19, 2013: Since the army went on the offensive in the north last May over 1,200 civilians have died in Boko Haram related violence up north. The number of Boko Haram attacks has diminished in the last few months but there is still violence, usually at least one major terrorist attack a week plus a lot of less spectacular violence. The Boko Haram sustain themselves by stealing from locals and because these border areas are so thinly populated there are not enough soldiers to guard all of it all the time.

December 19, 2013: In the northeast (Adamawa state, just south of Borno) some 30 Boko Haram gunmen crossed the border from their base in Cameroon and attacked a currency exchange. After killing five of the traders the gunmen grabbed a large quantity of cash and headed for the border. But the police caught up and killed 13 of the Boko Haram men and recovered the cash and lots of weapons.

December 20, 2013: In the northeast (Bama) over a hundred Boko Haram gunmen attacked an army base. The Islamic terrorists used assault rifles, heavy machine-guns and RPGs but were driven off. Several soldiers and at least five civilians (wives and children of soldiers) were killed. The army immediately went after the attackers, who had arrived in several dozen vehicles. This was the second Boko Haram attack on an army base in the northeast this month and because of the first attack security was increased in all bases.

December 23, 2013: In the northeast (between Bama and the Cameroon border) troops caught up with a convoy of Boko Haram gunmen who had attacked an army base on the 20th. Troops killed at least fifty of the Islamic terrorists and destroyed twenty of their vehicles. Several Boko Haram were captured but over a hundred kept going on foot and in vehicles. The army continues searching for the remaining attackers. Since the December 20th attack fifteen soldiers were killed defending the base and then chasing down the attackers. The army got a lot of help from the air force, whose reconnaissance aircraft spotted and tracked the fleeing convoy of Boko Haram man. The terrorists were seeking to get into Cameroon, where Nigerian troops could not pursue.

December 24, 2013: In the northeast the army and police, along with some local pro-government militias, provided additional security for churches as the Christian minority prepared to celebrate Christmas.

December 28, 2013: Boko Haram released a video taking credit for the December 20th attack but did not mention the aftermath that saw at least fifty of the attackers killed and many more wounded or captured. Also unmentioned was the fact that this year there were no attacks on Christians during Christmas. Back in 2011 there were five attacks on churches during Christmas leaving over 30 dead. The Boko Haram leader on the video denied that his men had eaten portions of their victims, insisting that all Boko Haram did was behead some victims, which is properly Islamic.

December 29, 2013: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen attacked a village 21 kilometers from the army base at Bama that was attacked on the 20th. The army detected the attackers quickly and came after them with aircraft, artillery and ground troops, forcing the Boko Haram men to flee. The troops noted that the Boko Haram had a lot of vehicles mounting heavy (12.7mm and 14.5mm) machine-guns, apparently bought in Cameroon by black market weapons dealers. Boko Haram keeps coming into Nigeria because that's where the money is and the Islamic terrorists need cash to survive.

It's been up to Nigeria to greatly improve surveillance on its side of the border but that still leaves a lot of the thinly populated border area unwatched most of the time. There are additional problems with the fact that over 70,000 Nigerian civilians have fled across the border to escape the Boko Haram violence and these refugees are forced to provide cover for some Boko Haram groups.

Then there are the pirates and oil thieves down south. In the last year the navy alone has been arresting 100-150 people a month in the Niger River Delta for oil theft. Each month the navy also seizes over 100 crude refineries (that convert the oil to kerosene or diesel fuel that can be sold locally) and over a hundred boats and barges involved in oil theft. Ashore the police in the Niger River Delta make nearly twice as many arrests and refinery seizures. The navy also deals with about a dozen pirate attacks off shore each month and kills or captures about a dozen pirates each month. The oil thefts continue because it is so profitable and the losses to the security forces is simply written off as a cost of doing business.

The government is also working more closely with Cameroon to deal with the Boko Haram men who set up bases just across the border. One of the side effects of driving Boko Haram out of the cities earlier in 2013 was that this forced the Islamic terrorists to move across the borders into Cameroon, Chad and Niger. These three nations have far fewer security forces and Boko Haram tends to behave on the other side of the border so as to avoid antagonizing the local tribes and government. Most of these terrorist camps are in Cameroon, whose border with Nigeria is thinly populated and rarely patrolled. In response to requests from Nigeria Cameroon has increased surveillance of the border posts on the few roads and assigned more police and soldiers to sweep the border area and check for foreigners. Boko Haram tends to keep their weapons hidden while in Cameroon and avoid confrontations with local security forces. This may change if Cameroonian troops come by too often asking too many questions. In anticipation of increased violence Cameroon has organized a rapid reaction force that can reinforce any army or police patrols or border posts that are attacked. Cameroonian police and army units have also established communications with their Nigerian counterparts just across the border. This has led to coordinating border patrols and making plans to deal with Boko Haram men headed for the border from either direction.

December 30, 2013: At the end of the year there was a major shakeup in the army leadership. Senior leaders who were not getting results were replaced, with the implication that the new commanders would be lose their new jobs if they did not make significant progress against the Islamic terrorists in the northeast. Also replaced were several intelligence commanders. Keeping tabs on the enemy is crucial in dealing with an organization like Boko Haram. The government has also quietly let commanders know that one sign of failure (and cause for demotion or dismissal) is civilian casualties. Nigerian soldiers and police have long been infamous for their casual attitude towards civilian casualties. This was always a cause for popular animosity against the security forces and with the Boko Haram uprising over the last few years the misbehavior, and public anger, got worse. The government was forced to finally do something about it and now commanders at all levels are being held accountable for civilian deaths due to carelessness or a desire for revenge. This has made a difference, but this casual brutality has been the norm for so long that it is uncertain if the changes will stick.

December 30, 2013: In the northeast (Borno state) soldiers carried out a series of raids against Boko Haram camps, killing 63 Islamic terrorists and capturing many weapons and much other equipment and supplies.

The "Pirate Coast" (where pirates are most active) is now off West Africa in the Gulf of Guinea and not off Somalia in northeast Africa. Most of the pirates in the Gulf of Guinea are Nigerians and they attacked 31 ships and briefly hijacked nine of them in 2013. The Nigerian pirates have no safe place to keep captured ships while a large ransom is negotiated. Instead they rob ships they attack and quickly leave. In some cases they arrange to hijack much of the cargo, usually at sea, by transferring to another ship at night and then scampering away before the navy or police show up. Sometimes a few of the ships' officers are kidnapped for ransom.

December 31, 2013: Nigeria-Oilmen wheel and deal prior to election'

AEI - Tradition has it in Nigeria that election years are always preceded by a huge sell-off of oil licenses. Looking ahead to legislative and presidential elections in April, 2015 the government of Goodluck Jonathan has just put 31 marginal fields on the auction block.http://www.indigo-net.com/lib/cookie_log/redirector.asp?mail=mogesie@gmail.com&ID=101120&DOCIID=107948427&ENAIID=193615&RETOUR=SIMPLE&link=http://www.africaintelligence.com/AEM/spotlight/2013/12/31/oilmen-wheel-and-deal-prior-to-election,108001301-EVE - _blank

January 1, 2014: The religious violence in Nigeria is becoming a major factor globally. Worldwide nearly half (47 percent) of the terrorist deaths were caused by just six organizations. Last year 22.4 percent of terrorist deaths were caused by Pushtun tribal radicals (16.2 percent from the Afghan Taliban and 6.2 percent by the Pakistani Taliban). Al Qaeda in Arabia (mainly Yemen) caused 6.2 percent of terrorist deaths while Al Qaeda in Iraq caused another six percent. In Africa the Somali al Shabaab caused 4.7 percent while Boko Haram in Nigeria accounted for 7.8 percent. Most (52.9 percent) of terrorist deaths are caused by over a hundred organizations, many of them operating in the same area (and sometimes against) the "Big Six".

January 6, 2014: Tribal violence continues in central Nigeria (Plateau State) as Moslem gunmen attacked a Christian village killing at least 30 people and destroying much property. Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian and pagan farmers outside the city of Jos for years. The violence has gotten worse now and there were over a thousand casualties in 2013. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want.

January 9, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen attacked an army unit conducting a search operation and were repulsed, losing 38 men. The army had been warned of the attack and were ready and lost only one dead while two soldiers were wounded. The troops took off after the retreating Islamic terrorists, many of whom were wounded and captured three vehicles, one of them loaded with bombs and the other with food. The army had recon aircraft overhead and this led to the capture of many weapons and other military supplies.

January 10, 2014: In the Niger River Delta pirates attacked a passenger boat and killed two passengers in the process.

January 11, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen attacked a village outside the state capital, killing five people.

January 14, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) a bomb went off in a market in the state capital killing 43 people.

January 16, 2014: Cameroon troops were in a brief gun battle with Boko Haram fighters who were chasing some Nigerian civilians into Cameroon. On the Cameroon side one civilian was killed and five wounded. The Boko Haram men retreated back into Nigeria when the Cameroonian troops confronted them and opened fire. Boko Haram had attacked a village just across the border and many civilians fled to Cameroon to escape the violence. The shooting could be heard on the Cameroon side and local troops were alerted.

Despite a major counteroffensive against the Boko Haram in early 2013 that put the Islamic terrorists on the defensive this effort has not destroyed the religious fanatics. Having been chased out of its urban and suburban bases in the three northeast states they were most active in, surviving Boko Haram members set up operations in the mountain forests along the Cameroon border. The army has moved most of its operations to the rural areas along the border. There are still some armed Boko Haram members in the cities, especially Maiduguri. There they are sheltered by civilians and are difficult to root out.

Meanwhile president Johnathan is distracted by the defections of many political allies and how that could impact national elections in 2015. This dissention is in part caused by increasingly successful corruption prosecutions, which have many dirty politicians seeking new alliances to stay out of jail and hang onto their stolen wealth. This, for many politicians, is more important than religious terrorism in the north. The new military leadership is expected to try some new ideas, but nothing major.

January 17, 2014: In the north (Maiduguri) a car bomb went off killing 40 people and wounding even more. Yesterday Boko Haram gunmen on motorcycles attacked a police station 160 kilometers southwest of Maiduguri with gunfire and a bomb, killing six people.

January 17, 2014: Over the last two days the government replaced the four senior military commanders. There is now a new chief of staff (head of the entire military) and the commanders of the army, navy and air force. This was done because of popular dissatisfaction with efforts to deal with Islamic terrorists in the north. There the Boko Haram, who model themselves on the Taliban, are trying to establish a religious dictatorship, first in the Moslem north and then in the Christian south. This change at the top comes after an earlier housecleaning. At the end of 2013 there was a major shakeup in lower ranking army leaders. Those who were not getting results were replaced, with the implication that the new commanders would lose their new jobs if they did not make significant progress against the Islamic terrorists in the northeast. Also replaced were several intelligence commanders. Keeping tabs on the enemy is crucial in dealing with an organization like Boko Haram. The government has also quietly let commanders know that one sign of failure (and cause for demotion or dismissal) is civilian casualties. Nigerian soldiers and police have long been infamous for their casual attitude towards civilian casualties. This was always a cause for popular animosity against the security forces and with the Boko Haram uprising over the last few years the misbehavior, and public anger got worse. The government was forced to finally do something about it and now commanders at all levels are being held accountable for civilian deaths due to carelessness or a desire for revenge. This has made a difference, but this casual brutality has been the norm for so long that it is uncertain if the changes will stick.

January 18, 2014: Contact was lost with an Italian tanker off the coast of Angola and it was feared that Nigerian pirates were the cause. On the 26th the tanker was found with its 27 man crew safe but its 60,000 ton cargo of diesel gone. The crew said they were taken by pirates but further investigation revealed that it was apparently a scam by the crew to steal the cargo and blame it on pirates.

January 19, 2014: In the northeast (Borno State) Boko Haram attacked a village and killed 18 people. Many structures were burned and some of the residents fled across the nearby border to Niger.

January 20, 2014: Vandalized natural gas pipelines, which exploded after being punctured, cut power for electricity generating plants and reduced available electricity by 30 percent. While oil pipelines are breached 4-5 times a day (mainly to steal oil) there have been no attacks on natural gas pipelines for over five years. Like some of the oil pipeline attacks, the gas pipeline attacks have all been pure vandalism. The problem here is corruption and the fact that little of the income from the oil and gas reaches the people where these natural resources are found or where the pipelines are. So it is not unusual for the pipelines to be vandalized simply to protest the corruption and bad government.

January 21, 2014: Air Marshall Alex Badeh, the head (chief of staff) of the military was sworn in and announced that he would devise a way to quickly (as in by April) eliminate the Boko Haram threat. Badeh is himself from the north (Adamawa state, an area where Boko Haram is very active.) April, it turned out over the next week, might be a bit too ambitious.

Near the oil terminal at Port Harcourt, seven pirates attacked a tugboat and kidnapped the captain and engineer.

In the south (Rivers state) police stopped a convoy of 17 busses carrying 320 people from the north (Jigawa State) and arrested them all on suspicion of being members of Boko Haram. Further investigation revealed that the men and women on the bus were traders from the north who had lived and worked in Port Harcourt for years and were returning south in a convoy for safety from bandits. Traders are favorite kidnapping victims north and south because they can pay larger ransoms. Jigawa State is in the north but has very little Boko Haram activity and what there is of it is police arresting Boko Haram members trying to hide or simply move through Jigawa State. While all this was going on there was a similar paranoia outbreak in southern Imo state where people in the area noted that 84 young men from northern Katsina State had recently arrived for a training course at a local school. The young men were suspected of being Boko Haram and police, to avoid any vigilante incidents, ordered the 84 men to return north. Katsina State authorities protested that the 84 men were definitely not Boko Haram and that there had been very little Boko Haram activity in Katsina State over the last few years.

January 26, 2014: In the north (Borno state) over 40 Boko Haram gunmen in several four wheel drive vehicles and pretending to be traders drove into a town marketplace and opened fire. They first shot at the soldiers on duty there and then at everyone else. They killed 85 and wounded many more using AK-47s. Then they used explosives and fire bombs to damage or destroy much of the market and some 300 nearby buildings. The Islamic terrorists then took a few hostages and drove off into a nearby forest. To the south, in Adamawa state another group of Boko Haram gunmen attacked a Catholic church and killed 22 worshippers.

So far this year more than 6,000 civilians have fled the northeast (Adamawa, Yobe and Borno states) to neighboring Cameroon and Niger to get away from Boko Haram violence. There are now at least 20,000 Nigerian refugees who have fled like this and many more are expected to cross the border if Boko Haram is not suppressed soon.

In 2013 trade (exports and imports) with China were $13 billion. That has doubled in the past four years. President Johnson pointed out that only 11 percent of African trade is within Africa and this has created a culture of dependence on importing many goods from elsewhere (like China) and the need to export raw materials to pay for the imports. Johnson believes that removing all the laws and regulations that limit entrepreneurs in African could bring a lot of this trade back to Africa. While most Nigerians agree that the country could use more economic freedom, they also believe government corruption is at the root of all Africa's economic problems.

Boko Haram has caught the attention of Christians worldwide. That's because in 2013 over 2,100 Christians were killed worldwide for their beliefs. Some 29 percent of those deaths were in Nigeria. Another 57 percent were in Syria, where regional hostility towards Christians has long been very intense. Some 90 percent of the worldwide Christian deaths (for religious reasons) were at the hands of Islamic terrorists and al Qaeda in Syria and Boko Haram in Nigeria are the worst offender s accounting for 85 percent of the martyred Christians in 2013 . This has led to increased fear, anxiety and paranoia in the largely Christian south. Nearly a third of the world population is Christian and at least 100 million of them are constantly threatened by anti-Christian militants.

Nigeria has also taken note of an American surveillance technique used in Iraq and Afghanistan and erected eight towers along the coast equipped with cameras that can spot ships out to 48 kilometers at sea. This enables the navy to better deal with the growing number of pirates operating out there. The towers have been placed at the areas of highest offshore activity. Thus there are four to cover the waters off the major port of Lagos. The oil export terminals at Bonny and Brass each have one. There is another at Yenagoa, one in Ibaka and one in eastern Akwa Ibom state.

January 29, 2014: Boko Haram has become a major threat along the Niger border, regularly raiding villages to obtain supplies and terrorize the locals. These attacks usually result in dead civilians and property destruction and theft. The Islamic terrorist group is also moving back into at least one city (Maiduguri, the capital of Borno state, the "home" of Boko Haram) and proving resistant to the army tactics of searching for Boko Haram camps and attacking them. Boko Haram keeps moving their camps and some are across the border in Cameroon and Niger, where the local security forces are not enthusiastic about taking on these Nigerian religious fanatics. Nigerian officials have been seeking advice from the U.S. It's also been noted that American UAVs (based in Niger) have been very useful in Mali.

January 29, 2014: In the north (Borno state) a bus from Cameroon was hit by a Boko Haram roadside bomb, killing seven Nigerians.

January 30, 2014: In the Niger River Delta police raided a pirate hideout and freed three Indian sailors that had been kidnapped from a boat off nearby Equatorial Guinea. All but one of the kidnappers was arrested.

January 31, 2014: In the north (Adamawa State) Boko Haram attacked a rural Christian village killing eleven people. The dead included a Christian clergyman. The attackers were eventually repulsed by a local self-defense militia armed with crude firearms made by rural iron workers for the black market and local hunters. These are usually single shot shotguns and pistols and people who buy them tend to become proficient as when hunting you have to reload after each shot so the first shot has to count.

February 1, 2014: In the north (Kaduna state) a popular local Moslem cleric who regularly preached against Boko Haram was shot dead by several gunmen. His wife and child were also killed. Boko Haram is suspected even though Kaduna is far from the areas where the Islamic terrorists are most active. However Kaduna has been the scene of fighting between Christian and Moslem tribes that do not get along for several reasons (usually having to do with real estate.)

February 2, 2014: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram attacks on civilians have killed more than 250 in the last two weeks. The death toll may be higher because most of the violence is in the countryside and there are many rural villages with no phone (landline or cell) service. So news of Boko Haram attacks in these places takes a while to reach the police. A growing number of attacks are in and around Maiduguri. This is the state capital and the city where Boko Haram always had the most support. The violence is most evident in the countryside where over 30 towns and villages now stand completely deserted and, in some cases, burnt out by a Boko Haram attack.

February 6, 2014: Tribal violence continues in central Nigeria (Plateau State) as Christian gunmen attacked a Moslem village killing at least 20 people and destroying much property. This is the second such attack in the last week. Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian and pagan farmers outside the city of Jos for years. The violence has gotten worse now and there were over a thousand casualties in 2013. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want.

February 8, 2014: In the Niger River Delta twenty policemen in three gunboats attempted to land at a village where an oil theft gang was based. They were met by such heavy gunfire that they had to retreat. Many of the men at the village had accepted the 2009 amnesty but had since gone back to stealing oil. Apparently this crew were not sharing their profits with the local politicians and the police wanted to discuss that. Government auditors believe the oil thieves cost the government $6 billion a year.

Corrupt officials with lots of money and lawyers are not the only problem. The state governors tend to be the most corrupt senior officials and they have organized a legislative effort to make it more difficult to prosecute corrupt politicians. There are many of these local politicians, working their way up in corrupt local political organizations with the ultimate goal of being elected governor of a state and being able to amass a large fortune (and then retire outside of Nigeria, in some place without an extradition treaty). The thieves are getting organized as the anti-corruption efforts are more successful. The plundering appears to continue.

Anti-corruption investigators and activists are not only uncovering the details of how so much has been stolen but how it was done and how corrupt politicians and officials continue to resist prosecution and punishment. Current estimates are that over $10 billion in oil income was stolen recently. One scam involved foreign oil brokers who arrange for oil exports to be sold at artificially low rates and the difference (between that and the real price) to be shared by the brokers and corrupt Nigerian officials. In 2013 some $7 billion in stolen oil income has been traced to this scheme. Punishing the thieves is time-consuming and difficult because the thieves can afford lots of lawyers and litigation to slow down (or buy off) Nigerian prosecutors. Many politicians and government officials refuse to admit a crime even took place and just call for more studies, audits and committees. Some anti-corruption investigators believe that $20 billion may have been stolen in 2013 alone. The World Bank estimates that at least $400 billion has been stolen since the 1960s. What is different now is that the people have real, verifiable numbers and the numbers are huge. Lots of Nigerians are angry about this, so angry that many corrupt politicians are scared.

Economic disruptions caused by Islamic terrorist activity in northern Nigeria, northern Mali, Sudan and Central African Republic/CAR over the last two years have caused persistent food shortages throughout this semi-desert region (called the Sahel). All this violence has made it difficult to buy food locally for aid operations. Global recession and seemingly endless demands for aid in the Sahel have made the usual foreign donors less willing to continue giving. Currently 40,000 people in northern Nigeria (and several million throughout the rest of this region) are completely dependent on food aid and elsewhere in the Sahel nearly ten million have poor access to food because of all the violence, much of it caused by Islamic terrorists.

February 11, 2014: In the north (Borno state) over a hundred Boko Haram men dressed in army uniforms and riding in trucks painted in army colors attacked a town. There the gunmen killed 52 people, wounded many more, kidnapped 20 teenage girls and burned down over a thousand structures, including a mosque. The Boko Haram men also had an army armored vehicle which they had apparently bought or stolen. The raiders rode off with many local vehicles they seized. The police and soldiers stationed in the town fled when they realized how many Boko Haram there were. The Boko Haram men destroyed about 70 percent of the town during the six hours they were their killing, burning and looting.

February 12, 2014: Islamic terrorists from Boko Haram continue to make life miserable for people in and around Maidugur i, the capital of Borno state. There are not enough soldiers and police to patrol the areas between the city and the Cameroon border. There are some Boko Haram bases in Cameroon and these are safe from attack by the Nigerian army and generally left alone by the few Cameroon soldiers or police on that side of the border. Maiduguri is sort of the “home” of Boko Haram and if the government wants to do some serious damage to this Islamic terrorist group they will have to find a way to crush them in and around the city. This has been largely done inside the city, but out in the countryside it’s a different matter. Arming the self-defense militias is an option that the army wants to avoid as most of those weapons will eventually disappear into the black market for illegal guns.

February 13, 2014: In the north (Adamawa state) nine soldiers were killed when their patrol was ambushed by Boko Haram gunmen. Survivors of the ambush say that at least nine of the ambushers were also killed.

February 15, 2014: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked a Christian village near the Cameroon border and killed over a hundred people. Several other villages were attacked in the area but there were far fewer deaths from those attacks. People in the area now know the run for the bush at the first sign of a Boko Haram attack.

February 17, 2014: Niger reported that a series of army raids in the east (Diffa, on the Nigerian border adjacent to Borno state) led to the arrest of twenty Boko Haram men from Nigeria. A Boko Haram camp was destroyed along with a large quantity of weapons and ammunition. The troops also killed several Boko Haram members. The Niger officers on the scene determined that Boko Haram was preparing to make attacks in Niger in retaliation for the Niger army and police operations against Boko Haram.

February 19, 2014: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen attacked, for the fourth time in two years, Bama, a village 21 kilometers from an army base. Nearly fifty people were killed this time as the Islamic terrorists looted and burned the town, including the palace of a prominent tribal chief. Because the military base is nearby the army often catches the attackers as they flee and kills a lot of them. But the Cameroon border is also nearby and the Islamic terrorists that once across the border they are safe. The Boko Haram in this area have lots of vehicles mounting heavy (12.7mm and 14.5mm) machine-guns, apparently bought in Cameroon by black market weapons dealers. Boko Haram keeps coming into Nigeria because that's where the money is and the Islamic terrorists need cash to survive. These raids are not just to terrify but also to steal supplies and equipment.

February 21, 2014: A Nigerian court ordered the government to either bring charges and arrest the recently dismissed Central Bank head (Lamido Sanusi) or leave him alone. On the 20th president Johnson suspended Sanusi for unspecified irregularities and federal agents seized Sanusi's passport. Sanusi's real crime is supplying anti-corruption investigators with data proving that the government officials have recently stolen over $20 billion of oil revenue. Theft on that scale is believed to involve the highest officials in the national government, especially if Sanusi can provide sufficient documentation on the details.

February 22, 2014: Tribal violence continues in central Nigeria (Plateau State) as Moslem and Christian gunmen attacked each other's villages killing at least 49 people and destroying much property in several attacks over the last three days. This is a continuation of the series of attacks that began in the last month. Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian and pagan farmers outside the city of Jos for years. The violence has gotten worse now and there were over a thousand casualties in 2013. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want.

Another new problem Cameroon has on the border is refugees from Nigeria. There are over 100,000 of them so far and there is definitely a Boko Haram presence in the refugee camps. Boko Haram does not make spectacular attacks on the Cameroon side of the border, seeking to maintain good relations with the border police so they can continue to use Cameroon as a sanctuary. This lack of Boko Haram violence attracts the refugees, who are thoroughly terrified of Boko Haram.

Boko Haram also has cash and Cameroon has detected a sharp increase in the movement of illegal weapons to the Nigerian border area over the last year. Gunrunners throughout the region have been detected seeking, and often, getting large orders from the Boko Haram groups camped out in Cameroon. The Islamic terrorists obviously have cash. Last September Cameroon police seized a truck carrying several thousand AK-47s and heading for the Nigerian border. In January another truck was stopped and found carrying 655 rifles and pistols. Other trucks have been carrying hidden cargo consisting of heavy (12.7mm and 14.5mm) machine-guns, ammunition or RPGs. It's not that gunrunners headed for Nigeria are unknown in this part of Cameroon. But in the past the weapons smugglers were carrying smaller quantities and headed into Nigeria to supply the many criminal gangs that politicians maintain as private armies (especially during elections). But now the quantities are much larger, and they are stopping at the border and sold on the Cameroon side.

Meanwhile Boko Haram also repeated its threats against Moslem clerics in the north who preach against Islamic terrorism. In addition to assassinating prominent clerics who criticize them, some of the Boko Haram raids hit the mosques of these clerics, burning them down while killing many of the local Moslems who attend the mosque. Boko Haram is all about terror, big time.

Boko Haram, pleased with all the media attention announced that it will begin attacking oil facilities in the south (the Niger River Delta). That's is more boast than reality. The south is largely Christian and the local Moslems are on their best behavior so as not to antagonize the Christian majority down there. Moreover the delta is heavily policed because of all the oil facilities, along with many well-armed Christian criminals who make a living by stealing oil. Moslem terrorists from the north are not welcome and would be easy to spot (different tribes, cultures, languages accents and all that.) Some of the southern Christians would appreciate it if Boko Haram came south as that would provide an opportunity for angry Christians to get some payback for all the atrocities inflicted on the Christian minority up north. The Moslem minority in the south insists (with considerable conviction) that they are anti-Boko Haram and would report any signs that these fanatics were trying to set up shop in the south. So the Boko Haram threat is more bluster than reality. But given that Boko Haram considers itself on a Mission From God, they may well try to carry out attacks in the south. Previous attempts have failed, but if you believe your activities are Divinely Approved than trying again is not out of the question.

February 24, 2014: Up north in Borno the local governor and the federal government are arguing over why Boko Haram has managed to kill so many people in the last few weeks. Over 400 have died in a series of spectacular raids. The governor made headlines by declaring that the Islamic terrorists were better armed, equipped and more motivated than the army. The military responded by denying this was the case and pointing out that all these Boko Haram raids were near the Cameroon border and in late afternoon or at night and that the attackers hit places far from army or police reinforcements. The attackers retreated into Cameroon and Nigerian forces do not have permission to cross the border in pursuit. Cameroon does not have enough soldiers or police to guard the entire border. The frontier area is largely rural, as well as being hilly (the foothills of the Gwoza Mountains) and easily trafficable by vehicles off the roads. Although the areas is semi-desert there are plenty of trees and vegetation most of the year. This makes it difficult for the air force to spot the approaching raiders. In short, Boko Haram has more places to hide than the army has people to watch. The army did respond by closing the border with Cameroon in Borno state, but this will not be much of an impediment to the Boko Haram raiders, who usually avoid the official border crossings. The closing will mainly inconvenience legal users of the crossings and make it more difficult for Nigerians to flee the Boko Haram violence.

February 25, 2014: In the north (Yobe state) Boko Haram attacked a government boarding school at 2 AM and killed 43 faculty and male students. The female college students were not killed.

February 28, 2014: In the north (Borno state) several Boko Haram attacks left over a hundred dead. Two of the attacks were bombs (in a market place and a theater) set off in the state capital (Maiduguri).

In the south (Ondo State) police arrested four pirates who had been robbing passengers and crew of small boats operating off the coast and were pointed out by former victims who recognized them. Larger ships have been adopting more security measures and this had made it more difficult for pirates to attack these vessels.

Just across the border in Cameroon a villager alerted the army when a group of 30 armed men passed nearby. The armed strangers were coming from the nearby Nigerian border and the army correctly deduced that this was another Boko Haram outfit heading for a sanctuary in rural Cameroon. The army intercepted the Boko Haram men and in a brief fight killed five of them while suffering one dead. Two of the Boko Haram men were captured as the group retreated back into Nigeria. Interrogation of the prisoners revealed that this group had carried out an attack in Nigeria earlier in the day that left dozens of civilians dead.

March 2, 2014: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked a village. The few soldiers stationed there fled and the Islamic terrorists killed 32 residents of Mafa and burned down most of the buildings there. The Boko Haram left behind one bomb that went off the next day killing two of the policemen who had arrived to help survivors. A week earlier Boko Haram had left leaflets in the village warning people that an attack was coming. The leaflets didn't say when and while many people fled some had returned when the attack actually took place.

March 3, 2014: In the north (Katsina state) three policemen were killed while pursuing gunmen who had attacked a checkpoint. The killers are believed to be Boko Haram, which has rarely been active in Katsina but does occasionally show up in other parts of the north besides the three states where the Islamic terrorists have always been most active.

March 4, 2014: The search for money stolen by former Nigerian dictator Sani Abacha continues, with the recent action by the United States to freeze $458 million found in British and French banks. Another $100 million has been found by American and Nigerian investigators and is expected to be frozen soon and eventually sent back to Nigeria. Although Abacha died in office in 1998 and was succeeded by reform governments the corruption he practiced continued. Abacha was believed to have stolen over $3 billion and his family continues to try and keep stolen cash hidden from Nigerian investigators trying to get it back. That does not always work. In 2009 the government found $2 billion in stolen Abacha funds in Swiss bank accounts and convinced the Swiss to give the money back. That took longer than expected because the first $290 million returned promptly disappeared. The Swiss saw that the recovered stolen money was being stolen again and refused to resume payouts until assured that the money would be put to legitimate uses. Much of the money hidden in Switzerland has been found, a process that did not get into high gear until 2006.

March 5, 2014: In the northeast (Borno and Adamawa states) the army has success in two operations and killed at least twenty of the Islamic terrorists and captured weapons, equipment and documents.

In response to the recent attack on a boarding school, at least five of these schools in the northeast have temporarily closed. Boko Haram, like the Taliban they model themselves on, oppose non-religious education and education for girls. Attacking these schools and slaughtering students discourages parents from sending their children to these schools. This is not persuasion but sheer terror. Boko Haram wants to change behavior and has no problem using terror when persuasion fails.

The security forces are doing some damage to Boko Haram. The Islamic terrorists are hated by a lot of the people the Islamic terrorists presume to be "liberating" and the police get plenty of tips. Arrests are made and Boko Haram operations are often blocked by soldiers or police who arrive in time and fight back. Boko Haram is having a hard time reestablishing itself in the cities because their many terror attacks there have made them lots of enemies among the population. Informing on suspected Boko Haram is a popular activity in urban areas and even corrupt and incompetent cops can get lucky.

Meanwhile the government further damages its credibility by again setting a date by which they assure people they will have suppressed Boko Haram terrorism. The current date is May 2014 and few people in the affected areas believe that. The government ignores problems with corruption and bad leadership and instead blames Cameroon for not allowing Nigerian forces to purse fleeing Boko Haram gunmen into Cameroon and not finding and shutting down Boko Haram camps in Cameroon. The government ignores the fact that Cameroon has far fewer resources (population, GDP) and does not want Nigerian troops in Cameroon because of the Nigerian Army reputation for randomly killing and abusing civilians and bad behavior in general. On the Cameroon side of the border there are many places to hide and few people living in the area to provide information. Many Nigerians, especially those living along the Cameroon border in the northeast, understand this. The Nigerian government probably does as well, but excuses are needed to explain the continued Boko Haram terror.

March 7, 2014: Interrogations of captured Boko Haram have revealed that the Islamic terrorists are continuing to operate in part because they practice what they preach; much less corruption and more efficient administration. Compared with many soldiers and police Boko Haram gunmen are better paid and paid on time. Boko Haram leaders make sure their gunmen are fed regularly and see to it that the families (especially widows) are paid death benefits and great efforts are made to care for the wounded and remove the dead from the battlefield so the army can't identify Boko Haram men and go after family. Even worse, all these resources (cash and weapons) appear to come from Nigeria, not foreign sources. The Islamic terrorists mostly use weapons captured from the security forces and obtain cash via kidnapping, robbery and plunder. The preferred targets are Christians and anyone working for the government. In contrast soldiers and police often find themselves getting paid late, or not at all. Army and police commanders still steal pay and sell off weapons and supplies meant for their subordinates. Such officers tend to be poor leaders all around and the soldiers and police they are in charge of have low morale and poor performance. As a result checkpoints are often abandoned at the least sign of danger and many soldiers and police are intimidated by Boko Haram. Boko Haram propaganda puts it quite accurately when corruption and bad government are accused of being the two things most wrong about Nigeria. Until the government can scrounge up some army and police commanders who are honest and competent the security forces are going to continue to fail in their attempts to eliminate the Boko Haram terror. So far this year the Boko Haram attacks have left over 300 dead. The Boko Haram violence began in 2010 and since then over 1,600 have died.

March 9, 2014: The army concluded several days of raids in the Sambisa forest in the northeast (where the borders of Borno, Yobe and Adamwa states meet). Over Boko Haram men were killed and over fifty arrested. This involved the destruction of several Boko Haram camps and the army continues patrolling to catch those Islamic terrorists that had fled the approach of the troops.

March 11, 2014: In the northeast (around Lake Chad) troops from Nigeria, Cameroon, Niger and Chad coordinated raids to round up over a hundred Boko Haram members, many of them wounded. These men had survived the recent raids on many Boko Haram camps and fled the country seeking medical aid and relief from the ongoing army patrols.

March 12, 2014: In the northeast (around the Sambisa forces) the local cell phone service was temporarily shut down to cripple communications for the many Boko Haram men fleeing the army raids and patrols.

In the north (Lake Chad) troops found a Boko Haram weapons storage site with dozens of weapons and large quantities of ammunition.

March 14, 2014: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked a military camp outside the state capital (Maiduguri) apparently in an attempt to free several hundred captured Boko Haram men being held there. The attack was repulsed and after two hours the Boko Haram gunmen withdrew, taking their dead and wounded with them. Four soldiers were wounded and even more Boko Haram were killed or wounded because the Islamic terrorists were attacking. The air force came in after about an hour and got a sense of how the Boko Haram force was deployed and attacked the terrorists from the air. After this attack the army imposed a 24 hour curfew on Maiduguri to make it easier to hunt down fleeing Boko Haram men.

March 15, 2014: In the Niger Delta down south the navy conducted a series of raids over eight hours and destroyed more than 260 improvised (and illegal) refineries that turned stolen oil into a crude form of kerosene. Several hundred liters of refined product was found at each refinery and that was destroyed as well. Five people were arrested and some boats and other equipment seized. These improvised refineries cost less than $5,000 to set up, employ 15-20 people and generate over $7,000 a month in profit. So the operators don't mind if a lot of them are found by the security forces and destroyed. The navy has been collecting information on the location of refineries for some time and conducted the raids in a short period of time to prevent operators from moving their refineries.

March 17, 2014: In the southeast (Benue state) Fulani tribesmen attacked two Tiv villages and were repulsed leaving at least 25 dead. This followed several days of similar attack in nearby Kaduna state that left over 200 dead. A few days before that Fulani tribesmen also killed over a hundred people in northern Katsina state, where most of the victims were Moslems (Hausa). The Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian and pagan farmers in central and southeastern Nigeria for years and raiding Moslem farmers in the north. The violence has gotten worse now and there were over a thousand casualties in 2013. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want.

March 18, 2014: In response to the Boko Haram threat the northeastern state of Borno is temporarily closing 85 high schools with a total attendance of over 120,000 students. The closings are unpopular because the Moslem northeast has the lowest education levels in the country. Only about five percent of children in Borno state get to attend high school.

The government is under growing pressure to do more for the nearly half a million people who have fled their homes in the past year because of Boko Haram activities. Most of these refugees are still in Nigeria, living with family or friends or however they can. About 12 percent of the refugees have fled across the border, mostly into Cameroon. Organizing government help for the refugees is risky because the effort is likely to be crippled by corrupt officials.

The success of recent joint operations around Lake Chad has led the nations bordering Lake Chad (Chad, Cameroon, Libya, Niger, Nigeria and the Central African Republic/CAR) to form a permanent task force to patrol the lake region and coordinate operations against smugglers, Islamic terrorists and bandits. The initial emphasis will be on containing the Islamic terrorists, mainly Boko Haram, in the area. The new task force will have its headquarters in the Nigerian town of Baga, which is on the lake. Baga is large enough to accommodate a new military base. The goal is to have the new task force up and running before the end of the year. Increased coordination will start immediately.

In the last two weeks the army has carried out major operations in the northeast which has resulted in over 500 Boko Haram killed or captured. Interrogation of prisoners revealed that Boko Haram leaders had told many of their men to disperse back into the population and abandon camps that had not yet been attacked until arrangements could be made to establish new camps. The increased army and police activity in the northeast during the last few months has made life hard for the several thousand Boko Haram still using camps inside Nigeria. Food and other supplies became a problem because the terrorists had to launch major operations to obtain supplies, usually in the form of raiding a town or village. Doing this risked a battle with troops and a pursuit chasing them back to their camp, which could then be attacked on the ground or bombed by the air force. This is causing more of the camps to be moved across the border, especially into Cameroon which has the weakest military presences on their side of the border. But those camps still require food, fuel and other supplies and to remain in Cameroon the terrorists have to pay for what they need. If they raid and loot and police and soldiers will come after them. Boko Haram is in need of more cash so the police are preparing for more bank robberies and other high-value robberies. It is believed that Boko Haram has approached al Qaeda for help in obtaining the cash they need to continue a high level of operations.

The government is organizing a new Border Patrol Corps to monitor the land borders, especially in the northeast. Over the next year the government will also establish 500 new border control posts in an effort to reduce the number of border crossings (currently about 1,400) that are not monitored and allow anyone to illegally enter the country. These illegal crossings have long been tolerated because many tribes are astride the border and the people are used to crossing back and forth without passports. The new border posts will generally allow locals to move back and forth freely but will be on the alert for smugglers, terrorists and anyone the police are looking for. Most of these new posts will first be established in border areas where Boko Haram is active. The way these things work in Nigeria the new border guards would be exposed to bribes from smugglers or even terrorists and many would take the money and do nothing. But some would refuse bribes from Islamic terrorists and at least report having spotted them.

March 19, 2014: The government reports that over 2,000 have died as a result of Boko Haram activity during the last six months. Most of the dead were civilians, largely the result of Boko Haram raiding rural towns and villages in search of supplies and two terrorize civilians. There have been over 40 of these raids so far this year and casualties from these attacks account for most of the thousand plus people killed so far this year. These raids have been the cause of some 60 percent of the half million refugees in the last year. Rural people in the northeast, especially Christians, are terrified of the Boko Haram. The government is trying to combine aggressive operations against Boko Haram with a deliberately kinder and gentler approach to the local civilians. This is difficult because it has long been customary for the police, and especially the army, to deal harshly with civilians in a crises and to regard all civilians as potentially hostile. This has been a very unpopular attitude and the government is under growing pressure to get the security forces to be less brutal with civilians. The government has issued orders to do just that and most, but not all, soldiers and police are at least trying.

March 20, 2014: In the north (Borno state near the Cameroon border) a bomb went off in a village market killing 32 people. It took over a day for the word to get out because the army has shut down cell phone service along the border to aid in operations against Boko Haram.

Cameroon revealed that it had sent another 700 troops to parts of the Nigerian border used by Boko Haram.

Officials in northeastern Borno state announced that all public and private schools will close before the end of the month. This is to protect the children from the growing number of Boko Haram attacks on schools. This is a major victory for Boko Haram, whose name is translated as "Western education is forbidden."

March 21, 2014: In the northeast (Borno) troops captured a Cameroonian man identified as a major arms smuggler and supplier for Boko Haram. That led to the discovery of some major arms caches, one of them in a burned out church. Cameroon has been the source of arms because of its excellent ports on the Gulf of Guinea. There's lots of truck traffic going north to landlocked Chad and that provides opportunities to hide weapons and ammo among legitimate cargo. Somewhere near the Nigerian border the illegal arms are transferred to smaller trucks and run across the lightly guarded frontier. Interrogations of captured smugglers also indicated that much of the smuggling is now run by Boko Haram and that is apparently a major source of their income. Since Boko Haram is constantly crossing the border, taking over the smuggling routes makes sense as Boko Haram is armed and ruthless and the smugglers don't want to lose their jobs. It's also suspected that Boko Haram is receiving cash from foreign sources, but there is no definitive proof. For the moment all that is certain is that Boko Haram still loot extensively during their raids, but also have expensive weapons and equipment that was not stolen from civilians or police. The cash is coming from somewhere.

March 22, 2014: Northern religious leaders have caused a political firestorm in the south by claiming that Moslems now comprise 60 percent of the population. This was in response to president Johnson (a Christian) for selecting Christians for 62 percent of the positions on the 492 member national conference of notables summoned to come up with ideas on how to reform the country. Christians are insisting that the 2016 census include a question on religion to settle this matter.

March 24, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) the military announced that operations over the weekend had left 18 Islamic terrorists dead and 16 AK-47s captured. The army has been aggressively patrolling the Lake Chad area and several hilly areas along the Cameroon border.

March 25, 2014: In the northeast (Maiduguri) two suicide car bombs killed eight soldiers. Boko Haram was suspected and it appears the bombers feared detection by soldiers and set off their explosives before reaching their intended target. Three or four terrorists died in the attacks.

March 26, 2014: Nigeria conflict 'affects millions', officials say'

BBC News : More than 3 million people are facing a humanitarian crisis in three northern states hit by an Islamist-led insurgency. The conflict has displaced about 250,000 people since January. President Goodluck Jonathan declared a state of emergency in the three states last year to crush the insurgency. However, the militant Islamist group Boko Haram has stepped up attacks in recent months.President Goodluck Jonathan declared a state of emergency in the three states last year to crush the insurgency.

March 26, 2014: Boko Haram has released videos their men took during the March 14th attack (in Borno state) attack against a military camp (Giwa Barracks) outside the state capital (Maiduguri) apparently in an attempt to free several hundred Boko Haram men being held there. The army initially reported that the attack was repulsed and after two hours the Boko Haram gunmen withdrew, taking their dead and wounded with them. The army said four soldiers were wounded but that even more Boko Haram were killed or wounded because the Islamic terrorists were attacking. The army and the Boko Haram video apparently agree that the air force showed after about an hour and got a sense of how the Boko Haram force was deployed and attacked the terrorists from the air. After this attack the army imposed a 24 hour curfew on Maiduguri to make it easier to hunt down fleeing Boko Haram men. In contrast Boko Haram, and local civilians, report that over 500 people were killed when troops and the air force opened fire on the prison portion of Giwa Barracks. Most of the resulting dead prisoners were not Boko Haram but simply young men rounded up for questioning. Journalists (both local and foreign) are finding that the army is not accurately reporting all losses from their counter-terror operations. More soldiers and civilians are dying than the army will admit. That is nothing new, as it's an old Nigeria Army tradition to try and cover up the number of civilians killed during operations. Popular outrage against that sort of violence has been building for years and has reached the point where senior politicians no longer automatically accept the army version and are now openly demanding that the army treat civilians more humanely. Senior military commanders are repeating these admonitions, but when you get down to brigade, battalion and company commanders the old rules still seem to apply. Thus losses to Boko Haram violence have been higher than the army reports and a larger percentage of the victims are innocent civilians killed by soldiers. For many civilians in the north there are two terrorist organizations to fear; Boko Haram and the army.

Boko Haram videos promise more violence and its leader declared that he and Boko Haram are at war with the world because only when everyone has submitted to Sharia (Islamic law) will there be peace. The guy featured in most of these videos is Abubakar Shekau, who has been Boko Haram leader since 2010. Nigeria offers a $300,000 reward for his capture or death while the U.S. offers $7 million.

March 27, 2014: In the south soldiers arrested two Nigerians who tried to bribe (with $6,500) an officer to provide an armed boat to escort a small tanker full of stolen oil across the frontier. Police later rounded up the rest of the gang which included two British citizens. The economic opportunities for stealing oil are so great that some expatriate Nigerians are returning to participate. As much as 250,000 barrels a day are being stolen. That's over $10 million a day for the thieves and about $16 million lost to the government. Then again, the oil thieves put more money back into the economy than the corrupt officials do. The politicians have stolen far more than the oil thieves have and more and more details of that gigantic theft are coming to light. The profitability of oil theft, and the fact that most of the thieves are local, is one reason the security forces have a hard time recruiting informers in the Niger Delta oil fields, at least with regard to oil theft.

March 29, 2014: In the southeast (Benue state) Fulani tribesmen attacked the village of a rival tribe, killing 19 people and kidnapping fifteen. This one of many such clashes this month in Benue state that have left nearly 300 dead. The Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian and pagan farmers in central and southeastern Nigeria for years and also raiding Moslem farmers in the north. The violence has gotten worse now and there were over a thousand casualties in 2013 and it looks to be worse this year. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want.

Boko Haram has been very active in trying to get its members out of prison and the government has had a hard time halting the use of bribes to assist these jail breaks. In response the unofficial policy if for honest prison guards to use their weapons liberally and this has resulted in lots of prisoners, including those being held for trial and not convicted of anything, getting killed in a desperate effort to limit the number of escapees. This policy appears to have limited the success of Boko Haram prison break efforts recently, but increased the number of people killed during the attempts.

March 30, 2014: In the capital, not far from the presidential residence there was a two hour gun battle inside a special police prison holding many Boko Haram men. At least 21 people were reported killed, the result of a prisoner receiving a smuggled gun and trying to use it to get himself, and perhaps others, out. Police would not say how many police were killed. Locals reported that the fighting stayed within the police compound indicating that no prisoners escaped. Often Boko Haram will launch an attack from the outside at the same time prisoners get loose inside because of corrupt guards. But this is the capital and if Boko Haram had sent an assault force they did not make it in time.

The security forces are doing some damage to Boko Haram. The Islamic terrorists are hated by a lot of the people the Islamic terrorists presume to be “liberating” and the police get plenty of tips. Arrests are made and Boko Haram operations are often blocked by soldiers or police who arrive in time and fight back. Boko Haram is having a hard time reestablishing itself in the cities because their many terror attacks there have made them lots of enemies among the population. Informing on suspected Boko Haram is a popular activity in urban areas and even corrupt and incompetent cops can get lucky.

Meanwhile the government further damages its credibility by again setting a date by which they assure people they will have suppressed Boko Haram terrorism. The current date is May 2014 and few people in the affected areas believe that. The government ignores problems with corruption and bad leadership and instead blames Cameroon for not allowing Nigerian forces to purse fleeing Boko Haram gunmen into Cameroon and not finding and shutting down Boko Haram camps in Cameroon. The government ignores the fact that Cameroon has far fewer resources (population, GDP) and does not want Nigerian troops in Cameroon because of the Nigerian Army reputation for randomly killing and abusing civilians and bad behavior in general. On the Cameroon side of the border there are many places to hide and few people living in the area to provide information. Many Nigerians, especially those living along the Cameroon border in the northeast, understand this. The Nigerian government probably does as well, but excuses are needed to explain the continued Boko Haram terror.

Many Nigerians are dismayed that Western nations, while condemning Boko Haram violence do not denounce the endemic corruption in Nigeria that is the cause of all the violence. Interrogations of captured Boko Haram men has revealed that the Islamic terrorists are continuing to operate in part because they practice what they preach; much less corruption and more efficient administration. Compared with many soldiers and police Boko Haram gunmen are better paid and paid on time. Boko Haram leaders make sure their gunmen are fed regularly and see to it that the families (especially widows) are paid death benefits and great efforts are made to care for the wounded and remove the dead from the battlefield so the army can't identify Boko Haram men and go after family. Even worse, most of these resources (cash and weapons) appear to come from Nigeria, not foreign sources. The Islamic terrorists mostly use weapons captured from the security forces and obtain cash via kidnapping, robbery and plunder. The preferred targets are Christians and anyone working for the government. In contrast soldiers and police often find themselves getting paid late, or not at all. Army and police commanders still steal pay and sell off weapons and supplies meant for their subordinates. Such officers tend to be poor leaders all around and the soldiers and police they are in charge of have low morale and poor performance. As a result checkpoints are often abandoned at the least sign of danger and many soldiers and police are intimidated by the Islamic terrorists. Boko Haram propaganda puts it quite accurately when corruption and bad government are accused of being the two things most wrong about Nigeria. Until the government can scrounge up some army and police commanders who are honest and competent the security forces are going to continue to fail in their attempts to eliminate the Boko Haram terror. The Boko Haram violence began in 2010 and since then over 2,800 have died, most of them in the last year. While Boko Haram attacks have increased so have the number of civilians killed during army operations. This has long been a problem with the army and years of government pressure to persuade the army to be less lethal to innocent civilians has not worked.

Niger, Chad and Cameroon border the three Nigerian states where Boko Haram is most active. All three countries border Borno state along a 500 kilometer stretch of frontier where the Boko Haram activity is most intense. All three nations fear that the Boko Haram form of Islamic radicalism will spread to their populations, but that has not happened yet. Ominously, some pro-Boko Haram clerics from Nigeria have been preaching in Niger and Cameroon mosques. Islamic conservative clergy are not unusual in either side of the border, but those who do not denounce Boko Haram are suspected of quietly recruiting young men to join the "jihad" (struggle). These preachers have to recruit quietly because otherwise police in Niger or Cameroon will arrest and deport them, sometimes after a vigorous interrogation.

The northern government blame the federal government for mishandling the counter-terrorism effort. The federal government accuses the governors of the three northeastern states of being corrupt and tolerating officials who actually cooperate with Boko Haram. Both sides are right, but neither the governors nor the president of Nigeria wants to dwell on the corruption issue. That is the big problem. Boko Haram is able to sustain its support because so many northerners are fed up with the corruption and ineffective government and the poverty that combinations produces for most Nigerians. Even the president is finding himself besieged by more and more evidence of his own corrupt behavior (and massive theft of oil income). There are few heroes in all this and lots of villains pretending to be victims.

March 31, 2014: As scary as the Boko Haram violence is nearly all of it is concentrated in just three of the 36 Nigerian states. These three states are in the semi-desert north and contain only twelve million people, which is only seven percent of Nigerians. The violence has caused over 1,200 deaths so far this year and disrupted the lives of over six million people. A third of the people in the three northeastern states have had their lives disrupted by the Boko Haram violence and the military response. Over 360,000 people have fled these three states and 17 percent of these refugees moved out of Nigeria. Most of the violence is in Borno state, where 27 counties (including the state capital Maiduguri) have Boko Haram activity. In Adamawa state it's only six counties and in Yobe state it's only five. Thus 71 percent of the counties troubled by Boko Haram are in Borno. In the last week alone at least a hundred people have died from Boko Haram related violence. Northern Nigerians consider the Army a terrorist organization.

April 1, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state, outside the state capital Maiduguri) a team of Boko Haram gunmen in four vehicles attempted to attack and destroy a fuel depot. Soldiers and police halted the attack at a checkpoint, where one of the vehicles, rigged as a suicide bomb, exploded and killed 15 people. At least six of the attackers died but failed to set fire to the depot or a nearby gas (petrol) station.

The army announced that just across the border the Cameroon Army had recently raided a Boko Haram base and seized a huge quantity of weapons (288 rifles, 35 RPG launchers, 35 locally made bombs plus pistols, mortar shells, some submachine guns and lots of ammunition). The Cameroon Army discovered this camp after they arrested and interrogated two men who worked for a local arms smuggler.

April 3, 2014: In central Nigeria (Nasarawa state) an army raid on a Boko Haram base left over thirty dead. Many weapons and crude bombs (and bomb making materials) were seized. Locals reported the presence of the Islamic terrorists and the army quickly responded. No word yet on any civilians who might have been hurt. Nasarawa is just north of Plateau state where there has been years of violence between Moslem herders and Christian farmers. The army recently deployed a task force to Benue, Nasarawa and Plateau states to deal with the growing activity of armed groups.

In the northwest (Zamfara state) about fifty gunmen on motorbikes attacked two villages, burning buildings, looting and shooting. Nearly a hundred people were killed or wounded. Boko Haram was blamed, although the Islamic terrorists don't usually operate in large numbers this far west. Fulani tribal raiders are more likely to operate like this (lots of guys with guns on motorbikes.)

April 4, 2014: In the northeast, just across the border in Cameroon, Boko Haram kidnapped three Christian missionaries (two Italian priests and a Canadian nun). They will probably be held for ransom although Boko Haram prefer to kill Christian clergy. But these are foreigners and potentially worth millions of dollars in ransoms. Such ransoms are a major source of funds for Boko Haram. Business before pleasure.

In the northwest (Zamfara state) Faluni tribesmen raided a meeting of Hausa self-defense militias and the resulting battle left several hundred Hausa (mostly) and Fulani dead or wounded. This raid was after cattle and other loot as well as the gathering of Hausa militiamen. Both Hausa and Fulani are Moslem. Starting this month, in north central Nigeria (Benue, Nasarawa and Plateau States), the army deployed several thousand troops in an effort to shut down the tribal fighters who have been raiding each other's villages for most of 2014 and causing over a thousand casualties and much property damage. The army task force has been ordered to find and destroy several large armed groups responsible for most of the mayhem. Most of these marauders are Fulani tribesmen. The Moslem nomadic Fulani have been fighting with Christian and pagan farmers in central and southeastern Nigeria for years and also raiding rival Moslem tribes in the north. The violence has gotten worse and sending in thousands of additional police did not halt the fighting. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want. Christian militias fight back, but the Fulani are doing most of the damage this year. This government effort to shut down the Fulani raiders brought forth accusations from mainstream Moslem groups that the army was picking on Moslems by concentrating on the Fulani raiders and not the Christians self-defense groups and tribal militias the Fulani raiders often run into. The Moslem leaders want attention paid to the growing tribal feuds between Moslem tribes, like the recent battle between Fulani and Hausa in Zamfara. At the moment the attacks on Christians gets more attention because half the population of Nigeria is Christian and Boko Haram has declared war on all Christians, especially the shrinking Christian minority in the largely Moslem north. But in response to the recent Fulani raid in Zamfara state the national police have sent in hundreds of additional paramilitary personnel to deal (or try to deal) with that situation.

April 5, 2014: In the northeast (Yobe state) Boko Haram attacked a village and went after worshippers gathered in a mosque, killing 17 people and wounding many more. Boko Haram prefers to kill Christians and other non-Moslems but most Moslems in the northeast now fear and hate Boko Haram and the Islamic terrorists must intimidate those it suspects are cooperating with the government. Many Moslems in the northeast have joined local self-defense militias and will tell the army about Boko Haram activity.

April 6, 2014: The government announced that Nigerian GDP was currently $510 billion. This is twice previous estimates and the change came about because the government undertook to examine the economy in detail. This had not been done since 1990 and the measurements (and data collected) until recently had not been adjusted to account for new industries (movie production, cell phones, the Internet and so on). Moreover, as in the rest of Africa there is a lot of corruption and other illegal financial activity that does not easily find its way into government statistics. In the West it is common practice to conduct special surveys and investigations to measure this off-the-books economic activity. That sort of thing was never popular in Africa where the rulers were the most corrupt and did not want to put any of that in the public record. But times are changing and now Nigeria has the largest GDP in Africa (passing less populous South Africa which has no oil and still has higher per-capital income) and is number 26 among world nations. As expected the new GDP number and the data backing it up is raising a lot of embarrassing questions about who has all that wealth and how they got it.

April 8, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state near Lake Chad) troops went after Boko Haram who were raiding or besieging villages. The Islamic terrorists are in need of food and other supplies and the troops are out to protect the villagers. Today there were several clashes with Boko Haram which left over 30 Islamic terrorists and five soldiers dead. Many more Boko Haram fled into the bush, still armed, hungry and desperate. Troops captured a lot of weapons and ammo from dead terrorists or that was left behind because the Boko Haram men on foot could not easily carry it all.

There are other Boko Haram conspiracy theories being tossed about at the highest levels. One of the more outrageous one has been used by several senior officials accusing dismissed Central Bank head Lamido Sanusi of secretly financing Boko Haram. Sanusi is under attack because he accused senior officials of stealing billions in oil revenue. In response president Johnson suspended Sanusi on February 20th for unspecified irregularities and federal agents seized Sanusi's passport. Sanusi's real crime was supplying anti-corruption investigators with data proving that the government officials have recently stolen over $20 billion of oil revenue. Theft on that scale is believed to involve the highest officials in the national government, especially if Sanusi can provide sufficient documentation on the details. On April 3rd a court awarded Sanusi $300,000 damages (from the government) and the return of his passport. The court found the government accusations against Sanusi groundless. The court had earlier ordered the government not to try and arrest or otherwise harm Sanusi. Desperate government officials then came up with the unproved accusations that Sanusi was somehow financing Boko Haram. Sanusi was appointed to head and reform the central bank in 2009. He got a lot done and was much admired locally and internationally within the banking community. The courts expect to decide in May on Sanusi's demand that he be reinstated as head of the Central Bank. For senior government officials, shutting Sanusi up is of major importance because it is feared Sanusi knows too much about the decades of oil revenue theft at the highest levels of government. Boko Haram may not be able to bring down the government, but Sanusi and what he knows is a major and very real threat.

There are more practical and important accusations you can throw at the army. The main one is the tendency of soldiers to use indiscriminate violence and arrests when faced with widespread Boko Haram violence (or any kind of uprising). Killing civilians and randomly rounding up young men (of the same age as most Boko Haram) tends to be counterproductive. This behavior makes the army little different than Boko Haram, at least as far as many northeastern civilians are concerned. This is especially true of the Moslem majority up there, because the remaining Christians are treated with more restraint and understanding. That makes sense because the Christians want to defend themselves and often form militias with army help. But many Moslem communities feel the same as the Christians and are also under attack by Boko Haram for being "collaborators", not Moslem enough or both. The army has been ordered to make the most of this situation, get more cooperation from civilians and behave. Not all commanders, especially at the lower levels (platoon, company and battalion commanders) have successfully adapted to these new orders. These undisciplined and randomly violent commanders are as big a problem as Boko Haram.

A major reason for the increased Boko Haram violence is the damage the army has done to the group's leadership and finances. Many senior leaders have been killed, captured or driven into hiding. This means the Boko Haram organization no longer exercises much control. General instructions are now distributed via audio or video material posted on the Internet. Boko Haram has split into many semi-autonomous bands that are now more concerned with basic survival (getting food, ammunition, medical supplies, fuel and so on). Thus more raids that are carried out mainly for loot, with murder and property destruction secondary to getting supplies. This has hampered recruiting and led to more desertions, but there are still several thousand armed Islamic terrorists out there.

April 9, 2014: As if Nigeria didn't have enough problems with Boko Haram and tribal feuds, now the military has to contend with politicians and tribal leaders in the northeast accusing the army of collaborating with Boko Haram. It is unclear how this latest conspiracy works, because there was no reason given as to why the military would collaborate other than greed (bribes) and self-preservation (avoiding combat with the Islamic terrorists). The Nigerian military has a history of corruption, but usually in the form of looting or stealing military assets (cash and property). Taking bribes from the enemy, especially one that slaughters women, children and worshippers in church (the military is disproportionately Christian) seems unlikely. The generals are demanding proof and so far, two weeks after they charges first appeared, none has been provided other than statements by an anonymous Moslem soldiers. Looking closely at how the army operates will reveal some incompetence and cowardice and a lot more corruption and desire for revenge. Corrupt politicians and tribal leaders in the northeast could spin that into conspiracy theories about the army being bought or intimidated by Boko Haram because that sort of thing is attractive to the media. Meanwhile the people are desperate for protection from the growing Islamic violence.

April 10, 2014: In the northeast Boko Haram made three attacks. Two were on villages near the Cameroon border, in which 130 people were killed while the other was at a teachers college, where eight died and several women were kidnapped.

April 14, 2014: In the capital a large car bomb explosion at a bus depot killed 75 people. Boko Haram later took credit for their first attack in the capital in two years. In the northeast (the Sambisa forest where the borders of Borno, Yobe and Adamwa states meet) Boko Haram raided a boarding school for teenage girls and kidnapped over a hundred students and some of the young women on the faculty. The captives, aged 16-18, would be used for sex and slave labor (around the camps). This is a common practice in Africa. Over the next few days several dozen of the girls escaped but 85 remain missing and the army is being criticized for the inept way they are handing the search (not interviewing all the escaped girls and not sending troops to guard the school).

April 15, 2014: Canada has warned its citizens to avoid travelling to Nigeria. With the exception of a few cities, the entire country is considered quite dangerous because of high crime rates and Islamic terrorists (Boko Haram).

April 16, 2014: The army falsely reported that most of the girls kidnapped by Boko Haram on the 14th had been freed.

April 20, 2014: In the north (Bauchi state) unidentified gunmen attacked a girl's boarding school and burned down several buildings but left the female students alone and left without kidnapping anyone. While Boko Haram has made attacks in Bauchi state it's unclear who was responsible for this one.

In Cameroon the government is being criticized because recent claims of large (over 5,000 weapons) arms seizures near the Nigerian border could not be verified by reporters. Civilians living in villages near where the government said the seizures took place said they saw nothing. The government responded that the smugglers operated in remote areas and avoided civilians as well as security forces. There are also concerns that even if weapons were seized they would, as often happens, be sold back to black market arms dealers so that government officials could keep the cash. Cameroon is also concerned about pro-Boko Haram clerics from Nigeria quietly preaching and recruiting for Boko Haram in Cameroon mosques. Islamic conservative clergy are not unusual on either side of the border, but those who do not denounce Boko Haram are suspected of quietly recruiting young men to join the "jihad" (struggle) and fight (and often die) in Nigeria. These preachers have to recruit quietly because otherwise police in Cameroon will arrest and deport them, sometimes after a vigorous interrogation. Evidence of this recruiting is showing up when some of the recruits return from Nigeria with tales of disillusionment and adversity while with Boko Haram.

In the last month security forces in the Niger River Delta have seized seven barges and ships carrying stolen oil to oil brokers in neighboring countries. Along the coast 85 refinery operations have been found and destroyed and 196 people arrested. Oil companies believe about 150,000 barrels of oil a day are being stolen by thieves who tap into oil pipelines. That's over five billion dollars a year in lost oil revenue. Most of what the government receives from this is stolen by politicians and civil servants, so people living in the oil producing regions as an anti-corruption measure.

April 22, 2014: The army is asking that the federal government suspend the governors of the three northeastern states (Adamawa, Borno and Yobe) under emergency rule. The army holds the governors responsible for the many officials in those states who are cooperating with Boko Haram (to avoid attack) or taking bribes from the Islamic terrorists. Some of these officials are covering themselves in case Boko Haram should gain power and the governors are often just responding to civilian fears of army misconduct. Those three states are where most of the Boko Haram violence is and have been under emergency rule since May 2013. Residents of those three states have justifiable complaints about the army, in particular the casual attitude of the military towards the safety of civilians and their property. The army is also unreliable when it comes to sharing information on casualties. Thus Boko Haram related deaths so far this year are believed to be (based on local reports) at least 1,500, which is 50 percent more than what the army reports. Boko Haram related deaths from 2010 to 2013 were about 3,600, so the violence is not declining. The government has been saying, for several years, that Boko Haram would be crushed within a year and never happens. More insightful observers point out that the problem is mainly one of corruption and poverty, as well as the appeal of Islamic radicalism as a magical cure. All of Nigeria suffers from corruption. Poverty is more prevalent in the Moslem north, in part because of climate. That's because the semi-desert Sahel region south of the Sahara Desert is found in the north. Another problem is the more conservative nature of Islamic populations and the lower education levels. Many northerners understand that if the corruption and bad government went away things would automatically get better. So far few northern politicians have become enthusiastic about cracking down on corruption. That's a common sentiment of politicians throughout Nigeria and the main reason Boko Haram is not going to be eliminated anytime soon.

April 23, 2014: In central Nigeria (Taraba state) Fulani tribesmen attacked a Christian village and killed 17 people. This is part of a pattern of tribal fighting in the area that has left over 500 dead so far this year. The Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian and pagan farmers in central and southeastern Nigeria for years and also raiding Moslem farmers in the north. The violence has gotten worse now and there were over a thousand casualties in 2013 and it looks to be worse this year. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want.

April 24, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state, outside the town of Bulanbuli) a raid on a Boko Haram camp left four soldiers and over 40 Islamic terrorists dead. Some Boko Haram were captured along with 16 firearms, lots of ammo, bomb making materials and documents.

Elsewhere in central Nigeria (Nasarawa state) a tribal dispute turned violent and left over twenty dead and many more wounded. Earlier in April an army raid on a Boko Haram base in the area left over thirty dead. Many weapons and crude bombs (and bomb making materials) were seized. Locals reported the presence of the Islamic terrorists and the army quickly responded. Nasarawa is just north of Plateau state where there has been years of violence between Moslem herders and Christian farmers. The army recently deployed a task force to Benue, Nasarawa and Plateau states to deal with the growing activity of armed groups.

April 26, 2014: In central Nigeria (Taraba state) several Boko Haram gunmen, trying to pass themselves off as nomadic herders, were arrested by police. Few Boko Haram have been encountered outside the three northeastern states where the Islamic terrorists originated and have been most active. This incident is another indication that Boko Haram continues to be interested in expanding its activities beyond the three northeastern states.

Elsewhere in the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen raided a town and took several young women and a Christian clergyman captive.

April 27, 2014: People living in the northeastern forests report that Boko Haram conducted mass marriage ceremonies for most of the teenage girls kidnapped on the 14th. The Boko Haram men paid the kidnappers about $12 for each “bride”. This is a common practice for Islamic terrorists, especially in Africa. This enables the new husbands to justify raping their new bride and forcing her to be, in effect, his personal slave. The captured women will maintain the camp and, if necessary, carry loads if the Islamic terrorists are forced to move long distances on foot. If the military attacks the camp and some of the slaves are killed, Boko Haram can accuse the government of an atrocity.

The government has asked the neighboring states of Cameroon, Chad, Benin, and Niger for help in locating and rescuing the kidnapped and enslaved girls. This tragedy has become big news throughout the region and some cooperation is expected. The fact that the incident has become a major news story makes it a major media defeat for Boko Haram, who always strive to portray themselves as devout reformers, not brutal self-righteous thugs. The Boko Haram resort to slaving resonates deeply in northern and central Nigeria for Bornu state was once the center of an empire that grew rich by enslaving other Africans and selling them to Arab traders who transported the slaves to Arabia. This trade continued until the British colonial government suppressed it in the 19th century. Bitter memories linger and the Boko Haram slaving has opened an old wound.

Political and army leaders fear that the uproar over the kidnapped girls will persist and force the security forces to take desperate measures (and suffer lots of casualties) in order to "do something." Meanwhile the outrage is hurting Boko Haram as well, with fewer new recruits seeking to join. The Boko Haram response has been to make deals with local criminal gangs wherein the gangs participate in some of the Boko Haram raids for a share of the loot. The gangs, who are usually based on tribal affiliation in a town or group of villages, are often smugglers and thus tolerated by the locals. Boko Haram does business with smugglers which is how they are able to connect with the gangs. These gangs won't raid in the areas where they are from (and would be recognized and that would trigger reprisals) but most neighboring villages and towns are a different matter, especially if they are populated by people from another tribe. The gangsters are recognized (by mannerisms and accent) by survivors of the raids and this leads to more self-defense militias and calls to be allowed to possess legal firearms (there's the lot of illegal stuff along the border). The security forces don't want more legal firearms in the hands of people along the border, but may have to give a bit on that point if they want more effective cooperation from the locals.

The public is appalled that such a large Boko Haram force, travelling in over a dozen vehicles, could attack the school and then raid several more villages while driving back to their forest hideouts and not be detected or intercepted by the security forces. As a practical matter the military is in a tough position. If they establish a lot of checkpoints in the northeast, in areas where Boko Haram is believed to have camps in the mountainous forests, Boko Haram can mass enough gunmen to attack these checkpoints with a fair chance of success. That means highly visible "defeats" for the army and a blow to morale because of the dead and wounded soldiers. The army doesn't like to discuss this very real conundrum they are in and are hoping that one of their field commanders will come up with new tactics that will speed up the detection and destruction of the Boko Haram camps and the Islamic terrorists who depend on them. Without these bases the Boko Haram cannot organize large raiding parties nor have a safe place to store their loot and slaves. Without their camps, many of them just across the border in Cameroon, Boko Haram is forced to operate in smaller, less effective, groups that are easier to deal with and destroy.

May 1, 2014: The nation is in an uproar over an April 14 th incident in the northeast (the Sambisa forest where the borders of Borno, Yobe and Adamwa states meet) where Boko Haram raided a boarding school for teenage girls and kidnapped over 200 students and some of the young women on the faculty. Fears that the captives, aged 16-18, would be used for sex and slave labor (around the camps) were apparently realized. While being transported to the terrorist camps more than 40 of the girls escaped but over 200 remained missing and the army was criticized for the inept way they handed the search. Specific criticisms involved not interviewing all the escaped girls and not sending troops to guard the school as that was where some of the escaped girls were returning.

May 2, 2014: In the capital (Abuja) a car bomb exploded killing 19 and wounding over 50. In the capital (Abuja) police raided locations near where two terrorist bombs had gone off in the last month. Eight people were arrested including some foreigners and charged with complicity in the bombings.

May 3, 2014: The U.S. State Department warned American travelers to avoid two hotels in the Nigerian port city of Lagos because of credible information that Islamic terrorists were planning to attack one of the hotels in the near future.

May 4, 2014: In the northeast (Borno) Boko Haram gunmen kidnapped another eleven teenage girls. This took place near the boarding school where nearly 300 were taken in April.

President Goodluck Jonathan finally made a public statement about the mass kidnapping and vowed to find them. But he has made promises like that before about Boko Haram and failed to deliver. Until today he not only seemed to ignore the kidnapping but was actively hostile to those calling for help. When some parents from the kidnapping area came to the capital to personally plead to the president and his wife for help, the president's wife ordered them arrested. The petitioners were later released as public anger over the kidnapping and government inaction continued to grow. This silence was consistent with Jonathan's view that Boko Haram was largely the fault of corrupt northern politicians who were encouraging the Islamic terrorists as a way to embarrass and punish the president for breaking an implied promise to not run for another term. Traditionally northern (Moslem) and southern (Christian) politicians took turns being president. Whichever party held the presidency got the biggest share of the billions stolen each year from government oil income. Nigerian politicians tend to concentrate on the money making aspects of holding office, not some nonsense about "public service." There are exceptions, but these anti-corruption types tend to be hounded out of office, driven into exile or simply murdered. An honest politicians is very much an endangered species in Nigeria.

May 5, 2014: Boko Haram released a video in which the leader of the group took credit for the April mass kidnapping and claimed that the girls taken were now his slaves and threatened to sell the girls to others. The government offered a $320,000 reward for anyone who provides information that leads to the rescue of the girls.

May 8, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) over a hundred Boko Haram gunmen rode into the border town of Gamboru Ngala and opened fire on a crowded market place. Shooting at those who fled and then moving through the town setting fire to dozens of buildings and firing on anyone they encountered, the gunmen killed nearly 300 people before they drove away. Gamboru Ngala had a force of soldiers to defend against raids like this, but these troops had been sent away to help in the search for the kidnapped girls.

May 9, 2014: In the northeast Boko Haram blew up a bridge and kidnapped the wife and two children of a retired police officer. The bridge was taken down to reduce the mobility of the security forces. The kidnapping was part of a campaign to intimidate local police into inaction or willingness to do favors (without or without a bribe) for the Islamic terrorists.

What Nigeria has not refused is specialized electronic monitoring equipment that several Western nations have offered. This What gear, used by police and military forces in many parts of the world enables security forces to monitor a wide range of electronic signals and automatically search for certain words or phrases. This makes it more difficult for the Islamic terrorists to coordinate their operations out in the bush, or makes it easier for the army to find them if they continue to use wireless communications. This equipment can be quickly and quietly installed on Nigerian Air Force (or civilian) aircraft and may already be in use.

May 10, 2014: The government announced the deployment of more air force and electronic equipment to assist in the search for the kidnapped girls. The government is also believed to have quietly accepted foreign military and intelligence assistance. Nigeria considers itself the foremost military power in sub-Saharan Africa and while that is a dubious claim it does encourage Nigerian leaders to resist calling in foreigners when there is an emergency the Nigerian military seems incapable to handling. Thus Nigeria has refused to allow American UAVs to help with the search. But the U.S. has spy satellites that can scrutinize the areas where Boko Haram has camps and that data can be discreetly passed to Nigerian officers for analysis and action. The U.S. has done that sort of thing before. If Nigeria asks, the U.S. can have several UAVs over the search area within 24 hours and keep UAVs over that area for as long as it takes.

The Nigerian military also has a history of corruption, but usually in the form of looting or stealing military assets (cash and property). Taking bribes from the enemy, especially one that slaughters women, children and worshippers in church (the military is disproportionately Christian) seems unlikely. Nigerians consider their armed forces one of the better trained and led in Africa. But that's not saying much, as the military training and leadership levels in Africa are very low, often to the point of complete ineffectiveness. Nigeria uses Britain as a model for its military, as Britain was the former colonial power in the region and helped establish the Nigerian military half a century ago. But the corruption that is endemic to the region eventually had its way with the armed forces. Leadership and training have suffered. But U.S. training teams (to improve peacekeeping and counter-terror skills) have been in Nigeria during the last decade, and report that the armed forces are not completely demoralized and debilitated by the corruption, and with some intense training, and elimination of the most corrupt officers, combat capabilities would be much improved.

The main problem here is not Boko Haram but the corrupt and inept government that has cursed Nigeria since it became independent half a century ago. This the government has been saying, for over a decade that Boko Haram would be crushed within a year and that never happens. More insightful observers point out that the problem is mainly one of corruption and poverty, as well as the appeal of Islamic radicalism as a magical cure. All of Nigeria suffers from corruption. Poverty is more prevalent in the Moslem north, in part because of climate but also because Islamic culture discourages Western education or sending girls to school. The climate problem is because the semi-desert Sahel region south of the Sahara Desert is found in the north. Many northerners understand that if the corruption and bad government went away things would automatically get better. So far few northern politicians have become enthusiastic about cracking down on corruption. That's a common sentiment with politicians throughout Nigeria and the main reason Boko Haram is not going to be eliminated anytime soon.

The government has asked the neighboring states of Cameroon, Chad, Benin, and Niger for help in locating and rescuing the kidnapped and enslaved girls. This tragedy has become big news throughout the region and some cooperation is expected. The fact that the incident has become a major news story makes it a major media defeat for Boko Haram, who always strive to portray themselves as devout reformers, not brutal self-righteous thugs. The Boko Haram resort to slaving resonates deeply in northern and central Nigeria for Bornu state (where Boko Haram is most active) was once the center of an empire that grew rich by enslaving other Africans and selling them to Arab traders who transported the slaves to Arabia. This trade continued until the British colonial government suppressed it in the 19th century. Bitter memories linger and the Boko Haram slaving has opened an old wound. Boko Haram may avoid that trap by offering to barter the girls for imprisoned Islamic terrorists. The government will resist that, as doing such trades merely encourages more kidnappings. to slavers, but discreetly.

Meanwhile Boko Haram improves its situation out in the countryside by making deals with local criminal gangs wherein the gangs participate in some of the Boko Haram raids for a share of the loot. The gangs, who are usually based on tribal affiliation in a town or group of villages, are often smugglers and thus tolerated by the locals. Boko Haram does business with smugglers which is how they are able to connect with the gangs. These gangs won't raid in the areas where they are from (and would be recognized and that would trigger reprisals) but most neighboring villages and towns are a different matter, especially if they are populated by people from another tribe. The gangsters are recognized (by mannerisms and accent) by survivors of the raids and this leads to more self-defense militias and calls to be allowed to possess legal firearms (there's the lot of illegal stuff along the border). The security forces don't want more legal firearms in the hands of people on the border, but may have to give a bit on that point if they want more effective cooperation from the locals. Finally, Boko Haram leaders may well realize that the international outrage over the kidnapping will probably die down and dissipate quickly and Boko Haram will continue to defy government efforts to eliminate Islamic terrorism in the mostly Moslem north. Boko Haram has been around since 2001 and despite several major police and military operations to wipe it out, continues to operate.

The outrage over the mass kidnapping is hurting Boko Haram as well, with fewer new recruits seeking to join because of the massive criticism now coming from Moslem clergy. Senior Islamic scholars throughout the Moslem world have condemned Boko Haram as violating Islamic law with their barbaric actions. Even al Qaeda has disassociated itself from Boko Haram, which had long claimed a connection with al Qaeda. Boko Haram has tried to put a positive spin on the situation, threatening to sell the girls into slavery. This is something that resonates with many Nigerians who still have memories of ancestors who were slaves. This boastful threat is meant to intimidate and does not reflect reality. There is still slavery in the Sahel (the semi-desert region that extends across Africa from the Atlantic to the Indian Ocean), but it is illegal and handled quietly these days where it is still active. Some of the girls could be sold

Political and army leaders fear that the uproar over the kidnapped girls will persist and force the security forces to take desperate measures (and suffer lots of casualties) in order to "do something." In response the government has ordered two more divisions of troops (over 20,000 soldiers) north to aid in the search. To get these troops up there and into action will take weeks and in the meantime the international media is all over the story. The government is also offering a $320,000 reward for anyone who provides information that leads to the rescue of the girls. So far no one appears to have stepped forward with anything useful.

The key Boko Haram vulnerability is the new bases they have established along the Cameroon border. Without these bases the Boko Haram cannot organize large raiding parties nor have a safe place to store their loot and slaves. Without their camps, many of them just across the border in Cameroon, Boko Haram is forced to operate in smaller, less effective, groups that are easier to deal with and destroy.

As a practical matter the military is in a tough position. If they establish a lot of checkpoints in areas where Boko Haram is believed to have camps, Boko Haram can mass enough gunmen to attack these checkpoints with a fair chance of success. That means highly visible "defeats" for the army and a blow to morale because of the many dead and wounded soldiers. The army doesn't like to discuss this very real conundrum they are in and are hoping that one of their field commanders will come up with new tactics that will speed up the detection and destruction of the Boko Haram camps and the Islamic terrorists who depend on them. The government has been reluctant to ask for foreign help but the troops out in the bush are eager for any edge they can get, no matter where it comes from. Moreover, some of the Nigerian officers and troops have received training from American troops, who impressed with their accounts of how U.S. forces operated in Iraq and Afghanistan. Nigerian troops admire fellow professionals who have succeeded in difficult situations and the combat troops in general are willing to share. Many Nigerian soldiers, especially junior officers, have access to the Internet and visit sites frequented by combat troops and know that help is available if only their own government would act.

The public is appalled that such a large Boko Haram force, travelling in over a dozen vehicles, could attack the school and then raid several more villages while driving back to their forest hideouts and not be detected or intercepted by the security forces. If the subsequent rumors are to be believed the army did detect this force moving about but lacked the commanders willing and able to respond quickly and forcefully enough to intercept and disrupt the Boko Haram plans.

The army is accused of being intimidated by Boko Haram and hesitant to set up checkpoints or launch small patrols for fear of being overwhelmed by an attacking force of the fierce Islamic gunmen. Despite all that the army has had some success against Boko Haram, overrunning several camps and inflicting hundreds of casualties this year. The army offensive earlier in the year basically drove Boko Haram out of the cities of the northeast. But out in the countryside Boko Haram developed tactics (fairly safe bases across the border in Cameroon or in remote forests on the Nigerian side of the border plus a much more fierce approach to combat which intimidates many soldiers and police) that enabled the Islamic terrorist group to rebuild and carry out increasingly destructive raids.

May 11, 2014: First the nation and now the world is in an uproar over an April 14 th incident in the northeast (the Sambisa forest where the borders of Borno, Yobe and Adamwa states meet) where Boko Haram raided a boarding school for teenage girls and kidnapped nearly 300 students and some of the young women on the faculty. Fears were that the captives, aged 10-18, would be used for sex and slave labor (around the camps). While being transported to the terrorist camps more than 40 of the girls escaped but over 200 remained missing and the army was criticized for the inept way they handled the situation. Specific criticisms involved not heeding a warning that the large force (200 gunmen in trucks and on motorbikes) was headed for the school (the police and soldiers guarding the school fled on hearing this news), interviewing all the escaped girls promptly and not sending troops to guard the school as that was where some of the escaped girls were returning. None of this was unusual for the army, which suffers from corruption, poor discipline and often erratic leadership. Some units are very, very good but most are not reliable.

May 12, 2014: Boko Haram released a video showing some of the kidnapped girls and demanding that imprisoned Boko Haram be exchanged for some of the girls.

The U.S. began using at least one electronic surveillance aircraft (an MC-12) to search for over 200 girls kidnapped in April by Boko Haram. The girls are believed to be held in the hilly Sambisa Forest in northeast Nigeria. The MC-12 could prove decisive in finding the girls. The MC-12 is a Beechcraft King Air twin engine commercial aircraft converted for use for electronic warfare and reconnaissance against irregular forces. That includes al Qaeda and Taliban and Palestinian terrorists as well as Boko Haram and al Shabaab in Africa. The MC-12 is crammed with vidcams, electronic sensors, jammers, and radios. This version of the MC-12 is called Ceasar (Communications Electronic Attack with Surveillance And Reconnaissance) and can spend hours circling an area, keeping troops on the ground aware of enemy walkie-talkie and cell phone use, including location of these devices and translations of what is being discussed. The enemy is often vaguely aware of what the MC-12 can do but have no better way to communicate. Thus the few Ceasar equipped aircraft sent to Afghanistan have proved very useful for the American and British troops that used them. MC-12s were equally effective in Iraq but given the large area (60,000 square kilometers for the Sambisa Forest alone) to be searched in Nigeria, could take a while to gather enough useful information. Most MC-12s in Africa have been operating out of a Franco-American Special Operations base in Djibouti. The U.S. is also believed to be using UAVs over Nigeria, especially the Global Hawk, which can cross oceans by itself and has spy satellite quality sensors.

May 13, 2014: Outside the northeastern city of Maiduguri Boko Haram ambushed a convoy of soldiers returning from patrolling the area where the schoolgirls were kidnapped last month. Four soldiers were killed as were several Boko Haram. The soldiers later protested to their officers (by firing their weapons into the air) about being ordered to return at night through an area where Boko Haram was known to be active.

Elsewhere in the north (Borno state) villagers got some advanced warning that a forces of Boko Haram was headed their way and prepared an ambush, killing or wounding over a hundred and capturing ten of the Islamic terrorists. The rest retreated.

May 14, 2014: In the north (Bauchi state) about 30 Boko Haram gunmen entered two villages at night and burned down the primary schools there.

May 16, 2014: In neighboring Cameroon some 200 Boko Haram (apparently from a camp in Nigeria) attacked a Chinese construction camp, killing one Cameroon soldiers and kidnapping ten Chinese. Nearby in Nigeria another village was attacked by a smaller Boko Haram force.

Britain offered Nigeria military advisers and trainers. Britain was the colonial power in Nigeria and trained the post-colonial Nigerian armed forces and police.

May 17, 2014: In France a meeting of leaders from Nigeria, Benin, Chad, Cameroon and Niger led to agreement that there would be more cooperation to defeat Boko Haram. In part this was prompted by news of yesterday's attack in Cameroon. The most impressive aspect of all this was the press release, because the key problems are the corruption and poor leadership within Nigeria and international cooperation will do little to fix that. The corruption and poor government is common throughout Africa although some countries are better run than others. The leaders of the less corrupt states now have an opportunity to impress on their Nigerian counterparts how important it is to reduce the corruption and expect more competence from government officials. There is an anti-corruption and "good government" movement in Nigeria but it is under constant attack by corrupt politicians who do not want their lucrative illegal practices to be interrupted. The mass kidnapping and general ineptness of the security forces in the northeast has put the spotlight on the bad behavior at the top in Nigeria and that never hurts. Meanwhile back in Nigeria president Jonathan was criticized for going to France rather than visiting the north. He has not been up there since the mass kidnapping and he and his wife both tried to play down the kidnapping until it became an international cause. Jonathan is seen as playing catchup and not really in control of the situation.

May 18, 2014: In the northern city of Kano a suicide car bomb went off in a Christian neighborhood, killing four people. Several hours before the explosion police had found and disabled another car bomb in Kano. Christian neighborhoods in northern (mostly Moslem) cities are a particular target for Islamic terrorist groups because these Christian enclaves feature drinking, Christian (and some Moslem) women walking around in Western clothing and lots of behavior that is, in general, anathema to Islamic conservatives.

A group of professional hunters in the northeast volunteered to search for the girls but the government turned down the proposal pointing out that such an effort would probably get the lightly armed hunters killed once they found Boko Haram camps and might even cause the Islamic terrorists to slaughter some of the schoolgirls. This was another missed opportunity as many Western and some African armies use local hunters and trackers to good effect. But to do this the troops must be competent enough to keep quiet and keep up as the trackers spread out to follow the clues left behind on the ground. There are some battalions in the Nigerian with troops well enough trained and led for this but the government has, so far, not found the will to force the army commanders to admit that there are such wide differences in capabilities between army units as that would admit that most of them are crippled by corruption and poor leadership.

May 19, 2014: Dozens of Boko Haram attacked a northeastern town (Shawa) and burned half of it down and killed at least even residents. Shawa is only 25 kilometers from where the schoolgirls were kidnapped last month. Locals considered this attack as just another example of how useless the army and police are.

May 20, 2014: In central Nigeria (Jos) two car bombs went off at a bus station, killing over 120 people. No one took responsibility for the attack. The bombing appeared to be the work of Boko Haram, but that group has not been active in this area. What has been happening a lot is tribal violence in which Moslem and Christian gunmen attack each other's villages killing hundreds of people a year and destroying much property. Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian and pagan farmers outside the city of Jos for years. The violence has gotten worse now and there were over a thousand casualties in 2013. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal, unless this car bombing was a Boko Haram action. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want.

The legislature extended the state of emergency in the northeast for another six months. The state of emergency began a year ago months ago with a major military operation in the northeast. That offensive, and the Boko Haram resistance to it has caused over 200,000 people in rural areas to flee their homes. Most have returned but at least 60,000 have fled the country, most of them to Niger and Cameroon.

It is becoming obvious that the army and police are intimidated by Boko Haram and the fanatical fighting style of the Islamic terrorists. It's not just poor leadership and training that prevents the army from mounting more patrols and road checkpoints. Commanders fear that their troops will be killed or, worse yet, flee, when they encounter large groups of Boko Haram. Thus Boko Haram has been able to use the roads and move convoys of stolen cars and trucks containing over a hundred gunmen. Especially at night, the Boko Haram convoys rule the roads, and much else, in the northeast.

There is growing pressure on the government to adopt the self-defense model that has worked in many other parts of the world. This involves recruiting and arming locals to defend themselves. Modern firearms are strictly controlled in Nigeria but there are a lot of illegal ones out there anyway and even more locally made ones (usually single shot pistols and shotguns fabricated by rural blacksmiths). The government is reluctant to encourage more weapons ownership among civilians. This is a legitimate concern in Nigeria were tribal disputes (ancient feuds to recent disagreements over land, water or trade) often turn large and violent. But the self-defense militia concept has worked in numerous recent instances of Islamic terrorism. The U.S. is apparently encouraging this, while also providing the government with all the satellite and aerial recon data available for northeast Nigeria. Some American Special Forces troops are apparently in Nigeria. These troops are respected by the Nigerian military for their many skills, including knowledge of Nigerian languages and culture. U.S. Special Forces soldiers have trained many Nigerian troops for peacekeeping duties.

Nigeria has asked the UN to add Boko Haram to their list of international terrorist organizations. There is some resistance to this among Moslem nations and some Western countries (like the United States) where senior politicians want to play down the role of Islam in many terrorist groups. There is no doubt in Nigeria that Islam is a crucial component of Boko Haram, but the wealthier Moslem oil states have spent a lot of money and diplomatic effort over the last few decades to play down the role of religion and to discourage the use of the term "Islamic" terrorism. Many leftist politicians in the West have bought into this and adopted the attitude that it's all about poverty and social problems, not religion. This annoys the Moslem victims of Islamic terrorism but the victims have got neither the distance nor the PR budget to make the religion angle disappear. With the Boko Haram mass kidnapping the global uproar and Boko Haram constantly talking about the religious reasoning behind their actions, the UN will probably put this Islamic terrorist group on the list of international terrorists. This will make it more difficult for Boko Haram to raise money worldwide or for known Boko Haram members to travel internationally.

The government has admitted that it really doesn't know exactly what happened when the girls were taken last April. So today a presidential commission has started work in the area where the kidnapping occurred and is interviewing witnesses and people in the area. Apparently there is now general agreement that 276 girls were present in the school when Boko Haram attacked and that at least 57 have escaped and reported that to authorities. The government also fears that Boko Haram will apply pressure on the government to release Boko Haram prisoners and pay lots of cash to get the girls released. The government apparently has a link to Boko Haram leaders via cooperative clergy and local politicians in the northeast and that is the deal being proposed. It is a bad deal because it would provide Boko Haram more cash to keep their operations going and expand and also give the Islamic terrorists an incentive to kidnap more children. Officially the government rejects demands for prisoner exchanges or ransom but because of the secret discussions with Boko Haram it is possible that Boko Haram prisoners could be "released" by a cooperative judge and ransom could be paid secretly to get the girls mysteriously released. This would get the government and army leaders out of the negative media spotlight for the moment but would, long-range, only make the situation up north worse. Unfortunately such shortsighted decisions are the norm, not the exception, in Nigeria.

The soldiers in the northeast are even more concerned with the bad attitudes and lack of skills and determination among their leaders and there have been several recent incidents of troops demonstrating their anger and frustration. In one case the car of a division commander was fired on by troops who believed (probably accurately) that shortages of fuel and other supplies they were experiencing were caused by the general stealing money meant for purchasing the supplies. The government plays down these incidents.

May 21, 2014: The government has over 20,000 troops and police in the northeast looking for over two hundred school girls Boko Haram kidnapped a month ago. Most Nigerians are not optimistic that the army and police will be successful in finding and rescuing the girls. While the government constantly boasts of the prowess of its security forces, on the ground the average Nigerian sees the army and police as undisciplined, inept and corrupt. Nigerian politicians tend to get very indignant at this criticism of the security forces, which is partly due to the fact that the army and police ultimately protect a very corrupt government. If foreigners bring up this subject the average Nigerian will ruefully agree and often mention a personal encounter with the brutality and corruption of the security forces. But mention any of this to a Nigerian politician and you get a hostile reaction, including denials and, if you are from outside of Africa, accusations of racism. This makes it very difficult for Western nations to help carry out reforms in Nigeria. The problem is that the corrupt politicians do not want honest and efficient police and soldiers because that would be a very direct danger to the political elite. All this makes it virtually impossible to accept much foreign military assistance.

May 21, 2014: The United States has sent another 80 U.S. Air Force personnel to Chad will they will support increased UAV operations.

The UN designated Boko Haram an international terrorist organization and imposed sanctions making it more difficult for known Boko Haram members to travel or raise funds internationally.

In the north (Borno state) several dozen Boko Haram attacked three villages near the Cameroon border and killed at least 35 people. In the central Nigerian city of Jos three people died when a bomb went off in a crowd of people watching a football (soccer) game on TV.

May 22, 2014: The military revealed that it knew where the girls were being held but had not yet decided how to handle getting the girls back. A military operation risks hurting some of the girls while negotiating their release simply encourages more kidnappings. Many Nigerians are dubious that the military now knows where the girls are as officials refused to provide few details other than that the girls were in the far north and that the military had been closely tracking the movements of the kidnappers and their captives since late April. It is believed that all the foreign help (especially with surveillance aircraft) may well have uncovered something in the north.

May 26, 2014: In the north (Yobe state) a large group of Boko Haram attacked a military base and killed 31 soldiers and police. The attack was repulsed and the Boko Haram retreated into the bush but not before burning down several buildings.

May 27, 2014: The government announced that it had undercounted the girls who had escaped from the Boko Haram after being kidnapped in April. Four more escaped girls were discovered as officials sought to contact all the families involved. Thus the latest count of missing girls is 219.

May 30, 2014: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen attacked three local tribal leaders, killing one of them. Most tribal and religious leaders in the north oppose Boko Haram and the Islamic terrorists seek to intimidate these critics into silence or a change of attitude with assassinations.

June 1, 2014: In the north (Borno state) about a dozen Boko Haram on motorbikes and in a car drove into a Christian village and attacked a church. Nine of the worshippers were killed. The Islamic terrorists fled and were pursued by local vigilantes, who killed four of the Boko Haram and captured three of them. Elsewhere in the north (Adamawa state) a Boko Haram bomb went off as a large crowd left a sporting event. This left 18 dead and 19 wounded. Boko Haram, like most Islamic terrorist groups, does not approve of video entertainment or organized sports. All are seen as sinful imports from the non-Moslem West.

June 2, 2014: Cameroon reported that its troops had ambushed a large force of Boko Haram crossing the border from Nigeria (Borno state) and killed at least 60 of the intruders. Over the last year, and especially since the April kidnapping, Cameroon has sent more troops to the border and set up an informant network of villagers and nomads living in the far north of the country. The local civilians in this area don't care for Boko Haram who sometimes cause problems (despite trying to behave well so as not to annoy the locals).

June 3, 2014: In the capital the chief of police backtracked on comments he made the day before that implied that there would be a ban on demonstrations in the capital concerning the 219 kidnapped girls. Such demonstrations have been very embarrassing for the government, especially when they happen in the capital where many foreign journalists are stationed.

Mainstream Islamic organizations worldwide have condemned Boko Haram for kidnapping the girls. This includes the OIC (Organization of Islamic Cooperation) which most Islamic nations belong to and has standing at the UN. Islamic radical groups like Boko Haram don't pay much attention to OIC or other mainstream Moslem groups because these organizations are seen as corrupt and tools for the tyrants who rule most Islamic countries. In many cases these groups are just that.

Since the girls were kidnapped on April 14th over 500 more civilians have been killed in Boko Haram attacks. There have also been several hundred more police, army and Boko Haram dead but most of the casualties continue to be civilians. There have been nearly 2,000 Boko Haram related deaths so far this year.

One of the embarrassing stories Nigeria failed to keep out of the news was about the corruption and incompetence related to Nigeria's own UAV fleet. It recently came out that the Nigerian military had purchased nine Israeli Aerostar UAVs in 2007. Nigeria paid several million dollars more per Aerostar than the usual $15 million price. While Nigeria may have also purchased training, maintenance equipment, some spare parts and technical support that still left millions more being paid than would normally be the case. That money probably went for cash to be siphoned off by government and military officials. The reason for the Aerostar purchase was the military effort to suppress the criminal gangs in the Niger Delta that were interfering with oil production. That problem was largely settled with a 2009 amnesty deal and nothing was heard about the Aerostars in action. Even after Boko Haram became active in the north in 2010 there was no sign or mention of the Aerostars. The Israeli firm that sold Nigeria the Aerostars did report an inquiry from the military for spare parts a few years ago, but no actual order was forthcoming. It is believed that by 2010 the Aerostars were all inoperable because of lack of maintenance and spare parts.

These corruption prosecutions have made many senior politicians and their mass media supporters wary of accepting foreign assistance to deal with the mass kidnapping. The fear is that more attention from foreigners will simply uncover and publicize more of the corruption in Nigeria. All this misbehavior is not news to most Nigerians, but the senior people like to pretend it doesn't exist when they travel abroad to enjoy all their stolen wealth. With the international media doing more stories on how widespread corruption is in Nigeria the most corrupt (and wealthiest) officials won't be able to pretend to just be "successful businessmen" while outside the country. This sort of thing could escalate into UN "crimes against humanity" investigations and all sort of unpleasantness. Best to keep the foreigners at arm's length and justify that with appeals to nationalism and self-reliance. So foreigners sent to help are told to work quietly and with little or no media contact. The foreigners have largely complied, rather than risk being told to leave. Western nations have sent several surveillance aircraft to assist Nigeria in finding and recovering over 200 kidnapped girls. Britain has sent an ASTOR radar aircraft to Ghana while the U.S. has an MC-12W operating from Niger, a Global Hawk UAV from Sicily and three UAVs from Chad. Nigeria is reluctant to allow foreign aircraft to operate from inside Nigeria.

Such corruption is not unknown in the military and is quite common throughout Africa. Some of the accused have already been found guilty. The investigations that uncovered all this was part of a growing anti-corruption effort. Often such investigations of military personnel are suppressed if the officers are working for powerful politicians. But working for widely hated Islamic terrorists like Boko Haram made these offenders easy targets and other military personnel had no hesitation in providing information and testimony. Such treasonous actions had been rumored for months, as soldiers noted suspicious activity by some of their superiors and spoke to civilians and even journalists about it.

June 4, 2014: The government revealed that it is prosecuting fifteen officers (at least four of them generals) for aiding Boko Haram. It's unclear if this was done just for money or because of intimidation or sympathy for the Islamic radical cause was also involved. Some Moslem officers have made no secret of their sympathy for Boko Haram and radical solutions to the many problems that plague the country. The accused officers are said to have supplied Boko Haram with weapons, ammo and equipment as well as information on planned military operations. This was said to have explained the large number of army units ambushed by Boko Haram or raids that found Boko Haram personnel already gone.

June 4, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) a group of Boko Haram arrived at a village and said they were itinerant preachers (a common thing in the area) and when much of the population had gathered for the sermon the Islamic terrorists opened fire killing at least 45 people. The gunmen then looted the place and set fire to many of the buildings.

June 5, 2014: In the capital a major newspaper accused the military of ordering troops to block distribution of an edition featuring a story critical of the army leadership. The army replied that they had received a tip that the newspaper trucks were being used to smuggle illegal materials. No such materials were found.

June 7, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) police ambushed a group of Boko Haram men and killed fifty of the Islamic terrorists. Further investigation revealed that the Boko Haram group was on its way to stage more raids in Borno and neighboring Adamawa state. The army has been under a lot of pressure to prevent more attacks on villages, as the ones that occurred last week appear to have killed over 400 people.

June 8, 2014: In the northeast (Gombe state) a female suicide bomber attacked outside an army base, killing three people. Across the border in Cameroon soldiers stationed in a village repulsed an attack by some Boko Haram coming from Nigeria.

June 10, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) a group of armed men showed up at a camp of Fulani nomadic herders and kidnapped twenty young women.

In the northeast (Yola state) the state government banned public events where people gathered to watch televised World Cup games. This is to prevent more Boko Haram attacks on such events. The federal government warned people in areas where Boko Haram is active to avoid such events as well. The World Cup games continue until early July.

June 11, 2014: In central Nigeria (Plateau state) over a dozen gunmen attacked two communities and destroyed two churches. The violence left six civilians, five police and an unknown number of attackers dead. Boko Haram is suspected but no one took credit for the attacks.

June 13, 2014: The U.S. announced a $5 million reward for the capture of Khalid al Barnawi, a former Boko Haram leader who broke away in 2012 to found the even more radical (and openly allied with al Quaeda) Ansaru. The feud between Boko Haram and Ansaru became more public in 2013 when criticisms of Boko Haram appeared on pro-terrorism websites. Ansaru (for Ansarul Muslimina Fi Biladis Sudan, or "Vanguards for the Protection of Muslims in Black Africa") is a Boko Haram splinter group that has become more active since declaring its existence in 2012. Ansaru objects to the Boko Haram tactics of killing lots of Moslems and wants to concentrate just killing foreigners or non-Moslem Nigerians. It is unclear how large Ansaru is and how much violence within Boko Haram, if any, will result from the split. Ansaru appears to be very small, perhaps only a few hundred members, and more interested (than Boko Haram) in working closely with Islamic terror groups operating elsewhere in Africa. This may encourage other extremist factions in Boko Haram to split off and create even more radical and violent groups like Ansaru. It’s this interest in attacking or kidnapping foreigners (especially Americans) that got the Ansaru leader on the U.S. most wanted terrorists list.

June 15, 2014: In the south (Abia state, near the coast but without a coastline) police halted a convoy of 35 vans and buses carrying 486 people and arrested everyone. Two of the vehicles managed to escape. Subsequent investigations found that one of the people in the caravan was a wanted Boko Haram leader. Most of those in the convoy appear to be Moslem northerners fleeing the violence up there and headed for the Port Harcourt looking for work. All are being held until this can be confirmed. Convoys like this are not unusual as it is safer to travel from the north like this to lessen the danger from bandits. If Boko Haram wanted to get to the south safely the convoys would be a good way to go.

June 16, 2014: In the south (Imo state) police found and disabled three bombs discovered in a church.

June 17, 2014: In the North (Yobe state) a Boko Haram bomb went off next to a crowd of people watching a World Cup game on TV, killing 21 people and wounding even more. Boko Haram considers football (soccer) and television sinful because they come from the West. Firearms and modern explosives are exempt from these prohibitions because these devices make it easier to kill sinners.

June 19, 2014: In the north (Borno state) soldiers raided a village reported to contain Boko Haram men and encountered ten armed men and after a brief gun battle, killed them. Nine firearms were recovered as were fifteen motorcycles (which were destroyed as the troops had no way to transport them).

Meanwhile There Is The Oil War: So far this year the security forces in the Niger River Delta have made a dent in the oil theft losses. By going after the barges and ships carrying stolen oil to oil brokers in neighboring countries and shutting down hundreds of improvised refinery operations losses have gone from 150,000 barrels of oil a day to about 35,000. Thus annual losses from oil theft have gone from over five billion dollars a year to about $1.2 billion.

Moreover there are several key differences in Nigeria. First, Boko Haram is potentially much larger because Moslems are half the population and a majority, or at least a large minority of those Moslems back what Boko Haram is fighting for (an end to corruption and misgovernment). But while the LTTE sought to maintain the support of the Tamil minority, Boko Haram is often very brutal towards Moslems in general, especially those who do not enthusiastically support them. The main problem the security forces have is a lack of willingness to take the effort to sort out which Moslems are hostile to the government and which are potential allies. This has long been a problem with the army and police and many military and police leaders have pushed for reform. To succeed quickly in the north those reforms have to come now. It’s uncertain if that will happen. The tradition of sloppiness and callousness towards civilians is an old one and not easily changed. Sending in a lot more soldiers and police without changing the bad old attitudes just creates more Boko Haram supporters in the north. What Nigerian officers are discovering by studying the Sri Lankan experience is that the solution involves a lot of reform, which is harder to pull off than just raising lots of new troops and police and sending them into the north.

Nigeria does not want to spend 30 years fighting Boko Haram and the lesson from Sri Lanka is to decide early on if the foe is determined enough to drag is out for decades. If so then raise a large army and police force and go in hard, fast and with little concern about civilian casualties. As the Sri Lankans found, this approach can destroy the armed foe, but not the underlying resentments that gave rise to the rebellion in the first place.

Total losses for nearly 30 years of violence are about 80,000. The UN, and the NGO (non-governmental organization) aid community called for war crimes changes to be brought against Sri Lankan leaders. The NGOs claimed that the government did not do enough to avoid hitting the Tamil civilians the LTTE were using as human shields. This was a smoke screen to help protect the UN and other NGOs from charges that they aided the LTTE and helped prolong the war. This is becoming a growing problem worldwide as the NGO workers seek to make their own lives easier by getting cozy with whatever warlord are in control where the NGOs are employed. These relief operations are careers for many of the NGO personnel and an adventure for the shorter term staff. But the NGO staff don't want to get killed doing good works, so there is a growing trend to make a discreet deal with the devil, in order to get some protection in a war zone.

There were atrocities by the security forces, but often against Sri Lankans who don't get along with the police. Over more than two decades of terrorism and violence, the national police acquired an attitude that they are above the law. Cross the cops, and you end up dead, or maybe just beaten, or crippled. To show you a lesson. Popular anger against this sort of thing had been building for some time, and politicians realized that they could no longer get away with not dealing with it. So, after the LTTE was crushed in 2009 more police were been arrested and prosecuted for misconduct. The police in turn were ordered to crack down on the criminal gangs, who flourished during the last two decades, often by being the paid accomplices of the LTTE. There was also fear that the criminal gangs would get their hands on some of the hidden LTTE weapons and put them back into circulation. The north had over a thousand of these hidden weapons caches, each containing small quantities of weapons (rifles and pistols usually plus ammo sometimes explosives). Some have still not been found some were discovered by civilians and the stuff ended up on the black market. Much more was revealed after the LTTE defeat, like secret agents within the government and military. Interrogations of captured LTTE members revealed all sorts of stuff like that. For example, it was revealed that the cook (for the last seven years) of the head of the army was an LTTE agent. Several other well placed agents have been revealed, and there were apparently dozens more who are still in place although most were apparently trying to figure out how to flee the country, not continue as agents of LTTE.

Applying the Sri Lankan experience in Nigeria is difficult because of some key differences. The LTTE violence began in the early 1980s and by the 1990s the LTTE had inflicted several major defeats on the army, including driving out an Indian peacekeeping force. LTTE suicide bombers killed a Sri Lankan prime minister, and a former Indian prime minister. By 2002, the LTTE had taken control of 14,000 square kilometers (22 percent of the island nation of Sri Lanka), and signed a ceasefire with the government. Tamils comprised 13 percent of the 20 million people living on the island, and wanted to establish their own nation in the territory the LTTE controlled in the north and along the east coast. Non-Tamils were driven out of that LTTE territory. Negotiations with the government failed because hard line LTTE leaders insisted on partition of the island. The government and many moderate LTTE leaders were willing to allow greater autonomy but not a separate state. This led, in 2004 to a split in the LTTE, with the east coast faction making a deal with the government. Troops moved into the east coast to put down the few hard line LTTE fighters that remained there. Continued negotiations with the LTTE proved fruitless, as the hardliners still insisted on partition. The war resumed in 2006, and in 34 months of fighting, the army lost 6,200 dead and over 30,000 wounded in what it called the Eelam War IV campaign. The LTTE is believed to have lost over 20,000 fighters during this period. By the end of 2008, the LTTE had been forced into a small area on the northeast coast. The LTTE called on its Tamil supporters in southern India and overseas to demonstrate and persuade foreign governments to force Sri Lanka to stop the offensive, declare a ceasefire, and allow the LTTE to rebuild itself. That effort failed. Determining how many Tamil civilians were killed during the last few months of fighting is complicated by the fact that many of the LTTE fighters were wearing civilian clothes, and the LTTE was deliberately urging, or coercing, Tamil civilians to accompany the troops and serve as human shields. The LTTE believed in "total war", where everyone, including women and children, had to be ready to risk their lives for the cause.

The Sri Lankan government used some pretty brutal tactics to defeat LTTE and had to deal with criticism from Western politicians and media over the treatment of the Tamils in the north. Many prominent Europeans demanded that Tamils in refugee camps be released immediately after the LTTE was defeated. There were also calls for the Sri Lankan security forces to be prosecuted for war crimes. This sort of thing enraged the Sinhalese majority in Sri Lanka and resulted in accusations that the foreign critics were a bunch of pro-terrorist, delusional, racists who imply that the Sri Lankans cannot govern themselves. India, the original home of the Tamils (who are a minority there, comprising only about six percent of the Indian population), is much more sympathetic to the Sri Lankan government. Partly, this is to keep the Chinese out (who are offering all manner of attractive commercial deals to Sri Lanka at the moment). But India knows all about fanatical sects and political movements, and was also subject to LTTE terrorism. Europe wasn't, and didn't understand. Thus the camps were not closed until all the LTTE members inside them were identified. Calls for war crimes prosecutions faded as more details of LTTE atrocities were revealed.

During the final year of the war in Sri Lanka the government forces faced 30,000 LTTE members. Not all were armed, but all were organized, and the army captured lots of records listing who they are. Most of these LTTE staff survived the final campaign, and the government is still looking for some of them. These are the people who could rebuild the LTTE and that is what is slowly going on.

The Sri Lankan Solution: Military leaders have been meeting with their counterparts from Sri Lanka (an island nation off the southern coast of India) to discuss how the Sri Lankan security forces defeated the LTTE rebels there. The destruction of the LTTE fighting force in 2009 did not end the war that killed over 90,000 people in three decades of strife but the defeat did end a long period of major combat. There are still a lot of angry, armed and anti-social Tamils in Sri Lanka. There is still the tension between the Tamil minority (about 13 percent of the population) and the Sinhalese (80 percent) majority. There is also a large (seven percent) Moslem minority with some grievances. But nothing like the anger many Tamils and Sinhalese still feel towards each other. It's expected that there will be a lot of low level terrorism between Tamil and Sinhalese extremists for years to come. But peace has returned to northern Sri Lanka after decades of violence. While the war in Nigeria is over religious, not ethnic differences, many Nigerian officers believe there are lessons to be learned from Sri Lanka.

Just across the border Cameroon is now at war with Boko Haram. Cameroonians living along the 2,000 kilometer long border (especially in the northern third of that) are suffering because of it. Boko Haram is now attacking Cameroon villages in an effort to terrorize the locals into silence. Worse, the Islamic terrorists often kidnap teenage boys and try (usually successfully) to turn them into Islamic terrorists. Those that resist are killed. The most active area for this new Boko Haram violence is across the border from Borno state, the part of Nigeria suffering the most Boko Haram violence. Since early 2013 Cameroon has sent more troops to the border and set up an informant network of villagers and nomads living in the far north of the country. The local civilians in this area never did get along with Boko Haram. Initially the Islamic terrorists tried to behave well so as not to annoy the locals. This worked for a while but, as is often the case, friction developed and now Boko Haram is at war with Cameroon as well as Nigeria.

June 20, 2014: In the north troops have been ordered to be more active in searching for Boko Haram gunmen and dealing with them. This means patrolling roads frequently and carefully to keep these routes free of Boko Haram roadblocks (that mainly prey on passing vehicles and provide supplies of vehicles, fuel and other goods) and ambushes.

June 20, 2014: Police report that 18 percent of the 486 people they arrested on June 15 in the south (Abia state, near the coast but without a coastline) were Boko Haram members. The police had halted a convoy of 35 vans and buses carrying 486 people and arrested everyone. Two of the vehicles managed to escape. Subsequent investigations quickly discovered that one of the people in the caravan was a wanted Boko Haram leader. Everyone in the convoy claimed to be Moslem northerners fleeing the violence up there and headed for the Port Harcourt looking for work. All were held and checked out on suspicion that this was an effort to get a large number of Boko Haram into the far south. The police now believe they have disrupted a major Boko Haram operation. Convoys like this are not unusual as it is safer to travel from the north like this to lessen the danger from bandits. If Boko Haram wanted to get to the south safely the convoys would be a good way to go. Then again Nigerian police often begin with bold press releases and end with false leads and unsustainable accusations.

June 21, 2014: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked two villages, killing over 25 people, wounding many more and setting fire to many buildings. The army and air force showed up after about six hours and chased the Islamic terrorists away.

June 22, 2014: In the north (Borno state) a suicide car bomber attacked an army checkpoint on the Cameroon border, killing three soldiers and wounding three others.

Elsewhere in the north another Boko Haram attack was less successful, although 33 villagers and 24 Boko Haram died before the attackers were driven off.

June 23, 2014: In the north (Kano state) a Boko Haram suicide car bomb went off outside a medical school, killing eight and wounding dozens more. Boko Haram considers all Western education harmful to Moslems.

June 24, 2014: Across the border in Cameroon the police shut down a major market place for two days and arrested over 40 Nigerians and accused them of being Boko Haram. The police and army are thoroughly searching the large market for weapons which they believe Boko Haram hid there between raids into Nigeria. Elsewhere in Cameroon there were three clashes with armed Boko Haram groups along the border in the last three days, leaving ten of the Islamic terrorists dead.

June 25, 2014: In the capital a bomb was set off at the entrance to a shopping center, where a large crowd was gathered to watch a televised World Cup game. The explosion killed 22 and wounded many more. Police shot what they thought was one of the attackers and captured another. A similar attack took place on the 17th in the north but this is the third Islamic terrorist attack in the capital this year. Boko Haram considers football and the World Cup to be evil Western influences on Moslems.

June 27, 2014: In the north (Bauchi state) a Boko Haram bomb went off in a brothel, killing eleven and wounding 38. Elsewhere in the north (Kano state) a large Boko Haram bomb was found hidden in a truck and disabled.

June 28, 2014: In the north (Borno state) Boko Haram raided a village and over three days killed at least 30 local men, kidnapped over 60 women, 30 teenage boys and burned the place down as they left.

June 29, 2014: In the north (Borno state) about 20 Boko Haram in several vehicles attacked three villages, burned down five churches and killed or wounded over a hundred Christians in the process.

Meanwhile some real problem with the Christian president go back to May, 2010 when ailing (since November 2009) Moslem president Umaru Yar'Adua died and his Christian vice president Goodluck Jonathan was sworn in as president. Jonathan had to work with the legislature to get sufficient power three months earlier to run the country. Yar'Adua's cronies were trying to use presidential power for their own ends, because Yar'Adua had not signed the document turning power over to the vice president when he took ill in 2009. Yar'Adua being a Moslem from the north and Jonathan a Christian from the south had a lot to do with it. Yar'Adua's term was up in 2011 and that meant elections. There has long been an understanding that Moslems and Christians would take turns holding the presidency. Many Moslem politicians are pushing for Goodluck Jonathan to not run for election, as his one year of presidential power should be followed by another Moslem president. The Christians disagree with this, especially since the corrupt Yar'Adua government (which began promising reform) was being cleaned up by an energetic, and seemingly clean, Jonathan. That did not last long and once elected in his own right Jonathan, beneath a veneer of incorruptibility proved to be as dirty (well, not quite as dirty) as his predecessors. That is particularly annoying to the Moslem leaders who know that Moslem politicians make less when the chief thief (president) is a Christian.

The continuing Boko Haram violence in the north has killed more than 2,000 people so far this year and created over 250,000 refugees. Most have fled to other areas in Nigeria but about a quarter have fled the country (mainly Cameroon). A disproportionate number of the refugees are Christians, who are frequent targets of Boko Haram. Christian leaders, especially those in the north, disagree with Moslem leaders who blame the rise of Boko Haram on misrule by the current Christian president. It is pointed out that the educational and economic disparities between the north and south existed before the country was created by the British and made independent in the 1960s. Christians accuse Moslems, especially Moslem leaders, of always blaming Moslem problems on outsiders and ignoring internal shortcomings. Leaving the Moslem community blameless means the problems never get fixed. Christian leaders also point out that the Islamic leaders of the north are generally as corrupt as the southern (Christian) politicians they accuse of causing all the problems in the north. Moreover the northern religious leaders, because they are often traditional tribal leaders as well, have political as well as religious duties and that makes them more prone to corrupt behavior, which is what Boko Haram is fighting against. Several of these northern religious leaders have been attacked by Boko Haram and some killed. Others have been secretly allied with Boko Haram, some out of conviction but others out of fear. Christian leaders believe that until their northern counterparts adopt a more clearheaded view of the Boko Haram problem those northern leaders will be more part of the problem than of any solution.

The U.S. has contributed vehicles, communications gear and protective vests to Nigeria for use by elite units fighting Boko Haram. The U.S. is also providing training and intelligence support. American UAVs and manned aircraft have completed their survey of the three northern states where Boko Haram is most active and have shared that data with other nations providing aerial reconnaissance help. The problem now is for Nigerian ground forces to make use of the data collected. This the Nigerians are reluctant to do because the Boko Haram fighters use booby traps ambushes to defend their rural bases. It’s a bloody business going after Boko Haram where they live. Not a lot of Nigerian army or police commanders are eager to take this on. There is also fear of failure, especially when it comes to rescuing all the women being held hostage. Nevertheless the Nigerians have improved their intelligence collecting. Part of this is the result of American electronic eavesdropping technology, which provides a lot of tips on what Boko Haram may be up to and where these Islamic terrorists are operating. This has enabled Nigerian intelligence to develop more informants on the ground. Most Moslems, and nearly all Christians, fear and hate Boko Haram and will pass on information to the army or police. Foreign intelligence agencies have helped the Nigerians improve their ability to collect and process all these tips and this is providing more timely warnings on what the Islamic terrorists are up to. Bombs that are found and disabled and attacks that are otherwise disrupted is not the sort of thing that makes the headlines, but a lot more of it has been happening. What is not so easily fixed is the poor leadership and training found in so many police and army units, as well as the culture of corruption and impunity in the security forces. For the soldiers and police the scariest thing about Boko Haram is their fearlessness and readiness to fight back if attacked. Nigerian soldiers and police are not used to this sort of attitude and are having trouble adapting to it.

June 30, 2014: Boko Haram are still trying to negotiate a prisoner swap for the 219 girls they are holding since April. The government has understandably refused to such a trade as that would mean Boko Haram would simply keep kidnapping women in order to get any captured Islamic terrorists released. The government has completed its investigation into the mass kidnapping last April. The conclusion was that 219 girls are still being held. Beyond that the government has not got much to report. Despite foreign help with intelligence and air reconnaissance there has been no reported progress in finding or rescuing the captives. Of course if a major rescue effort is in the works it would be a good idea to keep details out of the news.

It’s No Boko Haram!' It’s US, Israel Abducted Chibok Girls, So They Can Invade Nigeria, Steal Resources' COMMENTARY: Muslim Cleric Islamic Scholar, Sheikh Ibraheem Zakzaky says the US and Israel arranged the Chibok abduction as a launch pad for an invasion of Nigeria with the aim of stealing her resources. US, Israel and other Western powers have been accused of plotting the abduction of nearly 300 girls in Chibok, Borno state, as an excuse to invade and steal from Nigeria.

Sheikh Ibraheem Zakzaky, the leader of the Islamic Movement in Nigeria, made the accusation while speaking at the annual Martyrs’ Day commemoration held at the Baqiyyatullah Hussainiyyah, Zaria on Saturday. Zakzaky, said the Boko Haram sect was a myth and the girls' abduction a set-up to pave way for U.S. and Israeli military presence in Nigeria. “Let no one be fooled, there is nothing like Boko Haram! It is a covert operation to balkanize Nigeria and steals its resources in the name of search of Boko Haram insurgents. If you can fool others, we cannot be fooled,” Zakzaky said.

According to the controversial cleric, the ultimate aim is to 'steal Nigeria's abundant resources. “They realized there are gold deposits in Zamfara and Zaria - Birnin Gwari axis; gold and platinum in Sokoto and Borno. "They did it in Iraq, as they went in search of weapons of mass destruction (WMDs), which they never found but plunged the country into chaos. "The same thing was experimented in Afghanistan before our eyes,” the cleric said.

He also alleged that the Nigerian military is working together with the leader of the dreaded Boko Haram sect, Abubakar Shekau. “Shekau is presently being kept safe in a secret military camp," he said. Do you think there is any truth in what he is saying. (Text ends)

July 1, 2014: In the northeastern city of Maiduguri a Boko Haram bomb went off in an outdoor market killing at over fifty people. In the last two days there have been at least seven Boko Haram attacks in the northeast, leaving over fifty dead.

The government announced they had arrested a northern businessmen who had joined a vigilante group even though he was already a member of Boko Haram. The arrested man was part of a Boko Haram cell that included two women and was believed to have played a role in the April kidnapping of over 200 girls.

July 2, 2014: The government reports that over sixty women and girls had escaped from Boko Haram captivity in June but that more than 200 are still being held.

July 3, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) police arrested three women and accused them of operating a terrorist cell that recruited women to be suicide bombers or otherwise actively assist Boko Haram.

July 4, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) over fifty Boko Haram gunmen were killed when they attacked an army base. Six soldiers were killed defending the base against several hundred Boko Haram men. Elsewhere in the northeast a suicide truck bomber set off his explosives, killing himself and five local defense volunteers who had stopped him before he could get near a mosque with over a thousand people inside. The mosque was known for its anti-Boko Haram attitudes and had additional security to prevent such attacks.

July 6, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen attacked a police station and military camps near the Cameroon border. Seven villagers were killed, including one member of a local defense force. Five of the attackers were killed and five captured. Several buildings were set on fire during all this.

In the far north Boko Haram gunmen coming from Nigeria attacked a Cameroon border post. All the Cameroonian soldiers were killed or driven away. The Islamic terrorists looted the border post and fled back to Nigeria.

July 8, 2014: Boko Haram has launched at least 18 attacks in the northeast in the last two weeks. This terrifies the population up there and makes the government look helpless in the face of Boko Haram terrorism.

July 9, 2014: The government announced that recent raids on forest camps of Boko Haram had found documents connecting the Islamic terrorists with northern politicians and political parties. It's a common theme among southern politicians that Boko Haram is actually the creation of northern politicians who the group to make the central government (currently controlled by southern Christians) look bad and help northerners gain control of the national government in the next elections by convincing enough Nigerians that only northern (Moslem) politicians can solve the Boko Haram problem. There is some truth to this, but not much. Some northern politicians have collaborated with Boko Haram, but usually out of fear or strictly for business reasons. Most major politicians have links to criminal gangs or have some of these gangsters on the payroll to take care of dirty work. But few people believe some northern politicians created Boko Haram. This Islamic radical group has easily traced roots in the north that make it clear these Islamic radicals are quite hostile to the northern politicians.

In the northeast Boko Haram gunmen coming from Nigeria attacked a Cameroon border post. One Cameroonian soldier was wounded and blood trails indicated that at least one of the attackers was hit as well.

July 11, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) troops found and seized a Boko Haram camp. Most of the Islamic terrorists got away but several were captured along with nearly a hundred rifles and machine-guns plus bombs, rockets, ammunition and military equipment. This included dozens of army uniforms.

In the capital (Abuja) police uncovered a Boko Haram plot to carry out bombings of transportation targets in the city using time bombs and suicide bombers. Boko Haram has been trying to carry out more attacks in the rest of Nigeria, especially the Christian south but has had limited success. Over 90 percent of Boko Haram violence continues to occur in the three northeastern states.

July 12, 2014: Boko Haram released a new video on the Internet. In it the Boko Haram leader mocked army efforts to defeat the Islamic terrorists and again demanded the release of captured Boko Haram men in return for the kidnapped women and girls. In closing the Boko Haram leader called for Moslems to kill more Christians.

July 13, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen attacked a Christian village, setting fire to three churches and causing dozens of casualties before retreating when the military showed up. The air force killed some villagers by mistake and the final death toll was over 40. The Boko Haram gunfire on the village continued into the next day as some Islamic terrorists continued shooting from the forests.

The three hardest hit states of the northeast are suffering a big hit to their economies. While GDP growth nationally has fallen less than one percent because of Boko Haram violence this year, in those three northern states GDP is shrinking by over ten percent this year. Nationally GDP will grow over six percent this year. Meanwhile just across the border the six million people of northern Cameroon are also suffering an economic disaster because of Boko Haram. The Islamic terrorists have disrupted foreign aid projects there and economic activity in general. Investors are leaving and large scale projects are being suspended until security can be improved. The frequent closing of the Nigerian border hurts as well, because of the large volume of trade that normally moves in both directions.

The U.S. has contributed vehicles, communications gear and protective vests to Nigeria for use by elite units fighting Boko Haram. The U.S. is also providing training and intelligence support. American UAVs and manned aircraft have completed their survey of the three northern states where Boko Haram is most active and have shared that data with other nations providing aerial reconnaissance help. The problem now is for Nigerian ground forces to make use of the data collected. This the Nigerians are reluctant to do because the Boko Haram fighters use booby traps ambushes to defend their rural bases. It's a bloody business going after Boko Haram where they live. Not a lot of Nigerian army or police commanders are eager to take this on. There is also fear of failure, especially when it comes to rescuing all the women being held hostage. Nevertheless the Nigerians have improved their intelligence collecting. Part of this is the result of American electronic eavesdropping technology, which provides a lot of tips on what Boko Haram may be up to and where these Islamic terrorists are operating. This has enabled Nigerian intelligence to develop more informants on the ground. Most Moslems, and nearly all Christians, fear and hate Boko Haram and many will pass on information to the army or police. Foreign intelligence agencies have helped the Nigerians improve their ability to collect and process all these tips and this is providing more timely warnings on what the Islamic terrorists are up to or clues as to the identify of Boko Haram members in the cities. Bombs that are found and disabled and attacks that are otherwise disrupted is not the sort of thing that makes the headlines, but a lot more of it has been happening. What is not so easily fixed is the poor leadership and training found in so many police and army units, as well as the culture of corruption and impunity in the security forces. For the soldiers and police the scariest thing about Boko Haram is their fearlessness and readiness to fight back if attacked. Nigerian soldiers and police are not used to this sort of attitude and are having trouble adapting to it.

In the three northeastern states where most of the Boko Haram violence occurs the schools have been closed for three months now. This is a victory for the Islamic terrorists, who see Western style education as unsuitable for Moslems. But the education efforts in the northeast continue quietly, unofficially and in secret. This, however, plays into the anti-Christian paranoia that Boko Haram tries to exploit. Some northern Moslems support Boko Haram because they agree that the Christians, wherever they are, plot to harm Islam and are secretly trying to use education, medicine and all manner of Western technology to subvert young Moslems and turn them into Christians. This sort of murderous paranoia has long been present in Islamic culture but has been declining in the last century. However there is still enough of it around to sustain groups like Boko Haram.

The government has held secret negotiations with Boko Haram over the release of the female captives and several times it appeared a deal had been made. But every time Boko Haram came up with more demands that were unacceptable or backed away from a deal they had already agreed to. This indicates some dissention in the Boko Haram leadership.

July 15, 2014: Boko Haram continues demanding a prisoner swap. The Islamic terrorists are willing to exchange nearly 300 women and girls they have kidnapped since April for all Boko Haram members held by the government. Understandably officials refused such a trade as it would mean Boko Haram would simply keep kidnapping women in order to get any captured terrorists released. Meanwhile the government has still not rescued the captive women. Despite foreign help with intelligence and air reconnaissance there has been no reported progress in finding or rescuing the captives. Of course if a major rescue effort is in the works it would be a good idea to keep details out of the news. Nevertheless the government continues to be under great public pressure to "do something". In response the government hints at positive developments "soon." These vague promises are seen for what they are; not much.

July 16, 2014: Since May 2014 the U.S. has been providing training and intelligence support for Nigeria as part of an effort to find hundreds of women and girls kidnapped by Islamic terrorist group Boko Haram since April. The girls are believed to be held in some hilly forests in northeast Nigeria. By June American UAVs and manned aircraft completed their initial survey of the three northern states where Boko Haram is most active and shared that data with Nigeria and other nations providing aerial reconnaissance help. The problem now is for Nigerian ground forces to make use of the data collected. This the Nigerians are reluctant to do because the Boko Haram fighters use booby traps, ambushes and ruthless resistance to defend their rural bases. It's a bloody business going after Boko Haram where they live. Not a lot of Nigerian army or police commanders are eager to take this on. There is also fear of failure, especially when it comes to rescuing all the women being held hostage and getting them out alive. It also appears that the hostages are held in several locations, which further complicates the rescue effort.

The U.S. used manned and unmanned (UAV) aircraft and spy satellites for the task. Most of the search aircraft used day and night video cameras as well as heat sensors. There was also at least one electronic surveillance aircraft (an MC-12), which may have proved decisive in finding the girls. The MC-12 and the aerial reconnaissance builds a baseline of data which special American analysis software then compares to all subsequent photo or electronic data collected over the same area and quickly spots and differences, which can then be examined in greater detail. This form of pattern analysis also uses data mining and predictive analysis to tease more useful information out of the masses of information you have and continue to collect. The initial survey was accomplished in a few weeks with less than ten aircraft and UAVs along with a few hundred American personnel. Many more analysts worked on the project from distant bases, some in the United States.

The MC-12 is a Beechcraft King Air twin engine commercial aircraft outfitted for electronic warfare and reconnaissance against irregular forces. So far the MC-12 has been used against numerous Islamic terrorist organizations including the Taliban, various Palestinian and Iraqi terrorist groups, several al Qaeda factions as well as Boko Haram, al Shabaab and several different Malian groups in Africa. The MC-12 is crammed with vidcams, electronic sensors, jammers, and radios. This version of the MC-12 was called Ceasar (Communications Electronic Attack with Surveillance And Reconnaissance) and could spend hours circling an area, keeping troops on the ground aware of enemy walkie-talkie and cell phone use, including location of these devices and translations of what is being discussed. The enemy is often vaguely aware of what the MC-12 can do but have no better way to communicate. Thus the few Ceasar equipped aircraft sent to Afghanistan proved very useful for the American and British troops that used them.

Military use of the King Air arose in the United States (where Beechcraft is located) began in the early 1970s when the U.S. Army adopted the King Air as the RC-12 and then used it for a wide variety of intelligence missions ever since. In 2008 the first American MC-12 squadron was deployed to Iraq, where the twin engine aircraft was found to be durable and reliable. In its first six months there those dozen aircraft flew over a thousand sorties. That's about four sorties per week per aircraft. Most of the 43 MC-12s ordered have been sent to Afghanistan, where they have been worked hard and held up well to the heavy use. In 2010 the U.S. Air Force sent its first MC-12 to Afghanistan and it proved successful. This despite the fact that it could only stay in action for seven hours (plus one to get to the target area) per sortie, which was half as long as a UAVs. But more UAV capabilities (vidcams overhead for hours at a time) were needed in Afghanistan, and it didn't matter if the pilots are in the air or on the ground.

The King Airs were faster than UAVs enabling them to get where they were needed more quickly. More importantly the King Air carried more sensors than a UAV, which enabled it to be outfitted as a Ceasar aircraft. Moreover, having the equipment operators on board, along with a pilot and co-pilot available to just use their eyes on the target area, did make a difference over relying on operators elsewhere in Afghanistan, or somewhere else on the planet. That personal touch still makes a difference

The MC-12 itself is a modified version of the much older RC-12 electronic reconnaissance aircraft. The MC-12 provides the same service as a UAV (full motion video) in addition to electronic monitoring (radio, cell phone, etc.). The King Air 350 is a 5.6 ton, twin engine aircraft. The King Air 350 (and earlier models) has long been used by the U.S. Army and Air Force as a light cargo and passenger transport (the C-12 Huron). The MC-12 in Nigeria probably came from those AFRICOM has deployed in Africa. Most are based in Djibouti where American and French forces have built a large special operations base since September 11, 2001.

Because of all this help and other assistance the Nigerians have been able to improve their intelligence collecting. Part of this is the result of American electronic eavesdropping technology, which provides a lot of tips on what Boko Haram may be up to and where these Islamic terrorists are operating. This has enabled Nigerian intelligence to develop more informants on the ground. Most Moslems, and nearly all Christians, fear and hate Boko Haram and will pass on information to the army or police. Foreign intelligence agencies have helped the Nigerians improve their ability to collect and process all these tips and this is providing more timely warnings on what the Islamic terrorists are up to. Bombs that are found and disabled and attacks that are otherwise disrupted is not the sort of thing that makes the headlines, but a lot more of it has been happening. What is not so easily fixed is the poor leadership and training found in so many police and army units, as well as the culture of corruption and impunity in the security forces. For the soldiers and police the scariest thing about Boko Haram is their fearlessness and readiness to fight back if attacked. Nigerian soldiers and police are not used to this sort of attitude and are having trouble adapting to it.

July 15, 2014: In the northeast (Bauchi state) a much sought Boko Haram commander was captured. The Islamic terrorist, known by the nickname “Chief Butcher” was noted for his eagerness to slaughter women and children.

July 17, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram gunman began moving on the key town of Damboa. Located 53 kilometers north of Maiduguri (the state capital) it sits astride the main road to the north.

Over the next few days Boko Haram killed over a hundred people in and around Damboa and drove security forces out. Many civilians fled as well.

Meanwhile military and police commanders resist letting a lot of foreign advisors into the country for fear that they will publicize the corruption and incompetence in the military and police. These shortcomings are no secret inside Nigeria but the police and military commanders don't want a lot of international attention to their shortcomings. President Jonathan has recently replaced many senior army and police commanders but it remains to be seen if the replacements are any more competent, or less corrupt, than their predecessors.

The government is now asking for nearly $2 billion in loans from foreign countries in order to improve the security forces. President Goodluck Johnson's loan request was turned down, with potential lenders citing the rampant corruption and fears that most of the money would be stolen. Privately Johnathan was told that the main problem is not corruption but incompetence along with politicians and government officials more concerned with getting rich than doing their jobs. Johnathan was reminded that over the last year or so he had allowed competent officials to be removed when they threatened to halt the corrupt practices of senior officials. Johnathan has been getting this from foreign politicians and diplomats for a long time and despite assurances he would deal with the problem, nothing ever happens. Johnathan is running for reelection and there does not appear to be any rivals clean and competent enough to win and replace him.

July 18, 2014: Across the border in Cameroon Boko Haram attacked a police checkpoint killing a policeman and wounding another.

Elsewhere in the northeast (Borno state) gunmen attacked a remote village killing the head of the village, his bodyguard and ten others.

July 23, 2014: In the northeast (Kaduna state) Boko Haram set off two bombs, one in Kaduna city and the other in the town of Kawu, which killed nearly a hundred people. The targets of these two attacks were a prominent anti-Boko Haram religious leader and a powerful local politician. Both of these men escaped injury.

July 24, 2014: In the northeast (Kano state) a Boko Haram bomb killed five people.

Just across the border the six million people of northern Cameroon are also suffering an economic and foreign aid disaster because of Boko Haram. The Islamic terrorists operate in areas where three million people are losing most of their foreign aid and economic development projects. Aid workers, both locals and foreigners, are fleeing the area along with a lot of the people they are serving. The Islamic terrorists have disrupted foreign aid projects there and economic activity in general. Investors are leaving and large scale projects are being suspended until security can be improved. Many projects are not just suspended but heavily damaged by looters and neglect. Until the governments on both sides of the borders can get sufficient security forces into the area, coordinate their operations and deal with the Islamic terrorists, the situation will continue to get worse. This is fine with Boko Haram, whose strategy involves destroying all Western influences and then building a new authentically (7th century) Islamic society out of the wreckage. Most people in the area want no part of this, but when the proponents of this catastrophic policy are homicidal maniacs, effective resistance is useless.

As much as the government would like the issue to disappear the families of the more than two hundred girls still held captive by Boko Haram will not go away or stop publicizing the plight of their daughters and the inability of the government to do anything about it. Since April 14th, when the first Boko Haram raid in the northeast took nearly 300 girls from a boarding school the security forces have been unable or unwilling to find and rescue the girls. More girls have been taken since then but overall about a third of them have escaped. Boko Haram demanded that the government release all imprisoned Boko Haram in exchange for the release of the girls. The government refused and the Islamic terrorists threaten to sell the girls into slavery. Since April eleven parents of missing girls have died in the dozens of Boko Haram raids in the same area of the northeast where most of the kidnappings took place. Many parents continue to get media attention as they press the government to do something. The parents make no secret of why the government has not rescued the girls. Corruption and incompetence have been the only constants in Nigerian politics since independence was achieved in the 1960s. It's a national shame despite continuing efforts to curb the corruption and encourage honest and competent Nigerians to get themselves elected and turn the country around.

There is already one area approaching this degree of disorganization. In the northeast, the northern half of Borno state, an area that borders Cameroon, Chad and Niger, has largely come under Boko Haram control. The main road to the north is now blocked by Boko Haram. This was accomplished two weeks ago when a Boko Haram activity on the road and a raid on the town of Damboa, which is on this highway, drove out soldiers and police and most government officials. Since then Boko Haram has controlled Damboa and easy access to the northern half of Borno state. The army says it is preparing to clear Boko Haram out of Damboa and open the road but so far nothing has happened. Nearly 20,000 civilians have (so far) fled Damboa and points north, not willing to live under such Boko Haram created chaos.

July 25, 2014: So far this year Boko Haram has made about a hundred attacks and killed over 2,500 people, most of them unarmed civilians. As long as Boko Haram can escape the security forces by crossing the border the security forces will not be able to deal with the constant raids. The Boko Haram violence actually has a goal, and that is to terrorize civilians, officials and security forces in the region sufficiently so that no one will oppose whatever the Islamic terrorists want to do. As a result many civilians are fleeing the region rather than submit to Boko Haram rule. Most people stay where they are but the Boko Haram terror makes it easier to the Islamic terrorists to extort cash, goods and services from the locals. Boko Haram loots at will and takes what they want. Boko Haram does not have competent people to actually administer the territories they control meaning that these areas will become zones of chaos and violence as Islamic terrorists, armed militias and criminal gangs do whatever they want and battle each other for scarce resources. Tribal leaders have militias they can arm and deploy to provide some security, as can politicians who tend to keep lots of gangsters on the payroll to ensure winning the next election. Just because the government fails does not mean total failure. Many will organize to defend themselves, but without the relative security a government provides travel will be difficult and things like electricity and cell phone service will be difficult to maintain.

July 27, 2014: In the northeast (Kano city) a female suicide bomber wounded five police officers. Elsewhere in the city a 15 year old female suicide bomber exploded but only killed herself. Elsewhere a bomb went off at a church killing five people while another bomb in a mosque was discovered and disabled before it went off.

In northern Cameroon Boko Haram gunmen attacked the town of Kolofata, killing three people and kidnapping six, including the mayor and the wife of the Cameroon vice prime minister. The vice prime minister is from Kolofata and he and his wife were back to celebrate Ramadan. The vice prime minister was not at home when Boko Haram attacked his home and grabbed his wife. Cameroonian troops soon arrived in Kolofata and began searching for the Boko Haram hostages and their kidnappers. Cameroonian troops caught up with the kidnappers two days later and after several hours of fighting (that left 16 dead) the wife of the vice prime minister was rescued.

July 28, 2014: EBOLA OUTBREAK: Nigeria On High Alert, outbreak put a number of countries in a lockdown. Ebola May Expand It’s Deadly Reach Beyond Africa, 670+ people in West Africa dead + spread to 60 locations in four countries. The worst Ebola outbreak in history has put a number of countries in West Africa in lockdown, led to the deaths of nearly 700 people since February and brought new reports of doctors, including Americans, contracting the virus they are attempting to contain.

The situation is undeniably scary.

How bad is the outbreak? Bad — very, very bad. It's concentrated in three small West African states: Sierra Leone, Liberia and Guinea, where reports of Ebola infections first emerged in February. The outbreak has claimed more than 670 lives and, worryingly, infected medical personnel attempting to stop its spread. A prominent Liberian physician died Sunday. What's particularly scary, though, was the recent death of a Liberian man in Lagos, the bustling coastal mega-city in Nigeria, Africa's most populous country. The man, a consultant for the Liberian government, had traveled from Liberia through an airport in Lome, the capital of Togo, before arriving in Nigeria. The hospital where he died is under lockdown, and the WHO has sent teams to Togo and Nigeria.

Doctors Without Borders has described the Ebola epidemic sweeping across West Africa as “out of control.” The Ebola virus, which is fatal in 90 percent of cases, has killed more than 670 people in West Africa and spread to 60 locations in four countries. The obstacles to bringing the virus under control are formidable, among them a shortage of medical resources and resistance from local communities terrified by a disease they do not understand. The current outbreak began in Guinea in March. Sierra Leone is now the epicenter of the epidemic. The situation is deteriorating rapidly in Liberia. On Friday, a man died of an Ebola infection in Lagos, Nigeria.

Nurses and doctors are also falling victim to the disease. Two American aid workers have tested positive, and a doctor at Liberia’s largest hospital, the John F. Kennedy Memorial Medical Center in Monrovia, has died of the disease. The virus is amplified by a mobile population, especially across the shared borders between Guinea, Sierra Leone and Liberia. In the Nigerian case, the infected victim entered on a passenger flight from Liberia. The World Health Organization and the Nigerian government have shut down the hospital where the man died, and other passengers on the flight are being tracked down and tested.

Infected individuals must be isolated in health centers to prevent the virus from spreading to others and to give them the care they need. Bodies of victims must also be disposed of with care: The virus, present in bodily fluids, including sweat, is most infectious at the end-stage. Then there is widespread ignorance among the most vulnerable populations about what needs to be done. The result is that many people are hiding sick loved ones at home and transporting bodies for burial with no understanding of the precautions they must take.

Liberia’s president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, has declared a national Ebola emergency. The governments of Guinea, Sierra Leone and Nigeria must also act with equal urgency to raise public awareness, put additional trained medical personnel on the ground and trace patients' contacts with others. The current Ebola outbreak is more than a sum of national emergencies. It is now a regional crisis, and the whole of West Africa must act to contain it. (Text ends)

July 28, 2014: In the north (Yobe state) Boko Haram blew up a bridge after first chasing away the soldiers who were supposed to be defending it. Prior to that eight people died as several Boko Haram vehicles drove past the nearby army camp and through the town of Katarko to the bridge with the gunmen firing as they went. The soldiers at the bridge fled as the Islamic terrorists approached. This is the fifth bridge Boko Haram has destroyed since April. These bridges are destroyed to keep troops from easily getting to Boko Haram controlled areas to the north, at least during the rainy season. During the dry season vehicles can often cross at fords.

Elsewhere in the northeast (Borno state) the state government banned the use of vehicles by civilians during the next three days to make it more difficult for Boko Haram to carry out car bombings during the annual three day Islamic Eid celebration (at the end of Ramadan).

July 29, 2014: In the northeast (Katsina state) police stopped a car and arrested three suspected Boko Haram members. One was a ten year old girl with explosives strapped to her chest. Boko Haram is believed to have convinced several dozen girls and young women to be suicide bombers.

July 30, 2014: In the northeast (Kano city) a female suicide bomber killed six people at a college campus. This was the fourth local use of a female suicide bomber in the last week.

Off the coast pirates abandoned a 3,200 tanker from Singapore after seizing it on July 26th and looting the cargo and any portable valuables belonging to the ship or its crew. The crew of 21 was not harmed but such thefts are becoming increasingly common off West Africa. This ship was taken off the nearby coast of Ghana by a Nigerian gang and then moved to Nigerian waters for a more through looting. Ship location devices were disabled and crew locked up while the looting took place. The pirates do not kill the crews as this might trigger an international response as it did off Somalia. The pirates just want the money or anything (like maritime electronics and oil) that can quickly be turned into cash (via known merchants operating along the coast).

August 3, 2014: In the northeast (Kaduna state) gunmen from a local Moslem Fulani tribe attacked a Christian worship service killing a security guard and wounding several worshippers before being driven off. This sort of violence predates Boko Haram by several centuries. Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian and pagan farmers in the north and in Central Nigeria (especially around the city of Jos) for decades. The violence has gotten worse in the last decade and there were over a thousand casualties in 2013. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want. The Christian and pagan tribes fight back.

Despite the problems with troop reliability Nigeria, Niger, Chad and Cameroon are proceeding to implement a July agreement where each country will contribute 700 troops to form an international force to patrol the area where all their borders meet in northeast Nigeria.

The government is unable to defend the population in the north because the security forces (national police and military) are corrupt and inept. This has long been a problem which has been no secret. Years of media criticism have led the government to say changes will be made but the changes never happen. The main problem is corrupt officers. Stealing army funds and taking bribes (from gangsters, corrupt politicians and even Boko Haram) has cost many officers the loyalty of their own troops. This is especially true when these officers steal funds (sometimes including pay or money for food and fuel) meant for their own troops. As long as this behavior is tolerated the army and police commanders will be ineffective and unreliable. To make matters worse videos have recently appeared showing soldiers slitting the throats of Boko Haram suspects and Nigerians were not surprised. The army has behaved this way for years. The big fear here is that Boko Haram will trigger a major tribal/religious war that will kill millions before everyone turns on the Islamic terrorists in a big way and agrees to a peace. This sort of thing has happened before and despite a general aversion to another round of widespread mayhem there does not appear to be any obvious way to stop it. The willingness is there but not the means. Everyone hopes that ultimately the political, police and military leaders will stop stealing long enough to deal with Boko Haram. Not everyone believes this radical change in behavior will actually happen.

As long as Boko Haram can escape the security forces by running back to a sanctuary the security forces will not be able to deal with the constant raids. The Boko Haram violence actually has a goal, and that is to terrorize civilians, officials and security forces in the region sufficiently so that no one will oppose whatever the Islamic terrorists want to do. Most people stay where they are and submit to the Islamic terrorist demands for cash, goods and services. Boko Haram loots at will and takes what they want. Boko Haram does not have competent people to actually administer the territories they control meaning that these areas will become zones of chaos and violence as Islamic terrorists, armed militias and criminal gangs do whatever they want and battle each other for scarce resources. Tribal leaders have militias they can arm and deploy to provide some security, as can politicians who tend to keep lots of gangsters on the payroll to ensure winning the next election. Just because the government fails does not mean total failure of order up there. Many will organize to defend themselves, but without the relative security a government provides travel will be difficult and things like electricity and cell phone service will be difficult to maintain. At the moment Boko Haram is the most powerful gang in the northeast and all the other power brokers in the area are being told to cooperate or die. No one but Boko Haram has suicidal bombers and assassins. What gives Boko Haram their edge is that they are not just willing to kill, they are also willing to die while doing so.

Boko Haram has succeeded in creating a sanctuary in the northern half of Borno state, an area that borders Cameroon, Chad and Niger. The main road to this area is now blocked by Boko Haram. This was accomplished in early July when Boko Haram gunmen attacked traffic on the road and raided the town of Damboa, which is on this highway. This drove out soldiers and police and most government officials. Since then Boko Haram has controlled Damboa and easy access to the northern half of Borno state. The army has been unable to clear Boko Haram out of Damboa and open the road. Over 600,000 civilians have (so far) fled the northeast. Most refugees are now coming from areas around Damboa and points north, because they are not willing to live under such Boko Haram created chaos. But most of the refugees were created before May and the number fleeing has increased since then. The government has been quiet about what the army is going to do about all this.

So far this year Boko Haram has taken control of many rural areas in the northeast (Borno, Yobe, and Adamawa states). There have been over a hundred attacks Boko Haram attacks this year and this has left over 2,600 people (most of them unarmed civilians) dead. Most of these attacks have been in the northeast but a growing number are in the Christian south. This year there were bombings in four of Nigeria’s five largest cities (which prompted a massive anti-Boko Haram reaction by local police and civilians). Police have uncovered Boko Haram supporters among the Moslem minority in the south and this could lead to the Christian majority turning on the Moslem minority with uncontrolled violence. Not just because of the terror bombings but because of the hundreds of Christians Boko Haram has killed in the north and over 100,000 Christians who have fled the northeast because Boko Haram is going after Christians up there and there are new attacks every week. Most Islamic clerics in the north oppose Boko Haram violence, often in the face of Boko Haram death threats. This helps Christian clergy in the south make the case that all Moslems are not guilty for the sins of Boko Haram. This has kept anti-Moslem violence under control in the south, but the anger keeps growing among southern Christians.

August 6, 2014: Boko Haram goals are vague but they involve turning Nigeria and neighboring countries into a religious dictatorship. Boko Haram appeals to many young men (and some young women) because of the religious angle and the use of violence "in the name of God." This sort of thing breaks out periodically in Moslem areas as such unrestricted "jihad" (struggle) is part of Islamic doctrine. These violent outbreaks eventually die out, but not before doing a lot of damage.

Boko Haram Kills 2,053 Civilians in 6 Months - Apparent Crimes Against Humanity'

(APO ANALYSIS) ABUJA, NIGERIA — The Islamist insurgency Boko Haram in Nigeria killed at least 2,053 civilians in an estimated 95 attacks during the first half of 2014, Human Rights Watch said today. The figures are based on detailed analyses of media reports as well as field investigations. The killings and other abuses were part of widespread attacks on civilians in over 70 towns and villages in northeastern Nigeria, in the federal capital, Abuja, and elsewhere that are apparent crimes against humanity.

There has been a dramatic increase during 2014 in the numbers of casualties from bomb blasts, including several apparent suicide bombings. Since January, at least 432 people have been reported killed in 14 blasts in crowded marketplaces, a brothel, a technical college, and, on two occasions, places where people were watching soccer matches. Three of these attacks were in Maiduguri, the Borno state capital; two in Kano; two in Jos, the Plateau state capital; and three in Abuja, the federal capital. The Abuja attacks may demonstrate a southward trend of Boko Haram operations, Human Rights Watch said.

"Boko Haram is effectively waging war on the people of northeastern Nigeria at a staggering human cost," said Corinne Dufka, West Africa director at Human Rights Watch. "Atrocities committed as part of a widespread attack on civilians are crimes against humanity, for which those responsible need to be held to account."

The bulk of the attacks and casualties credibly reported and investigated by Human Rights Watch took place in Borno State, the birthplace of Boko Haram, where 1,446 people died. Attacks killed 151 in Adamawa state and 143 civilians in Yobe state.

Human Rights Watch compiled the figures by analyzing credible local and international media reports, and the findings of human rights groups, as well as interviewing witnesses and victims of numerous attacks. The media reports generally quoted villagers, hospital and morgue workers, police and military officials, and local leaders who had observed, registered, counted or buried the dead. In the vast majority of cases, Boko Haram forces appeared to deliberately target civilians.

Since 2009, Jama'atu Ahlis Sunna Lidda'awati wal-Jihad, Nigeria's Islamist insurgency popularly known as Boko Haram, has waged a violent campaign against the government to impose its authority under Sharia (Islamic) law. Widespread poverty, corruption, security force abuses, and longstanding impunity for a range of crimes have created a fertile ground in Nigeria for militant armed groups like Boko Haram.

The pace of attacks has dramatically intensified in remote villages since May 2013, when the federal government imposed a state of emergency in the northern states of Borno, Adamawa, and Yobe.

In many of the attacks Boko Haram gunmen fired on civilians, such as people gathered in busy marketplaces, places of worship, and residential neighborhoods. In three villages in Gwoza Local Government Area, Borno State, in early June, Boko Haram fighters impersonated military personnel to round up hundreds of villagers, then opened fire on them, media reports said. Two local chiefs from Attagara, one of the villages, told journalists they had buried 110 people killed in the attack.

On May 6, Boko Haram fighters allegedly killed 336 villagers in the twin towns of Gamboru-Ngala during an attack in which they used two armored personnel carriers they had stolen from the Nigerian military several months earlier. Residents reported that the villages had been burned to the ground.

Boko Haram's kidnapping of 276 girls from a school in Chibok in April was not its only attack on schools in the northeast. In February, Boko Haram militants locked the doors to a boys' dormitory of the Federal Government College of Buni Yadi, a secondary school near Damaturu, Yobe State and set the building on fire, killing 59.

Boko Haram forces have abducted and otherwise abused hundreds of women and girls during the attacks. Human Rights Watch will release a report in coming weeks on abuses by Boko Haram against girls and women, based on interviews with victims and witnesses in June. The report will also examine the deficiencies in the Nigerian government's response to these abuses.

The killings and other abuses by Boko Haram appear to rise to the level of crimes against humanity. The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, to which Nigeria is a party, defines crimes against humanity as various criminal offenses, including murder, torture and rape that are "committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population, with knowledge of the attack." Such crimes can be committed by a government or a non-state group. They must be widespread or systematic, but need not be both. “Widespread” refers to the scale of the acts or number of victims. A “systematic” attack indicates “a pattern or methodical plan.”

Since 2009, and increasingly since mid-2013, Boko Haram has carried out several hundred attacks against civilians and civilian structures in schools, marketplaces, and places of worship in villages, towns and even cities. The nature and frequency of the attacks indicate the actions of an organized movement. This is evidenced by the presence of convoys of trucks, motorbikes, and occasionally armored personnel carriers with well-armed gunmen; the fashion in which gunmen were seen deploying in and around the target or setting up checkpoints; and the planning required to infiltrate the cities in which attacks took place.

Human Rights Watch and other national and international human rights groups have also documented abuses by the Nigerian Security Forces since 2009 as they responded to the attacks by Boko Haram. These include excessive use of force, burning homes, physical abuse, and extrajudicial killings of those suspected of supporting Boko Haram. Amnesty International found that following a March 14 Boko Haram attack on Giwa Barracks that led to the escape of hundreds of detainees, the security forces executed hundreds of the unarmed recaptured detainees.

Security forces have rounded up hundreds of men and boys suspected of supporting Boko Haram, detained them in inhuman conditions and physically abused or killed them. Many others have been forcibly disappeared. The Nigerian government should account for the “disappeared” and ensure that all law enforcement operations are conducted in full accordance with international human rights standards.

“No matter how egregious the violence, Nigerian security forces engaged in operations against Boko Haram may not operate outside the law,” Dufka said. “The Nigerian government should recognize that it needs to protect its population both from Boko Haram and from abusive members of its own military and police.” SOURCE: Human Right Watch (HRW)

August 6, 2014: Boko Haram seized control Gwoza, another town on the road to Cameroon and long used by Boko Haram but not, until now, taken over by them. Gwoza is largely Christian and this attack, which left over a hundred (most of them civilians) dead was seen as part of the Boko Haram effort to chase all Christians from the largely Moslem north. The Islamic terrorists looted and burned much of the town and were still at it when the army showed up two days later.

August 7, 2014: A U.S. court approved the seizure and return to Nigeria of $480 million that former Nigerian dictator Sani Abacha had stolen (mostly from Nigerian oil revenue) and stashed in the United States during his 1992-98 rule.

August 8, 2014: The army drove Boko Haram out of two towns (Gwoza and Damboa) in the northern half of Borno state, an area that borders Cameroon, Chad and Niger. The main road to this area was blocked by Boko Haram occupying these two towns. Boko Haram gunmen drove security forces out of Damboa, which is on this highway, a month ago. Since then Boko Haram has controlled Damboa and easy access to the northern half of Borno state. For a month the army has been unable to clear Boko Haram out of Damboa and open the road. Nearly 700,000 civilians have fled the northeast so far to avoid all this Islamic terrorist activity, with about a third of them fleeing since May. Most refugees are now coming from areas around Damboa and points north, because they are not willing to live under such Boko Haram created chaos. The army has been moving more troops into the area over the last few weeks and some kind of operation was expected.

August 9, 2014: The government has declared the Ebola Virus outbreak a national emergency. The latest outbreak of Ebola began earlier this year in Guinea and most of the 1,300 who have died so far have been in Liberia, Guinea and Sierra Leone.

August 10, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked a village near the Chad border and kidnaped 85 people. Several days later Chadian troops rescued the kidnapped villagers from an island in nearby Lake Chad and arrested six of the kidnappers as well.

Meanwhile some pirates off the Nigeria coast and near the Malacca Strait have developed more complex but much more lucrative tactics. This involves recruiting someone who knows how to find and turn off maritime tracking devices as well as someone familiar with marine engines. This makes it impossible for the ship owner to track the ship. Then the pirates use their own personnel or force the crew to move small tankers to remote locations where most of the cargo (of oil) can be transferred to another ship and later sold on the black market. While that sort of thing requires a lot of organization, nerve and luck there have been at least two pirate gangs, one in Nigeria and another from somewhere around the Malacca Strait (Singapore, Malaysia or Indonesia) that have figured out how to do this. Nevertheless most of the attacks off Nigeria and Malacca Strait are still armed robbery. Given the amount of portable electronics on a seagoing ship (both company and personal), a half dozen armed pirates can net several thousand dollars per ship hit. There are fences on shore who pay cash for this stuff and quickly move it out of the country. But stealing several thousand tons of fuel oil from a small tanker is worth a thousand times more.

August 14, 2014: In the southeast (Bayelsa state) the JTF (Joint Task Force of army, navy and police) found and raided a camp used by pirates to prey on passenger and cargo boats serving communities in the Niger River Delta. All the pirates escaped the approaching soldiers although some appear to have been wounded. Much equipment and weapons were captured including six speedboats and lots of recently taken loot. The pirates were young (teens and twenties) men. The captured material may provide useful clues to who the pirates were but for the moment these guys probably have enough cash to resume their attacks.

In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked a village and kidnapped several dozen men and boys.

August 15, 2014: In the southeast (Bayelsa state) a union representing crewmen on commercial boats have threatened to strike if the government does not do something to reduce the number of pirate attacks within the Niger River Delta.

August 18, 2014: Cameroon has closed all its borders with Nigeria to prevent the Ebola Virus from spreading into Cameroon. Ebola has killed over 1,300 people in West Africa in the last nine months and at least a dozen in Nigeria appear to be infected and four have died so far. Ebola spreads by contact with fluids from an infected person. The Ebola virus can survive in those fluids (usually blood) for up to five days outside the infected person. Worse, most of those infected with Ebola die. That said, Ebola is at the moment a tiny (fraction of one percent) portion of disease deaths in Africa and outbreaks have been stopped in the past by isolating the infected until they recover or die and then disposing of the body safely. But since an infected person does not show symptoms until about five days after infection there is fear that the disease could spread to a lot of people.

Dozens of villages in northwestern Cameroon are deserted because of Boko Haram raids from the northeastern Nigeria bases (mainly in Borno State) that Boko Haram has established on the Nigerian side of the border. The Cameroon security forces have been able to shut down many Boko Haram bases on the Cameroon side of the border but have not been able to coordinate those operations with similar ones by the Nigerian Army on the Nigerian side of the border.

In the northeastern cities, where there is no visible Boko Haram presence, there are a growing number of suicide bombings, often carried out by women who conceal the explosives under their hijab (similar to a burqa, which covers them completely). As a result police and soldiers are carefully searching those in a hijab (which is common among the more religious Moslem women in the northeast). That has resulted in a low fewer women wearing the hijab and those who do are subject to more scrutiny.

And then there is the possibility of a Forever War. Boko Haram could survive for a long time via their tactics of looting and kidnapping. Those taken are usually enslaved but suitable candidates are turned into Islamic terrorists. All this is emulating the tactics of Christian terrorist organization from northern Uganda that began in 1987 and is still going. This is the Lords Resistance Army (LRA) that has sustained itself via looting, kidnapping, brainwashing (of young captives), random atrocities and slavery. It also has a long history of committing vicious and violent crimes, atrocities like mass murder, mass kidnapping, public rapes, and mutilation (with machetes and hand axes) of the living and the dead. That’s because the LRA has found that spectacular violence attracts media attention and it frightens defenseless rural populations. LRA found that if they could do both their movement could survive vigorous efforts to destroy it. Media attention, even negative attention, gave LRA a measure of political power. While the Ugandan Army managed to drive the LRA out of Uganda with the 2002-8 "Iron Fist" operation, and then resettle over a million terrified (by LRA) Ugandans living in refugee camps in northern Uganda, the LRA continued to exist in exile. Often down to less than 200 gunmen, the LRA has wandered through Congo, Sudan and the CAR (Central African Republic), living off the rural population. In a quarter century of violence LRA has left nearly 100,000 dead and millions of people driven from their homes. Boko Haram, which has killed about 10,000 since getting started in 2005, is headed in the same direction according to those who have managed to escape from Boko Haram or were freed by the army. The scariest aspect of this is how Boko Haram has learned how to brainwash teenage captives, both male and female, to become Islamic terrorists. This includes a growing number of female suicide bombers.

August 18, 2014: Nigeria: 'Economy may lose US$3.5b to Ebola'

The Ebola Virus Disease (EVD) may cost the Nigerian economy US$3.5 billion by December if it has not been contained by then, according to the Chief Executive Officer, Financial Derivatives Company Ltd., Mr. Bismarck Rewane,

The local media reported Monday that Mr. Rewane made the assertion in the firm's latest report, noting that the fear of the disease had affected economic activities significantly.

He listed the sectors of the economy mostly affected by the fear of the disease as aviation, tourism and hospitality, trade, medical and agriculture.

“Analysing these sectors’ contribution to the Gross Domestic Product shows that Nigeria may lose about $2bn in the first quarter of the outbreak. The chance of the outbreak going into a second quarter is very slim; which could extend the loss to $3.5bn,” Mr. Rewane said. The EVD has generated much fear in Africa's most populous nation since it was reported there on 25 July, when a Liberian infected with the virus died of the disease in Nigeria's commercial city of Lagos.

Since then, three Nigerians have died while six are undergoing treatment. Out of the six, one person has been discharged after successful treatment while the remaining five are said to be recovering well. The World Health Organization (WHO) said no new EVD cases have been reported in Nigeria, even though almost 200 people have been put under surveillance. According to WHO, 1,145 people have died of the disease mostly in Guinea, Liberia and Sierra Leone since the latest outbreak, which started in December 2013 in Guinea.

August 20, 2014: Nigeria: Quoted firm outlines plan to expand petroleum marketing operations’

One of the quoted companies on the Nigerian Stock Exchange (NSE), Forte Oil Plc, has outlined plans to expand its operations in the West African sub-region, particularly Nigeria, with a view to achieving market dominance, according to the Company’s Group Chief Executive Officer (GCEO), Mr. Akin Akinfemiwa.

“Our immediate strategic initiatives are to further strengthen our corporate Governance structure. This is a subject that will continue to give investors confidence to buy into the company,” Mr. Akinfemiwa told the gathering on the floor of the exchange. The occasion was the presentation of the ‘Facts Behind The Figures’, an avenue for investors, stock brokers and shareholders to interact and get useful information on the Company’s operation.

“We hope to achieve market dominance through the expansion of retail infrastructure, commercial business and Non-Oil Fuel Revenue (NFR). The expansion is continuous, there is no time base. ''We want to make Forte Oil sales outlet a one-stop shop, where you can enjoy other services such as car wash, buy recharge cards, cell phones and relax all within 3 kilometres radius to each other across Nigeria,” he added. With a strategic network of 500 retail outlets in 36 states, Forte Oil ‘s downstream petroleum operations extend to Ghana, where its subsidiary maintains significant network of retail outlets.

Mr. Akinfemiwa said the Ghana outlet was part of the regional expansion plans into other West African countries such as Liberia, Sierra Leone and Togo, leveraging Ghana as a hub. With market capitalisation of US$712 million, as at March, 2014 and a shareholders of 160,000, the largely petroleum products marketing, oil/gas company has diversify into power generation.

It successfully purchased the 414 Mega Watt (MW) Geregu Power Plant, one of the largest of such, located in North-Central Kogi State. Forte Oil Plc started operation in Nigeria on 11 Dec., 1964, as British Petroleum Nigeria Ltd. It later became African Petroleum (AP) before adopting the present name.

August 20, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) several dozen soldiers in an infantry company stationed outside the state capital of Maiduguri have mutinied and refused to go out on patrol unless they get better weapons and equipment as well as more ammunition. This sort of thing is not a surprise to troops serving in the northeast. Pressure (popular, political and media) to "do something" about Boko Haram has forced the military to establish a lot of checkpoints in areas where Boko Haram is believed to have camps and run a lot of patrols in isolated rural areas. In response Boko Haram has found they can mass enough gunmen to attack these checkpoints and patrols with a fair chance of success. That means lots of highly visible "defeats" for the army and a blow to morale because of the many dead and wounded soldiers. The army doesn't like to discuss this very real conundrum they are in and are hoping that one of their field commanders will come up with new tactics that will speed up the detection and destruction of the Boko Haram camps and the Islamic terrorists who depend on them. That has not happened yet. The government has been reluctant to ask for foreign help but the troops out in the bush are eager for any edge they can get, no matter where it comes from. Moreover, some of the Nigerian officers and troops have received training from American troops, who impressed with their accounts of how U.S. forces operated in Iraq and Afghanistan. Nigerian troops admire fellow professionals who have succeeded in difficult situations and the combat troops in general are willing to share. Many Nigerian soldiers, especially junior officers, have access to the Internet and visit sites frequented by combat troops and know that help is available if only their own government would act. The frustration among the troops and their families is growing. That can be seen in several recent demonstrations by wives and children of soldiers, to protest the leadership problems.

August 21, 2014: In the northeast (Yobe state) Buni Yadi Boko Haram raided and looted the place regularly over the last month but now has moved in permanently. Not many civilians left in the town and these will flee is the army tries to liberate the place.

August 24, 2014: Boko Haram released a video declaring the establishment of an Islamic state in the north east with its first capital in the town of Gwoza. This action is heavily influenced by a similar move in Iraq by Islamic terrorists there.

August 25, 2014: On the Cameroon border Boko Haram seized the town of Gamboru Ngala. This town was pretty much abandoned, largely as a result of a Boko Haram attack in May that left 300 residents dead. Some 500 soldiers and thousands of civilians fled to Cameroon after Boko Haram attacked the nearby towns of Ashigashyia and Kerawa. Ashigashyia is on the river with half the town in Nigeria and the other half in Cameroon. Boko Haram tried to advance into the Cameroon part of town but were repulsed by Cameroonian soldiers.

In the south one of the major foreign oil firms (Royal Dutch Shell) in Nigeria is selling some $5 billion worth of its Nigerian oil facilities. Shell is fed up with the persistent oil theft, which leaves pipeline punctured and inoperable for days at a time until repairs are made. Locals tend to blame Shell for the mess rather than the oil thieves. Two other foreign oil companies (Total and Eni) are also selling Nigerian assets and another $10 billion in oil properties are expected to be up for sale in the next two years. The foreign oil companies see the government as unwilling or unable to deal with the oil theft (local politicians are now believed involved and protecting some of the gangs) or the massive theft of oil income by government officials.

August 27, 2014: Across the border in Cameroon soldiers fired mortar shells at Boko Haram men in the Nigerian town of Gamboru Ngala. The Islamic terrorists suffered several casualties and were discouraged from raiding into Cameroon. Nevertheless over a hundred Boko Haram gunmen entered Cameroon but were attacked by soldiers who killed at least 27 of the Islamic terrorists and drove the rest back into Nigeria.

August 31, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked Bama. Troops repelled the first attack but the Islamic terrorists returned with reinforcements and overnight and into Monday drove out soldiers and police. The attackers suffered over a hundred casualties (most of them killed) in taking the town. It was several days before the army showed up with reinforcements. Meanwhile over 25,000 civilians fled Bama.

Across the border in Cameroon Boko Haram attacked the town of Fotokol but soldiers showed up, killed at least 40 of the Islamic terrorists and chased the survivors back into Nigeria. One soldier was wounded and several Boko Haram vehicles were captured and destroyed.

September 1, 2014: In Maiduguri the army expanded the curfew two hours so that it is now 7 PM to 6 AM.

September 5, 2014: The air force carried out attacks on Boko Haram forces in Borno state. This was in support of troops attacking Boko Haram forces in Bama, the second largest town in Borno and only 70 kilometers southeast of Maiduguri. Civilians complain that often air force jets will fly over a town occupied by Boko Haram but do nothing except circle the place, high enough to be safe from ground fire.

September 6, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) soldiers on their way to recapture Bama came across and raided a Boko Haram camp 35 kilometers southeast of Maiduguri. This action killed at least fifty Islamic terrorists and captured several vehicles and lots of weapons, ammo and equipment. Bama was later liberated from Boko Haram.

Across the border in Cameroon the army there says they have killed about a hundred Boko Haram over the weekend as several groups of Islamic terrorists found near the border were attacked.

September 7, 2014: In the northeast (Adamawa state) two small towns (Mubi and Michika) were raided and looted by Boko Haram in the last 48 hours. Soldiers sent to retake Michika were ambushed and suffered at least 24 dead. In neighboring Borno state twenty Boko Haram gunmen were killed when they tried to take the town of Biu but were driven away by soldiers.

Over the last few months the government fired some senior commanders in the northeast. The new commanders are being given an opportunity to demonstrate an ability to better deal with the Boko Haram threat. So far there have been some changes which led to more defeats of the Islamic terrorist groups. But Boko Haram remains a potent and growing threat in the northeast. If the security forces cannot turn things around soon there will probably be more new commanders by the end of the year. So far Nigeria has resisted accepting foreign advisors. Some embassies have had their military attaches (officers serving under diplomatic immunity) to informally advise and there have tried to help but the senior officers are hostile to "foreign interference." The military attaches have reported that the Nigerian military has a lot of bad habits and some very poor senior leaders. The elected leaders are a different story and have accepted American and NATO offers of military advisors. But the Nigerian military has not followed through. It's not just pride, but the Nigerian officers have a lot of hide (corruption, incompetence and poor leadership skills). All this is no secret as Western military personnel have encountered these problems when dealing with Nigerian troops on peacekeeping missions. In effect the politicians calling for some competence in the fight against Boko Haram face resistance from their own officers as well as the Islamic terrorists.

In the larger towns Boko Haram sometimes ask the people to stay but few accept that invitation because the Islamic terrorists expect people to live according to restrictive lifestyle rules. Infractions are severely punished.

Enforcement varies from one Boko Haram group to another but one of the more fanatical leaders ordered two men executed for smoking and that news got around quickly.

So far this year Boko Haram violence has caused some 2,100 deaths and left large areas in the northeast, especially in Borno state and along the Cameroon border, depopulated. These raids have forced over 600,000 people from their homes for extended periods. People in smaller towns and villages flee to larger towns or the state capital (Maiduguri). This is the result of more Boko Haram raids on smaller towns in the area. Boko Haram sustains itself by theft and raiding a town, killing all who oppose them and grabbing what they need is what passes for Boko Haram "going shopping." While the looting takes place some Boko Haram men seek out and murder local leaders (of the police, mosques, or vigilante groups).

Meanwhile in Yobe state Buni Yadi was taken in late August and not recaptured. Most of the action was in Borno state. Damboa was captured in July and retaken. Near Lake Chad Marte was taken and forgotten, Gamboru Ngala was taken and abandoned, same with nearby Dikwa. Southeast of Maiduguri, on the Cameroon border, Bama was taken in early September and is still being fought over. Gwoza was taken in early August, is still held and was declared the capital of the new Boko Haram Islamic state. A bit to the south Madagali was captured in early September and still held by the Islamic terrorists.

September 9, 2014: Cameroon reported that it had intercepted and attacked a large force of Boko Haram gunmen crossing the border from Nigeria. Over a hundred of the Islamic terrorists were killed in the clash and the survivors fled back into Nigeria.

September 9, 2014: In the last few weeks Boko Haram has taken control of many rural areas in the northeast (Borno, Yobe, and Adamawa states) and temporarily seized control of several towns. This was done by Boko Haram groups that can muster several hundred gun, moving quickly in dozens of vehicles (cars, SUVs, trucks). Some of the trucks mount heavy machine-guns. The goal of all this is the establishment of an Islamic state based on the largest city in area. That would be Maiduguri, the capital of Borno state and the birthplace of Boko Haram. The problem is that the army retakes the seized towns, except for those that are insignificant (too small or not on a main road). In more and more cases the army garrisons are able to defeat these attacks.

September 12, 2014: In the northeast (Borno State) the army and local militiamen defeated a pre-dawn attack on the town of Konduga and killed over a hundred Boko Haram men. Truckloads of weapons and ammunition were captured as well as some vehicles. Boko Haram apparently planned to use Konduga as a base for a later move towards nearby Maiduguri. This apparently was to be part of a coordinated attack on the city. Boko Haram was surprised by the skill and suddenness of the army defense and apparently lost several leaders during the fighting. Army intelligence had found out about the Boko Haram attack and commanders managed to organize an effective defense without alerting the Islamic terrorists.

September 16, 2014: The army has tried and sentenced twelve soldiers to death for a mutiny they participated in a month ago. This all began in the northeast (Borno state) where soldiers in an infantry company stationed outside the state capital of Maiduguri mutinied and refused to go out on patrol unless they got better weapons and equipment as well as more ammunition. This sort of thing was not a surprise to troops serving in the northeast. Pressure (popular, political and media) to "do something" about Boko Haram forced the military to establish a lot of checkpoints in areas where Boko Haram was believed to have camps and run a lot of patrols in isolated rural areas. In response Boko Haram found they could mass enough gunmen to attack these checkpoints and patrols with a fair chance of success. That meant lots of highly visible "defeats" for the army and a blow to morale because of the many dead and wounded soldiers. The army doesn't like to discuss this very real conundrum and were hoping that one of their field commanders would come up with new tactics that would speed up the detection and destruction of the Boko Haram camps and the Islamic terrorists who depend on them. That happened, but too slowly for the mutineers.

In neighboring Borno State the army battled a large group of Boko Haram near Konduga (35 kilometers outside Maiduguri) and killed over sixty of them and captured dozens of weapons and some vehicles. Boko Haram was apparently trying to drive the security forces out of the town, where the Islamic terrorists suffered a major defeat on the 12th.

September 17, 2014: In the northeast (Kano) Boko Haram attacked a teachers college. This left at least 15 civilians dead and 35 wounded. The Islamic terrorists used two suicide bombers in the attack that was halted by the arrival of police, who killed or wounded some of the attackers as they fled. Most of the casualties were in the lecture hall where the two suicide bombers detonated their explosives.

September 18, 2014: In the northeast a group of Boko Haram gunmen crossed the border into Cameroon and attacked in two places, killing four civilians. Soldiers responded to the first attack and after a few hours had caught up with the Boko Haram men, killed two of them and chased the rest back into Nigeria. One soldier was wounded. These attacks are relatively rare because of the quick and aggressive response of Cameroonian security forces. But the border area is thinly populated and it takes time to reach the site of an incident and chase down the raiders.

The attacks are either for looting or intimidating some of the 40,000 or so Nigerians who have fled to Cameroon to escape the violence.

September 19, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen attacked the market in the town of Mainok (56 kilometers outside of Maiduguri). Over twenty civilians were killed before the security forces intervened, killed at least 13 of the Islamic terrorists and drove the rest out of town. This went on past midnight and the army believes it killed over 40 of the Boko Haram men, many during the pursuit that continues into the next day.

September 22, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) groups of Boko Haram gunmen are increasing their raids around the state capital, Maiduguri. The raiding of towns and villages, which sometimes involves randomly killing civilians and always going after soldiers and police, is depopulating the area around the capital. About half the four million people in Borno state are now living in or very near the capital. A growing number of people in Maiduguri fear this is a prelude to an effort to take the city, or at least establish Boko Haram in the city again. This is the city where Boko Haram began and there would be some symbolism if Boko Haram could conquer the place. The government has responded by replacing a lot of the senior army and police commanders in the northeast and telling the new guys that failure is not an option. This appears to have worked, although Boko Haram has helped by angering so many of the locals with their random killings. Moreover, in the few areas where Boko Haram has been able to settle down their rule has not been much more palatable. Refugees from these areas tell of capricious and cruel rules imposed on civilians and Boko Haram disdain for the suffering their presence causes. This is a typical pattern with Islamic extremist groups, who eventually turn the population they claim to be serving against them. The Boko Haram are correct in accusing the current government as corrupt and inept, but it is becoming clear that Islamic radicalism is not a better alternative. The heavy combat losses Boko Haram has suffered in the last month appears to have demoralized many of their gunmen, who are increasingly surrendering, sometimes with their weapons.

September 23, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) 135 Boko Haram men surrendered near Konduga, where the army has been searching for Boko Haram camps.

September 24, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram gunmen on motorcycles rode through the two towns (Shaffa and Shindiffu) killing 19 and wounding many more. These attacks concentrated on Christians and ten churches were also burned down. Elsewhere in Borno soldiers stopped a truck carrying fifty young men and after questioning discovered that they were Boko Haram members fleeing a recent defeat by soldiers.

Their leaders had been killed and these recent recruits dropped their weapons and fled.

One of the girls kidnapped by Boko Haram in the northeast last April was found wandering around in Adamawa state. She was traumatized and unable to answer questions about her captivity or how she escaped.

September 25, 2014: The army recently claimed to have killed the Boko Haram leader, Abubakar Shekau, or at least the man who appeared on a recent Internet video claiming to be Abubakar Shekau. The army claims to have killed Shekau several times in the last year and it is believed that "Abubakar Shekau" is either the generic name Boko Haram gives to whoever is in charge or that a series of different men have appeared in Boko Haram videos claiming to be Abubakar Shekau.

September 27, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) clashes with Boko Haram in the last three days have left at least 40 of the Islamic terrorists dead along with eleven soldiers (plus three who are missing). Most of these clashes took place in Konduga, Damboa and Benisheik as troops search for Boko Haram men and their camps.

September 28, 2014: Cameroon announced that over 300 Boko Haram members had surrendered in the northeast over the past three weeks and asked for asylum. The Islamic terrorists surrendered large quantities of weapons and ammunition. Across the border in northeastern Nigeria the army has been attacking any Boko Haram it can find in Borno State and apparently chasing some of the Islamic terrorists into Cameroon. Many of those who recently surrendered in Cameroon were identified as having been operating on both sides of the border for months.

October 3, 2014: In the northeast (Adamawa State) hundreds of Boko Haram gunmen have taken control of several villages in the Michika area, looting and then destroying over 500 buildings and terrorizing the local civilians. The people there complain that this has been going on since early September and no soldiers or police have showed up. Over 10,000 people have fled to the state capital (Yola).

October 4, 2014: Boko Haram put a video on the Internet showing the wreckage of an air force jet (a two seat Alpha jet armed for ground attack) that crashed in the northeast on September 11th. Boko Haram claims to have shot it down but the air force denies that. The video also shows a man (identified as the pilot) being beheaded. The other pilot in the Alpha jet was apparently killed on September 11th. The air force first denied that the man being killed in the video was the pilot. But friends of the missing pilot confirmed that the beheaded man in the video was the pilot. After that the air force said it would avenge the death of the pilot with more air raids against Boko Haram.

October 6, 2014: The government believes that the main reason Boko Haram has not been defeated yet is because of continued support for the Islamic terrorists from some clergy and politicians in the northeast. Some of this cooperation is a side effect of the corruption that has long been a prominent feature of political life throughout the country. Politicians will basically deal with anyone, including criminals, if it is in their interest to do so.

In the last month the army has concentrated its efforts in the vicinity of the towns of Konduga, Damboa and Benisheik in Borno State. This was in response to Boko Haram gunmen more frequently raiding around the state capital, Maiduguri. The raiding of towns and villages, which sometimes involved randomly killing civilians and always going after soldiers and police, had depopulated many areas around the capital. About half the four million people in Borno state are now living in or very near the capital. A growing number of people in Maiduguri fear this is a prelude to an effort to take the city, or at least establish Boko Haram in the city again. This is the city where Boko Haram began and there would be some symbolism if Boko Haram could take control. The government responded by replacing a lot of the senior army and police commanders in the northeast and telling the new guys that failure is not an option. This appears to have worked, although Boko Haram has helped by angering so many of the locals with their random killings. Moreover, in the few areas where Boko Haram has been able to settle down their rule has not been much more palatable. Refugees from these areas tell of capricious and cruel rules imposed on civilians and Boko Haram disdain for the suffering their presence causes. This is a typical pattern with Islamic extremist groups, who eventually turn the population they claim to be serving against them. The Boko Haram are correct in accusing the current government as corrupt and inept, but it is becoming clear that Islamic radicalism is not a better alternative. The heavy combat losses Boko Haram has suffered in the last month appears to have demoralized many of their gunmen, who are increasingly surrendering, sometimes with their weapons. Meanwhile Boko Haram appears to have told its men to flee army operations in Borno and shift attacks to neighboring Adamawa State.

Christian leaders in the north, especially senior Roman Catholic clergy, dispute government claims that Boko Haram controls no territory. Catholic leaders say that there at least 25 towns in Borno, Yobe, and Adamawa States that are under Boko Haram control according to Christians living (or recently fled from) there. The Christian clergy accuse the government of ignoring the true seriousness of the security situation in the northeast.

In southeastern Niger the number of Nigerian refugees from Boko Haram violence has grown from 37,000 to over 100,000 in the last year. It appears that nearly 400,000 people in the northeast have fled their homes so far this year to escape Boko Haram. The government believes that Boko Haram violence has killed 13,000 people since 2009.

Secret (or at least unpublicized) negotiations to swap sixteen (the number varies) imprisoned Boko Haram leaders for the 220 schoolgirls kidnapped in the northeast last April have apparently failed because of disagreements within Boko Haram and doubts that Boko Haram actually has control over the 220 girls they claim to hold. It is believed that the captive girls have been dispersed and that no one in Boko Haram really knows where they all are at this point.

Another casualty of the Boko Haram violence in the northeast is economic activity in Borno, Yobe, and Adamawa States. These states are in a semi-desert region that contains only twelve million people, which is only seven percent of Nigerians. A third of the people in the three northeastern states have had their lives disrupted by the Boko Haram violence and the military response. Most of the violence is in Borno state, where 27 counties (including the state capital Maiduguri) have Boko Haram activity. In Adamawa state it's only six counties and in Yobe state it's only five. Thus 71 percent of the counties troubled by Boko Haram are in Borno. The constant raids by Boko Haram and the resulting use of numerous checkpoints on the main roads by soldiers and police have seriously hurt the local economy. Worse, a major new economic activity, producing oil from the new fields discovered in Lake Chad, have been delayed because the companies doing this work will not risk the safety of their employees in the area until Boko Haram is dealt with. This oil (at least three billion barrels, worth over $300 billion) would be a boom to the historically poor northeast.

October 6, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram raided the town of Ngamdu at night and the next morning residents found seven local men had been beheaded by the Islamic terrorists. The victims were believed to be involved with local self-defense militias. Boko Haram is trying to intimidate there local militias into inactivity. So far that is not working as locals believe they must either organize and resist or become slaves to the Islamic terrorists.

In the northeast (Adamawa State) soldiers responded to several hundred Boko Haram gunmen who had seized control of several villages in the Michika area a month ago. Soldiers claim to have killed over a hundred Boko Haram men and forced the others out of the area. Before the army showed up the Islamic terrorists had looted and destroyed over 500 buildings and terrorized the local civilians. The people there complain that this has been going on since early September and no soldiers or police have showed up. Over 10,000 people have fled to the state capital (Yola).

October 10, 2014: Tribal violence continues in central Nigeria (Plateau State) as Moslem raiders attacked Christian villages killing at least 26 people and destroying at least 60 buildings in the last week. This is a continuation of the series of attacks that involve Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen fighting with Christian and pagan farmers outside the city of Jos. The Christians usually retaliate and the violence continues. This has been going on for years. The violence has gotten worse now and there were over a thousand casualties in 2013. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want.

October 11, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) a Christian clergyman, kidnapped by Boko Haram in January, escaped (after heavy rain flooded the camp where he was being held). The clergyman said he had been held in the Sambisa forest. This is a large (60,000 square kilometers), hilly, sparsely populated area where the borders of Borno, Yobe and Adamwa states meet. It has long been a hideout for Boko Haram but the former captive reported that he was moved several times to avoid approaching soldiers.

In Cameroon the government announced the release of 27 people taken by Boko Haram in May and July. The victims included ten Chinese and the wife of Cameroon's deputy prime minister. It is unclear if any ransom was paid, but it is known that police and the military pursued these incidents vigorously and there have been several raids and over a dozen arrests.

October 15, 2014: In the north (Bauchi state) a bomb went off in a bus station killing five and wounding 12. Boko Haram is suspected.

October 17, 2014: In Chad peace talks between Nigerian and Boko Haram negotiators reached an agreement for a cease fire and the release of 200 girls kidnapped earlier in the year. It was implied that the ceasefire would begin immediately but that did not happen, at least for Boko Haram gunmen who continued raiding, looting, killing and kidnapping.

October 18, 2014: In the northeast (Adamawa State) Boko Haram returned to areas around Michika where they had fought with the army earlier in the month. Over the next two days the Islamic terrorists raided thee towns, killing at least 50 people, burning some buildings and leaving. This was apparently to demonstrate the ineffectiveness of the army in clearing Boko Haram from the area.

October 20, 2014: In the northeast there were several clashes with Boko Haram that left five civilians and 25 Islamic terrorists dead. The army did not disclose its casualties.

October 23, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram raided several villages killing at least 17 people and kidnapping over 30 children aged 11-17. The raiders also looted homes and businesses and stole 200 cattle as well. These attacks continued into the weekend.

October 24, 2014: In the south (Bayelsa state) pirates in speedboats ambushed an oil company barge being escorted by a police boat and looted the barge and police boat and took six oil workers and three policemen (and the civilian operating their boat) captive.

Up north, across the border in Cameroon Boko Haram men attacked a village housing refugees from Nigeria. This left four Nigerian civilians dead (and one Cameroon civilian wounded). But Cameroon soldiers showed up and drove them off. Cameroon troops also intercepted two other groups of Boko Haram as they crossed the border, exchanged fire with them and drove the Islamic terrorists back into Nigeria. The army reported that these three clashes left 39 Boko Haram dead. The army did not report their own casualties.

October 26, 2014: The recent peace deal with Boko Haram is highly suspect. Announced with great fanfare by the government on the 18th, it was to include an immediate ceasefire and the release of over 200 teenage girls Boko Haram seized since earlier this year. The peace deal was said to have been agreed to on the 17th but since then the violence has continued and there has been no confirmation from Boko Haram that they had agreed to anything. Chad (which is hosting the talks) and Nigeria insist that the deal is still on, but will not provide details. Since the 17th Boko Haram has kidnapped 60 more girls and made it clear the girls were being taken (usually from Christian villages) for use as sex slaves.

There has long been suspicions that Boko Haram was not a unified organization but a loose coalition of factions operating under the Boko Haram name. If that is the case then a peace deal will be difficult to achieve because the factions do not agree with each other on many issues, especially negotiating with the government. Boko Haram exists mainly to overthrow the government and replace it with a religious dictatorship. According to their spokesmen, Boko Haram believes they are winning and have no need of a ceasefire.

Three years of Boko Haram violence has left at least 14,000 dead and 2014 is the worst year so far. About half of those 14,000 deaths have occurred in the last twelve months. Religious and tribal violence has been common in Nigeria for centuries, but Boko Haram is the worst outbreak in recent times. For example, religious and tribal violence have killed 30,000 people since 1998, with Boko Haram accounting for a large fraction of that. Boko Haram is also different because they are operating in neighboring countries (Chad, Niger and Cameroon) as well. This has led to Nigeria, Benin, Chad, Cameroon and Niger agreeing to form a joint military force (with about 4,000 troops) to operate against Boko Haram and seek to destroy it. This new coalition brigade is supposed to begin operating in November.

October 26, 2014: The government insisted that recent Boko Haram attacks had not jeopardized the ceasefire negotiated with the Islamic terrorists in mid-October.

October 27, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram raided the village of Kukawa, near Lake Chad. The attackers burned down the market place, police station and a government building. Some cares were also set on fire. Police fought back but were outnumbered and retreated along with hundreds of villagers.

October 30, 2014: In the northeast (Adamawa state) over a hundred Boko Haram attacked the towns of Mubi and Uba and forced thousands of residents to flee, some across the border into Cameroon. In Mubi the Islamic terrorists raised their black flag over the palace over a tribal leader and killed several people who worked at a nearby university.

November 1, 2014: Boko Haram released a video on the Internet where they made it clear that there was never any ceasefire deal with the government the 200 or more kidnapped girls (most of them Christians) have converted to Islam and married Boko Haram fighters. Parents of these girls demand the government do something and the dozens of girls who have escaped, some after the forced conversion and marriages also call for a rescue effort.

In the south (Bayelsa state) the local chapter of the Maritime Workers Union of Nigeria declared a strike to protest the lack of police protection from the growing number of pirate attacks.

November 2, 2014: In the north (Kogi state) a group of armed men, believed to be Boko Haram, attacked a prison and released 132 of 145 inmates. One guard was killed and two wounded as the attackers used explosives and gunfire to get in and out. About 25 inmates were soon recaptured or turned themselves in. Boko Haram has freed over 2,200 inmates during attacks on prisons since 2009. There are 57,000 prisoners in 239 jails and prisons throughout Nigeria. Only 32 percent of the inmates have been convicted, the rest are awaiting trial.

In neighboring Yobe state two Boko Haram suicide bombers attacked a procession of Shia Moslems celebrating a religious event. Only one bomb went off, but it killed at least 23 people in a market place. Boko Haram is a Sunni group which, like most Sunni Islamic terrorists believes that Shia are heretics and must be killed.

November 4, 2014: In the north (Gombe state) Boko Haram raided the town of Nafada, robbed a bank, destroyed a police station and attacked a Mosque (where they killed five people, including a cleric). Five soldiers and policemen also died. The raiders then travelled to a French owned cement plant (the largest in Nigeria) and stole dynamite and some trucks. They sought to kidnap some French citizens who ran the plant, but they, and most of the workforce, had fled. Both places were near the border with Yola state, which has been the scene of Boko Haram violence for years.

November 5, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) several hundred Boko Haram raided the town of Malam Fatori. Although they initially overwhelmed the soldiers stationed there and killed 21 people, reinforcements quickly arrived and killed over 30 of the fleeing Islamic terrorists. The reinforcements were from an international force (with troops from Nigeria, Chad and Niger) that was recently organized to protect the area. Many civilians fled the fighting and crossed the border into Niger.

November 9, 2014: Across the border in northwestern Cameroon Boko Haram made six attacks, killing at least three civilians. Soldiers repulsed the attacks and many of the Islamic terrorists fled back to Nigeria.

November 10, 2014: In the north (Yobe state) a female Boko Haram suicide bomber, wearing a school uniform, set off her explosives in a high school assembly, killing 58 and wounding over 70 students and faculty.

November 12, 2014: In the northeast (Adamawa state) soldiers and pro-government militias liberated the town of Mubi. A Boko Haram leader was captured during the battle. Mubi has been attacked by Boko Haram several times since 2012. This time the local pro-government militias took the lead in attacking the Boko Haram in the town at night and driving them out.

November 13, 2014: In the northeast (Yola state) several hundred Boko Haram raided and occupied the towns of Hong and Gombi.

In the northeast (Adamawa state) over 13,000 Nigerians have fled to neighboring Cameroon since late October. Cameroon how hosts over 44,000 Nigerians. Over 700,000 Nigerians have fled their homes to escape Boko Haram violence. Nearly 3,000 have fled to Chad and several thousand to Niger. More than 100,000 have fled to other parts of Nigeria and several hundred thousand have fled to cities in the three northeastern states (Borno, Yobe and Adamwa) where Boko Haram is most active.

November 14, 2014: The government is criticizing the United States for refusing to sell Nigeria AH-64 helicopter gunships. The U.S. refused because of Nigeria's dismal track record maintaining and operating such equipment. The Americans also mentioned the tendency of Nigerian troops to kill lots of innocent civilians with such weapons. The U.S. also pointed out that similar weapons are available from other sources. The government was apparently more upset at the Americans openly discussing the corruption and lethal incompetence of the Nigerian military, something many Nigerians agree with but that the government insists does not exist. American military advisors have been urging the Nigerians to do more about the corruption and poor leadership in the military.

Another embarrassing trend for the military leadership is the increasing strength and capabilities of the officially recognized pro-government militias in the northeast. Officially called the Civilian JTF (Joint Task Force or CJTF), these volunteers receive little material support from the government. In early 2013 Boko Haram began to notice that in northeastern Borno and Yobe states thousands of Moslem and Christian young men were enthusiastically joining the CJTF to provide security from Boko Haram violence and provide information to the security forces about who Boko Haram members are and where they are living. In response Boko Haram openly declared war on CJTF members and threatened to come to their homes and kill them. Most CJTF members cover their faces while assisting the security forces. While the Boko Haram threat certainly terrified some CJTF men (who generally have no firearms), the leadership publicly defied the Islamic terrorists over the threats. The CJTF often operates with heavily armed police or soldiers nearby (ready to move in arrest Boko Haram suspects the vigilantes identify or fire back if Boko Haram attack). By the end of 2013 the army had begun to use the volunteers to replace troops at checkpoints. There are still some armed soldiers nearby, in case Boko Haram tries to attack the civilians, but this new policy has enabled more checkpoints to be set up and more through searches of vehicles to be conducted. This made it more difficult for Boko Haram to move around, plan and carry out attacks or to resupply the few men they still have in the cities. By the end of 2014 some CJTF groups were launching attacks on Boko Haram, and usually winning (because they knew the area and people better and often were able to launch a surprise attack at night). All this CJTF activity made Boko Haram very mad and ready to kill CJTF members whenever they had the chance. But because the CJTF have better information about their home areas, it's difficult for Boko Haram to make revenge attacks. Another disturbing development is that in 2014 more CJTF men obtained weapons via the black market or captured from Boko Haram. It was not illegal for CJTF members to have firearms, but legal firearms are expensive and have to be registered. Rural people tend to ignore the rules and frequently use crude locally made one shot weapons for hunting or home defense. The army doesn't care how the CJTF get weapons or that they have them. In some cases soldiers will unofficially help the CJTF get firearms, often from stuff captured from Boko Haram. This is sometimes done in defiance of their officers, who tend to regard such weapons as their own personal loot and will often take these weapons and sell them on the black market. While most civilians fear the army, they have more trust in and respect for the CJTF, who are usually local men they know. Boko Haram has far fewer admirers in the northeast as even Islamic conservatives up there see Boko Haram as heretical extremists who attack mosques and often kill worshippers. This is considered extremely offensive to most Moslems.

Religious and government leaders in the northeast are pleading with the government to send more troops to their area to deal with the growing Boko Haram violence. The government is reluctant to do so because duty in the northeast is unpopular with officers and troops and people in other parts of Nigeria will complain if troops are removed from their area. There is fear that Boko Haram violence will spread and no one wants to be left defenseless. Meanwhile the Boko Haram violence is ruining the economies of the north. Not just the three states (Borno, Yobe and Adamwa) hardest hit but adjacent states as well. Farmers are fleeing their land for the cities and that eliminates a lot of the normal food supply. Factories are shutting down and the government had to suspend development of oil and gas deposits in Lake Chad and operations run by foreign companies are withdrawing key (non-Nigerian) personnel over fear the Boko Haram will seek foreigners to kidnap and hold for ransom.

November 14, 2014: In the northeast (Kano state) Boko Haram attacked a gas (petrol) station killing six (including three policemen).

November 15, 2014: In the northeast (Adamawa state) Boko Haram tried to take control of two towns but were repulsed by soldiers and CJTF. There were over a dozen casualties. These two attacks were apparently carried out to obtain weapons but the attackers were repulsed and driven out before they could obtain anything.

November 16, 2014: In the northeast (Bauchi state) a female suicide bomber attacked at a major cell phone market killing 13 and wounding 65.

In the south (Niger Delta) a local gang leader (Government Ekpemupolo) kidnapped 15 people, including several journalists, travelling to an event attended by president Goodluck Johnathan. Some of the captives were beaten before all were released. The government refused to go after Ekpemupolo for this because Ekpemupolo is one of the wealthiest and most powerful men in the Niger Delta. He used to support separatist rebels but accepted amnesty in 2009 and became a successful (and very corrupt) businessman. This kidnapping was apparently another move by Ekpemupolo to coerce the government to go along with yet another shady business deal. The government finds it preferable to do business with Ekpemupolo rather than try to arrest and prosecute him.

November 17, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked a village (Azaya Kura) 40 kilometers from the state capital and killed at least 45 people. The Islamic terrorists fled before soldiers or CJTF arrived. This Boko Haram attack also involved a lot of looting.

November 20, 2014: In the northeast, near the Chad border and Lake Chad, Boko Haram ambushed and killed 48 Nigerians from a convoy headed for Chad to buy fish. Attacks like this serve Boko Haram in several ways. First, the murders further terrorize the population. Second the Islamic terrorists obtain some loot (vehicles and whatever cash and other valuables the victims had). Finally these attacks reinforce the idea that the security forces have lost control of the roads in rural areas. To the south soldiers chased Boko Haram out of Chibok, a town the Islamic terrorists had taken control of on the 14th. Chibok was where Boko Haram raided a boarding school in early 2014 and kidnapped over 200 teenage girls.

Cameroon announced the closing of 130 schools near the Nigerian border. The schools were vulnerable to Boko Haram attack. Boko Haram has always targeted secular schools as one of their principal beliefs is that Western education is the cause of Nigeria's problems. Most of the closed Cameroon schools have moved their operations further away from the Nigerian border. The security forces in Cameroon have made it very difficult for Boko Haram to maintain bases in Cameroon so Boko Haram now raids into Cameroon from Nigerian bases.

November 25, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) the capital (Maiduguri) was hit with a bomb attack in the main marketplace that killed 45.

November 27, 2014: In the northeast (Adamawa state) a bomb at a rural bus station leaving at least 30 dead. Police suspect that a Boko Haram man was transporting a bomb that went off prematurely as a bus station is not the usual kind of target the Islamic terrorists go after.

November 28, 2014: In the northeast (Kano state) Boko Haram attacked the largest mosque in the capital (Kano) killing 120 people and wounding even more. Two suicide bombers went in first during religious services and then Boko Haram gunmen shot people fleeing after the explosions. The Moslem religious and tribal leaders of Kano have been hostile to Boko Haram and this attack was meant to intimidate critics. A similar attack on the main mosque in Maiduguri (Borno state) was discovered and thwarted. In Kano angry civilians killed four Boko Haram gunmen outside the mosque and burned the bodies.

December 1, 2014: In the northeast (Yobe state) Boko Haram attacked a police base outside the state capital (Damaturu) apparently to intimidate the police and the young men there who had joined the CJTF. In neighboring Borno state the capital (Maiduguri) the main marketplace was hit with two bombs.

December 1, 2014: Over 150 died, at least half of them civilians with the rest split between security forces and Boko Haram. Local militia joined the police and soldiers to repulse the attack. Elsewhere in the northeast (Maiduguru) two Boko Haram suicide bombers (both teenage girls) killed nearly 40 people in a crowded market place. Elsewhere in the northeast (Borno state) at least 53 Boko Haram died when they attacked a village at night. Soldiers and local militia had detected the Islamic terrorists and met the raiders with gunfire. One soldier and one civilian were killed as well.

December 2, 2014: In central Nigeria (Nasarawa state) a tribal dispute turned violent and left at least nine dead and many more wounded. Nasarawa is just north of Plateau state where there has been years of violence between Moslem herders and Christian farmers. Early in 2014 the army deployed a task force to Benue, Nasarawa and Plateau states to deal with the growing activity of armed groups.

December 2, 2014: More and more of the Boko Haram attacks are against members of pro-government militias in the northeast. This usually means attacks on towns or villages which have a lot of these volunteers. Officially called the Civilian JTF (Joint Task Force or CJTF), these volunteers receive little material support from the government. In early 2013 Boko Haram began to notice that in northeastern Borno and Yobe states thousands of Moslem and Christian young men were enthusiastically joining the CJTF to provide security from Boko Haram violence and provide information to the security forces about who Boko Haram members are and where they are living. That trend continues and now the CJTF and self-defense groups in general have become frequent targets of attacks. Boko Haram openly declared war on CJTF members and threatened to come to their homes and kill them. Most CJTF members cover their faces while assisting the security forces, especially in areas near where they live that contain Boko Haram sympathizers and supporters. While the Boko Haram threat certainly terrified some CJTF men (who generally have no firearms), the leadership publicly defied the Islamic terrorists over the threats.

The CJTF often operates with heavily armed police or soldiers nearby (ready to move in arrest Boko Haram suspects the vigilantes identify or fire back if Boko Haram attack). By the end of 2013 the army had begun to use the volunteers to replace troops at checkpoints. There are still some armed soldiers nearby, in case Boko Haram tries to attack the civilians, but this new policy has enabled more checkpoints to be set up and more through searches of vehicles to be conducted. This made it more difficult for Boko Haram to move around, plan and carry out attacks or to resupply the few men they still have in the cities. Boko Haram responded by attacking checkpoints more frequently and now there are a lot fewer checkpoints.

Despite the checkpoint setback by the end of 2014 some CJTF groups were launching attacks on Boko Haram, and usually winning (because they knew the area and people better and often were able to launch a surprise attack at night). All this CJTF activity made Boko Haram very mad and ready to kill CJTF members whenever they had the chance. But because the CJTF have better information about their home areas, it's difficult for Boko Haram to make revenge attacks. The attacks are made anyway and often fail.

Another disturbing development is that in 2014 more CJTF men obtained weapons via the black market or captured from Boko Haram. It was not illegal for CJTF members to have firearms, but legal firearms are expensive and have to be registered. Rural people tend to ignore the rules and frequently use crude locally made one shot weapons for hunting or home defense. The army doesn't care how the CJTF get weapons or that they have them. In some cases soldiers will unofficially help the CJTF get firearms, often from captured from Boko Haram stuff. This is sometimes done in defiance of their officers, who tend to regard such weapons as their own personal loot and will often take these weapons and sell them on the black market. While most civilians fear the army, they have more trust in and respect for the CJTF, who are usually local men they know. Boko Haram has far fewer admirers in the northeast as even Islamic conservatives up there see Boko Haram as heretical extremists who attack mosques and often kill worshippers. This is considered extremely offensive to most Moslems.

The government continues to feud with the United States for refusing to sell Nigeria advanced weapons. The latest bit of retaliation is the cancellation of the third phase of training by Americans of an army infantry battalion. Two weeks ago the government openly criticized the U.S. for refusing to sell Nigeria AH-64 helicopter gunships and other advanced weapons. The American explanation for that refusal angered Nigerian officials even more. The U.S. refused because of Nigeria's dismal track record maintaining and operating such equipment. The Americans also mentioned the tendency of Nigerian troops to kill lots of innocent civilians with such weapons. The U.S. also pointed out that similar weapons are available from other sources but the U.S. did not want to get involved with the corruption and mismanagement so typical of Nigerian military procurement. The government was apparently more upset at the Americans openly discussing the corruption and lethal incompetence of the Nigerian military, something many Nigerians agree with but that the government insists does not exist. American military advisors have been urging the Nigerians to do more about the corruption and poor leadership in the military. Many Nigerian politicians (from outside the ruling party) criticize the government of allowing corruption and mismanagement weaken the army, leading to constant complaints from the troops that they are poorly equipped and led in the fight against Boko Haram.

Nigeria has the dubious distinction of being one of the primary victims of terrorism on the planet (along with Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan and Syria). These five countries accounted for 80 percent of all terrorism related deaths in 2013 and even more in 2014. Four Islamic terrorist organizations (ISIL, al Qaeda, Boko Haram and the Taliban) account for nearly 70 percent of all terrorist deaths. Many of the lesser terror groups are also Islamic.

December 4, 2014: In the north (Gombe state) Boko Haram raided a French owned cement plant and two towns. While doing this they stole vehicles, robbed a bank, burned some buildings but were eventually driven off by soldiers and police. Boko Haram lost about 67 men while the security forces lost ten. The heavy losses among the Islamic terrorists was largely due to their tendency to drive right into a town without taking into account the possibility of armed soldiers, police and militia lying in wait. Even after their vehicles took heavy fire many Islamic terrorists would keep advancing on foot and get shot.

December 6, 2014: In the west (Niger state) 275 prisoners escaped from a prison after ten gunmen attacked the place at night, shot three guards and opened the cells. It was 15 minutes before police arrived. About 40 percent of the escapees were recaptured within 72 hours but most of them evaded recapture. Boko Haram has staged several similar prison breaks recently but it is unclear if this one was staged by Islamic terrorists.

December 10, 2014: In the northeast (Borno, Adamawa and Bauchi states) raids by the army killed at least 27 Boko Haram and captured documents detailing what places the Islamic terrorists were planning to attack. The documents contained maps showing details of the attacks. Elsewhere in the northeast (Kano state) two Boko Haram female suicide bombers attacked a market and killed four people. Security personnel prevented the two from getting to areas with more people. Witnesses saw the two bombers taking instructions from what appeared to be a man who was their minder and who backed away and escaped after the bombs went off. The use of women is a common Islamic terrorist tactic when these groups are popular and attract female recruits. Their conservative religious doctrine forbids arming women and sending them out to fight alongside men, but being a suicide bomber is acceptable and some women volunteer.

December 11, 2014: In the central Nigerian city of Jos two Boko Haram suicide bombers killed 31 people in a market. Jos has long been the scene of friction between local Christian farmers and Moslem herders moving south in search of pastures and water. Meanwhile in the northeast, across the border in Cameroon, over 400 Boko Haram attacked a border town (Amchide) defended by soldiers and police. Over 180 of the attackers were killed and the attack was repulsed. The army did not report their own casualties, which were apparently low.

December 14, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked a village (Gumsuri) killed 32 people then rounded up 185 villagers (including women and children) put them on trucks and drove off towards the Sambisa Forest (long the location of Boko Haram camps). The captives were probably be used as slaves to tend the camp and move equipment when vehicles cannot do it.

December 15, 2014: In the southeast (Benue state) tribesmen attacked the village of a rival tribe, killing six. This was one of many such clashes this year in Benue state that have left over 400 dead. The Moslem nomadic Fulani tribesmen have been fighting with Christian and pagan farmers in central and southeastern Nigeria for years and also raiding Moslem farmers in the north. The violence has gotten worse now and there were over a thousand casualties in 2013 and it looks to be worse this year. Boko Haram has recently claimed involvement, but that appears to be marginal. The Fulani have long claimed that the government was sending Christian police to persecute them because of their religion (not because they were constantly attacking Christian farmers). The settled (farming) tribes have been there a long time and in the last few decades more Fulani have come south looking for pasturage and water for their herds and have increasingly used force to get what they want.

December 17, 2014: In the northeast an army court martial convicted 54 soldiers of mutiny and sentenced them to death. The soldiers said they refused orders because the necessary weapons and equipment were not provided. Some of the soldiers came right out and accused some of their commanders of being corrupt and ineffective. Actually executing these soldiers (by firing squad) is going to be difficult because of the growing realization that the complaints of the convicted soldiers were probably accurate and the army wants to kill these men for exposing the corruption.

In neighboring Cameroon officials from the north, where Boko Haram is operating, are asking for another 20,000 troops to deal with the Nigerian Islamic terrorists. While the soldiers and police have been able to defeat Boko Haram attacks on towns and villages, rural farmers have lost thousands of cattle to Boko Haram. As a result many farmers and ranchers are abandoning their land because of the Boko Haram threat. The government plans to recruit over 15,000 more soldiers and police over the next two years, which is not soon enough to deal with the Boko Haram problem. The economy up north is in shambles as well because most trade with Nigeria has been halted.

December 19, 2014: Many Nigerians see corruption as being the major problem with the military ineffectiveness against Boko Haram. When this corruption problem is actually measured Nigeria finds that, while it is not the most corrupt nation in the world (that would be a three way tie between Afghanistan, North Korea and Somalia) Nigeria is among the 40 most corrupt nations on the planet. Nigeria is 136 on the list of 175 nations. Last year Nigeria was 144, so there has been some improvement. Corruption in this Transparency International Corruption Perception Index is measured on a 1 (most corrupt) to 100 (not corrupt) scale. The three most corrupt nations have a rating of 8 and the least corrupt (New Zealand and Denmark) are 91. African nations are the most corrupt, followed by Middle Eastern ones.

By late 2014 some army officers in the northeast have been openly (but anonymously, usually via unsigned letters to newspapers) complained about the corruption in the military and provided details. Local elected leaders in the northeast have seized on this to demand that the federal government do something about the crippling corruption in the military. But many of these northeastern politicians also admit that it will take the appearance (via upcoming national elections) of truly incorruptible leaders to clean up the mess and meanwhile the army is losing its war with Boko Haram.

In the three northeastern states where most of the Boko Haram violence occurs nearly 200,000 students have lost access to education in some 800 schools that have been destroyed or closed because of Boko Haram activity. This is a victory for the Islamic terrorists, who see Western style education as unsuitable for Moslems. Despite the violence education efforts in the northeast continue quietly, unofficially and in secret, especially among Christians. This, however, plays into the anti-Christian paranoia that Boko Haram tries to exploit. Some northern Moslems support Boko Haram because they agree that the Christians, wherever they are, plot to harm Islam and are secretly trying to use education, medicine and all manner of Western technology to subvert young Moslems and turn them into Christians. This sort of murderous paranoia has long been present in Islamic culture but has been declining in the last century. However there is still enough of it around to sustain groups like Boko Haram.

In the northeast over 700,000 civilians have been displaced by the Boko Haram violence. About 20 percent of these refugees have fled the country.

More and more Boko Haram is finding that their most formidable opponent in the northeast is not the security forces but armed local militias. Most of these militiamen are Moslems, which unnerves some of the Islamic terrorists who are more comfortable attacking local Christians. Officially called the Civilian JTF (Joint Task Force or CJTF), these volunteers receive little material support from the government. In early 2013 Boko Haram began to notice that in northeastern Borno and Yobe states thousands of Moslem and Christian young men were enthusiastically joining the CJTF to provide security from Boko Haram violence and provide information to the security forces about who Boko Haram members are and where they are living. That trend continues and now the CJTF and self-defense groups in general have become frequent targets of attacks. Boko Haram openly declared war on CJTF members and threatened to come to their homes and kill them. Most CJTF members cover their faces while assisting the security forces, especially in areas near where they live that contain Boko Haram sympathizers and supporters. While the Boko Haram threat certainly terrified some CJTF men (who often have no firearms), the leadership publicly defied the Islamic terrorists over the threats. Local governments in the north are now seeking to provide more weapons for these militias. It was noted in 2014 that more CJTF men obtained weapons via the black market or captured from Boko Haram. It was not illegal for CJTF members to have firearms, but legal firearms are expensive and have to be registered. Rural people tend to ignore the rules and frequently use crude locally made one shot weapons for hunting or home defense. The army doesn't care how the CJTF get weapons or that they have them. In some cases soldiers will unofficially help the CJTF get firearms, often from captured from Boko Haram stuff. This is sometimes done in defiance of their officers, who tend to regard such weapons as their own personal loot and will often take these weapons and sell them on the black market. While most civilians fear the army, they have more trust in and respect for the CJTF, who are usually local men they know. Boko Haram has far fewer admirers in the northeast as even Islamic conservatives up there see Boko Haram as heretical extremists who attack mosques and often kill worshippers. This is considered extremely offensive to most Moslems.

December 19, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) troops ambushed and killed 35 Boko Haram men intent on preventing repairs to the local electrical grid. Three soldiers died in the ambush operation.

In the south, (River State) a police waterway patrol came upon gunmen in three speedboats robbing people on a passenger boat. In the following gun battle one pirate was killed but the others escaped. Police captured three speedboats, a machine-gun, an assault rifle, five cell phones and some ammunition.

December 21, 2014: In the northeast (Yobe state) Boko Haram men in vehicles raided the town of Geidan, bombed the police station and attacked the local prison releasing Boko Haram men and other inmates.

December 22, 2014: In the north (Gombe state) a bomb went off in a bus station killing twenty people. Boko Haram was suspected. In nearby Bauchi state two bombs went off in a market killing over twenty. Boko Haram was suspected.

December 28, 2014: Across the border in northern Cameroon over 500 Boko Haram attacked the major army camp in the area at Achigashiya. The Nigerian Islamic terrorists held the camp for about four hours before being driven out by a counterattack. This was the largest attack Boko Haram ever made in Cameroon and was apparently an attempt to intimidate the army into backing off on counter-terrorism operations. The day before Cameroon soldiers and police has attacked the Boko Haram, killing over a hundred and arresting nearly 200. The Cameroon forces have been successful with operations like this but the Nigerians keep recruiting new men in Nigeria and sending them to camps in Cameroon. While somewhat safer from attack than in Nigeria, the camps in Cameroon are being hit more often and Boko Haram hoped this attack would slow the Cameroon security forces down. The Cameroon government responded by sending more troops north and ordering them to go after Boko Haram more intensively.

December 29, 2014: In the northeast (Borno state) Boko Haram attacked a village near Chibok, killing 15 people (most of them local self-defense volunteers), burning many buildings and warning the villagers not to oppose Boko Haram. Chibok was where Boko Haram raided a boarding school in early 2014 and kidnapped over 200 teenage girls.

December 29, 2014: In early December a senior army officer on duty in northern Nigeria released an anonymous letter to the media. The letter was meant for publication and the author explained that doing this anonymously was a matter of life or death because officers who speak out about the corruption and incompetence in the army receive death threats and some of them are killed as a result. The letter went on to describe the many ways the army is crippled by corruption and incompetence. The letter detailed how senior commanders diverted supplies for their troops (especially food and fuel) for themselves, to be sold and the cash disappearing. He described how 3,000 soldiers who deserted or were killed are still listed as active and senior officers take the pay that these "ghost soldiers" are still receiving.

Ammunition and weapons also go missing and the writer describes how one successful operation against Boko Haram had to be cut short because the troops were out of ammunition and there was no more to resupply them with.

Local elected leaders in the northeast have seized on these revelation to demand that the federal government do something about the crippling corruption in the military. But many of these northeastern politicians also admit that it will take the appearance (via upcoming national elections) of truly incorruptible leaders to clean up the mess and meanwhile the army is losing its war with Boko Haram.

The failure to suppress Islamic terrorism in the northeast lies with the security forces, which operate outside the law while trying to enforce it. The army and police, when faced with a major emergency (like the Boko Haram terror tactics) will react by arresting and torturing lots of people (especially young men, the most likely Boko Haram recruits), often killing them and denying what had been done. While Westerners act horrified at such behavior, that sort of thing did not largely disappear from the West until the last century or two. When a Nigerian joins the police or army they tend to accept the "traditional" way of doing things. But there are good reasons why many such traditions have been replaced elsewhere in the world.

Indiscriminate torture and murder is not the most efficient way to deal with an outbreak of Islamic terrorism. Many senior government officials understand this, but getting the security forces to change these deadly customs has been very difficult as have efforts to root out corruption in the army and police.

The police and soldiers often do more harm than good, usually in the form of abusing or killing innocent civilians. This is largely the result of incompetent recruiting and training, as well as a culture of corruption in the leadership (especially in the police.) The government has long talked about dealing with these problems, but little has been accomplished. This latest public plea for change, from someone in the army leadership, will probably fail to cause any meaningful change.

December 31, 2014: In the north (Gombe state) a Boko Haram suicide bomber, unable to enter a packed Christian church, detonated his explosives and wounded eight people. Elsewhere in Gombe (Bolari) a female suicide bomber tried to get into a military base but soldiers opened fire on her when she would not halt. Her explosives went off, either because she detonated them or one of the bullets set them off and she was the only casualty.

December 2014, he emerged as the presidential candidate of the All Progressives Congress for the March 2015 elections. Muhammadu Buhari who born 17 December 1942 is the President-elect of Nigeria and a retired Major- General in the Nigerian Army who was Head of State of Nigeria from 31 December 1983 to 27 August 1985, after taking power in a military coup d'état. The term Buharism is ascribed to the Buhari military government. He ran unsuccessfully for the office of President in the 2003, 2007 and 2011 elections. In March 2015: President elect Mohammadu Buhari won the 2015 general election, defeating the incumbent President Goodluck Emele Jonathan. If he takes office in May as scheduled it will mark the first time since Nigeria gained independence in 1960 that an incumbent elected government peacefully transfers power to an elected member of the opposition.

May 14, 2015: Amharicdrama – About 11 arrested for selling human meat at a Nigerian restaurant. Nigerian Police on Thursday arrested a hotel owner, six women and four men for selling human meat. Onitsha police arrested 11 people after they discovered 2 fresh human heads wrapped in a cellophane bag. The police also discovered two AK47 rifles and forty rounds of live ammunition and cellphones from the unnamed hotel. Some residents had observed strange activities going on in the hotel and tipped off the police. A Pastor who was among the people who tipped off the police on Thursday said: I went to the hotel early this year, after eating, I was told that a lump of meat was being sold at N700, I was surprised. So I did not know it was human meat that I ate at such expensive price."

GOVERNANCE: Nigeria worst performer among African powerhouses in Ibrahim index. Philanthropist Mo Ibrahim says economic success must not be allowed to overshadow human rights and democracy in Africa. Guardian Global development :

Liz Ford @lizfordguardian (October 15, 2012)

Human rights, political freedom, transparency and accountability have deteriorated in four African "powerhouses" over the past six years, according to the 2012 Ibrahim Index of African Governance, published on Monday.

Nigeria, South Africa, Kenya and Egypt dropped in the rankings in two of the four categories used in the index to assess good governance across the continent – safety and rule of law, and participation and human rights. The other two categories are sustainable economic opportunity and human development.

Nigeria was singled out as the worst performer of the four, dropping into the bottom 10 countries in the overall rankings for the first time. The country was ranked 14th out of the 16 countries in west Africa and 43rd out of the 52 countries listed overall. Nigeria was 41st last year and 37th in 2006.

Although South Africa, Egypt and Kenya are ranked fifth, 14th and 25th respectively, people's freedom to participate in political processes has declined in each country. Kenya and South Africa have also registered a decline in economic opportunities, while Egypt has shown a significant improvement in this area.

"Given the vast natural and human resources of these four regional powers, these governance results are a concern," said Abdoulie Janneh, a board member of the Mo Ibrahim Foundation, which has published the index since 2007. "Each of these countries plays a key role in the economic and political landscape of the continent. To continue to optimally play this role requires a sustained commitment to balanced and equitable governance."

This year's index examines data from each of the four categories, which are broken down into 14 sub-categories, for each country between 2000 and 2011. It uses 88 indicators drawn from 23 independent data providers from Africa and internationally.

Mauritius came top in the overall index, followed by Cape Verde, Botswana and the Seychelles, continuing the same pattern as last year. Somalia was last, a position it has occupied since the index was first published. The country came last in each of the four category rankings. Somalia's overall score has declined since 2006. Tanzania moved into the top 10 for the first time this year, while Liberia, Sierra Leone and Angola registered significant improvements. Sudan and South Sudan were not included this year.

Speaking ahead of the index launch, the Sudanese-born philanthropist Mo Ibrahim told the Guardian that economic success cannot be allowed to overshadow human rights and democratic processes in Africa (video), a continent that has seen steady economic growth over the past 10 years, even during the "dark days of the financial crisis". "What we need in Africa is balanced development. Economic success cannot be a replacement for human rights or participation, or democracy … it doesn't work," he said. "It worries us a lot when we don't see the trickle-through factor, when gain goes to the top 1% or 2%, leaving the rest behind."

North Africa is an obvious example of the consequences of ignoring people's needs and rights, he added. "Literacy in Tunisia is almost 100%. It's amazing – no country in the region or even in Asia can match Tunisia in education. So we have wonderful human development achievement in education and health, etc. But hundreds of thousands of men and women who graduated from college cannot find work, and not only that but [they] look around and they see an oppressive, corrupt regime. Then you have a volatile mix."

Rwanda, which has risen two places in the overall ranking, to 23rd this year, is also an example of unbalanced development. Although the country ranks 16th and 11th for human development and sustainable economic opportunities respectively, up from 13th and 17th in 2011, it is 31st for safety and rule of law, down one place from last year and continuing a downward trend since 2006, and 29th for human rights and participation, although this is a rise of one place since last year. Last month, the EU partially froze aid to Rwanda over its alleged support of M23 rebel fighters in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, following the US, Germany and the Netherlands. The UK had earlier suspended budget support over concerns about the country's human rights record. Britain has since unblocked a portion of this money.

Ibrahim said the governments in Kigali and Kinshasa need to be encouraged by their donors and "friends" to sit down and talk to solve the crisis. "I really think Rwanda is not just part of the problem but part of the solution, and what we hope is for the different parties to sit together … and have constructive discussions," he said.

Overall, since 2000, governance in Africa has improved. Particular progress has been made in women's rights, said Ibrahim, although he acknowledged there was still a long way to go before gender equality is achieved. "We're very pleased. This is an area [in which] we're moving forward, but we're coming from a very low base," he said. It's easy to introduce new legislation against domestic violence or give women rights over land and in divorce cases, but it's much more difficult to change attitudes and the culture of "male supremacy", he said. "Education helps and the spread of information helps, and courageous, unflinching, uncompromising … political leadership is also required."

For the third time, the Mo Ibrahim Foundation decided not to award any one the prize for African leadership this year, as no one matched the judges' criteria. The prize recognises and celebrates excellence in African leadership, and provides winners with the opportunity to pursue their commitment to Africa once they have stepped down from office. It is awarded to a democratically elected former African head of state or government.

The prize committee said: "[We] reviewed a number of eligible candidates but none met the criteria needed to win this award. The award is about excellence in leadership. In the first six years the prize committee has selected three very worthy laureates who continue to be an inspiration and whose examples, we hope, will be emulated." (Text ends)

May 29, 2015 President Elect Muhammadu Buhari is being sworn in as Nigeria's 15th head of state. He defeated incumbent President Goodluck Jonathan in the general elections in March. Expectations are high that Mr Buhari will bring much needed change to Nigeria. The country has suffered with the Boko Haram insurgency, corruption, fuel shortages, high unemployment and slower economic growth.

MEDICINE: Nigerian Professor Produces Antivirt, Anti Viral Drug Cures HIV/AIDS In 2 Months' Nigerian Professor Produces Antivirt, An Anti Viral Drug For Treating HIV AIDS. Despite doubts in some quarters about the authenticity of his claims, Professor Maduike Ezeibe of Michael Okpara University of Agriculture Umudike (MOUAU), Abia State, has insisted that his recent therapy for the dreaded HIV and AIDS is real and effective. The discovery of the therapy, Ezeibe said, was a major scientific breakthrough in the search for a cure to the global pandemic. He said after 19 years of hard work, he was able to discover the therapy and his research was eventually published in the British Journal of Medicine & Medical Research. The Professor of Veterinary Medicine, who obtained his first degree in same discipline at the University of Nigeria Nsukka in 1986, Masters in Ruminant Medicine, and doctorate degree in Canine Medicine all in UNN, said he moved to MOUAU on leave of absence. Speaking with Southern City News in his office, he said his research into the therapy known as 'Antivirt' (Anti-Viral Therapy), dated back to 1994 when he took the challenge to be part of the global solution to the HIV/AIDS scourge ravaging humanity. (Text ends)

TERROR: Nigeria Boko Haram crisis - Militants 'kill 150'

Nearly 150 people are reported to have been killed by suspected Boko Haram Islamist militants in attacks in Nigeria's north-eastern Borno state. Eyewitnesses say the gunmen stormed the village of Kukawa near Lake Chad on Wednesday evening, killing 97 people, including women and children.

On Tuesday, the militants shot dead 48 men after they had finished prayers in two villages near the town of Monguno, a resident told the BBC. The women are said to have been spared. Monguno was recently recaptured from Boko Haram. At least 23 people died in the town last month after a confiscated Boko Haram bomb exploded during celebrations to mark the successful military operation against the Islamist group.

According to Amnesty International, at least 17,000 people, mostly civilians, have been killed since 2009, when Boko Haram launched its violent uprising to try to impose militant Islamist rule. 'They spared nobody' More than 50 militants stormed Kukawa on Wednesday, eyewitness Babami Alhaji Kolo was quoted as saying by the AFP news agency. "The terrorists first descended on Muslim worshippers in various mosques who were observing the Maghrib prayer shortly after breaking their fast," he said.

NIGERIA: Gifted Children! 8-Year-Old Twins Break World Mathematics Record.

RISING AFRICA July 3, 2015: Meet twins Paula and Peter Imafidon – they passed the University of Cambridge Advanced Maths A level at age 8!

They chat with GMTV's John Stapleton. The 8-year-old twins from Waltham Forest in northeast London are a part of the highest-achieving clan in the history of Great Britain education. The two youngest Nigerian siblings are about to make British history as the youngest students to ever enter high school.

They astounded veteran experts of academia when they became the youngest to ever pass the University of Cambridge's advanced mathematics exam. That's on top of the fact they have set world records when they passed the A/AS-level math papers. Chris Imafidon, their father, said he's not concerned about his youngest children's ability to adapt to secondary school despite their tender age. "We're delighted with the progress they have made," he said. "Because they are twins they are always able to help and support each other." To Peter and Paula's parents, this is nothing new. Chris Imafidon said he and his wife have been through this before: They have other super-gifted, overachieving children. Peter and Paula's sister, Anne-Marie, now 20, holds the world record as the youngest girl to pass the A-level computing when she was just 13. She is now studying at arguably the most renowned medical school in the United States, Johns Hopkins University, in Baltimore. Another sister, Christina, 17, is the youngest student to ever get accepted and study at an undergraduate institution at any British university at 11. And Samantha, now age 12, had passed two rigorous high school-level mathematics and statistics exams at the age of six, something that her twin siblings, Peter and Paula, also did. (Text ends)

What city is the Igbo capital of Nigeria?

Marc Themba Oct 15
Owen City

Related Links

Would Africa be far developed and far ahead of the present position they are in now if the Europeans did not invade and colonize them? Or their situation would have been worse without the Europeans?

Why doesn't Eritrea give Ethiopia even just a tiny bit of coast, like with Congo & Iraq, so that it's not completely landlocked? Should they? Or Djibouti or Somalia? Why didn't Ethiopia demand that in exchange for their independence?

What is the likelihood that one day, US, Canada, Australia, NZ & South Africa will relax the migration rules & let all the Brits & EU citizens in to live & work? Or is the trend for a continual tightening up of the laws regardless of the government?

What are the best countries in Africa? Although like South America, the continent has not developed, is it a mixed bag with Egypt, South Africa, Mozambique, Tanzania, Cape Verde & Seychelles? Are Morocco & Madagascar also affluent?

How do I teach my autistic son that it is not acceptable for a white person to say the "n" word, but it is accepted for a black person? He struggles with black and white thinking.

What military tactics were used in the 2nd Congo War? Was it an unconventional war or did the various sides fight like conventional armies?

Can you find and critically discuss any case in South Africa that deals with the presumption that the legislature did not intend to be unreasonable or to cause injustice?

If it costs $26.00 to ship one pound of Lincoln pennies to South Africa, and each 100 pennies can be cashed at a bank in CapeTown for 15 ZAR, how many zar would one pound of pennies be worth in the local economy?

Why have you decided to stay in South Africa as a white person?

Will Tigrya people separate from Ethiopia?

Did ancient civilization start in Africa?

What are the conditions for berries to be grown in West Africa?

Other than the Berbers, what other indigenous tribes are in Maghreb and Mashriq?

Is CCP's OBOR initiative befitting the poor-people of African nations?

How deep into Africa did the Sephardi Jews go after the Reconquista?

How do Nigerians treat white people?

History Republic Answered by Ikem Wilson

Facts about Nigeria first:

I am a Nigerian, I have been living here since I was born , so I am going to tell you how we treat white people in Nigeria now.

Nigeria is a West African country—the most populous black nation and 7th most populous nation in the world . Nigeria has a lot of influence on other African countries because of its population and roles it played in liberating other African countries from colonial rule. We do say: anywhere you go in this world without meeting a Nigerian, just know you're unsafe there. This saying is true because Nigerians travel a lot.

Nigeria has the third biggest movie industry in the world . After Hollywood and Bollywood, you will get Nollywood. And Afrobeat that is making wave around the world originated from Nigeria. Every Nigerian is multilingual or bilingual. I, myself speak at least three languages, the same with others.

Since you have known this fact, let me now tell you how we treat white people.

We call white people 'oyibo', meaning white in Nigerian Pidgin English. Oyibo is a general word for someone that's not black. Asians can be called 'oyibo' the same with Europeans.

In banks , oyibo (white)people are attended to first before any other person. A marriage between oyibo and black person is celebrated , most of them become celebrities after the marriage. In rural areas, people run out of their homes to see white people whenever they're around or passing by .

Her name is Lolo Ifunaya . She became a celebrity for being able to speak Pidgin English fluently. She's from Austria .

Oyibo (white people) are always guarded by armed soldiers and I don't know why. Some of the oyibos from Asia are always aggressive towards Nigerians with their guardian support. Nigerians treat them good but they pay back with harshness .

An Asian man Pinned a Nigerian down in Nigeria.

Policeman holding an umbrella for a Chinese man in Nigeria.

Oyibos from non-English-speaking countries speak Pidgin English more than they speak English. The ones from Europe are friendly, while some from Asia are not. Some oyibos want to naturalize but Nigerian constitution does not allow that except the person meets some certain conditions required by the constitution.

This girl in this picture left Russia for Nigeria for skit-making .Her name is Oyibo Marlian.

Some oyibos are now in Nigeria and they're still making it

What is wrong with Nigeria? Why is the condition getting worse every day I check on the news, especially after 60 years of independence?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam
Independent since 1960. October7, 2020

Things are not worse; they are just the same. There is, literally, nothing in the news today that is any different from 20, 40, 60 years ago. It is still the same song and dance: high crime, ethnic tension, brutal security forces, terrorism, striking teachers, emigration, corruption and, of course, predictions of an inevitable split.

Mediocre stagnation while everything else moves forward is the problem with Nigeria. Compounding that problem is the fact that the institutions to educate Nigerians and create a consensus of stewardship are missing. Our discourse sows divisions and promises utopia.

Until the purpose of our politics stops dividing the 'National Cake', nothing will change. It will be groundhog day forever—purgatory with no prospect of redemption.

To what extent is it correct to say that the Richard constitution of 1946 sowed the seed of ethnic discord in Nigeria?

Chidera Akigwe

Former Unemployed Still a StudentSat

That's simple, the constitution introduced regionalism into Nigeria. Therefore dividing Nigeria into the North, East and West. The parties that emerged thanks to the British design were regionalized and tribalized. The Northern people's congress was for the North alone, Action Group for the west and National council of Nigeria citizens for the east. Also to encourage the dominance of the North over the south half of the seats in the central legislature was given to them. It's not a wonder that the motion for independence was defeated in the year 1953 as the country was torn along regional lines and that the first republic suffered too many crises. Thanks.

Related Links

Where can I invest my little 10k in Nigeria, the likes of the OPAY investment program?

What is your input on the saying "Africans under-developed Africans"? How true is this?

Do you have any current recommendation of a grant obtainable to help the youths in Africa build up business and earn a living. The condition here is catastrophic. If yes kindly reply with a link of the grant or if you can individually help?

Is France still exploiting and looting Africa?

Why are Nigerians maltreated in South Africa?

What do Africans derive from underdeveloping Africa?

Hi, could someone who is in Nigeria(Warri area) how much does it cost to get a copy of a birth certificate snd a school transcript? I wanna help a friend but I'm not sure he's being honest eith me. Needs them to get a job. He also wants to get a NIN. Anyway he said for everything and transportation it would total about 250 dollars. He says he had to go to the government office snd can't do it online. I wanna help but don't want to be taken for a fool. Thanks for your info.

What is the military operation in the Eastern Region of Nigeria code named?

Why do most Africans say "sorry" before asking for anything?

Why do racism against the black people still exist in the mainly white skinned people dominated countries in the world?

What is the population of the African continent?

What is airxam.com all about?

How do I join the black industry of oil in Nigeria?

What are fifteen (15) riddles from any Nigerian language and their answers?

Is Boko Haram the same as Daesh?

Boris Ezomo
Nigerian and proud of it.

Actually No.

They were created separate from each other. I think ISIS would find some of the beliefs and actions of Boko Haram backward.

However in 2015, Boko Haram pledged allegiance to ISIS.

As you know, ISIS stands for “Islamic State of Iraq and Syria", also known as ISIL (Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant) As you see, the geography is well specified.

Daesh is an acronym of the group's full Arabic name, al-Dawla al-Islamiya fi al-Iraq wa al-Sham.

Actually ISIS hates this acronym, and never use it themselves. While everyone else prefers it to the English “ISIS" version.

Why? “Daesh” as a word in Arabic, is similar to two Arabic words: 'Daes', which translates to 'one who crushes something underfoot', and 'Dahes', meaning 'one who sows discord. Whatever the word, it is opposite to the religious values the claim.

So No, Boko Haram is an affiliate of ISIS. Or may I say “Dahes"

But they certainly claim that they are affiliated, and even tried a name change to match

Related Links

Where can I invest my little 10k in Nigeria, the likes of the OPAY investment program?

What is your input on the saying "Africans under-developed Africans"? How true is this?

Do you have any current recommendation of a grant obtainable to help the youths in Africa build up business and earn a living. The condition here is catastrophic. If yes kindly reply with a link of the grant or if you can individually help?

Is France still exploiting and looting Africa?

Why are Nigerians maltreated in South Africa?

What do Africans derive from underdeveloping Africa?

Hi, could someone who is in Nigeria(Warri area) how much does it cost to get a copy of a birth certificate snd a school transcript? I wanna help a friend but I'm not sure he's being honest eith me. Needs them to get a job. He also wants to get a NIN. Anyway he said for everything and transportation it would total about 250 dollars. He says he had to go to the government office snd can't do it online. I wanna help but don't want to be taken for a fool. Thanks for your info. 🤔

What is the military operation in the Eastern Region of Nigeria code named?

Why do most Africans say "sorry" before asking for anything?

Why do racism against the black people still exist in the mainly white skinned people dominated countries in the world?

What is the population of the African continent?

What is airxam.com all about?

How do I join the black industry of oil in Nigeria?

What are fifteen (15) riddles from any Nigerian language

What are the positive attributes of African culture?

Dar Milli Philosopher May 31

The main positive attributes are love, respect and responsibility.

Love of family, neighbours, guests and strangers (this is why Africa was colonized. We treated the strangers with love not knowing they came with evil intentions).

Respect for elders.And responsibility from early on. In traditional culture Africans were considered mature at puberty and taught to be responsible adults. Were expected to have married and started adult family life at the soonest from puberty. Many did so by age 20 to 22.

Why is Nigeria on the dangerous country list?

Victor Dirikebamor Storyteller Updated February 8, 2020

If you live in some Western country and got attacked by some bandits while going out to grab a bite at some restaurant in the middle of the Night, a typical Nigerian would probably say you deserve it:

"Why won't you get attacked at that time?"

Because over here, that's like a taboo, it doesn't happen.

You don't saunter around your city in the middle of the night simply because you can't sleep.

The average Nigerian is already indoors or around his home by 8 pm, it is only young folks in need of beautiful pleasures that stick around clubs and bars late in the night, even then they have to look over their shoulders and move quickly if need be.

I can't count the number of times I left my beer on the table at some bar because "fine boys that matter" showed up, to do their business, but that was mostly at the South of Nigeria.

Why is Nigeria on the dangerous country list?

Nigeria being on that list might have nothing to do with politics, it's a reality.

It might be bizarre to the average Nigerian that his country is labelled unsafe, but those who have been to other places know this.

To him, every place on earth is like his.

There are cases of kidnapping, rape, police harassment, petty theft... which are the most common, e.t.c.

These are not peculiar to Nigeria, they occur in every country but on a varied frequency and magnitude.

These things are less or quite common in some parts of Nigeria.

It doesn't mean these things will happen to you when you visit but acknowledging that they exist would help keep you on guard.

And don't think it happens to foreigners alone, it happens to us locals too, it happens even more to locals because as a foreigner the police and even locals would want to protect you more.

That's why its good to be with a local if you plan on visiting Nigeria, they know the danger zones, and could speak the appropriate language if confronted.

Nigeria as a country is complete; the best, the good and the ugly can be found here if you look closely.

AFRICAN CULTURES:
What are some good African proverbs that you have read?

Related Links:

How do you make bitter leaf soup?
What is one beautiful tradition in any of the African tribes do you think the world needs to know?
What is one African tradition you wish you could change?
Who are the Mende People of Sierra Leone?
Can you mention (with pictures) some traditional African dances?

The family of my fiancee in Ghana continues to ask me for large sums of money instead of buying traditional gifts as part of the marriage arrangement. Will this end with the marriage or do they just see me as a meal ticket?

Who are the Ijaws?
Why do South Africans go barefoot so much?
What was the Nok culture, and how did it perish?
How did the Bakongo tribe treat twins?
What are the major differences between the Bantu people and the Kongo people?
Can you post a picture of yourself in an African traditional attire?
What are some African utensils?
What do you know about the Ndebele people?

What is the difference between Nigeria and South Africa?

Jeff November 21, 2018
In many ways it comes down to two national essentials: land and people.

Nigeria is roughly 1/6th the size of the USA but has almost 2/3 the population. That means the nation is crowded into cities and even small hamlets are not far from others.

South Africa is a bit larger than Nigeria but has less than a third of its population (56 million South Africans compared to nearly 200 million Nigerians).

On the other hand much of Nigeria is perfect for farming, with sahel and savanna being limited to the north of the nation, while much of South Africa is scrub or desert, with more limited areas for farming (admittedly SA has some wonderful wine country, and boasts excellent agriculture and game in parts).

Nigeria has a tropical wet/dry climate while South Africa has a Mediterranean climate on the coast (hence that excellent Pinotage they produce, along with other varieties) and a drier, more temperate climate inland (SA gets snow, Nigeria does not).

Nigeria's many peoples speak between 300 to 500 languages and dialects, depending on how one classifies these many tongues, while SA has but 11 official languages.

South Africa has Christians, fewer Muslims and more admitted traditionalists than Nigeria, which is evenly divided between its Muslim north and Christian south. Religion plays a much more pronounced role in the lives of Nigerians as well, although both have their share of corrupt pastors. Indeed there are numerous churches with shared congregations among both nations.

Both nations struggle with corruption, but SA has a better chance of overcoming this scourge due to the divisions between its ethnic groups, which help balance power and provide counterweights to each other. While Nigeria's many tribes divide its peoples, all Nigeria tribes have the similar tendency to favor their own over everyone else: corruption follows each tribe in turn as its leaders come to power. Corruption in South Africa balances between indigenous tribes such as the Zulu and Xhosa, but also among the coloreds, the Boers, and others. This means any one group had to take into account diverse conflicting needs and desires or risk the out groups uniting to overthrow the leadership, while in Nigeria corruption merely cycles between the north and south.

Nigeria does have a more successful recent democratic series of transitions, and has endured far more military rule than SA, which has remained under one party rule since the end of Apartheid decades ago.

SA is also far more developed than Nigeria. It’s principal cities offer European standards of living for middle class and wealthy citizens, while in Nigeria even the president flys to the UK for medical treatment. One can drive thousands of miles around SA’s well paved roads unaccompanied by guards or stopped by security checkpoints every hour or so, while the security situation in Nigeria remains difficult and infrastructure more poorly maintained or absent.

Interestingly I’ve found in spite of greater difficulties Nigerians are more optimistic, more entrepreneurial, and more willing to do whatever it takes, while South Africans seem more resigned and accepting of their situation. That last is more of a personal impression though and much more anecdotal than the other observations.

Both are great nations and their respective influences are felt far beyond their own borders on the continent.

What is so Nigerian?

John Omage

Metering Engineer at IBEDC Nigeria (2017–present)Updated August 13, 2019

Lol..

It's naturally Nigerian to “washy” or “whyn” or pull somebody's legs…imagine your boss/landlord telling you they're loyal to your administration.

It's Nigerian to go buy a sound system and play music aloud just to inform the street you got your first salary…that you've arrived. 😏

It's annoyingly Nigerian to tell someone “we go wash am o” when you got something new. Imagine after paying my house rent to that agent, he saw me and said “ bros! Congrats! Make we wash am na”… Meaning: Let's celebrate your rent renewal 😃

It's by default Nigerian to murder innocent chicken just to celebrate

Christmas.🥂

It's so Nigerian to head to the mall, 3.6km away, just to buy bottled water.😒

It's so Nigerian to have B.Sc in Mathematics and then M.Sc in Electrical Engineering and then go get a job as a cashier in a microfinance bank. 😓

It's so Nigerian to "price" or negotiate the price of anything at all, even visa application fee. 🤣

It's so Nigerian to blame village people for their misfortune.

It's so Nigerian politicians promise to fix air conditioners on the streets if voted into power. 🙄

How true is this that the US B1/B2 visa has been suspended? I heard it here in my country, Nigeria.

How true is this that the US B1/B2 visa has been suspended? I heard it here in my country, Nigeria.

And YES! It's so great to be Nigerian. 🇳🇬🇳🇬🇳🇬🇳🇬🇳🇬💪

Kathryn Berck

Retired USconsular officer,INTJ,PBK,writer,dog & horse lover March 16

Statistics always lag a bit behind the reality that generates them, but here are the nonimmigrant visa - including B1/B2 - issuance numbers for January 2021:
https://travel.state.gov/content/dam/visas/Statistics/Non-Immigrant-Statistics/MonthlyNIVIssuances/JANUARY%202021%20-%20NIV%20Issuances%20by%20Post%20and%20Visa%20Class.pdf
It is extremely unlikely that there has been a sudden suspension of nonimmigrant visas anywhere, including one of my favorite places, Nigeria.

Related Links

With the US ban on Nigeria, can a family member of a US resident still immigrate to the US through a visa waiver after petition approval?
What is the easiest way to get a US visa as a Nigerian national?
What does the Trump visa ban mean for Nigerians?
What happens to already files I-130 for sons of a US citizen to get immigration processes since Nigeria is among the listed countries for immigrants ban?
Why does the US always deny a visa for Nigerians?

How can Nigeria having a GDP approx. 600 billion dollars become the world headquarters for extreme poverty?

Ameh Sunday Fitumi

President (2021–present) August 5

That is a clear indication the wealth of Nigeria is in the hands of few individuals. Three Nigerians have the combined wealth of 50% of Nigerians. Expectedly the poverty is concentrated in the North of Nigeria, the same location that produced the richest Nigerian. Until that same region fully embraces western education, and reduces the increase in out of school children, the extreme poverty index will continue to rise. In addition to formal education, there is a need to emphasise on the teaching of wealth creation so that more people will learn to create structures that will take them and their family out of poverty.

Related Links

Why is the description the importance of transpiration in the regions of Africa control excessively loss of water from their leaves?

Who started Boko Haram in Nigeria?

Why is Africa the poorest continent but with rich natural resources?

Why is Nigeria always getting wrong notwithstanding the abundance of mineral and human resources?

I was told I won $500k in the Nigerian lottery six months ago and all I had to do was send $2k in processing fees, which I did, but I haven't heard anything back and I am starting to worry. Who is the right person to contact about this?

Which other method has the World Bank and International Monetary Fund used to enforce loans to African countries apart from the structural adjustment programme?

Why was Nigeria suspended from Common Wealth of Nation in 1995?

What are good business idea with capital of 200k in Port Harcourt?

Hi please I need help, I will go straight to the point. so I'm a Nigerian living in Ghana, I'm working over here, but my job is quite risky, and I dont get paid well and I hate it too, so I save a million naira so im planing on going back to Nigeria?

Who is interested in getting a giveaway? I'm giving out a free Ebook about actionable steps to earn money working on the internet Email me nwaforiyke22@Gmail.com if you are interested.

What are some of the benefits of snail farming to the African economy?

Why do most Nigerians refer to all the brands of diapers in the market as pampers?

Are Ikwerre Igbos?

How can I sell pigs in Nigeria to industries, and where can I likely export them to?

Is there a connection between Europe's affluence and poverty in Africa?

Does the Igbo tribe still exist?

ASHLEY High School Student What kind of ridiculous question is this? Of course, it clearly does because I am Igbo.

Related Links

Why is the description the importance of transpiration in the regions of Africa control excessively loss of water from their leaves?

Who started Bokoharam in Nigeria?

Why is Africa the poorest continent but with rich natural resources?

Why is Nigeria always getting wrong notwithstanding the abundance of mineral and human resources?

I was told I won $500k in the Nigerian lottery six months ago and all I had to do was send $2k in processing fees, which I did, but I haven't heard anything back and I am starting to worry. Who is the right person to contact about this?

Which other method has the World Bank and International Monetary Fund used to enforce loans to African countries apart from the structural adjustment programme?

Why was Nigeria suspended from Common Wealth of Nation in 1995?

What are good business idea with capital of 200k in Port Harcourt?

Hi please I need help, I will go straight to the point. so I'm a Nigerian living in Ghana, I'm working over here, but my job is quite risky, and I dont get paid well and I hate it too, so I save a million naira so im planing on going back to Nigeria?

Who is interested in getting a giveaway? I'm giving out a free Ebook about actionable steps to earn money working on the internet Email me nwaforiyke22@Gmail.com if you are interested.

What are some of the benefits of snail farming to the African economy?

Why do most Nigerians refer to all the brands of diapers in the market as pampers?

Are Ikwerre Igbos?

How can I sell pigs in Nigeria to industries, and where can I likely export them to?

Is there a connection between Europe’s affluence and poverty in Africa?

Hi please, I need help, I will go straight to the point. so I'm a Nigerian living in Ghana, I'm working over here, but my job is quite risky, and I dont get paid well and I hate it too, so I save a million naira so I'm planning on going back to Nigeria?

Related Links

Why is the description the importance of transpiration in the regions of Africa control excessively loss of water from their leaves?

Who started Bokoharam in Nigeria?

Why is Africa the poorest continent but with rich natural resources?

Why is Nigeria always getting wrong notwithstanding the abundance of mineral and human resources?

I was told I won $500k in the Nigerian lottery six months ago and all I had to do was send $2k in processing fees, which I did, but I haven't heard anything back and I am starting to worry. Who is the right person to contact about this?

Which other method has the World Bank and International Monetary Fund used to enforce loans to African countries apart from the structural adjustment programme?

Why was Nigeria suspended from CommonWealth of Nation in 1995?
What are good business idea with a capital of 200k in Port Harcourt?

Who is interested in getting a giveaway? I'm giving out a free Ebook about actionable steps to earn money working on the internet Email me nwaforiyke22@Gmail.com if you are interested.

What are some of the benefits of snail farming to the African economy?

Why do most Nigerians refer to all the brands of diapers in the market as pampers?

Are Ikwerre Igbos?

How can I sell pigs in Nigeria to industries, and where can I likely export them to?

Is there a connection between Europe's affluence and poverty in Africa?

News Nigeria

Another UK University Officially Hands Over Looted Benin Bronze

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong

The University of Aberdeen has handed over a Benin Bronze to Nigeria after over 100 years since it was looted by British forces.

The handover ceremony took place on Thursday in Scotland with Prince Aghatise Erediauwa, the younger brother of the current Benin monarch; Chief Charles Uwensuyi-Edosomwan, the Obasuyi of Benin; Professor Abba Isa Tijani, Director of the National Commission for Museums and Monuments; Babatunde Adebiyi, the Legal Adviser of National Commission for Museums and Monuments; and Abdul Mohammed Gimba, Director, Museums, National Commission for Museums and Monuments present to receive the artefact.

They were also accompanied by Prince Isa Bayero, a Prince of the Kano Emirates; His Excellency, Suleiman Sani, Deputy High Commissioner to Nigeria in UK; and Mrs Edith Ekunke, Retired Director of the National Museum, Lagos.

The sculpture, which depicts the head of an Oba (king), is one of thousands of religious and cultural artefacts looted by British forces in 1897 during the destruction of Benin City in present-day Nigeria by a British military expedition.

It was later purchased by the University of Aberdeen at an auction in 1957.

But a recent review of collections included research into its provenance confirming that it was one of the so-called 'bronzes', acquired in immoral circumstances during the Benin Punitive Expedition in which the royal palace of the Oba was burned and looted.

As a result, in 2020 the University instigated a conversation through Professor Bankole Sodipo, Professor of Law in Babcock University, Nigeria, with the National Commission for Museums and Monuments of Nigeria, the Edo State Government and the Royal Court of the Oba, regarding its return.

A formal request for repatriation by the Nigerian Federal Government and supported by the other parties was then proposed and in March 2021 it was unanimously approved by the University Court following discussion by an expert panel, which included representatives of the University, the Director of the Hunterian Museum in the University of Glasgow and Professor Sodipo representing the Nigerian partners.

Reacting to the move, his Royal Majesty, Oba of Benin, Omo N'Oba N'Edo Uku Akpolokpolo, Ewuare (II) said: "we thank the University of Aberdeen for this noble act of returning our bronze work. We hope that other institutions worldwide will see the injustice when they insist on holding on to items which in fact should be a reminder to them of the great injustice that was inflicted on a people so far away and so long ago".

The process of a legal transfer then began with the University working to support the timescales identified by the Nigerian partners for its physical return.

His Royal Majesty, Oba of Benin, Omo N'Oba N'Edo Uku Akpolokpolo, Ewuare II, said: "much has been said about the significance of heritage art and, in spite of the occasional attempts in some quarters to downplay their cultural and religious relevance, these works are often imbued with the spirit of the people from whom they were taken.

“Regardless of the resistance in some quarters, the return of stolen art is the right thing to do. Some say that they acquired their own collections. This is like saying, well, I know this item was originally stolen but because I bought it somewhere, then I’m okay. That notion is completely wrong and unfortunate.

“In any event, we thank the University of Aberdeen for this noble act of returning our bronze work. We hope that other institutions worldwide will see the injustice when they insist on holding on to items which in fact should be a reminder to them of the great injustice that was inflicted on a people so far away and so long ago”.

Professor Abba Isa Tijani, Director-General of the National Commission for Museums and Monuments, said: “We at the National Commission for Museums and Monuments of Nigeria really appreciate the initiative of the University of Aberdeen to release the Benin Bronze head in their collection.

“The University commenced this move without being instigated. This is unprecedented. On its volition, the University felt it ought to return to Nigeria an important cultural object it obtained some decades ago through what can pass in the United Kingdom as legal acquisition. I must appreciate Professor Bankole Sodipo who linked up with Lawyer Babatunde Adebiyi of the Commission to ensure that an avenue for discussion was created.

“The synergy was an added impetus to the initiative of the University of Aberdeen. Today, we are witnessing the success story. The Commission intends to cement its relationship with the University of Aberdeen and also work with the University in fashioning mutual agreements with other universities and institutions in the region regarding Nigerian artefacts in their holdings.

“We earnestly expect without any doubt that other persons and institutions will reach out to us for talks on the way forward concerning Nigerian artefacts in their possession. The Aberdeen return should inspire all to a future of friendly returns.”

The Minister of Information and Culture of Nigeria, Alhaji Lai Mohammed, said: “Nigeria warmly welcomes the return of the Benin Bronze Head by the University of Aberdeen and once again calls on all individuals, organizations and countries in possession of Nigerian artefacts to voluntarily return them to where they belong – Nigeria.”

Professor George Boyne, Principal and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Aberdeen, said: "Over the last 40 years the Benin Bronzes have become important symbols of injustice.

"It would not have been right to have retained an item of such great cultural significance that was acquired in such reprehensible circumstances.

"The University took a proactive approach to identify the appropriate people to discuss what to do and we are extremely grateful for the collective approach taken by the partners in Nigeria, which has facilitated this return.

"We are delighted to welcome our guests representing the Federal Republic of Nigeria, the Kingdom of Benin, and the National Commission for Museums and Monuments and commend their spirit of co-operation in making this possible."

The partners have committed to the safe-keeping of the Bronze 'in such a manner and in true essence of its sovereignty', until it can be put on public display at the Oba's palace or other agreed place.

This comes a day after the Jesus College, University of Cambridge returned a Benin Bronze – the Okukor statue to Nigeria.

Jesus College, University of Cambridge became the first institution in the world to return a Benin Bronze.

It was looted directly from the Court of Benin, as part of the punitive British expedition of 1897 and was given to the College in 1905 by the father of a student.

Mansa Musa's father, Abu Bakr II, abdicated the throne of Mali because he was convinced he could find the edge of the Atlantic ocean. What contemporary knowledge fed this belief? Did he expect to find a 'new world'?

Josue Dennis Chance

Quick side note, I'm not entirely sure how it became assumed that Abu Bakr II was the king in the Atlantic voyage story, since Musa himself says the "king who preceded him" which refers either to Mansa Muhammad or Mansa Qu, Abu Bakr most likely being Musa's grandfather who never actually ruled himself.

Figure 46
Abu Bakari, Brother Of Mansa Musa

The story you're talking about comes from the Mamluk scribe al-Umari who got this secondhand from one of Musa's hosts in Cairo during his famous Hajj. This is also, bizarrely enough, the only place this story has ever shown up. No other Arabic historians wrote about this, no oral traditions tell it, it's literally nowhere else.

Which is suspicious — Mansa Muhammad and Mansa Qu were from an entirely separate branch of the Keita royal family, which certainly suggests a measure of intrigue at work. But that's impossible to prove when we have just one source on the subject.

There's also the question of technology: West Africans at this time had, according to Portuguese and Venetian sailors just a century later, dugout canoes made from hollowed our logs. While these were effective for fishing and river travel, it's hard to imagine anyone sailing across the Atlantic in these boats.

But enough about qualifying the story, onto your question itself:

Unfortunately, we know next to nothing about Abu Bakr's motivations for venturing into the sea. Musa as recorded by al-Umari simply states:
Did the Malian crew of the Mansa Abu-Bakari II expedition survive and settle amongst the native populations of the Americas?

If Mansa Musa was the richest man ever, why was the Mali Empire not so relevant back on that period?

Where did Mansa Musa's fortune go? Was his Kingdom Mali a rich/powerful country prior to "The king who was my predecessor did not believe that it was impossible to discover the furthest limit of the Atlantic Ocean and wished vehemently to do so."

Curiosity, then, is Musa's explanation. But historian Michael Gomez points out that this king set out on his voyage with ships loaded with gold. Why? Presumably as a means of exchange with anyone they encountered. Who did they expect to encounter, though? That's hard to really tell at this distance with so few sources. Mali had traded extensively with North Africa, and by extension, Europe and the Middle East by this point. But Malians knew that those markets were to the north, so if they wanted to bypass the land routes why would they sail west?

As for what they know, it's also hard to tell. Musa's story tells of two voyages: one which set out and encountered "a river with a powerful current" which Gomez speculates is the Canary Current well off the coast of Senegambia where the Mansa presumably sailed from. The kings, however, did not believe the lone sailor who returned and told him of the current, and instead prepared a fleet of some 2000 boats filled with supplies, men and gold. And so he ventured out into the sea, leaving his cousin Musa as governor.

Nobody heard from that king again — leaving Musa in charge. So what do we make of this story? It's hard to take it at face value truth be told, particularly because it works as an incredible front for Musa to cover any intrigue he used to gain the throne. At the same time, there are enough elements of truth and plausibility that it can't be dismissed either — Musa seems to know about a massive oceanographic feature and how else would he know of it if nobody had seen it? Outside sources, perhaps, but it's not conclusive. Regardless, it's one of the most colorful stories from medieval Mali.

Sources:

Corpus of Early Arabic Sources for West African History by Nehemiah Levtzion and JP Hopkins African Dominion: A New History of Empire in Early and Medieval West Africa by Michael Gomez.

Related Links

How did Mansa Abu Bakr build his fleet of West Africans? He had no boats other than canoes. Did he really sail into the open ocean with canoes or did he bring experts from other regions?

Former Abu Bakr II (the ninth Mansa of the Mali Empire) set sail on an expedition from Mali. Is there any evidence/proof of what happened to his fleet?

What evidence supports the claim that Abu Bakir II, the emperor of Mali, reached the Americas before Christopher Columbus?

What you get of Nigeria depends on what you think about it.

Theophilus E.Daniel-Kagbare

If you are one of those who sees nothing good in Nigeria, well... chances are you'll hardly partake of the good of the land. If you believe that in the midst of the challenges, etc, there are opportunities for success, chances are that you'll succeed.

Someone wrote the following. (forwarded to me on WhatsApp):

Nigeria is not good, you said, but right in your presence DBanj, Davido, Banky W, Tiwa Savage, Naira Marley, DJ Cuppy came from abroad and while you are still wailing, they have made it in the music industry, controlling Dollars and living their dreams.

Wizkid, Olamide, Burna Boy, Flavour, P-Square, TuFace, Kiss Daniels, etc are Naija born. But the same economy and bad leadership. But through hard work and dedication, they have made it while you still dey shout, "Nigeria is bad!

Leave music, let's talk about sport. Kanu Nwankwo, Jay Jay Okocha, Vicent Enyeama, Odion Ighalo, Samuel Kanu, Ahmed Musa, Mikel Obi, Jamiu Collins, Victor Osihmen, Samuel Chukwueze, Uzoho, Oghenekaro, Ramon Azeez, etc, na under this same "Nigeria is bad and bad leadership" their talents were discovered before international clubs discovered them. What then is your excuse?

Many of Nigeria's current sportsmen and women from athletics to basketball, boxing, table tennis, taekwondo, etc, who have conquered poverty and living big and making Nigeria proud at home and abroad, started from this our obodo Nigeria. You still shout, "Nigeria is bad!"

Let's move to entertainment*. Alibaba, Basket Mouth, I Go Dye, Klint Da Drunk, Lepacious Bose, Akpororo, Bovi, Ayo Makun, Helen Paul, Igosave, Chioma Omeruah, Emmanuela, Frank D Don, John Okafor, Ushbebe, Tee A, Mark Angel, etc. The majority of these people were not born with a silver spoon. But through hard work, discipline, dedication, creativity, and diligence, they have waved poverty goodbye.* While you are still shouting, "Nigeria is not working!"

Let's move to Digital Marketing. Linda Ekeji, Uche Eze Pedro, Demola Ogundele, Kemi Filani, Eme Achanga, Ladun Liadi, Japheth Joshua Omojuwa, Laila, Makinde Azeez, Jide Ogunsanya, Yemisi Aiyedun, Noble Igwe, Chude Jideonwo, Loy Okezie, Onibalusi Bamidele, Stella Dimoko Korkus, Ayeni Adekunle, Ono Bello, Ajetunmobi Sheriff, Chidimma Umeh, Chioma Iwunze, Osemhen Akhibi, Temitope Balogun Akinmuda, etc. It is in this same "Nigeria no dey work" that the majority of them made it. What then is your excuse?

What about entrepreneurship? Temitope Ogunsemo, Oluwatobi Ajayi, Abubakar Sadiq Falalu, Obinna Okwodu, Etop Ikpe, Evans Akanno, Kehinde Ayanleye, Meltus, Adedayo Saheed Amzat, Oluwaseun Tamitope Osewa, Razak Ahmed, Ijeoma Ndukwe-Egwuronu, Ohmai Atafo, Auodeji Adewunmi, Peter Banigo, Olorunyomi Omoniyi Makun, Ezra Olubi, Eyo Bassey, Olalekan Olude, Opeyemi Awoyemi. The majority of these entrepreneurs attended the same calamitous universities you attended. But through hard work, dedication, discipline, faith, and diligence, they were able to surmount the Nigerian challenges and made it big. The same "Nigeria is not working"

In your koro eyes, when you were seeing Boko Haram in the North, one American lady, Mira Mehta while driving along Kaduna road saw a business opportunity in agro-processing via tomato roadside sellers and set up Tomato Jos Company in Kaduna.

So did Retson A Tedheke and co set up the Nigeria Farmers Group and Cooperative Society (NFGCS) with headquarter in Nasarawa. Under-five years it was created, NFGCS with Retson as Managing Partner is breaking new grounds in the Nigerian agriculture sector and value chain.

What then is your excuse? Still the same "Nigeria is not working" and "bad leadership" excuses?

Yes, things are hard. Nigeria has a lot of problems. But without challenges, there will be no opportunities. As big as Nigeria's problems are, so are her opportunities.

Examine yourself. What is your talent? What are you doing right? What are you not doing right? What are your strengths and weaknesses? Use your strengths to minimize your weaknesses.

What do you love doing? What is that thing you do that gives you peace of mind? Many of the world's most successful people are successful because they live what they do.

What's your vision and mission? What is your purpose in life? A person without vision perishes. Many people in Nigeria complain because they are perishing.

Check your environment, open your eyes to and sniff for opportunities in relation to your talent, identify it, write it down (business plan), pursue it, start small but aim big, pray to God for guidance. All jobs are not created by the government. Nollywood was started without any government intervention but see where it is today!

Pursue your dreams. Don't procrastinate. It is dangerous. Remember, you are not the only one that dreams. God's rain falls on everybody.

Pray for those in the position of authority. In them lies your peace and your security. Pray for Nigeria and believe in her. What you don't believe in doesn't work for you.

Finally, eschew bitterness, remove hatred, be kind to people, remember the poor and needy, be at peace with all people, be financially disciplined, and long for knowledge. And your creator will crown your effort with success.

God Bless Nigeria

Related Questions

What factors slowed the cultural development of sub-Saharan Africa?

How can a DNA test help in Nigeria?

Why are some countries still controlled by their formal colonial masters despite having their own independence as a nation?

How far behind or close is Nigeria's economy and technology advancement to other African countries?

Nigeria is a country with so much. Why does it have all these problems?

How can the menace of age falsification be curbed in the world, especially in Africa?

Is there any Nigerian journal publishing articles in education, particularly teacher education that is Scopus indexed?

Why are Western countries trying to stop palm oil production by making up claims it encourges deforestation when properly managed it does not? They will give billions to Liberia for free instead of supporting a viable local industry.

Why is it so easy to call countries outside Africa on mobile at a very flat rate, but it's always expensive to call my fellow brothers in Africa?

Why are there fewer factories in Africa? What are Africans not getting right?

What would end global hunger, population control in third world countries or more investment in Third World countries agricultural development?

What does the world know African nations for that can drive sustainable development?

Why is it that African countries are still underdeveloped? Does it mean that Westerners were first created on this Earth before Africans?

Why is it that so many people voted massively for "white money" as their favorite housemate in the just completed Big Brother Naija 2021 season which was held in Lagos, Nigeria?

Do you think the educational system in Nigeria needs reshaping, and how?

Why are the Fulani and the Dogon fighting in Northern Nigeria?

Nasir Ben Marley Directeur Général at Etagalah (2011–present)September 28

It's not Nigeria , but in Mali yes they fought Long time . With Alhadj Oumar Tall around 1700 I really don't remember the years etc …! Elhadj has fought with plenty of tribes who weren't Muslims, and I think most of the fights were about religion. Many Dogon people converted in Islam at that time ! Well I know the history for a very long time and I haven't read the book for more than 10 years ! Elhadj Oumar was really a phenomenal leader and had thousands of Muslims soldiers following him including his sons . I really hope I can write almost everything about the Dogon and Fulani wars . It's one the great in Malian histories and very important.

Related Links

Why are some countries still controlled by their formal colonial masters despite having their own independence as a nation?

How far behind or close is Nigeria's economy and technology advancement to other African countries?

Nigeria is a country with so much. Why does it have all these problems?

How can the menace of age falsification be curbed in the world, especially in Africa?

Is there any Nigerian journal publishing articles in education, particularly teacher education that is Scopus indexed?

Why are Western countries trying to stop palm oil production by making up claims it encourages deforestation when properly managed it does not? They will give billions to Liberia for free instead of supporting a viable local industry.

Why is it so easy to call countries outside Africa on mobile at a very flat rate, but it's always expensive to call my fellow brothers in Africa?

Why are there fewer factories in Africa? What are Africans not getting right?

What would end global hunger, population control in third world countries or more investment in Third World countries agricultural development?

What does the world know African nations for that can drive sustainable development?

Why is it that African countries are still underdeveloped? Does it mean that Westerners were first created on this Earth before Africans?

Why is it that so many people voted massively for "white money" as their favorite housemate in the just completed Big Brother Naija 2021 season which was held in Lagos, Nigeria?

Do you think the educational system in Nigeria needs reshaping, and how?

What does independence mean to an average Nigerian?

How do I promote digital products in Nigeria?

Similarities and differences between Lagos and Abuja?

Moses Josiah Adakole September 14

Similarities lie in the major fact that both are major cities and are most visited by local and international visitors. Infrastructure is top notch in these cities. The main difference is the fact that Lagos is a mega commercial town compared to Abuja.

Related Links

What factors slowed the cultural development of sub-Saharan Africa?

How can a DNA test help in Nigeria?

Why are some countries still controlled by their formal colonial masters despite having their own independence as a nation?

How far behind or close is Nigeria's economy and technology advancement to other African countries?

Nigeria is a country with so much. Why does it have all these problems?

How can the menace of age falsification be curbed in the world, especially in Africa?

Is there any Nigerian journal publishing articles in education, particularly teacher education that is Scopus indexed?

Why are Western countries trying to stop palm oil production by making up claims it encourges deforestation when properly managed it does not? They will give billions to Liberia for free instead of supporting a viable local industry.

Why is it so easy to call countries outside Africa on mobile at a very flat rate, but it's always expensive to call my fellow brothers in Africa?

Why are there fewer factories in Africa? What are Africans not getting right?

What would end global hunger, population control in third world countries or more investment in Third World countries agricultural development?

What does the world know African nations for that can drive sustainable development?

Why is it that African countries are still underdeveloped? Does it mean that Westerners were first created on this Earth before Africans?

Why is it that so many people voted massively for "white money" as their favorite housemate in the just completed Big Brother Naija 2021 season which was held in Lagos, Nigeria?

Do you think the educational system in Nigeria needs reshaping, and how?

WHAT WE CALL EDUCATION SHOULD BE CALLED INDOCTRINATION,
Strategic Lead at 9os Nigeria (2018–present) September 20

The system has designed a system that we spent about 16 years of our lives getting cocktail designed lessons that is aimed at delivering for the system an army of workers that would work their ideologies (Factories, Schools, Banks & hotels).

Unfortunately, a tiny percentage of these workers are about to escape from the army that is engineered by this indoctrination and live lives that allows them the freedom of choices which is the essence of living when the good lord gave freewill on creation.

Please, this content is not here to condemn paid work but to encourage you to reach out for knowledge that would allow you a life that will increase your options in this life, cause even within paid employment you can live within the .1% if in doubt ask Satya Nadella the man at the helm of affairs at Microsoft.

One way that I have been able to design a learning path that will increase my chances in life, is aligning my learning process along the five basic aspects of my life that should be a success. These are Myself, which is I achieve through selective learning through purposeful schooling at the University of YouTube and most importantly Intentional living.

Spiritual me, Studying at the feet of a man of God that believes in God's Standard and within a smaller congregation, This I have been able to achieve in a small congregation (do not worry we are a growing church I.e., Springhill Ministries with Pastor Jackson Adebisi as the presiding minister.

My Family, this one must learn through sensitivity not sensibility ask any married man they will tell you. I tell you the truth, marriage is an institution that you learn every day. Please do not use the study of another as a doctrine, every partner varies.

Professional, this one I had to study by implementing all that I have learnt to ascertain the best result. From Bluejay Farms to 9osnigeria to Purchase Technical Services , I have to research a solution that would provide my clients with satisfaction but most importantly offer solutions that they might not know they needed.

The fifth would be that which involves giving back to the society, in past couple of years I tried to give back to the society from supporting the less privilege personally to hanging out with the boys at Badamia Home for Children and helping them to avoid making mistakes that i had done in my growing years.

But the bid to learn more so that I have helped the society is the reason I enrolled for the Capro Trauma Training session in line with Christian teaching is one part that I believe would put me in the right part especially in the present world with so many hurt souls that need healing.

The first session is in the next couple of hours and honestly, I am excited for what life holds for me with this new relationship.

I will keep you posted.

Why is it too hard to give the Biafra referendum and let them be independent?

Mr Teacher Senior Teacher (2003–present) Mon

Because federation Nigeria practises don't support it.

Related Questions

Why are some countries still controlled by their formal colonial masters despite having their own independence as a nation?

How far behind or close is Nigeria’s economy and technology advancement to other African countries?

Nigeria is a country with so much. Why does it have all these problems?

How can the menace of age falsification be curbed in the world, especially in Africa?

Is there any Nigerian journal publishing articles in education, particularly teacher education that is Scopus indexed?

Why are Western countries trying to stop palm oil production by making up claims it encourges deforestation when properly managed it does not? They will give billions to Liberia for free instead of supporting a viable local industry.

Why is it so easy to call countries outside Africa on mobile at a very flat rate, but it's always expensive to call my fellow brothers in Africa?

Why are there fewer factories in Africa? What are Africans not getting right?

What would end global hunger, population control in third world countries or more investment in Third World countries agricultural development?

What does the world know African nations for that can drive sustainable development?

Why is it that African countries are still underdeveloped? Does it mean that Westerners were first created on this Earth before Africans?

Why is it that so many people voted massively for "white money" as their favorite housemate in the just completed Big Brother Naija 2021 season which was held in Lagos, Nigeria?

Do you think the educational system in Nigeria needs reshaping, and how?

What does independence mean to an average Nigerian?

How do I promote digital products in Nigeria?

Wake Up Africa!
The tragic story of the first Black African gold medallist who was executed by firing squad

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong September 23

His involvement in politics and later military activities have made many people forget that Emmanuel Ifeajuna was the first ever black African to win a gold medal.

Born in Nigeria in 1935, Ifeajuna was a high jumper, a skill he learnt while still in school. He participated in national competitions including the 1954 Nigerian Athletics Championships that saw him establish his name as a prolific high jumper. After jumping 6 foot 5.5 inches (1.97 m) at this competition, he qualified to represent his country at the 1954 British Empire and Commonwealth Games.

While in Vancouver where the competition took place, Ifeajuna broke both the competition and the British Empire records in high jump. He did all this without his right shoe. He was considered a hero and received such a grand welcome, complete with a parade when he returned to Nigeria after the competition. He became such a celebrity that his photo was used on the cover of exercise books in Nigeria.

He, however, stopped training in the game and opted to go back to school. He joined the University College of Ibadan, where he became involved in student politics and became friends with some of Nigeria's biggest poets, J.P Clark and Christopher Okigbo. Ifeajuna would organise a number of protests, but would not participate in many of them according to the accounts of his friends and schoolmates.

After completing his university studies, he went to Abeokuta to teach but left the profession in 1960 to join the military. Because of his education, Ifeajuna rose the ranks to become a Major in 1966.

Dissatisfied with how the government was running affairs after independence, Ifeajuna became a plotter of Nigeria's bloodiest coup together with Major Chukwuma Kaduna Nzeogwu, Timothy Onwuatuegwu, Chris Anuforo, Don Okafor, Adewale Ademoyega and Humphrey Chukwuka.

It is recorded that Ifeajuna not only arrested then-Prime Minister Abubakar Tafawa Balewa (who later died in detention) but also killed other army officials including Brigadier Zakariya Maimalari, who had come to him for help and Lieutenant Colonel Abogo Largema.

The coup was prevented by Major-General Johnson Aguiyi-Ironsi, who later took over power to become the first military head of state. Following the failure of the coup, Ifeajuna had no choice but to run away. With the help of his friends, he travelled to Benin and headed to Ghana where he was welcomed by Kwame Nkrumah.

His stay in Ghana was shortlived as Nkrumah's government would be overthrown shortly afterwards. He returned to Nigeria amid assurances from Emeka Ojukwu, who would later become the leader of the Republic of Biafra, that his life was not at risk.

Ifeajuna got back into the military and became part of the Biafran Army. However, Ojukwu would accuse Ifeajuna and other top military leaders of treason in 1967. He claimed that Ifeajuna and his mates were busy negotiating with Nigeria via the British and wanted to overthrow him and take power for themselves.

In a hastily-conducted trial, Ifeajuna was sentenced to death by firing squad and was executed on September 25, 1967. According to reports, his last words were:

You may kill me now, but I am afraid it is too late. I am sorry for you all because it won't be long before they get all of you. The Nigerians are already in your midst."

Compared to most of the 1966 coup planners and the leaders of the Biafran revolution, Ifeajuna has not been featured prominently in Nigerian history.

He left behind an unpublished manuscript about the January 1966 coup that caught the attention of many people who believed that it would reveal some facts about the event.

News Nigeria

TROOPS NEUTRALISE 2 INSURGENTS IN BABANGIDA…Capture Weapons

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong

Troops of Sector 2 Joint Task Force North East, Operation HADIN KAI have neutralised two Islamic State West Africa Province/ Boko Haram insurgents during a counter attack by troops responding to insurgents' infiltration attempt into Babangida community in Tarmuwa Local Government Area of Yobe State, on Sunday 26 September 2021. Owing to the logistics blockade imposed on the insurgents, the criminals now desperately indulge in pillaging activities in order to replenish their dwindling logistics. The insurgents made futile effort to infiltrate and pillage the community, but were met with a fierce counter attack by the vigilant troops, forcing them to withdraw in disarray, leaving traces of blood littering their route as they fled.

Aside inflicting casualty on the insurgents, the gallant troops also captured one BHT/ISWAP Heckler and Koch 21 Guns, Three AK 47 rifle magazines, 213 links of 7.62mm (NATO) and two grenades. Further exploitation by the troops is still ongoing.

The troops have been commended by the Chief of Army Staff, Lt Gen Faruk Yahaya for their doggedness in expeditiously conducting the counter attack. He also encouraged them to remain resolute in the ongoing operations against the insurgents.

We enjoin law-abiding people of Yobe State and the North East in general to remain assured of troops' determination to rout the Boko Haram/Islamic State West Africa Province terrorists from their hideouts. They are also encouraged to continue to avail troops with actionable information that would enhance execution of ongoing Counter Terrorism Counter Insurgency operations in the region.

ONYEMA NWACHUKWU

Brigadier General Director Army Public Relations investigations and prosecution.

Man arrested for allegedly killing his brother for rituals in Kwara

Aniekpeno Ekong Follow News Nigeria for all the latest news in Nigeria

The Kwara State Command of the Nigeria Security and Civil Defence Corps (NSCDC), has arrested one Ismail Saliu, 25, for allegedly conspiring with a herbalist and one other, to slaughter his brother.

The NSCDC Command Spokesman in Kwara, Mr Babawale Afolabi, disclosed this in a statement on Saturday, in Ilorin.

Afolabi said that Saliu conspired with two others, and killed his 14-year-old younger brother, Azeez Saliu, with the intention of using him for money rituals.

The Spokesman said that the incident happened on Sept. 13, in Kosubosu, Baruten Local Government Area (LGA), of Kwara.

"On Sept. 13, operatives of the NSCDC in Kosubosu Divisional Office, got a distress call from a neighbourhood about suspicious movement of certain individuals in the area.

"Some officers from the divisional office, with operatives of the Anti-Vandal patrol team in the area, swung into action and subsequently arrested a herbalist Ahmed Nkwe 44, Ismail Saliu 25 and Saliu Ahmed 30," Afolabi said.

The spokesman said that investigations revealed, that the suspects lured the victim to the farm, where he was gruesomely murdered by his own brother, Ismail Saliu.

He said that the suspect and his accomplices, were later arrested by operatives of the NSCDC on their way back from the farm.

Afolabi said that the prime suspect and brother to the deceased, confessed to have personally slaughtered his brother with the help of the herbalist and one other person.

He said that the State Commandant, Ayinla Makinde, was briefed on the incident, and had ordered that the suspects should be handed over to the police, for further investigations and prosecution.

How bad is Nigeria's President Buhari?

Abiola Tayo-Afolabi screenwriter, political geek and information mavenUpdated September 3, 2018

He is a bad COMMUNICATOR... What is even worse is he surrounded himself with Media aides with extreme poor communication skills. Just like marriage is 75% communication, leadership is pretty much the same thing. Someone once said ex-governor Fashola can sleep with another man's wife and when caught in the act, he will explain to the husband why he had to sleep with his wife and the husband will agree with Fashola's argument.

When Obama first got into power, one of his campaign donors disagreed with one of his policies and wrote him a letter, Titled, Obama, I want my $100 back. In fact, it sparked a ripple effect of other donors asking for their money back. After reading the mail, Obama replied in a letter, explaining why he made the policy, the importance etc. The man was invited to the White House and the white House staff that met with him asked if he was satisfied with Obama's response? The man replied that not only is he satisfied but he is willing to donate more...

Communication is key, it is what he lacks alongside low energy and zero charisma.

So imagine having F9 in a major course (communication) which is 75% of your total score... That's how bad he is.

Related Links

Has Buhari been a good president for Nigeria? What are his major accomplishments?

Why do Nigerians hate President Buhari?

Is Muhammadu Buhari a good president?

How is Buhari better than Jonathan as Nigerian President?

What is the difference between president Good luck ebele Jonathan regime and general Mohammed Buhari?

Is Muhammadu Buhari a bad president?

How bad is Nigeria's President Buhari?

Is Nigeria a failed state?

What are the good qualities of President Buhari of Nigeria?

Who could possibly redeem Nigeria if President Muhammadu Buhari fails to change his agenda?

What would happen to Nigeria if Buhari wins a second term?

Is it possible to have a nice, upright, and righteous person as a leader in Nigeria, or does Nigeria need to be recolonized and start all over again because Nigeria is actually a failed state?

If you are to be the replacement of President Muhammadu Buhari for 6 months, what will you change in Nigeria?

What if Buhari is not the president, what if Atiku is? Would Nigeria have been better?

What are the achievements of President Buhari administration in Nigeria?

Does Biafra have what it takes to be a nation?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam, Nigerian September 14

Tried and answered. The answer is no.
Otherwise, my credential would be different.

See that map?

It will never work without mass genocide or massive concessions, and all the non-Igbo groups there know it.

The problem with Biafra then was that it turned an understandable grievance into a vehicle for the ambitions of the then Lt. Col. Ojukwu and his clique of advisers.

It is undeniable that the ethnic cleansing of Igbos (and non-Muslim Northerners) across Northern Nigeria was instigated by the junta that had then seized power in Nigeria. Who could stay loyal in those circumstances?

The issue should have been simple and clear: We want nothing to do with people killing us.

Talk of whether Lt. Col. Gowon had the requisite 'seniority' or trying to invade Lagos were all distractions and, ultimately, costly mistakes.

The problem with Biafra now, on the other hand, is that it is just ethnic chauvinism. Bringing us full circle to why it is an unpopular project.

The Biafran project must convince Nigeria's other ethnic groups, the Yoruba, most of all, that they should leave Nigeria. And that is before getting into issues of post-independence nation-building.

I am always sanguine about the endurance of Nigeria because I see no indication that secessionism is popular among the Yoruba. In truth, if the southwest left, Nigeria would collapse.

But the southwesterners still seem committed. The Niger-Delta militants are frankly too well-armed for even Nigeria to fully corral, much less a hypothetical Biafra. That leaves the issue of Biafra as a fantastical burden for southeasterners to deal with until its activists get too old and as resigned to Nigeria like the rest of us are.

It is rather ironic. Practically the same reasons that prevent an Igbo politician from building a national base or attracting enough support within the big two parties to enter Aso Rock also mitigates the viability of the Biafran project.

As an aside, I see only a few easy national projects in the Niger Area:

Nigeria, obviously.

A partitioned Christianistan and an Islamic State. Although you would soon have Catholics vs Protestants, Sunni vs Shia, Igbos vs Yoruba, Southerners vs Northerners redux.

Independent Omooduduwastan amid a collapsing Nigeria. Although, their large Igbo, Hausa and Muslim minorities would become political headaches immediately.

The others are fantasies as far as I am concerned. They would require a political genius of Bismarckian and Ataturkian and Temujinian and Washingtonian (I'll stop now) and Zedongian (OK, really) heights. And if that chimaera existed, then dude(ess) just play for team Nigeria instead. Then our great-grandkids can live in a Great Power. Jeez.

So many untapped markets to free, Simba.

Related Links

Why can't Biafra be allowed to become an independent state?
What will happen if Biafra breaks away from Nigeria?
What makes up BIAFRA? Can Biafra become a separate entity from Nigeria?
Will Biafra come to fruition?
What is the real issue with the Biafra struggle in Nigeria?
Is there a viable claim for Biafra to be established? How would it work as a country?

Which famous place in Nigeria?

Aniekpeno Ekong Lived in Nigeria for more than 30 years Mon

Every place in Nigeria has a rich cultural history filled with hospitable, peace loving people. Nigeria, an African country on the Gulf of Guinea, has many natural landmarks and wildlife reserves. Protected areas such as Cross River National Park and Yankari National Park have waterfalls, dense rainforest, savanna and rare primate habitats. One of the most recognizable sites is Zuma Rock, a 725m-tall monolith outside the capital of Abuja that's pictured on the national currency. Everywhere in Nigeria is famous for something very unique. If I understood your question better I would have been able to help you more. Next time kindly ask well

Related Links

I am still a student. I am wondering if I should go for computer science in Nigeria. Is it worth it?

What is the state of covid'19 outspread in African countries?

How much will it cost me to ship a car from the UAE to Nigeria?

Why are all the major Mediterranean islands closer to Europe and Asia than to Africa?

What would it take for an African country to attain world superpower status?

What are the roles and problem of social work in the African society?

Who are the sponsors of Boko Haram terrorists in Nigeria?

What do I do after I just got scammed by an investment company in Nigeria?

How can I withdraw my profit from a deriv account with my debit card in Nigeria, West Africa?

Do you think the former Deputy Governor of the Central Bank of Nigeria (CBN), Dr. Obadiah Mailafia, died of natural causes?

What is the cheapest MTN data app in Nigeria?

What is the health implementation of a coup in Africa?

What is the statutory body which regulates airline and travel agencies in Nigeria?

Why is it said that Africa, as a continent, does not have a security seat in the UN security council?

Do Nigerians know Jumia is presently running promos and discounts or about 70%?

Similarities and differences between Lagos and Abuja?

Moses Josiah Adakole Lives in Nigeria (1997–present) September 14

Similarities lies in the major fact that both are major cities and are most visited by local and international visitors. Infrastructure is top notched in these cities. The main difference is the fact that Lagos is a mega commercial town compared to Abuja.

Related Links

I am still a student. I am wondering if I should go for computer science in Nigeria. Is it worth it?

What is the state of covid'19 outspread in African countries?

How much will it cost me to ship a car from the UAE to Nigeria?

Why are all the major Mediterranean islands closer to Europe and Asia than to Africa?

What would it take for an African country to attain world superpower status?

What are the roles and problem of social work in the African society?

Who are the sponsors of Boko Haram terrorists in Nigeria?

What do I do after I just got scammed by an investment company in Nigeria?

How can I withdraw my profit from a deriv account with my debit card in Nigeria, West Africa?

Do you think the former Deputy Governor of the Central Bank of Nigeria (CBN), Dr. Obadiah Mailafia, died of natural causes?

What is the cheapest MTN data app in Nigeria?

What is the health implementation of a coup in Africa?

What is the statutory body which regulates airline and travel agencies in Nigeria?

Why is it said that Africa, as a continent, does not have a security seat in the UN security council?

Do Nigerians know Jumia is presently running promos and discounts or about 70%?

Why are African countries third world states? Why don't African countries develop?

Trevor Zylstra

Many many people mis-use the term "third world" to mean something it was never meant to mean. They use the term as a put-down, or as a kind of short-hand for poor undeveloped countries. That is NOT the intended meaning of the term at all.

By definition developed back in the period between the end of the Second World War and the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, the…

First World meant the western, democratic countries such as the US, the UK, the NATO countries, Australia, and other countries in their sphere, etc. and the…

Second World meant the communist countries such as the Soviet Union, China, and other countries in their sphere. And that left the…

Third World as the countries not aligned with either the western democracies or the communist countries. For example, Finland would be considered Third World. So would Japan. So would Brazil. So would Saudi Arabia. So would the Republic of Ireland. As you can see, the Third World is not related to poverty/wealth and is not related to development/ underdevelopment. It is a political term related to spheres of influence.

So now, knowing the correct definition of the term, this question becomes easier to answer. Why are African countries Third World states? Because they are not closely aligned with either the western democracies nor with the communist countries. It's actually very simple.

Related Questions

I am still a student. I am wondering if I should go for computer science in Nigeria. Is it worth it?

What is the state of covid'19 outspread in African countries?

How much will it cost me to ship a car from the UAE to Nigeria?

Why are all the major Mediterranean islands closer to Europe and Asia than to Africa?

What would it take for an African country to attain world superpower status?

What are the roles and problem of social work in the African society?

Who are the sponsors of Boko Haram terrorists in Nigeria?

What do I do after I just got scammed by an investment company in Nigeria?

How can I withdraw my profit from a deriv account with my debit card in Nigeria, West Africa?

Do you think the former Deputy Governor of the Central Bank of Nigeria (CBN), Dr. Obadiah Mailafia, died of natural causes?

What is the cheapest MTN data app in Nigeria?

What is the health implementation of a coup in Africa?

What is the statutory body which regulates airline and travel agencies in Nigeria?

Why is it said that Africa, as a continent, does not have a security seat in the UN security council?

Do Nigerians know Jumia is presently running promos and discounts or about 70%?

What are some unexpected things first-time visitors to Nigeria notice?

Adam Webb

Visited and travelled around Nigeria, married into a Nigerian family.
Updated March 25, 2019

I visited Nigeria for my wife's brother's wedding a few years ago and there was so much that I didn't expect. Here are just a few things.

People are really friendly. This is not just an offhand nicety, but everyone was genuinely nice to me as a stranger, greeting and offering help.

There ARE scams, but people don't want you to fall for them. Nigeria is famous for it's scams (419s) and before visiting you are made aware that it is a big deal, but for every scam I saw, there were 10 people that warned me about them beforehand. It seems the majority of people are embarrassed by them but have come to terms with them being part of life.

Everyone is invited to a party. If you know about a party, just turn up! It is not expected that you know the people hosting, but is expected that you can just go along if you know somebody.

Weddings are huge. Hundreds, even thousands of guests. Invites don't seem to be a thing and again, anyone it appears can attend. Even people walking past on the street can just join in and be fed!

The rich are super, mega rich and the poor are very very poor. Some of the most expensive real estate in the world is in Lagos, with skyscrapers and plush hotels. But there are also so many people that live in squalor spitting distance away.

Nigerians LOVE the English Premier league. You will see busses and trucks painted in Arsenal, Manchester United, Chelsea etc. colours everywhere and bars are packed out when there is live English football on.

Busses often have preachers and/or sales people get on and loudly evangelise or sell their products. Even at 6am in the morning.

Christians and Muslims live together and interact together quite happily. The only people that have any issues (from my experience) are Athiests, which are treated like they have an illness.

Petrol is often a massive problem. As a foreigner you are aware that Nigeria is a big oil producing nation, but there are so many petrol shortages and sometimes many-mile-long queues at petrol stations, which change their prices accordingly, that you wouldn't believe it.

Lots of buildings have 'THIS BUILDING IS NOT FOR SALE' written on them, as apparently a popular scam is to 'sell' somebody elses building without their knowledge!

Most busses don't have a schedule, they leave when they are full, which can take hours. Also, what might seem like a buss station, with lots of the smaller busses touting for passengers, often isn't. I remember being aboard a minibus that bolted off at high speed along with the 40 or 50 others that were in the same place the moment they heard a police siren!

Customer service is appalling in almost all restaurants and shops (aside perhaps from the super-high-end ones and weirdly KFC). It is not unusual to have to wake somebody to serve you, there is never any hurry to help you and there seems to be no pride in doing a good job. I know this sounds harsh, but this point is absolutely accurate from my experience. It appears in response, a culture of the customer becoming rude, loud and clicking fingers etc. to get service has emerged. I was always nice and polite, but rarely had the same granted back to me by the person I was paying.

These are just a few of the things I remembered, but I had a fantastic time there and will certainly be returning many times in the future. I certainly recommend you see for yourselves and don't just believe the negative hype.

Related Links

What are good gifts for a foreign visitor to bring when they're invited to someone's home in Nigeria for the first time?

What are the things not to do in Nigeria?

What good things can you say about Nigeria?

What are the biggest mistakes people make when visiting Nigeria?

What are the best things about living in Nigeria?

Why should I never visit Nigeria?

Does voting a younger person into the post of president make Nigeria a better place?

Abayomi Ben

Lives in Nigeria (1990–present)Mon

It is possible if godfatherism won't be at the base of decision making. Even the older ones want to deliver but godfather is a problem they battle within .

Related Links

How come Nigerians are mostly against voting in an Igbo person for President of Nigeria?

Is Nigeria a terrible place to live?

What if a renowned American presidential candidate becomes the President of Nigeria, can he/she reorganize Nigeria and take it on the part of growth and development?

With the level of decay and corruption in Nigeria, what is a better way of voting that we can implement? How can we stop election rigging? Is it possible to vote right in our homes without compromising our lives and safeties?

Can Nigerians vote for a woman to become president?

What are the pros and cons to compulsory voting?

News Nigeria

BUSTED: Nigerian Army Secretly Contacts Families As Boko Haram Fighters Kill 25 Soldiers In Borno

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong

Sahara

Reporters gathered that the soldiers were on patrol to clear some Boko Haram elements in Monguno area on September 16, 2021 when they were ambushed by the insurgents.

The Nigerian Army has refused to make a public statement five days after militants from the Islamic State-backed faction of Boko Haram, the Islamic State West Africa Province (ISWAP), formerly known as Jamā'at Ahl as-Sunnah lid-Da'wah wa'l-Jihād killed at least 25 soldiers in Borno State.

SaharaReporters gathered that the soldiers were on patrol to clear some Boko Haram elements in Monguno area on September 16, 2021 when they were ambushed by the insurgents.

The deadly attack left about 25 soldiers dead while some are still missing five days after the incident.

Meanwhile, the Nigerian Army secretly contacted some of the families of the deceased, informing them that their loved ones had been deposited in a morgue.

SaharaReporters gathered that military operational vehicles, several weapons and ammunition were stolen during the attack.

Monguno is north, about 70km drive from Maiduguri, the state capital and hosted thousands of Internally Displaced Persons mostly from Dikwa and Marte council areas.

“At least 25 soldiers have been confirmed dead, the authorities have contacted some of their families, their bodies are already deposited at the morgue,” a source told SaharaReporters on Monday evening.

The attack comes a few days after the insurgents killed 10 Nigerian soldiers after dislodging a military base in Rann, the administrative headquarters of Kala-Balge Local Government Area of Borno State.

Authorities of the Nigeria Army have, however, been silent on both incidents.

Boko Haram and its offshoot, Islamic State West Africa Province, have killed thousands and displaced millions in North-Eastern Nigeria.

The Nigerian military has repeatedly claimed that the insurgency had been largely defeated and frequently underplays any losses.

In the past months, soldiers have been targeted by the insurgents.

Over 300 soldiers and officers have been reportedly killed since January 2021.

At least 33 soldiers were killed early in the year when two vehicles loaded with explosives rammed into a military convoy in Wulgo.

The suicide bombers were identified as Abu Bakr al-Siddiq and Bana Jundullah. The group also claimed four military vehicles were destroyed.

In February, about 20 soldiers were also killed in Malari, Borno State by the insurgents.

SaharaReporters gathered that the soldiers were on patrol to clear some Boko Haram elements in the area following a credible intelligence when they were ambushed by the group.

Why is Nigeria refusing referendum to the Indigenous People of Biafra?

Emmanuel Nomeh
Field Sales Manager at Nestlé (2021–present)

They feel the north still has not developed to be on her own, they still need to gather more resources.

Related Links

What are the roles and problem of social work in the African society?

Who are the sponsors of Boko Haram terrorists in Nigeria?

What do I do after I just got scammed by an investment company in Nigeria?

How can I withdraw my profit from a deriv account with my debit card in Nigeria, West Africa?

Do you think the former Deputy Governor of the Central Bank of Nigeria (CBN), Dr. Obadiah Mailafia, died of natural causes?

What is the cheapest MTN data app in Nigeria?

What is the health implementation of a coup in Africa?

What is the statutory body which regulates airline and travel agencies in Nigeria?

Why is it said that Africa, as a continent, does not have a security seat in the UN security council?

Do Nigerians know Jumia is presently running promos and discounts or about 70%?

Why can't the Nigerian government declare bandits as terrorists?

Do you think poor and hungry Nigerians should be getting some form of free meal tickets to support themselves?

To get a cleaning part-time job in Norway as a Nigerian student, do I need to be able to speak Norwegian?

Why are African countries third world states? Why don't African countries develop?

Can anyone link me to someone who buys castor oil in Nigeria?

Do you think Biafra will be a better country than Nigeria?

NIGERIA. Answered by Emmanuel Eshebi

No, I don't think so. With the level of human rights abuses we see while enforcing their so-called seat at home order, they will be the worst country in history.

I'm Cross River State, one of the States in their map, but I don't believe in the Biafra idea.

I look forward to a stronger, and better Nigeria.

Related Links

Will Nigeria ever get better?

With the outrageous increase in dollars to naira, what will the masses do to alleviate themselves from a salary that refuses to rise?

What are the suggestions to deal with food insecurity in sub Saharan Africa?

What is Nimbia and when did it originate? I can't find anything about it online (it's a dialect of Gwandara).

Few Europeans and French colonized many African countries. What were their tactics and skills?

Why is Kpokpogarri trending in Nigeria? Who is he?

How do you hope the support you get from the Nigeria Jubilee Fellowship program helps achieve career goals?

What happens to the Biafra agitation if Nigeria gets another Northern President?

What places in South Africa sell wholesale jewellery or jewelry supplies at an affordable price?

What are some of the most fascinating places in South Africa apart from the toxic cities?

Would division in Nigeria be an option in solving Nigeria's problems?

Are all men created equal in African democracy?

Where was Biafra prior to pre-colonial and amalgamation?

Which Nigerian music celebrity is celebrated internationally more than how he or she is celebrated locally?

Why is Nigeria refusing referendum to the Indigenous People of Biafra?

What is the biggest challenge facing West Africa, Nigeria precisely? Unemployment gave birth to Insecurities

Okeji Daniel

Certificate in Conflict Resolution, United States Institute of Peace (Graduated 2012)Oct 23

One factor is the critically poor state of the economy. The economy has not been in good shape for the past five years and first went into a recession in 2016.

In 2020 in the wake of the COVID-19 pandemic it plunged into another recession – its worst in four decades. It recorded gross domestic product contraction of 3.62% in the third quarter of 2020.

There's been a lot of uncertainty, largely due to policy inconsistencies, about where people should invest. This cuts across various economic sectors.

Since the current government came into power in 2015, there has been a lot of policy change with the "command and control” posture adopted in managing the economy. For instance, exchange rates were left fixed for the first year of the administration until the distortions in the market became chaotic before some form of flexibility was allowed in the determination of the exchange rate, following market forces. Also land borders were arbitrarily closed to imports, despite the huge damage it could have on the country’s trade within the ECOWAS sub-region. This had a direct impact on prices of items.

These policy somersaults have caused capital flight. The political uncertainty played a role in the downward trend of markets. In the equities market, huge foreign portfolio investments were lost to the economy. There has also been a downturn in portfolio investments, fixed capital investment, foreign direct investments and capital importation. There was also a record decline in capital importation of about $1,548.88 million in the fourth quarter of 2016, a 15% decrease from the third quarter of same year.

And in the first quarter of 2017, capital importation was recorded to be about $908.27 million.

The result has been job losses and the dwindling capacity to create jobs.

The poor performance of different sectors of the economy, especially the agricultural sector, has created uncertainty and unemployment. The recurring farmer-herder crisis has had a negative impact on agricultural labour and production.

Another issue is Nigeria’s weak currency, which has been bad for manufacturing. As many people only have access to foreign currency through unofficial sources, prices of raw materials for manufacturing have affected the sector and its output. Several organisations cannot scale or employ more people.

The low level of infrastructure in the economy is another critical factor. For instance, farmers need to move their goods to markets. The routes that link the farms to the cities are in poor shape. Power supply is erratic and security is poor. These factors add up to a poor level of investment.

Meanwhile the labour supply is growing. People are graduating from higher institutions, but the demand for labour is shrinking. There are not enough jobs for young people who are leaving school. People with A levels as their highest qualification had the highest rate of unemployment with 50.7%, followed by people with first degree or higher national diploma at 40.1%.

Are you still surprised about the rise of Insecurities across Nigeria?

Related Links

Between leadership and fellowship crises, which one has contributes more to Africa's under-development or it a combination of both?

Why is African countries still having more poor citizens than average rich citizens?

Why do we have two seasons in Africa?

What do you know about Sango, the Yoruba (African) god of thunder?

I want to educate myself about Africa. What sources and books could I use to get realistic and unbiased information?

Will a military coup ever end in Africa?

What is the possible way out of staples price inflation? What is a case study of Nigeria?

What is the birthplace of the most spoken language (Swahili) in Africa?

Should we accept claims for the limited history of sub-Saharan Africa?

In Ethiopia, the right to ownership of urban land is invested in the state. Does transferring ownership right to individuals decrease slum expansion?

As a student of African origin who has never gone out of the shore of Africa, How do you succeed academically and financially combined outside African countries?

What top 10 African countries have an economic potential in the coming years?

Why do middle income earners in Africa not sign on insurance?

Why would Quora moderators not delete a blatantly racist answer after it had been reported? The question was "How many African countries are found on Quora?" The answer? "Too many". It is still up a week later. Shocked.

Is it true that most African people prefer their own ethnic group or country rather than Pan-Africanism?

Are the South Eastern Bantu people the ancestors of the Nigerian people and Cameroon? If so, how long ago?

Ygor Coelho

Avid reader on history of peoples and population genetics.Oct 20

Not at all, actually the precise opposite: Southeastern Bantu populations are the descendants of presumably Proto-Bantu-speaking peoples of mainly West African origin, who are likely to have lived initially somewhere in Cameroon or Nigeria up to circa 1,000 B.C. (note: the exact location of their homeland has not been determined and is still highly disputed, with the only near consensus being that it was somewhere in or near West Africa).

Southeastern Bantus are also, at least in their majority, clearly admixed with pre-Bantu populations, harboring a varying minority of ancestry inherited from them. Logically, if they all have West African ancestry (Yoruba/Esan/Lemande-related admixture), but West Africans generally lack or have much less of the typical ancestral components added to the Southeastern Bantu gene pool due to gene flow from and to other East Africans and Southern Africans.

The genetic evidences confirm the results of research in archaeology (evidences of agricultural development and farming cultures linked to the later Bantu societies appear first in West Africa than in East/Southeast Africa) and linguistics (all Bantu languages come from one single Proto-Bantu dialect continuum that is no older than 3,000–4,000 years at most, but Proto-Bantu itself is just a variety of a much more diverse, older and wide-ranging Niger-Congo language family, which is restricted to and most varied in West Africa).

What do Italians think of Nigerians?

Emilio Trussardi

Italian, from the Orobian Mountains March 25, 2018

I cannot speak for the entire Italy but I can, for sure, speak for the region where I am from, the Upper Valley of the river Serio, in the province of Bergamo. In this area there are two villages, Fino del Monte and Rovetta (and to a lesser degree, Clusone, my hometown) that have a very strong relationship with Nigeria (and also Ghana and Benin).

When Italy was in abysmal poverty the mountain regions were probably the poorest of all. Emigration was a very common thing and, for some reasons that are not entirely clear to me, instead of emigrating to America, Argentina, France or Switzerland like most Italians did, people from my home province moved first in Ghana (around 1910) and later to the neighbouring countries, with most of them settling in Nigeria.

As the stereotype goes for Italians from Bergamo, they were builders and construction workers and soon established thriving businesses in that sector.

My two uncles moved there in their twenties and they still own businesses there. Their own uncle was already working there during World War II and being Italian was imprisoned by The British. The sons of one of them grew up in Italy but later moved back to Lagos and established their own companies there.

In total there probably are a few hundred people of Bergamo descent living in Nigeria.

I personally know tens of people who work or have worked in Nigeria at some point in their life. I remember watching the 1994 World Cup match Italy-Nigeria with two italo-Nigerian girls (in Italy for the summer) who clearly supported Nigeria.

This immigration has caused an interesting mixture: in houses on the Alps carved elephant tusks and ebony statues are a common sight and chicken tikka masala with bananas and peanuts is a normal dish in many houses. People who used to live in Nigeria drank whisky and soda instead of Italian wine.

The Bergamasque community in Nigeria started their own traditions such as gathering together on Good Friday to sing the Via Crucis as they would do in Italy.

Nigeria was, in my childhood, the foreign country I most often heard about and it was always narrated positively. The fruit was amazing, the food awesome, the nature beyond belief. My dad is a keen hunter and was enthusiastic with the shooting he did there.

It was also considered a place with fantastic business opportunities, with many disadvantaged people (like my two uncles) being able to build a very successful career.

Related Questions

What is your view about Nigeria/Nigerians? (Non Nigerians only)?

Why are Nigerians hated by so many nations especially South Africans?

Are Nigerians smart?

Why do Nigerians and Jamaicans not like each other?

Are Nigerians the smartest people to walk the earth? Why?

What do you think of Nigerians?

What is the concept of indigenous African arts?

Alton Allen

Engineer (1990–present)Sun

African art was almost never art for art's sake, more than just pretty pictures, sculptures, textiles etc, it was spiritual and often reflects the era it was made , in the case of textiles and hairdo it can tell your status, it also tell the glory of kings and it is never static.

[Africa is a large continent full of a myriad of countries and cultures, its art cannot be defined under just one heading. “African Art” as a term, therefore, usually refers mainly to the art of Sub-Saharan Africa. The artistic trends and periods of the Mediterranean coast of Africa, or the art of the Islamicand Christian nations of Africa, have their own names, traditions, and art movements.

African Art has many characteristics, some of which include creative expressionism over realism, the prevalence of images and sculpture of the human figure, larger focus on sculpture rather than painting, abstract themes and representations, melding visual and performing arts (such as in the case of masks), and non-linear scaling.

African Art Origins and Historical Importance:

Ancient African art dates back at least 6000 years to rock art found in the Sahara. The whole of Africa was influenced by art depicting nature, both real and abstract, created by its many cultures from the Egyptians in the North and craft makers in the South over the millennia.]

[What is called Traditional African Art is what is most commonly recognized by Westerners. Wooden masks feature heavily in Traditional artworks, and originate mostly from Western African countries. These masks are created to represent human, animal, or mythical creatures and are used for ceremonial purposes. West African Traditional Art is often very colorful and uses plant fibers, stones, gems, ivory, animal hair, and pigments in decorating the wooden pieces, including both masks and statues.

African art – The Inevitable

Westerners believed that African art was substandard due to lack of education and poverty until the Avant-garde artists of the late 19th and 20th centuries took a major interest in it. These artists saw in the art a focus on the imagination rather than a drive for realistic interpretation. The expression of feeling and emotion that emanated from these works, the colors used and the abstract execution influenced the Impressionists, Cubists, Abstract Expressionists and other art schools of the modern era.]

Queen Mother Pendant Mask: Iyoba16th century

[Cast brass masks such as this one were owned by paramount chiefs and titleholders of the Benin kingdom. Representing the face of the oba himself, these masks were worn suspended from the neck to indicate rank and demonstrate fealty to the king. As Benin expanded its political influence and military control over many of its neighbors, those foreign rulers who were absorbed into its political system also received these masks. Created at the court by royal brass casters, such works were distributed by the oba to newly incorporated chiefs. This work is believed to have belonged to either the Amapetu of Mahin or the Olugbo of Ugbo, two Yoruba rulers approximately eighty miles to the west of Benin City.

Like most pectoral masks, this work depicts a human face framed at the bottom by an ornamental flange with loops for small metal rattles. The hair, bordered by a sharply angular hairline, consists of rows of small concentric circles. Two inlaid iron vertical marks on the forehead lend balance and dignity to the face, and invest the pupils of the eyes with an intensity and power befitting a ruler. The four vertical marks to either side of these are found on Benin sculptures depicting Edo women or non-Edo men, suggesting that this work may have been created expressly for the use of a foreign ruler. The subtle molding of the nose and cheeks as well as the sensitive, delicate mouth imbue the representation with a naturalism that is stylistically associated with the earliest period of Benin sculpture, suggesting that it was created between the fifteenth and seventeenth centuries.]

[According to the oral traditions of the Yoruba people, Ife is the place where life and civilisation began. Ife is regarded as the legendary homeland of the Yoruba-speaking peoples and its sacred ruler, the Ooni, is still revered as the descendant of the original creator gods. Ife is located in Osun State in modern south-western Nigeria.

The art of Ife has produced a large corpus of sculptural works in terracotta, stone, brass and copper which were found at different sites in the city. Among these artworks the representations of humans are striking for their naturalistic style.

Mask said to represent the Oni Obalufon II, 12-15th century, copper, from the Oni's Palace, Ife.

This life-like modelling is unique in Africa and when objects from Ife were first presented to the western world they were compared with the classical traditions of Ancient Greece and Rome. It was even suggested that such heads were evidence that Ife was the site of the lost civilization of Atlantis. In fact the sculpture of Ife is today rightly seen as one of the highest achievements of African art and culture.]

Imported from North Africa many hundreds of years before, horses were then locally raised and widely used in developing mounted cavalry and in war. Ashantee horseman equipped for war, Ashanti, Africa, 1824. From: Joseph Dupuis,Journal of a Residence in Ashantee 1824.

[Kente (Akan: nwentoma; Ewe: kete) refers to a Ghanaian textile, made of handwoven cloth, strips of silk and cotton.[1] Historically the fabric was worn in a toga-like fashion by royalty among ethnic groups such as the Ashanti and Ewe in modern day Ghana, the wearing of Kente cloth has become widespread to commemorate special occasions, with highly sought after Kente brands led by master weavers.]

Fulani (Peul) woman from Fouta Djallon, central Guinea.

Zulu women in traditional hair styles.

Hairstyles ancient and modern Nile Valley complex

What is Nigeria's biggest flaw, in your opinion?

Ngozi Stanley-Obi
October 5, 2019

A few Months ago, 33 years after we left high school,we had the first Alumna retreat of my high School .

I went to a Unity School, this was a concept introduced by the Government 40years ago, to bring the best students from the different tribes/States to study together, bond and become detribalized.

You had the best of the best brains in these schools.

During our retreat, our high School bonding was still in place. We looked at issues objectively and dispassionately to arrive at the best decisions.

There was no division along ethnic or religious lines.

We were brothers and sisters with a common purpose and vision, planning how best to make our positive impacts on our economy through our various fields.

At the end of this wonderful retreat, l realized that the greatest flaw in Nigeria is our division along ethnic and religious lines, instead of embracing detribalization for economic development.

We are all so busy fighting ethnic and religious battles instead of working together to make our Country better for all of us.

We will need to embrace our diversity and collectively work together to make our Country the best that it can be for all of us.

Related Links

How do other African countries view Nigeria?
Are Nigerians racist?
What is the cause of Nigeria's problems?
Will Nigeria ever get better?
What are the great examples of Nigerian frauds?
How dangerous is Nigeria?

What is it going to take for Biafra and other sessional groups to get their independence?

Observer of Political Trends August 23
Get support from the Americans.

There is no country on the continent (very few in the world, really) American support cannot dismember.

Secessionist causes that find a celebrity booster or a powerful patron in the US State Department, the Pentagon or the West Wing will be successful. Even better, aim for all four.

Do not be surprised if you end up alone after your independence.

It felt wry to read about Mr Clooney scoring an exclusive invite to former President Obama's 60th bash. Meanwhile, South Sudanese officials were in a shooting war that required mediation from the Prime Minister of Sudan.

Related Links

What makes up BIAFRA? Can Biafra become a separate entity from Nigeria?

How best do we divide Nigeria into Ariwa, Oduduwa and Biafra republics?

Why can't Biafra be allowed to become an independent state?

Is there a viable claim for Biafra to be established? How would it work as a country?

Why is Biafra the future of Africa?

When is Biafra going to actualize their freedom from Nigeria?

Does Nigeria mean Negroes?

Kude Haruna Hassan Phd in Information Systems, American University of Nigeria (Graduated 2018) 17h ago

Not at all… it means "Niger area", after the Royal Niger Company, itself getting its name from one of the two major rivers that traverse through the country. It was Lady Flora Shaw who coined the name "Nigeria!" https://www.npg.org.uk/collections/search/person/mp65594/flora-nee-shaw-lady-lugard

Related Links

Why? Why is Ethiopia still in 2014 while the rest of the world are in 2021?

Did you know there is a permanent forum on the people of African descent?

How should I expect to live in Lagos Nigeria on $5,000 USD per month?

What is the concept of indigenous African arts?

What is the law in Nigeria for personal protection against pirates in Nigerian waters?

Many blacks think of Europeans as architects of Africa's problems, perhaps due to colonization. Is there a useful rationale for that?

What is the possibility of having an advanced and developed Africa like the west?

How can the upcoming generation sanitize Africa of corruption?

Did modern North Africans come from the Middle East? Were the ancient North Africans Negroid Africans?

I have always wonder how Nigeria will be in two or three years time. We are suffering everyday. What are your thoughts? Let's see if we can get a solution and at least have hope on something.

What is the probability that the Nigerian naira will not crash by December 2021?

Who was the Nigerian president in 1979 to 1983?

Is ROOM69.NG a hookup or a dating site?

Why are African women and men naturally more muscular?

Did modern North Africans come from the Middle East? Were the ancient North Africans Negroid Africans?

Khepri Neteru Lab Tech at Northside Hospital (2016–present) 17h ago

No such thing is Negroid. Indigenous Africans, yes Also where did people from Western Asia come from???_

Related Links

Why? Why is Ethiopia still in 2014 while the rest of the world are in 2021?

Did you know there is a permanent forum on the people of African descent?

How should I expect to live in Lagos Nigeria on $5,000 USD per month?

What is the concept of indigenous African arts?

What is the law in Nigeria for personal protection against pirates in Nigerian waters?

Does Nigeria mean Negroes?

Many blacks think of Europeans as architects of Africa's problems, perhaps due to colonization. Is there a useful rationale for that?

What is the possibility of having an advanced and developed Africa like the west?

How can the upcoming generation sanitize Africa of corruption?

I have always wonder how Nigeria will be in two or three years time. We are suffering everyday. What are your thoughts? Let's see if we can get a solution and at least have hope on something.

What is the probability that the Nigerian naira will not crash by December 2021?

Who was the Nigerian president in 1979 to 1983?

Is ROOM69.NG a hookup or a dating site?

Why are African women and men naturally more muscular?

Will it ever snow in Nigeria?

Abdul Emmanuel Builder (2014–present) Thu

What has snow got to do with the development and growth of Nigeria. With or without snow in Nigeria, the People will live. Come to Jos the Capital of Plateau State and experience another level of cold and freezing weather similar to snow.

Olaniyi Opeyemi

Sales & Marketing for 10years & Affiliate Marketer at IGTCROPS (2007–present) Thu
Snow isn't something you would expect in Nigeria, a nation so close to the Equator.

Nigeria is the most populated country in Africa and the eighth most populated country on the planet. This West African country reaches out between scopes 4∘N and 7∘N, and longitudes 2∘E and 3∘E. Nigeria shares land borders with the Republic of Benin in the West, Chad and Cameroon in the East, and Niger in the North.

As a tropical country, there are two stormy seasons in Nigeria that stretch out from March to June and September to November. The environment is hot and muggy, with normal high temperatures going from 80F to 97F (27°C to 36°C) all through the country.

Related Links

What is the possibility of having an advanced and developed Africa like the west? Just Imagine a fully independent Africa capable of sustaining self with few people living below poverty level and few crises around.

How can the upcoming generation sanitize Africa of corruption?

Did modern North Africans come from the Middle East? Were the ancient North Africans Negroid Africans?

I have always wonder how Nigeria will be in two or three years time. We are suffering everyday. What are your thoughts? Let's see if we can get a solution and at least have hope on something.

What is the probability that the Nigerian naira will not crash by December 2021?

Who was the Nigerian president in 1979 to 1983?

Is ROOM69.NG a hookup or a dating site?

Why are African women and men naturally more muscular?

How much do you know about Africa?

Can someone introduce me to a very cheap Naira SMM panel in Nigeria?

Why is the weather in the northern part of Nigeria different from the weather in the southern part of Nigeria?

How do I make 100K Naira?

Why do Africans fan European football more than their own?

What do you know about African pears?

What constitutes Africa's biggest economic paradox?

Is it true that PhDs from African countries are considered weak by other countries?

Boris Ezomo

Africa is hot but I love it here. Fri

Mostly true and we have only ourselves to blame.

It is not how hard you study that matters, but with what.

The education system is basically abandoned in Africa, and it becomes more obvious the higher you go.

In primary schools you need just a blackboard

Secondary schools you need books and some lab chemicals.

In undergraduate you need expensive books or Internet as well as lab space

In post graduate level you need advanced lab, access to specialist libraries and advanced resources.

This is more obvious with science related degrees.

How on earth do you expect a nuclear physics PhD from Ibadan University with its small nuclear reactor and only one of few in Africa, to compete with a PhD from say US, UK and Russia that has easy access to nuclear energy for any research their students do for their PhDs.

In short, PhD involves a lot of research. Africa in general does not have the facilities.

Related Links

What is the possibility of having an advanced and developed Africa like the west? Just Imagine a fully independent Africa capable of sustaining self with few people living below poverty level and few crises around.

How can the upcoming generation sanitize Africa of corruption?

Did modern North Africans come from the Middle East? Were the ancient North Africans Negroid Africans?

I have always wonder how Nigeria will be in two or three years time. We are suffering everyday. What are your thoughts? Let's see if we can get a solution and at least have hope on something.

What is the probability that the Nigerian naira will not crash by December 2021?

Who was the Nigerian president in 1979 to 1983?

Is ROOM69.NG a hookup or a dating site?

Why are African women and men naturally more muscular?

How much do you know about Africa?

Can someone introduce me to a very cheap Naira SMM panel in Nigeria?

Why is the weather in the northern part of Nigeria different from the weather in the southern part of Nigeria?

How do I make 100K Naira?

Why do Africans fan European football more than their own?

What do you know about African pears?

What constitutes Africa's biggest economic paradox?

News Nigeria

Nigeria Intercepts Arms, Military Uniforms, Cocaine, 600,000 Bottles Of Codeine Coming Through Lagos Port

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong Fri

The Nigeria Customs Service has intercepted smuggled arms and ammunition, military uniforms, cocaine and thousands of bottles of codeine.
The area comptroller of the Tin Can Island command, Abdullahi Musa disclosed this on Thursday at a media conference in Lagos,

The command in conjunction with NDLEA (National Drug Law Enforcement Agency) also seized 43.110 kg of cocaine, military uniforms, used clothes, cartons of expired chloroquine injections, etc., with a duty paid value of N93,829,829," said Mr Musa.

"Recently, the command discovered a pistol with its magazine concealed in a compartment of an imported vehicle among others."

NCS had rejigged its anti-smuggling operations through intelligence sharing with other security agencies, including the NDLEA and the Standards Organisation of Nigeria, Abdullahi said.

"On Wednesday, the command seized a container of 150 arms and ammunition and 600,000 bottles of Bacardi brand of codeine, among others," he added.

Related Links

What is the possibility of having an advanced and developed Africa like the west? Just Imagine a fully independent Africa capable of sustaining self with few people living below poverty level and few crises around.

How can the upcoming generation sanitize Africa of corruption?

Did modern North Africans come from the Middle East? Were the ancient North Africans Negroid Africans?

I have always wonder how Nigeria will be in two or three years time. We are suffering everyday. What are your thoughts? Let's see if we can get a solution and at least have hope on something.

What is the probability that the Nigerian naira will not crash by December 2021?

Who was the Nigerian president in 1979 to 1983?

Is ROOM69.NG a hookup or a dating site?

Why are African women and men naturally more muscular?

How much do you know about Africa?

Can someone introduce me to a very cheap Naira SMM panel in Nigeria?

Why is the weather in the northern part of Nigeria different from the weather in the southern part of Nigeria?

How do I make 100K Naira?

Why do Africans fan European football more than their own?

What do you know about African pears?

What constitutes Africa's biggest economic paradox?

How much do you know about Africa?

Galaxia Of Dragons

I find it fascinating/Fri

Originally Answered: What do you know about Africa?

It's beautiful. I am mixed with A LOT, mostly African (Nigerian and Tanzanian) east and west africa... I love both my cultures.. The food is really good, the variety is amazing - meeting people is good... I can't complain I'm 75% African and I wouldn't have it any other way :)

Related Links

What is the possibility of having an advanced and developed Africa like the west? Just Imagine a fully independent Africa capable of sustaining self with few people living below poverty level and few crises around.

How can the upcoming generation sanitize Africa of corruption?

Did modern North Africans come from the Middle East? Were the ancient North Africans Negroid Africans?

I have always wonder how Nigeria will be in two or three years time. We are suffering everyday. What are your thoughts? Let's see if we can get a solution and at least have hope on something.

What is the probability that the Nigerian naira will not crash by December 2021?

Who was the Nigerian president in 1979 to 1983?

Is ROOM69.NG a hookup or a dating site?

Why are African women and men naturally more muscular?

Can someone introduce me to a very cheap Naira SMM panel in Nigeria?

Why is the weather in the northern part of Nigeria different from the weather in the southern part of Nigeria?

How do I make 100K Naira?

Why do Africans fan European football more than their own?

What do you know about African pears?

What constitutes Africa's biggest economic paradox?

News Nigeria

Kidnapped Woman Run Mad As Bandits Fed Dogs With Her New Born Twins

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong 6h ago

A pregnant woman kidnapped by bandits who gave birth to twins while in captivity and they were fed to the bandits' dogs, right in front of her eyes has run mad, News Nigeria has learned.

Mr. Aliyu Kwarbai, who disclosed the incident, said apart from the kidnapped woman, a staff of ABUTH was kidnapped at Mil Goma and was raped severally through her private parts (front and back) to the extent that she has developed a psychiatric disorder, she is currently undergoing treatment at ABUTH

Several other victims have been seriously abused, raped through the anus, chained for weeks, brutalized and sometimes killed and fed to dogs, Kwabai added.

However, Kwabai wondered why the Nigerian State is yet to label them terrorists and wants to grant them amnesty.

Those granted amnesty by the Katsina and Zamfara State Governments and placed on the Government payroll, receiving salaries monthly like any other legitimate civil servants, still went back to banditry.

What sort of amnesty do bandits sympathisers want? I am very sure none of their loved ones have ever been kidnapped, he said.

Nafiu Abdu, Professor of Soil chemistry, ABU Zaria.

Related Links

Why can't we create life? What are the missing components needed to recreate the events that lead to the first emergence of life on earth?

What are the odds of life to randomly form on Earth?

What is scientifically the most probable explanation for the emergence of life on Earth?

How did life on Earth begin?

If the conditions that led to formation of life on earth are replicated, will it lead to life forming in similar way as we know it today or will the outcome be probabilistic in nature?

How did life begin on Earth? How did we get from the "primordial soup" of the building

What will it take an African country to exist completely independent without contributions or influence from the West?

Fawaz Bello Studies at Federal University Lokoja (Expected 2025) 17h ago

I understand that there are some unnecessary contributions by the west which could sometimes lead to annoyance, but the idea of detaching from them is not right. They gave us most of what we are using today .

A similar example is Just like that of our normal daily lives some people give suggestions, some want to force their suggestions on you. It's not possible for external bodies not to contribute into internal affairs
Ans To the question

By being independent ,

when the country can produce by themselves (china) ,

can battle their wars on their own (Israel),

don't need loan from any country , good economy,

low amount of corruption from grassroot to tier 1 level.

I personally don't have problems with the contributions .

Related Links

I am from Nigeria and I wish to play Mobile Legends on European servers with low ping or without lag. Is it possible?

What is the major cause of the cholera outbreak in the northern part of Nigeria?

What should African leaders as well as the world leaders do to restore the failing democracy in Africa?

How do you think Nigeria should tackle her insecurity problems, especially in the northern part of Nigeria?

What is the future of e-commerce in Nigeria in the next 3 years?

In your mind, why is Africa called the dark continent?

Do you think that shutting down telecommunication in Northern Nigeria will help in the fight against Bandits?

How can you volunteer in Africa, and what program should you apply to?

How can social work be effective in Nigeria?

Why is the Sahara desert so big? Could it be reversed in order to recover a huge territory?

Is it true that PhDs from African countries are considered weak by other countries?

What do you think about Nigerians being the giants of Africa?

What are the top 5 products that are most in need in Nigeria?

What are the most patronized products in Nigeria?

What will it take an African country to exist completely independent without contributions or influence from the West?

Fawaz Bello

Studies at Federal University Lokoja (Expected 2025) 17h ago

I understand that there are some unnecessary contributions by the west which could sometimes lead to annoyance, but the idea of detaching from them is not right. They gave us most of what we are using today .

A similar example is Just like that of our normal daily lives some people give suggestions, some want to force their suggestions on you. It's not possible for external bodies not to contribute into internal affairs

Ans To the question

By being independent ,

when the country can produce by themselves (china) ,

can battle their wars on their own (Israel),

don't need loan from any country , good economy,

low amount of corruption from grassroot to tier 1 level.

I personally don't have problems with the contributions .

Related Links

I am from Nigeria and I wish to play Mobile Legends on European servers with low ping or without lag. Is it possible?

What is the major cause of the cholera outbreak in the northern part of Nigeria?

What should African leaders as well as the world leaders do to restore the failing democracy in Africa?

How do you think Nigeria should tackle her insecurity problems, especially in the northern part of Nigeria?

What is the future of e-commerce in Nigeria in the next 3 years?

In your mind, why is Africa called the dark continent?

Do you think that shutting down telecommunication in Northern Nigeria will help in the fight against Bandits?

How can you volunteer in Africa, and what program should you apply to?

How can social work be effective in Nigeria?

Why is the Sahara desert so big? Could it be reversed in order to recover a huge territory?

Is it true that PhDs from African countries are considered weak by other countries?

What do you think about Nigerians being the giants of Africa?

What are the top 5 products that are most in need in Nigeria?

What are the most patronized products in Nigeria?

Which country is better to live in, Kenya or Nigeria?

Jeff October 25, 2020 Originally Answered: Between Nigeria and Kenya, which is the best to reside in?

It depends why you came. I've spent time in both nations, and lived in Abuja for much of the last decade. Abuja is definitely easier to get around in than Nairobi, and the security situation within the ring roads is fine.

Armed robbers had recently taken to haunting the roundabouts in Nairobi when I first visited in 2015, waiting for traffic jams to slow vehicles enough for pointed guns to result in cash forked through barely opened windows.

That never happened when I lived in Abuja, in part because traffic is light most of the time and passerbys don't tolerate thieves. I have heard of such robberies in Lagos and kidnapping seems to be more prevalent in Naija as well, so one picks one's poison. Security needs are part of the package in both countries, frankly. Still, I rarely had issues and I went to spots few foreigners go.

If you're into the high life Lagos is the place. Nowhere in Africa touches it for population or the vibrancy of its residents: they're up and about every hour of the day and night. Abuja and Nairobi are staid by comparison.

It's far easier to travel around the countryside as a mzungu: rural security is much better in Kenya due to the robust safari tourism industry there. It's more cumbersome to travel far in Nigeria, due to sketchy security and oyibos like myself do stand out in a crowd. There are more white people in Nairobi, as well as Indians and Arabs, so it's not so glaringly obvious one is not local there by glance alone.

On the other hand I did travel around rural Naija and even went on safari at Yankari Game Reserve, West Africa's largest and oldest park. That's not necessarily common though, while every ex-pat in Kenya has taken a safari or two, if only to check it off the obvious lists of things to do in country.

Nigeria is first and foremost about people, while Kenya offers the chance to see wide open spaces and natural parks where one is only surrounded by those one brought. There's a sense of the frontier there, that Hemingway's short stories are still not outdated, although the colonial era is thankfully in the past.

That doesn't happen in Nigeria: life there is about conversations with strangers: I never once hung out at a bush bar and didn't end up talking politics, football, or just current events, unless I made a point of sitting by myself in a far off corner with a book. Achebe's third novel, No Longer At Ease, still seems relevant, dealing as it does with political corruption and revolution, but the nation of Things Fall Apart is long gone: the Igbos don't worship pythons anymore, more's the pity.

I'd say Kenya is best for those who like to travel, even after getting to a country, and Nigeria is best for those who like people and spicy food. I'm committed to Naija due to family, and hence a bit biased. The two nations are certainly not all that similar, but I'm not sure I'd argue either is inherently best.

What we experience where we go when we travel depends on what we bring with us.

My daughter and I on the backside of Zuma Rock. It used to be a weekend getaway years ago. She was fun to bring along, and still is, although these days I'm back in the American southwest, missing Africa.

With over 3,000 Boko Haram terrorists surrendering in both Nigeria and Cameroon in the past weeks, what possible advice can you give both governments that this latest move by the sect could be a scheme to launch more attacks?

Emmanuel-Francis Nwaolisa Ogomegbunam

Nigerian August 23

Originally Answered: With over 3,000 Boko Haram terrorists surrendering in both Nigeria and Cameroon in the past weeks, what possible advice can you give to both governments not forgetting the fact that this latest move by the sect could be a scheme to launch more attacks?

I find the idea of amnesty for criminals disgusting.
Being law-abiding should be seen as correct and rational.

Every village or neighbourhood should have a gibbet and a birching pole so the consequences of criminality can be made visible.

Also, the shame of being a village whose offspring are flogged or hung at a higher rate than neighbours will increase social pressure on criminal elements.

Sadly, the 'root causes' racket is ascendant. Apparently, poor people who work their fingers to the bone to better their lot are stupid. They should be criminals, instead. Those are the ideas pushed at the unending conferences on development. So this brilliant idea of paying off criminals has the imprimatur of agents of advanced countries. That is enough to shut down counter-arguments in Nigeria.

"You're right, people are suffering,"… "But these people [former jihadists] know how to shoot, how to bomb. So the government should set them up in business; otherwise they could do something bad."

The attitude of blackmailers. Another 'crime', but I guess in this up is down days that merits an additional bonus.

Malam 'Aliyu' lives in a neat, two-bedroom house in Nigeria's northern city of Kaduna. Squeezed into the small living room is a large, brand-new sofa set, still in its plastic. A plasma TV is on the wall. Outside, in the yard, is an area where he plans to raise poultry.

In his early thirties, with a wispy goatee, Aliyu has remarried to a forthright woman from the northeastern city of Maiduguri. She is also former Boko Haram, and they have been set up with the rent-free house in Kaduna, a business license, and a small monthly stipend provided by Nigeria's domestic spy service, better known as DSS.

This will not work. A country of 200 (?) million and a per capita of $535 cannot afford either permanent amnesty or even a large prisoner populace. Petty crimes should be swiftly punished, and the irredeemable criminals executed.

The Sharia is eminently sensible on this. Therefore I must wonder if Archbishop Welby has successfully converted the president to Anglicanism during all his medical trips to England. Either that or this is one of those 'cabal' schemes.

In Nigeria, top students receive N1,000 as prizes, and we also buy plasma TVs for (former) terrorists.

No, really. Up is down.

University of Nigeria Nsukka (UNN) The University of Nigeria Nsuka (UNN) has sparked outrage on social media after awarding the sum of N1000 and N1500 to its best graduating students in several categories. Parents and visitors couldn't hide their disappointment and anger during the institution's 49th convocation held last Thursday. SaharaReporters reported that parents and visitors at the convocation ceremony which held at the University of Nigeria, Enugu State, were angered that the institution could award such "ridiculous prizes" to its best brains at a public ceremony. The prizes and award night programme booklet of the best graduating students confirmed that the university awarded the said prizes to its best students. Some university workers drew comparisons between the university's paltry prize money and Big Brother Naija, where the winner takes prizes worth millions of naira. They added that even runners-up in the Big Brother Naija show still smile home with magnificent prizes such as Sports Utility Vehicles in a television programme devoid of academic rigour. The last edition of the BBNaija reality show saw the winner, Olamilekan "Laycon" Agbeleshe go home with prizes worth N85 million.

https://pmnewsnigeria.com/2021/06/15/unn-awards-best-graduating-students-n1000-cash-prizes/

There is no worse fate than being a lab rat for 'modernity'.

The next time some development economist blathers on about how Nigerians need to pay more tax, apparently, for fads like this, laugh at them. Better not to pay taxes and then get a reward from the government for your crime.

To survive hunters shooting without stopping, fly without perching.

Related Links

If Boko Haram is just 7,000 people and the Nigerian Army is over 200,000 strong, with support from the US, China, Israel, etc. in the fight against Boko Haram, then how is Boko Haram able to survive in a nation of 180 million people for 10 years?

What does Boko Haram aim to achieve by killing civilians in Nigeria?

Should South Africa be doing more to help Nigeria fight Boko Haram (weapons, training and possibly some troops)?

Nigerians, what's the deal with Boko Haram? You have a military that once contained a breakaway territory of Biafra, how can you not finish Boko Haram?

Why is the Nigerian army and its Allies seemingly finding it difficult to defeat Boko Haram?

What plan would you draw up to defeat the Boko Haram terrorist organisation in Nigeria?

Why is Boko Haram against Western education in Nigeria?

How is it possible that some group or other elements within Nigeria control the country and not the Nigerian federal government?

Would the United States be more interested in defeating Boko Haram if Nigeria had large amounts of oil to exploit?

How do terrorist groups like Al-shabab and Boko Haram get their supply of weapons?

What are the causes of insecurity in Nigeria?

Abdul Emmanuel Builder (2014–present) Sat

The one and only cause of insecurity in Nigeria is Religion. It has become like the air Nigerians breath, they can not do anything without putting Religion into it. Religion is destroying Nigeria and Nigerians are not even aware of it.

Related Links

What do you think about Nigerians being the giants of Africa?

What will it take an African country to exist completely independent without contributions or influence from the West?

What are the top 5 products that are most in need in Nigeria?

What are the most patronized products in Nigeria?

Can I get international demand from silica gel powder from Nigeria?

What are the understanding on the challenges of re-integration of surrendered Boko Haram insurgents?

What exactly were the British empire doing in countries such as Nigeria, Ghana and Jamaica? What were their motivations for going there?

How are Sub-Saharan Africans treated in Libya?

If a Nigerian ecommerce SAAS founder decides to incorporate in Delaware and bank offshore but wants to serve Africans n global clients, does he have to also incorporate in Nigeria too? How will he be taxed?

Is Nigeria proactive or reactive in national activities with your reasons?

Who has the identity of a Nigerian hacker or scammer?

Is there any social media created in Nigeria?

Which virtual card can I use for payment methods on the Play Store? My ATM card is not working. I'm in Nigeria.

Why was the Light Children's Movement started in Africa?

What are the causes of insecurity in Nigeria?

COMMENTARY by Matt Riggsby MA Archaeology, Boston University May 26, 2020

I've read a bunch about sub saharan African kingdoms but there isn't much to read about. There are almost no details whatsoever and it seems like there are only big events included. Don't u think having written would have changed that?

There are written records. It's just that not a lot about them has made it to you.

There are a number of factors quietly lurking underneath whether or not you've heard about any given place or time and how much you know about it. Is it the history of the place you're from? Was that place regarded as important to the history of your own people and the place you were educated? Did they speak a language similar to the one spoken by the people/in the place you're from? Did they follow a similar religion or otherwise have a similar culture? The more "no" answers you get, the less you're likely to be able to find out about it. This isn't some kind of conspiracy to keep that history from you; people just naturally spend more time and effort investigating things which they regard as important and which are accessible to them. If I know more about the cities of Renaissance Italy than about those of the Swahili Coast, it's in large part because I come from a society which feels more connected to any part of Europe than any part of Africa and where a substantial number of people speak Italian and Latin than Arabic and Swahili (which means there are more translations into English as well as more opportunities for me to learn Italian and Latin and thus grapple with primary sources myself). For most of the world, the history of sub-Saharan Africa is somebody else's history, written in somebody else's languages.

Of course, that's not great, because barriers of language and overall academic interest preserve our ignorance and prejudice on this side of the divide. Scholarship in general would be better off if there were deeper dives into the archives of Timbuctu and other places where a wealth of history of West Africa awaits us. But that has happened yet.

What are the most recent lies Nigeria has told the world?

Danelle Lucado

STSO at Transportation Security Administration (2015–present) August 15
It's not the Nigerians that are telling lies, it's the corrupt government that's telling lies. The most recent lie, I would say has to do with not wanting to prosecute or even arrest their police commissioner, after being arrested for wire fraud and the United States. They refused to extradite him and prosecute him for his fraudulent behavior. That's not Nigeria, that's the Nigerian government.

Why the cover-up? To spare Nigeria another embarrassment of another corrupt official. The most decorated officer ever, turns out to be a criminal. He's been extorting money, threatening witnesses, possibly killing people, we don't really know the depth of his crimes. All the complaining witnesses are now dead. That's the biggest lie that the Nigerian government is telling now.

Related Links

How are Sub-Saharan Africans treated in Libya?

If a Nigerian ecommerce SAAS founder decides to incorporate in Delaware and bank offshore but wants to serve Africans n global clients, does he have to also incorporate in Nigeria too? How will he be taxed?

Is Nigeria proactive or reactive in national activities with your reasons?

Who has the identity of a Nigerian hacker or scammer?

What are the causes of insecurity in Nigeria?

Is there any social media created in Nigeria?

Which virtual card can I use for payment method on Play Store? My ATM card is not working. I'm in Nigeria.

I don't think such will work for Africans. Is it because we are black?

Why was the Light Children's Movement started in Africa?

What must I do to be part of the Emirate Cabin Crew as a Nigerian?

Are ebooks patronized in Nigeria?

How can I deal with the issue of a BVN on a watchlist, or do I get another BVn?

What are the major products in Nigeria?

What are the causes of the killings in Jos, Nigeria?

Why do people always think Nigeria is the largest producer of oil and gas in Africa?

News Nigeria

One in every 6 persons in Kano a drug addict' – Buba

"In Kano State, drug abuse prevalence is 16 per cent; that is, in every six persons, one is a drug addict and they are between the ages of 15 years and 64 years..."

NDLEA Chairman, Buba Marwa, said on Monday in Kano that the state has about two million drug addicts, representing 16 per cent prevalence.

Mr Marwa made the disclosure when he paid a courtesy visit to Governor Abdullahi Ganduje.

"In Kano State, drug abuse prevalence is 16 per cent; that is, in every six persons, one is a drug addict and they are between the ages of 15 years and 64 years.

"Kano State has close to two million drug users abusing tramadol, codeine and other cough syrups, rather than cannabis.

“I will like to mention here that since I assumed leadership of NDLEA in January, we have seized over two million kilogrammes of assorted drugs, estimated at billions of Naira.

“Eight thousand people were arrested and 1,600 are now serving jail terms in correctional service facilities, and we are still working.

“Drug abuse has gone to the level of destroying our families unless is tackled with all seriousness it dof reserves,’’ he said.

Mr Marwa said that the use of drugs propelled criminal activities ranging from banditry, kidnapping and armed robbery, among others.

He said that NDLEA was comfortable that the Kano State government was a worthy partner in tackling drug abuse.

Mr Marwa urged the state government to make legislation that would prevent politicians from giving drugs to youths.

He also urged the government to make legislation on compulsory drug test for intending couples, also as part of measures to fight against drug abuse.

In his address of welcome, Mr Ganduje said Kano State is the most populous state with highest number of youths and a commercial nerve centre of Nigeria and some West African countries.

“Being commercial centre, some use that opportunity to traffic drugs and you know we have the international airport, railway finds ads that link to many states.

“So, Kano find itself in a vulnerable situation,’’ the governor said.

He added that it was a policy in the state that commissioners and permanent secretaries must undergo drug abuse tests before getting appointed to reduce drug abuse rate in the state.

Mr Ganduje said that the government would relocate legitimate drug dealers to a market as part of efforts to check drug abuse and trafficking.

Meanwhile, at the Emir of Kano’s palace, Mr Marwa solicited for the support of the emirate in addressing the menace.

55 THINGS YOU PROBABLY DO NOT KNOW ABOUT NIGERIA

Aniekpeno Ekong

Follow News Nigeria for all the latest news in Nigeria August 26

You Will Be Shocked To Find Out That You Do Not Know 99% Of These:

Do you know that?

1. The River Niger Bridge at Onitsha was constructed between 1964 and 1965 by Dumez- a French construction company and cost £5 million.

2. Patience Jonathan is one of Nigeria's most-educated First Ladies, with an NCE, a B.Ed, and a PhD from University of Port-Harcourt.

3. The highest peak in Nigeria is located in Taraba and is called Chappal Waddi which means "The Mountain of Death".

4. There are 196 countries in the world and at least one Igbo person from Nigeria lives in every one of them.

5. The Pidgin word 'Sabi' came from 'Saber', Portuguese and Spanish for 'to know'. Both country's ships traded slaves from the Bight of Benin.

6. Katsina College (now Barewa College in Zaria) has produced 5 Nigerian Presidents/Heads of State since it was founded in 1921 in Katsina.

7. Ojukwu taught Murtala Mohammed and Ben Adekunle at Regular Officers Special Training School, Ghana. Both 'fought' their teacher during the civil war

8. At Nigeria's independence in 1960, there were 41 Secondary Schools in the North and 842 Secondary Schools in the South.

9. In 1983, Senator Arthur Nzeribe spent $16.5 million to win a Senatorial seat in Orlu (in Imo State).

10. In 1973, the Federal Government of Nigeria considered officially changing the name of “Lagos” to “Eko”. Regarding “Lagos” as a colonial name.

11. The geographical area now referred to as Nigeria was once referred to as ‘Soudan’ and ‘Nigiritia’.

12. Offences punishable by death sentence after the 1966 coup included embezzlement, rape and homosexuality.

13. MKO Abiola was named Kashimawo (Let us wait and see) by his parents. He was his father’s twenty-third child, but the first to survive infancy.

14. Jaja Wachucku was the first person to refer to Lagos as a “no-man’s land” in 1947, provoking a national controversy.

15. Jollof rice, chicken breast, serve of ice cream, tea, coffee or Bournvita, with full cream milk and sugar: Meal Cost = 50Kobo- Unilag in the late 1970s

16. At the point death in 1989, Sam Okwaraji was a PhD candidate and qualified lawyer with an LL.M in International Law (University of Rome)

17. When the British Bank of West Africa (now First Bank) opened a branch in Kano in 1929, Alhassan Dantata (Dangote’s Grandfather) opened an account depositing 20 camel-loads of silver coins.

18. Jaja Wachuku is reputed to have owned the biggest one-man library in West Africa. Balewa sometimes referred to him as “Most Bookish Minister

19. The colonization of Nigeria took more than 40 years to achieve and the territories were integrated by the use of force.

20. Yoruba is spoken as a ritual language the Santeria cult in Carribean and South-Central America.

21. Slavery existed in the Nigerian territory before the 15th century and was abolished in the 19th century- 1807 by the British.

22. At least 55 women were killed in South-East Nigeria, in 1929 when the women forced the Umuahia warrant chiefs to submit to their rule.

23. The coinage ‘Supreme Court’ was first used in 1863 by the colonial administration through the enactment of the Supreme Court Ordinance No. II.

24. MKO Abiola died suddenly on July 7, 1998, exactly one month after General Sani Abacha died mysteriously on June 8, 1998.

25. Agbani Darego was the only one to wear a maillot as opposed to a bikini during the Miss Universe contest in 2001.

26. The ‘Ankara’ material is not indigenous to Nigeria. Our indigenous textiles include the Akwete, Ukara, Aso-Oke and Adire.

27. Aloma Mukhtar is the first female lawyer from the North and went on to become the first female Chief Justice of Nigeria.

28. The area known as Makoro town in Lagos was first a swamp, later sand-filled by the colonial government and served as the first bridge to the Island.

29. Esie Museum is Nigeria’s first museum, established in 1945. Once reputed to have the largest collection of soapstone images in the world.

30. Aminu Kano formed the Northern Teachers’ Association (NTA) in 1948, the first successful regional organization in the history of the North.

31. George Goldie, who played a major role in founding Nigeria, placed a curse on anyone who attempts to write his biography.

32. In 1996, John Ogbu, a Nigerian Anthropologist firmly advocated for the use of African-American Vernacular to teach in the U.S

33. Hause Language indigenous to Northern Nigeria is spoken in 11 African States. Germany, French, U.S., and British International radio stations broadcast in Hausa.

34. The surgeon who ‘killed’ Stella Obasanjo was sentenced to 1 year in prison, disqualified for 3 years and fined €120,000.

35. The word ‘asiri’ means ‘secret’ in Hausa, Yoruba, Nupe and Igarra. It also means ‘gossip’ in Igbo.

36. Igbo-Ora in Oyo State, Kodinji in India and Candido Godoi in Brazil are the towns that produce the highest number of twin births in the world.

37. Bishop Ajayi Crowther, a Yoruba, in 1857 produced a reading book for the Igbo Language and a full grammar and vocabulary of NUPE in 1864.

38. The first TV broadcast in Nigeria and Tropical Africa was on October 31, 1959.

39. In 1978, a 50Kobo increase (from #1.50 to #2) in the cost of University Students’ meal per day caused the ‘Ali Must Go’ protests.

40. Albert E. Kitson discovered coal in Enugu in 1909. This discovery led to the building of Port-Harcourt town in 1912.

41. Today, only Nigeria has a larger black population than Brazil. More than 3.5 million Africans were captured, enslaved and transported to Brazil.

42. Groundnut pyramids were the invention of Alhaji Alhassan Dantata to stack bags before export.

43. In 1967, old traditional ruler, Oba Akran and A. Ademiluyi were jailed for 14 years (7 each) for stealing £504,750 (#2.5b).

44. Since 1960, Nigeria has been either ruled by an ex-lecturer/ex-teacher or military man. The only exceptions are Azikiwe and Shonekan.

45. If you visited Lagos in 1975, you could spend a day at the Presidential Suite of Federal Palace Hotel for #100, single room for #19.

46. The first aircraft to land in Nigeria landed in Kano in July 1925. A British fighter jet flew from Khartoum (present day Sudan).

47. In 1895, Koko of Nembe (now in Bayelsa) took 60 white men hostage. When the British refused his demands, more than 40 of those men were eaten.

48. The 'Naira' was coined by Chief Obafemi Awolowo when he was serving as the Federal Commissioner of Finance.

49. Koma Hill (settlement in Adamawa where people lived and practised the killing of twins) was discovered in 1986 by a NYSC corps member.

50. The pilot (Francis Osakwe) that flew Ojukwu away from Biafra (1970) was the same pilot that flew Gowon to Uganda (last flight as Head of State).

51. In 1986, Shehu Shagari was banned from participation in politics for life. The ban has still not been lifted.

52. As the wife of the deputy Head of State (Vice President of Nigeria) in 1984, Biodun Idiagbon personally ran a small ice cream shop in Ilorin..

53. Koma Hills (Adamawa State) inhabitants when discovered were observed to engage in the practise of borrowing wives among themselves.

54. Juju, Dashiki, Yam and Okra are words in the English dictionary that originated from ethnic groups located in present day Nigeria.

55. Nigeria has more English speakers than England, and more Muslims than Saudi Arabia and Syria.

Do You Like This Post? Please Kindly Follow News Nigeria.

News Nigeria
EVOLUTION OF THE NIGERIAN POLICE FORCE

Aniekpeno Ekong Follow News Nigeria for all the latest news in Nigeria August 18

Evolution and the role of colonial police in the country established by the colonialists, Henry Austin Bruce, 1st Baron AberdareGCB PCJP DLFRS FRHistS, Sir George Dashwood Taubman GoldieKCMG FRS, in various parts of the country at different times between 1861 and 1960 were organized and deployed as occupation force to suppress the indigenous Nigerian peoples as the colonizers exploited their resources to develop their own countries.

The country known as Nigeria is made up of different ethnic nationalities (more than a hundred of them). These ethnic nationalities were conquered by the British at different times and over a long period of time (1861-1903).

The colonizers executed the colonial project employing violence and fraud or deceits. Nigeria's constituent nationalities were conquered at different periods. As a nationality is conquered, British colonial presence is established by establishing a police force for the territory. Second, violence and fraud were employed in the conquest of the nationalities. Consequently, the colonizer feared resistance and police forces under various names were established and employed as an instrument of violence and oppression against the indigenous population.

Given the character of colonial rule, police forces were the instrument used to sustain alien domination. The colonial police were not accountable to the colonized but to the colonizers.

At the inception, the NPF was formed to oppress the people and violate their rights. It was not formed to protect the people. Little wonder, the police as today find it difficult to protect the people.

During the colonial period, most police were associated with local governments (native authorities). In the 1960s, under the First Republic, these forces were first regionalized and then nationalized. The British merged Lagos colony and the southern and northern protectorates in 1913 and named the new colony Nigeria. The northern and southern regional police forces were later merged, in 1930, to form the colony's first national police – the Nigeria Police Force (NPF). Aniekpeno Ekong

Why are there so many oil refineries in Nigeria?

Taofeek Olawale Shittu Badagry born and raised.November 22, 2017

I was itching to edit your question to: Why are there so many useless oil refineries in Nigeria?

I didn't out of respect for you, but that should be the question really. We have just four refineries yet we have problem keeping them functional. The United States has 141 (ONE-FOUR-ONE!), 137 are functional, the remaining 4 are undergoing reconstruction.
If you feel that's an unfair comparison, Venezuela with $371B GDP compared to Nigeria's $405B, has three fully functional refineries in a very dysfunctional society. Pakistan with $287B has four, Peru with $192B has five, Romania with $187B has ten!

I know GDP doesn't necessarily reflect on the issue at hand, but when oil makes up over 90% of your foreign transaction, shouldn't your refineries be in tip-top shape?

Here's the Minister of Petroleum Resources in Nigeria on the poor state of our refineries:

"To get a replacement for the equipment was not possible, because they were obsolete," she said. "For over 20 years, the equipment was not changed or maintained."

Refineries without proper maintenance for two decades creates economic disaster, and on a long term scale, an environmental disaster waiting to happen.

Reference: Why Nigeria's refineries are in terrible shape - Petroleum Minister - Premium Times Nigeria

Related Links

Why is Nigeria importing petrol from other countries? Is it that our leaders cannot build refineries?

How long does it take to build an oil refinery?

Why hasn't Nigeria been capable of exploring, extracting, and refining its own crude oil without any foreign involvement?
Why is it taking the country so long to refine its own crude oil using its indigenous technical capabilities?

How much does it cost to build a 30,000 BPSD oil refinery?

News Nigeria

Stop Protecting Bandits, Boko Haram Insurgents

– Ortom Fires Presidency Again

Posted by Aniekpeno Ekong

Governor Samuel Ortom of Benue State has asked the presidency to stop shielding bandit terrorists and Boko Haram insurgents terrorising the country.

Naija News reported that the governor had labelled Buhari as the worst President to ever rule Nigeria, adding that the Nigerian leader is grossly incapable of managing the affairs of the country.

Reacting, the Presidency described Ortom as a very unprincipled man who is only motivated by the lust for personal gains.

But in an interview with BBC Pidgin on Saturday, the Benue governor asked the Muhammadu Buhari-led government to flush out bandits and Boko Haram members with immediate effect.

He urged the government to use the same zeal it used to arrest secessionist leaders like Sunday Igboho and Nnamdi Kanu, to hunt down the criminals.

Ortom also berated the Buhari-led government for failing to proscribe Fulani bandits as terrorists just like the way it branded IPOB as a terrorist group.

He said: "If the government has power to stop Sunday Igboho and Nnamdi Kanu, why don't they have powers to stop bandits? All we hear is unknown gunmen.

"For me, I know it is Fulani bandits that are coming to kill us in Benue and our current leaders at Aso Rock in the presidency, have hands in all these that are happening.

"In fact, I was not the one who said it, even the Fulani bandits, they don't want them to be addressed as Fulani.

"They should just be calling them bandits, but they have come out to say this government brought them in 2015. It is not something to hide.

"I'm not the one who said this alone, Obasanjo has said it too, even Sultan too. Didn't you hear what Commodore Kunle said days ago?"

Governor Ortom stated that President Buhari does not need any proof of his allegations following the attempted attack on his convoy some mnoth ago.

He said: "Which proof do you want again? Why did the President not brand the Fulani bandits as terrorists just like the way it branded IPOB a terrorist group and the way it tagged Nnamdi Kanu and Sunday Igboho?

"The President knows what he is doing, there are good Fulani people and those who want the country to be at peace but the President does not want it to happen. When I talk, the next thing is to blackmail me.

“When I spoke on Channels TV a few days ago, it has been a while since I spoke there, then the next thing I heard is that they are being queried because of my interview.

“Miyetti Allah sponsors terrorism, they get funds and they have taken responsibility for their actions.

“I have written a couple of times to the President. Another group, the Fulani nationality movement, attempted to assassinate me, I have sent these findings to the president.”

“All these things, the presidency has all my findings, especially the handlers of the President.”

What could Nigerian people teach the rest of the world?

Victor Dirikebamor Storyteller February 17, 2020

#One

Depression is something new to most Nigerians and that is because we're family-oriented, we surround ourselves with family and friends at all times.

#Two

We love music, not only that, we dance to it with skin bone and soul. When you see a Nigerian celebrating, one might think they have no problems at all.

#Three

We consume natural food most of the times, mostly those who live in rural communities. Fry-fry or flower, known as snacks is new to many and distasteful to most men. We prefer cooked food without much oil which helps to keep many healthy.

#Four

The zest for survival is high on Nigerians. They will find a way to survive for the main time with the hope that things would be better. Hope is a watchword here!

#Five

There is no room for suicide, I've only heard it occur on rare occasions. The average Nigerian always finds a reason to stay alive, we instinctively know that being alive to face our troubles is better than taking the easy way out.

#Six

Being extremely creative is a survival tactic for most Nigerians, one might not survive in Nigeria for long without constantly tasking the mind to come up with solutions to everyday wahala(problems). Getting results using makeshift technologies or strategies is not new to us. Here in Nigeria, one either improvise or dig their grave before coming out to the open because everything will fight you from succeeding.

#Seven

Humanity has enough problems without religion, we see numerous disadvantages of religion in Nigeria every day but not everything about religion is bad, the laws help shape our character. Many of us live-right and desist from hating and hurting our enemies, even our horrible leaders because it's against our beliefs.

#Eight

A friend is never a friend until you make them family. Friends are considered family in Nigeria and our parents automatically accept our friends, consider them as theirs and administer the unsolicited, necessary home training to them from day one, including punishment.

#Nine

The average Nigerian has all the reasons in the world to be totally dishonest, evil, unhappy, suicidal, etc. But most of us still remain human, and more human than you, with the hope that things will get better. This further confirms the saying that "we are who we are", if you're good you're good even when you find yourself in hell.

And more...

God bless Nigeria

Related Links

Why are Nigerians everywhere all over the world?

Why are Nigerians so successful in America, and what can that teach us about the power of "racism" in the modern age?

What does it mean to be a Nigerian?

Are Nigerians smart?

What do people think about Nigeria and Nigerians?

If you could tell a Nigerian how not to behave abroad, what would you say to them?

NIGERIA NEWS

Is the Chinese investment more likely to help end poverty in some African countries than charity-based aid provided by other actors?

Answered by Iamisearo Job August 23

No charity or NGO has ever succeeded in ending poverty in Africa and they are not created for that purpose.
They are created to pull In money for some people while acting like they care to solve problems.

So what they have to offer is a temporary solution to the headache and when they are needed again they will not be there living you worse because they had your hope up.

Dashing out money such as recommended by universal basic income will not work also but instead, we need a system that allows everyone to invest in the future with their work or little token and get reward financially from the profit.

I have a model of such but luckily have no funds to launch the prototype in Nigeria with this model we can eliminate hunger in Africa and make food almost free to get.

Related Links

Why was the Light Children's Movement started in Africa?

What must I do to be part of the Emirate Cabin Crew as a Nigerian?

Are ebooks patronized in Nigeria?

How can I deal with the issue of a BVN on a watchlist, or do I get another BVn?

What are the major products in Nigeria?

What are the causes of the killings in Jos, Nigeria?

Why do people always think Nigeria is the largest production of oil and gas in Africa?

Why do people hate Nigerians?

Is it possible for foreign aid to go to the citizens directly and bypass the corrupt governments such as Nigeria?

Why was Africa a fertile ground for slave trade?

Do you think the proposed digital Naira by the Central Bank of Nigeria succeed?

Do you think Boko Haram and ISWAP will take over the Nigerian government if left unchecked?

If the bandits could successfully carry out an attack on Nigeria Defense Academy (NDA), how safe are the ordinary citizens of Nigeria?

Which state has the highest demand for yam in Nigeria?

Do you need new yam from Zaki-Biam, Benue State?

NIGERIA News:
President Muhammadu Buhari inaugurates employment scheme for 20000 Nigerian youths.

By Lahaga Aondowase
Blogger, Writer, Retailer and Online marketer

President Muhammadu Buhari inaugurates employment scheme for 20000 Nigerian youths. The programme will employ 20000 Nigerian youths in public and private sector organizations every year.

Founder at Orgguy (2021–present)11h ago
President Muhammadu Buhari inaugurates employment scheme for 20000 Nigerian youths. The programme will employ 20000 Nigerian youths in public and private sector organizations every year.

NIGERIA

Bishop urges FG to turn Sambisa, other forests into grazing reserves

As 600 Anglican Delegates, 137 Churches Storm Anambra For Synod

The Bishop, Nnewi Diocese, Province of the Niger, Anglican Communnion, Rt. Rev. Dr. Ndubuisi Obi, has called on the Federal Government to turn the dreaded Sambisa Forest and other forests, which serve as haven for bandits in Yobe, Niger and Kaduna, among other states to grazing reserves, if it is keen on tackling insecurity facing the country.

Obi, who made the call at Nnewi, Anambra State, yesterday, ahead of the three-day 9th session of the Synod beginning September 2, 2021 at St James Ichi, Ekwusigo Local Council of Anambra State, with theme: Created for Dominion, said he was amazed that government was foot-dragging on turning the forests into grazing reserves. No fewer than 600 delegates from 137 churches are expected as participants.

He said the conversion of these forests into reserves will help curb banditry, kidnappings and farmer-herder clashes, advising the Federal Government to show more sincerity and openness in its policy and efforts to check saddening activities of insurgent groups, such as Boko Haram, herdsmen and others killing and engaging in destructive spree.

Obi wondered why the Federal Government that had found it expedient to construct rail line from Nigeria to Niger is not disposed to building facilities that can take water from available rivers to irrigate and fertilise the lands at the vast land in Sambisa and other forests.

The cleric pointed out that it was ill timed for President Muhammadu Buhari to show more interest in the creation and reviving controversial grazing routes, which drew ire from majority of members of the House of Representatives who opposed it.

The bishop advised the Federal Government to provide fund and buy lands and grow grasses for the cattle to feed. Obi frowned at the raid and killings of suspected members of Eastern Security Network (ESN)) and Indigenous People of Biafra (IPOB) in Imo State and other parts of Southeast, while turning deaf ears to the orgy of killings and destruction of property in parts of the North.

Why did the British succeed in conquering the Nigerian people despite a strong opposition?

David Crawford Former British Army Infantry Officer (1974–1994) August 18, 2018

If you are Nigerian I suggest you do some reading. There was only ever one British military mission to the area now called Nigeria and that was to the Kingdom of Benin, where a small escort force of 250 native Nigeria Protection Force and 8 British civil representatives were attacked and killed for no reason and without warning by troops loyal to King Oba whist on a mission to resolve a trading dispute. This was immediately followed by the Benin Expedition of 1897 when a force of 1200 Royal Marines and sailors moved to bring those responsible to justice, including Oba. They met strong resistance and after 10 days hard fighting captured Benin City which they burnt to the ground and looted as per their orders. The "prizes" were all returned to London and auctioned at top London sales rooms to pay for the expedition.

Now, in a move mirroring the Chinese and their Summer Palace , and I suspect this Quora question is posted by an anonymous troll involved in the ridiculous demands that the UK should return or pay compensation for the materials taken.

For our questioner and any one else who thinks the Edo Kingdom of Benin is all of Nigeria:

It was roughly the dark green area bottom left of the map marked EDO.

Why is it difficult to travel out from Nigeria?

Debo Kayode Ogunranti Lived in Nigeria August 19, 2018

The biggest problem of travelling out of Nigeria is that of obtaining a visa. Most visas are difficult to obtain in Nigeria because of several reasons including the perception by the issuing countries that most applicants are potential economic migrants instead of being genuine students, vacationers, health tourists or businessmen they claim to be on their application forms.

Since the cost of living in Nigeria is high, so is the cost of obtaining visas.

The cost of air travel is far too high for average Nigerians.

The problem of medical certificates is also prevalent in Nigeria and more so because many countries would bar you from entry if you do not have a up to date Yellow Card.

Language may be a barrier to entry if a Nigerian does not speak more than the English language.

Travel glitches may create a serious deterrent to travelling abroad by Nigerians. These include delayed flights and cancellations, health concerns and fear of terrorism.

There's nothing peculiar about travel difficulties in Nigeria if you remember that we are a poor third world country and one of the most populous in the world.

Planning long ahead usually mitigates the problems one may encounter when travelling out of the country.

When you travel, it helps to have purpose, even when you are on vacation.

Bon voyage!

COMMENTARY Debo Kayode Ogunranti lived in Nigeria Answered August 19, 2018
Upvoted by Duke Ogolor lives in Nigeria (1960-present)

The biggest problem of travelling out of Nigeria is that of obtaining a visa. Most visas are difficult to obtain in Nigeria because of several reasons including the perception by the issuing countries that most applicants are potential economic migrants instead of being genuine students, vacationers, health tourists or businessmen they claim to be on their application forms.

Since the cost of living in Nigeria is high, so is the cost of obtaining visas.

The cost of air travel is far too high for average Nigerians.

The problem of medical certificates is also prevalent in Nigeria and more so because many countries would bar you from entry if you do not have a up to date Yellow Card.

Language may be a barrier to entry if a Nigerian does not speak more than the English language.

Travel glitches may create a serious deterrent to travelling abroad by Nigerians. These include delayed flights and cancellations, health concerns and fear of terrorism.

There's nothing peculiar about travel difficulties in Nigeria if you remember that we are a poor third world country and one of the most populous in the world.

Planning long ahead usually mitigates the problems one may encounter when travelling out of the country.

When you travel, it helps to have purpose, even when you are on vacation.

Bon voyage!

Related Links

What’s the best way to get out of Nigeria?
Why are Nigerians fleeing Nigeria?

Why do you want to travel out of Nigeria?
What is your best travel experience in Nigeria?
How do you travel from Nigeria to the USA?
Are there US soldiers based in Nigeria now?

Why are most successful doctors in America and England are Nigerian, but the president of Nigeria leaves the country to see other doctors?

Luka John Benjamin
Clergy at Living Faith Church Worldwide (2013–present)August 2

The major factors here are poor remuneration, poor facilities and working condition, and job satisfaction. Many of our health professionals are overworked. A doctor is supposed to see a maximum of 20 patients a day but they are seeing about 150 in a day. Certainly by the time he gets to 50 he is already exhausted. Even a nurse that is supposed to see about four patients has to take care of 50 patients in a ward, certainly he/she will get tired. The truth is that in Nigeria the working environment for many doctors is very hostile. Many doctors see patients that they can treat or intervene on their issues die in front of them because the hospitals they are working in does not have the necessary equipment to take care of them. Many patients in dire need for help don't have enough money for the kind of services they need at that particular time. I can tell you many doctors are spending fortunes on patients that they are not related to because it's painful to see patients die.

So, if we have our NHIS fully functional and we can always treat any patient, I can tell you many doctors will have job satisfaction because at the end of the day you have saved so many lives. But by the time you don't have that, you will be dissatisfied. The remuneration of doctors is very poor, if you go to other climes, what we are paid here is just 10 percent of what they collect and they respect doctors, they put you in that right position where you feel very important. We don't have good funding for maintenance for hospitals in the country. The few doctors that we have are overworked and are not appreciated, these are some of the reasons why so many of them are leaving unfortunately.

Related Links

How can I deal with the issue of a BVN on a watchlist, or do I get another BVn?

What are the major products in Nigeria?

What are the causes of the killings in Jos, Nigeria?

Why do people always think Nigeria is the largest production of oil and gas in Africa?

Why do people hate Nigerians?

Is it possible for foreign aid to go to the citizens directly and bypass the corrupt governments such as Nigeria?

Why was Africa a fertile ground for slave trade?

Do you think the proposed digital Naira by the Central Bank of Nigeria succeed?

Do you think Boko Haram and ISWAP will take over the Nigerian government if left unchecked?

If the bandits could successfully carry out an attack on Nigeria Defense Academy (NDA), how safe are the ordinary citizens of Nigeria?

Which state has the highest demand for yam in Nigeria?

Do you need new yam from Zaki-Biam, Benue State?

What are some interesting weapons that originated in Africa?

Does Gram-free pay Nigerians at all? If no, why?

Why do Nigerians believe that their traditional methods or ways of treating ailments is no longer effective?

NIGERIA News

What are the causes of the killings in Jos, Nigeria?

Plateau State is currently the main site of ethnic and religious violence in northern Nigeria. The past decade has seen recurrent crises across the state, in urban and rural areas. Thousands of lives have been lost in these violent conflicts, there has been extensive damage to property, and the development prospects of the state have been set back. The violence has mainly been along religious lines, between Muslims and Christians, but ethnicity also has a central role in the conflicts and there are considerable political interests at stake. Jos, the state capital and a major northern city with a population of some one million inhabitants, is the epicentre of much of the insecurity in Plateau State and has been the site of some of the worst of the violence. Episodes of mass killing and destruction have occurred in Jos in 2001, 2002, 2008 and 2010. The violence has also affected other parts of the high plateau, in rural areas outside of Jos – particularly in 2001-2 and 2010, when hundreds of people were killed in villages, in their fields, or while tending cattle. There have been massacres in the old mining settlements on the plateau, notably in 2001 and 2010. In rural areas there has also been widespread violence between Berom farmers and Fulani pastoralists. This is generally framed as a conflict over land, but contrary to media reports, many of those involved tend not to think the conflict is about a struggle for grazing land or farmland. In some areas valuable dry-season farmland has changed hands, with Hausa and Fulani farmers being forced off the land (Blench, 2004). But much of the violence appears to be politically inspired and xenophobic rather than arising out of competition for land – as the killings in the old mining settlements suggest.

The violence in Plateau State began after two decades of increasing collective violence in other parts of northern Nigeria, the worst of which occurred in Kano, Kaduna and Bauchi States. Plateau State was largely peaceful during this period, 1980-2000. In fact, the first episode of mass violence in Jos since the anti-Igbo pogroms in 1966 occurred in 2001

The recurrent crisis in and around Jos has const many lives and the root causes have yet to be addressed. Government reports have tried to explain the complicated situation, assess the number of deaths and come up with policy recommendations. It seems as if the presence of the military has a somewhat calmed down the situation, but the conflict has neither been solved nor has it been channelled into peaceful conflict resolution mechanisms.

In fact, there seems to be a lack of clarity on what the conflict causes are. Some call it a religious conflict, others see land interests at play, others believe that the distinction between indigenes and settlers and their implications lie at the heart of the conflict. This lack of clarity further complicates the search for policy solutions.

Last week, hours after President Muhammadu Buhari met behind closed doors with Governor Simon Lalong of Plateau State in the Presidential Villa, Abuja, some gunmen, on Tuesday night, turned the state to a theatre of war, as they attacked Yelwan Zangam community, close to the permanent site of the University of Jos (UNIJOS), killing about 36 people and burning houses.

The attack occurred around 9:00 p.m. despite the dusk to dawn curfew imposed in Jos North council as well as Jos South and Bassa council areas. The attackers shot sporadically, gunning down fleeing residents and burning some others in their homes.

Before the incident, the fragile bridge linking the community to other communities was destroyed to prevent help from coming to the people.

Related Links

How can I deal with the issue of a BVN on a watchlist, or do I get another BVn?

What are the major products in Nigeria?

Why do people always think Nigeria is the largest production of oil and gas in Africa?

Why do people hate Nigerians?

Is it possible for foreign aid to go to the citizens directly and bypass the corrupt governments such as Nigeria?

Why was Africa a fertile ground for slave trade?

Do you think the proposed digital Naira by the Central Bank of Nigeria will succeed?

Do you think Boko Haram and ISWAP will take over the Nigerian government if left unchecked?

If the bandits could successfully carry out an attack on Nigeria Defense Academy (NDA), how safe are the ordinary citizens of Nigeria?

Which state has the highest demand for yam in Nigeria?

Do you need new yam from Zaki-Biam, Benue State?

What are some interesting weapons that originated in Africa?

Does Gram-free pay Nigerians at all? If no, why?

Why are most successful doctors in America and England are Nigerian, but the president of Nigeria leaves the country to see other doctors?

Luka John Benjamin Clergy at Living Faith Church Worldwide (2013–present) August 2

The major factors here are poor remuneration, poor facilities and working condition, and job satisfaction. Many of our health professionals are overworked. A doctor is supposed to see a maximum of 20 patients a day but they are seeing about 150 in a day. Certainly by the time he gets to 50 he is already exhausted. Even a nurse that is supposed to see about four patients has to take care of 50 patients in a ward, certainly he/she will get tired. The truth is that in Nigeria the working environment for many doctors is very hostile. Many doctors see patients that they can treat or intervene on their issues die in front of them because the hospitals they are working in does not have the necessary equipment to take care of them. Many patients in dire need for help don't have enough money for the kind of services they need at that particular time. I can tell you many doctors are spending fortunes on patients that they are not related to because it's painful to see patients die.

So, if we have our NHIS fully functional and we can always treat any patient, I can tell you many doctors will have job satisfaction because at the end of the day you have saved so many lives. But by the time you don't have that, you will be dissatisfied. The remuneration of doctors is very poor, if you go to other climes, what we are paid here is just 10 percent of what they collect and they respect doctors, they put you in that right position where you feel very important. We don't have good funding for maintenance for hospitals in the country. The few doctors that we have are overworked and are not appreciated, these are some of the reasons why so many of them are leaving unfortunately.

Related Links

How can I deal with the issue of a BVN on a watchlist, or do I get another BVn?

What are the major products in Nigeria?

What are the causes of the killings in Jos, Nigeria?

Why do people always think Nigeria is the largest production of oil and gas in Africa?

Why do people hate Nigerians?

Is it possible for foreign aid to go to the citizens directly and bypass the corrupt governments such as Nigeria?

Why was Africa a fertile ground for slave trade?

Do you think the proposed digital Naira by the Central Bank of Nigeria succeed?

Do you think Boko Haram and ISWAP will take over the Nigerian government if left unchecked?

If the bandits could successfully carry out an attack on Nigeria Defense Academy (NDA), how safe are the ordinary citizens of Nigeria?

Which state has the highest demand for yam in Nigeria?

Do you need new yam from Zaki-Biam, Benue State?

What are some interesting weapons that originated in Africa?

Does Gram-free pay Nigerians at all? If no, why?

Why do Nigerians believe that their traditional methods or ways of treating ailments is no longer effective?

Why is Nigeria not a prepared destination for tourists?

Victor Dirikebamor

Storyteller Updated May 8, 2020

Preferred, you mean?

From the mountains and hills in the North and West with lakes and waterfalls here and there.

Down to the mangroves, the beaches– overlooking the Atlantic Ocean. Hills, more waterfalls and level lands– thick with woods and wildlife that would wow even the maker, in the South.

With marvellous people and rather tedious beings in between to make it a complete little world right here:

Why is Nigeria amongst the least preferred when it comes to tourism?

Don't mix this up, I've been to all zones in Nigeria, it's a wonderful land.

Related Links

Why Nigeria lacks tourists? Is tourism still underdeveloped in Nigeria?
What is a popular tourist destination?
Why should I never visit Nigeria?
What are the best tourist destinations in Nigeria?
What is it like to be a tourist in Nigeria?
Is Nigeria safe for tourists?

When I'm on top of the tabletop mountains in the plateau, everything, even time seems to stop moving, life worries can't be found here or there, and at that moment all you do is to wonder.

You strain your eyes to see further but can't, and sometimes your heart ache because of it, but the cool breeze compensates for that and causes one to smile in awe.

There are wonderful sights here, with cultures that will definitely wow a lot of people, so why isn't people coming as much as they should? Why is Nigeria not making money from tourism as much as we should?

Nigeria is not the safest place on Earth, neither is it the safest in the west of Africa, hence even our leaders and most Nigerians don't consider her as their first choice– the majority of us go on vacation abroad.

Until we tackle safety Nigeria would never make tangible revenue from tourism, which is a big loss, considering dozens of countries stay afloat from the proceeds of tourism alone.

People of any colour, sex and size should be free to move about, all over the country, seeing what they want to see without worry but that is quite impossible in parts of Nigeria.

I will be lying if I told you otherwise!

Does that mean people don't come?

They do, a lot of them, but most of them know where to go to and just don't dart around as you can do in dozens of other countries.

The Calabar Carnival is always teeming with foreigners from all over.

You could find hundreds of foreigners all over Nigeria who are here not just for work but fun, but most of those people have a local with them, telling them where to go and what not to do– you should do the same too until the leaders put in place better safety measures.

In all, the sights and sounds in Nigeria are worth it and far outrank the worries.

All you need to do is to be careful and ask the locals questions.

Also read: How safe is Nigeria for a visitor — How exactly do Nigerians treat Foreigners THE AFRICAN EAGLE

Related Links

Why Nigeria lacks tourists? Is tourism still underdeveloped in Nigeria?
What is a popular tourist destination?
Why should I never visit Nigeria?
What are the best tourist destinations in Nigeria?
What is it like to be a tourist in Nigeria?
Is Nigeria safe for tourists?

Why should I never visit Nigeria?

Osazua Iruedo Manager (2017–present) Updated October 11, 2018

I think you should never visit Nigeria.

Nigeria is the music capital of Africa. Wizkid is here. 2face is here. Davido is here. The groove is here. Chances are you might prefer our type of music, Afrobeat, high life, afropop and our groove to the one in your country. Life here can be very contagious.

How will you even cope in the midst of our Yoruba demons? I don't mean the demons that were thrown from heaven. A Yoruba demon is a young man of Yoruba descent who has the gift to effortlessly make a lady fall head over heels in love with him. This one's are good looking and knows the cloths and attire that suits them perfectly. This demons are so intelligent that you might feel intimidated. Would you want to be intimidated? Another reason why you should never visit Nigeria.

